At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I come precisely to that part of the speech by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre where he asked that the guaranteed income supplement be granted without any means test. I fully agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on that point, as well as some of my colleagues in the Ralliement Créditiste and other hon. members I will not mention and who spoke at length on that matter.

When this amendment to the Old Age Security Act came before the house, we had anticipated the difficulties which the income test would mean for the aged people claiming the $30 supplement who would have to give an account of their income.

Mr. Speaker, last Saturday—hardly two days ago—an old lady on the verge of bursting into tears came to my office, saying that the Department of National Health and Welfare was demanding the return of an overpayment out of the $76.50 pension now being paid to her. What happened in her case? Since her husband's death, that lady had had federal, provincial and even municipal officials looking through all her papers and her bank accounts to see whether she had some income hidden somewhere. Fed up with having strangers know more about her personal affairs than she did herself, she had refused to reveal to the government what little capital she had in reserve precisely to meet possible difficulties. On those grounds, legal claim was made to the amount which it seems she had been paid and to which she was not entitled, and that without knowing exactly what her financial situation was.

This is one of the many cases of which the members are aware, I believe, concerning the old people who feel persecuted through those investigations. I therefore fully agree that the system of checking should be abolished as soon as possible, and I doubt that sending the resolution to a committee for study would improve the situation, because more protracted debates would keep the government from acting, thus delaying the setting up of a just society.

So, I feel that the government should take it upon itself to make the necessary amendments now, during the current session, to improve the act and grant immediately, and without tests, all old persons 65 years of age—as a spokesman of the government said a while ago, without waiting for the present provisions of the act to take effect—a $109 pension from the beginning of next January; or to increase the pension to $125 as proposed by the mover. Indeed, the government need not refer this resolution to a house committee; it can do so on its own.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, at this point, I merely wish to add a few words which, I trust, my colleagues can easily remember.

First of all, I congratulate my good friend for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for having proved, once again, as always, that he is an inveterate defender of those classes of society which certainly need help.

I should also like to congratulate those who have spoken in this regard, for I feel that this is more than a question of dollars. Although we, in this corner of the house, at times feel that we need field glasses to see your elegance in the chair, Mr. Speaker, nonetheless we are members of this house and we want to express our opinions as much as possible. I trust that note will be taken of this. I say this is not merely a question of dollars, and I feel that if we grant everyone $125 this year, next year it will be $135, $140 or $150.

In my opinion, the most disadvantaged segment of our population is that which is over 65. Why? Because it is a problem which those who are 30, 40 or 50 have never thought about and have never tried to solve. The answer is simple. Today, under our present economic system, people retire at 65. Some like to be called pensioners and others do not. Anyway, whether they like it or not, they are pensioners. These people find it difficult to make ends meet and often die soon after they retire. I think that we should give greater consideration to the problem of ageing.

My hon. friend mentioned earlier Professor Baetz. I might suggest that he read an article written by Dr. Bortz entitled Our Ageing Population. That, I think, is the whole problem: gerontology.

As an example, there is no amount appropriated for gerontology in the estimates of the National Research Council of Canada. In 1960, people over 65 years made up 8.6 per cent of the population of Canada and 10 years from now the proportion will be 10 to 12 per cent. What are we going to do with the aged? Shall we give them $140, $150? In my view, it is not only a question of rehabilitating them but an economic question as well.

Medicine is making constant progress, whether we like it or not. The estimated span of life nowadays is 72 years. Within 10 years, perhaps it will reach 76 or 77 years. People will enjoy a green old age and perfect health. Old people will be in a certain way useless to society. I believe we are making a mistake. That is the reason why I said a moment ago that this is the problem of the people who are 30, 40 and 50, and they are the ones who should endeavour to set up a scheme of occupational therapy. This is called ergotherapy in medical terms. It is a kind of therapy which makes it possible for those people to enjoy the economic advantages available instead of suffering the disadvantages which seem to be their lot.

If we remove these people from the labour market at the age of 65, if their number increases in 10 or 12 years, as I said earlier, our productivity will certainly decrease. Now, if our productivity decreases, another group of people will have to work more to balance it out. These people raise problems in the field of housing, for instance.

Earlier I heard my very good friend talk about an old lady who came to his office. He is very lucky to have seen only one; I have seen them by the hundreds. Every day for instance, I see people who need drugs. They do not have the means to obtain them and even if they received $125 or $150 a month, they would be poorer than if they could be covered by a drug insurance. If these people could be assisted in other fields, besides money, it would be a lot better in my opinion.

We were talking a while ago of statistics; I have here figures that are quite surprising. In the United States, for instance, it is said that the population will show an increase of 20 per cent in the next decade, while the number of workers will increase only by 6 per cent. Twenty years from now, if those figures are correct, and as they can be ascertained in the book entitled America Next Twenty Years, the population will increase by 40 per cent, but the increase in the number of workers will be only 10 per cent. This means that a worker will not only be self-supporting but able to provide for one person and a half, with all that is coming as concerns labour reform, etc.—

[English]

They will have to support themselves and three and a half other persons. In other words, to maintain today's standard of living tomorrow's worker will have to more than double his activity.

[Translation]

Then people having reached the age of 65 can perform certain functions, that is true. According to statistics, five out of eight persons over 65 can accomplish a great deal of work, and interesting work too. And this will not penalize those less than 65 years old, because after all, it is a penalty. It is a penalty because as people over 65 cannot work, people less than 65 have to pay a tax. In the mean time, this deprives the taxation department of some revenues that could be obtained by levying a tax on people over 65 who earn something.

This means, therefore, that we are living in a rapidly changing society, in a society that seems to seek itself. In short we live in a sick society and it is up to us to legislate, not in a unilateral sense, but in a sense that could bring something practical to this society which is changing too rapidly, I would say.

It is up to us to give funds, to induce researchers, especially in geriatrics, to find solutions to the serious problem of ageing. Nowadays, university people are trying to find vaccines, everything is being done to extend the limits of life. But once a person is 65 years old, we abandon him. He is alone in life. I think those people are the most destitute, the most unfortunate. They still feel able to do something and we are not enabling them to do anything that would permit them to become more or less an asset to society. I think that we still need experienced people today, people who have been through economic hardships like the older members of this house knew in 1933. I feel that it rests with the Canadian people to wake up and to be sensitized to that important problem; it is a problem of the survival for a nation.

Do we realize that, with the pill, one day we will have to cope with the fall in the birth-rate? We speak about genocide in Biafra and many other things. The real genocide is committed by the white man and will eventually experience the consequences. We do not have to worry about it, Mr. Speaker. When we are still dashingly young we do not think about tomorrow or illness, we do not think that one day we will be 65 years of age and that we will be retired from the Canadian economic life.

Now, I would like this matter to be taken into serious consideration and every effort made so that the people will understand that the real problem is not that of a $125 pension.

I greatly admire those who have served the country, whether it be in the public service or in the armed forces, in the defence of our rights on foreign battlefields during the last three wars. I have great confidence in these people, and if it were possible for me to do so, I would give them everything, because they deserve it. I think the fact of giving something is only a poultice on a wound; it is not a treatment.

I believe that today we should not work out compromise policies but rather planning policies that would at last bring about a sound economic system that would likely benefit the young people who are 65 years of age, because at that age, we can still be young, Mr. Speaker.

There are some people who are still active at 80. As a matter of fact, Professor Dudley White, the great American cardiologist, celebrated his 80th birthday last year. I think we need people who have lived that long, because their lives have been interesting. They knew how to use their heads and their hands to do something and eliminate the fatal boredom of those who no longer feel useful past the age of 65. All soldiers, young and old, are needed by society, particularly experienced people such as those and people who only ask for an opportunity to do something useful for a society that appears to be very sick.

I would like to add that if that policy is not rejuvenated and does not attempt to make gerontology an active science, as is done today in the United States where millions of dollars are spent on research in the fields of geriatrics, gerontology or the study of senility, we shall find no solution to our problems. Even if we were to create all kinds of machinery to make fine finished products, if nobody can use them our manufacturing activity will be useless.

It is all very well to read books, it is all very well to write poetry at 65 or after. We prefer to read poetry in our free time in order to spend our valuable time in being useful to people, to Canada, more especially to our youth—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At seven o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

[English]

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the house would agree to revert to motions so that I could move the motion to constitute the committee on external affairs and national defence.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE —LIST OF PERSONNEL

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the special committee appointed on September 12, 1968, has the honour to present the following as its first report:

Your committee recommends that the standing committee on external affairs and national defence be composed of the following members: Mr. Alexander, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Asselin, Mr. Brewin, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Cafik, Mr. de Bané, Mr. Fairweather, Mr. Forrestall, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Groos, Mr. Harkness, Mr. Laniel, Mr. Laprise, Mr. Legault, Mr. Lewis, Mr. MacLean, Mr. Macquarrie, Mr.

Marceau, Mr. McIntosh, Mr. Ouellet, Mr. Penner, Mr. Prud'homme, Mr. Roberts, Mr. Ryan, Mr. Smith (Northumberland-Miramichi), Mr. Stewart (Cochrane), Mr. Thompson, Mr. Wahn, Mr. Winch.

I move that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING PERIOD, RESPECTING INTEREST RATES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Olson (for Mr. Benson) for the second reading of Bill No. C-111, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, just before the private members hour I was saying it is a well known fact that the Farm Improvement Loans Act is administered by the banks. Some time ago the banks informed the finance committee of this house that they aimed to lend out about 30 per cent of their money in what are generally conceived to be small loans. I am really more than a bit disappointed that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), who is now back in Canada, has not taken a greater interest in this debate because the manner in which banks operate and their service to Canadians come under his jurisdiction. I recognize that if the minister had incorporated a fixed interest rate in this bill the banks might not lend any money at all under its terms. I ask how far the banks are prepared to go to serve the Canadian people and the various segments of Canadian industry? A number of years ago when the whole question of banking was being thoroughly studied by the finance committee we were informed that western Canada is a bank depository surplus area, and that it provides a depository surplus from which banks can lend money.

At the resolution stage of this bill the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) stated that the banks became hesitant to lend money at 5 per cent under this legislation, even before the act ran out on June 30 of last year. We are not in any way saying that they have to lend all their money at 5 per cent. I would not suggest that they should not make a profit on lending money, but I do say that in giving a bank a charter we stipulate that it has to provide a service to the community. This is a licence which banks should dearly cherish. They should be prepared to help out various segments of the economy if help is required, and especially so under the terms of this legislation, which provide a government guarantee.

I have taken a rough look at this bill, and after doing so I wonder what the Minister of Finance has in mind. Is he trying to assist small banking companies? Is he trying to assist trust companies and loan companies? When he was speaking on the hustings the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said his government would set up a separate policy for small farmers, giving them more aid than is available to farmers who are already on economic units. But this bill suggests that the government is giving aid to small banks and near banks, the latter being a term that was applied to such companies some years ago. This bill is an attempt to benefit the near banks and bring them under the government guarantee, something they had not enjoyed previously. There is really no heart shown for the agriculture industry in this legislation.

The minister said that the act came into being in 1945, and I am the first to agree with him that it has served a great purpose since that time. From July to September of last year something like $55 million was lent by the banks under the terms of the Farm Improvement Loans Act. There was a government guarantee at that time. I would like to know how much money the banks lent for farm machinery in the same period this year, without a guarantee?

I know the banks are telling the Minister of Finance that this government guarantee is not necessary any more, that the agricultural industry is a reliable one, and that this guarantee is not really worth a 1 per cent interest rate. They are telling the minister that they have to charge farmers a high rate of interest. If that be the case, then why are machinery sales during the first seven months of this year down 30 per cent in Saskatchewan, 26 per cent in Alberta and 22.8 per cent in Manitoba? That is a drastic reduction. It is interesting to link that with the fact that the farm improvement loans legislation was not in effect for a three or four month period.

Mr. Olson: That is part of the reason.

Mr. Horner: If the minister admits that that is part of the reason, then he admits that the government guarantee is worth something.

Mr. Olson: Right.

Mr. Horner: This is what we have been trying to enunciate quite clearly. I have asked the minister a number of times what the formula will be, and how much it is worth. As recorded at page 602 of Hansard he said it was worth something but he did not know how much, and he was not prepared to give us a set formula.

The agricultural industry is a basic one in Canada. The Economic Council has said that it it sadly lagging behind the agricultural industry in the United States, but I do not believe it is that far behind. It says, further, that it will take us 20 years to catch up with the United States, and points out that the U.S. agriculture industry has had greater access to and made greater use of capital than Canadian farmers.

I note that the Minister of Finance has returned to the house. I urge the Minister of Agriculture, who knows the situation very well, to use his best offices with the Minister of Finance to fix a formula so that in effect we will not be asked to give the government a pig in a poke, with carte blanche to fix the interest rate as high as it likes. We know what the government has done to house builders and to people who want homes. It has set the interest rate for mortgages at 2 per cent above the rate for long term borrowings by the government. We think this is too high for the agriculture industry, which serves a very necessary purpose in the Canadian economy.

Let us check the budget speeches of the last two ministers of finance. They indicate that the balance of payments situation in Canada has been assisted to a great extent by increases in exports of Canadian wheat. Let us hear what the Minister of Agriculture intends to do about bankers setting the interest rates.

During the last election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the agricultural industry today is in difficulty because of rising costs of operation. The cost of the necessary capital is one of the major factors. The Economic Council of Canada has suggested that the use of more capital by the agriculture industry is one method of assisting the Canadian industry to catch up with its counterpart in the United States. I hope the minister keeps this in mind when he deals with the bankers. I hope he will also bear in mind that the government controls banking in this country. Not long ago when the Mercantile Bank was to be taken over by the First National Bank in New York the government would not allow that to happen. We know the government controls banks in this country because they are the ones who issue bank charters. These banks have to be told that the agriculture industry is necessary to the general economy of Canada and that it is an obligation on the part of the banks to service that industry by providing capital at a reasonable interest rate.

I realize that the bankers will say they pay 6 per cent on invested money, and that they cannot possibly lend money at 6 per cent. Only a few years ago they were making loans at 5 per cent, yet the statutory limit was 6 per cent. That is one per cent off the statutory limit.

Does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) intend to inform this house during second reading what formula will be devised so that the interest rate will be 1 per cent below the prime lending rate? If he assures us that he will do so, I will have no objection and I do not think many others will object. But we have had no such assurance.

The Minister of Agriculture has said that he believes the government guarantee is worth something, but the Minister of Finance has not indicated what he believes is the value of the charter to these banks. He has told us that these banks are serving various segments of the economy.

In 1945 banks were lending money at 6 per cent without difficulty. The government provided a guarantee and instructed the banks to lend at 5 per cent. The Economic Council report shows that the banks provided huge amounts of money at that percentage rate. I believe it was something of the order of $2 billion. Surely if they have been able to lend that amount of money at 1 per cent less than the prime borrowing rate they can continue to do so now.

We have removed the ceiling on bank interest rates and have allowed them to fluctuate. Will this money be made available to the agricultural industry at 1 per cent less than the prime borrowing rate? If the minister does not like that idea, would he please inform the house what formula he intends to work out?

For the last 20 years the government has felt that the agricultural industry required an interest rate of 1 per cent less than the statutory limit; but that industry today is in even worse difficulty and requires more assistance. The sales of farm machinery are down quite drastically. There is conclusive evidence that the industry needs assistance as badly as it did in 1945 or 1955.

The minister may well suggest that the banks will not lend money if we do not increase the interest rate. That is the crux of the difficulty. Surely the minister can assure us that he take action to force them to make this capital available. The government has given these institutions the right to lend money, and, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) said when he was sitting to my left on the Social Credit benches, this right gives the banks the opportunity to make money. I am sure he remembers that old formula, though he may have pushed it out of his mind.

These banks should be asked to provide service in order to assist this basic industry in Canada. As the minister has said, this measure will allow other institutions such as the Caisses Populaires and, I suppose, the treasury branches in Alberta and the credit unions throughout the country to make loans. I should like to ask him to indicate what percentage of total farm improvement loans will be made by these so-called near banks. I suggest that percentage will not be very high. I have no objection to this idea and I think the minister has shown some initiative in this regard, but he knows full well that the percentage of these loans made by near banks will be very small. He is nodding his head. I am sure we agree that the majority of the loans under farm improvement legislation will be made by the chartered banks.

What authority has the government to force these banks to serve this basic industry in this country? The minister has said that the guarantee is of some value. I agree, but I urge him to consider this whole matter very seriously. Over the years the agricultural industry has played a major part in boosting the economy of this nation. Many people are employed by farm machinery producers, and much of this equipment is shipped to western Canada. This means a great deal to the economy when machine sales are high. For the past few years there has been an average of about $200 million spent on farm machinery in western Canada alone. This is big business.

We are prepared to allow speedy passage of this legislation but we want to be assured that there will be safeguards. The minister cannot ask us to give him carte blanche authority in setting interest rates. We must look after this industry. We already have many people in the cities today who are untrained and unskilled and we do not want another group of people from the farms moving to the urban areas. We must do something to keep these people on the farms. This can only be done by providing the required money at a reasonable interest rate.

What has the Minister of Finance said to the bankers in this country about these interest rates? While this bill has not yet been passed, the minister must have had conversations with bankers. There has been a suggestion made that this legislation was ready last February. If it was ready then, the minister has surely had the opportunity to discuss it with bank managers. Will he not inform the house about these conversations? Can he give us an indication of how these people intend to deal with this legislation?

Surely the Minister of Finance can get up in this debate before we start a clause by clause study of the bill and tell us the thinking of the banks. Surely he has talked to the chartered banks on this matter and knows what they will have to have in order to lend money to the agricultural industry. We have it from the Minister of Agriculture that the government guarantee is worth something. Surely the Minister of Finance can tell us what the banks think the government guarantee is worth. I think it is his duty as Minister of Finance, piloting this bill through, to tell us what the banks think the government guarantee is worth and what he thinks the charters of the banks are worth, because after all he is the man who is handling the finances of this country.

It cannot be overemphasized that this piece of legislation has been very successful, particularly in the past 23 years. Over $2 billion has been lent to farmers, and the loss has been as low as one-tenth of one per cent. Surely the Minister of Finance owes it to the house to tell us what procedure he is going to use. Has he discussed the matter with the banks? What is their attitude about this piece of legislation? We cannot let it flounder and die because the banks are allowed to set too high an interest rate. The banks must be concerned about other matters.

I am sure the government would agree with the inspector general of banks, who about two years ago said to the finance committee that there is no real guide that can be used, but it has been the rule of thumb that 30 per cent of the money is put out in the way of small loans to small businessmen and farmers alike. Surely that is still the policy; but I would like to hear it from the Minister of Finance so that I may be reassured that this useful piece of legislation will continue to be of service to the agricultural industry.

There has been a great deal of concern across the country, particularly this year, because every time you have a difficult harvest year there is a rush on buying farm machinery. The Minister of Agriculture knows this. If there is a difficult harvest year the farmers say, "We have to get the crop off the land. We have to buy a new combine, and time is short." Machinery sales increase in proportion to the difficulty of the harvest. This has been a difficult harvest year. We need to be told in a hurry what the interest rates will be and whether this legislation will prove useful this fall and in the years ahead.

There is another problem with which I would like the Minister of Finance to deal. I refer to a practice that has sprung up in the last year or so. The machinery companies say to a farmer, "We will sell you a combine interest free. If you buy it this fall you will not have to pay any interest on it until next spring." The banks have been reluctant to do this. They say to the farmer, "Why did you not come to us in the fall?" The farmer says, "I have it interest free now, so why should I take out a loan for it?" Surely the Minister of Finance has had some discussion with the banks in this regard. The fact is that the banks have simply been reluctant to make use of the legislation because of the uncertainty with regard to the interest rate.

I will summarize my remarks briefly, Mr. Speaker. We want to know how good the guarantee is. I know that the Minister of Finance thinks it is good. How good do the banks think it is? How good does the Minister of Finance think the charter is to the banks? What percentage of loans does the Minister of Agriculture think will be made by the so-called near banks who are included in this legislation? We have the right to know some of the details of the program before we get into a clause by clause study of the bill.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I recall that the other day when we were discussing this legislation in resolution form it was suggested that there was an urgency here; that it was important that this legislation go through quickly because the farmers were waiting and needed the credit that would be available under the legislation. They needed this credit program working again, because for all practical purposes it has not been working for almost a year.

This piece of legislation is the one that is supposed to be most urgent. If this is so, I really do not quite comprehend why such extensive changes are being made to the act at this time. I would have thought that if it was considered urgent—and I would have to agree that it is—it would have been advisable to take the act as it was, put it before this house, and then take a later opportunity to put some of the suggested changes before a standing committee so they could be carefully considered.

I believe that at least one or two fairly important departures have been made in this bill. One is the inclusion of land as an added security or as an added purpose for which money can be lent. This will be the first time land has been included in the act, which as the previous speaker said came into force in 1944 or 1945. The manner in which this provision and the proposals with respect to it are included is, it seems to me, a departure from what has come to be, shall I say the established approach to farm credit in this country. Indeed this does not apply to Canada only but to the United States, our neighbour to the south, and Europe. In effect, comparatively speaking this is short term credit for the purpose of buying land, or perhaps more properly I should say it is intermediate term credit.

In the immediate post second world war period our farmers were starved of credit. They were short of credit; they could not get it because the banks and the standard lending institutions would not make it available at that time, for understandable reasons, one being that they had taken a pretty good shellacking in the 1930's. I can recall the farm organizations, the farm unions and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture saying that a credit program was needed for farmers.

One of the principles put forward by these organizations and the economists was that long term credit was needed for the purchase of land because short term credit is a risky method of putting up money for such a purchase. All the economists that I know seemed to agree with this principle. So the program was started with a 20 year term for repaying the loan. That term was increased to 25 years, then 30 years, and in the last two or three years economists have been talking about perpetual mortgages on farms.

The idea has been that money would be lent and there would be no real intention of repaying it; that it would simply be a charge against the productivity of the land and transferred from one generation to another. I do not know that I agree with this idea, but it is a trend in the thinking.

One of the economists at the University of Manitoba gave a talk on this subject a year ago. Now, under this legislation, we are regressing when we say we will go back to the granting of intermediate credit on land. We expect that the purchaser will pay this off in 15 years, which is contrary to our previous policy. Now we know that under the present circumstances farmers are not able to build up their own capital. I think it was Mr. John Dawson, who was with the Economic Council of Canada, who said that there was only a short period in the late 1940s and early 1950s during which farmers were able to make enough income from their farms to build up sufficient capital to replace their machinery and to expand and develop their farms, taking advantage of the new technology. The same report from the Economic Council of Canada stated that from time to time we had been depending on credit, and according to most predictions we will continue to do so with the greater use of the new technology.

However, the legislation before us proposes quite the opposite and, in fact, goes against this trend. It may be that some new wisdom has descended on the Department of Agriculture, which has come to the conclusion that this trend is no longer the right one and that we had better consider a new way. This seems to be the sort of approach which is now acceptable, to start a new trend. Perhaps the legislation before us reflects the new trend. For example, within our credit programs we have developed a new approach whereby credit supervisors in the Farm Credit Corporation are able to say to a farmer, "if you want this loan of several thousand dollars, we will sit down with you and see how you can use this money, and how it can be tailored to your operation". Under the farm improvement loan proposals in this bill we will leave it to an insurance company, a trust company or to a bank, whoever may be making the loan, to decide to whom to grant the loan, wherever they think the security is sound, and that we will then underwrite it. If it turns out badly we will pick up the pieces. I do not consider this to be a really new advance.

It was only a year or two ago that in the maritimes the Farm Credit Corporation decided not to collect payments for a year. I suppose this was helpful to the farmers there and I hope that since then their situation has improved. What will happen if the same situation should arise again in other parts of the country, such as in western Canada this year with the slow grain sales and damaged and wet crops? We may well have to take that sort of action again. So I say that this legislation does not provide an answer to the problems with which we may be faced.

The matter of the interest rate was already discussed here by the previous speaker. I am not sure that I can add a great deal, except to state the obvious, namely that we know that there is a limited earning capacity in farming and the only thing that we can do to help is to keep down the interest rate. Such are the circumstances now that farmers are being hemmed in on all sides. With respect to grain, we are limited by the GATT agreement, and the international situation is tough on farmers.

A few days ago we had here in Ottawa the group of corn growers who have requested us to block purchases from the United States. This is a pretty difficult problem. We have trade relations with our neighbour to the south, the ramifications of which have to be considered seriously. However, in the credit field we can take whatever action we consider to be appropriate in the circumstances under which we are operating. This also applies to housing. I suppose that the government believes that higher interest rates and short term loans for land is the appropriate action at the present time. Apparently this is considered appropriate because it is proposed to us. The government proposes to put trust companies, insurance companies and banks back in the lending field, with government guarantees, although these institutions have had considerable difficulties in this respect. This is not necessarily a reflection on the institutions but rather a reflection on the facts of life. When loans are being made to farmers the situation is different from when they are made for the purpose of apartment building, or when they are made to other sectors of industry which are more secure.

These are the points I wished to make with regard to the bill before us. I hope they will receive serious consideration when the bill is dealt with clause by clause.

Mr. Stanley Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any length at this stage of our consideration of the bill. However, I wish to make a few remarks, because of some fears which I have with regard to this legislation.

After considering the various amendments which will be introduced, one of the paramount questions which occurs to me has to do with the rate of interest to be charged. This is the crux of the matter, the purpose of the bill.

Although other supporting amendments may be generally acceptable for various reasons, I think the main question which comes to us as members of the opposition is what criteria the minister will use in determining the interest rates, and on what basis the farmers will have to decide from day to day whether it would be in their interest to hold off borrowing money or whether it would be in the interest of the machine dealers to try to stall a sale for a month or so, thereby giving the farmers the best advantage.

We are very concerned over the fact that at this late stage the minister cannot tell us of the results of his discussions with the banking institutions, even though the bill has now been introduced in the house. I do not know how much discussion has taken place to date, but I do know if the minister does not have any answers now then he should be concerned. Perhaps if these bills are passed the banking fraternity will tell us that they can only give us an interest rate comparable with that which they grant house builders. As the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) has said, such an interest rate would not be in our interests. I am very much concerned because I really thought that when this government took on the job of administering the country, they would be following the pattern advocated during the election campaign.

I happened to obtain a statement which was made by the Prime Minister in Winnipeg on June 2, concerning small farm policy. I believe that the interest rate which is set will certainly have an effect on the small farmer. I am concerned because I thought the Liberal party advocated a specific policy for the small farmer. I quote from this statement:

> While the situation varies from commodity to commodity, in general 30 per cent of Canada's farmers produce 70 per cent of our agricultural production. This great variation in farm size, and with it productivity, renders the development of agricultural programs appropriate to varying farm sizes most difficult. The problem could be met through the institution of a system of farm differentiation by productivity and size. This differentiation could provide a basis for modifying programs to meet the particular needs of farms of different sizes. The concept is that farmers themselves could reach the decision as to their own classification for this purpose. All farm programs could then be designed taking into consideration the special needs of the smaller farmers and the social aspect of such programs could be recognized and measured. Programs for all other farms could be those consistent with a larger scale viable operation. In return for the differential level of assistance the smaller farmer could undertake that at the time the farm passed from his possession he would not dispose of it for other than farm consolidation or for movement into the public sector. Thus the special programs designed for farmers in this category would not perpetuate the problem.

The farm improvement loan provision would be extended and integrated with the Farm Credit Corporation. So far as I can see, the only integration is going to be a higher rate of interest. The other day when I took part in the debate I suggested that the government was deliberately trying to eliminate the small farmer. The minister challenged my statement, and as recorded at page 771 of Hansard, he said:

> I say to him with all sincerity that the government is deliberately trying to help the small farmer by passing this legislation.

However, even the Winnipeg Free Press of June 4 had to make this statement in its editorial:

> —the long run results would be the elimination of small, uneconomic units and the large subsidies paid to them.

I repeat that the increasing of interest rates is a deliberate policy on the part of this government. This will mean that the small farmer will just have to go. I am concerned about the method the minister will use to determine the rate of interest. I wonder what will happen every time the Bank of Canada adjusts the rate. Are we then to expect a change in the rate for farm improvement loans? Will an order in council immediately be passed? Will this be one of the responsibilities that the cabinet will have, to follow suit immediately? If there is an election in the offing, will it be in the interests of the governing party to amend the rate of interest in order to obtain some advantage? It may be in the interests of certain segments of the economy to have a tight money policy, but that might not be in the interests of the agricultural sector.

Since the minister is a farmer he knows, for example, that even though government financial policy may dictate a tightening up of the amount of credit available, in the springtime the farmer must have fertilizer. The minister knows full well that there are other expenses in the spring in connection with seeding which farmers cannot avoid. Either the farmer puts in a crop or he does not. Will this policy apply all across the board? What will happen if we have a situation such as we have this year, one wherein, when harvest time arrives, we have not taken off the crop? We still have to carry on. Will that high interest rate prevent us from going to the bank? What are we to expect? Can the minister give us some idea? Can he tie his formula to anything so that we will not be guessing from day to day?

I have already mentioned some of the other amendments that will be introduced. It is interesting to note that one section of the bill will provide for the reduction in the amount of the guarantee. The purpose of this provision may be to induce some of the lending institutions to grant money, but the banks may find themselves in a position where a great deal of money has been lent, so they will restrict tending operations. They may withhold money from the farming community. The farmers may find themselves in a position where instructions have come from the head office in the banking institutions to hold back on loans to farmers, despite the government guarantee. Will the government guarantee mean anything?

Before this debate ends, I hope the minister will give us some idea of what we may expect. Surely we should not be dependent on the whim of the minister, or the need for adjustment of interest rate prior to an election, in order to make it clear that the government is acting in the interests of the farmer. When we are putting in a crop, we cannot have a suggestion that we should wait a couple of weeks. I do not think this would be in the interests of an industry that is so dependent upon weather and other seasonal factors. At this particular stage I think the minister would be helpful if he could give us an indication of his thinking on this subject. If he has not done any thinking, he could at least give us some indication of the stage the discussions have reached with the banking institutions.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Selkirk): These are bleak times on the Canadian prairies, Mr. Speaker. In addition to mother nature not being very accommodating this fall, we have a government that is not very accommodating. The minister knows full well that with the rising costs of production the last thing the Canadian farmer needs is something which adds to the cost of production. I feel we are being asked to do that very thing by agreeing to a proposition that will mean an increase in the cost of capital to the farmers.

The minister is the sort of man who understands the industry. I ask him, is he not asking the opposition for too much when he asks them to endorse a blank cheque by giving to the cabinet the power to set interest rates, when we are given no indication of the level at which they might be set? I understand that the old interest limit under farm improvement loans is untenable, given present rates of interest in the money market. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I add my voice to that of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and my colleague from Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) in submitting that the minister really must give us some idea about the general nature of the formula that the cabinet will follow when it meets to prescribe the interest rate referred to in this bill. The hon. member for Crowfoot has a very logical point when he argues that the value of the government's guarantee to the chartered banks, and to the other money lending institutions for that matter, must be something definite and concrete. It is a question of how much.

Perhaps it is difficult to arrive at the value of this guarantee to the banks in precise percentage terms. But, Mr. Speaker, this is what the officials of the Department of Finance are for. I am sure that they know how to operate a slide rule, and to meet and consult with financial experts. They must be in a position to give us some pretty tangible idea how much lower the interest rate chargeable under this act will be because of the fact that a guarantee is extended by the government of Canada.

The other day, when the minister was responding to the different arguments that had been put forward by members during the debate on the resolution stage he attempted to answer some of them. I am not suggesting that he did not answer some of them with a good deal of logic, but he really did not come to grips with some of the arguments. One in particular has to do with the fact that the farmers of Canada have to compete with agricultural producers in other parts of the world particularly with those who operate in climates much the same as ours.

In the United States I understand—the minister did not indicate otherwise and I am sure his officials gave him information on this point—that the interest rate charged to farmers under the federal farm loan administration, which is the credit granting agency for farmers in the United States, is still at 5 per cent. If this be so, Mr. Speaker, what effect will it have on Canadian farmers if we proceed to increase interest rates charged them by one, one and a half or two percentage points?

From a brief conversation I had with the hon. member for Crowfoot, I think it might be reasonable at the present time to think in terms of an interest rate set at somewhere around 6 or 6½ per cent, and perhaps we on this side should force the issue by proposing an amendment. Personally Mr. Speaker, I would be inclined to support an amendment which laid down a formula by which the cabinet would have to abide when it sets an interest rate under this legislation. It seems to me that the interest rate under the act should be limited to that level that meets the cost to the banks, of obtaining money, plus just enough to cover the cost of administration and provide a margin of profit.

One hears it argued that we cannot expect the banks to charge a rate that would be lower than that which the banks have to pay depositors who deposit their money under certificates of deposit. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that because of action taken by this government two years ago interest rates have escalated. I understand that banks now have to pay depositors on certificates of deposit somewhere around 6 per cent. It was as high as 6¾ per cent a few months ago; but now, Mr. Speaker, there has been a slight downward movement in the cost of money and certificates of deposit are costing the bank only about 6¼ per cent. That is about how much the banks should be allowed to charge the farmers under a farm improvement loan, particularly since they have an iron clad guarantee from the people of Canada through the instrument of the government of Canada. I do not see why the minister cannot tell the house what formula the government has in mind. Would it be roughly at that level of interest that the banks have to pay on certificates of deposit, plus a small fraction beyond that? If the minister were to concur in that, then I would say it would be reasonable enough.

The issue before us, Mr. Speaker, is weighty and important. Much could be said about it, and much has already been said by hon. members on this side. The minister is under some obligation to give us just a little more information before he has a right to expect us to agree to his proposition.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my voice in the debate by making a few comments in our discussion of Bill No. C-111 to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. It is now almost a year since the benefit of the farm improvement loan legislation has gone awry and farmers across Canada have been labouring with the problem of trying to get adequate farm credit. As was pointed out earlier this evening, the Economic Council, in analysing the economic situation of the agricultural industry of this country, has indicated in no uncertain terms that one problem that is facing the industry is the lack of proper and reasonable credit.

As has been mentioned before, Mr. Speaker, and should be emphasized again, the agricultural industry is the second largest source of income for Canada. The wood, pulp and paper industry is, I think, the major source of income for Canada; but agricultural products take second place. I think hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Speaker, have realized a number of times since they took office in 1963 that it is only because of the ingenuity, the perseverance, the tenacity, the technological advance and good economic judgment of the farming industry that we have been able to bail ourselves out of a serious position, so far as the balance of trade problem is concerned.

In 1968, Mr. Speaker, we find the agricultural industry in a very serious financial position, not only because of the effect of inclement weather, frost and so on on this year's crop, but because of the lapse of the world international wheat agreement, which has caused the greatest pile-up of wheat in Canada's history.

Today our farmers owe many bills. They are staggering under the increase in overheads and the cost-price squeeze. It looks as if by design the government is trying to aggravate the situation by bringing in this bill. We are almost in the position of having to buy a pig in a poke.

I do not think this is fair to the agricultural industry, Mr. Speaker. It should have the same consideration as any other. I am greatly discouraged by some of the arguments advanced. I am sure hon. members on this side of the house from western agricultural areas, as well as those who sit opposite, representing agricultural areas, are distressed to hear it asked why the farmers should get a subsidy, why they should not fend for themselves the same as others.

I should like to remind you, Mr. Speaker, and through you the members of the house, that the farming industry is in a very unique position compared with other sectors of the economy. The farmers of this country have no basic control over their economic prospects. On the other hand, if labourers in Canada are dissatisfied with their income, then under the law they can go on strike and demand higher wages in order to obtain their share of the economy. Industry and business are the same. When I, in common with other small businessmen, find myself facing economic problems brought on by rising costs, I raise my prices in order to obtain a fair mark-up and to stay in business. It is the same with the wholesalers, and it is the same in practically every industry across this country. But the farmers are in a unique position. They must rely on mother nature. The farmer cannot go out in the spring and say, "I will leave my tractor in the shed and let it rust, because the cows will calf, the chickens will lay eggs and the pigs will farrow." The farmer is at the mercy of the market and depends, for his livelihood, on what he will be paid in a market over which he has no control.

I disagree with those who argue that the agricultural industry is not entitled to any subsidy. It is one of the basic and most important industries in the country, and consideration ought to be given to providing it with some subsidy. It is important not only to Canadian consumers in this country, but to consumers throughout the world. We all depend upon it. Anyone reading statistics and learning of the very rapid expansion of world population will realize that the agricultural industry has an important part to play in our very survival. I think therefore that we should establish a reasonable rate of interest for farmers to pay so that, so to speak, they are not buying a pig in a poke. The farmer ought to be entitled to a reasonable rate of interest. There are some who say that in the case of the agricultural industry the subsidy ought to be, possibly, 1 per cent, in order to help farmers meet their commitments and stay on top of the economic heap.

I join with other hon. members on this side of the house in urging the Minister of Agriculture to bring forward a formula of some kind so that the farmers of this country will know for certain what they must pay for their money, and will receive assurance that the rate is within reason.

The banks and other lending institutions of this country have been doing very well financially; they seem to have no financial problems, particularly since this government took the lid off the bank interest rate one year ago. We see how our financial institutions are thriving. We are proud of them; they are among the best there are. Nevertheless we, as members of this house, must seek to help the agricultural industry in its problems. Our agriculture is of the best, and we must see that it has a fair chance to survive. I again urge the Minister of Agriculture to give serious thought to writing into this bill some type of formula that will enable those engaged in farming to be assured of a fair chance of survival.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-111 is, naturally, a continuation of the resolutions we were considering the other day, when I mentioned the importance of the agricultural sector in our Canadian economy. I also maintained, among other things, that agriculture is the very basis of the economic structure of Canada. I am still of that opinion. It is one which we express everywhere in Canada and particularly in the east, without, however, discriminating on that account against other parts of the country.

For example, in order to help the western farmers, we accepted and supported legislation likely to help them, and we believe that hon. members from the west will likewise support us in our demands in the eastern part of the country, that is, a uniform agricultural policy for both eastern and western Canada.

In the past, we have noted that there were economic disparities. Now, we also have agricultural disparities. Western farmers are treated better than eastern farmers. Having to deal with many kinds of products, eastern farmers were unable to sell their products or get subsidies, when such subsidies were granted, for example, for wheat production and even for non-production of wheat.

There was a time, Mr. Speaker, when the government paid the western farmers so much per acre for not producing wheat. A few days ago, I received letters from Canadians in western Canada informing me that the wheat crop was left to rot this year, because the crop insurance was more beneficial to the western farmer than the subsidies paid by the government. This means that wheat will rot under the snow this winter, since crop insurance is more profitable than government subsidies. Now, while production is being destroyed this way, the honourable Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is introducing bills allowing farmers to get deeper into debt, to enlarge their farm by enabling them to borrow $25,000 instead of $15,000.

Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I was saying the other day: The present minister of Agriculture possesses agricultural efficiency and knowledge that are probably greater than those of any other Minister of Agriculture parliament has ever known. Only, that same Minister of Agriculture was once an active member of the Canadian Social Credit and, at that time, he violently denounced similar bills, sometimes accusing the Conservative government, sometimes the Liberal government, of wanting to crush or stifle the Canadian farmer. Today, firmly seated in the front benches, he has entirely forgotten what he said and repeated for so many years in the house.

Mr. Speaker, it is inconceivable, even incomprehensible, that a man should suddenly change his political allegiance and propose to us today what he fought yesterday, worship today what he fought yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, we are now studying bills Nos. C-110, C-111 and C-112. Those three bills, instead of helping the farmers, place them in a difficult position. A farmer will feel quite free because he will be able to borrow $25,000 to buy machinery and more land to increase the acreage he is farming at the present time. However, when the time comes to pay back capital and interests, he will find himself in a situation even more difficult than at present. The Minister of Agriculture should anticipate that. Anyhow, he knows that when the time comes for repayment, it is painful. We noticed that not only in the field of agriculture but also in every field of economic activity in Canada. Everything goes well when a loan is granted. When the time comes for repayment plus the interests, some suffer headaches. Farmers have been in that state of stagnation for many years.

In 1946, when I came to this house—22 years ago—farmers were facing exactly the same problem as today.

It was difficult for the farmer to sell his production and he could hardly borrow, either under national or provincial farm loans. At least, I know that there was a farm credit board in the province of Quebec. Now, it is a Farm Credit Corporation that governs us at this time. The government undertakes to guarantee the loans and borrowings of farmers up to $25,000, but it does not have the courage to tell them: You will not have to pay an interest rate higher than the one that has been set. Farmers are left an open prey to all the exploiters that will want to lend them money, in order that they may purchase farm lands. As a matter of fact, these lands will cost in 15 years twice as much as their original purchase price. Even if the interest rate were increased to 8, 9 or 10 per cent, the Minister of Agriculture could at the same time include in this Bill No. C-111, a subsection in which it would be stipulated that the government undertakes to pay a subsidy equal to 2, 3 or 4 per cent, so that the farmers would be assured of paying nothing more than 2 or 3 per cent interest. Then the minister would help the farmers. For the time being, with that bill the minister is convinced that he is not helping the farmer and that the finance companies will benefit from this bill. Even if one believes, at a given time, that the farmer will benefit therefrom, in the long run, it will be the financiers, those who will lend money to the farmer, who will draw the greatest advantages and, as in the past, the farmers will have to face the same problems.

As I said before, the problem does not boil down to having the farmer produce. He could produce five times more than he does now if he could only be sure of selling his production at prices which would allow him to make profits. The minister knew that when he received the delegation of the Canadian corn producers. The other day, he was told on parliament hill that these people were operating at a loss. Even though they would treble their land, their loss would only be trebled.

In the field of the dairy industry, the same problem is the same. In the field of wheat production, it is the same thing.

We are now selling our wheat to the Russians at a price lower than the costs incurred for its production in western Canada. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is aware of that. Even if western farmers were allowed to borrow $25,000 to triple the area of their farm in order to produce more wheat, if we are going to sell it at a loss, what advantage will farmers draw therefrom? Will it be profitable? We have absolutely no assurance. Such bills will not improve the standing of agriculture or assure the economic stability of farmers. Those means should not be used.

If the minister brought in a bill, for example, providing for the construction of cold storage plants throughout Canada, that would not only enable us to meet the needs of the Canadian people by storing commodities but it would also enable us to help the emergent countries of the world. Then, the farmer would be sure to sell his products at a profit and the hon. Minister of Agriculture would have saved agriculture and Canadian farmers.

What we need is action and we should stop beating around the bush. Let us not introduce any more legislation which looks for difficulties where there are none, but instead let us try to bring a solution to the problems. As I said, a farmer who borrows $10,000, $15,000, $20,000 or $25,000 may feel that he is getting substantial help, but 10 years from now, Mr. Speaker, if we are still in this house, the farmers will experience far more serious problems than they have to face now. So, I say frankly that these bills are not meant to assist the farmer; on the contrary, they tend to mortgage his farm a little more and to enslave him, and this is the fault of the present government and the one we had before.

Mr. Speaker, the farmers deserve attention from the minister, from the government and from parliament, and although we do not all come from agricultural constituencies, it is nonetheless true that agriculture is the basis of the whole national economy. As a matter of fact, L. B. Johnson, who is now president, said not so long ago, that returning to the land could be the solution to the depression now looming up in the United States.

It is the same with us. Thirty years ago, we witnessed a back-to-the-farm movement. It was said that leaving the cities to settle on farms would solve the problem of poverty amidst affluence. We practised colonization on a very large scale, and, at that time, in the northwestern part of Quebec, in the Quebec and the Lac-Saint-Jean area, in the Saguenay and even in northern Alberta and Saskatchewan, most of the parishes were founded. It was back to the land. Well, today, with the problems which crop up in the cities, I am convinced that instead of saying: Let us cut down the number of farms, the minister will have to say, as in the past: The back-to-the-farm movement might be the ideal solution to the depression in order to face the misery which is anticipated in the cities this coming winter, not within 10 years but this winter, because we will have to face an increasing number of unemployed, not because people do not have the opportunity to purchase commodities, but simply because they cannot afford them. At the present time, the farmers cannot afford to buy land or incur expenses to increase their production because they have no assurance that they will sell their surplus production, they are not even sure of selling this year's production.

Mr. Speaker, the Créditistes have but one solution: foresee the day when we decide to finance production through consumption—not through finance companies—but through the Canadian consumer, who needs food, clothing, lodging. When production is determined by the consumer, financed by the consumer, we will have done away with the blood suckers of the Canadian economy those finance companies which crush, on the one hand, the producers by mortgaging their production and, on the other hand, the consumers by mortgaging their purchasing. That is the system in which we live, and the system we fight. That is the system the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) helped us fight for years in parliament. But, today, now that he has responsibilities, not only towards his riding or the farmers of his riding, but towards the whole of Canada, the time has come for him to tell the government to act according to the needs of Canadians, of the farmers of our country who are willing to supply what the Canadian consumer needs.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): The weakness of this legislation lies in the fact that the determining of the interest rate by the governor in council leaves ground for wide latitude of action and a good deal of uncertainty. My information leads me to believe that the banks would not lend money at the present time unless there was a spread of between one half of one per cent and 1 per cent above the prime interest rate. That is near 7 per cent at the present time. For near banks and similar institutions I should think a rate of 9 per cent would be in the neighbourhood at which they would be interested. Interest rates at 9 per cent are in fact available at the present time, with some takers.

In the rural areas of western Canada there appears to be an accumulation of savings resulting in a net outflow of money from rural areas into city lending hands. I am sure this trend is a useful one and that as a nation we should encourage these savings. There is room for argument, however, that as a consequence of this the banks should be required to lend a certain percentage of the money to farmers to enable them to carry on their business. It is important that the formula by which the governor in council is to set the interest rate should be elucidated. I feel that until details of this formula are forthcoming the present bill makes little sense and may be of little value. I would urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to bring forward this formula at the earliest opportunity so as to make this debate a useful and constructive procedure.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I intend to be as brief as was my hon. friend in my comments on the bill at this stage. The minister obviously knows by now that the main point of contention here is the projected interest rate, the suggested interest rate or the unknown interest rate which faces the opposition at the present time.

There is no necessity to belabour the point in connection with the need for improved farm credit facilities. We all know that for all practical purposes no money has been lent under this legislation for some time, with the interest rate at only 5 per cent. What we had hoped for was a realistic interest rate, or a realistic formula for defining one. The minister in the resolution speaks about orders in council which may be made to prescribe maximum levels. This still leaves an area of uncertainty which causes a good deal of concern to many of us on this side of the house. As my hon. friend from Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) said, the guarantee must be worth something.

This act was established over 23 years ago in 1945 and during all that time, as far as I know, the interest rate has been fixed. As to my own attitude, if the minister looks at a speech I made in this house a year ago on this subject he will find I suggested there should be some change in the Farm Improvement Loans Act to get money to work. We know there has to be an increase or a change in the interest rate. But that it should be open-ended, without a limit, after 23 years during which it has been fixed, leaves much to be desired.

This does not only affect those of the farming community. People living in urban areas have an interest in the kind of rate which farmers have to pay. No one living in the city would contemplate getting involved in a contractual obligation if he did not know what rate of interest he would have to pay. It is evident that under the proposed bill the rate of interest is to be increased, however the rate is set. This will mean increased cost of production which will be passed on in turn to consumers, leading to a higher cost of living.

At this stage our criticism is directed against the proposition that the interest rate should be open ended after 23 years of operation during which it was set at a definite figure. Many millions of dollars were lent under this system. The minister tells us the cabinet will set this rate. Perhaps when we pass this bill in principle the minister can advise the committee which other bills involving the lending of federal moneys make provision for an open ended interest rate to be set by the cabinet. Rates of interest under the National Housing Act are not set by the cabinet, though it is true they are set in accordance with a formula.

I suggest that under this measure the farmers of this country will be playing a floating crap game with the dice loaded. They have not too much option, because they need the credit, and have the experience of turning to the government for help in this direction. As I say, they will be playing a floating crap game with a floating interest rate set by the cabinet—this month it might be a certain figure, next month it might be lower; or perhaps, because of one's friends, it might be different. The minister shakes his head, but we do not know.

We heard before this parliament began that this was to be a swinging place. But we did not appreciate that we would have swinging interest rates. It is one thing to be a swinger and another to be a cool cat. We would like to see a cool interest rate with no swinging on the ups and downs. The minister nods his head and I shall sit down, because I want to know how he will answer these questions during the committee stage. This act was passed back in March, 1945, close to the ides of March, of which we are told to beware. Mr. Speaker, unless the farmers have the benefit of a definite interest rate it will not be the ides of March we should beware, but the interest of Olson.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I noted with some interest tonight the change in the arrangements of the business of the house by which second reading of the Farm Improvement Loans Act now takes precedence over second reading of the Farm Credit Act. It seems it occurred to the minister at the last minute that the program should be altered? Did this indicate that there was some disturbance behind the scenes? Is he, perhaps, trying to put down a revolt? Is he having second thoughts? Did he receive a message from the prophetic Bible Institute of Calgary? Or is this a manoeuvre setting the stage so as to justify the change of interest rate proposed in connection with the farm credit legislation?

This bill does three main things. It changes the manner in which interest rates are set. Under the new arrangements the governor in council will have the power to set interest rates, whereas formerly the rate was fixed at 5 per cent. In the second place it extends farm improvement loan coverage to include land purchase where the land in question is added to an existing farm.

Third, it extends coverage in that it makes it possible for credit unions, caisse populaires, and trust and loan companies to make loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I approve of the principle of extending the provisions of this act to include credit unions and co-operative organizations. In the main, credit unions are working at the community level and are very knowledgeable of the needs of rural communities. Some trust and loan companies are already in the farm lending business and are familiar with the credit picture and can handle these loans effectively. Some are making farm loans at this time, but it is obvious that most lending companies are primarily interested in making a buck, rather than being concerned with the welfare of the agricultural industry.

I trust the minister, in designating eligible loan companies and others who may lend with government guarantees, will first determine that they have adequate and skilled personnel and policy to make a positive contribution to the welfare of the agricultural industry. It might also be of assistance if this were spelled out to some extent in the act, so the minister will have some legislative guidance in determining whom he should designate to make loans under the provisions of this act.

The amendment proposed in regard to the interest rate structure represents a major change, as has been pointed out by previous speakers. The minister has recounted how the banks would not lend any more money at the 5 per cent rate. The government has adopted a policy of allowing interest rates to go up and they have to take the responsibility for this situation. What the minister is now saying in effect is that the banks made him do it. But the government cannot slough off its responsibility in this way.

The argument has been made that the level of returns in agriculture at the present time is insufficient to carry high interest rates. Certainly it has been made clear that the effect of the proposed amendments would be to raise interest rates on farm improvement loans. It seems to me the government must concern itself with the direction in which these actions will take the agricultural industry.

If the government cannot or will not do something about the interest rate structure in Canada it should take a look at some of the alternatives that have been suggested during the previous debate on this matter. One suggestion that has been raised is that lending in the area of intermediate term credit might be made with government funds. In this way the level of interest rates could be restricted.

A second step that could be taken as an alternative would be to ensure through other programs—certainly not by this legislation, as the minister seemed to think we were suggesting—that the agricultural industry will receive an adequate level of returns.

The third possibility that might be considered, and I admit the administrative difficulty, would be to subsidize interest rates. Certainly it seems to me this would be preferable to allowing market forces to determine what rates of interest the farmers will have to pay for loans under this act.

There are two basic points which require consideration. The first is that parliament should be the body which sets the interest rates or the basic policy in respect of rates. The second point is that rates should be set at a reasonable level. The other major provision in this legislation will extend the act so that it will include land purchases. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) has already dealt with this question at some length and quite effectively.

Again I must ask the minister to give consideration to what this step will do to agriculture as a whole. I am suggesting that it will help large farmers the most, and these are the people who are not really in greatest need. After all, they are in a position to consider higher interest rates and this will add to the penalties and hardships on the smaller and new farm operators who are trying to enter this industry. I suggest it will result in a further scramble for land which will be backed by public guarantees. Some credit is provided by private companies now, and land purchases are being made, but this is not being done with public backing.

The change in this legislation will mean that private companies can engage in the land mortgage business with public backing and guarantees. The Farm Credit Corporation does consider lending from the viewpoint of farm units and not on a piecemeal basis. I suggest this will not be of concern to the private industry in the land mortgage field.

I suggest that this measure as it is set out could be a step in the direction of destroying the effectiveness of the Farm Credit Corporation. Certainly I think the corporation is accepted by farmers all across Canada and recognized as an agency for the betterment of the agricultural industry. I agree there are some problems in respect of present Farm Credit Corporation legislation, particularly for those farmers who wish to add a piece of land to their existing farm enterprise. I think these problems could be solved and dealt with by amendments to the Farm Credit Act rather than in this other way.

Let me suggest to the minister that most of the history of private credit in agriculture shows poor results and poor outcome. Public credit programs have helped the industry, and in this regard I should like to refer to the report of the Saskatchewan royal commission on agriculture which dealt extensively with the field of farm credit in 1955.

It has been noted in this house that this report was used as the basis for the Farm Credit Act as it was originally introduced in this house. I should like to draw the minister's attention to some of the principles that were set out by this royal commission for a public credit program. It did suggest that a farm should be treated as a unit for credit purposes. Second, it suggests that credit is needed by the young farmer with practical experience but a shortage of capital. Third, it suggests there is a greater need for credit facilities and, fourth, there is a need for an assessment of applications for credit and the income potential of the potential borrower. What we do need is more emphasis on the income potential and management ability rather than on collateral security. It was pointed out that guidance and supervision are essential to an adequate rural credit program. It was also pointed out that loan repayment periods must be longer and flexible enough to meet the argicultural situation. Those are some of the principles which I suggest should be included in any public credit program.

Let me draw the minister's attention to the fact that one of the recommendations made was that the extension of loans for fixed and working capital by a farm credit lending agency should be done by one credit agency rather than a proliferation of agencies in order to permit sound supervision. In some of the programs we now have before us we are moving away from this principle.

Questions are being asked in the agricultural industry today such as whether it is necessary to repurchase land each generation? In other words, do farmers have to live poor and die rich, as has been too often the case in the past. Is it necessary to have these high interest rates? What kind of rural communities are we building for the future?

These are some of the questions that the government must also consider. I urge that they be given careful consideration when the government is dealing with legislation such as that now before us.

Mr. L. J. Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the minister replies I should like to ask one or two questions similar to those posed by my colleague, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton).

I cannot recall whether he gave any reasons for the inclusion of land under the farm improvement loans program. I am wondering whether this is to take some of the pressure off the Farm Credit Corporation in respect of loans on small parcels of land, so as to leave Farm Credit Corporation capital available to a greater degree to large farmers, thus turning over the smaller farmers or the purchasers of small parcels of land to the tender mercies of the lovey dovey finance company and various other and sundry such organizations.

The minister and his colleagues in the cabinet can set the interest rate at whatever they want. I was sorry to hear one hon. member to my right say that he agreed an interest rate of 5 per cent was too low. I do not think that statement could be made to any farmer in this country, because if it were you would not get out of town with a whole skin. If the minister wants to do that, fine. Then I suggest that the government should proceed, as I mentioned the other day during another stage of this legislation, to set as national policy for the most basic of all industries in this country that no one under this legislation, or the other legislation which we have been considering, shall pay more than an interest rate of 5 per cent. Then, when the minister and his colleagues choose to set a rate higher than that by order in council, they should also ask the banks to send them a bill for the difference between 5 per cent and whatever rate they set. Then they would be making a real contribution to the most basic of all industries in this country. They would not be adding to the costs of production that farmers face.

When the Bank Act was opened up in a previous session of this house, government spokesmen and spokesmen for the financial interests of this country expressed great concern over the fact that the near banks, the loan and trust companies, were getting too large a share of the capital market of the country and that by opening up the act the banks would be allowed to get into other fields and they might even be able to stay open longer. Now the government wants to reverse the process.

If the arguments were logical in the discussions regarding the opening up of the Bank Act, I suggest that the arguments now about including these other organizations are not logical. I am speaking of trust and loan companies, because I support completely the opening up in this legislation of facilities which include credit unions, caisses populaires and co-operative credit societies. But opening up this field to other financial institutions such as trust and loan companies is the exact opposite of the arguments put forward previously in the debate on amendments to the Bank Act. On the matter of fees and service charges I wonder what would happen to a farmer who had obtained a loan under the act and fell behind in his payments because of a crop failure. I can just imagine how the lovey dovey finance companies would treat him if he asked for an extension of the repayment period or a renewal of the loan.

I say this because under the provisions of the act they are not subject to any additional charges so long as they are not in default of payment. But I can just imagine how some of these outfits will get caught up with making a faster buck by charging higher interest rates and service charges, should the farmer find himself in the position I have mentioned. I hope the minister can inform the house that if the provisions of the legislation are not solid enough to take care of this sort of situation, he will see that such provisions are included when we are in committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, as I have already had the opportunity of airing my views on such an important and much discussed subject, I would like to take a few minutes to make some remarks since the minister is here. I would simply like to tell the minister that, during the week-end, I happened to meet quite a few farmers from my riding, and I would like to pass on their views to him. In fact, I think those views might lead him to revise his position regarding the bill. To start with, I will tell the hon. minister of Agriculture that I can think of nothing worse. However, we will have to consider the possibility for our farmers to pay an interest rate higher than 5 per cent.

I know that a great deal has already been said on that subject and that others were certainly more cunning than I. I do not in the least want to be cunning. What I want to do is to beg the hon. minister, in the name of the farmers, not only in my riding, but in my province and in the whole country, to reassure the farmers that the 5 per cent interest rate will not go up. The reasons which motivate my intervention in this matter are well known. The minister is well aware of the situation of the farmers. He knows that they need help urgently, of course, but above all that it is essential to limit the interest rate to 5 per cent.

I am certain that the government will have to make up the difference in the interest notes, which are perhaps necessary. However, in the interest of our farmers and a strong and expanding agriculture, I think we cannot honestly support a bill which will abolish the fixed interest rate.

From the remarks of the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette), I learned that the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) was against such a measure a few years ago. I think we should know the opinion of members of the government party from Québec or other provinces, on that matter. I have not heard many members on the government benches state their position and I do not believe they are really in favour of increasing the interest rate. I imagine they must feel pretty uncomfortable at this point.

Having discussed the subject, and bearing in mind that like all of us, during the election campaign, they committed themselves to a limit on the interest rates, I am still wondering how they will be able to vote honestly, without going back on what they promised on the hustings. I urge them once more to exert pressure on the minister to make him change his mind and accept the fact that the farmers are unable to pay more than 5 per cent.

I waited to speak up until this debate drew to a close to-night, hoping and believing that the farmers might win if not the sympathy, at least the understanding of the Minister of Agriculture. I do hope he will give the matter a second thought and admit, once and for all, that the farmers cannot afford to pay interest rates any higher than 5 per cent.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I recognize the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), but I am obliged to inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can fully appreciate the concern hon. members have for the plight of the farmers in paying a higher interest rate, which would in fact add to their costs of operation. There is no one in this house who is more anxious to have lower interest rates for farm improvement loans than is the Minister of Agriculture. But I suggest to hon. members that if we were going to maintain the rate at 5 per cent, or indeed at any rate below that which will be sufficiently attractive for the banks and for other financial institutions to make loans to the farmers, we may as well not pass the legislation at all. The simple fact of the matter is that when the interest rate was fixed at 5 per cent, loans were not being made; and indeed when the farmers went in to obtain credit to purchase farm equipment, the banks would not make use of the guarantee under the Farm Improvement Loans Act as late as several months before the act expired. They said to the farmers, "No, we do not regard the guarantees to be sufficiently attractive for us to make loans at that rate; but if you will pay the commercial rate, or some other rate depending on the risk, then we will make this loan to you". Some of these loans have been made at rates as high as 9 or 10 per cent. The whole purpose therefore of having a maximum prescribed rate which would qualify the loan for a government guarantee is to have that rate lower than the going rate.

When hon. members opposite say that the government is doing something which will do harm to the small farmers, I do not know what they mean, because if they wish to keep the maximum interest rate so low that the loans will not be made, we will just be wasting our time trying to pass this legislation. Most of the farmers across this country know this very well. They are waiting for this act to be passed by parliament, so that a government guarantee will be available for these loans and so that the rate will be lower than what they are paying in the banks today.

Hon. members opposite have asked what the precise formula will be. They have asked for the exact rate. Frankly, I do not know the exact rate. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) asked how much the government guarantee is worth; and then he went on to answer his own question, because at the time it was set at 5 per cent the banks could charge 6 per cent, but they did in fact lend hundreds of millions of dollars at 5 per cent. It must have been worth at least 1 per cent more.

Mr. Horner: Could the minister say whether it is still worth 1 per cent?

Mr. Olson: I think it is, and indeed if you were considering it on a percentage basis it might be worth even slightly more than one per cent.

Mr. Horner: Below the bank prime borrowing rate?

Mr. Baldwin: After the budget is presented it will probably be less.

Mr. Olson: Lower than the rate that borrowers are paying now.

Mr. Horner: The prime rate at that time was 6 per cent.

Mr. Olson: The prime lending rate at that time was not 6 per cent. The maximum statutory limits according to which the banks charged their interest rate was 6 per cent, but they lent the money at 5 per cent. I suggest to hon. members opposite that the government guarantee for these loans is still worth 1 per cent, or perhaps a little more.

Mr. Horner: Can the minister give us an idea as to what rate he is talking about now?

Mr. Olson: What is important is that a farmer today can go to a bank and if he has a high credit rating he can borrow money at a fairly attractive rate. However, other farmers whose credit rating is not quite as high pay a substantially higher rate than the lowest rate offered to some farmers today. Hon. members opposite know that. When we offer this government guarantee, every loan that is guaranteed under this act will be at an even lower rate than is the commercial or competitive rate today. So when hon. members opposite say we are helping the big farmers but not the small ones, in fact exactly the opposite is true.

Mr. Horner: Would the minister permit a question? Will the prescribed rate be the same for every farmer?

Mr. Olson: I have only three minutes left in which to answer the questions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister has the floor.

Mr. Olson: We will get to this matter when we are in committee; I have a suspicion it will be brought up again. I want to make it quite clear that the effect of this act will be substantially more beneficial to the small farmer whose credit rating is not quite as high than it will be to the big farmer who has a good credit rating.

I will try to answer some questions in the next few minutes. One of them was: Why include land under the Farm Improvement Loans Act? It is simple. The reason is that it is substantially easier and less costly to make an application under the Farm Improvement Loans Act than to apply to the Farm Credit Corporation, because of the legal fees, the mortgages, and so on, that the Farm Credit Corporation requires. Therefore we think it would be advantageous to include under this legislation smaller parcels of land. Large amounts of money for larger pieces of land will still go through the Farm Credit Corporation.

There are several other questions which I should like to answer, but I will do so when we are in committee. Almost every hon. member who rose in this debate has referred to the interest rate. I hope I have answered their questions. We do not know precisely what the rate will be, but we are sure it will be a substantial improvement over the rate which farmers are paying today. It is for that reason that many farmers are waiting for the house to pass this act, so they can take advantage of it and obtain credit for the purchase of farm machinery which they have probably needed for several months.

Mr. Korchinski: If we pass this legislation tomorrow, what will the interest rate be?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a brief question for the minister. I quite agree that farmers want this act passed. So far as I am concerned, the interest rate is not what we would like it to be at this stage. We want to vote on it. However, can the minister answer the question which I put to him in the course of my previous remarks? Is there any other federal act under which the governor in council sets the interest rate?

Mr. Olson: There are several other statutes: For example, the second part of the Farm Credit Act, the Farm Machinery Syndicates Credit Act, and several others.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

• (10:00 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: I wonder if the government house leader could give us an idea whether we will be proceeding tomorrow with the business he announced last Thursday?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, we will be taking item No. 3 on today's order paper, the resolution preceding the amendments to the Post Office Act. When that is completed, we will take third reading of the bill for the Windfall extension of Canadian National Railways. When that is completed we will continue with the committee stage of the bill we were discussing this evening. I will make further arrangements when we have dealt with that business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—REQUEST FOR FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES LEGISLATION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): A few days ago, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) the following question, as reported at page 705 of Hansard:

> In view of charges of sex discrimination in employment which were made yesterday by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, and in view of the need to ensure that women workers will receive equal pay for comparable work and equal opportunity in respect of hiring and advancement, will the government consider the enactment of a fair employment practices act?

In reply the minister referred me to remarks made the previous evening by his parliamentary secretary. I looked up Hansard, Mr. Speaker, and found some references to the women's bureau and to the Female Employees Equal Pay Act. However, I found no reference whatever to a fair employment practices act. I am rather astonished that the Minister of Labour could so lightly dismiss the considered opinion of the president of a large labour organization in this country which represents the overwhelming majority of the organized workers.

In speaking before the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, as had the Canadian Union of Public Employees earlier, criticized the degree of discrimination against women workers. As a matter of fact, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress called for a fair employment commission which would, and I use his words, "forcibly and immediately eliminate discrimination against women on the job."

As I say, I have difficulty in understanding how the Minister of Labour could dismiss this matter in such a cursory manner. When we are speaking of discrimination against women workers in Canada, I think the minister would do well to remember that we are referring to one third of the Canadian labour force at the moment, and that is a very big segment indeed. Had he attended even one session of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women during the past week, he would have realized how deep and widespread is the resentment of women, and even some men in the Canadian congress, against this discrimination against women in our labour force.

This discrimination shows itself in a great many ways. For one thing, the labour congress made it clear that there is discrimination practised against women taking employment in traditionally male occupations. Consequently, these women are forced into occupations which are much less well paid and where frequently they are at the bottom of the pay scale. A newspaper article refers to the statement of the president of the Canadian Labour Congress this way:

> Mr. MacDonald backed his case for the need to eliminate sex prejudice on the job by saying that jobs most frequently occupied by women, such as clerks, telephone operators, typists, hairdressers or launderers, seldom lead to advancement and are lower paid than areas where women do not predominate.
> We might add that even in those industries where women predominate any males who may be working in it generally fare better financially.

We must remember that the vice president of the council of the Canadian Labour Congress met with Miss Hugette Plamondon, and we cannot forget her statement that when she looked at the pay schedule in a plant her heart started to pound because she realized that at the bottom of the pay scale would be the women workers.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Second, Mr Speaker, there is prejudice in women having positions of responsibility. Why? The usual excuses are given—that women are there for a short period only, that they cannot stand responsibility, and so on. I suspect that the males who got there first are being reluctant to share the more interesting work that responsibility entails, as well as the much better pay and undoubted status that goes with positions of responsibility.

Third, Mr Speaker, there is prejudice against women having supervisory positions over men or other women. Such a situation, which the minister dismissed so casually and briefly the other evening, violates both the United Nations universal declaration of human rights and also the I.L.O. convention respecting discrimination in respect of employment and occupation.

It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, from the testimony we heard last week before the commission that the Female Employees Equal Pay Act, which is administered by the women's bureau, has proved completely inadequate to deal with discrimination. The best proof of that fact is that the head of the women's bureau last spring quit her job in complete frustration. Simply paying a new supervisor of the women's bureau a higher salary is not going to get rid of the causes of frustration which brought about the resignation of the previous head. There is need—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I just finish, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I must inform the hon. member that her time has expired.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and, I must say, with a great deal of sympathy. Last week I explained that the Female Employees Equal Pay Act is basically good legislation and that its weakness rests with the fact that action can only be taken on complaints brought to our attention by affected workers. It is the intention of the Department of Labour to recommend that this act be amended so that the Department of Labour can act on its own initiative rather than on complaints, as is the present practice.

I also pointed out, as Mr. Little of the Canadian Union of Public Employees had already pointed out himself, that perhaps sufficient efforts have not been made to acquaint women with this act and its provisions. Mr. Little was also frank and honest enough to indicate that the unions themselves are not without blame, a point substantiated by Miss Hugette Plamondon of the Canadian Labour Congress.

The Canadian Labour Congress has also referred to this problem in its brief to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. No doubt the observations which have been made, particularly those concerning the interpretation of the terms "identical or substantially identical work", and the implementation of the act, will give rise to conclusions and recommendations by the commission.

With respect to equal opportunity in hiring and advancement, this is a very complex matter involving not only widespread social attitudes as to what is degrading work for women. The physical and mental health of women has also been protected by other laws which prohibit women from undertaking certain work. I have in mind legislation conforming with international labour conventions, such as the act prohibiting employment of women underground in mines.

When the grounds for discrimination were being established in our Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, it was decided that sex was not in the same category as colour, race, religion, or national origin. None of these bases have the slightest effect on employability or productivity in any occupation. However, there are many jobs requiring strengths usually associated with males, which most women could not fill, while there are other occupations, such as working underground in mines and the like, which society would deem unsuitable for women. There is also provincial legislation governing hours of work, rest periods, safety and health facilities provided in connection with employment of women as distinct from men. Experience has proven the need for legislation to protect women against hazards to which they are more vulnerable because of their sex.

In the case of the working mother for instance, limitations may actually facilitate her gainful employment, and preferential treatment must be expected when maternity conditions require her to take long periods off from work. In other words, because equitable terms of employment for women often require differentiation from those applied to men, sex is a quite different factor from the other factors included in the Fair Employment Practices Act.

In the submission by the Canadian Labour Congress to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, the congress recognizes there are broad social attitudes which could militate against the effectiveness of such legislation.

They state that prejudice against women taking employment in traditionally male occupations and against women being placed in supervisory positions over men, or even over other women, does not reside solely with management, but also extends to all levels of the employment structure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO CONTROL INCREASED NARCOTICS TRAFFIC

Mr. R. L. Whiting (Halton): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare what his department is doing to educate young people to the dangers of taking drugs such as L.S.D., S.T.P. and heroin; whether serious consideration is being given to using communications techniques such as films, television programs and young people's popular magazines; and what research is being carried out to determine what long term effects these drugs have on people who use them, particularly on young people whose future could be ruined. It was suggested that this important question be placed on the order paper. Because of the importance of this subject I have asked for an opportunity to discuss it on the adjournment debate.

At the outset of my remarks I think I ought to bring something into perspective, and that is that I believe the vast majority of young people in Canada are not taking drugs and probably will never take drugs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Whiting: But, Mr. Speaker, there are young people who are taking drugs such as L.S.D. and S.T.P., and there are others who can be influenced by them. All too often in recent months have we read and heard about L.S.D. and S.T.P. parties involving young people. We know of the many reasons our young people are turning to drugs, but the time allotted to me this evening does not permit my going into all the various aspects of the question. I should like to draw to Your Honour's attention one important reason, and that is ignorance. Our young people do not know how seriously they may endanger their physical and mental health as the result of just one experiment with L.S.D.

I should like to read what the Montreal Protestant School Board said recently in an effort to discourage student drug use:

> We believe that only factual information well presented, and not conjecture based on emotional appeal, will have an influence on our young people today. The responsibility for communication of this information must be shared by educators, parents, students and the public at large.

This is a national problem and it must be treated as such. I maintain that this information should be initiated at the federal level. I do not think there is a town or community in this country which can sit back smugly and say: Drug addiction cannot happen here. Facts show that drug addiction can happen and does happen in many communities, and no one community or no one area is immune.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) said last week that he will be meeting with the provincial health ministers in the near future. I strongly urge that this subject be placed on the agenda and discussed. I urge the federal government to take the initiative in setting up an educational program in co-operation with the provinces. The money this program will cost will be money well spent.

Mr. Robert Stanbury (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): In the unavoidable absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his parliamentary secretary I am glad to have the opportunity of congratulating the hon. member on his interest in this most important matter, an interest which I share both as a member of the standing committee on health and welfare in the last parliament and now as parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State, who has a special concern for the youth of Canada.

The hon. member will know that under the terms of the British North America Act, there is no way in which the Department of National Health and Welfare can carry out an education program with respect to drug abuse or any other subject directly in the schools. What the department can do, and is doing, is to make informational materials available for use by school, community or other groups.

Some months ago officials of the department met with a group of high school teachers to discuss ways in which the department could assist in informing young people of the dangers of drug abuse. As a result of this meeting the department has purchased a number of copies of a movie called "L.S.D.: Insight or Insanity" which it is making available to schools and other interested groups. As well, this film has been brought to the attention of the provincial departments of health and a number of these have ordered copies which they are making available within their respective provinces.

A number of publications dealing with L.S.D. and marijuana have been produced by the department in recent months and a major pamphlet, designed for mass distribution, is in its final stages of production. This pamphlet will be provided to provincial departments of health in sufficient quantity for distribution throughout the provinces.

It is the intention of the department to expand this informational program in every way possible in order to ensure that the consequences of the misuse of drugs are fully known to our young people.

As well, the department is continuing to reassess and update its control program as new hallucinogenic drugs come into use among young people. By order in council P.C. 1968-1736, Schedule H of the Food and Drug Act was amended last month by the addition of D.E.T., D.M.T. and S.T.P. This amendment will have the effect of prohibiting the sale of these substances as well as L.S.D. which was added to this schedule some time ago.

Item 29 in the list of bills presented to this house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on September 12, "A bill to amend the Food and Drug Act and the Narcotic Control Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Criminal Code," will further increase our capacity to control the use of hallucinogenic drugs. This bill will add to the Food and Drug Act an additional schedule to be known as restricted drugs and will provide penalties for possession, possession for purposes of trafficking, and trafficking in such substances as L.S.D., S.T.P. and other hallucinogenic drugs. The whole subject of drug abuse—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State but his time has expired.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS—OTTAWA—COST OF NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I brought up the matter of the cost of the National Arts Centre which initially was not supposed to exceed $15 million. Yet, today, we are told that it will cost approximately $56 million.

I am happy to see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) in his seat tonight to take note of the brief remarks I will make on this matter.

In the Ottawa Journal of June 1966—over two years ago already—one could read this:

[English]

Contract for the main portion for the National Arts Centre today was awarded to V. K. Mason Construction of Ottawa on a $31,848,000 bid.

This brings the going price to date to $34,968,000.

[Translation]

And it is said that there is more. It is said now that there were three stages.

First stage:

[English]

Phase 1, the excavation, now complete and ready for superstructure, cost $1,453,000.

Phase 2, a portion of the underground garage with the job far from complete cost $1,667,000.

Phase 3, the construction of the three theatres, completion of underground parking and provision of facilities for restaurants, cafeterias, shopping mall, dressing rooms for 160 performers, rehearsal halls and administration offices now is scheduled to begin this July with a completion date set for January 1968.

[Translation]

The total amount at that time was supposed to reach approximately $35 million. That was in June 1966.

[English]

Awarding of contract was made public by Works Minister McIlraith.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, recently, that is on October 3, we could read in the Ottawa Citizen the following:

[English]

Arts Centre cost now up to $46 million.

—Which means approximately. Reporter Greg Connolley said—

[Translation]

That means about $10 million more than the amount mentioned two years ago.

That is what prompted Mr. Greg Connolly, of the press gallery, to say, when he questioned certain members, including the former prime minister of Canada, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and I quote:

[English]

His eyebrows almost popped out of sight when he noted the cost for furniture in the centre was not set at $3,989,000.

[Translation]

We are speaking of $4 million, for furniture only, which prompted the former prime minister to say:

[English]

"They must be getting that place dressed up like Joe Greene's office."

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is something abnormal here. Those contracts were given after tenders had been submitted. Now, after the tenders have been received, the contract given, here we are—two years later—with increases of $10, $12 and $15 million. Why tender then, if it serves no purpose?

If someone agrees to do a job for $31 million, how is it that two years later we have a $46 million undertaking? How come $15 million have been added? Is that fair to the other tenderers? Is it fair to the Canadian people who witness such a scandal?

Without the shadow of a doubt, in the minds of the Canadian people, there is messing around somewhere, probably with the election funds, where the contractors are concerned.

We are not against the construction of the Arts Centre; far from it.

Even a Liberal member, the other day, complained about the way the walls of the Arts Centre look.

Mr. Speaker, tenders are submitted and a contract is given to a contractor only after a department has inquired into his financial situation. If the contractor is not solvent, he is not given the contract.

Mr. Speaker, the situation with regard to the construction of the Arts Centre in Ottawa is inexplicable. That is why I put a question about it to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon. Since the Minister of Public Works is now in the house, I ask him to tell us why the Canadian people should pay $56 million. I am not the one to say that; it was said by the experts who figured the cost of the Ottawa Arts Centre.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

This centre will cost $56 million, instead of $15 or $20 millions as provided. What portion of that amount of $56 million went to financing the election of the government in office? What amount was provided by the Mason Construction, by subcontractors, such as Pitt's for instance, who was supposed to do the excavation? Architects also were involved. The Foundation of Canada built the garage. The Spino Construction built the tunnel which costs over half a million dollars.

Mr. Speaker, it might be a good idea to tell the Canadian people, and especially the house, what are the reasons for a price increase such as we witness at the present time.

[English]

Mr. Robert Stanbury (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, if I heard the hon. member correctly he mentioned a figure of $56 million. As a citizen of Ontario who has watched the mushrooming cost of the provincial science and technology centre in Toronto, I sympathize with him, but I do not think he should make the matter worse than it is. Perhaps he was dealing in Social Credit dollars. The government's estimate for completing the national arts centre is $46,426,000.

The figure of $9 million with which some comparison has been made was produced in October 1963 by a group of private citizens who called themselves the national capital arts alliance. This figure was contained in a submission they made to the government recommending the construction of an arts centre.

At that stage they were expressing a desire for a centre to contain provision for opera and an experimental studio, and their estimates were based on prices of previously constructed single unit theatres. No site had been selected although they did recommend a site at Sussex and St. Patrick streets which was relatively open and they believed surface parking would be available. No detailed study had been made on the development of the type of facilities they wished the centre to include. They estimated that the building would contain 4.8 million cubic feet with a floor area of 175,000 square feet.

The project which the government has built is an entirely different project. It contains 16 million cubic feet of space with a floor area of 924,000 square feet including a 900 vehicle underground parking garage.

As part of the development of the capital area it has been constructed on Confederation square, and while in this location it contributes to our capital, its location involves foundation conditions and the necessity of constructing a major portion below ground, as well as the provision of substantial changes in the routing of traffic and access tunnels to the parking, none of which was contemplated by the original proposers of the scheme.

The government approved of the project in a general sense in February of 1964 with the decision to accept the city owned portion of the Confederation square site and set up advisory committees to determine the requirements in providing facilities for opera, music, theatre and visual arts. These committees have developed the requirements so that the centre will provide for the total range of performing arts under first class conditions, of which Canada as a whole will be justifiably proud. The cost of the construction elements of the centre is $38,922,000 with the parking garage a $3,606,000, these figures including the cost of the necessary relocation and provision of services, such as power, water, telephone and streets. Then $3,898,000 will be spent on theatre equipment and furnishings.

The construction has been in four phases; a preliminary excavation contract being awarded in January, 1965, construction of the Mackenzie King bridge approach and a portion of the garage in June 1965, a tunnel entrance under Elgin street in August 1966, with the major theatre construction contract being awarded in June, 1966. Work on the centre is progressing and will be complete in order that the first performance may take place in June, 1969.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.34 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 8, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's) presented the first report of the standing committee on external affairs and national defence, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF CONTINUING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister has had an opportunity to conduct the necessary consultations and can now say whether the proposed meeting of the continuing committee of the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers on the constitution will be held before Christmas as planned.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wrote to all the premiers of the provinces a few days ago, following my earlier letter of two weeks ago, suggesting that the general assessment of the situation at that time was that most provinces might be agreeable to a date early in December, around December 8 or 9 if my memory is correct. However, I did indicate in these letters that I had written a different kind of letter to the premier of Quebec and the premier of Alberta, in view of the recent situation which has developed in those countries—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: He has been talking to the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Trudeau: For some of you country boys I think this would be welcome.

Mr. Horner: Check Hansard on that one.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not correct Hansard the same as those hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is now addressing the chair.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker—indicating that in view of the particular situation in those two provinces we might give leeway to the two premiers in suggesting an alternative date, but that it was still our hope to have the meeting on the dates suggested in December. We are awaiting replies, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS BETWEEN PRIVATE AND PUBLIC SECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to address a question to the Minister without Portfolio who acts in the place of the Minister of Transport, who has responsibility for housing and according to the schedule is supposed to be here today.

I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Transport whether he can assure the house that the $170 million the Minister of Transport announced would be made available to private developers and builders for building family units will not in any way reduce the amount of money to be made available this year for public housing.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to look into that question and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, who I understand is responsible as to which ministers should or should not be here. May I ask him whether he and his government can assure the house and the country that the $170 million now being made available for private building purposes does not in any way reduce the amount of money that is also available for public housing, as originally intended.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what is the objection to having the Acting Minister of Transport answer this question when he has the information?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He has not got the information.

Mr. Lewis: Nor has the Prime Minister. I am asking the Prime Minister whether he and the government can give us this assurance, and as Prime Minister of this country he ought to be in a position to do so.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member is more interested in having information than in scoring debating points, then surely he should have no objection to being given the correct information within 24 hours.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not care whether it is the Prime Minister or anyone else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: He has no right to impute motives to any member of this house, and I resent his suggestion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker, I say I am entirely in order in asking the Prime Minister for the assurance that this amount will not be reduced.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is quite right. It is a basic rule of debate that no hon. member may impute motives.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO REPLACEMENT FOR WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the right honourable Prime Minister.

[Mr. Lewis.]

When does he intend to introduce his just society policy to replace the winter works policy, in view of the fact that municipalities are now in a very difficult situation?

Can the house expect an early statement from the right hon. Prime Minister in this connection?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the policy in this regard was launched before cancelling the winter works program; this the member should know.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

We are precisely asking the Prime Minister to inform the house about the work done so far by the government, because the Canadian people are not aware of it.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, when I announced the end of winter works, I explained that they had been replaced by programs entailing much higher and much more useful expenditures as far as the economic expansion of the country is concerned.

[English]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT RESPECTING CONSIDERATION OF SHARED PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the Prime Minister indicated that the government was endeavouring to hold meetings of federal and provincial ministers of finance or treasury officials with a view to discussing open ended joint programs. Will the Prime Minister kindly clarify the situation that has developed? Will those meetings he referred to be part of the general dominion-provincial meetings with regard to dominion-provincial financial arrangements, or will they be separate meetings?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): They would be part of the meetings of the ministers of finance of the federal government and the provinces. There may also have to be separate meetings of health and welfare ministers.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In those supplementary meetings will medicare and its position in the open ended programs listed by the government be part of the discussion?

Mr. Trudeau: We have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that the provinces are free to put any item they wish on the agenda. If they want to put medicare on, that would certainly be acceptable.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DISCUSSIONS WITH NEWSPAPER OFFICIALS ON REDUCTION IN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Can the Postmaster General report to this house how the discussions with the circulation managers of daily newspapers are proceeding? I ask this question in view of the minister's announcement in this house last week end that discussions would be taking place in this regard early this week, with a view to altering the announced Saturday cut-off in mail delivery.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, since yesterday morning field directors and officers of the post office have been fanning out across the country to discuss with publishers and circulation managers of newspapers the problems occasioned by the ending of postal deliveries on Saturday. I may say that the reaction has been extremely warm.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kierans: The editors and circulation managers of newspapers have appreciated the delicatesse of the officers of the department as well as their anxiety to find ways of easing whatever problems may arise. We are pursuing this program, and when the reports come in from the field I anticipate holding a general meeting with the senior executives of the association itself.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister has indicated that he is seeking reports on the matter, is he prepared to accept reports from hon. members of this house on behalf of their constituents? I have several hundred right now on my desk.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING EARLY RETIREMENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I have a question related to the answer given yesterday by the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond. In the absence of the minister concerned I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether negotiations will take place between Devco and the unions concerned before any early retirement program, as recommended in the Donald report, is implemented.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Minister of Forestry and Rural Development under whose jurisdiction this comes will be here tomorrow for the question period.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRIES AS TO POSSIBLE MERGER AND APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Winnipeg South, in connection with the task force on Air Canada. Could he advise the house how that task force is proceeding and whether any evidence has been placed before him or those associated with him, or whether representations have been made, that Air Canada should merge with Canadian Pacific Airlines, a suggestion which received support from the hon. gentleman in June?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): I have been asked by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Transport to look into the future planning of Air Canada. One of many alternatives which exist is a possible merger, but no active consideration is being given at the present time to a merger of Air Canada and Canadian Pacific.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for that answer, and would ask him whether his views have changed since June when he said Air Canada and Canadian Pacific should join together and the stock be made available for private purchase.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I thought the minister was about to answer the question addressed to him by my right hon. friend. Has the minister been able as yet to recommend to his colleagues the name of a new president for Air Canada?

Mr. Richardson: I think I should say first of all that the board of directors of Air Canada and the government are well pleased with the interim management which is being given to Air Canada by the acting president. I should say further that the board of directors are considering changes in the management structure of the company and that these changes are being discussed with the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure the hon. gentleman intended to answer my question but did not get the opportunity. I would not wish to deny him—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It might be helpful if I suggested that the question was not entirely in order. The right hon. gentleman is asking whether the minister has changed his views. That in itself, I suggest, is not a proper question.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REPORTED RECONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED BRANCH REORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it a fact that the government is reconsidering the announced reorganization of the Indian affairs branch and, if so, would the right hon. gentleman say whether an announcement is imminent?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we announced last week that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would be reorganized in order to serve the Indians of Canada better and we do not intend to change our policy.

[English]

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can he say whether he has yet received a report prepared by ARDA in regard to poverty in Indian areas in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have no report from ARDA on my desk at the present time.

[English]

Mr. Simpson: Then would the minister consider conferring with his colleague, the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, who has told us that he is in possession of this report, and thereby do away with the confusion that exists in the ministry?

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether the table of organization as now determined by the department is ready to be made available to members of parliament?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I signed a letter addressed to all members of parliament and all Indian chiefs, setting out the detailed reorganization. No doubt members and other persons concerned will receive it this week.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

When he met the Indian chiefs yesterday, was he acting as minister or as Indian chief?

Mr. Chrétien: I met them in both capacities, Mr. Speaker, and I was given a warm reception.

[English]

DRUGS

MARIJUANA—REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF RESEARCH COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the galloping increase in the use of marijuana and the increasing number of young people tragically being paraded daily before the courts, and the extreme urgency of dealing properly with these cases, will the minister consider setting up an immediate research committee to look into this problem, or will he make a statement to the house?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to consider that suggestion by the hon. member. However, I would advise him that there are people within the department who are now forming a secretariat and looking into the matter fully.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): As a supplementary question, would the minister tell the house whether his experts in this field are discussing the problem with the appropriate officials in the Department of Justice, who seem to feel we need more and stiffer jail sentences?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, without agreeing with the conclusion of the hon. member I would state that officials in my department are discussing the matter with officials in the Department of Justice.

FISHERIES

AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS ON LOBSTER TRAP LIMITATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is the minister giving any thought to amending the regulation concerning the lobster trap limitation in view of the fact that the lobster season is to open soon and in view of the controversy arising from this regulation.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the regulations which have been in effect for some time will be continued, but we are giving some thought to their amendment in the longer term.

Mr. Comeau: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is the minister giving any thought to amending the regulation concerning the granting of licences to new fishermen?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think my previous answer also applies in this case.

FARM MACHINERY

REQUEST FOR INTERIM ACTION TO HALT COST INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or his parliamentary secretary. In view of the reported delay in the finalization of the Barber commission report on the price of farm machinery, is the government contemplating any interim action to stop the rise in the cost of farm machinery?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Ministers of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, may I take that question as notice?

SHIPPING

CHURCHILL—INQUIRY INTO EXTENSION OF SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the other day the Minister of Transport said he would be looking into the report on the possibility of the extension of the shipping season at Churchill, may I ask the Acting Minister of Transport whether that report will be made public.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there has been continuous examination of the extension of the Churchill shipping season, and there have been investigations, particularly into new ice breaking techniques which would enable the port seasons to be extended.

Mr. Korchinski: Will these reports be made public or will they be secret documents for the department's own use?

[Later:]

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, and in view of the fact that we were unable to obtain a reply from the acting minister, will the right hon. Prime Minister undertake to consult with someone in the department to determine whether there is a report on a possible extension of the Churchill shipping season, and whether this report will be made public?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Surely the acting minister attempted to reply earlier, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: He attempted; that's right.

Mr. Trudeau: We all make attempts. You sometimes attempt to ask questions.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would not rise at this time except for the fact that the Prime Minister made a point of this matter. Let me say that the Minister without Portfolio did not answer the question that was asked. He may have answered another question but I suggest that ministers may refuse to answer questions if that is their wish, and that is their prerogative, but should not purport to answer questions that have not been asked.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I understood the question that was directed to me was whether the report in respect of Churchill would be made public. I have not had an opportunity to see this report and until I have had a chance to read it I would reserve judgment. I do not believe there will be any reason that it should not be made public.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF THALIDOMIDE CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Judd Buchanan (London West): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the parents of only a few of the thalidomide children born in Canada have launched actions or secured settlements from the manufacturer of the drug—the principle used in the settlements being that of providing "a living wage for the rest of the children's lives"—would the minister undertake to draw this fact to the attention of all the parents of thalidomide children in Canada, so they can take whatever steps are necessary to secure their children's rights?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume the hon. member is making a representation to the minister, which I presume has been noted.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

APPOINTMENT OF CO-CHAIRMAN OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister told the house when answering a question put to him on September 19, nearly three weeks ago, that this appointment would be made shortly, and in view of the great deal of work that still has to be done by the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism, is the Prime Minister now ready to make an appointment in place of the late Mr. Laurendeau?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to give this answer to the hon. member. I was not sure whether I should announce it in the way of an answer to his question or perhaps by way of a press release. I am glad the question has come at this time. Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon, who was a commissioner, has been asked to take on the duties of co-chairman with Mr. Dunton, and we have asked Professor Andre Raynauld of the University of Montreal to take on the duties of Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister inform the house whether it is the intention of the bilingualism and biculturalism commission to continue its work according to the original terms of reference, or will its work be terminated in the not too distant future?

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is continuing its work under the original terms of reference. It does have to come back to the government at set dates, I believe, in connection with its project. Every time the commission comes to us with a request for a delay we have to decide whether we shall agree to a further extension of time. We have indicated, however, that we would like to see the work terminated as soon as possible.

GRAIN

REPORTED INVESTIGATION OF SALES ABOVE QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. However, in his absence because of the urgency of this matter I would like to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt. Has the minister received a number of reports from Alberta and other western provinces of farmers who have allegedly sold grain over their quota? If so, can he say whether such cases are being investigated by the R.C.M.P. and whether it is the intention of the government to prosecute, in view of the increasingly desperate situation of the farmers in these areas?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

PENSIONS

REPORTED REFUSAL TO ACCEPT CERTAIN PLANS FOR REGISTRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister issued a directive within the last ten days declining to accept for registration pension plans primarily designed for the benefit of shareholders and their families?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this question might be placed on the order paper or, if the hon. member so wishes, discussed at the time of adjournment.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY RESPECTING ADMINISTRATION OF P.F.R.A.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, but in his absence perhaps the Prime Minister could inform the house and western Canada whether the administration of P.F.R.A. comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, or is the government dropping this whole project?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as acting minister I propose to take notice of this question and bring it to the minister's attention for reply tomorrow.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Despite the fact that the rules do not so provide, what we are seeing now is a sly and surreptitious method to compel members to give notice when they do not have to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

LEGISLATION RESPECTING AUTOMOBILE AND TIRE SAFETY STANDARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, who is supposed to be here today and is not, may I direct a question to the acting minister, who is supposed to be here and is. In view of the estimate by the Canada Safety Council that between 65 and 75 people will die in highway accidents over the coming week end, can the minister say whether the government will be bringing in legislation at this session of parliament regarding automobile and tire safety?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I naturally share the hon. member's concern about the number of highway accidents. I would like to assure him that the Department of Transport is taking some action in this matter. At the present time we are holding a competition to fill the position of director of the auto safety office. This will be a section of the Department of Transport, which was established by this house in the last session. As soon as this appointment has been made, which should be within at least the next two months, the traffic safety office will be in operation.

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Transport if he can say whether the government is keeping under continuing review the allegations that the auto industry is charging for its safety devices a price out of proportion with the cost of the added safety features on cars.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, all matters pertaining to safety will be under review.

EXTERNAL AID

NIGERIA—SUGGESTED LEASING OF AIRCRAFT TO RED CROSS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. First of all, is it a fact that our humanitarian efforts to assist the people of Nigeria and Biafra are frustrated by the technicality of not wanting to interfere in the internal affairs of another nation? Second, if this is true, would the government consider leasing aircraft to the International Red Cross for a nominal sum, in order to provide transportation facilities to deliver desperately needed food to the people of Nigeria and Biafra?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is, of course, a very important matter and I hesitate to intervene, but certainly the question is not asked in the proper form, particularly the first part of the hon. member's question.

SPORTS

HOCKEY—STATEMENT ON PROPOSED TASK FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to answer a question posed yesterday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, concerning whether a task force had been set up to look into the question of the control exerted by professional hockey over the lives of young Canadians. I would advise the right hon. gentleman that a task force was set up on August 2 last composed of Dr. Harold Rea as chairman, Dr. Paul DesRuisseaux and Nancy Greene. It was to go into the definition of amateur and professional sport and particularly the effect of professional sport on amateur sport. It will most emphatically be going into this whole question of the control and effect of professional hockey on the lives of young Canadians, to which the right hon. gentleman referred.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this task force. I ask the minister whether evidence is being taken regarding certain contracts that are entered into with youth in our country binding them far and beyond anything that is within the legal definition of responsibility. Aso, is the task force charged with making recommendations to prevent the National Hockey League operating in that connection and doing things which have all the appearances of being a monopoly without control?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, this is one of the very reasons that the task force was set up in the first place. It is expected to report at the beginning of the year.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What is the government doing with the last report it got on this very subject, which was tabled in January of 1967?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, that report, as I understand it, was from the fitness and amateur sport council and there were differences of opinion with respect to the conclusions reached in the report.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he can assure the house and the country that the results of tests in chemical warfare at Suffield, Alberta—Operation Vacuum—are not intended for use in the war in Viet Nam.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should think that question might be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Walter Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the government aware of any plan on the part of the United States government to phase out their base in Argentia, Newfoundland?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question should be placed on the order paper.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN MONTREAL SHARE OF DEFICIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is responsible for Expo; however, in his absence, I shall put the question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house whether he has received representations or suggestions from the authorities of the city of Montreal urging the reduction of the amount owed by the city of Montreal with regard to the Expo '67 deficit?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister concerned will be here tomorrow, and I am sure he will answer the question if he can.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, does the right hon. Prime Minister intend to agree to such a reduction if the city of Montreal asks for it?

Mr. Speaker: The supplementary question is hypothetical.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING JOINT COMMITTEE AND RESEARCH UNIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question which I am sure the Prime Minister can answer. In view of the recommendations contained in the third and fifth annual reviews of the Economic Council of Canada calling for the establishment of a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on economic affairs and the establishment of an independent economic research unit, will the Prime Minister indicate what action the government proposes to take on these recommendations?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Would the hon. gentleman repeat the last part of the question?

Mr. Stanfield: Will the Prime Minister indicate what action if any the government intends to take in respect of these recommendations?

Mr. Trudeau: I am told, Mr. Speaker, that already there is a standing committee of the House of Commons on economic affairs.

Mr. Stanfield: I should not like to suggest that the recommendations have not been thoroughly considered, but they were that a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be established, and that an independent economic research institution should be formed.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition should not have been so sure that I would be able to answer this question. I will have to consider it and provide an answer at some other time.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF GREEK REFUGEES ENTERING CANADA ILLEGALLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is government policy to permit Greeks who claim to be political refugees to stay in Canada, or are they to be deported if they enter Canada illegally?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked is not acceptable.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, this question is of some urgency. Even though perhaps I phrased it badly, in view of other leniencies I have witnessed I think I should obtain an answer. These Greeks are being deported and they claim they are being sent back to their deaths in their homeland. I should like to know whether this country is offering political refuge to Greeks who enter here illegally and claim they are political refugees.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to whom this question might be addressed will be here tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of Transport is going to be here tomorrow, a day when all the ministers are supposed to be present.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED NATIONS

INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION RESPECTING CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a very easy question for the Prime Minister which I know he will be able to answer. Has the Canadian delegation to the United Nations been instructed by the government to join France and the United States in calling for the withdrawal of Russian troops from Czechoslovakia?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not know, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Or is the government hesitating in this regard because it is waiting for the countries surrounding Russia to make the first move?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Many members are seeking to ask questions and there are only a few minutes left. I suggest that the questions and the supplementary questions should be limited.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

REQUEST FOR GRANT BY FOLK ARTS COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on September 27 I directed a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Has he had an opportunity to discuss the subject matter of the question directed to him? This had to do with a revision or perhaps a review of the decision that was made in terms of supporting a request of the Canadian Folk Arts Council for a grant.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The answer to that question is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: I believe I asked two questions, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to know which question the minister has answered.

Mr. Drury: The answer to the first question is yes, Mr. Speaker, and the answer to the second question is no.

FISHERIES

SALT COD—INQUIRY AS TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Fisheries indicate to the house and the country whether the government is contemplating deficiency payments on salt cod? If so, can we expect an announcement soon?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we are currently making payments in respect of the salt cod carryover from 1967. Payments in respect of the 1968 catch are under consideration.

POLLUTION

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF CANADA WATER ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I believe my question should be directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or his parliamentary secretary. Can the minister give any indication to the house if and when he plans to implement a Canada Water Act in view of the fact that control of water pollution was referred to in the throne speech, and is of urgent importance to British Columbia and other areas across Canada?

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): In the absence of the minister, who will be here later this week, Mr. Speaker, I shall take the question as notice.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if at the same time the minister could also report any progress in the setting of Canadian standards of water pollution to include biological, chemical and physical aspects of the question.

Mr. Orange: I would be happy to bring this to the attention of the minister also.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED DEPARTMENTAL REFUSAL TO ANALYSE ABORTION PILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is it a fact, as alleged in the brief presented to the royal commission on the status of women, that the Department of National Health and Welfare has refused a request to analyse in its laboratories various abortion pills feared dangerous?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked by the hon. member is not in order since he is asking the minister to confirm or deny an allegation. Perhaps the question might be placed on the order paper in another form.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—TABLING OF REPORT OF OBSERVER MISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked yesterday whether we would table the report of the observer mission in Nigeria so it might be made available to all hon. members. This report was not made to the Canadian government, but it has been made available to the government and also to members of the standing committee which began meetings this morning. With the permission of the house I will table this report. Actually there are two documents, the report of the observer mission and a covering note outlining the composition and terms of reference of this observer team.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table the document to which he has just referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NIGERIA—USE BY RED CROSS OF CANADIAN AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the right hon. Prime Minister whether he had received a cable from the head of state of Biafra sent to the Secretary General of the United Nations and to heads of member states of the United Nations regarding allegations of acts of genocide. The right hon. gentleman undertook in reply to ascertain whether the cable had reached his office, and promised to inform the house today concerning any action he is contemplating in this regard.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Apparently a communication addressed to me by Colonel Ojukwu was received at our permanent mission in New York by registered air mail. The communication called upon us, as the hon. member indicated, to take action to prevent acts of genocide allegedly being perpetrated by the government of Nigeria. There has been no reply to this communication as yet, but this is part of our over-all policy of trying to avoid intervention in the political side of this conflict while trying to help as much as we can in the humanitarian side.

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs has had any more success in his quest for support to bring the matter before the United Nations? He may not have any report as yet, but I wonder whether he could inform us.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have no report as yet on the success of this mission but I do have a report, which I have just received, on the success of the minister in negotiating with the Nigerian commissioner for external affairs, who is in New York, on whether they would object to the International Red Cross using Canadian aircraft which we put at their disposal. These aircraft would be used to bring supplies to all parts of Nigeria and not only those parts under the control of the Nigerian government.

The answer was favourable. In this answer Dr. Arikpo, the Nigerian commissioner for foreign affairs, now says the federal government of Nigeria would have no objection to the Red Cross using a Canadian aircraft and crew in its relief operations anywhere in Nigeria, including flights into the area under rebel control, under the existing arrangements and understanding between the federal government of Nigeria and the International Red Cross.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF PRIVATE MEMBERS' HOUR THIS DAY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the program of business for today. In view of the fact that we have all been invited to a very important event at six o'clock, namely the hanging of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —I wonder if it might be the wish of the house that we suspend private members' hour for this day.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the standing orders the private members' hour would be suspended in any case in view of the fact that we are calling today the resolution preceding the Post Office Act amendments.

Business of the House

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to today's business. In view of the urgent need for the farm improvement loans legislation and the co-operation which this side of the house is prepared to extend to the government, I wonder if the house leader would not rather continue with this legislation today, particularly since we have moved to the committee stage and it is quite possible that the legislation could be passed today. This legislation is urgently needed in all parts of Canada, and most particularly in western Canada.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to make orderly arrangements for the business of the house we agreed last Thursday to deal today with the Post Office Act resolution. It seems to me that if we are going to deal with the business of the house in an orderly fashion we should proceed as arranged. If a spirit of co-operation exists now I am sure it will also exist tomorrow. I shall count on the support of the hon. member for Crowfoot on this particular bill.

MESSAGE TO THE SENATE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of joint committees of both houses on the subjects of the printing of parliament, the direction of the library of parliament, and that the members appointed on each of these committees to act on behalf of this house are those listed in the second report of the special committee which has been submitted today.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENTS AFFECTING RATES, ADMINISTRATION, SAVINGS BANK

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Post Office Act to abolish the local delivery rate on letters for delivery within the postal area in which they are posted and to increase by one cent the postage rates for letters posted in Canada for delivery anywhere in Canada; to provide an amended rate structure for newspapers and periodicals; to provide for certain changes in connection with the administration of the Act, more especially in relation to tenders and contracts; and to provide for the discontinuance of interest payments on deposits in the post office savings bank after December 31st, 1969, and for the crediting after that date to the Receiver General of small deposits in the post office savings bank and unclaimed for thirty years.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Chairman, it has been said many times that Canada has one of the finest postal systems in the world. Nothing in my brief experience as Postmaster General would lead me to any different opinion, and my first obligation and indeed privilege is to pay tribute to the more than 48,000 men and women who operate the system and provide the people of Canada with a postal service through more than 10,500 postal installations from coast to coast. Their efforts are certainly worthy of the thanks of every Canadian.

Such a tribute to our post office employees, however, would be meaningless if it were not accompanied by a resolve to improve their working conditions, enhance employee job satisfaction and open up opportunities for advancement, self-improvement and fuller personal development. These are the elements that an employee looks for in a just society and by which he will judge that society.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The Post Office Department has accomplished a great deal in this area, credit for which must go to my immediate predecessor, the hon. member for Longueuil. Most of the 48,000 public servants in the Post Office Department are now covered by collective bargaining. Greater security of employment increases confidence, invites participation and inspires loyalty and pride. Agreements recently concluded with the union will provide better working conditions of employment for the operating staff, approximately 28,000 employees. Contrary to the impression of some who were inconvenienced by the long postal strike, it is true to say, and I am glad to confirm, that the leaders of the postal union demonstrated during this period their sense of responsibility and respect for the law. That law in a just society must always give to all groups the power to fight for and to defend their rights. A just society, Mr. Chairman, depends on a thriving economy, for only an efficient, expanding economy can afford the costs of rectifying injustices, improving distributions of wealth and incomes and hope to reduce the burden of poverty.

The institutions of such an economy and such a society must be efficient and thriving.

[Mr. Kierans.]

The post office is such an institution. Our function is communication, the transmission at low cost of items of business and personal information from one place to another. In this function we complement, we duplicate, but to an increasing extent are being superseded by other systems of communication, telephone, teletype machines, telegraph, television, radio and the cloud that appears no bigger than a hand, satellites.

Nearly all of the important innovations in communications are taking place outside the post office and indeed outside the existing governmental structure. What effect, for example, will such developments as television-telephones, telephones linked to computers for information retrival or even the payment of household bills, newspaper delivery direct to homes via television or teletype, what effect will these technical possibilities and soon to be economically feasible changes have on the traditional function of the post office, the transmission of information? These developments are taking place outside the post office and outside of the government; rather, I should say they were taking place outside of the post office and outside of the government. For now we are to have a department of communications of which the post office will be an integral part. The post office will have, therefore, at its disposal in the future the best scientists in the research branch of the department of communications to enable it to meet the challenge of change. This has already been agreed upon by the officers of the post office and officers-designate of the new department.

The creation of the new department is clear evidence of the government's belief that for a just society we must have not only a thriving economy but modern institutions, institutions aware of today's realities and alive to tomorrow's possibilities. Clearly, the post office was viewed by the Prime Minister, when he proposed this reorganization, as a problem of function, of communications in a rapidly changing industry, not as the perennial problem of an institution in political, financial or administrative difficulties.

It is a new view, a new idea that must be accepted by all of us. The difficulty will lie, I suspect, not so much in accepting these new ideas, if I may paraphrase Lord Keynes, but in escaping from the old ones. The Post Office Department is faced with a great many problems. One of the most serious is the mounting cost of its own operations departmental forecasts indicate that on the basis of present fees and postage rates the post office accounts will show a deficit of $99.5 million in the current fiscal year. At the same time there is a pressing need to improve services, to modernize and extend the facilities and improve working conditions, all of which will require increased expenditures.

It is evident, therefore, that action must be taken to restore a reasonable cost-revenue relationship, and to provide the funds necessary to ensure that our traditional standard of service will be maintained. Hon. members of the committee are aware that I have already taken action to adjust the rates charged for those classes of mail which, under the Post Office Act, the Postmaster General may regulate. It is expected that these rates will result in revenues equal to the costs of handling the classes of mail concerned.

Some studies have begun, and others are pending, which will search out ways and means of reducing costs, improving administration and productivity, and of achieving the most effective staff relations. Broadly speaking, these actions comprise what the Postmaster General can do on his own authority. As examples I may cite the closing of the postal savings bank, the move to a five day week, and the decision to make those who use our money order system pay the reasonable costs of operating that system. Many other changes leading to greater efficiency are also being considered. The public, Mr. Chairman, will not forgive us if we seek to balance our budget solely by rate increases. Our responsibility is to examine all procedures, all traditional methods, to gauge their worthiness and present efficacy. Cutting out the fat, the outmoded, is painful but it is also necessary.

This brings me to the bill to be considered by this house. Its major items have to do with adjustments to the rates fixed by statute with respect to letters, newspapers and periodicals, that is, first and second class mail. The present rates for local and out of town letters took effect on April 1, 1954. In the 14 years since that date, costs of all kinds have increased sharply, including the cost of operating the postal service. Our cost analyses show that the cost of handling letter mail now exceeds the revenue derived from it. Moreover, it has been found that the cost of handling letters for local delivery, commonly known as drop letters, has increased at an accelerated rate, so that the average cost of handling a letter mailed for delivery in the same locality is not noticeably less than that of a letter delivered through a post office other than the one at which it was mailed. We are no longer justified, therefore, in maintaining a lower rate of postage for local letters. Canada is virtually the only postal administration in the world providing unlimited local delivery of letters at a lower rate of postage, and it is clear that we cannot continue to do so in the light of mounting postal deficits.

The proposed rates applicable to letters mailed in Canada for delivery anywhere in Canada are six cents for the first ounce or fraction and four cents for each additional ounce or fraction. I might add that we have in mind in connection with these increases a quid pro quo whereby all letter mail posted in Canada for delivery in Canada will be carried by air where this will expedite delivery. The committee is aware that Canada pioneered this "all-up" service for letters up to one ounce in weight in 1948, an innovation by the Liberal government of the time. The removal of the present weight limit of eight ounces, which was established in 1954, will no doubt be welcomed by the business world.

The proposed changes respecting newspapers and periodicals are intended to accomplish two main objectives: first, to take a long step toward assuring that this class of mail pays its fair share of the operation by substantially increasing the rates of postage applicable to it; second, to amend and clarify the terms and conditions under which the statutory second class rates apply. These changes will provide a substantial amount of additional revenue and a more logical basis for determining entitlement to second class privileges.

The remaining changes in the Post Office Act are intended to clarify the authority and responsibility of the Postmaster General with respect to some aspects of departmental administration, and to facilitate the adjustment of transportation arrangements so that we can keep up with changing conditions.

In addition, two amendments are sought in connection with the winding up of the Post Office Savings Bank. As the committee is aware from the announcement recently made, the government has decided to discontinue this service because of the steady decline in the number of depositors, the amounts deposited and the total balance on deposit. It has been evident for some time that there is little need and almost no demand for this facility. It is no part of a just society to pay 2½ per cent interest to depositors when they can more than double their income by investing in Canada savings bonds.

I believe it is unnecessary for me to say more by way of introduction. I would, however, assure the committee that I will do my utmost to answer fully and frankly the questions of the opposition during the clause by clause consideration of the bill. The department is quite prepared to lay before this house the most detailed information on its operations, with the hope of receiving the constructive criticisms and suggestions of all members interested in a postal service that will provide a standard of excellence that will be the pride of all Canadians.

This is the challenge before this committee, Mr. Chairman. I would remind hon. members that no substantial legislation has been passed affecting first class rates since 1954. No substantial legislation has been passed affecting second class rates since 1951. The question before us is: Are we to bring the post office into the modern era as a living, changing force, or are we to turn back the clock to 1951 and 1954 and condemn the department to exist in the strait-jacket of outmoded rates, regulations and procedures? That is the choice before us.

Under our parliamentary system, the government proposes but this house disposes. I would not have it otherwise. With every confidence in the wisdom and judgment of all members of the house, I move the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I must begin by extending my congratulations to the minister on his appointment. I also wish to congratulate him for translating his great ability and immense energy to the national arena of governmental operations. I have been here for only 11 years but he is the eighth Postmaster General that I have seen sitting in that place. I am not going to suggest what happened to most of the others, whether they were promoted, demoted—

An hon. Member: Or outmoded.

Mr. Macquarrie: Yes, as someone suggests, or outmoded. I congratulate him too on being the minister designate of a new, interesting, romantic department, that of the department of communications. He could go down in history as the man who brought us into the space age up in the stratosphere and slowed the movement of mail down on the ground. This may be an interesting achievement.

I took note of what the minister said about the leaders of the postal unions and I will not take issue with him on that. I will say, however, that the government's handling of the recent postal strike was deplorable and incompetent beyond belief. A French philosopher once said that to govern is to foresee. It would appear that in reference to the postal strike everybody in the country saw it coming except the government, which when it was far too late for possible acceptance proposed a settlement at the last minute.

The minister has had wide latitude in this debate, and this is the general pattern. I should like to say that it would be impossible for us to discuss the projected or requested increase in rates, if I may use more precise phraseology, without referring to the already announced impending diminution in service. As he says, the house does dispose and he does propose. I for one, Mr. Chairman, am not disposed to congratulate the minister of communications on his suggestion that we are going to reduce this service to the public. I hope that I will not, in his fine phrases in the final paragraph of his dissertation, be accused of doing such dreadful things as turning back the clock, putting people in strait-jackets and turning the horse and cart around the wrong way. The minister painted at that point a terrible picture of potential opposition.

This department is tremendously important and is one of the oldest and most vital public service institutions. I suppose that the post office has more meaning to the average Canadian and to more Canadians than any other department of government and probably any other institution of government. As the Glassco commission pointed out, since confederation the post office has seen little change in its function, and a very simple function it is—the handling of the country's mail.

I jotted down some words from the minister's statement. He used these words: "transmission at low cost of items of communication from one place to another". That was the minister's particular phraseology. The Canada Year Book describes it this way:

> —the basic tasks of the Canadian postal service are to receive, convey and deliver postal matter with speed and security.

I emphasize the word "speed", to which I shall return later.

I am not one who has only uncomplimentary remarks for the Canadian post office. There have been improvements and developments of which I am very proud. We are all pleased with the new developments in automated equipment. In some fields the Canadian post office has pioneered. Our all-up service, introduced some years ago, put the department in the forefront of postal departments. There are many reasons for pride in our post office, although there are many reasons for concern.

I should think that a thoroughgoing study might now be in order. It should be a study that is not geared to some particular conclusion. It should not be a study of whether a crown corporation is a good idea. It should not be geared to the working conditions of certain types of employees. It should not be geared just to the question of balance of revenue and expenditure. I say that a thoroughgoing, exhaustive study of this important public service would be in order.

Perhaps some of the drastic changes which the minister has decided upon should not have been decided on until after the study. Changes might reasonably have followed rather than preceded any such study. I would not suggest that the minister is the type of person whose motto is, "Don't confuse me with facts, I want to make a decision." All the same I am convinced that we have not yet had a thoroughgoing study of the Canadian postal service.

Is the financial situation so drastic that it requires the serious increases envisaged in this resolution? That is the important case to be made out and I am convinced that the case has not been strongly made. I think the minister's statement was most inadequate.

Mr. Stanfield: Hear, hear. I agree.

Mr. Macquarrie: There are many explanations which should have been but were not given.

Mr. Stanfield: There were no explanations.

Mr. Macquarrie: I wish to quote some words from the minister's 1968 report. I am not the financial genius he is, but these words appear in the report:

> A quick review of past reports would seem to indicate the financial position of the Canada Post Office has gone from one of modest surpluses to one of large deficits. This is not so. The accounting procedures from 1963-64 take into consideration sizeable costs previously assumed by other government departments on behalf of the Canada Post Office. Such costs cover accommodation, charges for accounting and cheque issuing services, employer contributions to the superannuation fund, the Canada Pension Plan, the surgical-medical insurance plan, and workmen's compensation. From 1963-64, the Canada Post Office has also taken credit for the services provided to other government departments; these services do not compensate for the costs assumed from the other departments. The recording of these figures by the Canada Post Office gives an accurate picture of the financial situation as it is today, but renders it difficult to make a fair comparison with the years prior to 1963-64 when all costs and revenues were not considered and most surpluses were recorded.

I suggest that the minister read that report and that he say to himself: I am not sure as to the financial position of the Canadian post office; we must have further elucidation of this situation before we impose these new cost increases on the public. He ought to ask himself, is the Post Office Department being improperly charged for deficits which ought to be more widely and broadly assumed? What aspects of postal operations are the serious offenders in regard to going into the red, and which are in the black? Are the proper groups of patrons being assessed their due proportion of responsibility for uneconomic functions of the Post Office Department? I suggest that these are questions which must be answered. Whether the post office record is as red as it is sometimes dyed, or precisely where the uneconomic operations are, is but one line of inquiry.

There is something even more important than that that we ought to consider. I think we must look at the basic assumption, which has recently received prominence, that this department must pay its way, that the post office must keep in the black, that it must soak its patrons enough to avoid any charge on the general revenues of the country. To exalt such an idea into a principle of government or administration, is in my view a preposterous and unfair assumption. Why should the post office, among all departments, pay its way? Is there some unwritten law, some lofty principle, which says that the users of the mails must balance the post office budget but that the users of the airways, the sea lanes or the rail lines need not do so? Can we in conscience and equity say to the post office: Pay your way, hike all your rates, and then say to the C.B.C.: Come to us if you need a few more millions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macquarrie: Should freight and passengers be carried on a subsidized service and parcel post not be given any assistance? Does this sound reasonable? Is this fair treatment of the Canadian public? Naturally we all want government departments to balance their budgets. I hope that by saying this I do not sound old-fashioned or unjazzy. It is a consummation devoutedly to be wished. But since it has not been attained, by what right do we pick on that long established public service, the Canada Post Office. Why impose upon post office patrons a reduction in service? The closing of post offices for a second day out of seven cannot but curtail services, slow the passage of mail and generally reduce the usefulness of the Post Office Department to the people of this country, to the people who own it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macquarrie: I say to the minister, the matter is not nearly as simple as he made it appear when he spoke about 80 per cent of business being done on five days of the week. I say that this change will impose a serious problem on many established businesses at the very same time that the increased rate will present those businesses with other difficult problems. The public, the business community, the patrons of the post office, in that way are getting a double whammy.

The minister has made no case for Saturday closing. His brief explanation of a few weeks ago was as inadequate as it was unwelcome. I have read many reports of experts who have examined one phase or another of our postal operation, reports of experts such as those with the Glassco commission, but I have yet to read any report which recommended as a solution to any problem the closing of post offices on Saturday. Indeed, a study of commercial operations in this country will indicate that Saturday is one of the busiest days of the week. There has been a change in recent years in the week end business pattern. I can envisage a situation where one could walk down Sparks Street mall on a Saturday and find all business establishments open except the post office.

This is not to say I am suggesting that all postal workers should remain, or become, six-day workers any more than employees of chain grocery stores are today. I condemn in the strongest terms this arbitrary diminution of service to the public. I do not think you enhance or advance the just society by saying: You will get mail on just five days a week.

There are many Canadians who derive no great satisfaction from the institutions of government. There are many Canadians in humble circumstances who receive from their government very little which means more to them than the rapid and efficient delivery of mail whether it be in connection with business, whether it be in the nature of communications from their loved ones, or what have you. In our mobile society the curtailment of rapid communication by letter is something I find hard to accept. I find it even harder to accept the suggestion that in some way we advance the just society by so doing.

I was impressed the other day by an indication of lack of careful thought which has gone into this proposal. In answer to a question a brittle reply was given that the rural carriers would, of course, have their returns diminished to five-sixths of what they were. Mathematically, this sounds good. But what in the name of goodness will happen to the men whose already far too small earnings will be so diminished? Will they find an alternative job to make up for the decline in their incomes, and will they find one just for the now free Saturday? To make this kind of brittle, callous calculation indicates there is probably a good deal less compassion in the just society than we had hoped for.

I say: Let the mail go through. If a case can be made for increased charges there is no one so unreasonable as to suggest they must be opposed. But we are now faced with a situation in which the service will be diminished and the cost increased. Surely the post office is not in so bad a situation that both these things must be visited upon the people. I suggest to the minister that he take a little more care and go into this question a little more thoroughly, that the public be told more about what is to be done to their ancient institution, the post office. I should like the house and the committee to be told a little more about these things.

In my opinion—and my hon. friend from Oxford demonstrated today that it is his view also—this is a most unpopular move. In my opinion the people of Canada do not want their postal service curtailed as the minister has suggested. Canadians are concerned and many more are uncertain. Therefore I would strongly suggest that this proposed measure be referred to a committee of the house, either a standing or special committee, where witnesses may be heard, where people in the newspaper field can put forward their case plainly instead of expressing their heat to departmental field officers, where spokesmen for other businesses which are geared to the mail system as it now exists may explain their attitude, where the whole matter may be discussed and fully considered and where many of the matters not discussed by the minister today may be carefully canvassed.

This is a serious step, Mr. Chairman. It is one which involves the diminution of service, one which should not be made lightly after a casual announcement by a minister, however able he may be. I should like to hear from representatives of the church press who have written to us outlining their special problems. I should like to be given more information on the publications issue which was referred to by the O'Leary commission and, in my opinion, never adequately dealt with. I should like to hear of any difficulties likely to be encountered in connection with the transmitting of bills of lading in relation to freight shipments. In short, there are many ramifications to this proposal. Severe disruptions may occur and there are a multitude of questions to be asked, all requiring explanations.

I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was correct the other day when he said the Post Office Act should be amended so that parliament would have more control over postal rates than it has at present. We are not afraid of change, but the kind of change which reduces the usefulness of a great service to the public and places the public at a disadvantage is not the kind of change we welcome.

We are not averse to modernization. We want the post office workers to enjoy the best possible conditions. We want the mail to go through more swiftly, not more slowly. If the minister can tell me that the mail will go faster by languishing for a couple of days during the week I am open to conviction but he will have to be far more eloquent than he was today. I think this is a subject which requires further ventilation, In my view the minister will be making a great mistake if he rushes through with this legislation, and we who are responsible to the people, the patrons of the post office, would be remiss in our duty if we did not call upon the hon. gentleman to explain further and justify these proposals. An avenue for useful service in this regard would be to arrange for a committee to receive this bill at the proper stage and go through it carefully, because there is a great deal at stake in the operation of the post office, an agency which provides a most intimate and valuable service to the Canadian public.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Chairman, both as a member of the New Democratic party which holds that public enterprise can be just as efficient as private enterprise, if not more so, in a number of areas, and also as a former employee of the postal service, I derive some satisfaction from taking part in the discussion this afternoon.

I wish to say at once that I agree with the Postmaster General in one respect at least. I have in mind his statement that the Canadian postal service is one of the best, if not the best, in the world. I would only qualify this by saying "it was" rather than "it is". I am not so sure it will continue to be the best under the proposals the hon. gentleman is putting forward. At the present time, however, as has been the case for many years, the postal service of Canada is an extremely good one. For example, it is something to consider that every 12 months it handles and distributes some five billion pieces of mail, the vast bulk of which is delivered within 24 hours without error.

Before going on to consider some of the details of the legislation, may I compliment the officers and employees of the postal service of Canada who in my opinion were for many years downgraded, overworked and underpaid and who now, through collective bargaining, are making worth-while gains in wages and conditions.

In the last parliament the proposal of the then postmaster general to increase the ordinary letter rate for locally mailed and delivered letters from four to five cents and the rate for onward or air mail letters from five to six cents was defeated. As a matter of fact the government was defeated on that issue but it did not take the defeat as one that required its resignation. In fact, it has not taken that defeat as a reason to give up its general plan to boost the mail rate for the ordinary letter writer.

What has happened is that the government is not only planning to increase the postal rate for the ordinary letter writer, that is, the first class mail consumer, but it is also asking that consumer to accept less service and pay more for it. We are being asked to condone a hike from four cents to six cents for locally mailed letters, from five cents to six cents for onward delivery letters, and to accept a reduction in delivery service from six to five days a week. No comparable country in the world has that kind of substandard delivery, dropping down to five days a week, and there is no reason why Canadians should be asked to live with it. In our party we are not going to consent to that plan.

The mail service of Canada is like the health, education or broadcasting services. It is an essential public service organized by the public for the public's use. As far as it may be feasible we believe that the system should pay its way, and I point out that this has been done for many years by first class mail and the people who use it, the ordinary letter writers. Where it has not been paying its own way has been in regard to second class mail, that type of mail published to make a profit and including periodicals and general printed matter. This class has piled up millions of dollars of deficits over many years, for which the users of the ordinary first class mail, along with the taxpayers in general, have paid.

The public accounts committee of this house only last year presented a report which contained the following unanimous recommendation:

> The committee first drew the matter (that is, of the second class mail) deficits to the attention of the house in 1958, ten years ago, and, while minor changes have been made the annual loss has continued to increase and the committee is of the opinion that sufficient consideration has not been given to the solution of this problem. It considers it essential that the Post Office Department of parliament find ways and means immediately of covering the loss of the second class mail . . . without this being done at the expense of other classes of mail.

Similar recommendations have been made by other committees during the last seven, eight or nine years, and I make a similar recommendation today.

Why should the first class mail users, the ordinary letter writing consumers of Canada, pay for profit-orientated mail which does not pay for itself? Why should they be asked now to shoulder an increase from four cents to six cents for local mail and from five cents to six cents for air mail, when the main reason is a delivery deficit which stems from carrying freeloading mail, and when there is an imbalance to Canada's detriment in the carriage of foreign mail in Canada against the amount of Canadian mail carried, say, in the United States?

It is said that the bulk of the first class ordinary mail—I have heard one estimate put it at about 80 per cent—is really just business mail, bills from hydro commissions, telephone companies, department stores, oil corporations and the like. If this is so and if the cost of sending out their bills is going to be increased by 50 per cent as now proposed, which by my figuring would be in the order of $14 million a year, does anybody think that these business concerns are going to absorb that multimillion dollar cost? Certainly the consumer would not think so. His experience has been that any time an increase in a tax or other cost is imposed upon business that increase is passed on to him.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, did the hon. member say that the drop letter rate was going to cost about $17 million?

Mr. Mather: I said that by my figuring the net increase would be about $14 million.

Mr. Kierans: Eight and a half million dollars.

Mr. Mather: The estimate of the Postmaster General is $8½ million. I said $14 million. If I accept his figure I still say that the corporations of Canada are not going to shoulder an $8½ million increase. They will pass it on to the ordinary letter writers. In addition, when the ordinary letter writer mails his cheques in payment of the accounts of those businesses he will pay an extra two cents. It is not the business corporations of the country that will be hurt by this increase.

We are now told that major increases are planned for second and third class mail to make a start on reducing the deficit on profit orientated mail. If that type of mail is going to be reformed cost-wise—and one estimate says that 75 per cent of its cost has been subsidized by the ordinary letter writers and the taxpayers—there will need to be an immense increase in its rates. Meanwhile, we say, leave the first class mail alone.

I have here a little item headed, "The Short Life And Times Of Postmaster Generals." A previous speaker has alluded to the fact that we have had a great many of them. By my figures we have had eight of them in the last eight years, including Hamilton, MacLean, Fairclough, Denis, Nicholson, Tremblay, Côté, and now Kierans. I think it has been too long a revolving-door sort of position. Neither the Postmaster General nor the postal service has had time to get to know each other in order to function as a coordinated team with businesslike goals.

There is some talk that we are going to have a zip code system in our mail service like they have in the United States. I think that would be a good idea, but if we get a zip code in Canada I think it should include a special category for former postmasters general, particularly those who have lost their zip.

I have a few questions that I would like the minister to note. How much imbalance, in dollars, is caused by our reciprocal agreements with other countries, notably the United States? What is the cost of handling bulk mail, such as money, comparing the post office rate with that of private security services? By how much do the taxpayers or the ordinary first class mail users subsidize the special delivery service, which under the minister's proposals I believe will be stepped up since regular delivery is to be reduced from six days to five days a week? Why is there a different rate for second class mail between the Americas, and between Canada and Great Britain? I believe that to send a paper from Canada to Britain the cost is double what it is to send a paper from Canada to the United States. I would like to get the actual figures on this. What percentage of second class mail delivered in Canada originates from American publications or from wholly owned American subsidiaries in Canada? Finally, what was the value of printed matter imported into Canada in the last ten years and carried by our post office without remuneration under the terms of the universal post office convention?

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I summarize the position of my party with regard to these proposals. First, we say, let the first class mail alone. Second, we also propose that the deficit, which all along has been caused by subsidizing private business mailings, should be eliminated. Third, we ask that the government renegotiate the international treaty which has involved us in losses and bring about parity with the United States postal service in order that our consumers will not be subsidizing non-Canadian competitors. Fourth, we want an examination—it might be through a committee, a commission, or a special inquiry within the post office itself—of the various subsidies and charges borne by the postal service in order to bring out the facts and provide a clear picture showing who pays for what. Fifth, we would like a study to be made in depth of the reported advantages of turning the post office into a public corporation such as Air Canada, a crown company operated quite separately from itinerant postmasters general.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, we in this party would also like to see a further advance in the modernization to which the Postmaster General has alluded and which has already taken place to some degree in the postal service. We should like the procedures and techniques of the postal service brought in line with the era of technological production and distribution in which we are living. Some people say that the post office at this time faces a situation similar to that which the telephone companies faced a few years ago before they made their operations as automatic as possible.

Before resuming my seat, let me say that we in this party aim to do what we can to bring about in this department the best service to the most people in the shortest possible time. It is not in line with this philosophy that we should support the proposed increase in the first class mail rate or a diminution of the service to the users of first class mail.

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Chairman, a year ago the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté) who was then Postmaster General, introduced in this house a resolution which is very much like that introduced today by the present Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans).

I followed the debate on that resolution from the galleries, and I am very happy today to be able to support this resolution and to make a few constructive comments to the hon. Postmaster General with a view to improving mail service, particularly in areas far removed from the large urban centres.

When I worked in the office of the Postmaster General, I realized that the Canadian postal service is a very extensive operation. I met in this department employees who were always ready and willing to serve their country and to co-operate with the minister and senior officials.

As in any well-organized undertaking, the heads of this department are thoroughly informed about the operating costs and they are trying to hold the balance even between postal revenues and working expenses.

That is why on September 28, 1967, the hon. minister introduced in this house a bill designed to bring in annual revenues of more than $40 million. It is that same resolution that the opposition thought fit to turn down on November 28, 1967, thereby contributing to the increase of the deficit of the fiscal year ending on March 31, 1968.

For long years the department managed to balance its postal revenue and operating costs. The Canadian population was not increasing very rapidly. The volume of mail remained constant. Transportation and labour costs did not vary much. Because of these factors, it was possible to ensure well-balanced postal operations.

Consequently, the last increase in postal rates—as pointed out by the hon. minister a while ago—goes back 14 years, to the time when the department provided, at no increase in costs, air transport within Canada for letters weighing less than eight ounces.

But things have changed since. Today, changes occur more rapidly than ever.

According to the last figures of the department, postal revenue amounted to $337 million compared to expenditures of $404,300,000 for operating costs. This means, as indicated in the report, a deficit of $67,200,000, which the parliament will have to make good.

Canadian postal expenses will not go down. As I said, times have changed.

Each time the Canadian population increases by one, the Post Office Department must handle 240 more pieces of mail per year.

Mr. Chairman, at the present time the mail volume, still according to the report of the department, amounts to almost 5 billion pieces. And, according to the statistics, the Canadian mail volume increases by 5 per cent every year. This means that in 14 years from now, the mail volume handled by the Post Office Department will be twice what it now is; and that 10 billion pieces will be handled annually. One may rightly say that the figure is impressive.

In his resolution, the minister proposes to increase from 5¢ to 6¢ the rate on first class letters. Let us not forget, in this regard, that the 5 cents rate has applied for over 14 years. Yet, the cost of transport and other costs have increased since.

Now, if we expect Canadian posts to pay their own way, mail rates must be increased.

Some 15 years ago, Canadians could get a cup of coffee for 5 cents, a bottle of Coke for 5 cents, a cigar for 5 cents. Today, these items have doubled in price, while we still pay in 1968, 5 cents to mail a letter out of town and 4 cents for local delivery.

The former Postmaster general who is now Minister of National Revenue, has carefully studied postal problems. During his term of office, more efficient methods of dealing with the mail have been adopted. I should like, Mr. Chairman, to mention some methods of delivering the mail that have been put into practice in a pilot area, the Gaspé peninsula.

The peninsula was a testing ground for a new method, which has since been extended to the whole of Canada: rural routes have been spread out from large centres.

Several small revenue post offices have been closed down; thus better service was extended to users directly to their home, thanks to the setting up of rural routes.

According to the Canada Post Office's last annual report, 221 post offices were closed down between March 31, 1967 and March 31, 1968. Out of those 221 post offices, 63 were in the Gaspé and Bonaventure counties and 17 others will close down in a few months. This will bring the number to 80, and they are exclusively in the two constituencies I just mentioned. People who were using those post offices are getting their mail through rural routes' service.

Mr. Chairman, rural routes' service is much better than the letter carrier service in large cities. People using it can buy stamps from the rural letter carrier. The latter looks after registration of letters, parcel insurance, sale of money orders and collection of C.O.D. amounts. He is a sort of travelling post office with a fixed time-table, while the city letter carrier only delivers mail. The payment of contractors who deliver the mails on rural routes has been discussed for several years, and by your leave, Mr. Chairman, I will come back to that later on.

Another change made in the delivery service by the department, from 1966 to 1967, has been the establishment of serving centres designed to expedite transportation of mail on short distances and make it more efficient. These centres are located in well-defined geographical areas and the mail is quickly dispatched to these offices during the quiet hours of the night to be delivered afterwards by suboffices to neighbouring communities. In that way, and particularly in the Gaspé peninsula, the mail from Montreal and Quebec city is received several hours earlier than under the old transportation system. In many cases, the service enjoyed by expanding localities was poor because they were at the end of the railway line or the highway service. All that is changed now. It began in the pilot area of the Gaspé peninsula under the tenure of the 46th Postmaster General, the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Côté). Eighty of those centres are now operating, according to the annual report of the Post Office Department, and the creation of 120 other serving centres throughout the country is under study.

The merger of the small revenue post offices, the creation of new rural routes and serving centres are new services available to the Canadian people.

Mr. Chairman, the increases provided in the resolution now under consideration are not designed exclusively to pay for the new salaries of the post office employees. I gave other reasons why the 6c. rate now proposed by the minister is a bargain for the whole of Canada.

Canadians are willing to pay one cent more in postage for their letters because, in the last few years, the Post Office Department has been giving a much better service.

I would not like to see for any reason whatsoever the quality of the service go down after the passing of the bill which will be introduced in the house. It is necessary to establish the right balance between the revenue and the expenditures of the Post Office Department, but it must be remembered that the department must contribute to the progress of Canada and to the daily life of the people. It has discharged that obligation successfully until now and I am sure that Canadians from coast to coast are grateful to the postal employees. I wish to add in passing that Canada can be really proud of its postal service and, as stated by the minister earlier, it is the best in the world.

Mr. Chairman, while keeping to the resolution under consideration, I wish to refer to the report of the royal commission on working conditions in the Post Office Department.

At the time the late René Tremblay was holding the office of Postmaster General, there was a lot of unrest in the department. The employees were most anxious to have their own union and they asked urgently for the creation of a collective bargaining system. They were unhappy also about the method used to establish their pay level and job classification.

In July and August 1965 a strike was called in the main post offices in Canada. This was the first work stoppage by postal workers in forty years. While the strike was going on; Hon. René Tremblay was endeavouring behind the scenes to find some way of settling the differences between the demands of the employees and the offers of the government. The name of the former member for Matane, however, was never particularly mentioned in press releases and reports.

The Postmaster General wanted to get to the bottom of things. It is during his discussions with the leaders of the postal workers' unions that he agreed to establish a commission of inquiry on working conditions in the Post Office Department.

Mr. Tremblay did not merely make that promise to the employees. He also convinced his colleagues in the cabinet concerning the need to establish such a commission as reported in order in council P.C. 1965-1590 which reads as follows:

> The Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Postmaster General, advise that Mr. Justice André Montpetit, Montreal, Quebec, be appointed a Commissioner—

Justice Montpetit presided during a 12 month period an investigation among the employees throughout Canada on their complaints about working conditions. When the report was tabled, it dealt with a great number of complaints stated under the form of a summary including 282 recommendations made by the commission.

Mr. Chairman, I must today, on this first opportunity which is given to me to speak in this house since the death of hon. René Tremblay, pay a tribute to this minister who left a most useful working paper for future Postmasters General and the authorities of the department.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cyr: Referring to the report of the royal commission, I shall mention particularly recommendation No. 58 which reads as follows:

> That the responsible authorities conduct a thorough study of the consequences of the adoption of a policy aimed at curtailing postal service on week-ends.

Moreover, under recommendation No. 59, paragraph (c) we read:

> That this study include amongst other things:
> —the possibility of suspending postal operations between the midnight shift on Friday and the evening shift on Sunday at those locations where this is practical, i.e., where no serious delay in mail delivery would occur;

And under paragraph (d) we read:

> The possibility in those offices where it would not be practical to curtail Saturday delivery and wicket service, of employing a minimum staff for the sale of money orders, etc., sorting, preparation and delivery of only first class mail matter along with C.O.D.'s and registered mail and the dispatching of mail of these classes.

Mr. Chairman, the resolution now before us purports to gather revenues to balance the budget of the department. As I said at the beginning, it is our duty, here in this house, to balance the budget of the Post Office Department. As I said right at the beginning, we have obligations towards Canada and its population, because the postal service belongs to the daily life of Canadians.

Post Office Act

On September 27, 1968 the Postmaster General declared, as reported in Hansard, page 496, that as from February 1, 1969, he intends to close the post offices on Saturdays. I quote:

It is, therefore, intended to close the post offices on Saturdays. Deliveries of mail will not be made on Saturdays. This will include letter carrier service, parcel post and rural route deliveries.

Mr. Chairman, I object to the closing of certain post offices in the morning on Saturdays as well as to stopping, on Saturdays, mail deliveries on rural routes.

• (4:40 p.m.)

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, the Post Office Department undertook in 1967 a program of amalgamation of all revenue post offices and establishment of rural routes for the delivery of mail to those who were no longer served by their post offices. The Postmaster General at that time told these people that the rural routes would provide them with better service. The program was very well received and the people served by the rural routes are very satisfied with the present service. Newspapers printed in Montreal or Quebec on Friday were distributed in Gaspé on Saturday afternoon or evening and, in some places, on Sunday morning. Thanks to the new delievery service established in 1967 and the distribution centres, the Friday editions of Montreal and Quebec newspapers reach the post offices in the ridings of Gaspé and Bonaventure during the night from Friday to Saturday, and they are delivered to the post offices and on the rural routes on Saturday morning. The people of Gaspé peninsula I represent are ready to accept a one cent increase on the postage rate of letters, as it is justified by the new postal services which have been placed at their disposal for more than one year.

According to the statement made on September 27 in the house by the minister to the effect that he was thinking of closing post offices on Saturdays, the people of Gaspé peninsula will receive their Friday papers on Monday only.

Mr. Chairman, this decision does not concern only the region of Gaspé but all the regions which are far from the large centres. Post office users in big cities like Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Quebec, Halifax, Vancouver, Winnipeg and others, can do without the post office service on Saturdays since the newspapers are printed in those cities and their citizens can buy them at any stand or have them delivered at home by newsboys.

Mr. Chairman, if the delivery of the mail is stopped on Saturdays, rural regions will regress by 50 years. The resolution is proposing measures affecting mail delivery and rate structure as applied to newspapers and periodicals. If we are to increase the statutory rate on Canadian newspapers—daily papers that is—I suggest to the hon. minister that the increase be sufficient to make sure that Canadians who now get their paper by mail on Saturdays will still get it.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, the Post Office Department has the responsibility to contribute to Canada's development and to the well-being of its people generally. I suggest it is not by discontinuing delivery of mail on Saturdays in rural areas that we shall reach that objective. The department is saving money by consolidating small postal substations and is still carrying on that program. It would be ill-timed to deprive the patrons of rural post offices, of their Saturday mail.

In his statement of September 27, the minister said: It is, therefore, intended to close the post offices on Saturdays." I take for granted that the decision is not final, since he used the word "intended".

Mr. Chairman, it would be proper more than ever to meditate on the Latin proverb taken from the book of the great Augustus, Festina lente—Make haste slowly.

The resolution now before us reads in part as follows:

—to provide for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act, more especially in relation to tenders and contracts—

The payment of services given by rural contractors has always been particularly emphasized in this house.

The basic rate is fixed according to norms taking into account the distance travelled, the number of boxes on the route and the number of calls. There are also other important factors which will have to be considered when the department will be preparing the estimates for highway services and rural routes, such as the topography of the area, the weather conditions and the state of roads.

For instance, in winter, transportation of mails is much easier on provincial highways, where snow-ploughs pass several times a day, than on secondary roads maintained by municipalities. I want to point out that, in the spring, when the thaw is setting in, it is almost impossible to drive on many secondary roads. It is also in winter and in spring that the contractor's vehicle is most liable to be damaged.

I would suggest to the Postmaster General the establishment of a committee made up of officials of his department and independent appraisers who, at different periods during the year, would accompany the contractor to perform the field work. Such a committee would then realize that a highway service and a rural mail delivery in the Gaspé peninsula or in northern New Brunswick are entirely different from those in the Niagara Falls or Vancouver areas.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) has just recently established a committee travelling throughout Canada, in order to learn about housing conditions.

The Postmaster General could do likewise to determine regional standards which would direct the officials of his departments to assess the highway and rural route services.

Mr. Chairman, before closing my remarks, I am asking the House to pass the resolution under consideration. Since the Postmaster General is very understanding and anxious to co-operate with the members who are much closer to the people, I know that he intends to reconsider the removal of newspapers delivery on Saturdays, as reported in Hansard, on page 735. Even this afternoon, he mentioned he was considering the problem. Therefore, I am asking him to inform us specifically on his intentions before closing the debate.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see the Postmaster General, the designated minister of communications, has returned to his seat because for a while it seemed that the only minister in the house piloting this piece of legislation was the Minister of Fisheries. I did not think this was necessarily a coincidence.

Mr. Kierans: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I did not miss a word of what was said.

Mr. Nowlan: I never assumed that the Postmaster General missed a word, but the fact is that the only minister present in the house for a short while was the Minister of Fisheries, which I thought was perhaps most appropriate. In view of the bland and general way in which the Postmaster General presented his explanation of the terms of the resolution today, Canadians across the country may think that more than what the Postmaster General said is involved here and that this thing is a little fishy. Thus the post was most aptly filled by the Minister of Fisheries in the absence of the Postmaster General.

Following this opening salvo I would like to echo many of the thoughts which the hon. member for Hillsborough expressed to the minister in his remarks on the resolution before us. In this era of the great society and in extending some Irish charity from this side of the house to the minister who is supposed to have some strain of Irish in him, I wish to follow the hon. member for Hillsborough in extending congratulations to the minister on his appointment and on his presence in the house. However, I must say I found that the longer the minister spoke in his introductory remarks the more difficult it became for me to be compassionate, as one is supposed to be in this type of society, for my compassion, in opposition to Parkinson's law, diminished the longer the minister spoke as he tried to sugarcoat his way with bland generalities. In bringing to the attention of the house the exotic world of communication satellites, he tried to divert our attention from some very real flaws in the resolution.

My only conclusion, after listening to the minister and trying hard to be charitable, is that the just society, which many people tried to define during the election campaign, is simply a slogan. Therefore I feel I am being charitable in the circumstances in view of this bill in saying that the just society is one in which you pay more and get less. Certainly that is just what is proposed in this bill.

In trying to resolve the problem of how much compassion I should show in extending my congratulations to the minister and having listened to him offer a bouquet to the employees of his department, I wondered at the minister's words in speaking of the turmoil of the strike last summer when he said that the strikers, in his own words, "respected the law and demonstrated their respect for the law". There was no real doubt in the minds of Canadians about whether or not the employees of the post office demonstrated their respect for the law. There is not much doubt either on the part of the public in general that it is the government which must discharge its responsibility to govern this country. I am not going to get off the track, but it was interesting to see the minister put up this straw man and then digress by talking about satellites, telephones, electronic highways and the like.

In listening to the minister's discussion of the strike I began to wonder whether or not the proposals in this resolution and the pending bill do emanate from the strike in the sense that the government, because of the summer doldrums, was perhaps surprised that the public did not react more violently during the early days when postal service was cut off. I do not know what was contained in the interoffice memos of the Post Office Department. Certainly there was a period of ten days or perhaps even two weeks when the public did not seem to be organized in the sense that there was much vocal criticism of the lack of postal service. I wonder in my own mind whether perhaps the postal strike of last summer has not been one of the catalysts that produced this resolution and the bill to follow, since the minister seems prepared to go far beyond what his predecessor was prepared to do just last winter.

I suggest that if this is the type of reasoning that has prompted consideration of this resolution and the progressive press announcements that have been made in an attempt to precondition Canadians to these drastic changes, then the minister is going to find out that the postal service is still very important to Canadians. While we may talk about expanding telecommunications and satellites, the postal service is the glue which holds our national fabric together. I submit that these quick suggestions for such drastic changes touch the raw nerve of most Canadians. Certainly there is no question about the need for some change in rates. However, when we see rate increases on the one hand with a reduction of service on the other, then we get some understanding of the type of renovation and reform this Postmaster General would like to bring to the post office.

It would have been rather amusing, if it were not so serious, to hear the minister suggest in a glib way that we have to buy this package holus-bolus, that if we do not do so we are neanderthal; we are against progress and against change. The minister mentioned there had been no change in the rates since 1954. Some members of the press have said that now we have a majority government, that government can move boldly to make the drastic changes necessary. It is a fact that since 1954 there have been majority governments. The fact that some governments moved carefully and cautiously, long before the just society was conceived, illustrates the perplexity and complexity of some of the issues raised in this resolution.

It is a little disappointing to me that this minister, who I think has some good ideas for reform in theory, should try to glibly give us the sugar pill. I certainly hope that when we are discussing the bill the minister will tell us what he proposes to do because there are fundamental implications here that go far beyond the post office itself. It is an unfortunate fact which Canadians seem to have accepted, but since 1935 the Liberal party has been in power for 27 of those 33 years. If things were so drastic and horrible, it is rather surprising to me that this party which formed the government for the majority of the time since 1935 did not move with a little more dispatch, a little more imagination and innovation, to correct some of the wrongs about which the Postmaster General told us. They certainly have had a chance to innovate and to suggest changes. I think it is a little too easy to suggest, after constructive criticism from outside the house, that we are all against change.

So far as rates and service are concerned, the hon. member for Hillsborough asked many legitimate questions. I want to concentrate a little on the rates and some of the implications contained in these rate changes. Before doing that I should like to digress for a moment and congratulate the minister sincerely on the letter that we received today, giving his second and sober thoughts concerning the rural mail contract dilemma. The letter dated October 7, which I presume was directed to all members of parliament, indicated that the rural mail contracts will be considered and assessed on a just basis. In effect, these contractors will be paid for some of the equipment they did not use. This certainly is a constructive attitude on the part of the minister and goes much further than his statement on October 1 when he said that he had sober thoughts and second thoughts but the second thoughts were the same as the first. Now, his sober thoughts and second thoughts recognize the legitimate case of the rural mail contractors in Canada. I did want to congratulate the minister upon that, without any backhanded compliment being intended.

The other change upon which I hope the minister will report when we are considering the new bill is the recommendations of the Glassco commission for improving the postal service. How many of these recommendations have been implemented since 1962 to update the postal service? If some of them have not been implemented, perhaps the minister could give the reasons why certain recommendations in this very constructive report have not been followed.

With these two digressions on the rural mail contractors and this question of change, which is not a pill we can accept on this side of the house, I should like to comment on part of the minister's remarks. He mentioned that one of the reasons for the rate change was to ensure that newspapers and periodicals bore their fair share of the cost. I believe the hon. member for Surrey asked about international agreements, and certainly the one with the United States. I wonder how the minister reconciles these suggested changes to increase rates with the Canadian users of second and third class mail? There is a case for rate change, but how can he reconcile the statement he made that newspapers and periodicals shall bear their fair share of the cost when he knows, and I know, that the problem in connection with the newspaper and periodical business is the great influx of printed matter from the United States. This printed material contributes no revenue to our coffers because, under the international agreement, it comes into Canada basically on a postage free basis.

I believe that the suggestion that the increase in second and third class postal rates is going to solve the problems of the post office detracts from the real problem, the influx of printed material from the United States which, as a result of the international agreement, is carried by our post office on an almost postage free basis. The fact that we are now going to increase second and third class mail rates on this side of the border cannot help but aggravate the extremely involved law of copyright in connection with printing and publishing inasmuch as United States printing and publishing firms now have such a tremendous advantage over Canadian printing and publishing firms because of the vast numbers of such firms in the United States.

As I understand the minister's remarks, by increasing the second and third class rates we will not only have a natural imbalance as a result of the volume of printed and published matter but there will be even more incentive to printing and publishing companies in the United States to send their material to Canada, thus making Canadian printing and publishing that much less competitive. This second and third class mail is dropped into United States post office boxes at United States rates; it crosses the border into Canada and in effect is carried postage free under the international agreement. I think the question asked by the hon. member for Surrey is most relevant in trying to shed some light on the problem of second and third class mail without everybody being whipped up into an emotional state about how the poor postman in Canada is carrying a lot of mail too cheaply at subsidized rates. That is why I subscribe wholeheartedly to the remarks made by the hon. member for Hillsborough. I think that once we get through the resolution stage this matter should be referred to a committee, where those directly and indirectly involved could present briefs and make submissions. This would not only help educate hon. members but also inform the public about the far-reaching implications of these proposed changes.

Another point about Canadian and United States publishing and printing is that publications of this sort are assessed for federal sales tax of 12 per cent or for provincial sales tax of 5 to 8 per cent. The minister talks of the post office paying its own way and I am wondering whether that factor has been considered. Publications of other media such as radio and television pay no such sales tax.

Another very large employer and earner of dollars for this country is the paper industry. Since the wage increases were awarded last august, out of the blue has come the press statement of the minister that these rate, increases, which range between 66 and 100 per cent, will come into effect. This statement was made without any real consultation with the industry or opportunity given to the industry to submit briefs dealing with possible discrimination against the publishing industry as a result of these rate charges that the television and radio media do not pay.

As we already know, Mr. Chairman, the C.B.C. is heavily subsidized by tax dollars. In view of the fact that there is this discrimination to which I referred and that these increases range from 66 to 100 per cent, which amounts in total to an increase of from 17 to 20 per cent depending upon province, the plea of the minister to make the post office operation a pay as you go proposition would seem to fall on deaf ears unless some explanation is given of why the publishing and printing industry has been, under the proposals of the minister, singled out to pay its own way.

Mr. Kierans: Could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes.

Mr. Kierans: Can he guess or estimate exactly what percentage of our cost we recover on second class mail?

Mr. Orlikow: Why should he do that?

Mr. Kierans: Because the hon. member has been making charges. Our actual subsidy on second class mail at the moment amounts to 78 per cent of the cost. We recover 22 per cent. So that even with a 100 per cent increase of recovery this would still mean payment of a subsidy amounting to 56 per cent.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister for asking me a rhetorical question which he answered, and I am glad that he did because he had the information at his fingertips. This illustrates to me the necessity for this matter to go to a committee, not the committee of the whole but a committee which could hear the many briefs of interested parties, where firms could make submissions, where the experts could be cross-examined and the facts ascertained.

Regardless of the recovery on second class mail, we still have third class mail. Then, as I say, there is still that question which to me was glibly glossed over, namely, that the competitive communications media of television and radio pay no sales tax. Perhaps the minister has some facts and figures as to exactly how much is involved in regard to these publications that do not pay sales tax.

Mr. Perrault: The government would not have any figures of that kind.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour will have his chance to take the floor. This is not the house of another province and he has to govern himself by the rules of this house. It may be difficult for him but he will have to restrain himself.

As I say, some of these communications publications pay no sales tax and do not pay the higher rates. The transmission facilities of the C.B.C. radio and television services are publicly owned; yet they are still subsidized by the government.

In these areas alone, there are legitimate questions that I think the minister has to answer before this matter can proceed much further. For example, there is the question of the five day delivery week. The hon. member for Hillsborough and others will be striking out more forcefully on this subject and also on the question of rural mail contracts and deliveries. If the minister progresses as fast with the development of communication satellites as he is progressing with these drastic changes that he wants to make, then we may be faced with the ludicrous situation of some satellite going to the moon and back before some of the people in rural areas of this country read about it. That is what will happen unless something is quickly done about the newspaper situation.

The question of a five day week is not simply a matter of giving our postal workers a two day week end, because they have it now. I think that the public is being a little misguided if it thinks that this legislation breaks new ground by giving our postal workers a five day week.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Continue.

The Chairman: Does the committee give the hon. member leave to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank hon. members for their indulgence. There is another way in which the rural mail contractor can be affected. Perhaps the minister is aware of it so I will not belabour it; other hon. members may raise it.

We must also consider when talking of a five day week how businesses in our cities will be affected. The minister has stated that the mails will still move. If a letter is dropped into a post box in Vancouver on Friday night, will it still arrive in Toronto on Monday morning? There may be an easy answer to that.

Another problem that might not be so easy to answer concerns freight forwarders. These freight forwarders do business by bills of lading which they have to pick up at their customer's box before they can process the freight. This, Mr. Chairman, together with the five day week and the delivery in Toronto on Monday of a letter posted in Vancouver on Friday, are matters of legitimate concern not only to those in our cities but also to those in rural areas where mail is carried on Saturdays.

I am not going to say anything further because I know that other hon. members have a lot more to say about these drastic changes in what, to me, is a most vital service that affects more Canadians than any other.

Mr. Otto: I will not be too long, Mr. Chairman. In this instance I support the minister. Sometimes, I confess, it takes me longer to support a minister than to oppose him.

To come to the point, it seems that hon. members opposite are discussing the liquidation of our postal service. From what I understand of this resolution it does not mean the end of our postal service. The resolution seeks to increase postage rates by one cent in some instances and by as much as six cents in others. In short, the resolution seeks to readjust postage rates. Actually, it is a resolution to introduce a bill which will make the post office more efficient and a better, not a poorer, service.

Hon. members of the N.D.P. and the Conservative party have referred to the post office as a great public service. No one argues that the post office is not still a great public service. The question is under our present priorities is it a public service that requires subsidizing? If so, by how much?

Mr. Orlikow: Subsidizing by whom?

Mr. Otto: How much should the subsidy be?

Mr. Orlikow: And by whom should it be paid?

Mr. Otto: I want the hon. member for Winnipeg North to remember that when the post office became a public service just before the turn of the century, about 1889 or 1890, the postal authorities of Canada charged two cents to deliver a letter at a time when the total income for all Canada was only $892 million. Wages then were $1.50 per week and it cost two cents to have a letter delivered in Canada. There was no method of communication other than the post. There were no telephones. You sent a letter or you did not communicate. There was urgency, therefore, to introduce a public service dealing with postage.

In 1931, when Canadian per capita income was $348, the postal delivery rate went up to three cents. Per capita income in this country is now $2,400. If we applied a proportionate postage rate to our mail delivery it should cost 18 cents to have a letter delivered.

An hon. Member: It should be three cents.

Mr. Otto: When one remembers that Canadians spend $413 million a year on long distance telephone calls, or an average of $80 per family, no one will argue that six cents is too much to pay to have a piece of first class mail delivered. How many letters will Canadians send per week? If every family sends one letter a week, the increased cost to that family will be under 60 cents a year. In any event, each family does not send one letter a week. I say that when you consider that the average family spend $80 per year on long distance telephone calls it is nonsense to argue that this increase in first class mail rates is crucial for Canadians or that the country will go bankrupt. All this argument about the one cent increase is absolute nonsense. Considering what our people spend on long distance telephone calls every year and considering that our income per capita is much higher now than it was before, should first class mail be subsidized at all? I do not think so. I think it should pay its own way.

Mr. Orlikow: It does.

An hon. Member: Business will suffer.

Mr. Otto: I hear comments that business will suffer. I expect that this rate will mean an additional expense of about $1 per week per business. Since the cost of typing a letter is $2.70, spending an extra two cents to mail the letter will not break any business establishment. Business will be more efficiently served than in the past. In any event, business does not ask to be subsidized.

Mr. Orlikow: No, it passes its costs on to the consumer.

Mr. Otto: Of course. And who do you think is going to pay the $100 million deficit which amounts to about $5 per person? Does the hon. member think Canadians would rather pay $5 per capita or see postage rates on first class mail increased by one or two cents?

The latter part of the resolution, as I read it, deals with what some term direct mail. Direct mail entails an absolute waste of time and money. Of course, direct mailers will complain bitterly; their expenses will go up. You must remember, and it has been proven many times, that only about 7 to 9 per cent of direct mail is ever looked at. At most, direct mail is 9 per cent efficient and those who engage in direct mail advertising know that 90 per cent of their effort is wasted. Most of the matter they mail winds up in the waste paper basket. So long as we subsidize that inefficient 90 per cent the money the direct mailers spend will not be turned to more productive channels of advertising and promotion. I have absolutely no sympathy for the concept of direct mailing. There are many superior ways to get one's message across. If the postage rates are kept at their present levels it will pay those engaged in direct mailing to see 90 per cent of their matter thrown away and 10 per cent only put to effective use.

I want to say a few words about periodicals, Mr. Chairman. There has been a sort of sanctimonious attitude toward periodicals as if magazines, periodicals and newspapers of all kinds have a vested right to be in our lives.

Mr. Orlikow: Especially Time and Reader's Digest.

Mr. Otto: I have seen worse magazines.

Mr. Orlikow: I don't know where.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where have you been?

Mr. Otto: I hold no brief for Time or Life magazine. I think no periodical has the vested right to be delivered at rates which amount to subsidies. There are some areas of endeavour, in the artistic or literary fields, which the government might wish to promote. No one says that the government will cut out all subsidization. We are saying that the matter will be reviewed and adjusted. We want no one to say, "I have special privileges that someone else has not," or "someone has special privileges that I have not". That is the basis of this resolution. The resolution seeks to clarify and regulate so that all periodicals will be treated equally.

Mr. Orlikow: Where does it say that?

Mr. Otto: That is the entire purport of the resolution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Otto: The minister made that plain in several public statements. He did not say he would cut out all subsidies. He said that periodicals will be treated equally, as will be second class mail of all kinds.

I now wish to say a few words about the question of Saturday closing which was raised by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think the minister says that there will never be any kind of postal service on Saturday. He said the matter is to be studied. At the moment it looks as if Saturday deliveries will be discontinued. The minister recognizes that business patterns have changed and that for some people who work all week Saturday may be the only day on which they can make use of mail service. No doubt the department will evolve methods of serving members of the working public who must have recourse to mail service on Saturday, and I am quite sure that the minister is open on that subject. No one has said that mail service of every kind is to be discontinued on Saturdays.

The minister deserves kudos for announcing that a research group has been set up to determine whether the Post Office Department can be turned into a crown corporation. It would be a wonderful idea if it could be turned into a crown corporation. I think the department deserves the status of such a corporation, especially if it is to increase its efficiency. Personally, I see no reason for all the hue and cry we hear about the disappearance of the post office. The Post Office Department will be a better and more efficient department if it operates as a crown corporation, and I support the minister wholeheartedly on this aspect.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like, as other members have done, to congratulate the minister on his new position in his new field of activity, the federal government. He certainly comes here well recommended. We sincerely wish him success and hope he will be able to apply his many abilities to the demands of his new position.

Before I go further with my remarks, there are one or two things I think should be clarified. The previous speaker clearly implied that the minister had not said there would be no letter carrier or other delivery of mail on Saturdays and that the department was just considering the matter. I have in front of me Hansard containing the following statement on page 496. Nothing is said here about studying the question. The paragraph reads:

> It is therefore intended to close the post offices on Saturdays. Deliveries of mail will not be made on Saturdays. This will include letter carrier service, parcel post and rural route deliveries.

I quote this in order that there may be no misunderstanding. Unless the minister has changed his mind since then and imparted new information to the hon. member who has just spoken, there can be no equivocation about what the minister said. If during the course of the discussion of this resolution the hon. gentleman wishes to clarify the matter I am sure we would all be pleased to hear him do so.

It seems to me, in view of a number of things which have taken place and which have been brought up in this chamber, that the minister's great energy and enthusiasm for the work he has undertaken have led to his being a little too hasty in this case. Since the proposed changes are not to come into effect, I understand, until February 1 of next year there would certainly be no harm in responding to the representations made in this house and elsewhere that this question be referred to a special committee, perhaps with a proviso that the committee report back within a certain time limit so that its deliberations will not take too long.

As my hon. friend from Hillsborough has indicated, there are a number of aspects which require study. For instance, there is the question of the cost of the junk mail we all receive. The position of the weekly newspapers must be considered. How will bills of lading be affected? A great many people who stand to be seriously affected by these proposed changes should have a chance to make representations before a committee. The setting up of a special committee in this regard would be most appropriate. It would not delay the minister's proposed legislative changes and it might be most helpful.

Unlike a good many other ministers both present and past, the Postmaster General shows a certain flexibility of mind and reasonableness which are highly commendable. I would refer to the representations which were made to him by members on both sides of the house with respect to the position of rural mail contractors during the recent postal strike. I understand it was originally decided not to pay these people despite the fact that they had contracts with the government. After representations had been made the minister announced to us that the contracts would be honoured after all, minus sums in respect of costs for gasoline and the like which were not incurred.

I think this was an excellent decision on the part of the minister and he should be commended for listening to the representations made to him by hon. members. It is no disgrace to change one's mind. Some people who have been here over the years seem to believe they are the fount of all knowledge and that no one else can have any knowledge about anything. When asked to change positions they have taken they dig in their heels, lay their ears back and stubbornly refuse. It is refreshing to see a minister who does not do this.

It is my understanding that the principle has been followed by all governments in recent years that Canadian citizens should not be penalized because of geography or their location, and I am sure the minister would agree that this is a proper course to take. This applies to all necessary services, and surely communication services are included. There are forms of communication which presently enjoy heavy subsidies, as my hon. friend from Hillsborough indicated. I refer to the C.B.C. and the C.N.R., to mention only two. People who live in the far north receive news and information by radio and telegram via the C.B.C. This certainly costs plenty, but nobody objects to it. I believe that those who try to open up our north country are entitled to these special services even if they do cost extra money. There are precedents. The railway which opened up this vast country was never intended to pay its own way. The same applies to the Post Office Department.

I realize that most members on the government side come from the big cities. There are a few who do not but the majority come from the big cities and are not familiar with the difficulties with which residents of rural areas have to contend. Consider deliveries of newspapers, for example. People living in rural areas of southwestern Ontario, a heavily populated part of the country, as well as those living in southern Quebec or the lower mainland of British Columbia, I presume, receive their daily papers not from paper boys but by rural mail. I know that in my own area the London Free Press makes in the neighbourhood of 20,000 deliveries a day by rural mail.

It is true that in modern days radio and television constitute a greatly improved method of communication but it is a fact that a great many people still like to read the newspapers despite their many faults. Most of us read the newspapers and enjoy them. Most major dailies put out a special edition on Saturdays containing all sorts of additional matter—coloured pictures, comics, "goodies", as one of my hon. friends puts it. There are even some informative things in the coloured pictures. Most people, including farmers, appreciate this.

Perhaps I should bring it to the attention of members of the government that farm people work seven days a week. But they do have a little more time to themselves on Sundays, possibly because of their religious background. I know this is an old-fashioned concept to some, but in some places in the country areas Sunday is still observed as a day of rest.

As I say, people like to read their papers on Sunday and the papers would not be of much use if deliveries were not made until Monday or Tuesday. No doubt there are some who would be inconvenienced by the lack of letter carrier delivery in urban areas on a Saturday, but I have received nothing like as many complaints from urban areas as I have received from residents in rural areas. The minister might be able to justify to some extend discontinuance of mail delivery in urban areas but I certainly think he should carefully reconsider his intention to discontinue letter carrier service on Saturdays in the rural areas.

Discontinuance of Saturday service will have another effect. If the minister's proposal is put into effect without change on February 1, then because of his power to vary the contracts with rural mail contractors these people will have their remuneration cut proportionately. As someone pointed out earlier, this is not very just in the new just society, because these people get little enough as it is and, if I may use the expression, Mr. Chairman, damn little in proportion to others. Most of them cannot "moonlight", to use popular parlance, and cannot get other forms of income. It is not an easy matter to find Saturday jobs.

If the minister has to save money I suggest he save it on the letter carrying service in the urban areas. I and other members who represent both kinds of areas have not had as many complaints from urban as from rural areas, particularly in respect of the newspaper situation, and I hope the minister will reconsider this aspect of his proposal.

To sum up, Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will prevail upon his cabinet colleagues to set up a special committee of the house to report by a certain date, a committee that will look into a number of questions and complaints that have been raised. I cannot help but think that in his enthusiasm to do a really good job the minister has not received all the information he should have with respect to the proposed changes. The people of Canada and the minister could derive real benefit from further information, and I hope he will give careful consideration to this suggestion.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I waited with a great deal of interest for what was really the first speech of the Postmaster General in this chamber. Before he came to this house he had a reputation as a great progressive, a great radical. It may have been heresy and untrue but in fact I even read references to him as a socialist. But as I listened to his speech it seemed to me that it could very well have been made by his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, who on occasion has been called many things but never a radical, never a progressive and, God forbid, never a socialist.

Somewhere in the place where they make cabinets, Mr. Chairman, there must be a sausage machine. You take prospective cabinet ministers, radicals like the Postmaster General, reactionaries like the President of the Treasury Board, put them in the machine, grind away, and what comes out is some good gray, bureaucratic conservative who makes the kind of speech that the Postmaster General made.

The Postmaster General tells us that at present rates the post office is going to have a deficit of $99½ million and that the post office must pay its own way. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, has asked a very simple and obvious question. Where is it written that the Post Office or any other department of government must pay its own way? Does the Department of National Health and Welfare pay its own way? Does the Department of—

An hon. Member: Defence?

Mr. Orlikow: Defence is in a class by itself and I will leave it to the experts. Does the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce pay its own way, except in the sense that we hope it increases the efficiency of Canadian businesses and industries so that they can produce and so on? Which departments of government pay their own way? Does the National Research Council pay its own way? Can any minister demonstrate in dollars and cents that the National Research Council pays its own way? Of course not, Mr. Chairman. Governments and parliaments in past years have decided that the people of Canada are entitled to certain services, and one of the basic rights of the people of Canada is the right to send and receive mail.

I wonder whether the hon. member for York East, who spoke a few minutes ago, will go back to his constituency and tell the many old age pensioners there that the increase in the first class mail rate is justified, old age pensioners who live on the miserable pensions which we give them in this country, who depend so much in their way of life on the letters they get from their children and other relatives and friends. Will he tell them that this increase of almost 50 per cent is justified?

Aside from the question of the principle that the Post Office Department must pay its own way, which in my opinion is completely unjustified, there is a simple question that we have a right to ask. If there is a deficit and if the deficit must be met where was it incurred and are the increases proposed going to come from those sources which produced the deficit?

The minister has been very explicit. He is going to increase the rate for first class mail to six cents. He is going to cut deliveries from six days to five days a week. He is going to close the postal savings banks. He is going to increase the charges for sending postal money orders. He is going to increase the charges for sending local mail.

I would like the minister or anybody in his department to show any member of parliament or any member of the public that it costs as much to mail a letter in Ottawa to be delivered in Ottawa as it costs to mail a letter in Ottawa for delivery in Vancouver or Winnipeg. To say that it does is simply to show how ridiculous this kind of proposal is. It simply is not and cannot be true.

The minister has been very explicit about the kind of increases we are going to get for first class mail, although to my knowledge every study which has been made has indicated pretty clearly that first class mail comes fairly close to paying its own way if it does not in fact do so. Yet that is where the increases are coming, and that is where the minister is so careful to point out exactly what the increases will be.

The hon. member for Surrey has pointed out that those increases where they apply to business mail involving bills, charge accounts and the host of ordinary transactions in which we all get involved will not be paid for by the businesses which mail the bills but will be passed on in increased costs to the consumer. Every one of us who drives a car and uses the credit cards supplied to us so quickly, easily and gracefully by Imperial Oil, B.A., Shell and all the other companies, knows very well that the increase in the cost of sending a monthly statement to us will be picked up quickly by those companies through an increase in the cost of gasoline. The same goes for Eaton's and Simpson's, or anybody else with whom you are unfortunate enough to have to do business. So, we are going to have to pay for that increase in mail rates which the Postmaster General, that great progressive, is inflicting on the people of Canada—

Mr. Kierans: If I could make a remark—

Mr. Orlikow: I will always be glad to hear you.

Mr. Kierans: The hon. member has twitted me for being called at one time a socialist and perhaps now, horror of horrors, a conservative. I find it strange to listen to the hon. member for Winnipeg North, having listened to the hon. member for Surrey plead the cause of business in this chamber.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss for words—

Mr. Kierans: Are you a socialist?

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, if I am at a loss for words momentarily it is for the simple reason that obviously the Postmaster General has not been listening. I have just finished saying that those increases which the ordinary citizen is asked to pay will be paid by him when the cost of the goods which he buys is increased by the amount of the postal increase.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Chairman, if I could intervene in order to give the hon. member for Winnipeg North time to collect his thoughts, I would like to suggest that what is true about the increase in the first class rate is the simple fact that 80 per cent of this increase will be borne by the business community. What is suggested by the hon. member, and completely unproven, is that the business community will in fact pass it on to the consumers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where has the minister been?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I do not have a Parliamentary Guide here, but I understand that the Postmaster General at one point in his varied career was a professor in business administration, I believe, at McGill. I think he ought to go back and take a course. He and I know that none of the companies which will pay the increased cost of sending out their bills will themselves absorb that cost. He and I know—and it will be demonstrated very quickly—that they will pass that cost on to the consumer.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I do not mind the Postmaster General interrupting as long as the Chair keeps a record and does not take his time off mine.

Mr. Kierans: All I want to say, as a former professor of economics, is that the hon. member still—

The Chairman: Order, please. Under our standing orders the minister does not have the right to intervene even for the alleged reason of allowing the hon. member for Winnipeg North to collect his thoughts. If the minister wants to make a statement he can do so with the leave of the house. He can also ask a question. If the minister wants to ask a question, perhaps he should put his question directly.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I have the feeling that the more the minister speaks, the more he is digging his grave, so I have no objection to his speaking. The minister's statement was very specific and in very concrete terms—about the exact changes which he proposes in respect of first class mail which I say has on the whole been carrying its own cost. But the minister has not given us the full details of all the changes he proposes.

What the minister has not done—and I say he has no right to ask the members of this committee to vote for this resolution until he does it—is to tell us in the same kind of detail the increases which he proposes for other types of mail. For the hon. member for Annapolis Valley it was rather like pulling teeth to get the minister to tell us what is intended with respect to second and third class mail. I think I have written this down correctly, that at the present time second and third class mail is being subsidized to the extent of 78 per cent.

If the minister knows that and can tell us that he is increasing first class mail rates to six cents per letter, he can also tell us what he proposes to do about second and third class mail, because these have been the freeloaders. The just society, obviously, to the minister and to the Prime Minister means that those who have shall get more and those who have not shall pay more. What has the minister to say about second and third class mail? What about the garbage that comes into every mail box in this country every day? What about the throwaways, the catalogues, and all the material of this type which is unwanted and unasked for?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Certainly.

Mr. Kierans: Does the hon. member realize that we have already raised the rates on third class mail by between 66 per cent and 80 per cent? Does he also realize that a discussion on third class mail does not come under the terms of the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the minister that if he wants the members of the committee to vote intelligently on this resolution he should be just as specific with regard to the rate increases he proposes for second and third class mail as he was regarding those proposed for first class mail. What does 66 per cent mean? What was it before? How much was it losing before and how much will it pay in the future?

I can get an annual subscription to the Winnipeg newpapers—and I am sure this is true of members from Regina, Calgary or Vancouver—and the newspapers will be delivered in Ottawa at the same price as they are delivered to me in Winnipeg. How much does the Post Office Department charge the daily newspapers to deliver newspapers from the city in which they are printed to the city in which they are delivered? How much does it cost us to carry those newspapers? How much do we get back? The minister has not told us these things. I think he can, and I hope he will before we finish this debate.

How much does it cost to take Eaton's catalogue from the point where it is printed, either Toronto or Winnipeg, and have it delivered to virtually every home in Canada? Does it pay for itself or do we lose money on this operation? I have never asked that these catalogues be delivered to my home but they are. As I say, the minister should tell us whether we are losing money in this respect. Almost every day I get circulars from the Book of the Month Club, Encyclopedia Britannica or 100 other organizations. I have never asked for them but I get them. How much does it cost to deliver these? Are we getting back the cost of carrying them or subsidizing it? These are the kinds of things the minister ought to be telling this house. He has been singularly quiet on these matters up to now.

I suggest to the minister that if he has no new figures he should look at the report of the royal commission on publications. I realize that it may be verboten by this government because that royal commission was appointed by a former government. However, the royal commission published some very interesting statistics. I refer the minister to page 87 of the report, where they point out that periodicals do not carry the full cost of delivery. They point out that the loss to the Canadian Post Office on publishers' second class mail has been steadily increasing. In 1948 the loss to the post office was about $7.5 million; in 1960 it was almost $23 million. How much was it in 1967? Are the increases which the minister says he is imposing going to mean that there will be no loss to the postal department?

The royal commission on publications referred to the value to the country of small publications such as those put out by universities like McGill, Dalhousie and Toronto. I do not mind subsidizing these. I do not even mind subsidizing church publications, but I resent having the taxpayers of Canada subsidize publications such as Reader's Digest and Time magazine. I think they are very well able to pay for themselves. Before I would even think of voting for this resolution I want the minister to tell us whether in fact we are going to wipe out subsidies for this kind of magazine.

Perhaps we should be subsidizing the delivery through the mails of daily and weekly newspapers because they are a very important source of information to the people of this country. If the government intends to do that as a matter of public policy, surely the minister should say so and tell us that the cost of a deliberate decision to subsidize the delivery of daily and weekly newspapers, which are important to the people of Canada, will amount to so many millions. That is the kind of information the minister ought to give. It is because the minister has been so remiss in giving us these elemental and essential bits of information that, if we are to vote in a responsible way. we must vote against the resolution.

Before sitting down I should like to take this opportunity, since the minister discussed the Post Office Department, of saying a few words about the postal strike and what I consider to be the absolutely inexcusable and indefensible manner in which the government acted. I am not sure that this minister had very much to do with handling the strike. In 1966 there was a work stoppage by postal workers. As a means of getting the postal workers back to work the government appointed Mr. Justice Montpetit to look into the working conditions which may have led to the work stoppage.

Mr. Justice Montpetit made a very lengthy report. If there has ever been a more damaging report regarding the operations of government I do not know of it. Mr. Justice Montpetit made a series of recommendations and suggested that the Post Office Department should be reorganized in order that the working conditions for post office workers could be similar to those of private industry. We had another strike which lasted for several weeks because those recommendations were not implemented. The truth of this can be seen from the fact that to settle that strike it was necessary to appoint Mr. Justice Montpetit to examine the situation and find out what recommendations had not been implemented.

I cannot understand how any government could wait until the eve of a strike before saying to a group of workers that the amount they had asked for was too high and unreasonable. The government should have immediately said that the cost of living had increased by a certain percentage since the last settlement and it was prepared to use that percentage as the basis of an increase in wages. The government did not do this but waited until it was virtually impossible to prevent the strike. It seems to me that a government which refers so frequently to a just society should look at its own operations and implement a just society for its own employees before calling upon the people of Canada to do so.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, like the previous speakers, allow me to congratulate the new Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans), because I feel that among the ministers he has the most desirable post, since he is supported in his work by honest and efficient employees. Indeed, according to the reports of our friends who travelled throughout the world or soldiers on leave who tell us about the problems which they must face when dealing with the mail, we come to the conclusion that our service is not only excellent but also fast when one considers that there is a 24-hour service between Vancouver and Quebec and a 12-hour service between Ottawa and Quebec.

The part of the resolution which I prefer is the following and I quote:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Post Office Act to abolish the local delivery rate on letters for delivery within the postal area in which they are posted—

This disposition leaves something to be desired. However, further on, we read:

—to provide for certain changes in connection with the administration of the Act, more especially in relation to tenders and contracts;—

Mr. Chairman, it is very interesting to see that the hon. minister intends to tackle the problem of contracts because the method used until now was really outmoded as it dated back to the time when the mail was delivered by horse or ox-drawn carriage. I could give you a number of examples of this.

I have seen the list of contractors who deliver mail in my area. It is really disappointing to see the discrepancies which exist between contracts when the distances to cover are the same and an equivalent number of people are involved. I am convinced that of all the employees of the department, the people hired under contract are those who get the lowest salaries.

At this stage, Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to read some extracts from a letter I received from the Postmaster General on October 7, 1968. I quote:

—we recognize that a large number of contractors have taken steps to be available at all times in order to resume work as soon as the strike is over. For that reason, we are ready to pay them a certain remuneration, without prejudice, in accordance with the following provisions.

1. To the contractors who provide the rural mail delivery and other minor services, who do the work themselves and are paid on an annual basis, we propose to pay the ordinary remuneration for the whole period while the service was interrupted, less the normal operating costs which were not incurred during the period while the work was not performed.

[English]

The Chairman: It being six o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment today are as follows: The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Schreyer), Agriculture—biological effects on chickens of microwave tower radiation; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg), Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act,—alleged delay in submission of returns by corporations; the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), Fisheries—establishment by Russia of rights off Pacific coast.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, when the house rose, I was commenting a letter addressed to me by the Postmaster General on October 7.

This letter informs us of the minister's intention to reduce the wages due to contractors who were the victims of the postal strike last summer, such reduction being proportionate to the expenses incurred to do their work in normal times.

I wish to take advantage of this resolution to ask the minister to reconsider his decision and to pay all those contractors at the normal rate, as though there had been no strike.

In my opinion, a study to establish the exact margin between wages and expenses would cost more than the total payment of regular salaries due to these people.

Mr. Chairman, I started my remarks with congratulations for the honourable minister. Allow me here to show him my sympathy because, after all, having been in the minister's seat for barely two months, he is already forced to extend a begging hand.

We very well realize that he is facing increased operating costs. He is at the head of a Department with employees scattered in all parts of Canada. His employees must pay their taxes as all workers do. All sorts of taxes have been added to the costs of the various services which the department must use.

The minister must cope with pay increases claimed by his staff who these past years have had to wrestle with increases in federal, provincial, municipal and school taxes. All increases in taxes, both direct and indirect, have pushed upwards the costs of the services required for the good operation of that department.

Of course, the operator of a fleet of trucks for instance, will have to consider the higher operating costs of his vehicles because of direct or indirect taxes. The costs of materials needed to build new post offices have necessarily increased, on account of the new 12 per cent tax on building materials.

To summarize, Mr. Chairman, the minister is up against the system he set up himself in co-operation with his colleagues. He is up against higher trucking, railroad and air freight rates.

The minister must face up to the high cost of labour. He has to cope with the high rents for buildings not owned by his department.

The minister is also at grips with the rise in construction costs and the department lets contracts to other departments for the construction of the buildings it requires.

There is no other solution. The rates have to be increased for all postal deliveries across the country. To justify his action, the minister tell us that the rates in force at present were set in 1954.

Mr. Chairman, if such arguments were valid or justifiable, I think that family allowances would be increased since the rates now in force were established in 1944.

The second argument that the minister has advanced in his statement is to the effect that he wants to consider the classical methods in order to achieve a better service.

Mr. Chairman, has the minister begun his study of the matter? In the affirmative, with the 40-hour week that already exists for a number of postal employees, can the minister tell us if he intends to lay off all the people who are now working on a casual basis, in order to replace those who would have leisure time due to the 40-hour week.

This is a secret for nobody, because under the postal service in operation on Saturday, some employees had a holiday on Monday, some others on Tuesday and still others on Wednesday. At any rate, these holidays will automatically disappear and, I ask again my question: Will the casual employees have to leave their job or is it intended to assign them to other duties in order to really improve the service?

Can the hon. minister tell us by whom he intends to be assisted in his consideration and if the examiners have not yet been appointed, would he permit me to suggest that he should ask for the services of our postmasters, because, unfortunately up to now, these civil servants have not been called upon. However, these postmasters are serious, honest and conscientious people with a background of 10, 15 and sometimes 20 years of experience.

The ministers are sometimes shuffled around. Members can be defeated, but postmasters remain with all their knowledge and they only request the privilege of co-operating with the department.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that if the minister calls in this group of workers experienced in post office matters, the review of the old methods will not last long, since these civil servants will quickly point out the deficiencies which the honourable minister intends to remedy, in the best interest of the users of the Canadian post office.

[English]

Mr. McCleave: First, Mr. Chairman, this resolution gives me an opportunity to say a few kind words to the minister, who is a newcomer to the House of Commons. I congratulate him upon surviving the political olympiad which occurred in Ottawa earlier this year, and also congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the fact that the Prime Minister chose to establish communications with him.

It would also seem that the minister deals with the excommunicated, because one of the purposes of the proposed legislation is to do what the former member for York-Humber had advocated on occasion in the House of Commons. So that yesterday's heresies sometimes have a habit of turning up as today's Liberal doctrine.

In his remarks the minister made many references to the just society. I suppose this shows that the Prime Minister was communicating with him; and if we are to accept the minister's statement, the just society and the Post Office will march hand in hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: I appreciate the applause because I think the outstanding feature of the just society is that it is so inflationary that even an astronomic telescope had to be scrapped because it could not keep track of the inflation. The Post Office Department had been one of the last refuges of the nickel, but now even that refuge is gone with first class mail to go up to six cents. Indeed the minister is fully in tune with the just society, as we know it to exist in Canada today. I thought that as a new minister he might have reversed the trend that has been going on for some time in the House of Commons with regard to the resolution stage. As I understand the resolution stage, it affords the ministry an opportunity to present to the House of Commons the dollars and cents that will be involved in a particular piece of legislation so that the house can determine whether to accept or reject what is proposed. The resolution is to acquaint the house, and therefore, the taxpayers, with the amount of money involved in legislation that is proposed. But as other speakers have pointed out, we have not had a real indication from the minister, at least in his brief presentation, as to the exact picture of the costs.

It must be said in fairness to the minister that when in the debate he attempted to ask questions of other members or make interjections, some of this information came out. But I think it would have been more useful if he had given us this information in his opening remarks. Perhaps before the resolution stage of the debate ends, he will do so.

Mr. Chairman, by way of aside I would say that if we are to deal with the reform of our procedures and do not go back to the original purpose of the resolution stage, this is one of those things that could be scrapped quite easily without any loss to ourselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: If we do revert to the better practice of ancient times, then the resolution stage might yet achieve a purpose. Serious questions were asked by the hon. member for Hillsborough, the hon. member for Oxford, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley and members of other opposition parties. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Hillsborough, backed up by others, for a committee study was a pretty good one. We had in this house yesterday an instance of the hearts of all parliamentarians being touched by tragic events in another part of the world, and we are very quick to establish a committee to look into possible ways of assisting people suffering starvation.

I think everybody in the house agrees that if any department deeply touches the lives of Canadians, it is the Post Office Department. Perhaps nothing has hurt Canadians more than the announcements made over a period of time, culminating in this measure to change the postal habits of Canadians. I think it annoys them. I do not think they will buy the argument of the hon. member for York East, who asked, what is a penny increase or what is a two cents increase? For some people a penny or two pennies means a great deal indeed. When I heard this argument I thought the same argument would probably be used by some kindly but misguided executioner operating the medieval rack, in the middle ages to the effect that another little twist or turn would not really hurt at all. Probably this increase will not hurt most Canadians. But I know that during the postal strike, when people had to have an ear to bend to express their views about how much the postal service meant to them, I could tell how much the postal service means to very poor people who count on letters perhaps to a greater extent than any of us in this chamber.

The same argument could be raised with regard to making it more difficult for people to write letters by increasing the rate either one or two cents, namely that it takes something out of their lives. To many people letters are of extraordinary importance. I think we have had from the new minister commendable zeal and energy, but I think this has also been accompanied by an indecent haste to get the affairs of the Post Office in what he imagines to be order. To the minister I think this means balancing the budget. To those on this side it means paying more money for less service. To people all across Canada it means much less by way of service, particularly the week end service.

I support the suggestion of the hon. member for Hillsborough that a committee study this measure. I make the point that we sadly lack details in this regard. Certainly we have not had sufficient information at the resolution stage to justify the resolution that we are now considering. We should be able to ask questions of officials. If we can put our best collective experience and ideas together and suggest methods of relieving starvation in another part of the world, surely there must be a similar pool of ideas which could suggest how the Post Office could overcome some of its problems.

I think these problems are best summed up in the Canadian Post Office Annual Report for 1967. I quote from page 9 of that report as follows:

> Increases in revenues brought about through efficiencies, rate adjustments and larger volumes were offset constantly by the cost of increased services, additional personnel, rising labour costs and higher transportation charges.

It seems to me that in all the specific areas mentioned, enterprising M.P.s on the house committee could dig in and come up with ideas for our postal service. They could find out the specifics, the a's, b's and c's of each factor I have mentioned. I hope the Postmaster General will be able to answer the questions raised and tell us in the committee what is the long range projection for these measures.

We are asked to raise the postal rates one or two cents for first class mail, so we get into a six cent category for all mail. Does this stabilize the situation? Does this measure, with the others, overcome the problem the Postmaster General is trying to overcome, or in one year or two years is it projected that costs may go up and new measures will become necessary? I would like to have heard from the hon. gentleman, and hope that at some stage of the debate he will take us into his confidence as to long range planning, what these rates are intended to do now and what they will do in the future.

One of the proposals that I believe is being advanced by the hon. gentleman—if I did not hear him correctly, I hope he will set me right—deals with the newspapers of this country. I have particular reference to the smaller weeklies. Some of these newspapers have in the past enjoyed free mailing privileges: In an editorial in the Canadian Weekly Publisher of July, 1967, it was stated:

> Thus we generously estimate (the exact figures have been supplied to the postal authorities by the CWNA Postal Committee) that the Post Office Department handles, free of cost, at the most, some 500,000 copies a week.
> During the publishing year, with most newspapers closing one week for a plant holiday, this number amounts to 25,500,000 copies. At the usual mailing rate—three cents for the first two ounces—the annual lost revenue to the Post Office Department is $765,000 at most.

• (8:20 p.m.)

The $765,000 is a far cry from the gap of some $97 million that the minister is attempting to close through this legislation. When this measure comes in I hope some consideration will be given to the problems faced by the weekly newspaper publishers. Let me quote again from this editorial, Mr. Chairman:

> —a small community newspaper is no money-maker to many a publisher. This service to the public is, if the publisher is fortunate, made possible by the job shop and stationery store run in conjunction with the newspaper.
> The publisher keeps putting out his newspaper also because it is the only means that provides a voice to the grass roots community and lends it some identity.
> Quite often the small newspaper is the only voice through which the government by publicity releases or advertisements can reach the isolated or furthest corners of this country. Thus the newspapers not only provide service to their readers but help the government to communicate with its citizens.

I fully endorse these remarks Mr. Chairman. This matter of giving identity to small communities is important. It is my hope that nothing the minister does or that we here will be asked to do in respect of post office legislation will put any of these small but important areas of Canadian journalistic concern in jeopardy.

If the government wants to generate more revenue let me suggest one quick and handy way: Perhaps he should call on his friend Mayor Jean Drapeau of Montreal. However, I am not suggesting the minister should invite him here to set up some supercolossal lottery which will bail the post office out of this present sea of red ink.

Some residents of Ottawa have drawn my attention to the fact that the envelope which comes to their doors with an invitation to pay voluntary taxes to Montreal—a neat way to describe a lottery—come with the notation "Pull out for postal inspection" or "Tirez pour inspection postale". The glue on the envelope is such that, with heat and the normal jostling of the mail, the envelope seals itself. Thus the envelopes have arrived at the doors without a notation as to their source, because Mr. Drapeau does not put names or addresses on these, which have probably left Montreal as second or third class mail. They arrive in the post boxes of this nation as first class mail because of this self-sealing process. Let me suggest to the Postmaster General that he invite Mayor Drapeau to make a more sizeable contribution to the postal coffers of Canada in respect of these requests.

I have made a few points, and perhaps I will make more during the other stages of this legislation. Let me repeat that I endorse what I regard as the very reasonable request of the hon. member for Hillsborough, that at a very early stage we should follow the successful formula of referring this matter to a committee of the house so that interested individuals would have an opportunity to discuss with the minister and his officials what is surely the most basic service to the Canadian people. I do not think anyone would object to a time limit of a couple of weeks. This is one of the most important services that Canadian people have, because this service affects the lives of all of us.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Chairman, I think most members of the house have listened with interest to the line of argument advanced by the opposition during the course of considering this resolution. Despite the agitated eloquence and the tortuous line of opposition reasoning, it is obvious that we have in this resolution a measure which is not only desirable but necessary. It is necessary in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer. It is necessary, and opposition members know it. Indeed, I say this in part because of past pronouncements opposition members have made about the need to improve postal efficiency.

We have been treated today to a labyrinth of illogic.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Perrault: What is the proposal?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Perrault: What is the proposal?

An hon. Member: We now hear from the oratorical genius.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Chairman, I suppose we must listen to all this chatter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Perrault: Apparently the opposition slogan is "Don't confuse us with the facts, our minds are made up".

The proposal is to bring to the postal service of this country a degree of equity and economy which has been needed for years, and that it is time to put postal operations in Canada on a sound, efficient and businesslike basis. The proposal is the product of a belief which I submit should go beyond party demarcation lines. For once all should agree to endeavour to promote efficiency in a government operation which will produce benefits for all taxpayers. This instead of pursuing nit-picking arguments which, at times, I believe are not held sincerely by some of the members.

An hon. Member: How about the C.B.C.?

Mr. Perrault: Huge deficits in the postal operation are intolerable and injurious to the economy, and all of us know it. Yet, the intent of the opposition here today seems to be to oppose this resolution and therefore to frustrate any change.

An hon. Member: You don't know that.

Mr. Perrault: On September 29, 1967 the Conservative member for Lambton-Kent said in this house as recorded at page 288 of Hansard:

> The citizens of this country are being called upon, in effect, to subsidize the second class mail operations of the Post Office. How much more of this inflated cost of doing business, this inflated cost of living, can the Canadian public accept and still survive.

That is the position the Conservative party stated in this house one year ago.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Perrault: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to ask the hon. member a question.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour permit a question? Is he afraid?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: I must remind the hon. member that the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour has the floor.

Mr. Nowlan: Is he afraid of the question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Perrault: We heard the tragic appeal of the Conservative party last year: "How much longer, oh how much longer this inflated cost of doing business can the Canadian public accept and still survive?" How many spoke in terms of the "poor Canadian taxpayer"?

Mr. Nowlan: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. It is a rule of the committee of the house that no member has the right to interrupt another member during his speech.

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: No hon. member has the right to interrupt another hon. member unless the hon. member who has the floor gives permission to the one who interrupted him to ask a question. To the present instance the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour did not give such permission.

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: It was farthest from my mind to interrupt the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour. All I asked the hon. member was—

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Nowlan: The parliamentary secretary comes from a constituency which grows tomatoes, but he happens to be concerned with fish. All I want, Mr. Chairman, is to ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour if he would permit a question.

The Deputy Chairman: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Whelan: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacEwan: The parliamentary secretary is interrupting again.

Mr. Whelan: A question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I would like to inform the house that this member comes from an area which also has the largest fresh-water fish processing plant in the world.

The Deputy Chairman: This is not a question of privilege, and I would ask for the co-operation of the committee at this time.

Mr. Perrault: If the hon. member for Annapolis Valley would send me a letter, I will deal with his problem.

Mr. MacEwan: This is the would-be prime minister of British Columbia.

Mr. Perrault: Some members of the opposition should learn to squirm sitting down.

Mr. Chairman, I am suggesting to the house that we have listened to invalid political arguments advanced by the opposition this afternoon. Why was it valid for the Conservative party in 1967 to advance the view that the Canadian public must have reforms in second class postage rates, when in 1968 the action contemplated by the minister which would give effect to these appeals is being opposed by the official opposition?

Mr. Monteith: That is wrong.

Mr. Perrault: Look at the record. How else can you interpret the quality of the opposition arguments? This is what the hon. member said, last year. He said Canadians are being forced time and time again to dig deeper and deeper into their pockets, and he suggested that the people "cannot take any more weeks like the past one". There is an opportunity tonight for the opposition to achieve the reforms they advocated last year by supporting the measure before the house.

Mr. Monteith: Give us a little service.

Mr. Perrault: —to implement the kind of reforms they were demanding in the house just a few months ago. We are told also by certain opposition spokesmen that the measure will "hurt the little people".

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Perrault: I hear the words "hear, hear". It is almost as though the members of the opposition are attempting to suggest that a deficit approaching $100 million is somehow highly beneficial to the little people.

Mr. Nowlan: What about the C.B.C.?

Mr. Perrault: Inflation and unmanageable deficits are far more injurious to the "little people" of Canada than reforms which would make people who use postal services pay for them. The post office is a service industry. It is not in the category of the Department of National Health and Welfare; it is not in the area of regional development; it is not to be equated with the medical care program. It is a service industry and it is one of the most efficient postal services in the world. The government is simply suggesting it is time to put it on a pay for service basis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Perrault: We are told in the argument advanced by the opposition that this measure will hurt business. I will not repeat the arguments in reply which have been advanced here. I too, am the recipient of the so-called junk mail, and I think it is time that junk mail paid its way.

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member deserves it.

Mr. Perrault: Among other goals, the government is attempting here to advance measures which will fight the fires of inflation. The same hon. members who are so eloquent in defence of deficits in the Post Office are the ones who next Monday morning will be telling the house and the press that it is intolerable that any budget deficit exists. They are the ones who will make these kinds of charges. They will tell their constituents.

Mr. Nowlan: The truth is that they have a deficit.

Mr. Perrault: They will say, "Is it not tragic that we have this large budget deficit?" Yet, when they are called upon to vote for a measure which will help fight inflation and reduce the deficit, they will not support it.

Mr. MacEwan: The hon. member says this measure will fight inflation? What nonsense.

Mr. Perrault: All of us should support endeavours to make the user pay fairly for his postal service. This is one way we can really help the little people.

Mr. MacEwan: Turn over the page.

Mr. Perrault: It has been suggested by some hon. members that there are certain inefficiencies in the postal service. Yet the Glassco commission was highly complimentary about the Canadian postal service. A review of the Post Office Department services by the Glassco commission produced a tribute to the work of the department, as recorded at page 309 of volume 3 of the Glassco report, where it states:

> The Post Office Department has attained a commendable degree of efficiency.

Yet the argument is advanced that "inefficiencies" should be rooted out and that a reorganization should take place before any rate reforms are attempted. It would have been easier for the new Postmaster General and for this government to maintain the status quo, to defend the archaic rate structure and to refuse to act in an area where action has long been required. But I am sure I speak for the majority in this house when I say that the minister is to be commended for acting decisively to make one of the world's greatest postal systems even more efficient.

Mr. Nowlan: Pay more, get less.

Mr. Perrault: A courageous endeavour is being made here to establish sound economic principles with respect to a vital national service. This is not an issue in which politics should be played.

Mr. Nowlan: Why is the hon. member playing them?

Mr. Perrault: One of our fathers of confederation, a member of the Conservative party, said the following:

> However much the Canadian taxpayer may favour a policy of strict economy in the abstract, he likes nothing so little as its application.

And here we have a perfect example. We have had the abstract argument advanced by the official opposition that economies must be made.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; it is a well established rule of this house that when a member quotes something he has to give the source of the quotation. Now, there are many fathers of confederation and many fathers of Conservatism, past and present. I should like to know who the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour has for an author.

Mr. Perrault: If the hon. member would like me to oblige, the quotation is from Volume II, page 141 of the "Memoirs of Macdonald (1894)".

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, that is the old master.

Mr. Perrault: I should like to conclude by summarizing my argument. First of all, the Post Office Department is not like the Department of National Health and Welfare; it is not like the government's area development program; it is not in the category of national medical care. It is a service for which people expect to pay. People who receive good postal service expect to pay for good service.

When second class mail is subsidized to the extent of 78 per cent by the taxpayers of this country and the people of Canada recover only 22 per cent—and many of these people are the "little people" for whom members are concerned—when the Post Office has a deficit approaching $100 million, when reforms must be initiated in first and second class rates to pave the way for needed changes in third class mail rates, then I say the evidence is overwhelming for the need for reform in this area. We have to bring postal rates and service into the twentieth century. If the opposition members want to serve the Canadian people this evening, they are going to support this resolution.

Mr. Rynard: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the Postmaster General on his appointment. After congratulating him, I should like to remind him that he is sitting in the seat that has a very high mortality rate. It carries a death rate of one per year over the last eight years. I do not know if he is fully aware of the great risk he is taking, particularly when he introduces this particular bill. I was very interested in listening to the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour. I was unable to decide whether he was preaching for a call or wanted to convince himself of the correctness of the attitude he was taking.

I should like also to congratulate the minister upon taking another look at the plight of the rural mail carrier. He seems to have listened not only to the members of the opposition but to members on his own side and looked at the unfairness of the decision he originally took. I want to congratulate him because I think a man is bigger when he can take a look at some of these things and then decide what is fair and right. I believe the minister has gone quite far in correcting the situation, but he still has not allowed these rural mail carriers full compensation. Their gas and oil and a few other things may be deducted. I hope he does not put these deductions on a mileage basis and charge the rural mail contractors seven cents a mile for the miles they did not travel.

I have a great deal of respect for people who work inside and outside of post offices. They have a rigid system to which to adhere, and some of them are even spied upon as they work. Those who work outside have to face elements of weather and risk, the cold and the wet, as well as the rush and hurry of people who overload them at certain periods of the year. Having said this, I must say I do not believe there was any necessity for a strike in July. I feel that this parliament must accept some of the responsibility for the strike. Over the years since 1956 the reforms needed in the Post Office Department were pointed out over and over again. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the postal employees were forced into a position of having to strike. This government, and to some extent previous governments, must accept the blame for this situation.

I do not believe it is proper to give employees in an essential service such as the postal service the right to strike. I believe the very nature of their service denies the right to strike. My reason for saying this is best explained by an incident that took place in the city of New York when I was visiting there this summer. A medical doctor, a surgeon, happened to tell me that since we had a postal strike in Canada, that he had sent a pathological report to a patient of his in the city of Montreal, but the report had been turned back at the border because there was no mail delivery. This was a critical case, and I suppose the same thing could happen all along the border from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Cancer cells had been picked up in the specimen they had examined from this patient, so it was very important that the patient receive the report. We thought about what to do, and I said, "Why don't you send him a telegram and ask him to call you?" This is what the doctor did, because these reports are confidential. I am mentioning this case because there were many other such cases perhaps in which reports were not received until the strike was over. This is not a laughing matter, and could be a matter of life and death.

The strike also affected pensioners and those on welfare. These people run close to the line and when they do not receive their cheque hardship is often caused and suffered. Then, too, we must consider the loss of business and the lost orders. There were millions of dollars lost during this strike. Therefore I say that the responsibility for the strike rests squarely on the shoulders of the Postmaster General and the government. He cannot get out of it. If these employees had been treated fairly and honestly, I do not believe there would have been any strike. I think it is up to us, up to parliament, to make sure that these employees receive a fair, honest deal so that there is no reason for a strike. Surely, in this day and age there are ways for employees and employers to get together with a neutral arbitrator to come to a just decision. As a matter of fact, I would blame the government for this strike because they did not correct the faults that were pointed out in the past.

The minister referred to rising costs as a reason for increasing postage rates. I want to ask him if the efficiency of his Post Office, with all the computers and technological advances we have today, should not have been able to keep up with these rising costs? This is no excuse whatever. If business firms operating across Canada do not keep up with rising costs, then they are out of business. No one knows that better than the Postmaster

General because he is a graduate in economics. The minister said that 80 per cent of the postal business is done during five days of the week. If the service is reduced, it will mean that one in five will be hurt, and this is a fairly large segment of our community. One result will be that mail that goes out on Friday will not be delivered until the following Monday, especially in rural areas.

Now, we propose to go backwards in this Post Office Department. We propose to put up costs by $8.5 million in increased postage alone, first class. I think the Postmaster General and also the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour realize quite well that by increasing costs, about which we have been preaching in parliament both before and since the hon. member came here, you cause inflation. The Postmaster General is adding to this inflation. He argues where in the world will we get the money to pay for this hundred million deficit if we do not increase charges to individuals or firms using the postal facilities? Mr. Chairman, this is inflationary.

The cost of money orders has also increased. Apparently they are not competitive any more it is easier and cheaper to write a cheque. It looks as though the Post Office is not efficient enough to make them pay. The Postmaster General is a brilliant man in the field of economics, and I am wondering why he has to take this step backward instead of trying to make this department efficient enough to overcome the problem.

I have been receiving some mail that objects to this step that he is taking, Mr. Chairman. I have also read a lot of press articles that criticize it. The Postmaster General admitted today that he either had a hot press or a cool press, depending on what he read. I should like to read an article that I received in the mail yesterday headed: "More 'Go!', Less 'No', is what Post Office needs". The article goes on:

> The announcement by Postmaster General Kierans of the cutting off of any Saturday mail services, effective February 1, is merely the latest in a series of retrogressive measures by which the Post Office has steadily diminished the standard of its services.

I am sure that the Postmaster General knows much better than I do that years ago penny postage was inaugurated. Before that time sending a letter cost $1 more or less. Generally the person who received it paid the dollar. The sender did not. Poverty in those days dictated that if a letter was in a certain handwriting you did not pay the dollar, but returned it to the Post Office. It then went back to the dead letter office and finally I suppose, to the sender. That was some way to run the Post Office. Then the penny postage was tried and the Postmaster General knows what happened. Mail increased tremendously, until today the British post office system is one of the finest in the world and, as the Postmaster General knows, is paying its way.

This article to which I refer, Mr. Chairman, is interesting because it goes on to say:

> In no other field have Canadians experienced so drastic a reduction in service, accompanied by so marked an increase in cost;—

The Postmaster General has not been here too long, but he is making his mark. But what a mark!

> —in no other field do Canadians pay so much more for so much less.
> It is typical of the defeatist approach of Canada's post office authorities that they should approach this latest problem of financing from the negative side. Faced with any policy decision, Canada's postal chiefs invariably resolve them by simply eliminating or reducing services, instead of improving and modernizing them and developing new sources of revenue. The result has been to give Canadians, in this age of expansion and acceleration, a standard of mail service that is slower, less frequent and less convenient than that enjoyed by previous generations in what we regard as a more leisurely age.
> As a recent round-the-world survey showed, people in rural England enjoy a better standard of service than the best that can be found in supposedly sophisticated Toronto, while residents in many of the world's capitals enjoy a range and speed and frequency of mail service beyond a Canadian's wildest dreams.
> The difference in approach of Canada's Post Office and that of more advanced countries can be seen in the advertisements in British newspapers. The British post office buys ads to encourage the British public to make better use of mail facilities, stressing the cheapness of such service and the speed and convenience of the medium, increasing revenue by increasing volume.

How are the government going to do this in view of the present path that they are following?

> By contrast Canada's Post Office buys ads only to warn Canadians of reductions in service, to sector them about deadlines (No Christmas mail will be delivered if posted after such-and-such a date!) or to warn about some new category of mail which will not be accepted. For all of this, Canadians pay an exorbitant rate which has increased in proportion as the standard of service has declined. Presumably, such a policy can only reflect an official post office view that the ideal aimed at is one of no mail at all, at enormous public expense.
> It is time that all this was changed. It is time that the Post Office was brought into the 20th century.

That is what I had hoped this new Postmaster General would do.

It is time that new procedures were introduced, utilizing new computer-era technology, to both reduce costs and speed up service. It is time the Post Office campaigned aggressively for new standards of revenue, new standards of service. The only way this can be achieved is to introduce, from the world of business, a whole new administrative executive—

We have introduced a man of business, and I am hoping that he will see the light.

—to replace the men who presently head our post office system. Only by removing these fuddie-duddies, with their archaic, pigeon-hole concepts and negative outlook, can our postal services be streamlined to a standard worthy of this great and growing country.

I am sure that the Postmaster General would like to see some more of these editorials because they are very interesting.

In concluding, Mr. Chairman, may I say that cutting off the rural mail carriers' Saturday deliveries increases the cost of doing business, and rightly this must be considered. A rural mail carrier is all set to go, but is now going to be deprived of one day of service. He requires a motor vehicle and needs to keep it operative for six days a week, but now he will only use it on five days.

The Postmaster General referred to the possibility of amalgamating rural routes. I do not know which routes the minister was thinking of, but some that I am familiar with have as many as 300 to 400 patrons. Two such routes would mean delivering at the rate of 60 to 80 patrons an hour for a 10 hour day. I am not saying that this is the general rule, but some routes do have that number of customers, particularly tourist areas in the summer. If the Postmaster General is unaware of this I would be only too pleased to furnish him with the information.

Let us suppose that some routes are amalgamated and service is cut down. Mail will go out from ten to twelve o'clock in the morning and will be sorted by twelve o'clock. By the time the carrier gets around his route he will be ready for his bedtime meal, Mr. Chairman. If the Post Office is unable by new methods of procedure to keep costs down, then I think we will have to take another look at this sacred cow. We give $150 million to the C.B.C. without quibble. We also give money to transport and other departments. We pump millions of dollars into them.

The Postmaster General is trying to balance his accounts before he has had a chance to look into the problems of the department. I would expect a man of his brilliance and background to introduce new methods of cutting costs. After all, Mr. Chairman, our old age pensioners cannot afford colour television or the luxury of flying, but they do like to write letters to friends. Not long ago I saw four old people in a home who had been writing letters for two hours or more. One of their joys was to send mail out to their friends and hear from them.

I am sure the minister has not studied this problem enough, or with sufficient care. I hope that after the resolution stage the minister will look at the matter with great care and apply the solutions to it that he should be capable of formulating.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I join with other hon. members who have taken part in this debate in welcoming the Postmaster General to this house. He may think we have strange ways of expressing the warmth of our welcome; really, we are trying to make him an instant member of the club, by opposing his first measure.

An hon. Member: He will get used to it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As the minister knows, I have already indicated that we feel he is giving us a rather large package, some elements of which we are allowed to vote on but some elements of which we are not. In our view the package adds up to increased charges and decreased service, and therefore we do not like it and, as it stands now, we intend to vote against it.

I believe there is merit in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Hillsborough that this matter be referred to a standing committee of the house. If there are sound social and economic arguments in favour of this measure, which I doubt, I think it might be a good idea to give officials who can expound these arguments a chance to do so before the members of a standing committee. I am convinced that if the minister were to indicate that this would be done, debate on second reading would be quite short. We would not want to spin out that debate if we had the opportunity of having this matter considered in a standing committee of this house.

The arguments for the changes the Postmaster General is proposing—changes on the one hand involving increased charges and, on the other hand, involving decreased service—are based on two companion clichés. We have heard both of them several times tonight. The first is that the post office service must be put on a pay its own way basis. The second is that there is a $100 million deficit which must be taken care of and, of course, the only way to take care of it is by increasing the charges for postal services.

May I take a moment on the first of these two companion clichés, even though colleagues who have preceded me have touched on it, as still others no doubt will. Despite what the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour suggested a while ago, the post office service is not unlike other services provided by government. Many services provided by government at all levels do not, in themselves, pay their own way. That is, they do not directly gather in revenue equal to their cost. But the services are good for the community as a whole, good for society, good for the country, and therefore, in the long run, they are profitable to us even though in the actual bookkeeping they seem to run at a loss.

So far as government is concerned education does not pay its own way; indeed, it is all pay and no income. But surely, education pays tremendously in the life of the country. National defence does not pay its own way, but it is there if we need it. So one could go on talking of many services. I suggest if one tries to imagine a country without a postal service, without communications, he would realize how impoverished our life would then be. In other words, the value of having a postal service is immeasurably greater than the disadvantage from any deficit that may result from the rate structures we have at the present. I think, therefore, that the Postmaster General should not expect us to swallow his legislation just because he and some of his supporters keep talking about the necessity of the postal service to pay its own way.

The second of the two companion clichés was expounded very loudly a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour. He said, "There it is; we have a $100 million deficit. It must be recouped. What other way is there to do that except by raising the postage rates?" He chided the opposition for opposing this way of recouping losses, as though we liked the deficit or wanted the country to go into the red.

There are many other areas of government service where there is a deficit and where revenue has to be raised. But because those other areas are service areas we recognize that there is a case for collecting the deficit not just from the direct users of the service but from the taxpayers as a whole. I have searched my memory to recall what the Postmaster General said about the Carter report. It seems to me that at some point along the way he expressed interest in it and said it was a useful document. In any event, I commend it to him in support of the proposition that there are services that are best paid for, not by direct charges to the specific users of those services, but by a levy imposed according to ability to pay because of the benefit that everyone obtains from that service as a whole.

The Postmaster General and others said that some of us on this side of the house were defending business because we did not want business to pay more for its first class mail. I submit we are not defending business at all. If there is a $100 million deficit, we want that made good through steeper taxation by implementing the Carter report. We think that this is a fairer way to take care of this deficit than by exacting a charge of 1 or 2 cents extra on every first class letter that is written by everybody in this country, be that person a businessman, housewife, old age pensioner, or what have you. This is just plain, ordinary regressive taxation.

I suggest, therefore, after all the vaudeville we heard and watched half an hour ago is over, the plain fact of the matter is that the arguments for the Post Office paying its way and for meeting this deficit by charging an extra one or two cents on first class postage fall to the ground. But I accept the proposition of the hon. member for Hillsborough that this matter be referred to the standing committee so that it can be studied and, so to speak, got at a little more rationally than has been the case today in this committee of the whole.

I wish to raise three more points on which I shall not take undue time. First, we think it is unnecessary and unfair to raise the first class postage rate to six cents. We think this is a hardship—not on business people; many of them can well afford it—it is a hardship or will be a hardship on many people, even though the number of letters they may write in a month or year may be few.

We also think it is inconsistent for the government to talk about putting the service on a pay-its-own-way basis and then to say that a letter which goes across the street or a letter which goes into a rural post office and is shifted to a box only a few feet away, should pay the same rate as a letter sent from Vancouver to St. Johns. If the principle is argued at one point, why is it dropped at another? We think the whole concept of the six cent rate, and the concept of all first class mail paying the same rate, are false, and therefore we shall vote against this resolution.

There is another area in which we suspect we are being sold a bill of goods. I have in mind the fact that the minister has not yet given us precise details as to what will happen to the rates for second and third class mail. We have made the point many times that in our view the so-called junk mail should pay its way. We think the big newspapers, the catalogues from the department stores and so on should pay their way. The minister should not be asking writers of first class letters to pay more so as to make up for deficits brought about by the carriage of these other classes of mail at a loss.

At the same time we think there is an essential unfairness about the attitude taken by the minister inasmuch as he makes no distinction among the various categories of second and third class mail. Consideration should be given, for example, to the position of charitable organizations, groups such as the War Amputees Society, which has no doubt written to other hon. members as it has to me, and similar organizations which send out mail at less than the first class rate. In my opinion it is unfair that they should be grouped with those who send out newspapers, catalogues and junk mail.

There are organizations of various kinds which do have special claims. I think the same might be said about Christmas cards. After all, the sending of Christmas cards is a tradition in our society, and the inclusion of Christmas cards among some of the other categories which are to be charged higher rates represents a failure to distinguish among the various classes of mail.

As the Post Office Act is drawn up, we have an opportunity to vote only on the proposals which affect the first class rate; we do not have the opportunity to vote on the other rates which are covered in the general provisions of the act. The minister told us the other day when he made one of his announcements that he intended to make these declarations from time to time, so that when we got to the legislation we would have the complete picture before us. Yet today, when one of my colleagues was speaking, the hon. gentleman suggested he was talking about matters not relevant to the resolution. This demonstrates that there are some provisions, some rates, over which he has complete control. He can laugh at us here in the House of Commons. There are only two or three things for which he has to come to parliament to get approval—the first class rate, for instance. This is a strong argument in favour of the proposal made by the hon. member for Hillsborough that the whole measure might well go before a standing committee for thorough examination, with the officials of the department present to answer questions and to let us know the theory which forms bases for these decisions.

I wish to comment also on the proposal to reduce the postal service to five days a week. The hon. member for York East tried to suggest that this was only for a trial period, and that if it did not work the six day service could be restored. Well, we have heard that before. The Postmaster General did not say that. He knows that if the Saturday service is dropped it will probably be gone for a long time if not for good. We recognize the desire for a five day week, as far as the employees are concerned. Post Office employees generally do work a five day week, and the hope is that some day they will work a four day week or, if that is not possible, a seven or eight month year. These are the kinds of changes we stand for and the kinds of changes which will come.

I submit, however, that there are many inconveniences which will arise from the fact that letters posted on Friday will not reach their destination until Monday. I would remind the Postmaster General of the several occasions each year on which there is a holiday on the Monday. This will mean that letters posted on Thursday night or Friday will not arrive until Tuesday. We are asking for a lot of trouble by imposing this proposed five day week service.

Here is another example of something which I think is wrong in the Post Office Act. The minister has to come before parliament to get the first class rate increased by 50 per cent in the case of local delivery, or by 25 per cent in the case of out-of-town deliveries. But he does not need to come to us in connection with this even more drastic proposal to reduce delivery service to five days a week. He may be glad of that, in view of the trouble he is having in getting this postage rate increased through parliament. But surely, as the democrat I assume he is, he must find it strange to be in a position where all he has to do about the five day week is to announce it.

Parliament can complain through the spokesmen of the opposition parties, but he is sitting there as boss and can put it into effect. Surely he does not agree with this practice.

I might also point out that the dropping of the delivery service on Saturday will place many people in the position of having to pay extra in order to get important communications through. The minister has told us that a special delivery service will be available on Saturdays and Sundays. Is it not likely that many people will need to have recourse to this more expensive way of having communications delivered? All in all we consider that this reduction of service to a five day basis is a retrograde step and that the minister should not proceed in it.

As I say, I have not tried to join in the show we witnessed a while ago. I think this is a very serious matter. As we see the whole package, it is one of increased charges and reduced services. We do not like that package and we have no option but to vote against the parts of it which are before us, in protest against the whole proposition. I hope the minister will indicate his willingness to accept the suggestion that after second reading, if it cannot be done earlier, the bill be sent to a committee so that it may be fully studied. Meantime, we shall vote against this regressive resolution.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, I do not agree, of course, that it is advisable to increase postal rates, as proposed now by the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans). It should be considered that this service is one of the most popular in the country now, in the sense that all the people have at least the possibility to use it, at a price which is really reasonable.

Taking into account the policy of the government which, in the last few weeks, has tended to cut down, to impose restrictions here and there, it might have been expected that following the reduction in some services, the Post Office Department would even have offered all the people of the country a rate reduction instead of an increase of one cent. But it seems that the government does not intend to do that.

It might be necessary to find another solution besides increasing that rate and I think that it might be in order to look for the real reasons for the department's deficit. It might be explained by the fact that the costs of various other departments are borne by the Post Office Department, as mentioned in that department's annual report for 1968. Would it not be in order to make a more detailed study to find out whether expenditures were excessive, whether there is an anomaly, in short whether the Post Office Department is not used as a milch-cow by other departments because, according to the volume of mail, the number of businesses and homes served and the possibilities of the post office, it seems to me that this deficit is hard to understand. I even feel that it would be one of the rare services which could show some profit.

We are not paying for poor management or, I should say, we are not asking the citizens of the country to pay for poor management. Instead we should find out exactly why there is a deficit. It seems to me that the explanations given in the annual report are not clear enough. We should be told how much is spent for premises, accounting services, issuance of cheques, employer's contributions to the pension fund and the Canada pension plan. It seems to me that we should be told exactly how all that money has been absorbed by the Post Office Department and why, in fact we have a deficit. I say that, Mr. Chairman, because, from the start, we were told that is the explanation for the deficit, since for some years now, the department was rather in a surplus position.

Therefore, we should preserve the quite popular aspect of the Post Office Department, namely that every citizen should have the opportunity to use the postal service at minimum costs. If we establish a precedent through a continuous increase in the cost of this service, it will end up unfortunately like many others as an expensive service. While every citizen now has the opportunity to use a rather low-cost service it seems that it is a bad time, in a period of restraint as we witness now, to increase this rate.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the minister will reconsider this matter and that, in due time, he will be in a position to give up that increase.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I will be brief because I think there is not much to add to what has already been said, except perhaps sum up the matter.

I have had the opportunity to follow the debates of the house for some years, but it does not happen every day that we see so many inconsistencies in discussing a problem.

Here is the whole matter in a nutshell. We have a postal service the operation of which shows a deficit, and we have to decide who is going to make good the deficit. We must decide whether it will be the general public, through increased taxes, or the patrons. On that matter, I heard all sorts of remarks. I even heard the member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), who is usually responsible, say that some persons who would like to write to cousins or nephews were abstaining from doing so because it would cost a little more every week. Is it possible to suppose that these people will spend 50 cents more if they write one letter a week, for instance. There are not many families doing that.

I heard earlier the member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) say that this is a people's service of which our people should not be deprived. It is obvious that it is popular, Mr. Chairman. If the government could give everything free of charge, it would gladly do so, but there is a principle to maintain: Someone must make good deficits. We get nothing for nothing in this world. Who is going to pay? Will it be the public at large, people who do not write letters, or those who send mail described earlier as dead-letter mail, which nobody wants, or the patrons of this service?

It seems to me that the answer is simple. Those who make use of a service must pay for it.

Someone tried to make a comparison between the C.B.C. and the Canadian National. The comparison does not stand. If the government wanted the C.B.C. to be a business concern, it would be a paying proposition, but for the government, the C.B.C. is something else. This service cannot be appraised in terms of the revenues which it can yield. Then, the C.B.C. would welcome any publicity like certain other television stations. In the case of transportation services, the same applies. They were established at a time where it was impossible to make ends meet under the circumstances. Canada was being developed, and by opening means of communication, the government was doing its duty. It is not at all the same problem. The postal service should pay its own way; we have incurred a deficit of several million dollars and we must admire the courage of the minister who has just stated: Those are the facts, those are the figures. There is no quibbling here. The deficit amounts to some million dollars. Someone must pay. Who will it be? Will the people pay through increased taxes? There, I see the opposition objecting. Will the users alone pay the costs? If taxes are increased, the opposition which is already blaming the government for having spent $400 million beyond estimates will be heard. In fact I see, it immediately pointing a finger at the government and saying: Increasing taxes is outrageous.

Mr. Chairman, let us be logical, let us be reasonable, let us be real businessmen, let us be realistic, let us be logical. If it costs so much, we shall obviously have to pay so much; someone must foot the bill. If we increase taxes, who is going to foot the bill? The poor, on whom we are showering our pity. Mr. Chairman, my impression is that without realizing it—but perhaps we even realize it—we are politicking so much that we are falling a prey to demagogy. To me, it is clear that two and two make four. It has been suggested that the matter should be referred to a committee. This reminds me of a certain maxim I am sure my English-speaking friends understand even better than I do: Too many cooks spoil the broth. The more there are people to settle a problem, the less things work out.

Let us then allow the minister to assume his responsibilities and if, one, two or three years, from now he is found to have been wrong, thê voters will always have the privilege of asking him or the government to give an account of themselves. However, for the time being, they are trying to gain time by using incredible arguments.

I heard earlier one of my hon. friends on the other side of the house criticize Mayor Drapeau for having set up his lottery and taken advantage of a certain latitude granted under the Post Office Act. On the contrary, we should congratulate Mayor Drapeau for having shown such initiative, and I think that everybody—setting aside partisan feelings—would wish to have a mayor as dynamic and intelligent as Mayor Drapeau of Montreal, when it comes to municipal problems.

Mr. Chairman, I think—and I repeat once more—that the users should pay for the cost of postal services. I know that none of us like to pay, whether we can afford it or not. In fact, we do not like to pay our taxes, we do not like to pay our rent, we do not like to pay our bills at the end of the month. It hurts of course, but somebody has to pay. Would not the rational way of paying the bill be to divide it between those who use the post-office services? It seems so obvious to me that I am surprised we had to speak for such a long time to settle the matter.

The hon. minister said: We will have to try—note he did not say it was definite—to apply restrictions on the postal service.

We should wait, in all objectivity, to have proof that those restrictions are truly prejudicial to the users. It struck me how the minister stated the case, because he left us an open door when he said: It is an experiment, the matter will remain open. He did not use those terms, perhaps but that is what I understood. It will remain open and if it is proven that this is truly prejudicial to the community, we are ready to accept suggestions and reconsider our decisions. He has already done so in the field of the highway service.

Mr. Chairman, what is the meaning of that? I feel that we are still resorting to demagogy and moreover an easy demagogy. It is always easy to take the floor and say that the people are oppressed and that they have to pay beyond their means, when we all know that we are going through a difficult financial period. That does not apply only in Canada. It is an international concern. It is easy to take advantage of that situation and say that the government is unfair, that it oppresses and persecutes the poor people. Imagine: It is asking one cent more per letter, when the average Canadian does not mail a letter a week. What will that cost in a year?

Advertising agencies, business concerns, make use of the postal service, and they are in business. They can pay for the services which brings them profits; it is not up to those who write only five, ten or at the most 50 letters a year, to pay for the others.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind the situation is so clear that we should not complicate matters with partisan or demagogic considerations. To sum up the situation, postal services cost so much they must pay their own way. The same can probably not be said about all federal government services, true enough. But, with regard to postal services, it is so true that it should be profitable, that I am of those who agree that it should be entrusted to private enterprise which would then have to take the necessary means to make ends meet. I am not saying that the solution is ideal at the present time, but I feel that, in due course, there may be good reason to study that suggestion.

And so, not only should the Postmaster General not be blamed for this bill, but we should, on the contrary, underline the courage he has proved; for, in politics, it is never profitable, at least it does not seem to be, to tell the electors: You have to pay more for the services you are provided with.

However, Mr. Chairman, I think that today the Canadian citizen is rather well informed. He is not undully impressed with demagogic considerations which used to influence him in the past. He has a craving for truth, he wants to be sure that two and two make four, he wants to know whether he is told stories or the truth even if the truth is hard to take.

I think that the Postmaster General has shown courage in introducing this legislation and other related measures which, in the long run, will prove this very simple fact, namely that someone has to pay for everything our citizens receive. Who is going to pay for it? There is no magic in our world and it seems to me that the simplest way to put it is to say that the patrons will pay for it. For this reason I unreservedly support this bill and I think that all fair-minded members should support it too.

[English]

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, it has been said that this institution, the House of Commons, is a full length mirror that unerringly reflects our capacities, mediocrities, motives, maturity and magnanimity. I thought while listening to the minister introducing this resolution to amend the Post Office Act that this saying certainly holds true and can be applied to the minister in this case and to much of the legislation in general with which we have dealt in the house.

The hon. member who has just resumed his seat, the one time independent, and now the Liberal member for Trois-Rivières, said during the course of his remarks that too many cooks spoil the broth. This and the two preceding governments are a good example of this proverb. We have reached the stage where the deficit and inefficiency within the Post Office Department is so great—I am just taking one department as an example—that the saying has come true, and that too many cooks have spoiled the broth. I do not know how many postmasters general we have had during the past six years.

An hon. Member: Seven.

Mr. Alkenbrack: But too many cooks have spoiled the postal broth.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege, because my honourable friend ascribed to me certain statements that I did not make.

He takes a quotation and serves it up according to his whims. To my mind, he has no right to say that when I mentioned the proverb: Too many cooks spoil the broth, I was alluding to the fact that there have been so many Postmasters General in recent years, that this explains why things are in such a bad shape. My honourable friend is drawing a conclusion which is neither reasonable nor honest, and I should like to call him to order.

Even if my honourable friends resent my setting the record straight—

[English]

I will say it in English so I will be better understood. My hon. friend is trying to give a meaning to my remarks that I did not intend.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Mongrain: Do you object to my speaking in English? It is not as perfect English as your perfect French, but I have to say something.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I am sure you will agree that the hon. member for Trois-Rivières has made my point for me. I started to talk about the resolution. This resolution including the newly proposed five day week, thus reducing the postal service available to the people of Canada and at the same time increasing the cost to the people, reflects a lack of capacity of the Trudeau government. It reflects their mediocrity; it shows their immaturity and lack of stature in their efforts to serve the Canadian people.

The Canadian people expected something far more efficient and dynamic than the measures we are getting. I can do no better, in order to make several other points—and I am sure other hon. members will agree with those points—than quote from the Sault Star. I do not often quote from the Sault Star, although the Sault familiar to me is a "suburb" of the place in which I was born, namely Plummer township, Rydal Bank, Algoma district, Ontario.

The Sault Daily Star of Thursday, October 8 states this under the heading "Post office service must improve":

> The national Post Office has been the centre of unfavourable attention from Canadians in recent months. Whether or not this situation continues remains to be seen. Certainly, there are avenues open for the Post Office to redeem itself. That is if it has the foresight and initiative to explore these avenues.
> The events of recent months which brought the Post Office into disfavour started with the postal workers' strike. This strike lasted for three weeks through July and August and depressed and irritated a public deprived of an essential service.
> With the settlement of the strike came the news there would be a hike in postal rates to offset the post office deficit and pay for the postal workers' wage increases. The word was that the postage rate for all first class mail—local and out of town—would be six cents.

Let me remind the minister that this represents an increase of 20 per cent in that service which adds to the cost of living in this country. Let me quote further from this newspaper:

> Then, the other day Postmaster General Eric Kierans announced that starting Feb. 1, 1969 there would be no postal deliveries on Saturday and post offices will be closed on that day. This action said the Postmaster General was necessitated to cut down office costs.

Let me intervene briefly at this point to ask in what way this will cut down office costs? Thousands of people who work in the postal department will receive the same take-home pay after February 1, 1969. I am sure no one in this house wants to lower this take home pay, but I submit that administrative costs will remain about the same. This article goes on to say:

> All of this has done nothing to win friends and supporters of the Post Office among the Canadian public.

The article also states:

> However, while there may be justification for these moves by the Post Office the public has justification too in expecting that accompanying these unpopular measures there will be a diligent and conscientious effort by the Postmaster General's department to streamline the present Post Office operation.

I will not read the entire article, but it goes on to state:

> If there are going to be fewer deliveries and higher postal rates the public has the right to expect there will be increased efficiency in the postal delivery system as a compensatory measure.

The last paragraph states:

> If the Canadian public is going to have to pay more for its post office services, and if it is going to have curtailed services then the public should expect and should demand, that the service which is provided be made far better than the service it presently enjoys.

I disagree with that last word "enjoys" in the article, to the effect that the Canadian public presently enjoys the service it gets. Surely we do not enjoy much of the service we now have. I receive complaints regarding the slowness of some forms of mail delivery, and particularly that service from Toronto and Montreal to Napanee. This is particularly so in respect of parcel post. It is used extensively by professional people such as doctors and dentists, as well as the hospitals. These people are still complaining about the slowness of the delivery of mail. As for the recent strike, any government which would allow a strike to continue at such a tremendous cost to the Canadian people, and then reduces mail service to a five day week does not have any knowledge of the needs of the Canadian people and apparently has no desire to improve this service.

I have before me a letter written by the Postmaster General. I am sure hon. members were pleased to receive this in explanation and in answer to those protests made by many of us on behalf of rural mail contractors. There are two explanations contained in this letter dated October, 1968. The first is:

> To rural route contractors and those performing other small service contracts, doing the work themselves, and paid on the basis of an annual rate, we propose making the regular payment for the period which the service was interrupted, less the normal operating expenses which were not incurred while the service was not performed.

The second explanation refers to larger contracts and it says in part:

> In these cases we propose to pay the contractor his direct out of pocket expenses where the contract is on a per annum basis.

All our rural mail contracts are on a per annum basis. The full cost of payments to all these contractors has been previously budgeted for and the government's attempt to save a little money at the expense of these rural mail contractors seems to be pretty small, in light of the strike which was partly the fault of the government, because of its apathy. I am not placing all the blame on the government but surely this strike resulted partly from the lack of government action.

In my riding we must deal with rural and urban problems. We have no door to door mail delivery. I say to the Minister: Let us forget about this retrograde step to a five day week. I say on behalf of the farmers in the constituency of Frontenac-Lennox and Addington, they must get daily delivery. It is one hundred years since confederation. This is 1968, not 1868. If ever we needed a daily delivery we need it now.

What about the farmers who depend on rural route deliveries for their various agriculture returns and cheques, and their daily newspapers. Many of them depend on this service for these things. We do not have any house to house deliveries in my riding, but I have heard many protests from those who do in the neighbouring cities of Kingston and Belleville. I have heard the people say there that they used to get mail delivery twice a day, but that they are now getting it only once a day. They have stated that after the Trudeau government gets through with them they will only receive mail five days a week.

What about the differences in the services offered by various types of post offices? There will be no equity of service under the minister's new measure. In my riding for example I should like to compare the proposed services to be provided by the Napanee town post office and the service to be provided to the hamlet of Lavant.

The Napanee post office is owned and operated by the federal government, but under the minister's new measures no one will be able to obtain service there on a Saturday. We will not be able to buy a money order, obtain information or pick up a general delivery letter. The wickets will be closed. I hope the local people will be able to walk into the post offices and unlock their own boxes in order to get their mail. I hope the minister is not going to lock the entrance doors of the local post offices. Of course, since he is discontinuing the services of the post office savings banks, people who come to certain centres on Saturday will not be able to use them, either. This does not apply to the settled portions of Canada. I know that probably no one in my town uses post office savings methods any more, but there are people in remote areas of Canada who use the post office savings facilities, and the abolition of these services will be a hardship to them.

Let us get back to the other type of post offices. I wish to refer to the post office in Lavant. It is in a general store. The local residents who come into Lavant to do their shopping on Saturday will also ask for their mail and the storekeeper will certainly give it to them, as he should and can. I ask the minister, is this the just society? There will be no service in Napanee on Saturday, but plenty of service in Lavant. The latter is as it should be. I say again, this is 1968, not 1868.

At the same time as the minister is abolishing the daily mail service, I have just received a request which came in this week from the reeve and council of the townships of Barrie and Miller, in the country of Frontenac, that rural route No. 2 to Cloyne, for example, which is now a route with a three day a week frequency be increased to a daily mail service. I told reeve Tom Neale that I would bring this matter up in the house. This is an important rural route serving many tourists in the summer and the settlers, lumbermen and tourist lodges in the winter. It should have a daily mail service the year round. If the minister put into effect his five day week program, the best we can get for these people will of course be the five day delivery. I ask for his assistance in this matter, and I am sure that it will be forthcoming. We can improve the service there, although if this measure goes through, we will not get daily service.

There is another matter against which I want to protest. It concerns the treatment of the rural mail contractors. They should be given every cent coming to them under their contracts and should not be docked at all for anything resulting from the late lamented postal strike. In the review of their contracts, as mentioned in the resolution, the existing tenders and contracts should run as they are for the remainder of the lives of these contracts. Any changes made will only cost the government more money, and moreover the government has no business interfering with contracts made in good faith and signed with reliable people. The point I wish to make is that even if these contracts are renegotiated for a five day week, in view of the rapid escalation of other costs similar bids will be made for five days a week as those made formerly for six days a week. At the present time I believe these contracts run for four years, and if those made four years ago had to be renegotiated the average bidder would ask for more money.

Much has been said in the house since the debate began regarding ways of saving money in the Post Office Department. I am sure the minister will try to do that. I do not blame him for his efforts along these lines and I want to compliment him in that regard. Our criticism must be constructive. There is much good in trying to find ways of saving money in that department. Let us hear more about this from the minister and from all sides of the house.

With regard to the effect of this legislation on local businessmen, may I point out that many businessmen pick up their mail on Saturday and examine it during the remainder of the week end. They do not necessarily look at the mail on Saturday because they are too busy on that day, especially those who are in the retail business. For that reason the post office should be open six days a week, as are those businesses.

Much has been heard here about the cost of second class mail. Of course costs are involved in handling and sorting second class mail. However most of it is no use anyway; it is more or less a public nuisance. Then, I am sure the newspaper publishers face the future knowing that it will cost them more to have their newspapers delivered. I believe that now they are sent free within a 40 mile radius. I am told that this does not apply to the dailies, or to any publication delivered house to house. Outside the 40 mile radius payment for newspapers is made according to weight. I was in contact with two editors of weeklies in my riding, and they told me this afternoon that the newspapers expect to pay more but also expect value for their money.

The matter of junk mail has been raised several times from all corners of the house. I believe we should reduce a lot of this superfluous junk mail. We get too much of it right here, as members of the house. I am not referring to legitimate mail which is sent to us by our constituents.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to interrupt proceedings and forthwith put the question on the resolution now before the committee. Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: All those in favour please rise.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Motion agreed to: Yeas, 79; nays, 48.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Kierans thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-116, to amend the Post Office Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if it would be agreeable if I were to announce the business the government proposes to submit to the house for its consideration tomorrow? We propose to call item No. 11 on today's order paper, third reading of Bill No. C-109, an act respecting the construction of a railway line in the province of Alberta; then, item No. 5, house in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-111, an act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act; then, item No. 6 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. C-110, an act to amend the Farm Credit Act; then, item No. 8 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. C-113, an act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT—ALLEGED DELAY IN SUBMISSION OF RETURNS BY CORPORATIONS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, the other day when I brought a question before this house concerning the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, it was suggested that I put the question on the order paper, and for this reason I am suggesting the subject be considered tonight. This act was passed in 1962 after a considerable amount of debate. Upon reviewing Hansard, I find a considerable amount of debate again took place on this subject in 1965 when amendments to the act were introduced. My reason for bringing this question before the house is that it is my opinion there is absolutely no use in this house passing legislation if there is no enforcement of that legislation. I suggest that unless there is a good reason for the lack of enforcement of the provisions of any act, then those provisions should be enforced.

The purpose of this act was to have corporations and unions file annual returns. The other day I requested a report under the provisions of this act in so far as corporations and unions were concerned, and I was told that > —the preparation of the data for the corporation report has been delayed but improvements are being made and it is our objective to be more timely in the near future.

The only return that I received from the corporation was for 1963, while I received a return from the unions for every year including 1966.

I should like to ask the minister responsible for answering this question this evening for an explanation of why the returns from the corporations are not available. Unless there is an adequate reason for the lack of such returns in 1963. I should like to know whether the corporations are liable for the penalty outlined in section 6 of the act. If they are not liable, why not?

If the returns outlined in the report are not liable for return by the corporations, I should like to know whether there is any reason for the unions to file a return, as such, each year. If they do not file a return, are they responsible under section 6 of the act?

I noticed in Hansard that in September 1964 the then member for Port Arthur said it was obvious that the government was not enthusiastic about the bill as a whole, and that he assumed the legislation was going to waste away. I only ask that if it is the intention of the government to let this legislation waste away, then why do they not tell us, instead of leaving the act unfulfilled?

I would ask the minister to answer this question at this time, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it is of the utmost importance, particularly for myself, to know whether or not the act means what it says, and should be enforced in its entirety.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad indeed to rise to answer the question of the hon. member for Moose Jaw. Let me say at the outset that it is certainly not the intention of this government to let this legislation waste away. If there has been—as there has—some difficulty in the beginnings in carrying out the spirit of the legislation in full, it is partly due to the fact that the broadest interpretation possible has been put upon it.

I should like to say to the hon. member that the returns have in fact been made on time, but that the difficulty has been in compiling, investigating and reporting upon the data concerned. The differentiation between union and corporation reports is due to the difficulty of dealing with two groups of reports. There are in fact 175 unions which are required to report under the terms of the act, whereas there are 40,000 corporations.

In addition, part of the investigation into corporation returns is in its nature difficult. As I have said, at the moment the corporations are not in default in filing returns and the 1967 returns are on hand. To show the difficulty involved, however, of these 25,000 returns have been fully processed and, I may say, are available for inspection, as are the previous returns, in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which is the proper place at this stage. Some 12,000 further returns are in process of examination and tabulation, and several thousand others are being investigated from the point of view of whether a proper return has been made.

The hon. member may understand that there is some difficulty about the existence or non-existence of corporations, which on the books could apparently be making a return. One of the difficulties involved is that of determining the ultimate ownership of the shares of a corporation. At the moment, Mr. Speaker, some 15,000 corporation returns are being investigated from this point of view. There is also the difficulty not only of pursuing the ownership of the shares and, in some cases, finding it in the hands of the corporation, but of pursuing the ownership of the said shares through the ownership of the corporation.

So, this has been a long process. I am happy to say that the dominion statistician who is responsible in this regard is taking active measures to improve reporting procedures and bring them up to date. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) and other hon. members will be pleased to know that the report for the 1964 corporate returns is now in the printing stage. The report for 1965 should be available about the end of the year and it is hoped that the 1966 report will be available in the spring.

FISHERIES—ESTABLISHMENT BY RUSSIA OF RIGHTS OFF PACIFIC COAST

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in 1964 parliament passed the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act under which authority was given, through the governor in council, for the establishment of what the act calls geographic co-ordinates between which straight base lines would be drawn, and from which would be measured the three mile territorial zone and the additional nine mile fishing zone. When the bill was passing through parliament, as well as when it was in the other place and before various committees, the then secretary of state for external affairs and the then minister of fisheries both promised faithfully that those straight base lines would be drawn by the end of the year, that is, by the end of 1964.

Since then persistent questions have been asked in the house about the progress toward drawing those straight base lines, and the almost standard answer received from government for its failure in its commitment to put straight base lines into effect, the almost universal answer on all occasions, has been that this subject matter, in so far as the Pacific coast is concerned—and I am concerned about the Pacific coast—has been under negotiation with the United States, the only other country involved in the situation.

As time goes on it seems passing strange that Canada should be so concerned about sovereignty, when it is willing to negotiate with a foreign country the matter of determining the location of straight base lines which Canada, under laws passed by this parliament, has the authority to draw.

I have been given to understand that under international law a country can claim to have an historic fishery in a certain area or body of water if that country's vessels have been fishing there for a period of five years.

Pretty regularly since 1964, that is since four years ago, fishing vessels of the Soviet Union, as well as other ships of various sizes, have been sighted off our Pacific coast. Some of them, on occasion, have come into the area which would have been considered our own waters, if the government had moved to establish straight base lines, as it promised. Earlier this year a fishing ship—it was a much larger vessel than ones we are accustomed to seeing—from a foreign country actually tied up at the community of Massett in the Queen Charlotte islands. The men from it went out on the town, spent time at the Legion and had a pretty gay old time. Of course the personnel in what is loosely referred to as the coast guard, the fishery officer and the local R.C.M.P. officer were in a complete flap over the situation. The point is that here we see a complete disregard on the part of some for what we normally consider our own waters.

Unless we move swiftly, and there is not much time left, Japan, and the Soviet union in particular, will be in a position to claim an historic fishing right within the area that the Liberal government in 1964 promised would be enclosed as Canadian waters.

I know the present minister has said on more than one occasion that this matter is under review and that there is a possibility the government will move away from the commitment it made in 1964, namely, to draw the straight base lines on the Pacific coast in such a way as to include the waters of Queen Charlotte sound, Hecate strait and the Dixon entrance. This is the point at issue in the discussions which have taken place with the United States. They do not want us to do that. If the minister backs away from the commitment made to the fishermen and the Canadian people in 1964, and these base lines are drawn further in toward the coast, this would be nothing short of a betrayal of the legitimate interests and rights of the fishing industry on the Pacific coast.

The important thing, though, is to move quickly to preserve what little is left to ourselves, and to prevent nations with large fishing fleets, such as Japan and the Soviet Union, claiming historic fishing rights in these areas.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): First, perhaps I should say emphatically that the government has no intenton of backing away from the straight base line approach to the delineation of our fishing areas as outlined in the legislation in 1964.

In the question which the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) raised yesterday, he asked what action was being taken by the government to ensure that the Soviet Union does not establish historic fishing rights in the waters along our Pacific coast. I should like to make it clear to the hon. member and to the fishing industry in British Columbia that the Canadian government has been endeavouring to ensure that the Soviet Union does not establish historic fishing rights in waters along the west coast which are vital to our fishery. This is being done largely by exclusion. For example there has been no fishing by Russian fishing vessels within our Canadian fishing zones. By Canadian fishing zones I mean zones within 12 miles of the Canadian coastline. The Russians have been observing our 12 mile limit so there can be no question of the U.S.S.R. establishing historic fishing rights.

In recent years there have been several isolated incidents where the presence of Russian fishing vessels has been noticed in Dixon entrance. On each occasion they have left the area after being warned by our fishery patrol vessels that they were in Canadian waters. Those of us who have been watching this situation closely have, of course, been concerned as to the nature as well as the location of these Soviet fishing operations. From all accounts—and this has been verified by our own fisheries protection service—the Soviet fishing operations have been limited to catching groundfish species for which we have yet to develop a large commercial market on the west coast.

There has been no evidence, I repeat, no evidence, that the Soviet vessels are catching species which are of major interest to our fishing industry today, namely, salmon, halibut and herring. In other words, the Russians have not been establishing historic fishing rights off our west coast; they have not been fishing in Canadian fishing zones, nor have they been catching the species in which we are most interested today.

The hon. member expressed concern about our relation with the United States in connection with fishing zones. My understanding is that the fishery on our west coast is more vital and seems to have more strength than does the United States fishery on the west coast. To the extent that we have reciprocal fishing rights with the United States and can fish in their waters as they can in ours, we are gaining relative to them, and to the total fishing operation off the coast.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.21 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 9, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

UNVEILING OF PORTRAIT OF FORMER PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, last evening we had the pleasure of hearing some remarks made on the occasion of the unveiling of the portrait of a former prime minister of Canada. Fortunately a verbatim transcript of these proceedings is in existence, and I will take the liberty of suggesting to the house that this transcript be made an appendix to today's Hansard. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For document referred to above, see appendix A.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate have passed Bill S-5, an act to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act, to which the concurrence of this house is desired.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

MR. FORTIN—ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I should like to set the record straight, and submit an extremely serious problem to the house. In addition, I base my question of privilege on a principle which strikes me as being of prime importance.

As shown on page 459 of the House of Commons Debates, I put on the order paper question No. 123 in which I ask details with regards to the Northern Canada Power Commission, which body is answerable to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). In the first part of that question, I asked whether the Northern Canada Power Commission had, within the last three years, bought or nationalized—I said "bought or nationalized" private hydro-electric concerns, and the minister replied: "None". With regard to the other part, the replay was: "N/A."

However, on page 20 of the annual report of the Northern Canada Power Commission and subsidiaries, for the fiscal year terminated March 31, 1967, we read the following:

> On September 30, 1966, the Northern Canada Power Commission purchased the registered capital of the companies Yukon Telephone Syndicate Limited, Dawson City Water and Power Company Limited and Dawson Electric Light and Power Company Limited. The consolidated balance-sheet which accompanies these observations reveals that the financial situation and the operating statement of the commission and its subsidiaries—

Mr. Speaker, the matter is most serious, since it proves beyond a doubt that the government gave erroneous information to parliament. Without being an expert in parliamentary procedure, I understand that this is completely contrary to the fundamental principles which govern the business of parliament.

When the question period comes, each day, we try to put questions of general interest or urgent questions. We make an effort, on the opposition side, to obtain information which the public asks of us, and with the new procedure which allows the ministers to be absent from the house, the answers we succeed in obtaining are usually very vague. Sometimes one does not get an answer or is told: Put your question on the order paper. That suggestion is followed and inaccurate answers are given.

I therefore ask, Mr. Speaker, that steps be taken immediately by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with regard to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in order that the officials and some of his ministers stop making fun of some opposition members.

Mr. Speaker: Since the hon. member has not followed up his question of privilege with a motion, it is obvious that no debate is possible. I must therefore rule that there is no question of privilege which can be discussed at this time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—PARTICIPATION IN CRIMINAL INTELLIGENCE SYSTEM

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in connection with an answer given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) on October 4, 1968, and which appears on page 795 of Hansard.

The Minister of Justice was then answering a question from the member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who had asked him whether the province of Quebec had been in touch with the Minister of Justice concerning the setting up of a royal commission to examine the spreading of crime across the nation, and I quote:

> The minister has not received any request from the province of Quebec to set up a royal commission.

According to newspapers this morning, the Quebec premier, Hon. Jean-Jacques Bertrand, denied the statement of the Minister of Justice, pointing out, as can be read in today's issue of Montréal-Matin:

> After having recalled that, in a letter dated November 21, 1967, addressed to Mr. Turner, he had personally suggested that the proposed national centre be given the name "Canadian Criminality Information Centre".

Mr. Speaker, my point of order is this: the hon. minister has given out information which led the people to believe that the province of Quebec was not interested in co-operating with the federal government in matters of crime, and that reply is contrary to the documents the minister has on file. I ask the right hon. Prime Minister, in view of the absence of the Minister of Justice, to kindly tell us exactly what the situation is.

[English]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Since this matter is the responsibility of the Solicitor General perhaps I should deal with it now. I have read the answer reported in Hansard at page 795. It is precisely correct. What is being overlooked by the hon. member is that the newspaper article deals with collaboration and co-operation among police forces. There is excellent working co-operation among the police forces at this time, as stated by the Minister of Justice in the passage of Hansard referred to, in which he says:

> I can say from experience that the R.C.M.P. are in constant co-operation with provincial and municipal police forces in this country.

The working co-operation is excellent. It is a fact, however, that at the moment the Quebec provincial police are not members of the Canadian criminal intelligence system.

Mr. Valade: That was not my question of privilege. The Minister of Justice implied in this house that the province of Quebec had not shown interest in collaborating with the federal authorities. A spokesman for the Quebec government has stated, according to this morning's newspapers, that on November 26, 1967 a letter was addressed to the Minister of Justice on this question. That is the point I wanted to clear up.

Mr. McIlraith: I must not let that statement go unchallenged. That is not a fact. The minister from Quebec did reply to a letter from the Solicitor General of November 6, and that reply was dated November 21, 1967. That correspondence is in the Solicitor General's office.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

C.N.R. PENSION FUNDS

Question No. 11—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. What was the total amount of money on the books of the pension funds of the Canadian National Railways as at (a) December 31, 1964 (b) December 31, 1965 (c) December 31, 1966 (d) December 31, 1967?

2. What rate of interest does the C.N.R. pay on this money?

3. What amount of interest was credited to the above noted pension funds during the year ending (a) December 31, 1964 (b) December 31, 1965 (c) December 31, 1966 (d) December 31, 1967?

4. What was the total amount paid out of the above noted funds in pensions during the years ending (a) December 31, 1964 (b) December 31, 1965 (c) December 31, 1966 (d) December 31, 1967?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. The total amounts of the investments, cash and other current assets on the books of the pension trust funds were: As at 31 December 1964, $531,627,361; 31 December 1965, $575,887,009; 31 December 1966, $626,818,658; 31 December 1967, $684,962,758.

2. The C.N.R. does not pay interest on these assets which are held separately in the pension trust funds.

3. Net earnings on the investments of the pension trust funds were: Year ended 31 December 1964, $23,830,471; 31 December 1965, $25,932,593; 31 December 1966, $28,763,156; 31 December 1967, $34,541,149.

4. Total amounts of the pensions paid out of the pension trust funds were: Year ended 31 December 1964, $32,145,649; 31 December 1965, $34,575,142; 31 December 1966, $37,595,615; 31 December 1967, $40,688,714.

*PRESIDENT OF AIR CANADA

Question No. 49—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the President of Air Canada been appointed?

2. At what date did the position become vacant?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1. The board of directors of Air Canada appointed Mr. N. J. MacMillan to be acting president of Air Canada at the meeting of the board held at the end of May this year. In a statement at that time, the board said that Mr. MacMillan's appointment was of a temporary nature.

2. Mr. MacGregor retired as president of Air Canada at the end of May, 1968.

INCOME TAX ON TELEPHONE COMPANIES

Question No. 54—Mr. Fortin:

1. Do the telephone companies in Saskatchewan and Manitoba pay income tax?

2. Do the telephone companies in Quebec and Ontario pay income tax?

3. Does the government intend to bring the telephone companies under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act (Statutes of Canada 1966-67 c. 43)?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. All companies providing telephone service are subject to income tax except a corporation not less than 90 per cent of the shares or capital of which is owned by Her Majesty in right of a province or by a Canadian municipality or a wholly owned corporation subsidiary to such a corporation.

3. No.

AIRPORTS AND MILITARY AERODROMES IN CANADA

Question No. 78—Mr. Fortin:

1. How many airports are operated by the Department of Transport (a) in Quebec (b) in Ontario (c) in British Columbia?

2. Has the Department any intention of establishing in Quebec a corresponding number of airports to those existing in Ontario and British Columbia and, if not, for what reason?

3. How many military airdromes are there (a) in Quebec (b) in Ontario, and, if there is a difference in number, for what reason?

4. How many U.S. military airdromes are there in Canada?

5. Under what agreement are such airdromes established in Canada?

6. What compensation is received by Canada for the establishment of such airdromes?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Transport and National Defence as follows: 1. (a) ten; (b) eighteen, and (c) seventeen.

2. The maintenance of a numerical balance among the several provinces of Canada is not a basis on which airports are established.

3. (a) two, and; (b) six (two of which are unmanned and used as emergency aerodromes only).

In addition, three civil airports in Quebec and two in Ontario, which are near Canadian forces bases, are used by military aircraft. The size and type of forces stationed in Ontario require more military aerodromes for their specific function.

4. One, at Argentia, Newfoundland. In addition, the United States of America has a leased area with airport access rights at Goose Bay, Newfoundland.

5. Argentia was leased for 99 years by agreements made on March 27, 1941, and October 23, 1947. These agreements have been valid for Canada since April 1, 1949. The leased area at Goose bay was made available by Canada for a 20 year period by an exchange of notes on December 5, 1952. (See the Canada Treaty Series, 1952; Numbers 14 and 22).

6. None.

Questions

LOCATION OF COASTGUARD COLLEGE

Question No. 84—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. Is it the intention of the department concerned to change the local of the Canadian Coast Guard College now located in Cape Breton?

2. Has consideration been given or discussion taken place with regard to the removal of said College from its present location and, if so, who were the parties to such discussions?

3. Has the Minister concerned received a letter from the North Sydney Board of Trade suggesting that if such a move take place, consideration be given to locating the College on the north side of Sydney Harbour?

4. Has consideration been given to this suggestion and what reply was provided to the North Sydney Board of Trade?

Hon. James Richardson (Acting Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. The Point Edward location of the Coast Guard College is being developed as an Industrial Estate and this is making the satisfactory operation of the college increasingly difficult. Continued industrial expansion must lead eventually to such encroachment on the college that it will be necessary to move. In view of the great importance of industrial development in the area, this is regarded as inevitable and possible alternative sites are being studied. No decision has been made and no discussions have been held with authorities in possible relocation areas.

3. Yes.

4. The reply was that consideration would be given to the suggestion.

MOTOR VEHICLE WASHING FACILITIES, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 85—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. Has the Department of Agriculture in conjunction with the Department of Transport and/or the Department of Public Works commenced the construction of motor vehicle washing facilities at Port aux Basques, Newfoundland?

2. If so (a) what is the estimated cost of such an installation (b) what is the estimated date of completion of this project (c) on what date will these facilities be in operation?

3. Is it planned to construct motor vehicle washing facilities at Argentia, Newfoundland and, if so, what is the estimated cost of such installation?

4. Has consideration been given to the construction of one such facility at the Port of North Sydney, rather than two in Newfoundland?

5. What is the reason, in detail, for the construction of such facilities only in Newfoundland?

6. Are there any such facilities now in operation in Newfoundland?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture):

1. Yes.

2. (a) $1,021,800; (b) April 1, 1969; (c) May 1, 1969 estimated.

3. No firm plans but consideration is being given to such a requirement.

4. Yes.

5. To prevent the possible introduction on to the mainland of the pest, Golden Nematode, and potato wart disease, which are prevalent in areas of Newfoundland, it is highly desirable that soil which might be contaminated should be removed from vehicles prior to their arrival in Nova Scotia. Space for the construction of a vehicle washing facility is not available in the dock area in North Sydney, and the cost of acquiring land and providing access to a location outside the immediate area of docking was found to be prohibitive. Ferry traffic is occasionally diverted from North Sydney to Mulgrave due to weather conditions, and in these instances a vehicle washing facility at North Sydney would not provide the required protection.

6. No.

POST OFFICE CONSTRUCTION, ST. GERVAIS, QUE.—MINIMUM MILK PRICE

Question No. 95—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. Does the government intend to build a post office at St. Gervais, Bellechasse County and, if so (a) what is the estimated cost of that construction (b) when will the work start?

2. Is the Minister of Agriculture in a position to say that financial measures will be taken to guarantee industrial milk producers a minimum price of $5.50 per hundred pounds of milk for the next fiscal year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departers of Public Works and Agriculture as follows: 1. Yes, (a) a contract has been awarded for $26,200, (b) immediately.

2. No.

REFUSAL OF ASSISTANCE TO N.S. CO-OPERATIVE ABATTOIR

Question No. 103—Mr. Coates:

Why was the recommendation made by the Atlantic Development Board for assistance for the Nova Scotia Co-operative Abattoir refused by Treasury Board and what was the amount of the recommended assistance and what was the purpose of the proposed assistance?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Treasury

Board and the Department of Forestry and Rural Development as follows:

When the request for assistance to the Nova Scotia Co-operative Abattoir was considered the Treasury Board decided that it could not approve assistance at that time pending the outcome of the review of the whole question of assistance to individual firms by the minister responsible for regional development.

The amount of the requested assistance was $770,000, of which $270,000 was for capital expenditure to improve and enlarge the physical capacity of the plant and $550,000 was for working capital to enable the cooperative to gain greater flexibility in arranging its inventories and to reduce its reliance on heavy bank borrowings.

TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION, ROCKCLIFFE AIRPORT

Question No. 106—Mr. Code:

1. Referring to the answer to Question 524 of the last Session (Hansard, page 4171-2), has any decision now been taken regarding the transfer of the Rockcliffe Aerodrome from the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence to the Department of Transport?

2. If so, what is that decision?

3. If the decision is not to transfer the Aerodrome, what are the plans for its future use?

4. What plan does the government have for the establishment of a secondary or satellite airport in the National Capital Region?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Transport and National Defence as follows: 1. Yes.

2. The decision is that the Department of Transport will not take over the operation and maintenance of the Rockcliffe aerodrome.

3. All scheduled service flying has been discontinued at CFB Rockcliffe airport. Future disposition of the land which comprises the aerodrome is under study.

4. There are no firm plans at the present time for a satellite airport in the national capital region as the traffic at Ottawa international airport has not reached the point where such action is necessary. However, the Department of Transport is watching developments in air traffic in the national capital region and will recommend the development of a satellite airport when the need arises.

CANADIAN FORCES PERSONNEL

Question No. 110—Mr. McGrath:

1. What is the total strength of Canadian Forces personnel stationed in each of the four Atlantic Provinces—Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

2. What defence establishments are located in these Provinces?

3. What is the total strength of Canadian Forces personnel for each of the other six provinces, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. As of 30 June, 1968: Newfoundland: 424; Prince Edward Island: 1,353; Nova Scotia: 13,865; New Brunswick: 6,121.

2. It is not departmental policy to make public lists of all defence establishments in each province giving precise locations. However, the following is a list of major bases and stations: Newfoundland: CFS St. John's, CFS Gander; CFS Goose Bay; Prince Edward Island: CFB Summerside; Nova Scotia: CFB Greenwood; CFB Halifax; CFB Shearwater; CFB Cornwallis; CFS Mill Cove; CFS Shelburne; CFS Barrington; CFS Sydney; New Brunswick: CFB Gagetown; CFB Chatham; CFB Moncton; CFS Coverdale.

3. Quebec, 9,734; Ontario, 28,769; Manitoba, 6,729; Saskatchewan, 1,683; Alberta, 6,746; British Columbia, 8,583; Yukon, 171; Northwest Territories, 298.

EXPENDITURES ON URBAN RENEWAL STUDIES

Question No. 115—Mr. Paproski:

What is the total amount of expenditure by the federal government in the last five calendar years on urban renewal studies relating to (a) slum clearance (b) urban transportation (c) housing?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Pursuant to the National Housing Act, the federal government, during the five year period January 1, 1963, to December 31, 1967, approved contributions totalling $2,069,000 to provinces and municipalities for urban renewal studies including special studies relating to social aspects and housing rehabilitation in urban renewal areas. Expenditures during this same period, relating to these approvals amounted to $1,048,000. In addition, since the amendments to the National Housing Act in June, 1964, contributions under section 23A toward the preparation of urban renewal schemes were approved in the amount of $1,840,000. Expenditures relating to these approvals amounted to $832,000.

Questions

Contributions toward urban transportation studies under the National Housing Act were approved in the amount of $30,000 of which $23,000 had been expended as at December 31, 1967.

Urban renewal studies and the preparation of urban renewal schemes include elements of slum clearance, urban transportation and housing. The costs of these elements are not separately identifiable.

POLYMER CORPORATION

Question No. 117—Mr. Fortin:

1. Has the percentage of net profits with respect to sales of the Polymer Corporation Limited been dropping and, if so, what steps does the government, the Board of Directors and the management intend to take to prevent the situation from worsening?

2. Has the Board of Directors already considered, is it considering or will it consider establishing a subsidiary or production division in Quebec?

3. Has the Corporation considered directing its production more toward the manufacture of plastic products?

[Translation]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): Insofar as Polymer Corporation Limited is concerned: 1. Polymer Corporation's net income for 1967 as a percentage of net sales was below the level achieved in previous years and resulted from the continued rise in the cost of doing business and the decline in world prices for most of the Company's products. The management has intensified its efforts to improve productivity and reduce costs with very satisfactory results to date.

2. The capacity of the Company's existing Canadian operations is sufficient for its current needs and the Company, therefore, does not have any current plans to establish a subsidiary or production division in the province of Quebec. However, it is continually seeking attractive opportunities for further expansion and growth in Canada.

3. The Company now produces ABS resins and polystyrene, which represent only a small proportion of its total output, and is interested in strengthening its position in the plastics field.

*AMENDMENT OF FARM IMPROVEMENT LOAN LEGISLATION

Question No. 126—Mr. Alkenbrack:

1. When does the government intend to reconstitute and amend the legislation pertaining to the Farm Improvement Loan Act?

[Mr. Hellyer.]

2. Will the Act be broadened to serve a broader sector of the Agricultural Industry?

3. What will be the new rate of interest on farm improvement loans?

Mr. H. E. Gray (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. Appropriate amending legislation received first reading on October 3, 1968.

2. The measure now before the house would, in addition to making the interest rate prescribable by orders in council, increase the maximum loan amount, broaden the loan purposes to include the purchase of additional land, add credit unions, caisses populaires, trust, loan and life insurance companies as eligible lenders, and make a number of other improvements to this credit facility which serves the farming sector.

3. This rate has not yet been determined. It will be established when the amending legislation has been passed.

ROAD EXPENDITURES, TACHIE INDIAN VILLAGE

Question No. 142—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. Since January 1, 1965, has any money been spent on the Tachie Indian Village for roads, or with respect to roads leading to or from the said Village?

2. If so, what amount of money was spent in each year and how much of this was used to employ native Indian workmen and how much to rent equipment owned by people who were not native Indians?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes, money has been spent on a road leading to the Tachie reserve.

1966-67	30,000.00
1967-68	—
1968-69	12,500.00	(commitment)
Total	72,500.00

This road is being constructed under an agreement between the British Columbia provincial government and this department on a fifty-fifty cost sharing basis. As all of the work is being carried out by the province, there is no information available within the department on the details of expenditures.

INDIANS AND ESKIMOS IN TEACHER TRAINING PROGRAMS

Question No. 153—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How many (a) Eskimos (b) Indians, are enrolled in the Teacher Training Program at Fort Smith announced by the Minister for Indian Affairs last spring?

2. How many (a) Eskimos (b) Indians, are enrolled in the Teachers' Aid Training Program at the University of Manitoba and the University of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. There is no teacher training program being carried out in Fort Smith, N.W.T. However, such a program is in effect in Yellowknife, N.W.T. with the enrolment including one Eskimo and eight Indians.

2. University of Manitoba: (a) Eskimos, none; (b) Indians, eight. University of Saskatchewan: (a) Eskimos, none; (b) Indians, 14.

LOCATION CHANGE OF MANPOWER CENTRE, EDMONTON

Question No. 175—Mr. Paproski:

1. What was the date of the transfer of the offices and quarters of the Manpower Centre to the Centennial Building in Edmonton?

2. What are the terms of the leasing arrangement of the premises in the Centennial Building viz, floor space, terms of years, annual rental, responsibility for repairs and alterations, options for additional space, name of lessor, names of signing officers on behalf of the lessor?

3. What solicitors acted on behalf of the Crown in connection with this transaction?

4. What was the floor space, vacated, and the number of employees using the said premises?

5. What is the number of employees presently using the new premises?

6. For what reasons were the offices of the Manpower Centre removed from a public building built specifically as an employment centre which is housing, as well, the related offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission?

7. What government services are presently occupying the vacated premises and how long did the latter remain unoccupied?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. August 18, 1967.

2. Terms of lease: floor space, 17,580 square feet; five year term from August 18, 1967 to July 31, 1972 at 92,295 per annum ($5.25 per square foot); lessor responsible for all services and supply of original partitioning, 100 feet partitioning per 1,000 feet floor area leased; five year option to renew at same terms and conditions; option for additional 1800 square feet space with rent to be negotiated when option to renew is exercised, all subject to tax escalator clause 100 per cent over base year 1968 proportion of occupied premises; owners, Centennial Investment Ltd. and Edper (Alta.) Ltd.; signor for Centennial Investments, Gerald Seniw; signor for Edper (Alta.) Ltd., Peter Caffera.

3. No solicitor.

4. Floor space vacated, 8,758 square feet; 128 employees using premises.

5. Employees using new premises, 130.

6. Insufficient space available for both Unemployment Insurance Commission and manpower in the Unemployment Insurance Commission building.

7. Departments presently occupying the vacated premises: Department of Labour, Department of Defence Production, Canadian government repair services. Space was unoccupied for approximately four months during alterations to provide improved accommodation for U.I.C. and renovations for Departments of Labour and Defence Production and Canadian government repair services.

VETERANS AND WIDOW'S, LOTBINIÈRE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 189—Mr. Fortin:

1. How many world war I and world war II Canadian veterans, between the ages of 65 and 70, are there in the federal constituency of Lotbinière?

2. How many veterans' widows, between the ages of 65 and 70 are there in the federal constituency of Lotbinière?

3. Is the government considering the payment of old age assistance to veterans and their widows without a means test?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Veterans Affairs and National Health and Welfare as follows: 1 and 2. Statistics of the number of veterans and veterans' widows are not maintained by federal constituencies.

3. No. The government is not considering the amendment of the Old Age Assistance Act to permit the payment of old age assistance to veterans and their widows without a means test. However, the eligible age for the old age security pension, which is paid without a means test, is being reduced, and effective January 1, 1970, the pension will be payable at age 65, thereby eliminating the need presently filled by old age assistance.

CHARTERED BANK SHARES

Question No. 195—Mr. Latulippe:

What was the number of shares of chartered banks and their value at par on October 31, 1934, 1944, 1954, 1964, 1967?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance):

ECONOMIC RESEARCH PROJECT, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Question No. 203—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. How many Members of the Public Service of Canada are employed in the research project being carried out in Prince Edward Island by the Economic Improvement Corporation?

2. From what Department of the Government of Canada have such people been drawn?

3. To what department will the report of the E.I.C. be submitted?

4. Is any undertaking been given to the Province of Prince Edward Island regarding the implementation of an economic plan for that Province?

5. What amounts of federal expenditure are in contemplation under such a program?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): 1. None.

2. Not applicable.

3. To the Department of Forestry and Rural Development and to the advisory board established under the Fund for Rural Economic Development Act.

4. The objective is to implement a development plan, but undertakings depend on agreement between the governments on the nature and cost of programs.

5. Expenditures will depend on the agreement referred to.

*RENOVATION OF TERMINAL BUILDING, CALGARY AIRPORT

Question No. 204—Mr. Woolliams:

1. Will the building of a new air depot for Calgary's International Airport proceed in 1968?

2. If the said new structure is not planned for 1968, what renovations will be made to the old depot?

3. What will be the cost of the building of the said new depot?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1, 2 and 3. Renovations to the existing terminal building will provide a finger with departure rooms along the aircraft apron which could allow the addition of nose loading bridges. A new arrivals concourse including an inspection area will also be developed. In addition modifications to the existing aircraft apron, access roads, and car parking areas are planned. The department's planning for the proposed new terminal complex has not been finalized and, as a result, the cost of the new terminal building has not been established at this time.

*DISPOSAL OF BUILDINGS, CALGARY REPAIR DEPOT

Question No. 269—Mr. Woolliams:

1. Who purchased the 23 buildings at No. 11 Repair Depot in Calgary?

2. How much was paid to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for the buildings in question?

3. Were tenders called for in reference to the sale, and were the said buildings sold to the party tendering the highest price?

4. Were the tenders confidential and conducted by an independent body?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): 1. The 23 buildings were sold to the Adby Demolition Company Limited, 7204-118 Avenue, Edmonton, Alberta, for demolition and removal.

2. $6,371.

3. Yes.

4. The corporation, under its normal procedures, called for sealed bids by a specific closing date.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM COMMISSION

Question No. 272—Mr. Coates:

1. What has been the cost to date of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, how long has this Royal Commission been in operation, how much longer will it operate and what is the final estimated cost of this Royal Commission?

2. What are the names of the Commissioners now associated with this Royal Commission and how much has each received in salary and expenses to date?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I am informed by the royal commission as follows: 1. Total expenditures by the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism up to September 30, 1968, were $7,408,802.48. The commission has been in operation since July 19, 1963. At this stage it is not possible to estimate the length of operation or the final cost.

2. The total salary and expenses to date received by the commissioners now associated with this royal commission are as follows:

Name	Honoraria to date $	Expenses to date $
A. D. Dunton	60,550.00	4,256.08
C. Cormier	37,050.00	13,830.69
R. Frith	69,300.00	18,333.84
J.-L. Gagnon	91,750.00	17,891.65
P. Lacoste	24,300.00	2,442.80
G. Laing	48,800.00	30,036.29
J. Rudnyckyj	44,550.00	19,461.65
F. Scott	41,550.00	8,812.89
P. Wyczynski	44,950.00	3,967.66

*MAIL SERVICE, GEORGIAN BAY AREA

Question No. 280—Mr. Rynard:

1. How many contracts are in effect, at the present time, covering mail service in the Georgian Bay area from Midland to Parry Sound?

2. Is this service (a) daily (b) semi-weekly, or (c) weekly?

3. What is the total cost of this mail service?

4. What is the increase in servicing for the summer months?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): 1. There are two services in the Georgian bay area, between Midland and Parry Sound, as follows: (a) Midland and Wah Wah Taysee; (b) Parry Sound and Sans Souci. Both services are seasonal operations only and are being performed under temporary arrangements.

2. The service between Midland and Wah Wah Taysee is performed daily, except Sunday, from July 1 to Labour day. The service between Parry Sound and Sans Souci is tri-weekly in May, daily except Sunday from June 1 to September 14, and tri-weekly from September 15 to November 15.

3. The service between Midland and Wah Wah Taysee is performed at the rate of $35 per trip or approximately $2,000 per season. The service between Parry Sound and Sans Souci is performed at the rate of $945 per season.

4. The frequency of the service between Parry Sound and Sans Souci is increased from tri-weekly to daily except Sunday during the period June 1 to September 14.

I should have been glad to provide this information to the hon. member without taking up the time of the house.

*HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANTS

Question No. 297—Mr. Pringle:

1. Will the announcement of the termination of the Hospital Construction Grant Act on March 31, 1970 impose a hardship on Hospital Regional Districts who have approved projects, or intend to have approved projects underway, but uncompleted, at the termination date?

2. Will the amount of $13,304,165 shown under the heading 'Revote' on page 22 of P.C. 1968-12/529 remain at credit as allocated to provinces for use of Regional Hospital Boards, or will availability terminate with the Act on March 31, 1970?

[Translation]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. There will be no repercussions on projects approved as of March 31, 1970 under the federal grants for hospital construction.

2. It is unlikely that the government will give some assistance under the federal hospital construction grants to projects submitted after March 31, 1970.

UHF TELECOMMUNICATIONS SYSTEM, MONTREAL—LES ESCOUMINS

Question No. 303—Mr. Dumont:

What was the installation cost of the UHF telecommunications system along the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Lescoumins?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The UHF telecommunications system between Montreal and Les Escoumins that is a part of the marine traffic control facilities of the Department of Transport is provided under a rental contract for approximately $130,000 per annum.

Questions

*MOOSE JAW—DECLARATION AS DESIGNATED AREA

Question No. 311—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Will the government, in view of the detrimental effects on the City of Moose Jaw by the removal of some large industries, give favourable consideration to declaring that City a designated area?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): On September 25 the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development announced that he was reviewing the whole area development program with a view to new legislation early next year. This review will take into account the situation in areas such as Moose Jaw that cannot be designated under the existing program. Meanwhile officers of the department are assisting provincial and municipal officials in the attempt to attract new industrial activity to Moose Jaw.

REPAIRS TO HMCS "QU'APPELLE"

Question No. 346—Mr. Anderson:

1. Have repairs to HMCS Qu'Appelle, demaged when run aground on Wiers Beach near Victoria earlier this year, been completed?

2. If so, what was the total cost of such repairs?

3. If not, what is the estimated cost of repairs?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

2. $12,446.00.

3. Not applicable.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING JOINT COMMITTEE AND RESEARCH UNIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat to the right hon. Prime Minister the easy question I asked him yesterday, as to whether his government intends to act on the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada, twice repeated in its reports, relating to the establishment of a joint Senate and House of Commons committee on economic affairs, to which the council's reports should be referred, and also relating to the establishment of an independent economic unit for study, as recommended by the Economic Council of Canada.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this has been under advisement since yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a further easy question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to support the establishment of a committee on poverty in the Senate as recommended by the Economic Council of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think I can comment on what happens in the other place, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS BETWEEN PRIVATE AND PUBLIC SECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Transport in charge of housing is here, may I put to him a question?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Having given the minister the opportunity for this reception, I hope I will get a good answer. I want to ask the minister a question which I asked yesterday as to whether he can assure the house and the country that the $170 million which he announced will now be made available to private builders for housing in no way cuts into the amount of money set aside for public housing.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I can give my hon. friend the assurance that we will in no way reduce the expenditures for public housing during the current year. The reassessment of the applications for public housing, in various stages of processing, including low rental subsidized housing, housing for elderly persons, housing for students, etc., gave us an indication of what the total would be for the fiscal year and enabled us to make a decision which would allow us to use during the current fiscal year all the funds available for housing and maximize the construction which would take place during the current fiscal year.

I can therefore say to my hon. friend that in so far as the expenditures that were announced last week are concerned, this will mean a net addition to the housing starts for the current year and a very real aid in providing additional accommodation for Canadians who need it, without at the same time making it necessary to cut back on any of the other programs which are intended.

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do I understand the minister to say—whether or not one agrees with his suggestion that housing will be available to those who need it—that in effect the amount of money which had originally been allocated to public housing will not be spent this year, but that some of it has been added to the amount which is to be spent in private building?

Mr. Hellyer: The majority of the money for this program had originally been allocated for family accommodation. This was supplemented by an increment of about $50 million which was estimated to be a shortfall in other programs due to the fact that a reassessment of the various stages of planning indicated that money would not be spent on them during this year.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry to press this, Mr. Speaker, but I have a further supplementary question. The minister said there was a shortfall in other programs. I am asking him whether that shortfall, as he calls it, was in the public housing sector.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, it is only a question of estimating the expenditures. At the beginning of the year Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had to estimate the projects which would come in from the provinces and other agencies in all these categories. Their estimates and their anticipation were in some cases greater than the facts proved, and it was because of this that we felt we should take a decision now to use all the funds that were available, notwithstanding the fact that it meant a reallocation. I think my hon. friend should rejoice that the government has taken such a decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The two hon. members seem to be entering into a debate on this subject.

AIRPORTS

MONTREAL—EXCLUSIVE FRANCHISE FOR TAXI SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport.

The honourable minister says that at the Montreal international airport, at Dorval, the Murray Hill Co. takes care exclusively of the transportation of paying passengers. In view of the fact that many petitions have been submitted to the department by the Montreal Taxi Owners Association, requesting permission to carry passengers from the international airport to Montreal or outside the city, I should like to ask the minister if he can tell us today whether his department has reached a decision so as to recognize the undeniable rights of the people involved in taxi transportation in Montreal?

Mr. Speaker: This question goes quite far back I think, in the history of the previous session of parliament, so that it could be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Caouette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since it goes back rather far, I wonder if you would not allow the minister to answer. Indeed, it is becoming urgent after such a long time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ORGANIZED AND SYNDICATED CRIME IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether it is the intention of the federal government to set up a royal commission or a quasi-judicial body to conduct a full probe into crime in accordance with Prime Minister Bertrand's suggestion. He has alleged that crime is on the increase and that there has been a continual increase in gang murders.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is using as the basis for his allegation as to Mr. Bertrand's position. If he will explain exactly what he means by that I will be glad to answer his question. However, if his question is merely whether it is our intention at this time to set up a royal commission, I should like to take it as notice and give a specific answer tomorrow or Monday.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister taking the question as notice. Prime Minister Bertrand has alleged that he wrote a letter on November 27—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly ask a direct question.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister indicate whether the government received a letter from Prime Minister Bertrand in reference to the central intelligence mechanism set up by the federal government, and whether Quebec is actively taking a part in this regard as are other provinces in Canada?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bertrand wrote a letter on November 21, 1967 in reply to a letter from the then Solicitor General dated November 6, 1967. This subject was referred to and dealt with in that reply.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister answer the last part of the question? Is Quebec actively taking part in this central intelligence mechanism set up by the federal government, as are the other provinces?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, Quebec is not a member at the moment, but there is very good co-operation between the federal and Quebec police authorities. There is a very good and continuous working relationship at the present time between the R.C.M.P. and the Quebec provincial police.

AGRICULTURE

CORN—DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. RESPECTING DUMPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Agriculture is back with us I should like to ask him to answer the question I put to the acting minister last Monday. It had reference to his visit with the United States secretary of agriculture in Washington concerning the dumping of United States corn in Canada.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the question the hon. member for Oxford posed on October 7 and repeated today, discussions on this problem have already commenced between the officials of the government of Canada and those of the United States government in Washington. Indeed another meeting is to be held and further discussions will take place tomorrow morning. I have been attempting to get in touch with Secretary Freeman to talk with him about this matter. Perhaps I should advise hon. members that there was a death in his family early this week, which has made this situation a little more difficult.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the minister indicate whether he has agreed to the request of the farmers that their representative accompany him on any visit he may make to Washington?

Mr. Olson: I think there is a wrong assumption being made that I am going to Washington. I said we would approach the United States government. We have done that, and discussions are taking place at this time. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would not want me to frustrate in any way the success of those discussions by making statements here while they are taking place.

Mr. Horner: You told the farmers their representative would be going.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since he is now considering the problem of U.S. corn imports, can he also consider tomato imports, more especially in the eastern townships where the crop has to be left on the fields due to such imports.

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, my department has not been informed that the problem in respect of tomatoes is as severe as the hon. gentleman has indicated, but I can advise him that the Department of Agriculture is vitally concerned with all commodities.

TRADE

WHEAT—REPORTED FRENCH OFFER TO SELL AT BELOW AGREED PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the government has received any information that France is offering to sell wheat to Japan at lower prices than those provided by the international grains agreement.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I read the same report in the newspaper this morning, and I have asked officials of my department to provide me with information on this subject. If France does this it would be contrary to the agreed position taken by exporters at Canberra, and we would certainly protest as strongly as we could about these matters.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question posed by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. In view of this problem in respect of the dumping of grain at prices below those accepted in the international wheat agreement, will the minister indicate when a discussion can take place in this house regarding the Kennedy round agreements in order that we may debate this matter, which is costing the agricultural economy millions of dollars?

Mr. Pepin: Legislation on this subject is to be brought forward.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question supplementary to the question put by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. Is it not a fact that France has just recently made a sale to Japan, and is there any question as to whether or not they have violated the international agreement? What is Canada doing about it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is certainly not in order. The hon. member cannot ask the minister to verify or deny an alleged fact.

Mr. Horner: Perhaps I could word my question in a different way. What is the minister and his department doing about the recent sale by France to Japan, which many countries believe to be in violation of the international grains agreement?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the question begs the answer, in the sense that the hon. member admits this is the opinion of other people. It may not be the truth of the matter. As the hon. member well knows, there has been a sort of mutual accusation society around the world in recent days regarding this matter. Every country is anxious to say that it has not violated the international grains arrangement, but I will look more deeply into this subject. My impression is that there has been no such sale, but I will find out.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I ask the minister whether representatives of the wheat board have recently been in Japan in order to retain that traditional market which we have had in the past.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I am often questioned on these matters and am always tempted to say that the House of Commons is not a market place. Obviously if the wheat board wants to sell wheat, one of the first conditions they must observe is to be rather quiet in announcing where they are going to sell wheat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

EXPO '67

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN MONTREAL SHARE OF DEFICIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): While I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, and before I am asked to do so, I should like to answer two questions put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), who first inquired of the right hon. Prime Minister whether I had received a request from the city of Montreal to reduce its share of the Expo '67 deficit.

I have not received any such request myself.

The hon. member then asked what happens in such a case. The other day, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the province of Quebec was asked the same question, he answered that an agreement is an agreement, and a contract is a contract. I found that answer extremely interesting and intelligent, and I intend to support it wholeheartedly.

GRAIN

REPORTED INVESTIGATION OF SALES ABOVE QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville asked yesterday whether I had received a number of reports from Alberta and other western provinces of farmers who have allegedly sold grain over their quotas.

The administration of the quota system is the responsibility of the Canadian Wheat Board. Each year a number of quota violations are brought to the attention of the board and the board decides what action is necessary, including prosecutions of producers and agents involved, as circumstances warrant.

The Canadian Wheat Board has received reports during the current crop year of over-deliveries, and in these instances the board has requested the R.C.M.P. to investigate these violations. After completion of the investigations the board will decide whether prosecutions are warranted.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to the answer he gave me earlier. In view of the cash shortage of farmers faced with growing debts because of the failure to sell wheat, would the minister not consider suspending the penalties provided under the act?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, to what cash advance payment is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Mazankowski: This is with respect to over-deliveries.

Mr. Pepin: We have new legislation to increase the amounts provided.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, my question refers to prosecutions with respect to the over-delivery of quotas.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if somebody is in some way violating the quota system, he must be prevented from so doing, because other producers in the west will be damaged by his action.

PROVISION OF DRYING AND STORAGE FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture a brief but urgent question of which I have given him notice. Can the minister inform the house what action the government is taking to provide drying and storage facilities for tough, damp or damaged grain resulting from irregular harvest conditions on the prairies?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question, although I did not get it until after I reached the chamber. The board of grain commissioners have facilities at five of the inland terminals, Lethbridge, Calgary, Edmonton, Saskatoon and Moose Jaw, where there is a capacity of something like 7,000 bushels per hour for drying this grain. There have been discussions to move sufficient grain out of these elevators so there is enough space aroung the drying facilities that maximum use can be made of them. In addition, the drying capacity at the lakehead is somewhere between 400,000 and 500,000 bushels a day, depending upon how much moisture needs to be withdrawn from the grain. The Minister of Trade and Commerce may wish to comment further on this matter, but I understand the wheat board has now given priority to the movement of some lower grades, which would include the grades of which the hon. member speaks.

TRADE

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR LIMITATION OF IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Early this week, representatives of the textile industry and the labour unions of that industry recommended strongly to the government limitations the importation of textile products from low income countries. Has the government made a decision as to this recommendation?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at that meeting, the other day, which was very useful for all parties concerned, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) talked on behalf of the government and explained that the whole matter of imports was under study at the present time, that we were negotiating with other parties, and that we had even suggested to the industry some terms of reference for an investigation which might, if the industry is agreeable, get to the bottom of some allegations.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. When additional information has been collected on that matter, does the government intend to make a statement in the house?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if a new policy is to be announced, this will be done by one of the ministers.

The question of importations from less developed countries has been of concern to us for a long time, because both the Canadian producer and the Canadian worker are to be protected, while at the same time developing countries should not find closed markets everywhere, in more prosperous countries, like our own. Those two factors have to be assessed and interests in both cases protected.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Because of public concern as demonstrated by the 10-day vigil of Claire Culhane on parliament hill, and in view of his firm statement about non-intervention in Biafra, will the Prime Minister make an equally firm statement about non-intervention in Viet Nam?

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): My question is directed to the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. Can the Solicitor General assure this house he is quite capable of carrying out the responsibilities of his department, despite newspaper reports—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question asked by the hon. member is out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Mr. L. W. C. S. Barnes, an employee with the Department of National Defence, was given a temporary leave of absence and in view of the publication of an article against bilingualism, would the right hon. Prime Minister tell us since when a civil servant may take the liberty of criticizing government policy regarding bilingualism?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—CANADIAN OBSERVER AT MEETING OF NUCLEAR POWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of National Defence but, in his absence, I shall put it to the Prime Minister.

A meeting of the NATO nuclear plan group is taking place tomorrow and Friday in Bonn, Germany. Could the Prime Minister tell us whether he intends to send a Canadian observer to that meeting?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, could the member repeat his question and especially the name of the place? I did not hear it.

Mr. Laprise: The NATO nuclear plan group is meeting in Bonn, Germany, tomorrow and Friday. Is it the intention of the Canadian government to send an observer?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take the question as notice. I am not sure to what meeting my hon. friend is referring.

IMMIGRATION

RETRAINING REQUIREMENT FOR CZECHOSLOVAK DENTISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister investigating the plight of the five refugee Czechoslovak dentists who were qualified and experienced in their own country and have now been prevented from practising in Ontario for 18 months because they have to undertake a retraining program?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have been made aware of the circumstances surrounding these particular dentists and have discussed the matter with my predecessor. It is obviously a question of standards within individual provinces, and that is a matter for the province and the association, although my predecessor has from time to time suggested that these standards might be reconsidered in the light of refugee situations.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Were these men advised of this situation before they were encouraged to emigrate to Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would have to examine the specific conversations to answer that question, but generally the immigration officers attempt to explain to all immigrants the conditions that will prevail in their new country.

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO CONTROL INCREASED NARCOTICS TRAFFIC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On October 1 I asked the minister whether he would consider making a statement on motions on the use or misuse of marijuana and related drugs. At that time the minister said he would give this matter very serious consideration. I wonder whether he has given it consideration and can make such a statement forthwith.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, but I will be prepared to make such a statement early next week.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING EARLY RETIREMENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys asked whether negotiations will take place between Devco and the unions concerned before any early retirement program, as recommended in the Donald report, is implemented. There have been constant discussions for some months between the Devco management and the union involving all aspects of the early retirement program.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister stated the day before yesterday that this report must be considered from the viewpoint of both governments, can he assure the house that no enforced early retirement program will be imposed upon these railway workers and coal miners until there has been full discussion and a mutual decision has been reached between the unions and Devco?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think, Mr. Speaker, we are now in the first stages of negotiation. We will have to wait until negotiations have been completed.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I should like to ask the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development a supplementary question, but before doing so may I welcome him back to the house. When will the minister be in a position to table the Devco report?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the legislation which compels us to table the Devco report in the house. This is a report which should be brought forward in the cabinet. At the next opportunity I shall discuss this with the members of the cabinet and we shall see then what is to be done with the said report.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): May I ask a further supplementary question. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to clear up the impression the minister has that the government is being forced to table this report. This is not the case at all. Since portions of this report are being leaked by the minister's department bit by bit, perhaps he should table the report now. He has just leaked a bit of the report now.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY RESPECTING ADMINISTRATION OF P.F.R.A.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Crowfoot. The hon. member asked whether the administration of P.F.R.A. comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development or whether the government is dropping the whole project. The answer is yes to the first question, and very definitely no to the second.

SHIPBUILDING

INQUIRY AS TO RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): On Friday last, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Shore asked whether it was the intention of the government to submit a report to the house on the conclusions of the recent federal-provincial conference on fishing vessel construction materials. I should explain that this conference, which wound up last week in Montreal, was sponsored by the federal and provincial governments in the Atlantic region. The conference was essentially technical in nature and did not prepare recommendations on policy. The complete report of the conference will be published soon. It will be available to all hon. members on request.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FREIGHT RATES

MARITIME PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN PROPOSED INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker, before he disappears again. In view of the decision yesterday of the Canadian Transport Commission permitting further rate increases on maritime products, will the minister say what is the position of the Atlantic provinces transportation task force and when the transport committee of the house will be able to reconvene to hear from maritime representatives?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that I will very soon have a report from the Canadian Transport Commission in reference to part of the study, particularly that part concerned with less than carload lots. In so far as the convening of the parliamentary committee is concerned, as I indicated to the house before there is certainly no objection on the part of the government to the reconvening of the transport committee which was involved in this question at an earlier date. We would lend every assistance to that committee in pursuing the studies which were interrupted last spring.

Mr. Bell: I should like to thank the minister for that information. Since it appears it will be some time before corrective measures will be introduced, perhaps justifiably, may I ask the minister if he will give every assurance—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the hon. member's attention the fact that there are just a few minutes left in the question period. He should really ask his question as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister give every assurance that the freeze which will run out in September will be continued by legislation if necessary?

Mr. Hellyer: Well, I note the hon. gentleman's representations, Mr. Speaker, which I can assure him will be given careful consideration by the government.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

PROPOSED CLOSING OF STATIONS IN SOUTHWESTERN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): My question is for the Minister of Transport. I would ask the minister to inquire into and report to this house on the decision to close all Canadian Pacific stations in the Moose Jaw division serving southwestern Saskatchewan, and to ascertain whether this action can be postponed until such time as the farm and business associations in the areas affected can make representations to the appropriate bodies.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making representations to the minister, and at this point I have to call orders of the day.

Mr. McIntosh: May I rephrase my question. In view of the words I have just uttered, will the minister see that this action is stopped until representations can be made to that body?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have waited until the question period expired, but I feel that at this time I should bring to Your Honour's attention something which you must have noticed. When a minister of the crown who is pursuing his occupation somewhere other than in this house comes back and answers several questions, as did the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce today, confusion is created when a number of members would like to follow up with supplementary questions. They find difficulty in being recognized in order to pursue this line of questioning in a normal, orderly way. If the government intends to proceed with this improper and silly method of answering questions, I should think they would at least work out a system which would permit supplementary questions following the several questions which may have been answered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might say that I have noticed the difficulty created when more than one question is answered by a minister. We easily get into trouble later on in ascertaining which supplementary question is being asked. Perhaps the representations now made by the hon. member will be noted by the ministers.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On this point of order, Mr. Speaker, I suggest the task might be made easier as soon as the opposition has learned to ask questions of the appropriate departments.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I understood when the program was announced that it was quite proper to ask questions, and if the minister concerned could not deal with them a parliamentary secretary would take the question as notice. Am I to understand that the program is being further refined by the Prime Minister, and that he is now suggesting questions relating to a particular department might be asked properly only on the day when the minister of that department is present?

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister is nodding his head in approval of what the Leader of the Opposition just said. I should like to make it abundantly clear that the minister answering on agricultural problems is in attendance only three days a week, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. Surely that important industry demands more than three days a week from this government.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on the point of order and on the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister.

He said that he would ask the opposition to make an effort so as to direct questions to the ministers concerned. I would like him to ask his ministers to make an effort so as to give correct answers to the questions they are asked. Otherwise, he thinks we are fools, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I had risen earlier in connection with the same point of order. On Monday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was here very briefly and left before we had the opportunity to ask him a question. He was not here yesterday and has not been here today. I should like to know when the minister will be here so that he can be questioned.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps by unanimous consent the minister could be allowed to answer the question now.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Perhaps in response to the inquiry by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka I should point out that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is attending the meeting of the council of resource ministers. We hear a great deal from members on the other side about federal-provincial co-operation, and I think it is important that my colleague should be attending this meeting.

Mr. Ricard: Does that mean you don't believe in co-operation?

Mr. Bell: May I ask the house leader what happened to his expressed intention the other day to bring about a longer question period on Wednesday, when all the ministers are here?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I indicated at the time that if hon. members wished I would make that offer to them; but they did not take it up. If they are prepared to reduce the question period on Monday to 40 minutes, the government would be quite prepared to agree to a one hour question period on Wednesday. Perhaps if there is general agreement to that proposition we might make the order right now for inclusion in the provisional rules.

Mr. Bell: As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, this is absolutely necessary. For example, the Minister of Transport, who has a very important folio, has been away twice this week on days when he should have been here, and we shall not have the opportunity to see him again for another 10 days.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I respectfully suggest that the house leaders get together on this point and try to agree which question periods should be either extended or limited.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) has just said that ministers are often busy outside the house. I think that all the members of the opposition as well as those on the government side of the house realize this.

However, according to the list, all the ministers are supposed to be in the house on Wednesday. Yet about half a dozen are missing today. Will they be here tomorrow? If half of the ministers who are supposed to be here are busy outside the house and some of the others are away, what is the use of having a question period if we cannot meet the ministers or ask them questions?

[English]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to deal with that point too. It seems to me that whatever system we follow with regard to the question period it would be desirable for ministers, such as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to be able to participate in the way he is participating with his provincial colleagues. Although I agree he is not in the house today, I understand the meetings will be over on Friday, and that he will be in the house next Monday to respond to questions.

Mr. Caouette: That is the situation with regard to one minister, Mr. Speaker, but what about the other ministers who are missing today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I serve notice on the Minister of Defence Production, who is an infrequent visitor to the house, that I will be questioning him tomorrow on a matter of some urgency.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the point of order has not been disposed of yet.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I sent yesterday to the hon. Minister of Transport a notice of the question I intended to put to him today. In view of the fact that I cannot put it under the rules, I wish to give him notice that I will discuss it at ten o'clock, on the adjournment motion.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: This is insufficient notice according to the rules of the house.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AUTHORITY FOR CONSTRUCTION OF ALBERTA BRANCH LINE

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-109, respecting the construction of a line of railway in the province of Alberta by the Canadian National Railway Company from the vicinity of Windfall on the Windfall extension to the Sangudo subdivision of the Canadian National Railway in a westerly direction for a distance of approximately 51 miles to the Bigstone property of Pan American Petroleum Corporation and of a connecting spur extending in a northerly direction for a distance of approximately nine miles to the South Kaybob property of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited and its associates.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to debate the question on third reading, but surely the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), in a preliminary way at least, is going to answer many of the questions that were raised earlier during his absence, and which went unanswered?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Richardson) has taken responsibility for this bill. If there are any questions that he would care to reply to at this time, then I am sure this would be agreeable.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, all of the questions which were put were discussed thoroughly in committee, and I do not know of any that are outstanding at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) seems to be on his way out of the chamber so I suppose we are expected to agree to third reading of the bill, even although there are a number of points that have not been adequately dealt with. This is not the fault of the Acting Minister of Transport (Mr. Richardson). I do not for one moment suggest he could possibly be in a position to answer some of the proposals that were put to him the other day.

My colleague the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and also the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) put to the acting minister the proposition that, within the terms of Bill No. C-109, provision should be made to require by statute that the Canadian National Railways, in the contracts that it enters into with road building and railway line contractors, should specifically recruit from the immediate area a certain percentage of the labour force required.

I know the Acting Minister of Transport said that in his personal opinion this would be a desirable course of action to take, but that was where the matter was left, Mr.

Speaker. The Acting Minister of Transport obviously feels that he is hardly in a position to go further, other than to give such a tentative outline of what he personally thinks will happen. One would have thought that during the last two days the acting minister would have taken this matter up with the Minister of Transport and other officials of the department to see whether they were prepared to go beyond the simple voicing of a personal opinion, to the point where they would agree to the inclusion of such a desirable proposal—I am using the minister's words—in statute law.

In recent months, Mr. Speaker, we have heard more and more about the problem of poverty in our country, about the inter-regional disparities in income and the inter-regional disparities in job opportunities. We are now faced with a bill to provide for the building of a line of railway in the northern part of Alberta. One assumes that this is an area where job opportunities for the local Indian population are not that easy to come by.

If one wanted to do something tangible and concrete about this problem. Mr. Speaker, rather than resorting to studies and still more studies under the aegis of the Economic Council, under the aegis of ARDA, of FRED and a host of other government agenices, studies that have been proliferating over the last few years, we now have an opportunity to do something specific through the vehicle of this bill. Poverty remains as a cruel fact, and we are doing little in a tangible way to tackle the problem.

I do not know whether other hon. members would agree with this, Mr. Speaker, but when we do have the chance to do something specific and tangible to get at the problem of low employment opportunities in certain parts of the country it does seem a pity if we do not take that opportunity. This bill gives us the chance to act. The Minister without Portfolio agrees that it is a good idea; why not do something, then?

I see that the Minister of Transport has left the chamber, and probably has the attitude that "he is all right, Jack". He does not care; he has gone. The Minister without Portfolio, who is acting for him here, is hardly in a position to say much about this proposal. Again I repeat that one can hardly blame the Minister without Portfolio for this situation.

There were some other questions put to the minister two days ago, Mr. Speaker, which the acting minister cannot possibly answer. One of the questions put previously was why the Minister of Transport, after the passage of seven or eight months, could not come to a decision about the validity of certain claims having to do with a line of railway built by the C.N.R. some few years ago. This was an important matter which was raised two years ago, and since then the Minister of Transport has been dealing with or procrastinating on the question. The Minister without Portfolio from Winnipeg South is hardly in a position to answer that particular question.

I do not know at this stage, Mr. Speaker, what more can be said, except to express indignation at the fact that when the bill comes before us for third reading the minister has not given some tangible response to the questions asked, and that he has left the chamber. What is one to do?

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Are there any further questions?

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the Prime Minister said that the opposition was confused about how to ask questions, and I agree that that is true. Questions ought to be directed to the right minister, and in that I do not disagree with the Prime Minister. I submit the Acting Minister of Transport is in an odd position since he was, so to speak, handed a bill he did not expect to guide through the house. He has said that the Minister of Transport would be back here to discuss this matter. The Minister of Transport came in and left, and the question is, who is responsible for the bill, and who will guide it through the house? I appreciate the acting minister's words. I believe if he were head of the department worth-while action would flow from our discussions. I am not sure that, in our actual situation here, that will be so. The Minister of Transport may return to the chamber but he may leave to the acting minister the actual carrying out of certain proposals.

One problem I wish to speak about is that pertaining to the employment of local people—that is, people local to an area where a contract is being carried out. Clause 2 of this bill sets out the method of tendering, and what Canadian National must do in relation to contracts. We in this group suggest that in the areas where work is to be done, as far as possible local people should be hired to undertake some part of the construction. I think the minister is sympathetic to this idea. All the same, we cannot be certain that the government will insist that the Canadian National in its tender documents will say that a number of people local to the area involved in the construction are to be employed. That may be a roundabout way of saying what I want to say. Perhaps the only way to bring this matter forcefully to the government's attention is by moving an amendment. Therefore, Mr. Speaker I move:

That this Bill C-109 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of reconsidering clause 2 thereof.

We seek, by our motion, to bring this matter to the attention of members of the house and in a roundabout way to the attention of Canadian National Railways. The Fifth Annual Review of the Canada Council, on the topic of the challenge of growth and change, says that in remote areas in the country it is difficult to find employment for the local people who, very often, are not trained to take advantage of any employment opportunities that do exist.

To make sure that local people are employed, a clause specifying their employment will have to be included in contracts, and that will be a factor in assessing costs. The government must insist on this if it wishes to see people in remote localities gainfully employed.

Actually, we are not dealing directly with a crown corporation; third parties are involved and the crown corporation will deal with those third parties. Third parties will be employing those local people, and Canadian National must be informed that in preparing its tender documents consideration must be given to the employment of local people.

Sometimes local projects, from the point of view of providing employment, are of no value to the local people. In my area large sums of money are being spent for a hydro development. In the main that development does not help our local people. They do not need the project; they have all the electricity they can use, and even more. This hydro project is to provide electricity for southern Ontario. Since our local people are not working on it it is worthless in developing our area.

The government has suddenly decided that it has a role to play across Canada in providing employment for our Indians. We have the responsibility of seeing that subcontracts which are let in connection with the subject matter of this bill have clauses in them specifying employment of local people. We think this is only fair. Naturally we are not saying that 10 per cent or 20 per cent of any work force must be local people. Often local people may not be able to fill jobs. We are not tying this matter down rigidly. On the other hand, we do want to see local people employed and we do want to see contracts specifying the employment of local people. This matter will be raised again when the Canadian National estimates are before the house. We assure the Canadian National that we shall follow its actions closely in this matter and that we have ways of keeping this matter current. We have moved the amendment so that the house may express itself in the matter.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not indicated whether he has a seconder for his motion.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I could second the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I suggest, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the motivation of the hon. member in putting forward this amendment, that the first calculation here ought to be with regard to the availability of labour in the particular area, and as to who lives in the area northwest of Whitecourt, Alberta. This is not in the far north where a sizeable percentage of the population is native.

First let us determine what is meant by a local area. Is it within a radius of 100 miles? Is it the area within that 100 mile radius? What is the incidence of unemployment in the area? This is close to the Fox Creek area, near to what is known as the Valleyview oil area. In my view, if a person is out of a job in that area, in most instances it is, frankly, because he does not want to work.

Mr. Peters: Really!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is the hon. member so conversant with the area? I would say, with regard to this particular area, that to try to impose these kinds of terms on the construction of the extension of a spur line for the sulphur plant and the absorption plant is not realistic.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Suppose we prescribe by statute that a certain percentage of local labour must be used, and this local labour is not available; what will be the situation? Hon. members in their amendment have failed to provide for any alternative. I maintain that the proposal in its present terms is unrealistic and that it ought not, therefore, to be supported.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): I should like to say first of all in replying to the debate that as acting minister of transport I am responsible for this legislation. I have the complete concurrence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) and what I say here reflects his views as well as those of the Department of Transport.

I should like to say, further, that all questions which were put during the committee stage were answered, and that the particular question which is being discussed now on third reading about employment in the local area was answered by me. I said I was in agreement with the general thought that local people should be employed. I undertook, also, to refer this matter to the officials of the Canadian National. I shall go further at this point and say I shall be pleased to send copies of the letters I shall write in this regard to hon. members who have raised this matter, that is copies of the letters I intend to write to the Canadian National in this regard.

As to the point which has been raised in connection with the Great Slave Railway, I suggest that this has no bearing on the legislation we are considering today. The difficulties which arose under that contract should properly be discussed when the affairs of the C.N.R. are before the appropriate standing committee of the house, not during the passage of another piece of legislation.

I should like to conclude by saying that this legislation really boils down to something very simple. There are two new sulphur recovery plants in the Alberta gas field west of Windfall and in order to remove the sulphur and the liquid petroleum gas produced by these plants the two companies involved have entered into long term traffic guarantee contracts with the C.N.R. These contracts not only pay for the construction of this new branch line but cover all operating costs, and also, as confirmed by officials of the railway, they provide a surplus to the Canadian National. Construction of this line is therefore clearly in the interest of the railway and therefore in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Would the minister permit a question before he ends his remarks? The hon. gentleman has indicated he will be prepared to make available his communications to the C.N.R. in connection with this employment question. Would he also make available the replies received from the railway company so that we may know what reaction is forthcoming?

Mr. Richardson: I do not believe I can undertake to reveal the correspondence of another party. I will reveal my own correspondence.

Mr. Schreyer: I was wondering whether I could ask the minister a question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister prepared to receive an additional question?

Mr. Richardson: Yes.

Mr. Schreyer: What the minister has said is reasonable enough. Since he has stated that the subject matter of the Great Slave Railway and claims arising therefrom could properly be raised before the standing committee, will he undertake to have this subject matter placed before the standing committee on transport and communications?

Mr. Richardson: I assume that the responsibility for bringing that matter forward would rest upon those who are concerned about the matter. I simply said that the committee was the place where a matter of that kind ought to be considered, rather than in the house during the passage of this legislation.

Mr. Schreyer: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I have to remind hon. members that we are no longer in committee. We are on third reading and we should not return to the type of discussion or debate which is normal during the committee stage of a bill.

Mr. Schreyer: I rise on a point of order. The minister indicated that whoever was concerned with this matter of the Great Slave Railway should bring it before the committee. But since it is the rule that only the minister can refer subject matters to the standing committee I ask him whether he would be prepared to do so. It is his prerogative.

Mr. Speaker: This is not a point of order. It is an argument about the interpretation of the rules of the house.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): The minister has given an assurance to the house that he will bring this principle in relation to local employment to the attention of the Canadian National, and this gives us some cause for rejoicing.

Would he also bring to the attention of the railway company the problem which affects many workers in respect of contracts of employment which contain the non-fraternization clause. I am thinking specifically of the Marconi v. Whitfield case. Marconi had a contract from the government and the company's employment contract with one of its employees contained a clause that the employee was not to fraternize with Indians or Eskimos. This railway, as we know, is to be built in an area in which large numbers of these people are living. I wonder whether the minister could give us some assurance that he would seek to ensure through his contacts with the C.N.R. that this non-fraternization clause is not included in the work contract.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made a speech on the amendment. He cannot make a second speech on the amendment unless he has the unanimous consent of the house to do so.

Mr. Peters: I do not wish to make a speech. In the light of the assurance the minister has given us that he will accept responsibility for making representations to the C.N.R., I ask leave to withdraw the motion, if I am given the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) have leave of the house to withdraw the motion now before us?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Peters) withdrawn.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

• (4:00 p.m.)

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING PERIOD, RESPECTING INTEREST RATES, ETC.

The house resumed from Monday, October 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-111, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act—Mr. Olson (for Mr. Benson)—Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, before the minister makes a statement may I ask him an ancillary question related to this, and to some extent having an effect on the nature of our business. Has the minister given any consideration to the matter I raised with him, that when this bill is completed he might be prepared to change the order of priority and proceed after this with the bill relating to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act rather than with the bill to amend the Farm Credit Act?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I did give consideration to it, although I think it was only about a ten minute consideration. I agree it is urgent that the cash advance legislation be put through as quickly as possible, but I would not like to admit that the bill with respect to the Farm Credit Corporation is not also urgent. The reason I say so is because there is a necessity to increase the cash for the corporation so that it can continue its operations. The corporation usually gets a large number of applications for credit at this time of the year, and it would be rather helpful to it if the bill relating to it were to go through also.

I am sure the hon. member realizes there is the other problem of having the legislation come through in some kind of order, so that the officials who are required to answer hon. members' questions may be on hand and ready to come into the committee when needed. Since the hon. member raised this matter with me, a few minutes ago, I have been unable to get in touch with the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) from Saskatoon, to ascertain whether or not he and his officials are ready to proceed at once.

My hope is that we could get this bill through, then the farm credit bill, and get on to the cash advance legislation as well. As a matter of fact it is going to be called, once these other bills are through. I should also say I would be willing to wait with the bill to amend the Farm Machinery Syndicates Credit Act until the cash advance legislation has gone through, because it is not as urgent. There are some important amendments in it, but it would not cause any great difficulty from the point of view of administration or from the point of view of people who use that act, if the amending bill were delayed for a few days. I would be willing to put the cash advance legislation ahead of the farm syndicates legislation, but I would not be willing to give any other assurance at this point. We shall have to assume that as soon as the farm improvement loans legislation goes through, the Farm Credit Act amending bill would follow, until or unless I have made other arrangements.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to make a statement which I suppose will take ten or eleven minutes about a matter that was raised by many hon. members, that of the prescribed interest rate in the Farm Improvement Loans Act, if hon. gentlemen opposite would like me to do that. I have to say that this very comprehensive statement was prepared by the Department of Finance and by the Minister of Finance. However, much of it was contained in the remarks that I made the other night at the close of the resolution stage and I would not like to deprive hon. members of the time we have left today, if they would rather not hear the statement.

Mr. Horner: Let us have it.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make these few remarks on a point that is of real concern to members on both sides of the house, namely the proposal that the statutory interest of 5 per cent on farm improvement loans be changed. But before commenting on the interest rate itself it may be useful to recall the circumstances in which F.I.L.A., as farmers and bankers alike have come to call it, was first established.

The origins of F.I.L.A. are rooted in the great depression. Financial disaster had then overtaken a large number of farmers, and relationships between borrowers and lenders were strained, to put it mildly. In the years that followed farmers had to rely for credit for the most part on people with whom they dealt in marketing their products, like merchants, and from whom they bought their equipment. But this was very expensive credit, apart from the fact that it often prevented farmers from dealing freely with whomever was going to give them a favourable price.

It was in this setting that the government introduced the Farm Improvement Loans Act as an incentive for chartered banks to enter the term lending field in rural areas on a major scale. This incentive was a twofold one—the government guarantee, and a rate of interest that afforded the banks a reasonable return. It may be interesting to recall for hon. members what was said by Hon. Mr. Ilsley, who was minister of finance at the time. He said in part:

> The rate of interest is to be limited to a maximum of 5 per cent simple interest per annum, which is considerably less than rates generally obtaining for this kind of accommodation to farmers from merchants, dealers or other present sources and is, I believe, somewhat less than the average rate charged to farmers by banks on short term loans. It is reasonable that the rate should be lower since an important part of the risk is being borne by the government. Nevertheless, earnings must be sufficient to cover the banks' costs of operation and to give them an incentive to go out after business.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this principle is essentially the same as the one we have to look at today if we want this program to be again as effective and useful as it had been until recently—and when I say recently I mean until interest rates in the market went substantially above 5 per cent.

When the 5 per cent under F.I.L.A. was established, yields on government of Canada five year bonds were 1.92 per cent. The bank rate, the rate at which the Bank of Canada lends to financial institutions, was 2 per cent. The rate at which banks were then making loans to their prime customers was 4½ per cent, that is, half of one per cent below the F.I.L.A. rate.

I mention the banks' prime rate because reference was made to it during the debate. It relates of course to interest rate levels generally, and an even better measure of this is yields on government of Canada bonds. I would therefore prefer to look at changes in interest rates more in terms of changes in yields on government of Canada bonds. And if we really mean it when we say that F.I.L.A. should be reactivated, then we must take into account changes in the level of interest rates.

F.I.L.A. loans are made by private lenders from funds placed on deposit with them by other customers, and if they are not afforded a return that is commensurate with their costs, then they are just not going to make loans. What we have to aim for is a rate level for F.I.L.A. that is sufficiently high so as to give lenders "an incentive to go after the business", in the words of Mr. Ilsley, and that is at the same time sufficiently low so as still to represent a cost factor to farmers that is appreciably less than what they would have to pay without the guarantee program.

Perhaps I should emphasize that the cost of credit is not the only consideration in the interests of farmers. I have in mind in particular the small farmer. Farming generally has come a long way in the last two decades, and there are many farmers today who run highly successful commercial type operations for which they can get credit quite readily, and at rates probably not much above those that will prevail under a reactivated F.I.L.A. program.

While F.I.L.A. will be helpful also to this group, it is much more vitally needed by the smaller farmer whose creditworthiness may not be as well established, and chances are that it is this smaller farmer who will have to depend on F.I.L.A. to get at reasonable cost the credit he needs to buy equipment for the improvement of his farming operation.

Back in 1944, when the farm improvement loans program was being formulated, it was quite feasible to have a rate established in the legislation itself, and to leave it unchanged for an extended period of time. This approach did indeed work quite satisfactorily for quite a number of years. In recent years, however, there has been an increasing need for greater flexibility and quicker responsiveness to change in the economic environment. The need for greater flexibility in the rates of interest on guaranteed loans was recognized as early as 1960 when the government of the day brought before the house, as a companion measure to the highly successful F.I.L.A. program, the Small Businesses Loans Act, under which guaranteed loans may be made to small businessmen. This act, which became operative early in 1961, provides that the interest rate is to be prescribed by regulations. Another more recent example can be found in the Canada Student Loans Act which was passed in 1964. I find myself in full accord with opposition members when they suggest that the F.I.L.A. interest rate be determined by a formula, and I can gladly assure the house that we expect to prescribe a formula for the determination of the interest rate, and not a new fixed rate.

I cannot give the house at the moment full details of such a formula, because they have not yet been fully worked out. In the case of guaranteed loans, such as those under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, it is appropriate, and it has been the practice, to consult with the lenders before finalizing the details for a formula on interest rates on loans to be made by these lenders that will apply after the measure now before the house has been approved. I should like to make a small correction here and say that with respect to the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Canada Student Loans Act there have been consultations with the lenders before the prescribed rate, which in this case would be the maximum rate under which the guarantee is available, has been set down. But I would be glad to outline the general principles which we are currently considering in connection with the construction of such a formula. The formula will certainly relate the Farm Improvement Loans Act rate of interest to generally prevailing levels of interest, and this will probably be measured by reliance on yields on government of Canada securities of comparable term to maturity. In addition, I would expect that there will be a mark-up in respect of administrative cost. There should be provisions for periodic adjustments in the rate, perhaps quarterly, but the guiding principle should certainly be that adjustments would come about automatically, triggered by changing circumstances in the capital market.

I should add that this approach is much more likely to work to the advantage of farmers over the long run than would a rate fixed for a long period of time. True, when interest rates go up, farmers along with all other groups of borrowers, have to pay more, but farm improvement rates would also go down more quickly as monetary conditions change. This is the kind of flexibility that we are confident will work to the full advantage of the farming community, keeping in mind, again, that what is of importance to farmers is not only cost, but also availability.

I should like to say in conclusion that it would be nice if at this point we could state the specific amount, or give all the factors which would be included in the formula; but I am sure hon. members opposite will realize that in view of the availability of funds of those people who will actually be lending their money, and in the hope that this measure will be enthusiastically supported we have to consult with the lenders and arrive at a rate that, as I have said many times, is high enough so that it will be used and yet low enough so that the guarantee does in fact constitute a real assistance to some of the borrowers whose credit rating may not be such as to warrant their obtaining the most favourable rate at the present time.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, the minister's remarks have been a perfect example of what should be done at the very beginning of the debate on a subject such as this one. Many hours of questioning of farm representatives have gone into the preparation of this bill. If the minister had made his ten minute statement the day before yesterday, I am sure that much of the concern which many hon. members on this side of the house feel would have been alleviated. However, all this goes to substantiate the belief that, in a democracy, debate is very necessary and is one of the freedoms we enjoy—the freedom to express ourselves and the freedom to be concerned about this vital industry.

However, when I look at the minister I cannot help remembering the time when he was a member of the party to my left, and I find it somewhat amusing that he should go back to speeches made by former ministers of finance to support his own beliefs today. A former minister of finance said that the rate of interest on this type of loan shall be considerably less than on loans made to farmers for other purposes by the same banks. This is the interpretation we have put on that quotation. I see concern on the minister's face, as if he wished to say I was misinterpreting his remarks; but I listened very closely to them. The hon. Mr. Ilsley said:

> —considerably less than rates generally obtaining for this kind of accommodation to farmers from merchants, dealers or other present sources and is, I believe, somewhat less than the average rate charged to farmers by banks on short term loans.

I am still in complete agreement with this principle upon which the Farm Improvement Loans Act was founded. I am sure hon. members on this side will agree with me when I say we cannot accept the excuse the minister gave us for not giving us a formula today, that there has not been sufficient time for consultation. I urged him to proceed with this legislation yesterday, but the government did not respond to my urging. I was under the impression then that he may have been consulting with the banks. I would like to think the government had done so perhaps last February. Surely to goodness he can do better than come to the house and say, "We cannot announce the formula beforehand because there has to be further consultation". We cannot accept this, after we have heard the government say they had this legislation last February. I know that the Canada Student Loans Act legislation was passed with the open end interest rate clause in it. I know that the Small Businesses Loans Act was passed with a similar arrangement. Because of this fact, during the early stages of this bill I stressed how badly the agricultural industry needed an enticing interest rate. The farmers needed more money. Some months ago the Prime Minister expressed his concern in Winnipeg about the cost of input into the agricultural industry. I am not trying to compare in any way the needs of the agricultural industry with those of small businessmen or university students, but may I refer to the report of the Economic Council of Canada which stated that the agricultural industry needs more capital to catch up with the output of the agricultural industry in the United States. This is what we are arguing for here.

We want that output put into the agricultural industry at no greater increase. This is what the Prime Minister said in Winnipeg on June 2—that the agricultural industry cannot stand a higher cost of input. This is what we are worried about.

The minister has referred to an interest rate comparable to the yield on five year government securities. In order to make sure I understood him correctly, I should like to ask him whether that is what he said. Is that going to be the guide line for this fluctuating interest rate? We would like to know what it is going to be.

The minister went on to refer to the cost of issuing loans and suggested this would have to be taken into account. I immediately became concerned, because when he was speaking as a member of another party that sat to my left he indicated it would only cost 2 per cent to issue these loans. Will that 2 per cent added to the interest rate be comparable to the yield on five year government securities?

The minister did make a comprehensive and clarifying statement, and I commend him for that, but he has left me in doubt on a couple of points. I should not like to see him compare agriculture with any other industry. We know that thousands of dollars are being spent on educational facilities for students. One might well suggest that this is subsidizing the students. I do not think it is fair to compare government guaranteed loans to the agricultural industry with similar guaranteed loans to other segments of the economy. We must consider this as direct aid to the industry without making any comparison. Will this move the industry in the right direction? I hope the minister will clear up this matter.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I can answer this question immediately. I said the rate would be related to comparable term securities. The hon. member has read the bill and I am sure he knows there are some terms longer than five years available on certain type of borrowing under this act.

Mr. Horner: I realize that previous to this time there has been a ten year clause but I must consider the practical applications of this bill. The terms of loans in the past have rarely exceeded five years, and I would suggest that the average has been three years up until the last year or two when there has been a movement toward terms of four and five years. The minister says the rate will be comparable to the yield on government securities, but there can be a great difference. If the minister bases this on the average of long term government securities there could be a difference of 1 per cent. Surely the minister can clear up this matter.

I thank him for his statement in which he expressed for the first time during this debate his concern for interest rates. I thought he had forgotten all about the farmer's desire and need to obtain money at interest rates which would allow him to pay back the loan. However, while he did express concern, I think he should be a little more specific.

No amount of talk can convince me that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance have not had ample opportunity to discuss this matter with bankers. This bill has been under consideration for at least three or four months and they have had enough time. If these ministers believe in democracy they should not hedge or be secretive about this formula. Perhaps the minister does not have to write this formula into the bill, but at least he could tell us exactly what he is attempting to relate it to without comparing it to the yield on government securities. He has not even indicated whether he has in mind terms of five years or ten years, a short term of 91 days or a long term. The minister has given us some information but he has not given us as much as I am sure he could if he made an attempt.

Mr. Olson: Let me say to the hon. member that we are not attempting to be secretive, but I should like to be as accurate as possible. I do not want to say things on speculation, as I am sure hon. gentleman wants accurate answers. I have said I agree with the hon. member that the availability of funds is very important, as well as interest rates. When this bill is passed we want to be sure we will have the flexibility to guarantee a continuity of sufficient funds to make the act operative. The hon. member said at the outset that if I had made this statement a few days ago I might have cleared up a lot of problems. I went into great detail on this point and I think I said essentially the same thing I will say again. Perhaps it was not quite clear.

The hon. member will realize that the government wants our statements to be up to date. When things change we want hon. members to know so they will have information that is as current as possible.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Horner: Will the minister indicate what government securities this will be based on? Is it to be linked to five or ten year bonds, the long term average or the short term average?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, there would have to be an assessment made and perhaps some averages worked out. We may have to make an arbitrary decision as to what those averages should be based on. There will have to be negotiations with the bankers, because the money belongs to the banks.

What we have in mind is what we have stated. If some of the averages under the Farm Improvement Loans Act turn out to be in the area of five to six years for similar types of loans, then of course we would have to take that into account and base it on securities of the government for a comparable period of time.

When we have passed the amendments there will probably be some longer terms involved for land purchases than for farm machinery purchases. All of this is not clear as yet, and we would like the flexibility to prescribe the rate in order to take into account these factors. I have said very clearly that this will be related to government of Canada bonds over a comparable period of time.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture several questions. Many farmers are waiting for this act to be passed in order that they can make loans under its provisions. I was wondering whether the minister could tell us how soon after the bill is passed and enacted into law farmers will be able to obtain loans under it. Also, how soon after the bill becomes law will the prescribed interest rate be set? Farmers who have been making time purchases of machinery and other items in the last few months are paying a high interest rate. Will it be possible for them to re-finance their loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the last question, I am sure the hon. member for Assiniboia realizes that it raises additional problems when he talks about re-financing. The Minister of Finance has given an undertaking that the loans which have been made since the act expired on July 1 will in fact be available to receive a government guarantee. It will be up to the banks and the customers to decide whether they will make an application for this guarantee, which would hopefully somewhat reduce the interest rate that applied to the demand note.

But when you talk about re-financing, there are other kinds of re-financing that have been applied for from time to time. I refer to the financing carried out by the machinery company itself. We know for example that in some cases this type of financing includes taking delivery of the particular piece of machinery, without any down payment, and later applying for a loan under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. This is re-financing of a somewhat different nature, because then you are financing a secondhand piece of equipment at the full new price, or whatever the farmer paid for it. This raises some problems.

Again, there is no question about the government guarantee being made available for loans made by the banks since July 1. The Minister of Finance has announced that this guarantee will be available. The hon. member also asked how long it would be after the bill is enacted before loans under this program were available. I think a related question was, how long would it be before the interest rate is set. The prescribed rate would have to be set before the provisions of the guarantee would be available. I am sorry that I cannot give an exact date, but I assure the hon. member that we are keenly interested in setting this rate as quickly as possible.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to speak at any length on this bill. Possibly the reason it is not proposed to continue the interest rates within the act is the financial condition of our country, which is such that interest rates and the cost of money have become rather uncertain things. I believe this could be the reason. Whatever the formula will be, if it is a stable rate there is no reason why it should not have been included in this bill. Then we would know what it was going to be. The fact that it is not included in the bill will mean, of course, that the government, the lending companies and the banks will get together and ask (a) how much must we have? (b) how much will the traffic stand? and (c) what can we get back? These are the questions that have to be answered. They might as well have been answered right here in the house as later, because these are the factors that govern the setting of the rate in respect of the hiring of money. That is what we are talking about, namely how much the farmer will have to pay for hiring money with which to run his operation. These are the factors about which a former minister, who was mentioned earlier in the debate, was talking. As I said before, Mr. Chairman, whatever method or formula is to be adopted, it might just as well have been brought before the house and incorporated in this bill.

The other matter with which I should like to deal, if I am in order in so doing, Mr. Chairman, is that of including loans for land within the provisions of the act. As I mentioned the other night, this does not really add up. I do not know why we bring land under the provisions of this act rather than leaving it within the terms of the next act to come before us. There can probably be a good case made for farmers needing intermediate term loans with which to buy land. If it can be made, this has not been done. No satisfactory answer has been given to this question. The fact is that short term loans in respect of land is a pretty good way to get the farmer into a fair bit of difficulty in trying to repay the loan. Too much has to be repaid in too short a period of time.

If we do need an intermediate term loans program in respect of land, it should have been left to one of the other bills. It should be part of the function of the Farm Credit Corporation to supply money for this purpose. I have never seen any recommendations by the Farm Credit Corporation that we need short term money for land. This is what a 15 year repayment program is; it is short term money as far as land is concerned.

I tell the minister that I speak with some experience in this regard because I bought land when there was no Farm Credit Corporation, and had to make heavy payments on a short term loan. This just raises heck with one's living standard because the loan is paid back so fast that you find it difficult to maintain the standard of living you should enjoy.

Therefore I say again to the minister that this provision of the bill just does not make sense, unless there are trust and insurance companies who feel they would like to participate in the program. Those are the points I wish to make, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has asked why it is that we include land in this bill rather than in the one dealing with the Farm Credit Corporation. We think there is a place in this bill for a provision in respect of smaller amounts and smaller parcels of land because, as my hon. friend knows, it is easier to make application to the bank in respect of them. In addition, it is less costly to obtain credit in this way for smaller parcels of land than to go through the process of making application to the Farm Credit Corporation, with the legal fees involved in mortgages, and so on, which is the way in which the F.C.C. must operate.

Mr. Gleave: What is the approximate cost of processing a loan through the Farm Credit Corporation?

Mr. Olson: I am not exactly sure of the total cost. I think they used to charge an application fee of something like $50. I believe this has been reduced to $10. But I suppose the legal fees for each mortgage are not identical. I understand there is a cost involved here of anything from $50 to over $100, because inspections have to be made by the field staff and one has to pay for these. We do not have any assurance at this stage as to how the banks will respond to lending money for the purchase of land; they have not been in that business for some time. From time to time we are prepared to make available for assessment purposes, in an advisory capacity only, the competent people that we have in the Farm Credit Corporation, if some kind of arrangement can be worked out with the banks and provided they want to make use of this facility.

Mr. Gleave: Might I suggest that the fee, whatever it may be, whether it is $10 or $50 for inspection is not very significant when you are borrowing $15,000. Might I also suggest there are legal fees involved in the transfer of land whether you are buying it on a 15 year or 30 year mortgage; you are going to pay legal fees anyway. I had hoped that the minister could surely come forward with a better argument than that. I do say that this is a departure in lending policy and unless it can be justified it should not be followed.

Mr. Olson: In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, we are of the opinion that there is a place for a government guarantee. Until this amendment was written there was no place where the government guarantee was available to farmers for buying small parcels of land except through the Farm Credit Corporation. Unless there is a major change in the manner in which these loans are processed, then I do not see how these changes can be made. It is easy and simple for these smaller purchasers to go to their local banks. There are not nearly so many government offices close at hand. I am not saying that this is a problem which is insurmountable; but for convenience sake and the cost of processing, there is a place for government guarantees for loans on purchases of small parcels of land.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question on his earlier statement, when he was referring to those interest free deals that are supplied by machinery companies. The minister stated that if the farmer goes to the bank to make a loan on an interest free deal, the bank cannot make a loan at this time because it is then a used piece of equipment. Does this mean we are going to have a rate for new machinery and a rate for used machinery? Previously only a down payment was required.

Mr. Olson: No, I was not saying that you could not make a loan under the Farm Improvement Loans Act for used equipment. I can understand the hon. member's apprehension because when I finished saying what I said I wondered at that time if I left some misunderstanding. What I intended to say was that under the provisions of the previous act there was no possibility of refinancing; whether it was a piece of new or used equipment was not that important. I do not know all of the answers. This could be handled by regulation I suppose. Most farm equipment dealers have an arrangement whereby they finance within the company a piece of equipment with no down payment at the time, and sometimes the first payment is as much as six months or more later after the delivery of the piece of equipment. This does in fact constitute re-financing, whether the machinery is new or old. We have to take this into account. I do not think the statement of the Minister of Finance included that kind of re-financing. What the minister was talking about was that a government guarantee would be made available to loans that were made by the banks from July 1 until the date that this act becomes operative, to attract the lower rate.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): I would like to ask a further question, Mr. Chairman. A lot of this farm machinery is used seasonally. An example of this is a combine. This may be purchased right after the harvest season and not put into use for another 10 to 12 months. The farmer may wish to take advantage of a price reduction by ordering equipment in the fall. If he does not use the machine for 10 months, he can get an interest free program from the implement company. It is not uncommon in this day and age for a farmer to obtain a loan of $8,000. If you use the rate of interest of 6 per cent and if he can take advantage of an interest free loan from the machinery company, then he can save himself around $400. I should like to see such a provision in the act.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I realize that this practice has grown up recently, as my hon. friend knows. There are some distinct advantages in accepting pre-delivery because of discounts and that sort of thing. I know there have been legal questions. I have discussed this matter with many bankers—I will reveal no names—and they have in fact granted farm credit loans as if there had been no re-financing. However, they have been a little disturbed about the legal implications because there was, in fact, re-financing. We will look into it and try to cover that matter in the regulations.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): I think this should be looked into because in some areas re-financing can be arranged through the banks while in other areas it cannot.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have heard the statement from the Minister of Agriculture, which has cleared up some problems. I am afraid that he has not reassured me on one of the most important points of all. I am concerned about farming, as I am sure he is—about whether or not his department, and the government generally, are putting their finger on the real problem today. If we are going to support agriculture, and I am sure we are, is the money that we are providing going to the right people?

The group we are trying to help are the family farmers of Canada. I have been intimately in touch with this group of family farmers for the last ten years, and they have indicated almost unanimously that they are not getting the help parliament is trying to give them. When financial institutions are given the responsibility of parcelling out the money they want an efficient operation; they want to make as much money out of the transaction as they can. The cost of putting out a large loan is very much the same as the cost of putting out a small loan. If you look into the statistics as to where money has been lent, you will find that the average loan is quite large. I am referring now to all the areas covered by these bills.

Most of these loans are going to people who really do not need the money at all because their credit is good. You can tell this by the amount of money being paid back. This money is being repaid in spite of the lack of markets, and in spite of the holdover of grain on our farms. Most of these loans are being repaid, and you know why; they are being repaid because the money is being lent to people who do not really need the money. There are hundreds of farmers who need a small loan of $5,000 or $6,000 and they are not able to get it because priority is being given to the large, well guaranteed loans, the loan that no bank has to worry about. These loans are guaranteed by 6,000 or 7,000 acres of good arable wheat land. These farmers do not need to go to the government to borrow money when they are engaged in that type of operation. In many cases these farms are owned by corporations or by rich men who are plowing their income back into farming in order to escape income tax. If you lend such a man $17,000 or $20,000, of course he is going to pay it back.

I must say I have had literally hundreds of complaints from the little fellow who needs a loan most but cannot get it. Apparently the selling point of the government to parliament today is that we are short of money; but there is money for good purposes. We have to justify to the people of Canada the fact that we are going to ear-mark $500 million or $600 million to help agriculture. I do not think that the taxpayers of Canada want to subsidize the wrong people. I think the government of Canada should take the trouble to find out exactly who needs help in order to try to steer this money into the right channel.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, who has just taken his seat, knows the problem intimately. In this very building, Mr. Chairman, he at one time asked me to take my seat at a farm union meeting because I had asked the farm unions to define what is a family farm. I do not know why such a definition was not forthcoming five or ten years ago. Certainly I should like a definition today.

I am sure the minister knows what is the problem here. I would ask whether there is not some way in which to write into all four of these bills the principle that the money that is lent should go to those who need it the most. I think that we should, we can and that we must supply money to these people, and I do not think we need worry too much about the formula the Conservative administration established, which set an interest rate at 5 per cent.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that from time to time conditions change. When the Conservative government lent money at 5 per cent, the going rate at the Bank of Canada was 3½ per cent. This left 1½ per cent which was almost a gift to the banks making the loans. These loans were guaranteed by the treasury of Canada and the loss sustained amounted to a decimal point of 1 per cent. In effect this 1½ per cent margin was an administrative charge only. The whole thing was a cinch. Any finance institution that had the rent paid was only too glad to lend out $5 million or $6 million at 1½ per cent at absolutely no risk.

Banks today may not want to lend money at that rate because they can lend it for other purposes at rates between 8 and 10 per cent. Nevertheless I think the banks would lend $5 million or $6 million if a profit were guaranteed. If banks could earn a decent income by passing money through their hands at no risk, then they would be glad to lend this money today. However, they will not do this unless the money is earmarked by the government for a specific purpose.

When money is made available, Mr. Chairman, you just do not leave it to the banks to lend it to whom they please. We should tell the banks to whom this money is to be lent. I think things have been upside down here. As a government we have been insisting on giving this money to those who need it the least, and preventing those who need it the most from receiving it.

I do not want to go outside these four bills at the present ime, Mr. Chairman. The dairy industry and other branches of the agricultural industry have taken the same attitude toward the family farm, that it should be in Canada to stay. When money is lent, the cost of that money must, of course be taken into consideration.

We must remember, Mr. Chairman, that Canada is still a pioneer country. There should be 50 to 100 million people living in this country. Are we going to leave agriculture in the hands of a few hundred thousand people, or are we going to establish policies that will mean that Canada will have an ever-expanding agricultural industry employing more and more people instead of less and less? If the fewer and fewer farmers of today continue to expand their operations and get richer, then I suggest we cut off entirely our support for this kind of operation. The only kind of operation that I would support is one that takes the long view of our agricultural industry in Canada and makes sure there are more and more family farms in the country instead of less and less.

This particular bill, Mr. Chairman, seeks to expand the supply of money for the improvement of farms and the purchase of land. That is fine, provided the main principle to which I have referred is kept in mind, namely that this money is not just earmarked for the large farmers so that they can expand and take in neighbouring farms. We must make sure that a small farmer is able to buy enough land for his own particular operation.

Size alone, Mr. Chairman, is not the only criterion. I know one farmer in my district who has raised eight children on a quarter section of land. At fall fairs he is the man who has the red ribbons on his cattle. He would not necessarily be a better farmer if he had 10 sections of land. Perhaps he could have done a better job with half a section of land, and in a case like that where a farmer has a good operation on a quarter section by all means let us open the door and lend him the money to buy another quarter section, because a half section would be a more efficient unit.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, could I help the hon. member here. He said that loans have been in region of $18,000 to $20,000. I should just like to quote him some figures in this respect. In 1950 there were 58,969 loans under the act, the average being $1,075. In 1957 there were 57,988 loans made, the average being $1,199. In 1967, which is the last year the act was fully operative, 78,249 loans were made, the average being $2,602. So I am unable to follow the logic of the hon. member when he says that this legislation is not for the small farmer. There were literally thousands of loans made below $1,000 and between $1,000 and $2,000.

Mr. Bigg: I presume, Mr. Chairman, that the minister refers only to loans made under the farm improvement legislation.

Mr. Olson: That is the only act that is under consideration at the moment.

Mr. Bigg: I know that that is the only act under consideration, Mr. Chairman, but to prevent speaking four separate times on the subject I thought it would be acceptable if I talked about the principle behind farm loans under all four bills, Nos. C-110, C-111, C-112 and C-113. In my opinion, the principle behind all these bills is the same. I should like to know how we are spending the taxpayers' money and guaranteeing these loans on this general principle.

Mr. Olson: The answer to that, Mr. Chairman, is that we are making this money available to thousands and thousands of farmers with all sizes of operations.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, my experience has been that there are many smaller farmers who are unable to qualify for loans because the supply of money runs out. Preference is given to the larger, more efficient—I put that in brackets—farming units.

The Chairman: Order, please. So that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members business, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, public bills.

EXPROPRIATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TREATMENT OF PROPERTY OWNERS

On the order: Private members notices of motions:

No. 5—Mr. Chappell—September 18, 1968

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of giving immediate consideration to amending the Expropriation Act so that an owner whose property is expropriated will be dealt with in a more business-like and just manner, and more particularly so as to provide for a notice before the expropriation takes place, for a substantial advance of money at the time of taking property, for the spelling out of measures of compensation, for the change of interest rate to the bank rate of interest, and, finally, to provide that if property is affected or invaded in part by an act on the part of expropriating authorities, the owner may call upon authorities to take all his land or property.

Mr. Hyliard Chappell (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I am ready to proceed with the motion but the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), who wishes to be present to speak to it, is absent on government business. Therefore I ask that the house grant unanimous consent to allow the motion to stand until the house next deals with private members notices of motions, and that the motion retain its position.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

WITHHOLDING OF SHARED COST PAYMENTS FOLLOWING IMPOSITION OF UTILIZATION FEES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to amending the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act to provide that the imposing by any province under its own hospitalization and medical care plans of deterrent or utilization fees upon recipients of these services, will disqualify such province from receiving any share of costs from the Government of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the house is aware the purpose of the resolution is that this government should give consideration to amending the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act and, as Your Honour read, to provide that where any province imposes utilization or deterrent fees upon hospital or medical care services under its own provincial hospital or medical care plan, it be disqualified from obtaining any share of the costs of its hospitalization and medical care plan from the federal government. This would apply whether the deterrent fee is a co-insurance fee, utilization fee, or anything else that one may want to call it.

Universal public hospitalization and medical care plans in theory imply, and in fact require, that the total population prepays the cost of hospital and medical care benefits that any citizen may incur in the event of illness. Despite organized opposition from some individuals and groups, the fact remains that the overwhelming majority of Canadians wish to participate in a collective way to protect themselves and their families from being faced with large financial obligations at the time of or immediately after illness strikes.

During many years of experience—much of it bitter—which led to a demand by the people for a method of insuring themselves against the day when sickness or injury might strike, various organizations, then municipal governments and then provincial governments moved to implement plans that gave a citizen this kind of protection and service. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the consumers of medical and hospital services decided, through their governments, to prepay the costs of their hospital and medical care needs.

Underlying these measures is the principle that good health is a right—I emphasize—is a right of every citizen, and not a privilege. It is a basic tenet of such public programs that, regardless of financial means or station in life, the right to good health and treatment for illness shall not be denied to any citizen because of financial barriers.

On December 8, 1966, this house passed an act to authorize the payment of contributions by the government of Canada toward the costs of insured medical care services incurred by provinces under their own medical care plans. On July 1 the act took effect. It was a great milestone in Canadian history.

An earlier great milestone was the passing by this house of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act in April, 1957, and the amendment to it in June, 1968, that brought the act into force on July 1 of that year.

The intent and purpose of universal hospital and medical care plans is to provide full and equal access to the best possible health care for every citizen, regardless of his station in life, financial means, race, colour or creed, or his place of residence. They are a way of spreading the cost of health care over the entire population and removing the financial burden of hospital and doctor bills from the patient.

The great majority of citizens have decided through their democratically elected governments that they wish to pay in advance for their hospital and medical care, through yearly premiums, through income tax and sales tax, and other similar measures. Premiums are a fixed charge on every citizen. Most of the money that is raised by our governments is raised through income and sales taxes, which are based in some measure on one's ability to pay. This, then, brings me to the purpose of this resolution.

Experience has shown and is showing that some provinces are imposing additional charges that completely negate the intent and purpose of public hospital and medical care plans. The imposition of so-called deterrent fees, or utilization fees or co-insurance fees, as they are sometimes called, on a patient is in fact an extra tax on those who become sick or injured. This in fact means that people who have already paid for their hospitalization and doctor's care through their premiums and taxes are being taxed again, and must pay again as soon as they are sick. Such charges fly in the face of the intent of our national Medical Care Act and are perpetrated because of a loophole in the hospital insurance legislation. Section 4(1) (b) of the Medical Care Act says that medical services are to be provided for insured persons and that nothing, directly or indirectly, whether by charges or otherwise, shall impede or preclude an insured person from access to such services. Certainly, no co-insurance or deterrent fees are mentioned. In fact, the federal act discourages such charges which could have the effect of impeding reasonable access to insured services by insured persons, since their fees are not considered as a cost to be shared.

The government says in the act that the provincial plan must provide for the furnishing of insured services upon uniform terms and conditions to all in the province in accordance with the various tariffs, and so on, set out under the law. That service must be provided on a basis that provides for reasonable compensation for insured services to medical practitioners and—> —that does not impede or preclude, either directly or indirectly whether by charges made to insured persons or otherwise, reasonable access to insured services by insured persons;

The effect of these kinds of charges must be to deny reasonable access to medical hospital services to the poor, the old, the very young and the low income people. This is happening in more than one province. In particular I speak of my own province, Saskatchewan. There it is possible to pay a $1.50 deterrent fee four or five times in a single day, since it is charged by each doctor the patient might see for the same illness. You could go to a general practitioner, and when you say you have a stomach ache he will charge you the deterrent fee and refer you to an internist, who will charge you a deterrent fee and turn you over to a radiologist, who will take an X-ray and charge you a deterrent fee and then refer you back to the general practitioner, who will prescribe medicine. At each step you will be charged a fee. Even though you have already paid for your medical care through your income tax, sales tax or other form of premium payment you will pay again if you are sick. In addition, the fee is charged for every single office and house call you make for the same illness or injury, no matter how often you must go to the doctor.

Cancer patients, particularly, are victimized because of the number of times they must visit their doctors, or the number of times the doctors must visit their homes. They are victimized also because of their numerous hospital visits, which vary in length. Someone unfortunate enough to be ill with cancer has enough trouble, I submit, without being saddled with these various additional unfair and unjust costs. Someone sentenced to death by cancer and forced to lie for weeks or for months in a hospital bed should not, at such a time, be saddled with extra costs which an unconscionable government, either provincial or federal, has imposed on him.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The problem of deterrent fees imposed on treaty Indians is still not cleared up. It is quite clear that the department of Indian affairs and the federal government feel that the exaction of these fees would prevent Indians from receiving reasonable access to health treatment, and has decided to pay the fees on behalf of the treaty Indian people in Saskatchewan. But what about the Métis people, whose incomes are in many cases as low as, if not lower than those of the Indians? Is it not logical to suppose that these fees will affect them adversely, too? What about other classes of people with similarly low incomes? We hear it said that no one will be turned away. But anyone who goes to a hospital at ten o'clock at night in an emergency and does not have the required $25 deposit will not get in, and no bureaucrat will be able to convince me that anyone can get $25 from a social agency at that hour of the night.

Mr. Francis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Benjamin: I have only a few more minutes left and I should like to conclude. Perhaps the hon. member would ask his question when I am through.

The deterrent fee in connection with hospitalization is equally vicious. At $2.50 a day for the first 30 days and $1.50 a day for the next 60 days a total extra tax of $165 is imposed on a sick person who has the misfortune to be hospitalized for 90 days. The reason most often given to justify the imposition of deterrent or utilization fees is that they serve to curb abuses of the hospital and medical services. This is pure baloney. In fact it is no longer pure: It is old, it is bad, and it smells to high heaven. Abuses by whom? Where, when and how? Not the slightest evidence has ever been researched or presented to indicate that there is any significant amount of abuse. The infinitesimal number of people who might be considered hypochondriacs should not be deterred either, because they are sick, too, only in a different way. They need a doctor, just as someone with a real illness does. They particularly need a psychiatrist.

To suggest that deterrent fees will correct abuses of the use of hospital beds is to ask us to believe the unbelievable. No patient can admit himself to hospital or stay in hospital one day longer than his doctor says he can. If there are abuses in the use of hospital beds, charging a patient extra for something over which he has no control is both callous and unjust.

In the short time available to me I should like to call one witness—Dr. Neilson, head of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission. I quote from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail on November 3, 1964.

> Frivolous use of hospital beds in this province is a minor problem. Criticism of such abuses has been exaggerated.

The report continues:

> Dr. Neilson went on to suggest to the hospital association members that where such abuse did exist it could be blamed on their failure to set up proper admission standards.

In 1961 the Hall commission was empowered by a Conservative government to recommend such measures, consistent with the constitutional division of legislative powers in Canada, as the commissioners believed would ensure that the best possible health care would be available to all Canadians. In its report the commission recommended, as a primary objective of national policy, a comprehensive, universal health services program to achieve the highest possible health standards for all our people.

The commission came out strongly against co-insurance or deterrent payments which, the report stated, would simply deter the poor and have no effect on the unnecessary demands of those in the middle and high income categories. Such a policy would mean that Canada was simply continuing to ration health services on the basis of ability to pay. This position was subsequently endorsed by the Canadian Welfare Council.

I submit that this principle was accepted by the federal government on the day in 1966 when the Medical Care Act was passed. The criteria then established included comprehensiveness of medical service, universal coverage, administration by a public authority and portability between provinces. The imposition of deterrent fees negates the principle that provincial plans must be universal—that the provinces must make health services accessible to all without regard to financial circumstances. In giving effect to the medicare plan the federal government is rightly accepting responsibility to see to it that every citizen in Canada no matter where he might reside, will not be denied the basic right to reasonable access to hospital and medical care. According to the act of 1966, reasonable access means financial access.

Each province has a perfect right to establish whatever kind of hospital or medical care plan it wishes. But if a province chooses to implement a plan which is unfair or unjust to the consumer of those services, then that province should not be aided and abetted by the resources of the federal plan. The effect of this resolution, should it be agreed to by this house, would be to ask the federal government to consider making amendments to its legislation.

The result would be that the province of Saskatchewan, for example, would have to choose either to continue to collect $7 million dollars worth of blood money from the sick each year or to get $15 million from the federal government under the national medicare legislation. I hope hon. members will agree that these amendments to the federal legislation need to be made so that the unjust treatment of the sick, the poor, the young and the old, can no longer be meted out by provinces which wish to share in our federal plan.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, this motion put forward by the hon. member for Regina Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) would have the effect of telling the provinces that they cannot impose utilization fees in respect of hospital and medical services and still expect to receive a contribution to their insurance funds from the federal government.

I suspect the hon. member's motion has been precipitated by the establishment of utilization fees during the past year in Saskatchewan, from which province the hon. member comes. Now that the fees are a fact of life in that province we have this motion before us in Ottawa for consideration.

We need to consider the motion in terms of what would be desirable for the country as a whole. In doing so we must realize that Canada is a diverse country with wealthy areas and poorer sections. If this motion were adopted we might be preventing some of the poorer provinces from establishing a medical care program; they might be able to afford to do so if utilization fees were permitted, but if they were prevented from charging such fees they might decide they could not go ahead with a provincial scheme.

Let us for a few minutes consider the history of hospital insurance. When the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was passed by parliament it was drafted in a form which included the necessary guarantees to ensure that services would be provided on a uniform basis to all residents and had regard for the fact that under our constitution hospital care comes within the sphere of provincial legislation. For this reason it was particularly important to respect existing practices as much as possible, provided these did not conflict with the basic purposes of the federal program.

The federal hospital insurance program was preceded by several provincially administered plans, notably the two programs in Saskatchewan and British Columbia. In Alberta too a program was in operation prior to the inception of the federal plan. At that time two of these three programs were providing insured services in hospitals subject to the payment of a modest utilization fee.

Therefore provision was made in the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act for these so-called deterrent or utilization fees, which were described in the law as authorized charges. In order to sign an agreement under the act the provinces were required, in a schedule to the agreement, to set out the actual amounts of these authorized charges, thus enabling the federal government to be assured that the amount of the charges would remain at a nominal level.

Furthermore, in revising the formula on which the federal contribution is calculated, regard was had to the per capita amount of authorized charges in a province by reducing the federal contribution where such charges were levied.

In section 4(a) (ii) of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act it will be noted that the federal contribution, which in part is based on 25 per cent of the per capita cost of in-patient services in the province, is described as being "less the per capita amount of authorized charges in respect thereof." The effect of this provision is that provinces which impose authorized charges receive from the federal government, by way of a contribution, an amount which is less than that to which they would have been entitled had they not levied an authorized charge.

It is of interest to note that only two provinces and one of the territories made provision in their respective laws for authorized charges during the first decade of the program. Only in the last year has Saskatchewan also chosen to levy such a charge. In all circumstances, however, the charges are subject to the terms of the federal-provincial agreement, thus ensuring the maintenance of a reasonable level.

The situation with regard to the Medical Care Act is somewhat similar to that of hospital insurance in so far as the principle of provincial jurisdiction is concerned, and to the necessity of leaving to the provinces the right to operate their own programs in their own way as long as general principles are maintained. The general principles do not extend to the details of provincial financing, except in so far as ensuring that there are no financial obstacles imposed to insured services.

The Medical Care Act, unlike the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, does not envisage the use of the agreement mechanism, which had been a feature of shared cost health and welfare programs over a period of some years. Thus the federal government lacks the same opportunity, made possible through the hospital insurance agreements, to judge the level of authorized charges. In order to compensate for this lack, however, the Medical Care Act does require that insured services be provided to all residents upon uniform terms and conditions on a basis.

—that does not impede or preclude, either directly or indirectly whether by charges made to insured persons or otherwise reasonable access to insured services by insured persons.

The effect of this provision in section 4(1)(b) of the Medical Care Act is to permit the federal government to consider that one of the essential principles has been breached, in the event that a province should impose deterrent or co-insurance charges at a level which impedes access to insured services.

Furthermore the formula for the calculation of the per capita cost of insured services, as set out in section 5(2)(a), specifies that this shall be based on costs incurred by the province. If a co-insurance or deterrent charge is levied, the income from such charges is not considered to have been incurred by the province and therefore does not form a part of the amount on which the federal contribution is based. The effect of an authorized charge, therefore, both under the hospital insurance legislation and the medical care legislation is to make such a levy a disadvantage to the province in so far as the amount of the federal contribution is concerned.

As an ideal, Mr. Speaker, I believe we all like the idea of free medical and hospital care insurance programs, but we have to take the matter of human nature into consideration. It is not uncommon for people to go to a doctor even though they have nothing wrong with them.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Foster: We have to consider the diverse nature of our country. We have a federal state because our country is so diverse. We make provision for the provinces to carry out the programs the best way they can within their jurisdiction. I believe this is primarily a provincial matter and that we should allow the provinces to decide how they will administer their respective programs, because it is constitutionally their responsibility.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on the motion of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). We listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments he put forward, but I think we have to keep in mind certain other facts. There are facts on both sides of the coin. For instance we have seen Great Britain go full cycle. The medical authorities there are now imposing deterrent fees for drugs. So the problem of what is to be done about galloping hospital costs and medical care costs is not a closed book.

Any form of so-called free hospitalization or free medical care constitutes in effect an open ended program which can escalate very quickly without proper and necessary controls. It is a fact of life that where you have third parties who do the paying there does not appear to be the same concern about the costs of the plan involved. Previous to 1959 there was no so-called—and wrongly called—free hospitalization federally. The patient had a hospital pre-paid plan—Blue Cross or some other plan. There were certain checks on this, but the costs even then went up with those plans. Blue Cross was selective, as it operated on a group plan, mostly with payroll deductions.

With the advent of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act the costs began to skyrocket. In 1953, for instance, before the measure was enacted, the cost of active treatment hospitalization in Canada was $280.4 million, in mental hospitals it was $57.8 million and in the federal hospitals $36.4 million, making total hospital costs of $404 million in that year. Then, in 1958, with the advent of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, the active treatment hospitalization cost $422.9 million; mental treatment was $99 million and the t.b. hospital service $30.4 million. Federal hospitals cost $48.4 million, and the total hospital care across Canada cost $640.1 million.

In 1963 active treatment hospitals and diagnostic services cost $900.1 million, over three times more than in 1953. Mental treatment hospitalization cost $163 million, or a little less than three times more. Tuberculosis hospitalization treatment was less than it was ten years previously, falling back to $28.1 million. Federal hospitalization was $69.6 million, or just under twice as much. All hospital care was $1,154,100,000.

In 1965 hospitalization and diagnostic services had risen to $1,125,900,000, increasing at the rate of over $100 million per year. This is of concern to everyone in this house as well as to the federal and provincial governments and to the individuals who have to pay the premiums.

Physicians' fees rose from $176.6 million in 1953 to $545.1 million in 1965, and now in 1968 are estimated to be around $1 billion. This does not include dentistry which cost in 1965, the last year for which I have the figures, $160 million, nor does it include paramedical services such as osteopaths, chiropractors, optometrists and physiotherapists. Physiotherapists are now included in special cases, as are chiropractors, osteopaths and optometrists.

What is the reason for these escalating costs? First, there does not seem to be the same careful surveillance of accounts when third parties do the paying. The second reason is the over-utilization of beds which are for active treatment. Surgical wing operation costs far more than medical care operation. We are doing surgical work which was only dreamed of ten years ago, such as transplantation of organs such as kidneys and hearts, with the required operative teams, the elaborate scientific equipment and the intensive nursing care units. Probably in the next ten years we will be transplanting every organ with the exception of the brain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is hope for the Liberals yet.

Mr. Rynard: All this is tremendously expensive and greatly adds to hospital costs, but it is worth while and it saves lives. We are keeping people alive today who in 1953 would have died. It is true that we still have transplant rejections and this has to be overcome before the operation can be called anything but palliative.

From the medical point of view we are now keeping people living longer with the newer drugs developed since 1948, and every year we have added to our armamentarium. Actually, outside of anatomy and basic facts, 50 per cent of our medical knowledge has gone out the window in about eight years. This creates a problem in that we have continuously to re-educate not only the medical profession but we have continuously to train new teachers and do research to keep up with the vast amount of new knowledge. New ideas and new equipment to meet the discoveries and the new challenges are all tremendously costly. There must be no cutting of costs in this field.

Dr. E. J. Hinchey, F.R.C.S., a young Canadian surgeon, one of our bright young surgeons in Canada, and a graduate of Queen's University, said that our problem is that we are not spending enough on research, that we are not keeping up with the training of research teachers and that we should be spending ten times more on research than we are doing today.

There must be no cutting of costs in this field. This is a research oriented field. In the care of the chronically ill all of the scientifically equipped rooms are not necessary. Nursing skills are not as urgently needed and more nurses aides and other help could be used. Cheaper construction in all hospitals is a requirement. Some buildings are outdated before they are completed. The federal government should have something to say about the cost of the buildings. In 1958 the Conservative government doubled the amount of grants for the construction of hospitals. This government should have something to say about the millions of dollars which have gone for that purpose because this is a shared program.

It is true that the small grants which are made of $2,000 a bed, and so on, are minimal today. At that time, if I remember correctly, it cost about $7,000 a bed to build a hospital. Today the cost is close to $15,000 or $17,000 a bed, and no change in the grant. We can see how tremendously the costs have risen. We should seriously consider cutting down capital construction to enable the building of hospitals for $8,000 or $9,000 a bed for those who do not require intensive care. Many patients require treatment with the newer drugs but they do not require oxygen masks on tents or intensive care units. We should cut those costs, as well as nursing care. Many of the chronic cases are kept in hospitals although they could be sent home, if they were provided with proper nursing care. This is a field which should be explored. Nurses aides could be trained to do this work very well.

The emergency departments in most hospitals today are overcrowded simply because we do not have enough doctors to go around. The reason for this is that there are not enough teachers, and medical schools are crowded and cannot take in more students to train as doctors. At present we are training about 900 doctors a year, we lose 200 to the United States and we bring in 600 from foreign countries. Most of them are not adequately trained according to our standards, and yet we allow them to practise, instead of building our schools and training our students from every area in our country. We would be getting much better medical care if we did this. However, we do not do it, and I was very annoyed to see the government was cutting back on some of the research grants, and that cutbacks are being made in the health resources fund. This is a backward step. We should be supporting the recommendations of the Hall commission report which made reference to the training of more and more doctors. We have fallen far short of the schedule laid down in that report, yet the government has seen fit to bring in medicare without the proper facilities and personnel to carry out the extra work.

Doctors are overworked because of an increased utilization of their services. Because of the increased number of people using emergency departments, hospital costs have increased. Many of these people could be treated in a doctor's office, but they are crowding into these emergency rooms. In large centres like Toronto these people might have to wait from one to four hours before they are seen. It is almost impossible in any major city in Canada for a patient to see a doctor after 6 p.m.

An hon. Member: Or on Saturday or Sunday.

Mr. Rynard: Unless you have your own doctor and he happens to be available you are almost always sent to the emergency department, where on many occasions you are admitted to the hospital. Many of these patients are seen by an intern who is not quite sure of his problem. All of us know there have been a number of cases where people have been sent home, and some have died. Had they been in the hospital with proper care and treatment some probably would not have died. This situation makes doctors a little leery. When they see a patient in the emergency department they will very often say: Well, he is here, perhaps I should admit him. Admissions are increased in this way because the doctors do not want to take a chance. The government has done little to correct this problem.

To recapitulate, approximately 900 doctors are graduated each year, but we are losing about 200 per year to the United States. These are the doctors who want research facilities and the opportunities to do research or teach. I refer to people like Dr. Hinchey who, as I have said, was a graduate from Queen's University. He is now gone to working on research at Royal Victoria hospital, Montreal. I sincerely hope he will stay in this country.

This summer when I was in New York I saw many doctors who graduated from Canadian universities. They are now on the staffs of United States hospitals and they are doing an excellent job.

This whole problem is like a two faced coin. Will such a deterrent help? We brought in medicare and everybody immediately said that we were going to get free hospitalization and free medicare. Did we do the wrong thing as parliamentarians and have we falsely represented this measure? Medical care and hospitalization are not free. There is nothing man-made in this world that is free.

Again I ask whether this deterrent would help. Perhaps better supervision and control of our spending problems would be of more use. Would proper control and better supervision of some of these plans cut down the cost? Would the use of more nurses aides in homes cut down the cost of some of this work? Are these things more important than a deterrent? There is a serious question in this regard, and yet there is a serious problem to solve, in costs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question? In view of the excellent case he has made for increased money for research and for the great things that can be done in the field of medicine, does he not feel that this should be paid for by all of us rather than by imposing the extra cost of deterrent fees on the people who have to take advantage of these services?

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, provincial governments must have something to say about this matter. Health comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces, but we must not stint on research or education in any way because they are the most important things. Many other things flow from these activities. If we will have more doctors, and more research they can earn millions of dollars which could easily be used as a substitute for the deterrent fee about which the hon. member is talking. I hope that answers the hon. member's question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is moving in the right direction.

• (5:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. J. A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, it is often said, with regard to the business of the house, that we abuse the right to speak and that often, we use it for trifles. Many newspapermen poke fun at the house, saying that the members are not always serious in their interventions. I doubt that that can be said this evening about the debate on the notice of motion moved by the member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin).

I listened with great interest to the speech of the member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), a new-comer to the house, who speaks like a conscientious researcher and whose arguments are indeed very serious.

The intervention of the member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), as usual, is that of a practitioner who, obviously, has far more reference material than the average member, and we always follow with special interest the statements he presents calmly, sedately, just as a university professor would. We will undeniably be the richer for this debate.

Unless I am mistaken, the notice of motion of the member for Regina-Lake Centre stems from a deep concern for the welfare of the Canadian people. The honourable member certainly deserves congratulations, although the house would not be justified in legislating on all good causes. I feel that the possibilities for legislation in this house are limited by certain circumstances such as, for instance, constitutional matters or barriers, if you wish.

I should like to spend a few minutes—briefly, I am sorry to say—even though I respect the fundamental concern in this notice of motion, in demonstrating that this notice of motion is superfluous and even ill-advised, since it would encroach upon provincial jurisdictions; this cannot be accepted, and it would even run counter to certain well-known attitudes of his party. In addition, it bears the stamp of an excessive rigidity, which I would call "legislomania", if I may use that expression.

This notice of motion is useless, Mr. Speaker, as far as the federal government is concerned, if it tends to protect its own interests. In fact, I feel that the interests of the federal government are already protected by law, since the federal government contributes 50 per cent of the cost. If the provinces collect something else on what the federal government pays them, of course that will not justify the federal government to pay more than its share. That is why from the point of view of the provinces and certainly that of the federal government, that notice of motion is useless surely.

It is untimely, as I said earlier, because it constitutes inadmissible interference in the provincial field. Mr. Speaker, I believe that independently of everything that can happen in any of the provinces, it is unacceptable—and I will admit that the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre who told us about what is going on in Saskatchewan certainly impressed most of us—to go beyond the limits imposed on us by the provincial jurisdictions.

The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act were drafted and passed after consultation with the provinces. Provinces are responsible for the administration of these various acts, but I think that the federal government would be ill-advised to overlook the limits of its jurisdiction.

The member for Regina-Lake Centre spoke about the situation in his province. For my part, I know that in the province of Quebec, a general outcry would be raised if the federal government would become so meticulous that it would provide in its legislation all specific cases which might raise differences of opinions and differences in the needs of the various provinces. I think that we should emphasize what the member for Algoma said: In an immense country such as ours, conditions are not the same in all ten provinces, and a province may wish to give particular characteristics to the agreement entered upon with the federal government as, maybe, is the case in Saskatchewan.

Perhaps this is the case of my own province which has not yet been caught up by medicare. Some may feel that the provincial treasury cannot for the time being absorb the whole cost of that legislation and that besides patients must pay part of the cost. Of course, there are two schools of thought in this connection, Mr. Chairman. Some people say that the health of Canadians is a human asset which should be the concern of every Canadian and that all citizens must contribute to its conservation, as they contribute to the preservation of our natural resources. This is a just and commendable idea, Mr. Chairman. Other provinces, however, express a different viewpoint and say that the paying potential of each individual and the taxing capacity of each province must be taken into account.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, we have to recognize, in my opinion, that under such circumstances, in the majority of the provinces, such an interference, such a minute legislation on the part of the federal government, even though its motives and its concern were quite commendable, would be considered wrong and would not be accepted.

I would add, Mr. Speaker, that the notice of motion presented by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre surprises me. I will go back to my earlier remarks but I want first to suggest, in a very constructive manner, to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, that he is knocking on the wrong door. Since his concern is commendable and acceptable, he should knock on the door of the provincial governments. There must be, in his own province, a number of people who share his political philosophy and if he were to knock on the door of his provincial government, he would probably have more chance to get quicker results with regard to his proposal to this house. He should perhaps get a little more active in the election campaign and, eventually, take office in his province, so that this legislation could be implemented. At any rate, in view of the fact that the New Democratic party is not very strong in our province of Quebec, we, the Liberals, shall try on the long run to bring our provincial government to reason with regard to national health.

Mr. Chairman, I am coming back to what I said earlier. I think that the notice of motion of our colleague is inconsistent with certain well-known views of his party. In the past, for example, I was one of those who knew quite well Mr. Robert Cliche, chief of the Quebec wing of the N.D.P. I am always very interested in his political activities and I have always had much respect for the former leader of the N.D.P., Mr. Tommy Douglas. I have heard his speeches for many years and I note that there is some misunderstanding. Mr. Cliche, for example, advocates the decentralization of administrations, especially in the health and welfare fields. If the federal government would bring out such a legislation asking the province not to charge any other fees, we would immediately hear the shrill protests of the leader of the Quebec wing of the N.D.P.

That might be sufficient to make him give up the leadership of the provincial New Democratic party, because, apparently, he has a tendency lately to lean towards the M.S.A., Mr. René Levesque's movement. In fact, if I were the chief of the New Democratic party, I would be concerned with his attitudes and I would make a point of inviting him to Ottawa for a talk, because he also has ambiguous attitudes.

While Mr. Tommy Douglas has told us many times, in public statements, that he wanted a strong federal government, and, in other occasions, that he was in favour of a special status for Quebec, he was torn between two worries: that of granting to Quebec powers that it does not already have, and of ensuring at the same time a strong government in a number of fields.

Therefore, I say there is a certain amount of confusion therein. I realize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, who is new in the house, has not had like us the opportunity to analyse all the attitudes, all the positions taken by the leaders of his party, but my feeling is that his present notice of motion must sound false to those who have followed the course of events. In concluding Mr. Speaker I shall add that his notice of motion is far too rigid; I shall call this "legislomania". There are all kinds of manias. For instance, we have referred to Trudeaumania. Well, in this case it is Providence which wanted that state of mind to suddenly emerge in Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mongrain: —in 1968, a state of mind which seems to bring about an improvement in the physical and mental health of some people. You only have to look at the faces of those who sit on the front benches of the opposition in this house. It is a happy state of mind and nobody died as a result. On the contrary, everyone felt stimulated to act constructively.

But, Mr. Speaker, "legislomania" or our mania of legislating on a lot of small details in order to improve the administration of legislation in this country will, in the end, pester everybody and limit everyone's activity, particularly that of the provincial and municipal governments, thus doing more harm than good. There must be, somewhere, a little latitude left to provincial governments, municipalities and private enterprises.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my conclusion is that the notice of motion of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, even though its intent is worthy of praise, is not acceptable because it is not necessary. It represents an incursion in the provincial jurisdiction, which is incompatible with certain positions taken by the leaders of the member's party. Furthermore, it is excessively strict—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for consideration of private members' business has now expired.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house leader would indicate the business for tomorrow.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we will continue to completion, I hope, the committee stage of the bill with regard to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, thereafter we will call second reading of the bill to amend the Farm Credit Act and carry that through second reading and committee stages.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX "A"

HOUSE OF COMMONS—UNVEILING OF PORTRAIT OF FORMER PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Stanfield and colleagues, Mr. Speaker Deschatelets, honoured guests, members of parliament, members of the Senate, ladies and gentlemen: On behalf of the members of the House of Commons, and if my colleague Mr. Speaker Deschatelets, will allow me, on behalf of our colleagues in the Senate, I welcome you to this important and historic occasion. I extend particularly warm greetings to one whose portrait we will not unveil today, but who in my view is equally deserving of this recognition, namely Mrs. Diefenbaker.

We are very pleased to have with us today Mr. Horne, the renowned Canadian artist who has produced what is said to be a very fine portrait. Together with Mr. and Mrs. Diefenbaker we are all of course gratified that so many of their close personal friends have found it possible to be here with us today to share the honour bestowed on the former prime minister by the government and by the parliament of our country.

[Translation]

Ladies and gentlemen, it is fitting that this ceremony should be held on the very threshold of the House of Commons, where the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker gave his best to his country.

The portrait to be unveiled presently will be a special reminder of the notable contribution of a former prime minister to the Canadian parliament during more than a quarter of a century.

The parliamentary colleagues of Mr. Diefenbaker, those of yesterday as well as those of today, unite in congratulating him and in wishing him many more years of distinguished labour in the service of Canada.

[English]

I now invite the Hon. Mr. Stanfield to say a word.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Prime Minister and Mrs. Diefenbaker: This is a gathering, of course, in honour of a prime minister of Canada, but if we were gathered today in another gallery to honour the relatively small number of Canadians who have worked effectively and with statesmanship in order to strengthen parliament, we would still be gathering today to honour Mr. John Diefenbaker. If I have one regret concerning you, Mr. Diefenbaker, and perhaps I may be permitted one regret in this connection, it is that your career before you became prime minister, before you became party leader, as a member of parliament and as a fighter for civil liberties, is relatively unknown to a whole generation of younger Canadians. This is their loss because it makes them far less familiar than they ought to be with a great chapter in the fight for the enlargement of liberty and freedom in our country.

Mr. Diefenbaker's public career is one of contrasts. On the one hand, as party leader and prime minister of the country he has changed the nature of politics, indeed the nature of our country, whereas on the other hand in his capacity as a member of parliament he has fought long and constantly to preserve the old and best traditions of parliamentary life in our country. So, in the name of your friends and admirers, Mr. Diefenbaker, I salute you today; I salute you as a member of parliament, as a leader of an important party, the leader of the opposition, as a great prime minister of Canada; a man who in all those capacities has left an indelible mark upon the history of our country.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker, Mrs. Diefenbaker, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen: Just a few days ago in Regina I had the pleasure of visiting the buildings that had been the homestead of the Diefenbaker family. I thought that Canadians in general, and students of history in particular, would be grateful to the government for having preserved these buildings and having permitted the people to visit them in such a convenient fashion. As I looked at the buildings, I was impressed perhaps most by their very unimpressiveness. This, none the less, represents the very central aspect of life in Canada. They are the kind of buildings that remind us of the qualities developed in Canadians who were brought up in them, qualities of strength, self-sufficiency and great independence of character. It takes a lot of imagination to think that one who had begun in such a homestead was to become the prime minister of Canada. The long road from those buildings to 24 Sussex street tells us a great deal about the man who walked that road, and about the kind of country in which he lives.

I don't think we are able to say that our country provides equality for all, but a look at the history of those small buildings and their inhabitants makes us realize that our country is one that does provide equality of opportunity. It is a great thing to think of our country as one which can permit a man to come from such humble origins and to reach the highest elected office in our land. I know, Mr. Diefenbaker, that this portrait will be hung in a gallery along with the portraits of other men who perhaps began a rung or two higher on the economic ladder. I think your presence here, and the presence of your portrait amongst those others says a great deal not only about our country but about your great strength of character and your contribution to the history of this country.

[Translation]

I should like to say that, a long time ago, I heard Mr. Diefenbaker speak. Even at the time when I left university he could be identified with the struggle for the little people, for the humble people, for those who were in need of protection against the authorities.

Later, he brought that reputation to parliament. He identified himself with the Bill of Rights and, throughout his whole career in parliament, he distinguished himself through his constant struggle for the rights of the individual and the protection of minorities.

[English]

I will have to leave to others, sir, the privilege of talking about you as leader of a party and of a government, but I am qualified I think, to talk about you as a parliamentarian. I have had the privilege for the past few weeks of sitting across the aisle from you in the house, and I can testify to your great skill in that role. I sometimes wish that equality of opportunity would incite you, sir, to make sure that more ministers than myself learn by experience of your skills.

However, I do want to say that today is an important occasion. The rest of us here—Mr. Stanfield, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Caouette—are here as representatives of our parties and the people of Canada. Mr. Diefenbaker is here as a great Canadian. He is here as one who has contributed in a lasting way to our history, and it is in this capacity that we are privileged to honour him today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: On behalf of the House of Commons, the Senate and the parliament of Canada it is an honour and a privilege for me to accept the gift of this portrait to parliament from the government of Canada.

I now invite Mr. Diefenbaker to say a few words.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Caouette and my leader, the leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition: I am deeply touched by what has been said here today. It makes parliament what it is. To the Prime Minister may I say I was greatly taken by your observations when you were in Regina and visited my parents' humble home. I think it was an aphorism which will last for a long time. It was spontaneous, courteous, and humorous: "Sometimes when he is in the House I wish he were living here".

However, I want to tell the Prime Minister that from now on until further notice I am going to be the soul of moderation and I am going to await the arrival of the several ministers in absentia. I will do all this with that customary moderation that I always endeavour to display, but in greater form than heretofore, until I give further notice.

After the kind words that have been spoken here I think of the fact that in the years ahead each of those who has been prime minister will have a monument on parliament hill.

The Prime Minister mentioned my boyhood home. My father was a teacher who, in his day and generation, taught two who eventually became Prime Ministers of Canada, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King and me. History will tell in which case he did the worst job!

I think of the unveilings which will take place in the years ahead, and if the spirit that is present here today becomes translated into sculpture I can see the Prime Minister and me arm in arm with Lafontaine and Baldwin on parliament hill.

I understood originally that the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson was also to be present on this occasion but circumstances have prevented his being here. Perhaps it would have been better if he had been here, since it may well be that the words of Benjamin Franklin uttered in 1775 may apply, where he said. "If you do not hang together you will hang separately".

The present occasion, for one in my position, is a touching experience. In the spirit of the occasion we see a manifestation of the spirit of parliament. Those who know not parliament do not realize that in the cross-fire of daily parliamentary life we, and I am speaking for all of us, form an immense admiration for those who sit opposite us. We may disagree on the course that should be followed; our views on many matters may differ, yet there is one matter on which we all agree: There is no institution to compare with parliament for the preservation of values and truth.

It is not for me to judge the quality of Mr. Horne's portrait or to offer my opinion about it. I may say that, considering the subject matter the artist had available to him, he did a magnificent job. I thank the Prime Minister for his courtesy. It may be appropriate to say that perhaps some measure of masculine pulchritude made it possible for the placing of my portrait here. The efforts of those who in the past produced portraits, drawings and caricatures of me will be obliterated by the realistic skills that Mr. Horne has brought to bear in producing the portrait that is before us.

Parliament is the place where we form deep and abiding affections for those who sit opposite us. We know the contribution they are making and the responsibilities they bear. I want to say to you, Mr. Prime Minister, that though you, who in common with 14 other men who have been termed prime minister of Canada, are adept at asking questions, in the last few weeks you have shown an adeptness at answering them that does honour to you, and perhaps not so much to those of us who have put the questions.

I wish to thank all who are present here, our leader for his kind words and Mr. Speaker for that capacity which he possesses in such abounding measure—his kindliness and courtesy. To you again, Mr. Prime Minister, from the bottom of my heart, I express my appreciation.

After all, we are here for one purpose, whether we were raised in humbleness, or in circumstances which no one could expect would lead to the highest office of state. Whatever our background, to sum up the situation in a way which appeals to me, each of us in this country without regard to race, religion or colour, has an opportunity for service. It is up to us in our day and generation to play our part in bringing about a greater, more wonderful Canada such, as in our imagination, we can see today.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, allow me to thank you for your cordial welcome.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Before closing, ladies and gentlemen, may I transmit to you the regrets which were sent to me earlier by the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson that he could not be here today because of a long-standing invitation to address the Canadian club in Toronto. It will be his turn to be honoured very soon; we hope this ceremony will be held next week, but you will be advised in advance.

I take the opportunity to extend an invitation to my colleagues; I hope to see them in the railway committee room at seven o'clock, when we have another important function to perform.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 10, 1968

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF GROUP OF GERMAN PARLIAMENTARIANS

Mr. Speaker: May I bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a most welcome visitor to Canada, Herr Eugen Gerstenmaier, president of the Bundestag.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The president is accompanied by a distinguished delegation of German parliamentarians, and I should like to salute them as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: This visit gives us an opportunity to reciprocate, even if only in a very limited way, the generous hospitality extended to many Canadian government and parliamentary delegations to Germany during the last few years.

[Translation]

The Canadian members of parliament are indeed gratified and happy to welcome our distinguished parliamentary colleagues from Germany. Their visit gives us the opportunity to bring back to mind the considerable contribution of Canadians of German origin to all aspects of our national life. We therefore extend the heartiest welcome to you, Mr. President Gerstenmaier, and to your distinguished colleagues.

[English]

It is our hope that your stay in Canada will be interesting, pleasant and fruitful and that it will contribute to the strengthening of bonds of friendship between the peoples of Canada and of Germany.

THE LATE ARIEH ESHEL

EXPRESSIONS OF REGRET ON DEATH OF ISRAELI AMBASSADOR

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I draw to the attention of the house the passing away last evening of the Israeli ambassador to Canada, Mr. Arieh Eshel. I know that all members of the house will wish to join in conveying our sympathy and regret to Mrs. Eshel and the immediate family at their grievous loss, and to the government and people of Israel. Mr. Eshel was a devoted servant of his country who had held three ambassadorial postings in this hemisphere—in Uruguay, Brazil and New York—before coming here. His time with us has unhappily been cut short, but we shall long remember his vivacity, warmth and dedication. As a mark of respect the flag on the Peace Tower is being flown at half mast today and will remain at half mast tomorrow.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): May I on behalf of members of this party join with the Prime Minister in expressing our regret and sense of sorrow over the sudden loss to the people of Israel. The great record of public service of Mr. Eshel which made him so effective in this country in facilitating the relations between our peoples will long be remembered, and we feel a deep sense of sadness at his passing.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to join with the Prime Minister in expressing the deep regret of my hon. friends and myself over the sudden death of Mr. Eshel. Like other members of this house I had the pleasure of meeting the Israeli ambassador during his short stay in this country, and I was impressed by his devotion to the cause of his people and to the cause of peace in the world. My hon. friends and I extend our condolences to Mrs. Eshel, who in her own right has served her country in many parts of the world, particularly at the United Nations, and to their children and the people of Israel at their loss.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF SPEECH AT UN BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to table in English and in French copies of the text of the speech I made yesterday during the general debate in the United Nations Assembly.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the documents to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Before we leave this order of business may I say one word. I had hoped the Secretary of State for External Affairs was about to make a statement to the house on his visit to New York, and particularly on his discussions concerning Nigeria and Biafra. I wonder whether the minister would consider doing so now.

Mr. Sharp: I have been asked to appear before the committee which has been charged with consideration of this subject, and I have a statement ready to make on that occasion.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): On a point of order, I wonder whether the house would consent to having the minister's statement printed as an appendix to Hansard today so we might all have a chance to see it.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the state- to be made by the minister today at a later hour be appended to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nesbitt: Your Honour has misunderstood me. I was referring to the minister's speech at the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of document above referred to, see appendix.]

CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, LIMITATION OF POWERS, ETC.

Hon. Jack Davis (for the Postmaster General) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-5 (from the Senate), to amend the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EASTERN TOWNSHIPS, QUE.—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, to discuss a specific matter of pressing public importance.

I ask leave to propose the adjournment of the house because I consider the economic situation in the eastern townships to be of public importance. According to a letter I received from the municipal council of the town of Coaticook and several other associations concerning the economic situation of that town, an industry now giving employment to 225 people is due to close down early in 1969. Of course, pressures are being brought to bear with regard to the fate of that industry. We are asked to make the necessary interventions with the government authorities, with a view to solving the confused economic situation of the small town of Coaticook. It has a population of 7,000 and 225 family heads work for that small industry which is to close down; the consequences would be disastrous for that municipality, which needs all its industries and labour.

At the same time, I speak on behalf of the whole area of the eastern townships with regard to the strike at the Domtar company which started on July 18, 1968, and which affects the municipalities of East Angus and Windsor Mills. At East Angus, the industry employs 440 people and 760 at Windsor Mills. The Domtar employees in East Angus and Windsor Mills have lost, up to now in salaries about $1,625,000.

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry to interrupt the honourable member for Compton. As he knows, according to the rules, he must indicate to the Chair and to his colleagues what specific motion he intends to move with regard to the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I move seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the house do now adjourn its proceedings to discuss an urgent and pressing matter, namely the economic situation in the eastern townships.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not want to be unfair to the honourable member who has just moved a motion of adjournment, but he knows that under paragraph 7 of citation No. 100 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 4th edition, a motion of this kind is subject to certain precisions, and I wonder if the honourable member would like to indicate to what extent, in his opinion, there is urgency of debate.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to tell the house how the citizens of the eastern townships feel about the urgency of the debate.

I have here a letter from the secretary treasurer of the municipality of Coaticook and I would like to read some parts of it:

In the absence of Mr. Dumont who is at home sick, I have been instructed by the council to send you a copy of a letter addressed to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in Ottawa about the shutdown of the Penmans Ltd. plant in Coaticook which leaves 225 heads of families out of work—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must give as briefly as possible his arguments in favour of having a debate today instead of later this week or even next week. It is on that particular point that his remarks must bear at this time.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I have many other arguments. For instance, the newspaper La Tribune in the eastern townships published a score of articles on that subject. In fact, they were published in the following issues: Monday, September 16, page 16; Wednesday, September 18, page 20, Thursday, September 19, pages 1 and 9, Friday, September 20, pages 1 and 2, Thursday, September 26, page 2; Tuesday, October 1, page 2, Wednesday, October 2, page 2, Thursday, October 3, pages 2 and 7, Saturday, October 5, page 4, and Tuesday, October 8, page 5.

At this point, I want to quote that of September 20—

Mr. Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member and remind him once again that he must, immediately and as briefly as possible, point out to the Chair why he believes that a debate must be held today, and why we should adjourn the business of the house this very day for the purpose of discussing the situation he has just drawn to our attention.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it would take too long to describe to the house in detail at this time the situation in the eastern townships. It has been described in all the newspapers of the area and it prevails not only in the town of Coaticook, but in East Angus, Windsor Millet and many other towns in the eastern townships.

We are raising the question because the problem is not a local one concerning one municipality, but a general one concerning the economy of the whole area. That is why we are asking for an adjournment of the business of the house in order to allow us to give details to the hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Having listened to the hon. member for Compton and to the arguments which the hon. member for Shefford has just submitted I think I am now ready to make a ruling on this motion.

I must remind the hon. members of the provisions of citation 100 (8) of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms and I quote:

I do not think that, under the standing orders of 1882, a motion or a subject of this kind, having such a wide scope, was ever contemplated. What I think was contemplated, was an occurrence of some sudden emergency—

The hon. member would like us to adjourn in order to consider a situation which in his own terms has been going on for some time. The hon. member for Shefford referred to a general crisis rather than to a specific problem. Under the circumstances, I regretfully believe that it is not possible to accept the motion of the hon. member for Compton. Besides, I know that during the next few days, there will be some general debates in this house and the hon. members for Compton and Shefford will have the opportunity to let us know their views on this important problem.

EXTERNAL AID

NIGERIA—PROVISION OF CANADIAN HERCULES AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I preface my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs by welcoming him back to the house. We are not only pleased because of his presence here but because we have been concerned about the Prime Minister, who has been labouring with unnecessary burdens during the question period in the last few days.

Would the minister please tell the house when he expects the first Hercules aircraft to be loaned to the Red Cross to leave for Nigeria, specifically Fernando Po and Sao Tome?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we hope the Canadian Hercules aircraft will be on the way to Nigeria within 48 hours with a reconnaissance party to survey the conditions of air strips in federal and rebel held areas in Nigeria as well as Fernando Po. A second aircraft is to be placed on standby for possible early departure.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell the house the reasons for the delay in dispatching aircraft with supplies, and tell us what the need is for reconnaissance which he suggested would be the first job done by the Hercules?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the Hercules will be very valuable in the movement of supplies. It is not the lack of food in the area that is important at this time, it is the lack of transportation. The aircraft is going to be there for service, and it will be understood by hon. members that this type of aircraft is of a special kind. It is most important, if we are to make the best use of it, to know the exact conditions under which it will be operating. There is no question, however, about its operation as such.

Mr. Lewis: I should like to ask the minister whether any conditions were imposed by the Nigerian authorities as to where the planes are to fly from and where they are to land. Are they to be flown by day or by night or both?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there is only one general condition, and that is that an arrangement must be made between the international committee of the Red Cross and the government of Nigeria.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax): Will the minister indicate whether the Hercules or other types of aircraft will be offered to relief groups other than the International Red Cross?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the general understanding with most governments is that it is preferable to channel all our relief through the International Red Cross. That is the accepted international practice.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the honourable Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

While the honourable minister was at the United Nations in New York, did he get in touch with representatives of the United Nations or certain African countries, in order to obtain, through pressure or otherwise, a cease-fire between Nigeria and Biafra?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of question which I think would be better answered before the committee. I am sure it will be asked there, and I think it deserves a longer answer than Your Honour would permit at this time.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, will the minister advise this house as to the number of aircraft that will be placed at the disposal of the International Red Cross and/or other relief agencies?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government has not yet made a decision, but there will be at least two.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

In a statement on the troubles in Biafra, the Secretary of State for External Affairs reaffirmed that Canada would support Nigeria against the secessionist rebels. Could the Prime Minister tell us if the policy of his government is the same as that of his minister, namely to keep on murdering Biafrans, or if it consists in helping Biafrans to free themselves from federal Nigerian troops.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think that question illustrates one of the most important reasons why we do not want to get mixed up in the politics of Nigeria.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the former prime minister indicated that the relief to be provided by Canada will be of limited assistance, will the minister seriously consider the provision of more aircraft for relief purposes?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as will appear, I hope, in the committee, the greatest problem of relief remains; because the most serious conditions are going to arise in the future rather than now, and I believe this country and the international community as a whole are going to be engaged in one of the most important relief operations the world has ever seen.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, will the minister please tell the house if food presently to be loaded on ships in Halifax will be sent to Nigeria-Biafra by plane before October 13?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this shipment has been co-ordinated with the International Red Cross. The food is being shipped at the time most suitable to the International Red Cross, by sea. It is not necessary to move it by air.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question concerns the transport to Biafra of relief supplies. Is it the intention of the government to provide helicopters as well, since the problem seems to be one of distribution in Biafra and not just delivery?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the particular request we have had from the International Red Cross has been for Hercules planes. That seems to be the aircraft that we in Canada can best supply.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REPORTED RECALL BY FORD COMPANY IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to direct to the Minister of Transport. Having in mind the fact reported this week that some 14,000 Mustang and Cougar motor cars have been recalled by the Ford Motor Company in the United States, would the minister ask his department to look into the situation as it affects Canada and make an early report to the house on the matter?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to make the necessary inquiries.

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN EASTERN TOWNSHIPS, QUE.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put my question to the honourable Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is a member from the eastern townships, but in view of his absence, I shall direct it to his parliamentary secretary.

I should like to know whether the present government intends to introduce, in the near future, legislation to stimulate and help the textile industry in the eastern townships, since it has now reached a point where it is losing rather than gaining ground.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me an identical question was put yesterday.

PORTNEUF, QUE.—BRIEF FROM ECONOMIC COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Has the minister studied the brief submitted by the Economic Council of Portneuf concerning the economic situation in that area? If so, is he in a position to let us know the decision of his department?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I study all the briefs sent to me, including that one.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL MONEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the question of the Minister of Transport in his capacity as the minister responsible for housing. I have had an opportunity to give the minister notice of this question. Will the minister tell the house whether any part of the $170 million to be made available to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as announced by the minister last Friday in this house, represents any additional money to be provided by C.M.H.C. for overall housing starts this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me, again, that this question was asked yesterday.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I very carefully checked this matter, and I believe the question was not raised yesterday in this exact form.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it does not represent an increase in the capital budget, but it does represent an increase in the expenditure for the present year over what had been planned before.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

EFFECT OF U.S. REJECTION OF ANTI-DUMPING PROVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. I ask the minister whether the rejection by the United States Senate of the anti-dumping provisions in connection with the Kennedy round on the general agreement on trade and tariffs will affect the Canadian government's position; and if so, will changes be made?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this question as notice.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister do everything in his power to have the white paper on the Kennedy round anti-dumping legislation referred to the standing committee?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, there have already been discussions with the house leader of the hon. member's party. We would be very willing to have this matter referred to the committee immediately, without debate, after orders of the day today.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Transport but in his absence I direct it to the acting minister. Would the government give consideration to referring the report of the Canadian Transport Commission to the standing committee on transport and communications?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it would be asking too much of the hon. member to be present to ask his question the next time the Minister of Transport is here to answer questions.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grey-Simcoe.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Transport but I see he has left the chamber. Therefore I will keep my question until tomorrow.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSIDERATION OF BRIEF PREPARED BY QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right honourable Prime Minister.

Can he make a statement to the house today with regard to the study he has made of the brief prepared by Quebec officials for the federal-provincial conference next December concerning the Quebec republic?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have read the brief.

WATER RESOURCES

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON EXPORTS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Has the government changed its policy with regard to the export of water to the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is a very general question and I doubt that it should be asked at this time.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, it is a question of urgency because a rumour exists that there has been a change. I think it is important that we find out.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, implied in this question is the suggestion that there has been a change in government policy in respect of the export of water for sale to the United States. I want to assure the hon. member that there has been no such change. There is intensive study in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and other departments in respect of the present requirements of Canada for Canadian water and the projection of requirements in the future. Until these studies are completed there will be no question of the consideration of exporting water for sale.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the report of the science council stresses the great urgency of introducing legislation to deal with water pollution without further delay, is the government planning to introduce such legislation in the very near future?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as this is a matter of great importance, would the leader of the just society hurry up the minister who is responsible so we can have this dealt with very quickly?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ISSUE OF NEW SALMON FISHING LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries relating to the new regulations he has announced to control the size of the British Columbia salmon fishing fleet. The program as announced sets a top limit on the number of fishing vessels that may engage in the industry, and since objections have been raised about these new regulations, what steps does the minister propose taking to ensure that there will be no discrimination in the issuing of new licences?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the licences are those of existing boats. The boats can be traded, they can be bought or sold by anyone. There is no limitation as to the number of fishermen; we have simply set a maximum on the number of fishing vessels on the west coast engaged in catching salmon.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, if a licensed salmon fishing boat is burned or lost at sea, will a licence be granted to the new, replacement ship?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there will be no automatic granting of a licence. That particular vessel will be struck from the registry. An appeal committee has been set up to which the unfortunate owner can apply, and depending on the circumstances he may or may not obtain a new licence.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries. A few days ago I asked the minister whether he would be prepared to take the initiative in referring these proposed new regulations to the committee on fisheries when it was established. Inasmuch as the membership of that committee was announced the other day, can the minister say when he will have on the order paper a motion to refer this matter to the committee for study?

Mr. Davis: Soon, I hope, Mr. Speaker. This is a new system; it is a world first. There are probably a few wrinkles which need to be ironed out, hence I will be only too happy to see it referred to the committee and hear positive suggestions on how to improve the system.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Could the minister say when this might be?

Mr. Davis: As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF DEVCO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the importance to the people of Cape Breton of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and its policies, would the Prime Minister release the latest report so as to put an end to the persistent and disturbing rumours?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe this question was asked yesterday of the minister.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order; not only does the Prime Minister fail to get the import of the question, he fails to recognize the fact that this question was not answered. I ask him as head of the government to recognize the importance of the report of this crown company and of its policies for the future having regard for the fact that it was set up to help displaced miners. Since this government set up the crown corporation, 400 or 500 jobs have disappeared. Does he not consider it is time the report was released?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is hardly a point of order. The hon. member is making an argument in support of the suggestion that the report be released. It is an argument, not a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It would have to be a new question. I will recognize the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Would the Prime Minister consider releasing that portion of the report which deals with No. 20 colliery?

Mr. Trudeau: I would be glad to consider it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I think I can raise a legitimate point of order regarding the conduct of the government. It deals with the schedule released by the Prime Minister in respect of the attendance of ministers in the house. I wonder whether the ministers have received permission to exchange days, as did the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development with the Minister of Transport in exchanging Monday for Friday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION OF ASYLUM FOR TECHNICAL EXPERTS FROM CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the government inform the house whether it is granting asylum to defecting Czechoslovak nationals who are leaving their employment as technical experts in different countries of the world to come to Canada, as did a number from India in the last few days?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, our policy is directed to refugees from Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): I have a supplementary question. I wonder if the minister could tell us whether Czechoslovak nationals who are in Canada will be made eligible for student loans for professional retraining.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the matter of assistance for students from Czechoslovakia who are refugees is under consideration.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): These are not students; they are professionals.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond).]

EXPO '67

TENDERS FOR DEMOLITION OF CITÉ DU HAVRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the Minister of Transport and, in his absence, to the Prime Minister.

In view of the latter's absence, I shall direct it to the government, since I do not quite know which minister will be able to answer this question which is very urgent, it seems to me. I would like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, how urgent it is.

The tenders for the demolition of Cité du Havre in Montreal are closing at three o'clock this afternoon. Two days ago I gave notice to the Minister of Transport of the questions I intended to ask him.

Therefore, I ask any member of the cabinet, through you, Mr. Speaker, if the government intends to demolish the Cité du Havre in order to allow the real estate company to submit plans for the establishment of a Canadian film city or site there? It is a $12 million proposal—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member will kindly give me notice in writing of the question, I will see to it that it is discussed tonight on the adjournment motion.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

In my opinion, and you will agree, it is impossible without immediate action on the part of the government, to answer a question which requires a reply before three o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. member that it is a quarter past three already.

GRAIN

SUGGESTED OVER-QUOTA DELIVERIES OF OUT OF CONDITION GRADES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the government or the Canadian Wheat Board made plans to allow over-delivery quotas for tough, damp, heated and out of condition grain from this fall's harvest?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): There are no immediate plans in this regard. Of course the unit quota is the first thing that must be filled, and we must assess the whole situation before making plans for over deliveries.

Mr. Benjamin: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister check with the Canadian Wheat Board to see whether the practice in previous years when harvest conditions were similar will be followed again and over-delivery quotas allowed in places where the out of condition grain is at its worst?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now making a submission or a representation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR YUKON TERRITORIAL JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Has he or his department received a written request from Hon. L. Peterson, minister of labour and attorney general for British Columbia, requesting a leave of absence for Judge Parker who has been appointed chairman of the mediation commission? If so what decision has been made in regard to the request?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression the question has already been asked, though I may be wrong.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to question Your Honour's memory. I do not think the question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West has been answered, and since the minister seemed to be ready to reply to it I wonder if Your Honour could reconsider your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: It has already been reconsidered.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Department of Justice received a letter from the attorney general of British Columbia on May 29 asking for leave of absence for the territorial judge in the Yukon, Mr. Justice Parker, so he could serve as chairman of the mediation commission in British Columbia. This matter was discussed by the government and I wrote Mr. Peterson, the attorney general of British Columbia, on August 21 and said we could not recommend that leave of absence be granted for a seven year period under the circumstances given by Mr. Peterson. I also told the attorney general of British Columbia that it appeared to us that certain provisions of the Judges Act were incompatible with Judge Parker acting as chairman of the mediation commission under the terms of that commission for a seven year period.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Could he advise the house if the Leader of the Opposition has tabled an attendance register for his ghost cabinet?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the honourable Minister of Finance.

In a speech he made on October 1, 1968 at the annual meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the IRDB, the honourable minister mentioned in the second paragraph:

> We try to seek and formulate a set of economic programs which will free some resources. We are looking closely at our taxation system and priorities—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The honourable member should ask a question and he should not make a speech.

Mr. Matte: Here is my question, Mr. Speaker. Has the honourable minister considered the advisability of improving our monetary system?

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF REPORT ON ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. I ask it in the absence of the Leader of the Opposition, who is out in the country seeing how far short of performance is the just society.

Would the Prime Minister shortly place before the appropriate committee, either the justice committee or the committee on Indian affairs and northern development, the report of the royal commission inquiring into administration of justice in the Northwest Territories, which very pointedly emphasizes the lack of justice for some of the people in the territories who are subjected to the processes of law there?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe this report was submitted some months ago to the Department of Justice, if I am thinking of the same report as the hon. member. If I recall correctly, the matter that the commission had been set up to deal with has been settled, but I will gladly check into the over-all principles raised by the report to see whether any action should be contemplated by this house.

BROADCASTING

EXTENT OF U.S. CONTROL OF NEWFOUNDLAND FIRM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Will the minister request the Canadian Radio Television Commission to examine closely the degree to which ownership or effective control of the firm Stephens and Towndrow resides with the Columbia Broadcasting System of the United States or other U.S. interests?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question might well be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, this is a very important matter which has recently come to light and has international connotations. I beg your indulgence to allow the minister to answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that if he disagrees with the Speaker's assessment of the urgency of the matter, he can always give notification for consideration of the matter at the time of adjournment later today.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another question in the same vein. I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether government policy respecting United States control of media will not be diluted due to the apparent involvement of this particular firm with that of the well known friend of cabinet ministers, Mr. Geoff Stirling.

Mr. Speaker: The first question might be discussed tonight, but not the second one.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

FINANCE

COMPENSATION TO VENDING MACHINE OPERATORS FOLLOWING COINAGE CHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the great inconvenience, and I might say cost, to operators of coin vending machines in Canada owing to the new Canadian dimes and quarters, would the minister issue more news releases advising what help the government is prepared to give?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the association of coin vending machine operators was fully informed earlier this year that the federal government would pay one half of the material cost of converting existing vending machines to take the new all nickel coins. I think this is generally known throughout the industry.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ORGANIZED AND SYNDICATED CRIME IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice. Yesterday I asked the Solicitor General whether a request had been made by the Prime Minister of Quebec for a probe into crime, and whether the government had agreed to follow the suggestion of the Quebec Prime Minister. The Solicitor General took the question as notice and suggested that the Minister of Justice would answer it.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the Solicitor General ought to reply to that question.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Justice whether this comes under his jurisdiction or that of the Solicitor General? One has passed the buck to the other, and now it has been passed back.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take issue with that. I think the record speaks for itself. As the Solicitor General stated yesterday, the facts were as I had given them in an earlier answer to the hon. member for Calgary North. I think I should say that nothing I said in the House on October 4 in answer to the hon. member's question was intended to be critical of the province of Quebec. Indeed, I do not think my words were open to that construction or interpretation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This appears to be a debate as to the responsibility of the minister. I suggest both to the minister and to the hon. member that this is not a problem we should try to determine during the question period.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, there is a small point of order here. I am not trying to debate with the minister at all. The Solicitor General stated yesterday, when I asked him a question about a probe into crime which had been suggested by the Prime Minister of Quebec, that he would take the question as notice. The day before the Minister of Justice had made some reference to it.

I think the Minister of Justice, with the greatest respect to him, misunderstood my question. He thought I was suggesting he had contradicted himself. All I want him to do is make a statement on whether the government is prepared to accept the suggestion of the Prime Minister of Quebec that there should be an investigation into crime, which is on the increase in Canada. Now, could I put that question again to the minister? I am sure he will not be argumentative.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps there might be a conference between the two ministers and the hon. member after orders of the day.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SAINT HYACINTHE, QUE.—CLOSING OF RUBBER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

What steps does the government intend to take in order to find jobs for the 170 employees of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company in Saint Hyacinthe, who have lost or will lose their jobs by the end of the year, due to the strong competition with countries where salaries are far lower than those paid to Canadian workers?

Mr. Speaker: I think this question could be taken up again tonight at time of adjournment.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I submit this is a very important matter. I think the government should take steps to correct a situation which is going to make jobless at least 170 heads of family and seriously affect, as a result, many citizens in the town of Saint Hyacinthe.

I think the minister should give us an idea of what the government intends to do.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the minister concerned to give the house an idea of the programs of the government with regard to certain given situations. Such a general answer should be given either on motions or on the adjournment, when a minister has more time and can more easily give the sort of information which the hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe is asking for.

Mr. Ricard: In that case, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether he could make a statement on motions tomorrow.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

COMMUTED VALUE OF BENEFIT SUBJECT TO ESTATE TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the problem created by the fact that the commuted value of a Canada Pension Plan benefit awarded to a widow is subject to estate tax, would the minister consider this matter when preparing his forthcoming budget?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

COMMUNICATIONS

CO-OPERATION WITH FRANCE IN SPACE AND SATELLITE RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister able to advise us whether, at the United Nations, he made specific proposals to the foreign minister of France regarding special measures of co-operation in the field of space research and satellite telecommunication technology? If so, can he indicate in what areas the proposals lie?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is yes, I did make some proposals to the foreign minister of France. It would take me quite a long time to place them before the house. When the estimates of my department are being considered would perhaps be an appropriate time for me to give a full answer to that question.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF CLAIMS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and relates to the current consultations and meetings taking place with native Indians across the country and the concern they feel about not having available the proposed bill establishing an Indian claims commission, details of which the government outlined in the speech from the throne. Will the minister take steps immediately to make public government policy in this regard, or the government bill to establish the Indian claims commission, so that the matter may be discussed at the meetings which are taking place now?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been giving the matter of the Indian claims commission consideration and he has stated that there will be consultation when a basic policy for presentation is available about which there can be consultation.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did I understand the minister, who I believe is the acting minister, to say that there will be another series of consultations following the introduction of the Indian claims commission bill? If so, could he spell out in detail what is to take place?

Mr. Speaker: I hope the acting minister does not spell that out in detail. We have just two minutes left.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GABON—INQUIRY AS TO DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada initiated steps to renew diplomatic relations with Gabon?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In March the former prime minister of Canada said that he would ask if exchanges of correspondence on this subject could be tabled. Could they now be tabled?

Mr. Sharp: I was not concerned with these affairs so much in those days, Mr. Speaker, so that I shall look up the record and see what might be done. I might say, to clarify my previous answer, that of course there are relations between Gabon and Canada. All that has happened is that we have not exchanged diplomats.

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister for External Affairs.

Could he tell the house whether the government intends to revise its Viet Nam policy and, if so, could he be more explicit?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member were to read the statement I made yesterday at the United Nations he might have a clear exposition of our position.

Mr. Lewis: That is self serving evidence.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION AGAINST U.S. IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. On September 16 the minister said that the matter of the importation of United States turkeys at prices below the cost of Canadian production was to be given consideration. Has the matter been considered?

If so, with what result, and what action is to be taken?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it has been considered. Though we are watching the situation every day we have no evidence that United States turkeys are being imported into Canada at prices lower than they are being offered in the United States. So far as action is concerned, we have not yet decided to take any action except to keep the situation under constant surveillance.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEWFOUNDLAND—PROPOSED CLOSING OF U.S. INSTALLATION AT ARGENTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Defence Production. Notice of it was given yesterday by my colleague the hon. member for St. John's East. Would the minister tell the house whether the government has been advised of the reported plans to close down the big United States installation at Argentia, Newfoundland?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Defence Production, Newfoundland's friend in the federal cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I want to make the hon. gentleman a little more comfortable in his lonely role—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted, with the consent of the house, to ask the President of the Privy Council about the business for next week? I have been trying to obtain this information for the last 20 minutes.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): As hon. members know, we shall continue with the committee stage of the Farm Improvement Loans Act bill today, to be followed by second reading and committee stage of the farm credit bill. There is to be a departure from the business as announced last night if the Chair would call item No. 21 on today's order paper, the white paper on anti-dumping. I believe there is general agreement in the house that this matter may be proceeded with this afternoon without delay.

Tomorrow we propose to go into committee of supply and take the estimates of the governor general, privy council, legislation and treasury board. On Monday, of course, the house will not be sitting. On Tuesday next we shall call second reading of the bill to amend the Post Office Act and, on disposing of that, we will proceed to second reading of the bill to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, and to the committee stage of that bill. On Thursday next we would call the resolution preceding the official languages bill and on Friday next we would call estimates, the actual estimates to be called to be the subject of discussion with hon. members opposite.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Before Your Honour calls orders of the day, may I rise on a point of order. I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, how any hon. member can direct questions to the ministry if they are not accepted by those ministers who are in their seats on behalf of other ministers. The Prime Minister today, I submit, refused to answer a question of mine which was legitimate. The Acting Minister of Transport refused to give an answer. My question is, how is one to direct urgent questions to the ministry if ministers are not to be in their seats?

Mr. Speaker: I point out to the hon. member that the subject matter of his point of order took from 20 to 30 minutes of the time of the house yesterday.

TRADE

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF WHITE PAPER ON ANTI-DUMPING

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the white paper on anti-dumping tabled on September 20, 1968, be referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

Motion agreed to.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING PERIOD, RESPECTING INTEREST RATES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, October 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-111, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act—Mr. Olson (for Mr. Benson)—Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

On clause 1—Bank.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock yesterday I was interrupted by private members' hour. I had been in a verbal tussle with the Minister of Agriculture as to the size of loans and where the considerable amounts of money voted under these four bills were to go. I made an error, I am afraid. I said that the average loan was from $17,000 to around $20,000. I have learned, from papers submitted by the Department of Agriculture, that under the farm credit legislation the average loan has been $22,000.

That brings me to my main point, and if I make no other point in the debate I shall be happy. In my opinion, as well as in the opinion of many farmers in Canada, $1 billion and more, under one piece of legislation, is being directed toward fewer and fewer farmers and those farmers or bodies obtaining money are obtaining it in ever-increasing amounts. Last year the average amount lent under the Farm Credit Act was $20,380, and this year so far it has been $22,020. I refer to this act because these acts are so closely related that it is fair to say the rule of relevance is being kept. By lending such sums we are not getting to the root of the matter, namely, what are we doing to keep the small family farmer on the land?

The second question is: what chance does a young farmer have of acquiring a farm, starting up and making a success of it? It is not always possible for him to take over the family farm and in most cases where the farms are small I understand it is the deliberate policy of the government to withhold financial help in such cases unless the venture is obviously a paying proposition. This is putting the cart before the horse. How can a farmer possibly have a paying proposition unless his farm is well financed, in which case credit is hardly needed? Yet the administration will not lend money unless the operation is a cinch. I think the people of Canada are still pioneer-minded and that a large percentage of any money voted for agriculture should be devoted to the encouragement of the new farmer, the small farmer. Unless this is done I believe serious consequences will ensue.

The farmers' union of Alberta recently sent out fourteen questions, not addressed to me personally or to the minister personally but to the government of Canada. These farmers want to know the policy of the government with respect to the position of the family farm in Canadian agriculture. They are asking this question because they know it is the small farmer who is finding it increasingly difficult to make a living. They know that such markets as we have are increasingly being divided among fewer people. It is only the relatively few farmers, the well financed farmers, the independent corporations which do not rely on agriculture for a living but are interested rather in depreciation and avoidance of income tax, that are in a good position to qualify for loans at the present time. Yet they are in direct competition with the small family farms.

I always try to avoid criticizing unless I have some positive suggestion to make. Having discussed this question with many farm unions and many individual farmers, I say we must find some way of licensing farmers. By this I do not mean that farmers should be placed under bureaucratic control. It is a matter of definition. If we are to pass legislation here to help farmers we must know who it is we are helping. I believe it is necessary to have large corporation farms; I am not saying they should be destroyed. I think there should be large, efficient farms, and well-heeled farmers on the land. I am not suggesting we should return to a peasantry, or limit downward the size of farms any more than limit them upward.

I think we should recognize three categories of farmers so that when we vote money for farm loans or credit under any of the several bills we have been considering we will know exactly what we are doing. The experience of allowing decisions as to where the money is to go to rest with the financial institutions has proved disastrous over the last 20 years. Those institutions are interested only in profit per dollar on a percentage basis. We as legislators are interested in something far wider and greater.

It will be necessary, I am sure, to divide farmers into at least three main categories and to make sure that rules apply to these categories in different ways. I see no reason why the taxpayers of Canada should subsidize any large corporation. I do not intend to name any names, but there are corporations which are deep into the hog business, the poultry business and the cattle business—corporations which are not really farmers at all. I do not see why we should lend money to them at any specific rate of interest whatsoever.

The small farmer who is caught in the cost-price squeeze and whose turnover is not large enough to allow him to absorb his costs and make a reasonable profit is in an entirely different situation. He is not in any position to argue with the financial institutions, nor is he in a position to bargain at the marketing end. The grain market is in the doldrums. The small hog raiser is in competition with the big producers, and he will not be able to compete any more effectively if we lend his competitors money at a reduced rate, whatever the actual percentage may be.

The little man is certainly not going to get loans if the criterion is to be 100 per cent certainty of repayment. If the policy is not to lend money until the success of a venture is guaranteed, no small farmer will ever be able to get a loan. He will only be driven downward, or else we shall find ourselves with a system of feudal tenure of land in this country, something which I believe would be disastrous. It surprises me that in putting forward these ideas I am not backed up by a Minister of Agriculture who believes in the principle of interest free money for the little people.

Nowhere in the regulations made under these four acts do I find the emphasis placed where it should be, that is, on maintaining a happy agricultural industry in the hands of little people living on the land and depending on the land for their livelihood. A system of licensing farmers would help us in designating what a farmer is. The minister has the ability to take this step. His department has the statistics available. If this suggestion were followed we would arrive at an essential basis on which to evaluate any legislation having to do with farming in Canada.

When we are dealing with farming I do not think we ought to spend our time splitting hairs. During the last election, Liberal propaganda pointed the finger of scorn at the present leader of the Conservative party, saying he was a socialist because he hoped to guarantee people an income. The Edmonton Journal, which is not thought of as a Conservative paper, had this report on Monday, June 3: "Mr. Trudeau assured the farmers of Canada an income." To my mind the word "assure" and the word "guarantee" mean one and the same thing. I am certain hon. members to my extreme left are in favour of a guaranteed income. So it must be our unanimous opinion that the people of Canada should enjoy a decent standard of living wherever they find themselves. The Prime Minister called it an assured farm income. The Leader of the Opposition called it a guaranteed farm income. I say—and I am no socialist—that when we are spending the taxpayers' money to guarantee anybody an income we should take a very good look to see exactly whose income we are guaranteeing.

The present administration takes pride in the fact that it has provided a great amount of money for farm credit. I am not sure of the total but on the books there is $915,837,195 outstanding, very close to $1 billion on these accounts alone. Personally I think all this money has not been going to the right people. The villages of western Canada, and I presume the same applies in the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, are feeling the pinch of lack of population.

People who are interested in housing know what a problem we have in that regard. They have done their work and they can tell you that this business of driving people off the land into the cities is the wrong trend. We are indeed going to be a very sad country when we have 20 million or 30 million people rammed into our cities. The city is not a good place in which to raise families. It is not a good place in which to develop the individual initiative of which Canada has always been proud. It is very costly and unhealthy to live in a city. Driving people to live in a city is a backward step.

In case hon. members think that I have nothing but criticism I would point out that I have an answer to the problem. The small farmer can be protected by making sure that any government support policy is based on a reasonable quota system related to the family farm. This is the way to give an assured farm income or guaranteed farm income, whatever you want to call it, whereby the people who need it most can get that standard of living to which they are entitled, particularly if they are willing to work. There is no question of the farmers' willingness to work; otherwise they would not stay on their farms. They would crowd into the cities and there try to get on welfare plans. In the cities they would have an unnatural way of life, in many cases an unhealthy environment, and no economic security whatever. What are these people going to do?

In case I am considered a dreamer, with only a sentimental attachment for the land, I would point out that this is not so. The world today needs the produce of Canadian farmers, and in the long run I do not believe we will produce more or better food if we return to the feudal system.

We are mining the land. We are destroying our villages. We are reducing the income of individual little people. If the government persists in this idea of taking small farmers off the land and enlarging the feudal estates it will depart a long way from Liberalism's dream in the last century. I say to the government: be honest about it. Admit you are going to create feudal landlords, to be friends of the big money men and of the big landlords. It is a strange thing that I have to stand on the so-called blue Tory side of the house to remind government members of the type of principles which made Laurier great. He saw this matter clearly. If I had lived in the days of Laurier perhaps I would have been a Liberal, but I cannot be that now when the Liberals are giving only lip service to the cause of looking after the small people. There is certainly nothing in any of these four pieces of legislation to lead me to believe that the government has a sensible approach to agriculture.

The farmers are asking for nothing unusual. The question is, what interest rate should we charge them on the money that is being made available? Yesterday I said that a rate of 5 per cent may have been all right ten years ago. But now there is inflation which has been aggravated by the government pouring large amounts of money into the wrong sectors of our economy, to help the purchase of land at wrong prices by the wrong people.

It is a paradox that when we cannot sell our agricultural products for a decent price the price of land is still going up. Is it because the farmer is really making a big profit and hiding it some place? Or is it a fact that land is rapidly going into the hands of people who are not agriculturalists, who are using it as an economic trick to get out of paying income tax and bearing their proper share of the country's economic burdens? While these people are doing this they are taking a living away from those whose birthright it is to make a living on the land.

The Farm Union of Alberta, at least, agrees with me on what the formula should be for lending money. They say we should have a realistic rate of interest for money lent to small farmers. The only excuse for lending money below the normal bank rate of interest is that a cost-price squeeze is operating against the small farmer that he cannot meet without some type of assistance. The fairest way to give the small farmer a break is by lending him money at a reasonable interest rate, and I believe that the interest rate should float with the cost of money. I do not suppose that the government has it entirely in its power to prevent inflation, but it does have the power to lend money to small farmers at a rate which has a bearing on the cost that the government itself pays for money. I am not an actuary but I would suggest a formula of 1 per cent above the Bank of Canada lending rate.

I do not think we have to consult the banks about this because by the preamble to this bill we see that there are lending institutions in Canada that are willing to lend money on an assured deal, on a government backed deal. Caisses populaires, credit unions and so forth are in the money lending business, and they would be only too delighted to handle these farm loans when the government guarantees them a return on their money.

As I say, the rate of interest should float with the cost of money, and the only source that has large amounts of money in Canada is the Bank of Canada which sets the bank rate. So, let the farmers have their loans at approximately 1 per cent over the bank rate. I will not quibble with the minister and the government if the rate differential fluctuates between .8 per cent and 1.02 per cent. Over a period of years it has been profitable for the banks to handle this business at a rate of approximately 1 per cent or half of one per cent above the bank rate.

The farmers agree with this suggestion. They are realistic but they want to keep their place within the economy. Naturally, if we have inflation the price of farm products should go up somewhat. There is no doubt that the farmer's costs are going up, and so we should set this interest rate according to a fixed formula based on what we think is right.

This is not the law of the Medes and the Persians. We are changing it every day; otherwise, we would not be discussing it in this chamber. Let us take an honest look at what we think should be a fair rate according to this formula and give it a try. The money will be repaid. If the banks, credit companies and trust companies come back to us in 18 months or two years and show they have been giving this service to Canadian farmers at a loss, I think that as fairminded people we would be willing to raise the differential by, say, half of one per cent, to make sure that these companies do not work for nothing.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Chairman, I rise not to delay the passage of this legislation but to get some answers that I feel we did not get yesterday to questions that were posed by members of the opposition. I hope the minister will come back into the chamber for a few minutes because that is all the time I am going to take, and if he is not here I will have to ask these questions all over again.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, may I reassure the hon. member that I am here in my capacity as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance to assist—oh, here comes the minister. I was going to say I would take careful notes of the hon. member's points and bring them to the minister's attention, but I guess his representations penetrated behind the curtain and the minister has returned.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I noticed that the minister was back and I thought he might as well be comfortable in his seat. It is obvious from the remarks made by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the chamber that we are all agreed that this bill should be passed as expeditiously as possible. It is also obvious that the prime object of the bill is to make money available to the farmers at the fairest and most reasonable rate of interest that we can devise and, at the same time, assure the availability of the necessary funds. I think we are all agreed on this.

I am led to believe also, from the remarks the minister made yesterday, that he has finally agreed that the interest rate should be tied to some formula announced in advance, as part of the regulations under this act. So far as the formula is concerned I have a feeling, which I believe is shared by my colleagues on this side of the house, that in his answers yesterday the minister engaged in a little bit of hedging. I may be wrong and perhaps the minister will take the opportunity of clarifying the situation after I complete my remarks. Although he stated the rate of interest would be comparable with that paid on government bonds, in my opinion he did not come right out and say whether he meant long term or short term bonds or whether the interest on the loans would compare with the interest on a bond with a similar repayment period. Is the minister suggesting that multiple interest rates would be applied to the loans, depending upon the length of the loan period? I hope the minister will give us a clear, unequivocal answer to this question so we can pass this legislation and make it available to the farm community as quickly as possible.

The minister also said there will be some additional costs attached to these loans over and above the interest charge. Since there is no mortgage to be processed under the provisions of this legislation, I personally feel that there should be no added costs. I fail to see where an added cost factor would enter into a loan program of this type. Perhaps the minister would explain to the committee how much this added cost would be. I am sure that if the committee could get satisfactory answers to these questions there would be no delay in getting the legislation approved. I am just reiterating to the minister that we want to know whether the interest rate is to be tied to long term or short term bonds or whether it is going to be set according to the length of the loan period. In the latter case, I suggest we would probably have multiple interest rates. As I have said, if the minister can give the committee answers to these questions there should be no delay in getting the legislation approved.

Mr. Olson: Perhaps I could answer the hon. gentleman in about a minute and a half by saying that I have not been hedging with hon. gentlemen opposite. I have given them all the positive information I have at this point in time. We have to recognize, and I repeat this, that the banks are lending their own money. We do not have any legislation now, and we do not want any legislation, that will give the government the power to direct the banks to lend their customers money at any particular rate of interest. What we can do, and what we will do, is to suggest a maximum rate under which we will guarantee these loans. In other words, we are not going to guarantee a loan if the maximum interest rate is not low enough to enable the legislation to provide a service to the farmers, not to the banks but to the farmers.

I have to say this to hon. gentlemen: we think it is reasonable that there should be a slightly higher charge for these loans than for government bonds with similar terms because it is a fact the banks could lend this money to the government by just buying bonds. There are some additional expenses connected with servicing these loans and these expenses are not incurred by simply buying government bonds. This is the justification for the slight additional charge over the rate formerly charged.

So far as what the amount will be is concerned, I hope hon. gentlemen realize that by including small land purchases and presumably, therefore, longer periods for loans than were available under the old Farm Improvement Loans Act, there will be additional costs connected with loans of this type. We do not have any experience, however, with this type of loan and neither do the banks. I do say that the interest rate would be tried to a formula which would take into account a rate that is comparable with, that for the same term of government of Canada bond. I am sure hon. gentlemen will realize that we feel the banks will participate in this program to the same level that they did before. I hope my friend will agree with me that the banks gave wholehearted support to the Farm Improvement Loans Act over a long period of time. We want to make sure that they continue to do so. I have not been hedging at all, and as soon as I have positive, accurate information to give hon. gentlemen I will give it to them.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): What the minister is telling us is that he is prepared to see multiple interest rates under the legislation?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Chairman, I did not say that. I want to suggest that there may be a different rate for machinery, say, on a three year term. I am just throwing out these hypothetical cases. There may be a different rate for a land purchase on a 15 year term. Here again, we have to come back to the same argument I have used over and over again, namely, that it is the banks' money. We want to make sure they support this program and therefore we have to make some arrangements for setting a maximum rate under which we will guarantee loans at a point which the banks will support. It may be that there will be a slightly different rate for three year term loans to buy equipment which would depreciate rapidly compared with loans for the purchase of land. However, I am satisfied these rates will be tried to a comparable term that is current for government of Canada bonds.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Are we to understand, then, that there has been no discussion with the chartered banks or other interested lenders with regard to any formula that might be presented to them by the government and which they would consider satisfactory?

Mr. Olson: I would not say there has been no discussion. I do not think it would be useful at this stage to have a discussion or to say that the banks have agreed to this or have not agreed to that. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite must realize that it is necessary for the Department of Finance to have a bill passed by this house setting out the terms and conditions of loans before a final decision can be made as to what the maximum rate of interest will be under the guarantee.

I believe it was the hon. member for Assiniboia who asked me yesterday how long it would be after the legislation is passed before it would be operative. I cannot give a positive answer to the committee, but I would hope it would be within a few days after royal assent. We have reason to believe that is so.

Mr. Bigg: Has any consideration been given to the question of different interest rates for operations of different sizes? I refer to the difference between a family farm and a corporation farm. Has this question been discussed?

Mr. Olson: Certainly it has been discussed. I am sure my friend will agree with me that the main purpose of this measure, and other measures, is to assist farmers in obtaining economic units. Then, of course, we get into the complex question of what is, in fact, an economic unit. I followed my hon. friend's remarks very carefully and I agree with some of the points he made. I am sure he will agree that the best service we can perform for farmers is to give assistance in the obtaining of equipment and land in order that they can develop economic units to pay their expenses and provide themselves with a decent living from their farming operations.

Mr. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, did the minister consult any credit unions or loan companies in respect of this measure? He said he made some preliminary investigations with bankers but we are not dealing only with banks in this regard. Did he consult them to see what interest rates they might find attractive?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman I do not think any useful purpose could be served by making public statements in or outside the house regarding the exploratory inquiries that have been made of the people involved. I think this might make the situation more difficult. We should not speculate about things that have taken place up to this point. When the provisions of the bill are available we can make a decision about the maximum rate.

Let me point out to hon. members opposite that the maximum rate is not a matter for negotiation although it is a matter for discussion. One can become confused about the connotation of these two words in this context. I think in the final analysis the governor in council will decide what the maximum rate will be on loans which the government will guarantee.

The only purpose of this legislation, as I explained the other night, is to guarantee loans and lower the interest rates below commercial or competitive rates which now exist. Otherwise there would be no purpose. We are keenly aware that this is the purpose.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised by the minister's statement that there had been no consultation with financial institutions other than banks.

Mr. Olson: I did not say that.

Mr. Burton: I gathered from his remarks that there have been some discussions, but if I understood him correctly there have been no discussions with officials of credit unions.

Mr. Olson: That is not what I said at all.

Mr. Burton: I understood that there have been no discussions with trust or loan companies which may eventually become involved in lending under this legislation. Because our discussion has taken this turn I intend to make some remarks about subclause 1 of clause 1.

The purpose of this subclause is to redefine the term "bank" as it is used in the act. It has the effect of qualifying other institutions under the provisions which guarantee loans to farmers. This paragraph provides that all chartered banks are qualified under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Provision is made in subsequent paragraphs to include credit unions, caisse populaires and other co-operative credit societies, as well as trust companies and loan companies.

These companies must be designated under the provisions of this measure by the minister. I am aware of a financial institution which would fall within this category; yet none of the officials of this institution have received information about this bill. This institution's employees are experienced in the lending field, and are interested in receiving information. I forwarded them a copy of this bill.

Paragraphs (ii) and (iii) set out the other institutions which may qualify for inclusion under the provisions of this bill. As I understand the wording, the minister is to be given the discretion to decide which institutions will be included. There is some justification for this because of the nature of some of these institutions and because of what is involved. It seems to me that this leaves the minister in a rather vulnerable position. He has absolutely no criteria to follow in deciding which institutions should qualify. He must use his own judgment, which I have no doubt is as good as the judgment of anyone else. It would be useful if the minister had some legislative guidance in making these decisions as to which institutions should be designated or qualified under this measure. This would provide some protection.

Let me ask the minister what policy is to be followed when making loans. Are there to be any basic criteria as to what institutions may qualify? The institutions which make these loans will be making them for the purpose of farm improvement, and as long as they meet some criteria there will be no difficulty about the guarantee. Without some criteria there will be very mixed-up situations. Various institutions qualified under the provisions may well be following different policies. There will not be any co-ordinated or integrated approach in respect of farm credit affairs. This could lead to very serious problems.

I have consulted the managers of several financial institutions which have been engaged in lending money for the purpose of farm improvement without the provisions of any government guarantee. Some of these people are well qualified from a managerial point of view and have competent employees. This is the type of institution we should have in mind when deciding the criteria or provisions under which they may qualify.

We must look at the broad implications of this measure. Will the minister consider these financial institutions very carefully before including them within the provisions of this bill? Is there going to be any co-ordination or integration in respect of farm credit? This is very important because we are including a number of agencies which will deal with farm credit. We now have a federal agency, namely the Farm Credit Corporation.

Up to this time chartered banks have been making loans under the provisions of the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Most of these bank branches interested in making loans under this act are involved in the affairs of the immediate rural communities. They have personnel with knowledge of farm conditions in the areas they are serving. We are now extending the scope of this legislation. No doubt many of the institutions which will qualify under the new provisions will be able to handle these loans in a competent fashion. However, there are questions that should be answered regarding the approach that is to be used. I urge the minister to consider these questions seriously.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks about this legislation. Before I ask the questions I have in mind I should like to take issue with a statement by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

I think it will be beneficial to combine farm credit legislation. It seems evident that in years to come we will be creating more corporations. It is in this sense that I disagree with the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. Many more institutions will qualify under the terms of this bill and these institutions will be able to lend money to those farmers who have been turned down by the Farm Credit Corporation. If a farmer applies to the Farm Credit Corporation for a loan with which to buy land and the corporation does not think he is a good risk, under the farm improvement loans legislation he can go to a bank and is entitled to obtain a loan. Those of us who have had any experience with banks know what happens when you apply to a bank for such a loan. The bank takes a statement of your net worth, and so on, and very few farmers are denied a loan under the farm improvement loans legislation. For this reason the legislation has been a blessing over the years.

These are the people who will benefit from the program. This is what will happen, contrary to the wishes of the government that the large corporations shall one day take over all our farms. This is part of the thinking of the Farm Credit Corporation. I believe they will realize that there is a loophole in the farm improvement loans legislation which will benefit those who farm on a part time basis This is a good thing because it is the only salvation the family farmer has after he has applied to the Farm Credit Corporation for a loan.

I take issue with the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar in this regard. His argument was that the farmer will in a relatively short period be making large repayments on his loan and consequently his standard of living will be reduced. I realize that this sort of thing does happen, but the fact is that there is one place to which the farmer can turn for a loan after the Farm Credit Corporation has turned him down. He can go to a bank or other lending institution and obtain a loan. In this way he will at least be able to buy an additional quarter of land, and having bought the land can go back to the Farm Credit Corporation and say, "I am farming an almost economic unit and am now qualified to obtain a loan from you." This is what will happen, and I say thank goodness for it. It is good that there is one place to which the small farmer can go to obtain a loan.

I do not know whether the minister realizes it, but this program is in almost direct conflict with government policy in respect of farming, which is to eliminate the small farmer. These matters have been raised by other hon. members. I ask the minister whether we are to have different interest rates in respect of different purchases. Will there be one interest rate for the purchase of land, another for the purchase of machinery, another for the purchase of cattle and yet another for the purchase of buildings? We do not know what will happen with regard to interest rates. We do not know a great many things about this legislation. I think we are buying a cat in a bag. I am somewhat annoyed at and disturbed by the minister because apparently at this stage even he does not know the answers to these questions.

Apparently this legislation is not very important because the government house leader has told us that if it is not passed today we will move on and deal with other matters. Therefore there is not the urgency attached to it that the minister has tried to imply. There is a great need for this legislation, but the minister has not been very influential in persuading the government house leader that this is so. I do not think we need to rush into other measures but should deal with this matter first. The minister should give us the details of this legislation. Even if the minister is not prepared to answer our questions, we still need legislation along this line.

If there is to be one interest rate applied to a loan for the purchase of land, another applied to a loan for the purchase of machinery, with a different depreciation rate, another rate in respect of a loan to purchase cattle, buildings, and so on, how does the minister reconcile his statement that the interest rate will be tied to the rate of government borrowing? Obviously there will not be any such tie. This is an attempt to convince the committee that the government is thinking along that line, but obviously the banks have not made any definite statement in this respect. Apparently the minister has not said to the banks: This is the government's thinking in this regard. The minister has not received the thinking of the banks; he is simply waiting for them to say what they intend to do.

If the minister is prepared at this time to answer the questions we have raised in respect of the legislation I will immediately resume my seat. I ask the minister whether he can tell us that he has said to the banks, "This is what I propose", and whether the banks accepted or rejected his proposals. He has nothing to offer with regard to the attitude of the banks to this measure.

The banks will benefit from this legislation, but what will be the situation as between one bank and another? I should not talk about caisses populaire because I do not know enough about them, but I do have some knowledge of the way credit unions operate. The minister should ignore any arrangement arrived at among the banks, if this is indeed the case, and should agree with the banks on an interest rate that will be most favourable to the farmer.

Although different types of lending institutions are to be included in this program, they should all be prepared to accept the rate set by the minister. I do not think that because different types of lending institutions are included in the bill there will be any reduction in the interest rate. If there has been an agreement between the banks and other lending institutions as to the interest rate to be charged, the minister can keep that in the bill for windowdressing and go across the country saying he has made it possible for farmers to obtain loans from all these institutions. He can holler hallelujah, if he likes, for having done this. The point is that these institutions will not be helpful in reducing the interest rate the farmer will pay.

What interest rate has the minister proposed to the banks? What has been the reaction of the banks to his proposal? The minister has referred to a government guarantee in respect of these loans. Is that guarantee meaningful? Will the interest rate differ as between one bank and another, for example, as between the Royal Bank of Canada, the Canadian-Imperial Bank of Commerce and the Bank of Montreal? We do not have the answers to these questions. The minister is not prepared at this time to give us an idea of what he has in mind. Perhaps it is because he has no idea of what the interest rate should be.

If the government has any thinking in this regard, obviously the banks have not yet accepted it. Surely at this stage of the game the banks should be prepared to say yes to the minister's proposals and he should tell the house what those proposals are. If he did this, a great deal of time would be saved in our committee discussion. The minister should tell us, "We have made an agreement with the banks. This is it." What is the secret in this respect? We have to know sooner or later.

Must I as an opposition member rise in the house and ask the minister every day whether there has been a change in the rate or a fluctuation in a bond issue? If I have to do this, will it be helpful? Would this be conducive to the dispatch of business in the house? Surely it would not.

I believe it is my responsibility as an opposition member of this house to ask the minister these questions. Every time there is a bond issue, no matter in what part of the year it may be, it will have a bearing on the interest rate the banks will charge. I do not want to be put in the position where I have to pester the minister until he gives us this information. We will not be satisfied until the minister is prepared to tell us the formula arrived at in respect of interest rates. If we have to continually ask the minister questions on this matter, will it be in the interest of good business in the house and in the interest of the farming industry—because farmers will be continually asking for loans? This is not something that will last only one day or one year. It will continue and it will increase. It has been going on now for some 20 years.

Farm Improvement Loans Act

Surely the minister must realize that this situation is different from loans to businessmen. There have been business failures and farming failures right, left and centre, but the point is that the amount of money lost in loans to the farming community is insignificant. This is the real difference. Therefore I suggest to the minister he should be prepared to answer this question at this time in order to silence this verbiage and help me to save my breath. Otherwise, every time an order in council is passed I will be asking myself what were the criteria in setting the rate, why did the government raise it, and what can be done to reduce it. I will be selfish for a moment and say that as a potential borrower myself I could ask, why should I pay that kind of rate.

Mr. Olson: I think I could help the hon. member by just saying to him that I spelled out very clearly in my speech yesterday that the rates will be set according to whether the guarantee will be available to all institutions at the same level. There may be two rates, but the whole essence of this is its simplicity. We want it to be easy for farmers to apply for this kind of loan. These rates will be set for certain periods, and every potential borrower will know exactly what the rate is for that period. They will not be adjusted more often than every quarter, and if the hon. member wants to ask me or the Minister of Finance four times a year what the rate will be I do not think he will be pestering us and we would not mind answering him.

Mr. Korchinski: That is fine, Mr. Chairman. The minister has indicated there will be two rates, one for land. What will the other be for? Will there be different rates for land, machinery, livestock and so on?

Mr. Olson: I did not quite say that. There was a question whether there would be what was referred to as a multiplicity of rates. The hon. member said there might be one for machinery, one for livestock, one for land, etc. I suggest that, since a new provision or what amounts to almost a new concept is being added to this bill so far as its usefulness is concerned with regard to the purchase of land, there is a possibility of two rates being established, but not more than two rates, because of the difference in the length of term. We want to keep it simple. We have to keep that in mind because the very success of this provision in the past lay in the fact that it was simple to operate.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

Perhaps I should take this opportunity to answer some of the questions the hon. member raised. It is important that this legislation be passed. It is also important that the Farm Credit Act and the legislation on advances on grain be passed, but it is up to hon. members to decide when they will be passed. I as Minister of Agriculture think that all legislation dealing with agriculture is more important than any other legislation. However, there are other ministers and other members of this house who represent other areas, and they also have some rights here. We have to bear in mind the fact that there is other, very urgent legislation dealing with other matters.

The hon. member referred to this legislation as being a loophole. He said that someone may be able to get credit under this provision through a loophole which exists in the regulations of the corporation. I do not agree with him because I do not think the credit rating of the borrower would be changed. There are some complex rules and regulations, such as the economic unit qualification, which the Farm Credit Corporation requires and which may not be required under this legislation. I am glad my hon. friend has endorsed this, but I would not agree there is a loophole in this legislation from the Farm Credit Corporation because I do not think this is the correct term for it.

Mr. Korchinski: That is my own term, Mr. Chairman, and I am entitled to make my own definitions according to the way I see things. The minister has seen fit to give some answers to my questions, but I believe he has confused the issue even further. I asked whether there will be two interest rates, to which he said there would be a multiplicity of rates.

Mr. Olson: I said there will not be a multiplicity of rates.

Mr. Korchinski: There will be two rates. Let us leave it at that. Apparently the minister cannot give me a straight answer. If he can, he should stand up and say so right now. So we will have at least two rates. If I wish to get a loan for the purchase of land, which I can pay off in seven or eight years time, and if at the same time I am entitled to the same type of loan for machinery, why should I pay a different rate for machinery from that which I pay for land? I am the same man who would be getting the two loans and in both cases the credit risk would be the same. I should be able to get my money in the same way from the same bank. Can the minister explain that?

Mr. Olson: The difference is that when the hon. member borrows money for the purchase of land he may take the loan for 15 years while if he borrows money for a piece of equipment he may do so for three years.

Mr. Horner: I wish to speak on the same point, Mr. Chairman. If a farmer borrows $3,000 to $10,000 for machinery and takes another loan for land at the same time, both to be repaid in five years time, would the rate be the same?

Mr. Olson: Under the past provisions of the Farm Improvement Loans Act my hon. friend knows that a different note was written for each piece of equipment and for different purposes.

Mr. Horner: In the past the rate was the same for each piece of equipment and for each purpose. I am as confused as the hon. member for Mackenzie is. If there are two rates of interest, will one apply specifically to land and the other to machinery, or will one be charged for a five year term and the other for a longer term?

Mr. Olson: I do not wish to confuse the hon. members. I told them at the outset that all the details have not yet been worked out. Surely hon. members recognize that we need the authority of this parliament before we can initiate discussions of negotiations with all the financial institutions involved. If we went to them without the authority of the house and spoke about the proposed amendments, they would be asking precisely the same questions such as, what will parliament agree to, and so on. This is exactly what the Minister of Finance wants, namely, the authority of the house so as to enable us to give a government guarantee under the provisions of the act. It is only then that we will be in a position to make arrangements with the banks. We want to do it as quickly as possible.

Mr. Korchinski: I am glad the minister wants to rush this legislation through because I want that also. But at the same time I want to have a few questions answered before I rush into this headlong and find it is too late to back out of it. If, as the minister says, the banks are waiting to know what this house wants, I think we can provide the minister with some suggestions in due course. However, there are several questions which I wish to put to the minister. It may be that the minister has dealt with this one; nevertheless I will put it to him. It is to be presumed that eventually this bill will be passed in one form or another and will receive final reading regardless of whether or not it is acceptable to us. Therefore, will it be possible after this legislation is passed for many of the farmers, who have taken loans in the interim period at rates which were not too satisfactory but which they had to accept at that time, to refinance their loans under the provisions of this bill or will they not be given this opportunity?

Mr. Olson: The Minister of Finance answered this question some months ago. He said that any bank loan which was made since the expiration of the former act on June 30 would receive the government guarantee.

Mr. Korchinski: There is only one other point I wish to make. It seems to me the minister is vague as to what the final rate will be. Can he tell us what the final rate will be? Is there a conflict among the banking fraternity, that is, the chartered banks, the near banks and so on, as to loans which would be available from other sources? Is this why we cannot arrive at a final determination of the formula? I am wondering whether this is where the trouble lies. If so, I repeat that the minister should simply deal with the banking fraternity at this stage. I realize that many of the credit unions are giving depositors a higher rate of interest, and this does make it difficult to bring them in. The only way we can do so is to raise the rates, and I do not think that is in the interests of the farming community.

While the intention of the bill may be good, since these things cannot be done overnight I suggest that the minister simply deal with the banking fraternity and see whether the other lending institutions can work out their problems to enable them to fit within the framework of the bill.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, we think there is room in this area for all of these various institutions to provide credit. I do not think there is any conflict.

Mr. Korchinski: Is there a conflict between the banks and the near banks?

Mr. Olson: Not that I know of.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, on the question of the near banks, would the minister say whether the Inspector General of Banks will have authority to examine the books of near banks which do not have a federal charter or licence to operate in a federal field?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, this ties in with the questions raised by the hon. member for Regina East, I think it was. This is the reason for designating those institutions that come within the act, as hon. members will see from clause 1, so that we do in fact have authority to make the kind of inspections that we need for proper administration of the act.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I have a further question on this point. Am I to assume that only those financial institutions that have a federal charter will be designated as lending institutions under the act? To be more specific, would the treasury branches in the province of Alberta qualify under the act? They have no federal charter and operate solely within the province.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, we visualize that there would be institutions under both federal and provincial legislation, chartered under federal or provincial law, which could qualify.

Mr. Horner: Both of them could?

Mr. Olson: Yes.

Mr. Horner: Then I go one step further. Is the Inspector General of Banks to be given authority to investigate the provincial institutions that have a licence to operate within a province but have no licence to operate all across the country?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has raised some problems of which we are aware. We do not believe that this officer has the authority to investigate provincial institutions chartered under provincial law. Obviously the hon. member is raising a problem that would have to be taken into account when these institutions are designated under the act. We do not know the final details involved here.

Mr. Horner: I have one further question. I should like to encourage the minister and the committee to get on with this bill, but this does amaze me. In view of the fact that the act expired three or four months ago, surely the minister or his department would have discussed inspection of non-federal institutions. If the minister wants to encompass these institutions within this act and guarantee up to 90 per cent of the smaller loans, surely we should know where we are going on this question. I am amazed that the minister and the Department of Finance have not gone into this question fully.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Chairman, might I say a word on this point? It has been my privilege to deal and work with farmers and I have been engaged in the farming industry in Alberta for many years, as well as in British Columbia and other areas. Perhaps these fellows on the opposition side do not have to borrow any money, but my farmers have to and they have to find it where they can. The big problem that my farmers have had in the last few years is to find money, which is in short supply.

When these fellows opposite had the chance to run the show we got awfully short of money. They should not try to curtail the money supply but should try to loosen it up a little. I have even dealt with the provincial treasury branches in Alberta and found them quite satisfactory. What we need to do is to loosen up the money supply so that advantage can be taken of it.

I think this is an excellent bill. For the last few days I have heard suggestions that we should speed up its passage. My farmers want to borrow some money but it is obvious to me that the members of the opposition are slowing down passage of the legislation. Let us get ahead with it, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, if hon. gentlemen opposite had as many brains as the noise they make is loud, then we might be able to proceed with this legislation. We on this side have urged the government to proceed with all haste. We believe we should have postponed the debate on postage stamps for a day so that we could get ahead with this legislation, but the government refused. We asked for unanimous consent of the house to proceed last Tuesday, but the government said no.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East says that we have been holding up this legislation. The very point on which I tried to elicit information from the minister had to do with the treasury branches in Alberta which operate a very good banking system; I would be first to admit that. Yet the minister has not said that these branches would qualify under the act. He has not said that the Inspector General of Banks would be allowed to investigate their books. Up to the present time, the only banks that qualify under the legislation are those which allow inspection by the Inspector General. It is my duty to the farmers in my constituency, as I see it, to make certain that every bank operating in my province qualifies under this legislation.

The minister has indicated that discussions in this regard will take place. I say to him and also to the Department of Finance that they have been lax in their duty if they have not already consulted the treasury branch of the province of Alberta and other credit unions.

If banks and near banks are to be included in this legislation, then there was nothing to stop the minister from standing in his place two or three days ago and informing the house that without a shadow of a doubt discussions have been held and inspection arrangements worked out in relation to provincial institutions. Instead, we have had secrecy. We have had covering up and all sorts of things.

Mr. Pringle: We have had too much opposition.

Mr. Horner: My hon. friend says there has been too much opposition. It is the duty of the government to present legislation to this house. It is the duty of the opposition on behalf of the country to ensure that the legislation will do what the government says it will. I and those on this side have done our best to assist the government in proceeding with this legislation, but it took us three days to get a statement on interest rates from the minister. Now today he tells us there may be two interest rates. A while ago I asked him what rate of interest would be set on loans to buy equipment and land, and he has yet to reply.

• (4:50 p.m.)

To my hon. friend in the rump to my right I say that money lent on land has been a key factor in bringing about today's inflated land prices. It is up to hon. members interested in agriculture to examine closely whether money lent on land may or may not inflate land prices. I may be wrong in interpreting the minister's remarks, but I gathered that the interest rate on money lent on land was to be higher than the interest rate on money lent on machinery. The direct opposite should be the case. The interest rate on money lent on land ought to be lower because land depreciation is not a key factor when one considers the risk involved. In other words, machinery depreciates rapidly, and I hope that hon. members in the rump realize that. For the past few years land has been increasing in value and therefore money lent on land ought to bear a lower interest rate than money lent on machinery.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Horner: I know it is difficult for hon. members in the rump to know about these things, but I must say to the minister and to his assistant that there is no reason to prevent passage of this legislation before six o'clock if this committee is informed on the subject of interest rates. Are there to be two interest rates? Is the interest rate on money lent on land to be higher or lower than the interest rate on money lent on machinery?

Mr. Pringle: Sit down and listen.

Mr. Horner: Well, we have some gratuitous advice from the new leader of the rump.

Mr. Pringle: I think the hon. member—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Chairman, I was about to say—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. The hon. member for Crowfoot has the floor.

Mr. Horner: I see that the would-be leader of the rump is being challenged for the leadership by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. I suggest to both hon. members that if they were prepared to open their minds as they are prepared to open their mouths they might perhaps learn something. Hon. members are welcome to enter into the debate but not to lengthen it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: We are trying to elicit information so that the public and our constituents may be sure this legislation is being considered to the widest possible extent.

I notice the minister is trying to rise to his feet. I hope he wishes to clarify the question of interest rates because it ought to be clarified. He has left us in doubt about arrangements that have been made with lending institutions as to interest rates. Will they be determined on a territorial basis? Are they to fluctuate between banks?

Mr. Olson: The hon. member for Crowfoot asked several questions that I should like to answer. He talked about the risk involved with land vis-à-vis machinery. Under this government guarantee there is no risk on either type of loan because the money is guaranteed by the federal government.

Mr. Korchinski: The minister was not very clear about that.

Mr. Olson: Risk is not a factor. The only factor is time. The hon. member raised a point about money lent over a long term bearing interest at a slightly higher rate than money lent for a shorter term. He knows that that is so. I need not spell out to the hon. member the details of the performances and terms of various government bonds. He took that matter up so eloquently the other night himself. The hon. member also knows that so far as the federal government is concerned, government of Alberta treasury branches are extensions of the Alberta treasury. What authority do we have to inspect the provincial treasury? I am not sure that it is proper for us to consider guaranteeing loans that are made by the treasury of the province of Alberta. They can make their own guarantees. They are competent to do so.

Mr. Horner: In other words, loans by the treasury branches in Alberta will not be guaranteed under this act. Is that correct?

Mr. Olson: I think the hon. member can assume that.

Mr. Horner: I am very disappointed and I may say that many farmers in Alberta will also be disappointed.

Mr. Olson: I do not see what added value there would be to the government in guaranteeing loans that are part and parcel of the structure of the provincial government. They are completely guaranteed as far as that government is concerned.

The hon. member also raised the matter of credit unions. May I advise hon. member opposite that credit unions are now designated for student loans and that the program works very well.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: I should like to ask the minister for some details. In order to be understood, I will speak very slowly so as to make the simultaneous interpretation easier.

In the light of the statements he made the last few days, I should like to ask him first whether he is requesting the authority to sign agreements with private sources of credit; secondly, whether the house will have nothing more to say on this matter; thirdly, whether the government will be unable to guarantee approximately the requested interest rate or rates, and fourthly, whether he will be able to finance the operations of a public corporation which comes under the federal government.

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I believe one question the hon. member asked was whether we should guarantee credit emanating from private sources. To the extent that banks, credit unions, caisses populaires, and other similar institutions are private, compared with other institutions in the public sector, we shall be guaranteeing credit emanating from such private institutions. We will guarantee the repayment of loans that such institutions grant to private individuals.

If my hon. friend will look at clause 4 of the bill he will see that the guarantee is for 90 per cent on loans up to $125,000 with respect to the institutions mentioned there, 50 per cent for the next $125,000, up to $250,000, and 10 per cent on any amount that exceeds $250,000.

The other question my hon. friend asked was, I believe, what rates of interest will the government guarantee apply to. I have answered similar questions for quite a long time. We do not know precisely what that rate will be. We must pass the bill first so that the banks and other financial institutions will know exactly what is involved, and then we have provision for the governor in council to prescribe a rate after some discussions have been held.

Mr. Mazankowski: I wish to put two questions to the minister. I do not intend to hold up this bill in any way. In the provisions of the bill that pertain to classes of lenders, can the minister say specifically whether the Alberta treasury branches are to be included?

Second, could there not be some provision made to accommodate interest free deals so as to help both the farmers and the bankers? Take the case of a farmer who buys a combine this fall on an interest free basis, payment to become due on the first occasion he uses the machine. It might be ten months before he does so. Could there not be provision made in this legislation for the machine to be classed as a new unit? As the situation stands now it gives rise to considerable frustration on the part of the banker, the dealer and the customer when the time comes for the actual loan to be made. While we are dealing with this legislation I believe we should reach a clearcut policy on this kind of transaction.

Mr. Olson: In answer to the first question, let me say I can see no purpose in the federal government guaranteeing loans made by the provincial treasury. A government entity has full control already and we certainly could not apply the same rules to the treasury of a province as we can to the institutions which are included here. This is the case simply because another government is involved. The hon. member understands very well the legal and practical implications attached to doing what he suggests.

So far as the second question is concerned, refinancing in the strictest sense is not permissible under this act. However, a good deal depends on the arrangements made between the farmer and the machine company, whether a deal was actually consummated on the day the down payment was made and so on.

Mr. Mazankowski: Does the minister not feel that this does not really involve refinancing, that the arrangement I have in mind is really a form of pre-delivery? After all, the machine concerned is still a new one.

Mr. Olson: I am fully aware of that. In fact, I made some comment about it yesterday. It is a question of the terms. If the machine involved is new and unused and if the farmer has made no payment on it, perhaps it can be said that a deal has not been made until a payment is forthcoming. Possibly the machine has been rented up to that point. Some bankers have been concerned about this question in connection with farm improvement loans lest some of these deals would be challenged legally on the ground that they did in fact involve refinancing of a note. But we are willing to look at this question and see whether we can make the kind of accommodation which will fit the practical situation which exists. I should not like, however, to give the hon. member an undertaking that this measure will make provision for refinancing, because to do so would raise a great many problems with which we do not wish this legislation to be involved.

Mr. Rose: In rising I should like to pay my respects to the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. He comes from the mystic east but was described as the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

The debate on this clause seems to have been limited to members of the Conservative party and members of the New Democratic party. To come to the point of my remarks, it seems to me we have been manoeuvred here into discussion of the formula for setting an interest rate, whereas what we are really concerned about in this bill, as in a number of others, is the proposal for flexibility which it contains at a time when something definite and concrete is surely needed. This observation applies equally to the other farm bills, to the fishermen's improvement loan legislation and the Veterans Land Act. From my limited knowledge of farming it would appear that what we need is not more flexibility but a greater amount of stability.

For one thing, we need market stability. A farm improvement loan could be taken out during a period when the adjusted interest rate was relatively high and have to be repaid during a time of poor market prospects with predictable foreclosure, and so on. The formula prescribed under the student loan legislation was the government of Canada bond yield plus 1 per cent. We have not been told by the minister what the formula is to be in this instance. The hon. gentleman has talked about it and around it, but we have been given no definite information at all apart from what he said in his preamble yesterday afternoon. I can find no definite assurance in the legislation itself that quarterly adjustments will in fact be made. It is true there is a brief reference to this in Hansard.

Another subject which concerns members in this corner of the house is the minister's power to designate certain financial institutions. We should like to know the criteria upon which financial institutions are deemed eligible for such ministerial acceptability. We are interested in this because in contrast to hon. members to my right we are interested in seeing the kind of institutions which are authorized to make these loans broadened so as to include, for example, caisses populaires and credit unions.

My final comment arises from clause 4 in which it is laid down that $900 million is the limit imposed upon the banking institutions whereas the limit placed on credit unions and other institutions is $300 million. Is this just an arbitrary limit or is there some reason behind these figures which show an obvious preference for the banks by three to one?

Again I say that the committee has found itself sidetracked on the question of whether the formula should be this or that, half a percentage point above the long term yield on government of Canada bonds, or something else. What we are interested in really is something different. The fact is that our farmers, students, fishermen and veterans need stability, not the kind of flexibility which will lead to instability. We are opposed to the abandonment of a fixed low interest rate. If the minister would answer some of my questions in this regard I would feel much happier about the bill as it now stands.

Mr. Olson: The question which the hon. member has raised is essentially the same as that which was raised by the hon. member for Regina East. He wants to know the criteria upon which the minister exercises his powers of designation. That is pretty well spelled out in the first clause of the bill where it mentions "bank" and the term "bank", as my hon. friend knows, is used throughout the bill. The interpretation is, "a bank incorporated under the Bank Act." Then there is mention of a credit union, of a corporation within the meaning of the Trust Companies Act, of a loan company within the meaning of the Loan Companies Act, and of an insurance company within the meaning of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. These are the financial institutions that could be designated, but the bill does not say "or designated." It says "and designated." It is these companies that wish to participate in this kind of credit facility and have the guarantee made available to them that will make application to the Minister of Finance for designation. I think it is fairly clear what categories we are talking about.

Mr. Rose: The minister says that these various institutions may make application to the Minister of Finance. Under what conditions would the Minister of Finance agree that these institutions were acceptable? This is the detail of the question I am asking.

Mr. Olson: I really do not know the exact details of the question or, indeed, if there is very much involved in it. For example, I would think there would be no problem with all of the banks that have been in this business in the past. They would all be designated, and presumably also all the credit unions that are large enough to handle the kind of business envisaged here. There are many of those, although there are perhaps some small ones that could not make a contribution to this kind of lending.

The hon. member also asked why a certain maximum figure is guaranteed to the banks and a substantially lower figure to the other institutions. Up until a few months ago the banks handled all this business. There were no other insitutions involved. The sum of $300 million for the next three years seems to be a fairly large amount. I should not say it is generous because there is no generosity involved, but it is a big enough amount to see what is going to happen with these other institutions when they get involved in this kind of lending with a government guarantee. I feel fairly sure that the banks chartered under the Bank Act will be handling the majority of the business. As I say, up until a few months ago they handled all of it.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak briefly on a point raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot. I have never been a resident of Alberta but I have always had a good deal of approval if not affection, for the Alberta treasury branches. I think it is rather discriminatory on the part of the minister that he should exclude from this legislation a publicly owned money lending institution such as the Alberta treasury branch.

The minister did not say so definitely but he did reply to the hon. member for Crowfoot that one could assume that the Alberta treasury Branch would not be eligible to come under the provisions of this legislation. That is disappointing. The minister gave us to understand that there is some kind of constitutional problem in the government of Canada guaranteeing loans that might be made by a provincial public agency. Is there not some analogy with the arrangements that we have with respect to crop insurance? Crop insurance programs in the prairie provinces and in other provinces as well are arranged and administered by provincial agencies; yet under amending legislation passed two or three years ago they are allowed to re-insure them with the federal government. If it is possible to have that kind of an arrangement, a re-insurance by the province with the federal government against risk, why can we not have a similar arrangement with respect to a guarantee against risk in regard to money lending by financial institutions such as the Alberta treasury branches?

Mr. Olson: To my knowledge, and I have been trying to check this, there has never been an application by the Alberta treasury branches for a federal government guarantee for this type of loan. Indeed, I do not think they would appreciate our trying to apply the rules to them that we apply to private financial institutions. I do not think the question arises at all that they would even want this kind of thing. If hon. gentlemen opposite know that the Alberta provincial treasury would like the federal government to guarantee their operations and inspect their books, according to what the hon. member for Crowfoot says, I would point out that they have never drawn that to our attention.

Mr. Horner: Is the minister saying that if they did make application they would qualify? Is this the interpretation that I can put on his remarks? He is saying they never have. I do not believe every credit union has applied.

Mr. Olson: That is right.

Mr. Horner: The treasury branches in Alberta are completely independent of the Alberta treasury. Their books and their bookkeeping are separate. The minister shakes his head but I am certain they do not operate out of the same treasury. If they did apply would they qualify?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt in my mind that the treasury branch service in Alberta does in fact operate a very good and useful service in those areas where it has branches, but for the hon. member to say they operate completely independent of the treasury just is not so. This is the only legal status on which they can provide that service, that they are in fact an extension of the treasury. Otherwise they would need a bank charter and they have not got one. I know that and I know that they know it.

The question of whether or not we offer to guarantee loans that are made by the treasury branches just does not come up because I do not think they are going to apply. I do not think they would want to be designated and subjected to the regulations that would qualify them for designation. The hon. member has mentioned that all credit unions did not apply. That is true but some of them from time to time have expressed interest, particularly in student loans. We are prepared to offer this service whether or not all of them accept it. There have been times in the past when credit unions have indicated a desire to lend money under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, but probably they have not done so recently considering the 5 per cent interest rate. That is why we need these amendments so that we can get not only the banks back into this business but also all other financial institutions that have experience in dealing with farm credit requirements.

Mr. Horner: Has there been any discussion between the minister or the Department of Finance and the head of the Alberta government treasury branches with regard to the feasibility of their coming under this legislation?

Mr. Olson: Not recently.

Mr. Horner: Then the minister is not very interested in one of the major banking institutions in Alberta. I would say without a shadow of doubt that the treasury branches in Alberta have served a real purpose. They offer real competition to the chartered banks. They have done a tremendously good job in providing loans for farm machinery without a guarantee. For the past 23 years the chartered banks have had a guarantee but in fact the treasury branches have moved in and, to use the word in its polite sense, have even stolen business from the chartered banks.

• (5:20 p.m.)

If discussions were carried on with the treasury branches I do not believe for one minute that they would not express an interest in a guarantee. I am very disappointed that the Minister of Agriculture has not prodded the Minister of Finance or his deputies to look at the feasibility of allowing greater competition in the banking field in the province of Alberta. I might add, that there has been plenty of competition with respect to loans for home builders and city developments. Farmers have recently taken advantage of the Industrial Development Bank, since its operations have been made available to them. The treasury branches were opened in the smaller communities where the farming industry does most of its borrowing. I am making this point. I can only say again that the Minister of Agriculture has not prodded the financial department of his government into attempting to make working arrangements with the treasury branches in Alberta.

Mr. Olson: I am sure the hon. member really does not altogether mean what he has said. Why would the federal government have guaranteed provincial government loans? We are trying to induce private institutions into providing this credit for farmers. My hon. friend knows very well that for a long period of time the treasury branches were, in fact, providing loans of this type at 5 per cent without any federal government guarantee because they had the provincial government behind them. No federal government guarantee was needed. For a long time after the chartered banks moved their regular interest rate up to 6 per cent the treasury branches continued to lend money at 5 per cent.

I am convinced that the guarantee, or whatever you want to call it, of the province of Alberta standing behind these treasury branch agencies is sufficient. They could give exactly the kind of service they have given in the past whenever they wished to do so.

Mr. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the minister is a little vague about the loan companies or associations that are going to be allowed to lend money under this measure. I am left with the definite impression that the minister does not seem very sure about this. I suggest to the government that when this measure is in force they think carefully about it. I should like to give an illustration. A short time ago, an insurance company in Ontario went bankrupt and this resulted in a messy situation. I believe some of the loans this company had made were farm loans. I certainly hope the government will check this type of corporation. Since the minister himself seems a little vague, I specifically want to warn the government about such a situation.

I am a little disturbed about the attitude of the government since it has introduced various measures under which interest rates are to be raised. I am disturbed particularly about the feeling of the backbenchers on the government side that you can borrow your way out of trouble. You can get by for a little while but you are like the fellow who fell out of a tenth storey window and who said when he passed the fifth floor, "I am all right so far". It is unfortunate that something has not been done to increase the volume of wheat sales or the prices of farm products, for this is where the basic problem really lies.

Since the government allowed interest rates to go up in other sectors of the economy I suppose they felt that the farm sector must also have higher interest rates. Things are tough all over, so they might as well be tough for the farmer. I should like to deal for a moment with the legislation. I understand that it is permissive legislation. Does this mean that the government will go hand in hand to the princes of finance to see what interest rate they are willing to accept? I am a little perturbed about this angle. I communicated with some managers of credit unions and managers of banks in my area to try to ascertain what the interest rate would be. I admit that I would be operating at the retail level, so to speak, and the minister would be in a more authoritative position to find out what the interest rate would be for loans of this nature.

The fact the minister seems to be unsure on this question disturbs me. We all know the interest rate is going to be a realistic one. People talk about realistic movies, and they mean you are going to see more. In this case, a realistic interest rate means the interest rate is going up. I am quite perturbed about this. The fact interest rates are going up in all sectors of the economy suggests that the government is in financial trouble and is attempting to do a little buck-passing. It is going to cost the farmers concerned quite a few bucks to pay higher interest rates. These farmers will have to be good managers to pay these higher interest rates or they are not going to be farming very long. This is the way I see it. We will be discussing the interest clause later so I shall make some comments at that time.

Mr. Schreyer: The minister may well be right when he suggests that the provincial administration in Alberta has shown no interest to date in having the treasury branches come under the provisions of this legislation. This is one thing, but surely it would seem logical to leave the option open to the province of Alberta and to those who administer the treasury branches to come under this legislation if they see fit or if they are persuaded to do so by the farmers of that province. I have the impression the minister really has it in mind to exclude them from participation in this legislation. I say it is an unnecessary kind of discrimination when one publicly owned lending institution is not mentioned in this provision. I feel that the idea of a public lending institution as set up in Alberta was one of the finest innovations of the late William Aberhart and Ernest Manning. I am surprised to learn that a former disciple of theirs appears to be so nonchalant about it.

Mr. Horner: Actually, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture disappointed me when he said that the treasury branches in Alberta had not been consulted about this measure. He went on to say these institutions were lending government money and the purpose of this measure was to lend private capital. I should like to assure him and the house that the treasury branches in Alberta do operate a great deal on private capital. In fact, for a number of years these branches paid a higher rate on deposits than any of the chartered banks.

When I read clause 1 I cannot find where the minister has made provision to consult the treasury branches in the years ahead. Therefore I should like to move the following amendment:

To add after the word "society", line 12 and before the word "that" in line 13, the words "and other financial institutions".

I fully understand that this amendment will not automatically bring in the treasury branches in the years ahead. However, I want to make certain that these banks which have served Alberta so well cannot be automatically excluded. The minister will not be able to say in a year or two that they do not qualify because of the way this provision was written.

By adding these simple words "and other financial institutions" we will make the measure broad enough so that, if after consultation with the Alberta provincial authorities they want to qualify and rearrange their bookkeeping to satisfy the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance, there will be provision in the act to do so and they will not have to come back to parliament in search of a special provision. These financial institutions have done an excellent job in attempting to serve the rural areas of Alberta.

With those remarks, Mr. Chairman, I move this amendment.

I encourage the Minister of Agriculture and his colleagues, and particularly the hon. member to my right who spoke about the need to provide money to farmers, to support this amendment. I am sure this extra competition in the province of Alberta would be welcomed by the farmer.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak to a point of order. I am wondering whether or not this amendment is in order inasmuch as it would appear to increase the possible financial obligations of the government. Perhaps Your Honour might give us some direction on whether an amendment of this type, not presented by the government, would be acceptable for the reason I have suggested.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, there might be some merit to the point raised by the parliamentary secretary except for the fact that paragraph (ii) of subclause (1) of clause 1 refers to "a credit union, caisse populaire or other co-operative credit society". This is an open-ended definition and it leaves it to the discretion of the minister. There are a great number of credit associations and credit unions which might qualify. I hardly think the addition of the words "and other financial institutions" would in any substantial or definitive way add to the financial responsibilities of the government. If there was a limitation in respect of chartered banks, or specifically described institutions which were limited in number, there might be something to be said for the objection, but the eligibility provided by paragraph (ii) is so wide that the objection is not one that should be taken seriously.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, if I understood the parliamentary secretary correctly, he questioned the legality of the amendment because it might result in an increased cost to the government. He must realize that there will be no additional cost unless other institutions apply and qualify. There is nothing to stop the Minister of Agriculture or any other member of the cabinet, for that matter, turning down an application. The amendment does not suggest that all applications must be accepted. It makes provision for application. I fail to see any validity in the argument of the parliamentary secretary that the amendment is out of order.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I thank the honourable members for their enlightening comments, however, in my opinion, the amendment suggested by the honourable member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) goes beyond the terms of the resolution. In point of fact, the resolution preceding the bill under consideration appeared on the order paper of September 16, 1968, and read as follows:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act to provide for a further three-year loan period ending June 30, 1971; to substitute for the 5% rate of interest on guaranteed farm improvement loans made under the Act such rate or rates of interest as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council; to extend the purposes for which guaranteed loans may be made to include the purchase of land as an addition to an existing farm enterprise; to increase from $15,000 to $25,000 the maximum amount of any loan that may be made under the Act to a borrower together with any amount owing in respect of other guaranteed farm improvement loans; to authorize the Minister of Finance to designate certain trust and loan companies and insurance companies and certain credit unions, caisse populaire and other co-operative credit societies as authorized lenders under the Act;

Therefore, for this reason, I declare the amendment unacceptable.

[English]

Mr. Horner: I beg your pardon, sir, I did not hear your final words. Did you say the amendment was out of order?

The Deputy Chairman: I ruled it out of order.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I appeal your ruling to Mr. Speaker.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the deputy chairman of the committee made the following report:

Mr. Speaker, in committe of the whole on Bill C-111, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) proposed an amendment to clause 1 of the bill as follows:

"To add after the word 'society', line 12, and before the word 'that' in line 13 the words 'and other financial institutions.' "

• (5:50 p.m.)

I ruled the proposed amendment out of order on the ground that it went beyond the provisions of the resolution preceding the bill in that the resolution listed specific institutions whereas the proposed amendment would include many institutions not covered by the resolution.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, my participation in the argument will be very brief. I refer you to the resolution which appears at page 36 of Votes and Proceedings. In describing the institutions which may be susceptible of being designated by the Minister of Finance for the purpose of sharing in the capacity to make loans pursuant to this act the following words appear:

—to authorize the Minister of Finance to designate certain trust and loan companies—

Then it goes on to deal with insurance companies and certain credit unions. If it had been the intention of the government to limit or restrict the class of institution that would be susceptible of receiving these guarantees, the government would and should have said so. When we come to examine the bill we find in clause 1 that loan and trust companies are carefully defined, and the meaning of "loan company" as set out in the resolution is very carefully limited. The government has that right, but we are not compelled to look at the terms of the bill in order to decide whether or not that is so.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that you are not compelled to look at the bill to decide what should be the rights of a member to move an amendment and still come within the four corners of the resolution. I suggest that the words "loan company" must be given their widest possible interpretation. There is a general rule, as Your Honour well knows, that if you are on the horns of a dilemma and entertain any reasonable doubt, the benefit of that doubt must be given to the legality of the amendment placed before the house. On that basis I would ask Your Honour to rule that the amendment is in order.

I summarize by saying that if in the resolution the government had seen fit to limit loan companies to the type of companies set out in clause 1, then the point of objection raised by the chairman would have been completely correct and we would have not only accepted it but in that light I am sure no one from this party, which religiously abides by all of the rules, would have moved an amendment. On that basis I ask you to rule that this amendment is in order.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. The chairman of the committee ruled that the amendment exceeded the terms of the resolution. Quite obviously it does because the kinds of institutions, such as credit unions, caisses populaires and loan companies, were spelled out. I could go into a long explanation of why that limitation was placed there. It involves reasons other than the ones raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot who moved the amendment, but I will not do so because I agree that the limitation of the resolution does in fact preclude such an amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I just add one more thought. I agree partly with the Minister of Agriculture. The legislation outlines certain financial institutions such as trust companies, loan companies, insurance companies and credit unions. and out of that group the minister can designate certain companies. But the chairman's ruling was that the amendment went outside the scope of the resolution.

It is my view that we are arguing about something that is quite simple because the minister can always designate the institutions, and all the hon. member for Crowfoot is adding to the clause are the words "and other financial institutions". If the Minister of Finance did not want to have particular institutions included he would not designate them, and if the financial institutions did not want to be designated they could say they did not want to take part in this enterprise. So I do not think this would affect the bill very much. It may widen the provisions with reference to the kind of institutions the minister can choose. I overheard an hon. member over here say this might discriminate against the province of Alberta. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture, in his wisdom, would appreciate he is discriminating against the government controlled treasury branches in the province of Alberta.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Woolliams: There may be other institutions in the province of Quebec because in that province there are many kinds of credit unions. In view of the fact that the minister can always designate the financial institutions, and surely that was intended in the resolution, I would ask Your Honour to give my point serious consideration and upset the chairman's ruling.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal to Mr. Speaker from a decision given by the chairman of the committee of the whole pursuant to section 4 of standing order 59.

In the committee of the whole on Bill No. C-111 the hon. member for Crowfoot proposed an amendment to clause 1 of the bill as follows:

"To add after the word 'society', line 12, and before the word 'that' in line 13 the words 'and other financial institutions' ".

The question is to determine whether the proposed words of the amendment go beyond the terms of the resolution. My view is that if the words proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot by way of amendment do not enlarge the words "financial institutions" used in clause 1 of this bill, then the amendment is redundant and superfluous. If they seek to enlarge the terms of these words, then we have to determine whether the amendment is consistent with the detailed provisions of the resolution preceding the bill. In my view, when a resolution preceding a money bill sets out in detail the terms of the bill, as this one does, we have to be very cautious about amendments which might enlarge upon these terms.

I have to refer hon. members to citation 246 in the fourth edition of Beauchesne at page 207 subparagraph (3), which reads as follows in part:

The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand of recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications.

I suggest to hon. members, with respect, that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot does affect the conditions and qualifications set out in detail in the resolution approved by the house and preceding the bill.

For this reason I feel I have to sustain the decision of the learned and wise chairman of the committee of the whole.

And the house having resumed in committee:

On clause 1—Bank.

• (6:00 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-111. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Schreyer)—Agriculture, biological effects on chickens of microwave tower radiation; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Communications, co-operation with France in space and satellite research.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, public bills. As there are no private bills on today's order paper the house will proceed to the consideration of public bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION FOR ACCESS TO PEOPLE LIVING ON COMPANY PROPERTY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-5, to amend the Criminal Code (company-censored housing).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious that it is public policy, both in the federal and provincial jurisdictions, that workers shall have the right to join trade unions and, having so joined and given proof as required under federal and provincial labour relations acts that the union represents a majority of the workers concerned, shall have the right to bargain collectively and in good faith with the management of the enterprise for whch they work.

The rights of workers to join unions have been spelled out in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and in various provincial labour relations acts. I want to quote a couple of sections from the federal act, the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. Section 3 (1) provides:

> Every employee has the right to be a member of a trade union and to participate in the activities thereof.

Section 4 (1) provides:

> Subject to subsection (2), no employer or employers' organization, and no person acting on behalf of an employer or employers' organization, shall participate in or interfere with the formation or administration of a trade union, or contribute financial or other support to it.

The number of workers both in private industry and in government enterprises in the latter part of 1968 who belong to trade unions of various types amounts to approximately two million. Relationships between labour and management are, in my opinion, on the whole quite satisfactory. It is true that on occasion there are strikes. It is also true that many people think there are too many strikes. All I can say is that the number of days lost in the course of any year, even in the course of this year when there has been a relatively large number of strikes, is very small compared with the number of days lost because of unemployment, over which workers have no control, accidents on the job and sickness.

I think that this is the direction in which most Canadians have wanted labour-management relations to develop. Proof of that can be found in the fact that recently in this parliament we introduced legislation giving those who work for the federal government the same right to belong to a union, indeed to strike if they so desire, that workers in private industry have enjoyed for many years.

The reason for this bill, which essentially proposes a very simple amendment to the section in the Criminal Code dealing with trespassing, is that in certain sectors of our industrial society management has been less than ready to accept what I have indicated I believe to be the clear intent of parliament and the legislatures of Canada. I am referring to workers working in isolated areas, usually in the northern parts of Canada, who are engaged in the woods industry, the mining industry and the steel industry.

As far as I can tell, Mr. Speaker, in every province there have been instances where these workers have been forced, because they have no choice, to live in bunkhouses on company property, and the management has frequently exercised its right under the provisions of the section in the code dealing with trespassing to pick and choose who can and who cannot visit the workers in the company bunkhouses. I am sure the members of the house would be surprised to know that frequently managements have refused union organizers who wish to go on to company property, not to the work site but to visit the workers in their bunkhouses during their free time, access in order to speak to the workers. As a result, I suggest that the clear intent of the law has been violated by employers and management representatives.

I am sure the minister of forestry could tell us about many cases of this sort in the years when he was head of the Confederation of National Trade Unions in the province of Quebec, cases when he and other representatives of his union were forbidden access to various work sites in order to speak to workers there. I know that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) could spend hours telling the members of this house of the difficulties encountered by union representatives when they wanted to organize workers at the Kitimat plant of the Aluminum Company of Canada. I know that in northern Ontario mining and lumber camps have been declared out of bounds to union organizers. In some instances the unions have had to hire a helicopter to fly in their organizers and members because they could not use company-owned roads.

There has also been a number of such cases in the province of Manitoba. A power plant was built for the hydroelectric system of Manitoba at a place called Kelsey. It took almost three years to build this plant and there were anywhere from 1,000 to 3,000 workers at the plant at any one time. Not until the plant was completed and turned over to Manitoba hydro were the construction unions able to talk to the workers at the plant and get them to become members of the union so that they could get certification and bargain collectively.

What has happened as a result of this practice? I have in my files sworn affidavits from workers to the effect that in a period of six months they worked more hours than most workers who put in a 40-hour week work in a whole year. I have sworn affidavits saying that these workers worked an average of 100 hours a week, for seven days a week, six months at a time, and that they sometimes worked from 24 to 36 hours at a time without a rest. Why did they do that, Mr. Speaker? Not because they wanted to but because management said, "If you do not work these hours under these conditions, you will be fired." I suggest that any union would immediately have prevented that kind of exploitation. Yet union members simply were not permitted to enter that site.

Similar situations exist in the city of Thompson at the International Nickel Company's site. Because that company controls several hundred square miles of property in the area and because it had control for about two years of the railway link extending from the Hudson Bay line to the site of the company operation, it told the Canadian National to whom it could sell tickets to come to the property and to whom it could not sell tickets.

What was the result? For almost three years union officials from all unions were prohibited from entering the site and talking to workers. As a member of the legislature I was told I could not go to Thompson and talk to some of my constituents working there about the working conditions they had to endure. When at last I was able to go I was told I could not stay overnight because the local town administrator would not allow strangers to camp or otherwise stay on the site overnight. Not until I told the local administrator that he was free to call the R.C.M.P., that he was free to charge me with trespass, that I was willing to appear before the magistrate and if a fine were imposed I would refuse to pay it and go to jail instead, not until then was there positive action. The company permitted me to visit the site but not to move around on it. I was told that the company would send to me anyone I wished to see. Of course I knew, the company knew, and the workers knew that anyone visiting me would lose his job the next day.

That kind of thing has been going on and will continue to go on as long as employers have the right to abuse the provision of the Criminal Code dealing with trespass. I propose in this bill to introduce a simple amendment that will permit those living in rented accommodation on private property to receive visitors they want to receive. Such visitors might include union organizers who might wish to discuss with workers the question of joining a union.

I do not suggest that workers must join unions. I only suggest that existing federal and provincial legislation spells out the right of workers to join unions if they so wish. If this amendment to the Criminal Code were to obtain passage through the house, a long standing abuse of a section in the Criminal Code would be ended.

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, as a new member rising for the first time in the house may I congratulate you sincerely on your appointment as permanent Speaker. It is obvious that Your Honour is especially well qualified for such a great task. I also congratulate Mr. Deputy Speaker on his appointment and compliment him for the fine manner in which he is carrying out his new responsibilities.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to extend to you as well as to the Chairman of the committee of the whole my sincere congratulations.

[English]

The bill before the house today presents many problems. I suggest it creates more problems than it solves. In my opinion its effect would be to create confusion in a clear and concise section of the Criminal Code. The bill before the house seeks to amend section 41 of the code. Section 41, subsection 1, reads as follows:

> Every one who is in peaceable possession of a dwelling house or real property and every one lawfully assisting him or acting under his authority is justified in using force to prevent any person from trespassing on the dwelling house or real property, or to remove a trespasser therefrom, if he uses no more force than is necessary.

Subsection 2 reads:

> A trespasser who resists an attempt by a person who is in peaceable possession of a dwelling house or real property or a person lawfully assisting him or acting under his authority to prevent his entry or to remove him, shall be deemed to commit an assault without justification or provocation.

The amendment reads as follows:

> (3) Except where a landlord would be therein justified under a covenant with a tenant for quiet enjoyment, nothing in this section shall be deemed to justify an employer in using force to prevent any person from having ingress to, regress over, or egress from a dwelling house or real property in or upon which the employer houses an employee or to remove any person therefrom.

In the first place, the pith and substance of section 41 of the Criminal Code is protection from trespassers and control of trespassers by any person who is in peaceable possession of a dwelling house or by any person lawfully assisting him or acting under his authority. In short, the code provides an extension of normal rights to those against whom a trespass is committed. It extends the law of assault to include a trespasser who resists eviction.

The bill before the house makes an unnecessary exception to this sound law which is sensibly worded and suitably phrased. The intervention of an amendment like this would confound the courts; it would bring upon them utter confusion. There is no reason to limit the rights of employers, as a class, in assisting in the ejectment of trespassers. Employers, like all other citizens, are bound to obey the civil law of landlord and tenant. That law is a provincial matter under section 92 of the British North America Act.

If this bill were passed the law would prohibit an employer from assisting an employee who sought his aid in ejecting a trespasser. Surely nothing could be more absurd. I recognize the humanitarian motive of the hon. member for Winnipeg North in moving this amendment and I have some sympathy for those who have the problems he spoke of. But to translate the hon. member's desires into an amendment to the Criminal Code would, in my submission, cause much expense to be incurred and frustration to be felt. Many innocent people would suffer. The courts would dismiss charges and this part of the Criminal Code, as amended, would be considered void because of uncertainty and ruled out of order. It would give rise to endless cases. The dockets of magistrates throughout Canada would include subjects such as this which would raise difficult problems of interpretation.

For example, the words "quiet enjoyment" have various meanings attached to them, but I have checked the Criminal Code and there is no definition of "quiet enjoyment" to be found in it. "Quiet enjoyment" is a term used in English common law, especially in real estate and landlord and tenant law. It has a long history, but I submit it has no relevancy in Quebec where landlord and tenant law is governed by the Civil Code and other statutes. A magistrate struggling with words which are not applicable to that province would be lost for a definition. They have no meaning in Quebec. The object of the Criminal Code is to standardize the law throughout the country, not the reverse.

I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North is a humanitarian one and I do not quarrel with his thoughts and worth-while suggestions, but I submit the subject matter of his proposal ought properly to be placed before the legislatures of the various provinces.

At such a time in our constitutional development as the present enactment of a bill of this kind would invite the justifiable wrath of provincial legislatures. I am thinking in particular of the great province of Quebec. It would be considered an unwarranted invasion of a provincial sphere of legislation. In any event, it would probably be ruled out by any competent court as void for remoteness, or declared to be null and void for uncertainty.

Apart from the constitutional arguments against this bill, it appears to defeat its own purpose because it would prevent a helpful employer from assisting an employee to evict a trespasser. This could happen. It is not the case that employers and employees are always enemies. It is a notion which seems to be fostered by hon. members of this house who belong to the New Democratic party. But I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that there are many happy and successful companies—I am thinking particularly of the Dominion Foundry and Steel Company in Hamilton—where relations between employees and management are extremely good and where there is no need to worry about interference with employees by employers, because they work in partnership. This is what we are striving for. We are not trying to isolate people by class groups and distinctions; nothing is further from the desire of this house, I am sure. I am also sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) did not realize the implications of his bill.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, he is a fairly bright fellow.

Mr. Gibson: In the days when trespass is not an uncommon invasion of a citizen's rights, it is utterly unthinkable that such a garbled and incoherent amendment should be permitted to slip into the Criminal Code. The idea behind the bill is in the wrong context altogether and the bill itself is self-defeating.

It infringes on the employees' rights to have assistance from their own employer. Perhaps the bill itself is an example of the futility of careless words.

If this house were permitted during the private members' hour to spend one hour a week hearing speeches by six members of parliament lasting a maximum of ten minutes each on controversial subjects, I respectfully submit that a great deal of time would be saved, time which is now wasted, and that a more interesting debate would result. I suggest that rather than discuss bills of this nature in every private members' hour it would be better to allow more latitude for the discussion of current topics such as bilingualism and national unity, the procedural advancement of parliament from the outdated shackles of the past, or the thought behind the legislation which was under consideration earlier. If we were to proceed in this way I suggest that private members' hour would be far more interesting to hon. members and to the public and that the attendance in this house would increase.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would like to return to the subject under discussion and make his suggestion to the procedural committee.

Mr. Gibson: I will take the hint. Bills such as the one before the house today lead us nowhere. Ideas such as this are stale and out of context, and discussion of them is a senseless waste of time. The taxpayers are not paying us to deal with a bill which will never get through and which was never intended to get through, such as the one before us today. I therefore wish to express my sincere desire that this measure be defeated as a verbose and badly phrased mixture of words and phrases which would only create complete chaos. There is an old saying that an Englishman's home is his castle. It is certainly true that an Englishman's home is his home, whether it be a rented apartment, a trailer, a house, a tent or hotel room. In each case the occupant is given some protection by the Criminal Code, and the only result of the passing of this bill would be to restrict those rights and freedoms which are so precious to us all.

So let us reject this bill and, once again, resist the trend to cut down the individual's right to be protected from trespass in the just society. Let us guard against relaxing the law of trespass, a word which has changing meanings from generation to generation. With eavesdropping devices mushrooming in our technological age should we not consider a wider definition of trespass to include unwarranted invasion of privacy? We cannot discuss this fully today in the context of this debate but I feel we should be constantly on our guard to protect the individual's right to justice in a free society.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will permit a personal note. My father was a cabinet minister in the King and St. Laurent governments from 1940 to 1949.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell: Who was King?

Mr. Gibson: I hope you will permit me to say how proud I am to follow in his footsteps in this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear that my friends are behind me tonight because it always gives one a good deal of comfort when one is still unaccustomed to these matters.

I was very interested in the maiden speech of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) and in the attitude he took toward these private bills. I think he will find after he has been here a while that private members' bills do provide an opportunity to express a point of view on things which are sometimes left undone by busy governments. In my experience very few private members' bills have passed the House of Commons, but many of them have greatly influenced public opinion and the attitude of the government of the day. Many changes have come about as a result of private members bringing in resolutions and bills. The hon. member said it was a waste of the taxpayers' money to discuss these measures. In the past we used to get a dinner break from six o'clock till eight. Now we sit until seven, so it really does not cost much more of the taxpayers' money. Members are paid the same salaries whether they stay here and listen to me or not, and I note that some have not stayed to listen.

What the hon. member for Winnipeg North is saying, in a nutshell, is this. Many large companies in Canada, particularly mining and lumber companies, own the land upon which the homes of their employees are built. As I gather from the hon. member's argument in proposing this bill, whether he lives in an apartment or any other kind of home, every man believes his home is his castle. People who need employment with these big companies rent their homes on the employer's property, but they believe those homes are still their castles. The hon. member is complaining about the fact that companies have laid down certain rules and regulations which prevent union people who come on their property from visiting their employees in their homes, for the purpose of organizing unions.

I feel it is an inherent right of everybody to have any visitors he wishes in his home to discuss his personal and business problems, without interference from anyone else. That is an inherent right of every living Canadian. What the hon. member is saying, in a nutshell, is that section 41(1) and (2) of the code protects all but those who would be affected by this proposed measure. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) is really talking about a situation similar to that dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Eskimo case.

The hon. member says there is some discrimination with respect to property rights and the enjoyment of those rights in a case where a person working for a lumber company or a mining company has only one place to live, that is, in homes owned by the company. He is saying that if this is part of an employer-employee contract, then the employee should have the same rights as any other Canadian. With that I am in full accord.

Every man working in Canada has the right to strike and the right to arbitration. We have accepted that for a long time in Canada, and this party goes along with it; but I do believe we have come to a time in the industrial development of this nation when disruption in certain industries disrupts the whole economy of the country. That is why we were privileged in this house recently to have one of those love-in speeches by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), when he expressed his affection for all members on all sides of the house, and regretted the departure of some in the last election. He went on to point out he had taken all necessary steps in reference to the two strikes on the Great Lakes that held up shipments of grain, and cost this nation our grain markets, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) admitted.

Dealing with the question of the right to strike and its effect on the economy, I have been rather surprised to see certain members of the N.D.P. from the province of Saskatchewan, who represent farm ridings, remaining so silent of late in reference to those problems which held up shipments of grain. It may be that they are interested in a very important by-election in B.C. and do not want to disrupt or interrupt the thinking of the working people there, upon whom they are relying for support.

Mr. Perrault: That is imputing motives.

Mr. Woolliams: I am not imputing motives; the fellow isn't in the House of Commons yet. I know your party appreciates having two leaders in the House of Commons; and now we have this third one, this rump leader, who is one of the greatest interrupters of all times. He is carrying on here as he did back among the rustics of the legislature of British Columbia. I believe that is why he has been placed at that end of the chamber.

Mr. Perrault: Away out west.

Mr. Woolliams: Away out west; that is right. But I want to hear what his position is, because I know that if it is left to him to talk until five minutes to seven it will be his job to talk out the bill.

Coming back to the bill itself, I support the amendment it proposes; I think it is good. Every man's home is his castle, and there is duress when an employer owns a man's home and prevents people coming to talk to him about union business or about organizing a union. The code lays down a pretty sound rule of law in reference to people in other circumstances. At page 87 of Crankshaw's Criminal Code of Canada, 1959 edition—I have checked it and there were no amendments so far as this section is concerned—it says:

> There is nothing to prevent a man, who has not been forbidden the premises, from knocking at another's door, but the moment he is told to leave and fails to do so he becomes a trespasser. In such a case, however, the occupier must first require the trespasser to depart before he can justify laying his hands on him for the purpose of removing him and even after refusal he can only justify such force as is necessary to effect his removal.

What the hon. member for Winnipeg North is really saying is that if some union president or organizer comes to an employee's home on the company's property, then the company police or officials say, "You can't visit him for that purpose." That seems to me a discrimination, as far as the right of enjoyment of quiet possession of property is concerned. I congratulate the hon. member upon proposing this amendment because I think it is a good one. It is constitutionally sound. I hope we have a vote on it, and that it passes.

[Translation]

Mr. Herbert Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on this bill, because I consider as important the future of this country and the relationship between employers and employees, and I think the substance of this bill deals with the relationship between employees and employers.

[English]

I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) when he says that collective bargaining is a justified right of employees. I am not one of those who think it is a deterrent to society. It is true that we have had many strikes, some in industry and some in the public service, that have hurt the government and the public. But this serves to show the challenge in the field of industrial relations that lies before us in the years ahead.

We must not forget that collective bargaining preserves the rights of workers. An employer, usually a businessman, is interested in profits and higher productivity. He just may forget that his employees may not have the proper wages and conditions. I think it is essential that unions exist. I think it is also essential that union leaders and locals should be able to contact employees on the property of their employers. I will even suggest it would be practically acceptable for employers to encourage their employees to meet together on the employer's property.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I admit that the collective association of employees is very important for our Canadian society. However, there is no need to go too far in giving rights to the labour unions, especially in the light of section 41 of the Criminal Code which reads as follows:

41. (1) Every one who is in peaceable possession of a dwelling house or real property and every one lawfully assisting him or acting under his authority is justified in using force to prevent any person from trespassing on the dwelling house or real property, or to remove a trespasser therefrom, if he uses no more force than is necessary.

(2) A trespasser who resists an attempt by a person who is in peaceable possession of a dwelling house or real property or a person lawfully assisting him or acting under his authority to prevent his entry or to remove him shall be deemed to commit an assault without justification or provocation.

Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this amendment, it is important to really understand the meaning of section 41 of the Criminal Code. We must keep in mind that, in carrying out this amendment, we open the door to anyone who wants to visit an employee on the employer's property. In fact, section 1 of the bill reads as follows:

—an employer in using force to prevent any person from having ingress to, regress over, or egress from a dwelling house or real property in or upon which the employer houses an employee—

It may happen that the property where the employer houses the employee is exactly on the site of the plant where mining operations or construction works are carried out. Now, the security factor and the employer's right to receive persons other than members of a trade union should be kept in mind. I wholly agree that union leaders may go and meet employees, especially in their apartment or in their bunk-house, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) said, but it must be remembered that persons other than trade unionists may go to these places. It could be people who want to make a disturbance or make trouble for the company for reasons having nothing to do with collective associations.

That is why I cannot support this amendment, because it should deal specifically with trade unions or collective associations.

• (6:40 p.m.)

I believe I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) that it is regrettable that an employee cannot receive a union leader on his employer's premises, especially when it has been proven that unions are indispensable to workers. However I feel this amendment does not specifically cover the point in connection with union leaders or union meetings on an employer's premises. I might be able to support the bill if it specifically covered the point, but this bill does not. One part of the bill reads:

—to justify an employer in using force to prevent any person from having ingress to, regress over, or egress from a dwelling house or real property—

This means that if an employer has a bunk-house right near the mill he will not be allowed to stop trespassers or people who may cause him trouble by entering on his property. I do not believe we would be justified in taking this position. For these reasons, I cannot support this bill.

Criminal Code

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to make a few remarks on Bill No. C-5.

I must nevertheless admit that after listening to the speech of the honourable member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), who moved this amendment, my approach to this bill—and this is perhaps normal—has somewhat changed.

The honourable member for Winnipeg North dealt chiefly with trade union rights, which are actual rights. He spoke of cases where, for instance, heads of companies unjustly decided that certain friends of their employees were not to enter into the temporary dwelling place of those employees.

He also gave examples of trade union heads who wished to meet a group of employees but could not do so and, in order to get over the gates of the company property, had to hire a helicopter to reach their destination.

Obviously, as the representative of a riding where many workers slave all day at various jobs, I cannot contradict the principles of the member for Winnipeg North.

On the contrary, I can only approve them wholeheartedly and say that, with all the other members of the house, I shall spare no effort to improve the fate of our labourers, workers, and low-wage earners, of those who work not only day in and day out, but year in and year out, in very poor working conditions.

However, it seems to me that this amendment, designed to protect the rights of workers and employees—an amendment which is understandable in principle—should, in fact, have been applied to an act which I would prefer to be more explicit than section 41 of the Criminal Code dealing generally with the right of ownership, which is sacred to all Canadian citizens.

On reading the explanatory notes in the bill—which notes must have been prepared by the hon. member for Winnipeg North—I see we are not dealing with houses—and that is what I based my opinion on before coming here today—nor of modern housing rented to employees, but rather of rudimentary sleeping quarters where the companies or general contractors provide accommodation for their employees.

Those notes also indicate that the employees cannot have guests, as do people who live in ordinary rental units.

On the other hand, if I refer to subsections 1 and 2 of section 41 of the Criminal Code, which were quoted by two of the members who spoke before me, I realize that emphasis is placed on the expression or on the meaning of the word "landlord" on the one hand, and "tenant" on the other hand. Emphasis is also given the expression "quiet enjoyment" and, in addition, to "trespassing", or "trespasser" who, by resisting, is said to have committed an assault.

• (6:50 p.m.)

It seems to me that before understanding or trying to understand the amendment, an attempt must be made to understand the spirit of this section, the spirit of that act or those acts which protect the right of ownership in our country. On the basis of the letter of the act, and of what I believe to be the spirit of the act, I have come to the conclusion that the amendment intended to protect the worker should appear elsewhere in the Criminal Code.

When we speak of "trespasser" or "trespassing", to come back to the spirit of section 41, one thinks of someone who introduces himself somewhere without authorization. However, when one thinks of intrusion, one thinks of unwarranted intrusion into a society, a job or a place. We also know that, in Canada, no one, unless he has a special warrant, has the right to trespass on the property of a citizen without the latter's permission.

Therefore, as I said earlier, I was struck by the fact that the spirit of the law seems to place a certain emphasis on the fact of intrusion.

In the explanatory notes, it is written that these dormitories are not rented——in the ordinary way.

I am thinking of companies that build small shacks, small camps, which can be comfortable for a period of time in the right season, and which are not rented. The people who live in them are neither landlords nor tennants. The landlord is the company, the contractor.

I think that we should normally respect private ownership which is a basic principle in our Canadian policy and philosophy.

We should also consider the point of view of the landlord. Usually, on these camp sites, there are dangers of all kinds, abuses of all kinds, for humans.

The security aspect also has to be considered.

That is why, in most cases, as we all know, the owner of buildings, the contractor or the company, enforce some rules so as to ensure order on their property.

Furthermore, it is normal also for the contractor, the owner or the company, while respecting the rights of the workers, to be concerned with work efficiency, a smooth operation and results.

There are also sanitary and welfare reasons, but I shall dispense with them.

There is also the principle concerning order. The contractor must enforce regulations so that general order may prevail on his properties.

I think now of certain facts which I have witnessed and even experienced in the Quebec area from where I come and especially in northern Quebec.

I remember how, a few years ago, all our fellow-citizens looked with interest at the huge construction sites at Labrieville; they were managed by a landlord who was the Quebec government. The government was also a contractor who had to respect the rights of the workers. When the Bersimis river dam was built, severe rules were applied. Just any Quebec or Canadian citizens, just anybody, was not allowed across the barrier, even along the 85-mile road connecting Forestville and Labrieville.

I also remember the campsites during the construction of the dam at Lac Cassé, somewhere in the same area, and all those clearing jobs that went on: clearing the land, the shores and the rivers, when the dam was built. The contractor built bunk-houses for a relatively short time, usually for the summer. Let me tell you that the rules have to be strict, and that order has to be maintained.

The same goes for logging contractors' campsites. Back home, in my area, every year we have several campsites which are really rudimentary bunk-houses. Those same camps are used by students, young people during the summer months when the weather is good, to do forestry work. When I read this bill, it brought to my mind those sites, that type of work.

But I also thought of the matter of jurisdiction, which is most important and which I do not feel clashes with the rights of workers and labourers. Does this not, I told myself, fall within provincial jurisdiction? I know full well that several provincial departments, of which those of Labour, Health, Forestry, prepared regulations and complied with special laws concerning the facilities in those camps, the protection of the worker and the labourer, and the condition of the bunk-houses of which mention is made in the explanatory notes.

There is something else everyone knows which I should like to mention here. When we speak of constitution, of jurisdiction, whether it be that of federal or provincial governments, we always think of the B.N.A. Act and of section 92 which stipulates that in every province, the legislature has the exclusive right to legislate in certain matters. Amongst others, I see that according to subsection 13 of section 92, "ownership and civil rights" fall within its jurisdiction. We are dealing here with criminal law, but in Quebec, as mentioned a while ago, special legislation applies relating to civil law.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The time for private members business has expired. If there is consent we will resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING PERIOD, RESPECTING INTEREST RATES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-111, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act—Mr. Olson (for Mr. Benson)—Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

The Chairman: As it is now seven o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At seven o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks with respect to clause 1 of this bill, and some of the discussion that has taken place so far on this clause. I found it of some interest to note the performance of the government and the attitude of the government in dealing with the legislation now before us. Some of us are rather new to this house and to the ways of the house, but I must say that we are not so new that we could not see the pattern of some of the things that have been done, and the approach that has been used in dealing with some of the questions raised in connection with farm credit legislation.

The performance of the government with regard to some of these questions has been rather disappointing. I found it interesting that during the resolution stage the opposition were interested in a number of points with respect to the legislation to come, and we were told, "Let us get this resolution through, and then we will get to the bill and deal with all these things at that time." Then we came to second reading of the bill and virtually the same answer was given to our questions, "Let us give the bill second reading and get it into the committee stage, and then we will deal with some of these problems." Now we are at the committee stage and we are still asking questions and still have not the information we would like to have.

It may be that part of the reason we are not getting information with regard to matters in which we are interested is that the government simply does not know the answers. If the house was dealing with a completely new operation, a completely new bill, we could not expect the government to have all the administrative factors and details worked out, and we would have to allow them a little leeway to establish the operation. But in fact we have here an operation that has been in effect for some 23 years, namely since 1945, as the minister pointed out. It has been obvious since some time last winter that changes were required to the act and that amendments would be forthcoming, but it seems that a great many of the problems still have not been worked out.

After considerable prying the opposition has succeeded in getting some information from the government. If some government members are disturbed about the length of the debate on this question, I would simply note for them that if they had urged that more homework be done in the preparation of the bill, perhaps it would not be taking quite so long to deal with it. They should speak to the minister in this regard.

There has been a considerable amount of discussion with respect to the extension of the definition of the term "bank" which sets out those institutions which can qualify to act as lending agencies under this legislation. With respect to credit unions, caisses populaires, co-operative credit societies and trust and loan companies, the minister has indicated, if I understood him correctly, that all they would have to do would be to apply, and it would be just a matter of course for the minister to give the proper designation under which they could make loans under the act. I find this rather curious. Why should they not automatically qualify under the terms of this act rather than having to go through this little extra procedure, if there is no reason for doing it? It seems to me there is good reason for taking a very close look at some of these institutions before they are qualified as lending agencies. That is why I have already asked questions in respect of this legislation. I find that consultation with these institutions has been very limited. I gave an example of an institution where I am acquainted with some of the officials, who told me they had absolutely no knowledge of what was happening in respect of this program, and there had been no consultation with them.

The minister suggested to the hon. member for Crowfoot that if the Alberta treasury branch was interested in acting as a lending agency, they would make this desire known. I find this rather curious. If there is no opportunity for consultation, how can one deal adequately with the situation? I also asked the question as to what criteria would be used in designating whether an organization could act as a lending agency. I find there are really no criteria to be used. I suggested earlier—and I refer the minister to my remarks—some of the reasons why criteria are needed. I think it can be shown quite easily that some institutions would qualify very well, from a managerial standpoint, to act as lending agencies; but I seriously question whether this is the case with regard to some of the other lending organizations which may apply for qualification. This is a matter that the minister should be prepared to discuss further.

I asked, also, whether there was going to be any co-ordination or integration of the entire lending program to be carried out under this act. I asked what approach will be used and whether any policy framework will be set up by which the lending agencies will have to live. There was certainly no indication that this would be the case. I believe this is a deficiency in the legislation. This is a very real question. What are some of the new agencies going to do? They will certainly protect their own interests in lending money, and they really do not have much to worry about as a result of being able to operate under a government guarantee.

The hon. member for Mackenzie this afternoon raised a very valid point when he suggested that an individual might apply to the Farm Credit Corporation, be turned down in respect of an application for a loan, and then submit an application to one of these lending agencies and obtain the loan with a full government guarantee and backing. This is the type of unco-ordinated program that I believe could have a serious effect upon the structure of the agricultural industry. Certainly I think this is a matter which has to concern hon. members in dealing with this bill.

Subclause (2) is in the area with which we are most concerned in this regard, the provision which extends the Farm Improvement Loans Act operations to land purchases where the purchases are an addition to an existing owner operated farm. The minister said, in answer to earlier inquiries by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, that it would be easier to handle these loans this way than through the Farm Credit Corporation. As the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar pointed out, it is no easier to handle such applications through one of the lending agencies. You have to deal with legal papers, and there are legal and appraisal costs, just the same as there would be for the Farm Credit Corporation. At the same time I think it would be acknowledged that there are some deficiencies in the Farm Credit Corporation Act in dealing with such applications at the present time. I would suggest to the minister, as I am sure has occurred to him, that these particular problems could very easily be remedied by making the necessary amendments to the Farm Credit Corporation Act when it comes up.

Possibly at first glance it may seem to some hon. members that the principle of extending the Farm Improvement Loans Act operations to land purchases is a good thing, but I would suggest that it raises some serious questions. First of all it undermines the Farm Credit Corporation operations, because that corporation has tried to deal with land transfers and with the development of farm units on a rational and economic basis. They may not have been successful in all cases, but nevertheless I think this has been the direction in which their policy and operations have pointed, and they are to be commended for what they have done in this regard. I suggest that the extension of the Farm Improvement Loans Act operations to land purchases will in effect nullify and counteract some of the good work that has been done by the Farm Credit Corporation in this regard.

I would also suggest that the extension of this particular feature of the act will result in more pressures on land prices, and I am sure hon. members realize some of the problems that this will create. It will also help those who are already better off, because I am quite sure it is obvious to hon. members that the economics involved for a person who is adding a parcel of land to an existing farm unit are far different from the economics involved for a person who is establishing a farm unit on his own. It will further speed the trend toward rural depopulation, where in many cases this cannot be justified.

So I think that we in this house have to be concerned with the future of the agricultural industry, and we have to take note of just where this is going to take agriculture and the people who are engaged in this industry. I think it will have detrimental effects on the industry, I think that the necessary provision for the addition to farms could be made through the Farm Credit Corporation Act, and that this could be done when that bill is under discussion a little later on in the session.

Therefore I would like to move the following amendment:

That clause 1 be amended by striking out subclause (2) thereof.

Subclause (2) is that portion of clause 1 which appears at the top of page two of the printed bill. I want to assure the committee that it is not my desire in moving this amendment in any way to deny farmers the opportunity of adding to their farm units, because I realize that this is a desirable thing to do; but I would suggest that rather than doing it under this particular act which will have the detrimental effects I have pointed out, we should do it by amending the Farm Credit Corporation Act. Therefore I commend this amendment to the members of the house.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, we would like to see this amendment defeated because we believe that including as an additional purpose of this act the purchase of small parcels of land within the terms that have been laid down in other clauses, such as the $25,000 maximum limit, in other words providing an additional $10,000 for land, is a very valuable improvement to the act. Therefore we would like to see the amendment defeated.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the minister could explain what the new amendment is. I did not follow it, but I am sure the hon. minister did because he was so definite about it.

Mr. Olson: The amendment is really very simple. The hon. member moved that subclause (2) be struck from clause 1.

Mr. Woolliams: Did the hon. member not suggest that something be substituted therefor?

Mr. Olson: The effect of it would be to remove the provision in the new act which would allow the banks to make loans guaranteed by the government for the purchase of small parcels of land. So we do not accept it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Burton) negatived: Yeas, 4; nays, 82.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two on clause 2. There has been a lengthy and very informative discussion on clause 1, and perhaps what could be said on clause 2 has already been said.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I am a little concerned about some aspects of clause 2, particularly in regard to interest rates. The new Bank Act and interest rates are now subject to competitive conditions. In the last six months or so we have seen the effect of competition on interest rates and general borrowings.

The treasury branches in Alberta have played a tremendous part, Mr. Chairman, in this aspect of competitive banking during the last few years. It seemed to me on reading the resolution that preceded the bill that the general intent of the minister was to widen the scope of lending institutions. If that was so, then I can only say I am disappointed that he excluded from the bill the treasury branches in the province of Alberta that played a prominent part in the maintenance of competitive banking in that province. I notice the Minister of Agriculture applauding that statement, which could perhaps be interpreted as complimentary to the treasury branches of Alberta. However, he is a little late clapping his hands now.

I have never been a particularly strong advocate of the Social Credit party to which he belonged, Mr. Chairman, but I would be the first to say that I am not so blind as to recognize good points made by those who have disagreed with me in the past. One of the best things that the present premier of the province of Alberta, and his predecessor, did for that province was to exhort the treasury branches in Alberta to be competitive with the banks.

I was also terribly disappointed earlier today to hear the minister say that in recent months there has been no consultation with these treasury branches that played a great part in financing farmers in rural Alberta. I was all the more disappointed that this hon. gentleman, who had crossed the aisle—had stepped across an imaginary line, so to speak—had changed so quickly. He has cast aside his old ideals for the prestige of being Minister of Agriculture. He has cast aside all those things he cared about, such as the farmers with whom he campaigned in past elections in the province of Alberta. I feel sorry, Mr. Chairman, for those farmers.

All through this debate, Mr. Chairman, we on this side have attempted to peg down a formula for the setting of interest rates in years ahead. The reason we were so dedicated in our attempt to have a formula written into the bill was because we have seen this great transition on the part of a man who campaigned across the country on behalf of the farmers and said that a rate of 2 per cent was all that was required to lend money.

The loan sharks, the trust companies, are the ones who have adopted Social Credit policies, Mr. Chairman. They have fed this idea of debt free money. They have said that they would provide money at low interest rates so that the farmers can finance their operations. The members in the rump have questioned the intelligence of those of us in the opposition. Yet we have seen this minister cast aside his cares, his plea for low interest rates for the farmers, and say, in effect, that we should give the Minister of Finance or the Liberal government the right to set whatever rate they feel is justified.

The minister shakes his head. In the House of Commons the other evening the Minister of Finance happened to be present and I asked him what a charter to a bank means. I asked him whether it meant anything. The Minister of Finance quoted a former governor of the Bank of Canada; and I, Mr. Chairman, should like also to quote what a former governor of the Bank of Canada said with regard to whether or not a charter to a bank is not, in effect, putting a bank into position similar to that of a public utility. This is what Mr. Coyne had to say when questioned very closely in the finance, trade and economic affairs committee on March 3, 1966, as reported at page 92 of the committee report:

A bank certainly cannot make every decision from the point of view of immediate profits. It has to look to the future development of its business, to the welfare of its customers. A bank cannot prosper unless its customers prosper. It has to have regard, I would think, for the welfare of the area—

I am speaking here of areas engaged in agriculture.

—in which it operates; and certainly this would be more true of a regional bank than of a bank spread all over the country without attachment to any one particular place.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, this former governor told the bank that it should pay close attention to the segment of the economy and the area that it was serving, that it must do this in accepting its charter.

I have some reservation about the near banks, the trust companies. The act refers to loan companies; I was tempted to say "loan sharks" but I would not want to say anything that was not in the act itself. These loan companies are going to be able to qualify for the purposes of the act and will be able to lend money. I have no hesitation in including the treasury branches in Alberta because they have already served a particular segment of our economy. The minister can smile smugly about this.

Mr. Olson: He is ready to reply right now.

Mr. Horner: The minister has not really answered the question about the charter of a bank. I asked the Minister of Finance a few days ago what he believed a charter meant, and he said that a bank had to agree to whatever bank rate was set. In effect that was his answer.

Two nights ago in the house I said that the government is the seat of power. In our dealings with the banking institutions of this country we have been very scrupulous. We have prohibited the foreign ownership of a certain bank in this country solely because we wanted to assert that forever and a day the banks of Canada would work to the general advantage of Canadians. The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance say that the interest rates cannot be set too low or the banks would not lend money. They say their hands are tied, that they have to agree to the rate set by the banks.

I admit that my interest in this matter may be swayed by my personal interest in agriculture. I am a dedicated farmer and concerned about the desperate plight the industry faces today. Our difficult harvest has not aroused in me feelings of enthusiasm with regard to this bill. I am participating in the debate on a piece of legislation that seeks to hoist interest rates the agricultural industry must pay. I am not happy at that prospect, as some are on the government benches. They have been smiling all night.

An hon. Member: And laughing.

Mr. Horner: Banks must be told that their charters are privileges. Both Mr. James Coyne, the former governor of the Bank of Canada, and the inspector general of banks, have stated in committee that they consider banks to be quasi public utilities. If that is so, then I say that the government, which has the power, ought to say to the banks, "See that you co-operate whole-heartedly with the agricultural industry and make money available to it at the lowest possible rate of interest." Only then will our guarantee mean something. The minister nods his head. A couple of days ago he said that, so far as he was concerned, the government's guarantee to the banks meant that the farmers would have to pay 1 per cent less for their money. I then tried to learn from the Minister of Finance his conception of the meaning of a bank's charter, and whether banks were obligated to lend money at 1 per cent less than the going rate. I could not learn from him what he thought a charter meant to a bank. I could only conclude that he was in the hands of the banks.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Horner: He had pretty well accepted their ideas.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Horner: I would not say he was a pawn in the hands of the chartered banks, but if he was not, he came awfully close to that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: That is the impression he left. No doubt the Minister of Agriculture wants to say, "No, he was not." Perhaps we ought to hear from the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, because the Minister of Finance cannot be here. This is the end of the week, and his day off. At the beginning of the week ministers responsible for financial matters are supposed to be in the house; the Minister of Agriculture is to be here at the end of the week. This cabinet operates on a three day basis. The Minister of Agriculture must know, as I know and as every farmer knows, that all across Canada, down to the remotest parts of Newfoundland, farmers put in seven days a week and 16 hours a day. Yet the Prime Minister had the gall to say that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who speaks for the wheat board, can only be in this house for three days a week. That is enough of a week for him. Also the Minister of Agriculture can be here for only three days a week. If one dares to ask a question to do with the agricultural industry before the Minister of Agriculture is to be in the house the Prime Minister will stand up and say, "Surely this question can wait until tomorrow. The minister may be here tomorrow." I call that contempt of the agricultural industry.

Mr. Woolliams: Or of any other industry.

Mr. Horner: The government has on the order paper four pieces of legislation that will increase interest rates for farmers. None of this legislation spells out just how rates are to be increased. We have asked many questions; we have asked the minister if he has a formula; but he has just hedged and squirmed. We thought we had him pinned down once, when he said the rate would not be more than 1 per cent above the prime government borrowing rate. That is what he said three or four nights ago. But since then he has not been so confident. A little while ago he suggested that the interest rate would fluctuate quarterly, or that there might be two interest rates. I suppose one will be based on the rate paid on long term government borrowings, and the other on the short term borrowings. I do not know, and he has not told us.

We have tried to co-operate and to push this bill through as quickly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: The other day we asked the government to bring forward as quickly as possible the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. I see the minister nods his head. And what are we to consider tomorrow? Estimates, and not agriculture.

Mr. Olson: We have some time left tonight.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Horner: In so far as it lies within my power to do so, I shall do my best to see that the present bill passes tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: Oh, yes. I see hon. members agree with me completely. They are pounding their desks.

With that thought in mind I would move the following amendment:

That clause (2) at line 42 be amended by striking out the words after "at" and inserting the following:

"a rate of interest half of 1 per cent above the quarterly average of short term government borrowings, not to exceed 7 per cent per annum."

As will be seen, we realize that interest rates have risen steadily since the government took the lid off them. Let no one call us ultra conservative. If the amendment is accepted the interest rate will fluctuate to a maximum of 7 per cent, a full 2 per cent above the old interest rate set under this act. No one can say our party is not generous to banks. If the minister rejects our amendment he will be saying, "I am not too concerned about the agricultural industry."

The report of the Economic Council says that our agricultural industry must have capital. We have given full vent to our imagination in our amendment in trying to recompense banks adequately for agricultural loans. For this bill to have practical application the banks must be entitled to charge the high interest rates brought on since this government removed the old 6 per cent bank rate ceiling.

According to statistics and from what I have learned from the Bank of Canada, the present rate on 182-day bills is $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. That would mean that, under our amendment, the banks could charge a full $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent more than they could charge when the act become null and void on June 30. The minister cannot therefore say that our amendment will not allow the bank to earn enough, and that therefore money will not be made available to agriculture.

He has sources of information not available to me. He knows what the banks want. He has talked to them, but he did not disclose that to us. He has talked to the financial institutions; he knows what they want. If he can stand up here and say that this amendment would, if adopted, bring about a higher rate of interest, then I would be the first to withdraw the amendment. We on this side have felt that because of the recent about-face in connection with interest rates on the part of the minister we could not give him carte blanche in the absence of certain assurances. I tried to get an assurance from the Minister of Finance the other day, but I failed to draw him out. In the absence of any assurance from the minister or his colleague we felt we were obliged to place a ceiling on the amount which could be charged. We drew up this amendment carefully, bearing in mind that the ceiling ought to be set high enough to encourage the banks and other lending institutions to make loans to farmers.

I hope the minister will not take recourse to defensive arguments or points of order regarding the validity of the amendment. I hope he will deal with the question we have raised. As I say, if the interest rate he contemplates is lower than the one we suggest I shall be quick to withdraw the amendment and support the clause under review.

Mr. Olson: I wish to say that this amendment is unacceptable for a number of reasons. First of all, it would change the concept of having a prescribed rate, so that we could make arrangements with the banks and other institutions under which there would be maximum availability of credit to the people who want to use it.

Then there is the ambiguity as to what "short term" means. Does it mean 90-day treasury bills? Does it mean 180-day treasury bills? Does it relate to bonds which have been issued? The hon. member for Crowfoot knows very well that if he means 90-day treasury bill—

Mr. Horner: I should like to tell the minister I specifically referred to 180-day government bills. I referred specifically to these, and I believe I was speaking loudly enough for him to hear.

Mr. Olson: Well, with all respect to the intention of the hon. member, that is not what the amendment says. The amendment uses the phrase "short term" and we have no way of getting the hon. member's interpretation printed into the act, unless he puts down those words himself; and he has not done that.

Mr. Horner: Is the minister speaking on a point of order or is he making a reply to the speeches made on the amendment?

Mr. Olson: We are not questioning the good order—

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I was not addressing the minister; I was addressing the Chair. Is the hon. gentleman speaking on a point of order or is he discussing the amendment itself?

The Deputy Chairman: I think the Chair should put the amendment, first, and then the Minister of Agriculture can take the floor. I might point out that the amendment contains a reference to the word "at". There is no "at" in line 42, but there is one at the end of line 41.

Mr. Olson: As I was saying, regardless of whether or not we can spell out the meaning of "short term" with enough precision, the government takes the position that we need a prescribed rate of simple interest, and that the amendment is therefore unacceptable.

I should like to say one or two words about the very long speech the hon. member made about the treasury branches in Alberta. I wonder whether he could take his tongue out of his cheek long enough to admit that he did not really mean what he was saying. The government of Alberta does not need any guarantee from the federal government of the nature referred to. It was just a red herring in the first place.

Mr. Horner: On a point of order. The hon. minister has imputed motives to me. I was not speaking with my tongue in my cheek. I was speaking with as much sincerity as anyone can address to this important subject. The minister can snigger all he likes. The government of Alberta asked for guarantees from the federal government in respect to crop insurance. I think my question was a legitimate one and the hon. gentleman should withdraw his suggestion.

Mr. Olson: There is no point of order involved there.

Mr. Horner: There certainly is. The minister imputed motives.

Mr. Olson: Well, if the remarks I made were offensive to the hon. member for Crowfoot I should like to withdraw them. Anyway, he tried to make a case out of the fact that we were not guaranteeing loans made by the provincial governments. He knows that neither Alberta nor any of the other provinces would want the federal government to take action which would affect their treasury departments. The provinces have the right in law to set up their own branches of government, to conduct inspections and carry out the investigation of their own branches as thought necessary, without any assistance from the federal government. In spite of the fact that the act has been in existence since 1945, the treasury branch in Alberta has never applied to the federal government for guarantees. Indeed, even if these were offered I am sure they would not be accepted.

The hon. member also knows that the treasury branches can make these loans to farmers whenever they like. Under section 95 of the British North America Act the provincial governments have almost equal power as far as providing services to agriculture are concerned. In fact, they have made such services available. Not only Alberta but other provincial governments have done so in this field. I do not accept the argument that the province of Alberta wants the federal government to guarantee these loans to farmers. I can recall many times during the 'fifties and early 'sixties when the treasury branches did in fact make many loans to farmers for the purchase of equipment.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): That was in the free money days.

Mr. Olson: They lent it at 5 per cent when the chartered banks were charging 6 per cent on most of their loans. As I say, there is no need for this kind of guarantee and I do not think it would be appreciated by the province of Alberta.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, so far I have taken no part in the debate on this measure but the remarks which the minister has just made, which I think were quibbing, concerning the difficulty in determining interest with respect to short term loans raised by the dominion government, have caused me to rise to my feet. There should be no difficulty whatever for the federal government to compute on a three month or six month basis the cost to it of short term money. That would be on three month and six month treasury bills. These are issued every week and, as I say, there should be no difficulty determining the rate of interest. From that point of view the amendment moved by the hon. member for Crowfoot is absolutely in order.

What concerns me more is that this clause gives a blank cheque to either the Minister of Finance or the cabinet, I do not know which, to set the interest rate at any figure he or they wish. The House of Commons has always been loath, indeed very chary, in giving blank cheques to the government in office. It is a bad practice to do so. It is particularly dangerous in view of the fact the present government is one which does not to any large extent represent the agricultural interests of the country. It is chiefly representative of urban areas. It is a government which has probably less consciousness of the needs of agriculture, and of what can be done to agriculture by acts of government, than any other government that has been in office in Canada.

The reason for that is not the fault of the government. The reason is that this is more and more becoming an urbanized country, and it so happens that the number of members on the government benches coming from rural areas is the smallest, percentagewise, of any government we have had in this country. That is one of the reasons why it is dangerous to put into the hands of the minister, or the government, the power to set these interest rates. And so, Mr. Chairman, in accordance with what has been past precedent so far as parliament is concerned, the government should not be given a blank cheque in this regard. Therefore there should be some saving provision such as the one provided in this amendment. If there is any real objection, and I do not think there can be, to placing the figure at one quarter per cent above the cost of short term money to the government, then a definite maximum should be stated, such as 7 per cent or something along that line.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Crowfoot is probably acceptable, except that I do not agree with the principle that the interest rate on farm loans should fluctuate with the general market interest rate. If farmers must receive assistance on the matter of the interest rate it should be through the form of subsidization.

Farm economy is so dependant on the borrowing of money that I believe we must think of this matter, not in terms of the banks and other lending institutions but in terms of the agricultural industry. Since this amending bill will cover borrowing for the acquisition of land it has a long term aspect, and for that reason we should be careful about freeing the interest rate and allowing it to fluctuate according to the market rate.

The provisions of the amendment suggesting a prime borrowing rate and establishing a ceiling are probably not unrealistic. The result would probably be more than we could expect from the banks if they were given a free rein. Previously I pointed out that on a total of $200 million provided for farm improvement loans our subsidization cost was something like $3 million, which is not much greater than the prime rate at which the government can borrow money.

The net effect of the amendment proposed by the hon. member will probably be the same as that arising from the government's proposal. For that reason, and since I am opposed to the idea of a fluctuating interest rate, I find his amendment unworthy of support.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman from Calgary South—

Mr. Harkness: Centre.

Mr. Gray: —from Calgary Centre asked whether the interest rate would be prescribed by the minister or by the governor in council. This is something which might more appropriately be dealt with on clause 5. The provisions of that clause will make it possible for the interest rate to be prescribed by regulation. That clause is an amendment to section 6 of the act which confers the power on the governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, to make regulations covering a number of matters. If the appropriate amendment is carried it will mean that the governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister responsible for the act, will be able to prescribe the rate of interest payable by a borrower.

As the Minister of Agriculture has pointed out, it is intended to lay down a formula covering the various aspects that he touched on in his remarks the other day, a flexible formula that will make it possible for the banks to have a reasonable return and at the same time provide an incentive to them to make these important and necessary loans, that they are not making under the present interest rate. As the Minister of Agriculture has pointed out, if the house should adopt this bill as proposed by the government, farmers will be able to get loans of this type at lower interest rates than they are able to get them at now, and there will be greater availability of this necessary form of credit.

Let me conclude on the other point made by the hon. member for Calgary South—

Mr. Woolliams: Calgary Centre. Calgary South is your member.

Mr. Gray: That shows that there are a number of distinguished members in this house from Calgary. It is true that as a result of changes in population trends in this country, more and more members represent urban areas. I think it should be clear that on the government side of the house, and in the government portion of the other side of the house there are a number of very capable members representing the rural areas, not the least of which is of course is the Minister of Agriculture himself.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Put a flower in his teeth.

Mr. Gray: I think we should recognize, all of us, whether we represent rural areas, urban areas or both, it is our duty to legislate to the best of our ability in the interests of all the people in this country. We have this obligation whether we represent rural areas or urban areas. The hon. member for Crowfoot has an obligation to try to join in legislating in the best interests of the people in urban areas, and those of us who come from urban or semi-urban areas have a similar responsibility in respect of the people in the rural parts of this country.

We have often criticized in this house various forms of separatism in this country. Surely a form of separatism as nefarious as any other is one which attempts to divide Canadians in urban areas from rural areas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gray: We have an obligation, therefore, to support legislation of this type whether we come from the cities, towns, villages or farms in this country. We have an obligation to work together in the best interests of our country.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would answer this question? He has suggested the rate of interest would be a reasonable one. Suppose this measure were passed now, just as the government has drafted it, what would be the rate of interest charged to western farmers?

Mr. Whelan: How about the eastern farmers?

Mr. Gray: The hon. member for Essex makes a good point.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, answer the question.

Mr. Gray: I am answering the question. You may not want to hear the answer, and that is why you are interrupting. The Minister of Agriculture has already pointed out in detail that the formula is being worked out along the lines of the general principles he mentioned when he spoke the other day. Certainly this rate, to which I alluded as well, will be the one which is accepted as being proper—

Mr. Horner: By the banks.

Mr. Gray: —by all concerned.

Mr. Schreyer: May I ask a question? I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary if he was serious when he said the details are just being worked out. Does he mean that this legislation has been before us for three weeks, and the government is still working out the details?

Mr. Gray: I would say to the hon. member that I think he has added a meaning to the words I used which certainly was not intended. I was attempting, in making the answer, to say that the Minister of Agriculture felt he was not in a position to announce a definite formula on which the interest rate would be based. I did not intend my words to go any further than that.

Mr. Woolliams: He does not know the rate of interest, yet he talks with great verbosity.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask a simple question? Who is working out this rate of interest? Is it a computer, the just society, the government, or who?

Mr. Horner: The banks.

Mr. Skoberg: In rising to speak to the amendment, I should like to say that it is clear to me at this time the government is allowing the money markets to manipulate the rate of interest as they see fit. I believe a perfect example of this fact is exactly what was said a while ago, in the attempt to set one part of the country against the other. Agriculture is agriculture from one end of the nation to the other. There is no way the minister or his assistant can possibly distort that picture. We know very well that the economy must now have money poured into it.

I have reservations about the amendment before us because I am firmly convinced the interest rate should be pegged at 5 per cent, with subsidies in addition. However I realize that half a loaf is better than none. Surely this government will realize it is imperative that the people in this nation who need assistance receive that assistance. However, they cannot accept assistance when the interest rate attached to that assistance is left to the discretion of the governor in council. I suggest the government is remiss in its duty to the people of this country if they do not take immediate action to peg the interest at a rate the people of this country can afford.

I am sure the minister is aware of the fact that the farmers union has gone on record as indicating that the farmers are in urgent need for money at this time. However the letter states, and I am sure the minister received a copy of it, that the union is definitely against an open end interest rate. The amendment we have before us permits the interest rate to rise to 7 per cent under the guarantee. I am sure the young farmers in this country cannot make use of money borrowed at that rate.

The farmers cannot make use of loans that will have an open end interest rate. There has to be some provision for the young farmers of this country. So far as I am concerned, there has to be a three year interest free provision, if we expect our farm units to be able to work. We all know that good sales at a good price would be sufficient to remedy the situation. Right now these farmers cannot sell their grain and they must have money made available to them. We know very well, Mr. Chairman, if the bill before us is passed without amendment, then the rate of interest will constitute usury. I am positive this government will stand accused and convicted in the eyes of the entire nation including the entire agricultural population. I am in favour of the motion, but I feel the interest rate should be pegged at 5 per cent.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, it appears quite obvious to me that the reason the minister is not prepared to announce the interest rate is that he knows the rate would not be acceptable to the opposition or to the agricultural community. Otherwise there is no reason the rate could not be announced at the moment.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I have said many times that I was not hedging, I was not keeping any secrets. I do not know precisely what the optimum interest rate will be, but it has to be at a point at which the banks and other institutions will make credit available in a sufficiently large volume. I have said that over and over again.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a question?

Mr. Olson: I have just one other point. I cannot understand my friends in the official opposition opposing the wording of this provision, because in 1960 they did bring in the Small Businesses Loans Act, and they wrote into that bill at that time precisely the same wording that is here.

Mr. Skoreyko: That is a different thing.

Mr. Olson: If my hon. friend tells me the small businessmen in this country are not deserving of any consideration, then he is stating the opposite of what the opposition said.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Olson: You do not have the floor.

The Deputy Chairman: The minister has the floor.

Mr. Olson: When the opposition were introducing this concept into the Small Businesses Loans Act, they spoke about giving it the kind of flexibility that was needed. This is precisely what we are doing here, so I do not understand the objection to it now.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, as a member who represents a fishing area on the east coast I do not profess to be an expert on farming operations. However, let me assure hon. members that we are interested in the affairs of the farmers in the western part of Canada. Surely the members representing western Canada will not agree to any legislation which precludes the establishment of an interest rate which is reasonable, and in accordance with the terms of this legislation.

My colleagues have said that unless the minister can come to some agreement respecting the rate of interest, or at least a formula for setting the maximum, this will not be acceptable to almost every member in this portion of the house. I endorse this feeling. In spite of my background and the location of my riding I am concerned about the farmers of western Canada. These people should be given some indication of the government's plan, and I think the minister should answer some of the questions asked.

Mr. Hales: Surely we cannot leave unexplained what the Minister of Agriculture has said about approved loan administration. Nor can we let go unquestioned, what he has said about the introduction of this farm improvement loans program which was introduced by the Conservative government in the 1960's. At that time the rate was fixed at 6 per cent. What we now face is an entirely different situation. The banks can now make these loans without a ceiling on interest. Surely we will find ourselves in a difficult situation, with the bankers on the one hand raising the interest rates and the farmers on the other hand unable to pay.

Let me say to the parliamentary secretary that the should talk with the people from the rural parts of this country and ask their support in approval of what the Minister of Agriculture is now trying to accomplish. I am sure that he would be supplied with information that is contrary to the information he apparently has in his possession. If he met with any bank manager in the area of the country I represent I am sure he would be told that this floating interest rate will create great difficulties, not only for the farmers but for the management of these financial institutions which will qualify under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take exception to the minister's recollection of what happened between 1958 and 1960 under the government of the Conservative party. At that time the minister of agriculture advocated many things this government, supported by the Liberal party, opposed. The government of today is supporting many of the things that members of the Liberal opposition of that day rejected.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I want to tell the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance that I come from a combined rural and urban constituency. Let me assure him that we do not need the assurance from the government to indicate that things are different, or that the situation is otherwise than as the people of the city of Regina realize about the farm situation in this country. These people want to see a prosperous farm community.

It is certain that the majority of the people in my constituency will support a low level interest rate for farmers, namely the 5 per cent level. We now have this proposal before us which will allow by legislation a higher interest level. This will allow an interest rate higher than the farmers are at this present time paying. The new rate will be much higher than the farmers can pay at the present time, in view of the returns they obtain on their produce.

farmers who operate on a small scale. This might be the situation at the present time; but surely no one will agree that as a result of the provisions of the government measure these farmers will be better off than they were under the old legislation. Surely no one believes that they will be able to obtain larger loans any easier than in the past, or before the government lifted the bank interest rate.

I found it very interesting to listen to the minister, who used as a basis of his contribution to this debate made by Hon. J. L. Isley who was then minister of finance. There was some suggestion that this measure would do as much for the farmer as the legislation which was passed in 1945. I do not know what more unorthodox source he could have chosen. Let us consider what has happened since 1945. What has happened to the interest rate on farm loans since that time, in spite of the prescribed rate in the act? What has taken place since then? The situation has become more serious and the problems have become more difficult. These must be taken into account.

The government seems to rely on a framework of our present monetary institutions with particular reference to the banks. There has been no consideration on the part of the government regarding the relationship between returns from agriculture and interest rates. There has been no suggestion that intermediate credit provided under this act could be provided by government funds. There has been no consideration or suggestion that we might introduce the element of subsidization to stabilize the agricultural capitalization. This has not been the basis of recent governmental moves. We must be sure there is enough money to provide for the continued and successful operation of the agricultural industry. This is a major need.

The minister has indicated that he has been negotiating with bankers and has been encountering difficulties. The question is whether the government is going to allow financial institutions to dictate their terms. Would it not strengthen the minister's hand if the provisions of this legislation were more specific? Then he could obtain a firm undertaking from the banks requiring them to abide by this legislation once it has been passed by this house.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I posed a question earlier and I should now like to pose it again. What is the proposed composition of the new interest rate that farmers will be charged under this legislation? This seems to be the guts of the issue. I am entitled, as a city boy—perhaps somewhat alarmed by this rural uprising—to know something about the mechanism to be adopted in this regard. Perhaps the people who advised the government on former occasions are the people who are advising them on this occasion; I do not know. But I think, as a courtesy to the house, that all of us are entitled to know on what basis the interest formula will be arrived at. The farmers of Canada are also entitled to know this. I think it is a simple request and I hope the minister will answer.

• (9:20 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, we want to know what factors will be used by the minister in setting this interest rate formula.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I made a statement two or three days ago that spelled out in as much detail as is available the formula and criteria that will be used in establishing this interest rate. I think hon. members are missing the whole purpose of this bill. We had an act, until it expired on June 30, that set down a statutory 5 per cent limit.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. My point of order arises from the statement just made by the Minister of Agriculture, who said that a few days ago he explained in detail, as best he could, the formula that will be used to establish this interest rate. But the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance said a few minutes ago that the details were being worked out. Can these ministers not get together, and can we not get some straightforward information from the treasury benches?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, there is no point of order in what the hon. member has said. It may be a debatable point as to what the hon. member understood the parliamentary secretary and I to say. There are details, and there are other details.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a further point of order. If I rise on a point of order, it is the duty of the Chairman to decide whether I am in order. I would remind hon. members that the Chair failed to call me to order, and it is not the minister's place to rise and say there was not any point of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I now rule that the hon. member is out of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I am glad to remind you of your duty, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Halifax asked what criteria would be used. I spelled it out in as much detail as I could the other night. As I said, we do not at this point have the exact amount that will be set down as the rate of interest under which the government guarantee will be made available. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that we had an act that had a statutory limit of 5 per cent in it. We had that act until June 30 this year. But long before the expiry of that act the banks stopped lending money.

Therefore, if we set down a fixed rate that is so low—let us say 5 per cent, if hon. gentlemen opposite want to use that figure—the act would be of no practical value because the banks demonstrated for several months that at the current rates of interest in the economy they are not willing to lend money at 5 per cent, even with a government guarantee.

The whole purpose of the exercise is to amend the act so that the governor in council will have the authority to prescribe from time to time what that interest rate will be, bearing in mind that it needs to be high enough so that it will be supported and funds will be made available by the lending institutions in sufficiently large quantities, yet low enough so that it is of benefit in the cost factors which affect our farmers, who even today are paying much higher rates than some percentage point above the term loans about which I have spoken.

Hon. gentlemen opposite know that this provision has been written into other acts, and those acts have worked. Therefore I fail to see the rationale of trying to make this interest rate hard and fast when they know that a rate of 6 per cent, 7 per cent, 9 per cent, and so on, unless it is made so high that it is not realistic, means that we will not be sure what the response will be from the people who have the funds. We want the optimum rate in this measure, and we need some flexibility in setting it.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, we want to know what formula the minister intends to use to work out the rate of interest that will be effective. He not only will not tell us the rate of interest, but he will not tell us the formula. He is trying to jam down our throats a piece of legislation that we, representing our constituents, have no right to agree to. This happened a number of years ago with another Liberal government when they refused to give us information to which we were entitled. That was the famous pipe line debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Yes, you bet your hat it was. Many of you were not here at the time, but I was. That was when Mr. Howe would not tell the Canadian people the implications of that bill and what Mr. Clint Murchison intended to do. That was the pipe line debate.

It did not take the Liberal party very long when in power to get back to the same arrogant attitude. The first time they once again have an over-all majority they are trying to jam legislation down the throats of the opposition. Just because they have a voting majority they have no right to try to do this. We as members of parliament have no right to accept a piece of legislation like this when the government will not tell us what kind of formula will be used. The minister could bring in any kind of interest rate and we would be accused by our constituents of having passed this bill and letting the government set an exorbitant interest rate. The minister knows that perfectly well. He cannot deny it, because he knows it is perfectly true.

We have a right to ask, on behalf of the farmers of this country, what formula will be used in working out the interest rate that farmers will have to pay. I say to the minister again, stand up in your place and tell us how you are going to work out this interest rate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, if the government has no right to propose this kind of legislation, and parliament has no right to pass this kind of legislation, then all the exercise that the Conservative government went through with the Small Businesses Loans Act must have been out of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: That is a complete red herring.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I say to the minister, tell us what information we refused to give at that time. Can the minister tell us that?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to do that and irritate hon. gentlemen opposite; but the fact is that under the Small Businesses Loans Act the government of that day asked for powers to be given the governor in council to set the terms and conditions under which loans could be made.

Mr. Hees: And we outlined the formula that we would use.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Olson: In 1964 the government came before this house asking for authority to make loans to students, and the rates there were to be flexible enough so that the governor in council could prescribe them from time to time.

Mr. Hees: But the formula that was to be used was announced.

Mr. Olson: The Farm Machinery Syndicates Credit Act has similar wording in it. That portion of the Farm Credit Corporation Act has been in operation for years. That portion of the loan above $20,000 under one part of the act, and above $27,500 under another part, is a flexible interest rate. That is really all we are asking. There are many precedents for it, but we want to be in a position to discuss this with the institutions. Surely hon. members do not want us to come here with laws which will force the banks or other institutions—

Some hon. Members: Yes, we do.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: I know some of my friends over there might like those kinds of laws; but I do not think hon. members directly opposite would like such laws because that would be tantamount to confiscating the funds of the institutions, to telling them how much they should lend, to whom and for how much. I am not prepared to propose such legislation.

Mr. Moore: Since the minister told us he had some discussions with the institutions before the end of June, may I suggest that the government has had ample time to work on these details. If they have not, I would ask the minister whether he could tell us how much longer it would take to work out these details.

Mr. Olson: It will not take very long, once parliament has passed the legislation and has given us the necessary authority.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, there is just one question I would like to put to the minister. All of us want to be helpful to him in seeking information, but I notice that a number of institutions mentioned in the legislation have raised their rates. In the last few days a number of farmers in my constituency have spoken to me, as well as farmers from other areas who are very concerned about this, because they feel that the rates are going up. It is a common practice—and this is certainly so in the province of Ontario—for credit unions, for instance, to charge 12 per cent on loans, and 1 per cent a month on the unpaid balance. This is what has caused suspicion among the farmers and uncertainty in many people's minds. Inasmuch as the minister and his colleagues will not give us the formula to allay these suspicions, I should like to ask the minister a very straightforward question: Would he tell us whether or not the interest rate on these loans is likely to rise as high as 10 or 12 per cent?

Mr. Olson: I do not think so; in fact, I am very sure it will not.

Mr. Hees: But the minister does not know.

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister did not answer my question. He said he does not think so. This is the kind of answer that worries people in the agricultural areas. That is why we want to have a formula. Can the minister give us a straight yes or no?

Mr. Olson: No.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, if the Minister were to compare the provisions under this legislation, so far as setting down the rate of interest is concerned, with certain other acts which were brought in under the Conservative administration, he would be comparing oranges with turnips. The comparison would be invalid, because in that period and up to the time when the Liberal government came into office and changed the act some two years ago, there was an automatic ceiling on loans of 6 per cent. The provisions under the Small Loans Act were such that the governor in council could set the rate of interest, but the maximum rate he could set was 6 per cent. That provision is no longer applicable under this legislation. Now the rate of interest can go up as high as 10 or 12 per cent. I am surprised by the argument advanced by the minister, that under the Bank Act, up to the time it was amended, there was an automatic ceiling of 6 per cent. This is a different situation altogether.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, since I raised my original question a few minutes ago we have heard the minister's answer to a question put to him by the hon. member for Oxford in which the minister said the rate would not go up to 10 per cent. Therefore it seems to me the minister admitted that a formula does exist. Could we now ascertain from the minister with more exactitude what the formula for borrowing by our Canadian farmers would be? This is a request from a very reasonable person, a city boy somewhat cowed by these country problems, although I do have a farm area, now, which I did not have before.

I think I have a legitimate question. Could the minister tell us on what basis this formula is being arrived at, so that we could possibly pass this legislation in the next 22 minutes and go on to something else. The minister gives us very bland answers. First he waffled with regard to the question of the hon. member for Oxford, and then he said very definitely that the rate would not exceed 10 per cent. But we do not know on what basis he arrived at that answer, and I think we are entitled to know it. I have seen him moving 22 or 25 feet from his previous position in this chamber to where he is now, and I have also seen some changes in his economic ideas over every one of those 25 feet. But, political sparring aside, I hope he will give us an answer to what I regard as a basic question on the bill before us.

Mr. Olson: The hon. gentleman is entitled to as near an answer as I can give him. I am sorry, but I do not think he has read the explanation that I gave the other night. I said that I fully expected—and the Minister of Finance was here at that time—that we could perhaps under the government guarantee reduce the interest rate that farmers are paying on some of these loans. I know that on some of the loans the rate goes up to 10 per cent and over, but the average rate is substantially below 10 per cent, even now that farmers are borrowing without a government guarantee. What is more, we think it will be even more attractive with the government guarantee. Otherwise there is no purpose to the act. This is the only reason I could give a categorical answer that it will not be 10 per cent.

Mr. McCutcheon: Can I infer from the minister's remarks that the current interest rate is between 7 and 10 per cent?

Mr. Olson: This is not a guarantee. At any rate my hon. friend knows that there are various interest rates. A successful farmer with a good credit rating, who has made his payments to the bank on time—and there are many of them—and who has not borrowed more than was reasonable to meet the amortization, can receive favourable interest rates even now. But there are others under different conditions who pay substantially more. Therefore what we want to do is to set a guarantee at a rate somewhere below the average now, so that the banks will give the same rate to all customers who apply for it under the act.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, would the minister answer the question of an ordinary country boy who is trying to get a look at this just society?

Mr. Olson: I am also an ordinary country boy and I do not know all the various interest rates that are being paid by farmers all over the country. If I were to tell hon. members, I would be only guessing. I know what the bank charges me, but I do not know whether it charges my neighbour any more, when there is no guarantee.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Chairman, I would like to correct the minister's impression with regard to previous legislation. He has already been corrected on the matter of small business loans. Now I would like to correct the very misguided impression he has with respect to student loans. Is the minister not aware that that legislation provided interest free loans for at least three and a half to four and a half years?

Mr. Olson: That is right. A student does not pay the interest. But my hon. friend knows that the government does.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Why does the government not pay the farmers' interest, too?

Amendment (Mr. Horner) negatived: Yeas, 56; nays, 76.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, a lot of the arguments which have been advanced in support of the preceding amendment might satisfy me, but I am very disturbed that, for some reason or other, the minister has stated, that the method to be used by the government in setting interest rates will be determined by the amount that is required. While I appreciate that this formula, or something like it, might be functional in the case of the Farm Credit Corporation, I cannot see its purpose here.

If the government is going to be wasteful and chooses in its stupidity to proceed with projects which are not in the interests of the country, then I think it should pay the penalty. For example, let me refer to the building of the arts centre in Ottawa. The contract was originally let for something under $15 million. Now we understand that the final cost will be of the order of $45 million. In this particular case the final cost has tripled.

If our farmers have to start paying high interest rates because of the stupidity of this government, then the government has the responsibility for setting an interest rate that is directly proportional to its own stupidity. There is no reason why an industry such as the farming industry should have to pay an interest rate that has been inflated as a result of the stupidity of the government. The government have chosen to embark upon such schemes as medicare, but just because they have to raise a bond issue to capitalize the expenditure I see no reason why the farming industry should be penalized. This is exactly what is going to happen, Mr. Chairman.

If the government spent its money wisely and cut back its expenditure, it would not have to raise so much money. As a result the rate of interest would not be so high. This seems to me to be logical. The government has been buying up spittoons or wastepaper baskets at something like $35 a piece. This sort of expenditure is not conducive to lower interest rates. At the whim of a minister, the farming economy is being made to suffer because of wasteful expenditure by various government departments.

I am going to be brief and sit down in a few minutes, Mr. Chairman, but we cannot vote for this measure. The minister has been talking about an interest rate of 10 per cent. I have had loans from the bank at less than 10 per cent, and I am not necessarily the best risk. The minister is trying to tell the country that the rate will have to be 9 or 10 per cent, and that if he is able to bring the rate down to 8 per cent then everything will be hunky-dory. It will not be hunky-dory with me and it will not be hunky-dory with the rest of the country.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

There is another way out, Mr. Chairman. The money lent over the years to our farmers has been repaid. I do not know how many times this has been said, but only one tenth of one per cent is the risk involved. These loans are repeat business. It is business that will increase. The farm machinery companies are increasing the price of their machinery, and that is a business that repeats itself over and over again. The government's guarantee about which so much is said must mean something.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Farmers are entitled to premium rates because little risk is involved in their loans. I do not know whether the minister knows the risk rate with respect to loans made to small businesses; I submit it must be higher than the risk rate involved in farm loans. Farm loans carry a nominal, almost non-existent risk rate of one tenth of one per cent. That is, very, very few loans are not paid back. Surely, considering the infinitesimal risk involved in $200 million worth of business, much of it repeat business, which the banks will enjoy, consideration ought to be given to making loans available at low interest rates. Accordingly I wish to move the following amendment. I move:

That in clause 2, paragraph (f), all the words after the word "prescribed" in line 42 be deleted and that the clause be amended by adding the following words:

"and such rates being not higher than those available to schools, hospitals, municipalities and other such institutions, and such charge for insurance as may be authorized by the regulations, was, by the terms of the loan, payable to the bank in respect of the loan as long as the borrower is not in default;"

Mr. Olson: I see no useful purpose in this amendment. The rate will not be higher than that available to schools, hospitals or municipalities.

Mr. Woolliams: But we do not know that.

Mr. Olson: My hon. friend knows that there are many different rates for schools in different parts of the country. It could well be, if the rate were tied to that available for schools and so on, that the farm rate would be higher than my hon. friend intended it to be. The amendment therefore is of no value and is superfluous.

Mr. Korchinski: If the rate is to be no higher than that charged with respect to schools, hospitals, municipalities and the like, there is no harm, surely, in adopting this amendment. The rate would be within the confines set in the bill.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Korchinski) negatived: Yeas, 56; nays, 78.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I am reasonably certain that the hon. member for York North came in after the vote was called.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): I remind hon. members that no one is to come into the chamber after the question has been put. I am not aware that anybody broke the rules but I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner: On a point of order, may I ask whether the President of the Privy Council would ask Mr. Speaker and the house for unanimous consent to sit for another half hour, so that this legislation may be passed. Tomorrow estimates are to be called and we want to pass this legislation. Since we have nearly finished with the contentious clause concerning interest rates, I am sure that the other four short clause could be disposed of hastily.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member took the words from my mouth. I think the proper procedure would be to rise, report progress and seek consent to continue sitting.

Mr. Monteith: Do not see the clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The time being ten o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Or later this day.

Progress reported.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In the light of the remarks exchanged across the floor so recently, I wonder whether the house will agree to continue until 10.30 for the purpose of completing this legislation.

Mr. Baldwin: Perhaps some thought might be given by the house to continuing, not for half an hour but for an hour, with an order made that there then be put all questions necessary to complete this legislation, in all stages. The house might be prepared to do that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be most agreeable to having an order made to that effect.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the proposal of the hon. member for Peace River. Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): I thought I would have the opportunity, before 10 o'clock, to make representations and express certain points of view on the bill. Consequently, I should like to call it 10 o'clock.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Before he goes, could the leader of the house give us some idea of the business for tomorrow? I know he did indicate it earlier, but in view of what has happened tonight perhaps he has had some change of mind.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The business is as indicated earlier.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—BIOLOGICAL EFFECTS ON CHICKENS OF MICROWAVE TOWER RADIATION

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): The adjournment motion gives me a good opportunity to bring to the attention of the house and of the appropriate minister a subject matter which is quite serious in its implications. I know that publicity has recently gone out to the effect that I intend to raise the subject of microwave radiation energy and its possible biological effect on chickens. In fact, what is involved goes far beyond that. What is involved is an incomplete understanding on our part and on the part of our scientific community of the full effects of microwave energy on plant and animal life in general.

I can begin, Mr. Speaker, by indicating that recently I received a petition from approximately 500 residents of an area in central Manitoba, stating that due to recent releases of information concerning the possible effects of radiation on humans, livestock and vegetation, they requested that a thorough on site investigation be made of all surrounding areas adjacent to microwave towers.

As I say, this was signed by just slightly less than 500 farmers, hatchery operators and poultry farm operators from a central area of Manitoba. A few days ago I addressed a letter to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) bringing this petition and the concern expressed by these people to his attention, and giving him some slight background information on a particular case in point where the operator of one of the largest poultry farms in Manitoba, who had operated his farm with great success over a period of six or seven years, in late 1962 experienced very mysterious symptoms in his poultry flocks. All through the course of 1963 to 1966 inclusive these symptoms persisted. The minister is an experienced agriculturist and he must know something is drastic when feed conversion ratios are cut in half, when the mortality rate rises to 60 per cent in a flock of 10,000 to 15,000 birds, and when chickens and turkeys lose their feathers in a very obvious way.

All manner of experts were brought into the picture, including veterinarians from the central midwestern United States, from eastern Canada and western Canada, from the Department of Transport and from other government departments provincial and federal, and no one could give a diagnosis as to the probable cause. It was by a process of elimination that some of them suggested that perhaps there was some mysterious, if not mysterious at least unknown, relationship between the biological condition of these flocks of poultry and the presence of a microwave relay tower in the very near proximity of the farm.

From 1964 onward this particular poultry farm operator and others tried to solicit the advice of different government departments, at both the federal and provincial levels, and they really did not get very much co-operation. I hesitate to say this, but what is involved here may be on the frontier of human scientific knowledge and, because many of these people were reluctant to give any firm opinion, that poultry farm operator was left on his own to sink or swim.

The net result was that he was pushed into complete bankruptcy in the fall of 1966, and the role played by the Industrial Development Bank certainly left a great deal to be desired. It was prepared to take a $25,000 loss rather than get in and try to help this individual get all the support and advice necessary to cope with the problem.

I know the minister is going to get up and say, in his reassuring tone, that a grant has been given to the University of Manitoba. So it has, I understand—an initial grant of $3,-800. Mr. Speaker, that amount of money will hardly even begin to do an adequate job of research.

I may say that I have asked the opinion of experts, and we believe it would be much more helpful if a field study, rather than any laboratory experiment, were made. We would like on-site research under actual field conditions. We are given to understand that we are getting more and more information as we go along. This problem could result from a combination of factors, such as leakage from this microwave tower, improper instalation of some part or another, plus atmospheric conditions at the site. Without going into the technical details, I would urge the minister to take a personal interest in this case.

As I say, evidence would seem to indicate we are just on the frontiers of scientific knowledge in this respect. It would be a pity if the appropriate government departments did not bother to concern themselves a little more directly. I do not think—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Schreyer: May I just finish this sentence? I do not believe our society would want to be so callous as to leave an individual on his own in a situation where there is so much yet to be done.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wrote to me several days ago and I answered his letter at that time. I outlined what the Department of Agriculture has done up to this time. With regard to the complaints of alleged biological effects on poultry by microwave power radiation, I may say that this was brought to our attention in the fall of 1967 by the president of the Manitoba farmers union. On inquiring into the matter, we were advised that these complaints had originally been brought to the attention of the provincial authorities and the University of Manitoba, and that the university had already started an investigation into the possibility of adverse effects of microwave radiation.

Since an investigation was already under way by the University of Manitoba, it was decided that we should assist and support them, rather than undertake a separate study. We are assisting in obtaining information from other agencies studying the effects of microwave information on humans, animals and vegetation; and of contributing financial assistance toward the research studies being made by the universities on the effect of low levels of radiant energy on poultry. The dean of faculty of agriculture of the University of Manitoba has kept us fully informed There is no evidence to date to support the hypothesis that a microwave tower is responsible for unthriftiness or losses of agricultural plants or animals. The university, with our support, is continuing its investigation.

So far as the other allegation made by the hon. member is concerned, that we are on the frontiers of new information, and so on, I think there again we have to say no one can guarantee that some additional scientific discovery will not turn up some time that will give a positive diagnosis of the problem that this man is having with his poultry. Certainly we were doing everything within reason to attempt an analysis of the problem and, within the bounds of reasonableness, I think the government has done everything that could be expected of it. The same remark applies to the university, the provincial government and the federal government.

COMMUNICATIONS—CO-OPERATION WITH FRANCE IN SPACE AND SATELLITE RESEARCH

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is an important one. I know we live in an electronic age, but I wanted to talk about communications. I have read, if not understood, Marshall McLuhan, and I realize the importance of the whole communications field. I thought perhaps the minister designate of communications might be here tonight. I realize the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has to attend a committee meeting, which I just left, so I do not know who will be responding to this question.

I wonder whether there have not been important developments taking place with which this house is unfamiliar, and of which the country is unaware. It is for this reason I have been trying to ask questions on this subject matter for the last week or two. I have asked for a statement from the minister designate for communications, but so far on the records of this house we find little about telecommunications. We do however find considerable in the media. The Montreal Star for October 5 has an article by Robert Reford, under the date line of the United Nations, which reads:

> External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp proposed yesterday that Canada and France co-operate in the field of space research and technology, including satellite communications.
> Sharp made the proposal when he met here with French foreign minister Michel Debré. The two men spent nearly an hour together in a secluded corner of one of the delegates lounges after they had listened to the acting foreign minister of Czechoslovakia address the General Assembly.
> Debré took note of the proposal and said it would be considered by his government.
> They talked about three things: the implications of the Czech crisis, the Middle East and scientific co-operation in space research. The first two were general exchanges of views. The third was a specific Canadian proposal.

The article then continued:

> The space proposal was the unusual topic of their conversation. Obviously it represented the federal government's reaction to talk of a communications satellite to be operated jointly by France and Quebec.
> Sharp pointed out to Debré that there are many areas where Canada and France could help each. They include technical facilities, scientific research and technology.

I should like one of the ministers to tell us at least as much as was presumably told to Robert Reford.

Another interesting reference to the Paris press under the byline of Bernard Kaplan can be found in the Ottawa Citizen of October 8, 1968. Let me emphasize here that another minister has the responsibility for this, but I introduce it now as an indication of the increasing importance of this subject matter and the interest surrounding it. This article says:

> Thwarted on all these fronts, de Gaulle seems to be concentrating his thinned-out legions on pushing French culture on a worldwide scale.

I realize that this is not a governmental operation. The article continues:

> The first shot was sounded at the initial conference here of the international association of French speaking parliamentarians.

It then continues:

> But the evidence is that de Gaulle's intention is to make this body a major instrument for the advancement of French cultural politics.

Later in the article it is stated:

> The two main resolutions to pass called for the creation of an "international agency for cultural co-operation" among French speaking nations and "regions" and for a common front by French speaking governments in next year's international negotiations on control of telecommunications satellites.
> Both are matters of manifest concern to countries in whole or part French speaking.

The third and most important quote comes from the French press and was aired over the French networks on October 9 at 6 p.m. and again at 11 p.m. The text of this article, as translated, is as follows:

> A delegation of the Canadian government composed of personnel specialized in questions of equipping satellites is expected in France on October 15 according to authorized Canadian sources (sources canadiens autorisés). Composed of 7 members... In informed circles, special interest is taken in this announcement at a time when Canada has recently submitted to France a detailed proposition of co-operation in the field of space research.
> This proposition, Canadian sources report, was given by Mr. Mitchell Sharp, Secretary of State for External Affairs, to Mr. Michel Debré, foreign affairs minister, at the time of the interview they held last week end in New York at the United Nations.

I do not want to exacerbate the minister's difficulty, but I should like to caution him about secrecy. There should be some indication of Canada's actions in respect of this and we should have learned something regarding the NORAD role which was renewed without parliamentary discussions.

Let us not have any further contributions to the public disquiet in this very sensitive field. If these people are leaving for France, where are they? Are they technicians? Are they experts in intercommunication? Are they in electronics, and are they from one or several departments? What is the purpose of their visit, and what are their terms of reference? In what other countries have proposals been made for co-operation in this telecommunications field? What liaison has there been with provincial governments which have revealed both an interest and expertise in this highly complex but tremendously important field?

Surely we all realize that there is a tremendous public interest in what Canada is doing abroad this day, this week and a week from now? It should not be difficult to realize the sensitivity of the interests of the Canadian public. We would like to know what governments are doing, and what commitments are being made. How ironic it is that on the very issue of rapid electronic communications advances the government should be so uncommunicative. I ask that in respect of this tremendously important matter the government should communicate.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, my response is really one of procedure rather than of substance. The hon. member knows that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has taken an active part in these discussions. The hon. member has talked about other questions to which the minister has provided, answers, but the hon. member refuses to accept them. I would only say that if the hon. member had really been seeking information, I presume he would have been agreeable to putting this over until Tuesday. I regret that he did not have the courtesy to do so.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, may I, on a question of privilege, refute the implications of poor manners and remind the hon. gentleman that just minutes ago the minister advised me of his predicament. He could easily have let me know before. And surely there are enough acting ministers and parliamentary secretaries to deal with this matter. I do not like this charge of poor manners.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that the minister was appearing before the committee.

Mr. Macquarrie: So was I.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must remind the minister, as I have other hon. members in the past, that it is not according to the rules to impute improper motives.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

APPENDIX

ADDRESS TO UNITED NATIONS BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER

Mr. President,

Your election to the office of the presidency of this assembly is fitting testimony to the esteem in which you are held at the United Nations. I know you will take a worthy place amongst those distinguished representatives of member states from Latin America who have presided over our debates from time to time during the past twenty three years. Indeed, your election reminds us once again how much the United Nations owes its accomplishments to the dedication, eloquence and concern for principle of the delegates who have represented the founding member states from Latin America.

My country too has made special efforts since 1945 to implement the principles of the charter and to nurture the growth of this organization. Speaking in this assembly for the first time as the representative of a new Canadian government I wish to reaffirm Canada's determination to do all it can to support these principles. It is our aim to help to achieve a better world by strengthening the United Nations and its agencies as indispensable instruments for international co-operation.

Canada's contribution will be pragmatic and realistic. It will be based on our assessment of what the situation requires the United Nations to do and what Canada can best do in the fulfilment of its responsibilities as a faithful member of the United Nations. In matters of peace and war there are limits on the kinds of agreement likely to be reached. Member states however must work towards strengthening the authority of the organization. Success will come slowly. Some would use this forum for the ends of propaganda alone. Others sincerely expect the assembly to act as a quasi-government or legislature. Our yardstick ought to be the capacity of the United Nations to perform the functions which are its proper responsibility and on which there can be at any time a reasonable measure of agreement.

Canada's experience has led us to value our independence while recognizing the interdependence of all states in the modern world; to prize political diversity and cultural freedom; to cherish pride of country but to mistrust chauvinistic dogmas; to adapt but not to overthrow the traditions we have inherited from others; to govern by consent. We believe it is possible, indeed essential, to reconcile the affinities of geography and history and the close associations they imply with the universal concepts set out in the charter of equal rights, territorial integrity and political independence.

It follows that we cannot accept that a community of interest, real or alleged, political, cultural or economic, entitles one country to take upon itself the right to interfere in the internal affairs of another. In the commonwealth of nations to which we belong the right of national self-determination is so taken for granted that member countries are free to develop ties with any other countries, including socialist countries.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Above all, no international order can be founded or can exist on the self appointed right of any government or group of governments to impose their policies on other sovereign states by force. The invasion of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet union and some of its allies was nothing more than the assertion of a proprietary right of a great power to exercise domination over eastern Europe under the guise of a "fraternal" ideological relationship. It was naked power politics without regard to the charter of the United Nations. Have the governments of the USSR and its allies forgotten that less than two years ago this assembly by a vote of 109 to none declared:

> No state has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other states. Consequently, armed intervention and all other forms of interference or attempted threats against the personality of the state or against its political, economic and cultural elements, are condemned.

Although we are bound to take note of the wishes of the government of Czechoslovakia that the Security Council refrain from further action at this time, the council quite rightly remains seized of this question, which has profound implications for the independence and sovereignty of all member states. The concern of members of the United Nations for Czechoslovakia, its leaders and its people will inevitably continue until the soil of that country is once again free of foreign troops.

We must also be aware of the danger to peace in Europe arising from recent charges levelled by the Soviet union against the Federal German Republic and the evocation of an alleged unilateral right of intervention in yet another country. In the view of Canada, no such right exists.

While condemning the Soviet union and its allies for what they have done we must be ready to seize every opportunity for serious and constructive discussion of the issues that divide east and west. So long as Soviet troops remain on Czechoslovakian territory the progress of such discussions will of necessity be slow and cautious. But there is one area in which we must press on. Negotiations to end the arms race should be pursued vigorously. Progress on this front will benefit all nations, including Czechoslovakia.

THE ARMS RACE

Canada, and no doubt a great majority of members of the United Nations, was heartened by the announcement of the United States and the Soveit union on July 1 of their agreement to begin negotiations on the limitation of strategic nuclear weapons including anti-ballistic missiles. I urge the United States and the Soviet union to begin these talks without delay and to support the early resumption of negotiations in the eighteen nation disarmament committee on a comprehensive test ban, a halt in the production of fissionable material for military purposes and the reduction and subsequent elimination of nuclear stockpiles.

Since we last met, the treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons was opened for signature and has been signed by some 80 countries. Canada has signed the treaty and in due course intends to ratify it. All countries should help to realize the treaty's full potential by acceding to it soon.

The continued use of force in international disputes and the incalculable human suffering caused by war have drawn attention to the part played by the traffic in conventional arms in contributing to the conditions which lead to outbreaks of violence. In the days of the League of Nations, efforts were made to impose some restraints on the arms traffic by publicizing statistics about weapons and other types of armaments transferred between states. In our view, the concept of an international register of arms transfers should be revived.

My government is interested, too, in the possibility of limiting supplies of armaments in regions of acute political and military confrontation and has noted with approval the recent indication that under certain conditions, the USSR favours "the implementation of measures for regional disarmament and reduction of armaments in various parts of the world, including the Middle East."

NIGERIA

Next to the fear of war which I have so far been discussing in its various current aspects, we are all keenly aware that hunger and serious privation are issues which, especially when they reach disastrous proportions, cannot be ignored in this body. The Secretary General recognized this point when he drew to our attention the situation in Nigeria in the introduction in his annual report.

The Canadian delegation acknowledges and fully understands the request of the Organization of African Unity that governments abstain from any action which might impair the unity, territorial integrity and peace of Nigeria. We are also aware and appreciative of the efforts made by the government of Nigeria and many other governments to deal with the humanitarian issues. We trust that such efforts will expand in keeping with the requirements of the situation. In the face of the human tragedy which has unfolded before our eyes, it is only natural that people everywhere should feel deep sympathy for the Nigerian people and be anxious that no international effort be spared to come to the help of those in need.

Because of our sympathy and concern for the Nigerian people, the Canadian government is providing Hercules aircraft with crews and has allocated over one million dollars for relief supplies for Nigeria through the International Red Cross, whose invaluable service on this occasion, despite the difficulties arising from civil war, has given us grounds for admiration. In addition, Canadian voluntary agencies have made substantial contributions. My government also agreed, at the request of the government of Nigeria, to participate in the International team which has been observing the situation in the territories of the eastern region where federal government authority has been restored, and whose continuing reports will give an impartial account of what is happening. The reports should be as full and detailed as possible in order to serve their intended purpose.

We do not yet know the full dimensions of the problems of immediate relief which may be required, still less the extent of reconstruction which will face the people of Nigeria when peace, we hope, is mercifully and quckly restored. We do know that these problems will call for international co-operation and assistance on a substantial scale. Canada stands ready to play a full part.

THE MIDDLE EAST

In the Middle East, continuing tension and sporadic fighting between Israel and its neighbours sow the seeds of future conflict. There is a danger that the escalation of violence in the Middle East could involve outside powers and thus constitute a grave threat to world peace. Yet we are all conscious that the time and effort devoted to settle this dispute since the end of the fighting in June 1967 has led to no improvement in the situation. Agreement by the Security Council last November to certain basic provisions and principles for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East was an important achievement. But principles are of little use unless the parties accept in good faith the duty of implementing them fully and effectively.

The Canadian government reaffirms its support for Security Council resolution 242 of 22 November, 1967, in all its parts, and pays tribute to the patient and tenacious efforts of the special representative of the Secretary General, Ambassador Jarring, to assist the parties. We give him our full support, and call upon the parties to use his good offices and earnestly seek agreement on a peaceful and accepted settlement based on the provisions and principles of resolution 242. This is particularly important in the days which lie ahead when Foreign ministers are in New York and readily available to consult.

ARAB REFUGEES

The events of June 1967 tragically aggravated the problem of the Palestine refugees. I am sure I speak for all member countries when I pay tribute to the work of the commissioner general of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency and his staff. In extremely difficult conditions, the agency, in conjunction with the host governments, has carried out its responsibilities with perseverence, skill and compassion. In recognition of the vital need for UNWRA to continue its work, my government during the current fiscal year maintained its voluntary pledge of cash and food aid valued at 1.2 million dollars and, in addition, contributed to the agency the equivalent of $650,000 in special donations.

The agency can assist in supplying the refugees with the basic requirements for subsistence, and it has done notable work in providing education for thousands of refugee children. For the future, however, what is required is a just settlement which would offer the refugees the opportunity of living in peace and dignity. A solution to the refugee problem will only be feasible in the context of an agreed settlement between the Arab states and Israel. Meanwhile, pending the attainment of such a settlement, this urgent humanitarian problem remains. My government, therefore, calls upon all member states to demonstrate the reality of their concern for the refugees by supporting, tangibly and generously, the operations of UNRWA.

VIET NAM

It is deeply discouraging that no tangible progress has been made towards a negotiated settlement in Viet Nam. The high hopes universally aroused by the initiation of the talks in Paris reflected the overwhelming desire of mankind to see this agonizing and destructive conflict brought to an end.

While it is appropriate that this body should be concerned with the situation in Viet Nam, responsibility rests in the final analysis with the two sides to the conflict. Canada has already expressed the view that the bombing of North Viet Nam should stop. This is an essential first step. But a political settlement requires a general military de-escalation, and North Viet Nam must demonstrate its willingness to contribute to this process.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

We are often reminded that the United Nations is a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations. One of the main threats to such harmony is racial discrimination and the effects it has on international stability. The divisions amongst the membership which these questions provoke must not be allowed to lead to a breakdown in communication between us. The objective is clear. It is to ensure that the majority of the peoples of the countries of southern Africa will no longer be deprived of their rightful place in the political, economic and social development of their countries.

The main issues are the future of South West Africa and Rhodesia, the question of apertheid in South Africa, and the refusal of the government of Portugal to accept the overwhelming opinion of this assembly in favour of self determination for the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea. In all four situations minority groups have decided that they alone have the right to determine for an indefinite period the rate of progress and the capacity to govern of the unenfranchised majority. These inequities must be ended. The process of peaceful change must be accelerated.

But how? We are all looking for some way out of the present impasse over South West Africa. At the XXII session of the assembly, the Canadian representative suggested that the assembly explore the offer made by the foreign minister of South Africa to receive a personal representative of the Secretary General, without prejudice to any position which may have been taken by members of this organization. We still hope that this approach can be followed up. We are prepared to consider other approaches if they command a wide measure of agreement and if they are realistic.

We have agreed on the principles of United Nations action against Rhodesia. We must do everything possible to see that these decisions are carried out by all states and especially by South Africa and Portugal. We must continue also to confront these two states with our unanimous judgment that policies of racial repression and political subjugation are incompatible with United Nations principles. Canada respects and intends to abide by the decisions of the Security Council.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Violations of human rights are not restricted to southern Africa. All member states are under an obligation to look to their own records of achievement in protecting human rights. My government supports the initiatives which have been taken in the United Nations in the formulation of the various international covenants and declarations in the field of human rights. Canadian legislation reflects this concern in various enactments prohibiting discrimination based on sex, race, colour, creed or national origin, in living practices, conditions of employment, public accommodation and trade union membership. Voluntary organizations have promoted amongst all Canadians an awareness of their basic rights. Several provinces have established human rights commissions or ombudsmen, and a bill of rights enumerating individual rights has been adopted by the federal parliament. The federal government is proposing entrenchment of a code of human rights in our constitution.

In order to facilitate the implementation of such covenants and conventions my government recognizes the need for new approaches to the machinery of implementation. The proposal to create an office of the high commissioner for human rights is, in this context, an important and welcome development which I believe deserves the broadest possible support from member states.

PLIGHT OF CIVILIANS IN WAR

In the broader context of human rights, the review of the arrangements for coordination between the activities of international relief agencies in case of natural disasters should, we think, be extended to cases of hostilities so that in such cases also assistance can be provided quickly and effectively to the innocent victims involved.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

This organization is dedicated to the elimination of poverty, ignorance and disease. At the end of the first development decade, this goal is still far off. We can look back with satisfaction to some achievements—I think of the establishment of the United Nations development program for example—and we have learned some lessons. We have learned that economic development is a long term process and that co-ordination of international programs involves more than setting targets and adjusting priorities. We know better now that the terms and conditions under which aid is offered are of fundamental importance, as is the relationship of trade to aid. We realize that the improvement of agricultural techniques is critical to the whole development process.

Nevertheless, there is no hiding the fact that the level of international assistance to developing countries in inadequate. The needs grow faster than the resources are made available, partly because population increases so rapidly. So far as Canada is concerned, our aid program will continue to grow year by year to reach the goal of 1 per cent of gross national product as quickly as possible. We are pursuing a set of economic policies which will free resources for high priority purposes, and notwithstanding the imposition of strict limitations on expenditures in general, our aid effort will increase substantially next year. This includes an increase of 25 per cent in our contribution to the United Nations development program in the coming year, as well as significant increases in our contributions to the United Nations children's fund and for the United Nations high commissioner for refugees. At the same time we have always recognized the importance of the terms of aid, and have, therefore, through extensive use of grants and long term low interest loans, sought to meet the needs of recipient countries.

On the eve of the second development decade, we in Canada look forward to the conclusions of two major evaluations of development assistance and related policies of trade, one commissioned by the UNDP and one by the World Bank. The latter is to be headed by a former prime minister of Canada, the Right Hon. L. B. Pearson. There has been some skepticism whether resources made available for development purposes have been used with maximum efficiency. These assessments should identify the lessons to be learned from past experience and provide useful indications as to the policies to be pursued in the future. In this context, there may be greater confidence in development operations and, we hope, greater willingness on the part of developed countries to increase their contributions.

It seems apparent that to a significant degree the gap between the more developed and less developed societies reflects the differences in the extent to which they have learned to apply the techniques and the fruits of science and technology to their fundamental development problems. No mere transfer of the experience of the more developed nations can bridge this gap. The developing nations require their own capabilities in the field of science and technology. For this purpose, they must have ready access to the reservoir of knowledge and experience which exists elsewhere and their efforts to adapt these to their own special needs and aspirations should be welcomed.

Recognizing this, the Canadian government intends to establish in Canada an institution devoted to the practical application of science and technology to the fundamental social and economic problems of development. This institution will have a directing board and staff drawn from many countries and the results of its studies will be freely available to the international community. It will be designed to add a new dimension to the search for solutions to those social and economic ills which are the root cause of so many of the difficulties brought to this assembly.

Mr. President, my government recognizes that the terms of world trade must be improved if the developing countries are to be able to utilize technological change to greater effect and attract investment capital. We have heard various comments from this rostrum about the second United Nations conference on trade and development. No one can be content with its results. But it is an encouraging fact that, as new forms of aid such as tariff preferences are formulated in UNCTAD, the need for far reaching changes in the working method of the organization have also been recognized. We look forward to the presentation by the president of the second UNCTAD conference to the General Assembly in plenary session of the issues raised at the conference in New Delhi.

THE PROBLEMS OF HUMAN ENVIRONMENT

The Canadian delegation welcomes the fact that in addition to examining comparatively unfamiliar questions relating to outer space and the ocean floor, attention will be paid at this session to the problems of the human environment. We in Canada are keenly aware that the effects of pollution of the air and water respect no boundary. We and our neighbour, the United States, have together pioneered in the development of international machinery to deal with this problem. For these reasons we have welcomed the initiative of Sweden to have this important matter considered as a problem of world significance, and therefore one which it would be appropriate to deal with in the first instance in plenary session.

PEACEKEEPING

Despite the scientific revolution and startling advances in world organization, the sad fact is that governments are all too often forced to give military expenditures priority over the requirements of peaceful development. Resources which might be used to increase production and foster education must be applied to reconstruction and relief. It may be utopian to believe we can banish the use of force in relations amongst states. But we must strengthen the capacity of the United Nations to act as an agency for the control of conflict and the mediation of disputes.

My government is encouraged by the signs of progress in the special committee on peace keeping operations. We have been among those governments which have attempted to contribute to this work by summarizing their own practices and by pointing to the lessons which might be drawn. Papers on observer missions, prepared by the Secretary General and now being studied by a working group of the special committee, represent a significant contribution to our study of peace keeping in all its aspects. Discussions due to take place in the committee should help in narrowing the differences among member states about preparations for peace keeping. I hope the assembly will instruct the committee to expand its investigation to include other aspects of United Nations peace keeping experience and attempt to draw some agreed conclusions. In this way, we should be able to develop an understanding about the practice of peace keeping acceptable to all.

UNIVERSALITY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

We shall not be able to improve very much the capacity of the United Nations to realize its full potential in promoting peace and security unless the institution itself reflects the world as it is. The question of universality of membership remains pressing. We regret the absence from this assembly of states that play an important part in world affairs.

The question of the representation of China is the most important of these issues, even though it is not strictly a question of membership. My government has made public its decision to explore the possibilities of entering into diplomatic relations with the government of the People's Republic of China. It is not in the long term interests of world peace and security that the government in Peking should remain isolated. For this reason, we think that this government should be represented at the United Nations. We would welcome any equitable proposal which would facilitate the representation of the People's Republic of China in this organization having regard, however, to the rights of existing members.

CONCLUSION

The United Nations is a very different organization from the one Canada helped to found more than 20 years ago. Its membership has almost tripled. It has formulated new priorities and is moving in new directions. It has demonstrated powers of adaptation in response to new demands. Human rights, economic development, co-operation in new environments, such as outer space and the ocean floor, have taken their place as matters of major concern along side the more traditional but nonetheless vital questions of war and peace. Indeed, it is now understood better than it was that all these questions interact.

As we endeavour to meet new challenges, we should not lose sight of the fact that the effectiveness of the United Nations is bound to be measured in the eyes of world opinion against the practical results which follow from our resolutions. It is not by the number of resolutions that we pass that posterity will judge us, but rather by the determination that we show in dealing with the pressing issues of our times and in carrying out the decisions that we make. In this spirit, on behalf of Canada, I pledge sustained and vigorous support of the United Nations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS AND CANDIDATES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-117 entitled: "An act to amend the Canada Elections Act (Qualifications of voters and candidates)."

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Canada Elections Act so that Canadian citizens alone will be voters or candidates in elections.

Motion agreed to and bill read for the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION OF FARM LOAN LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question and to renew the request I made to him last night. Would he agree to bring forward the farm improvement loan bill as the first item of government business today, or early today, on the basis that the house would agree to an order that at the end of an hour all questions necessary to pass the legislation through all stages would be put? Possibly members of the creditiste party who opposed this suggestion last night might be prepared to accept it now.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of members who are not present in the house at the moment but who were advised yesterday that the farm legislation would not be called today. These were members who wanted to participate in the balance of the debate, and I think we could accept that members on both sides of the house wanted to be involved. However, Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the house leaders of the other side that we could substitute the farm bills for the post office bill that was announced for Tuesday. We would like to get several of these bills through, and we are prepared to offer to put them on next Tuesday rather than the announced post office legislation. This will also require some changes, but if the opposition house leaders agree we would be quite willing to call these bills for one more day.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION BEFORE IMPLEMENTATION OF REORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development my question is addressed to the Minister without Portfolio from Port Arthur. In view of statements made on the C.B.C. national news last night by the president of the Manitoba Indian Brotherhood that Indian affairs department reorganization will have the effect of more centralization in Ottawa, of separating economic from social programs, and of appointing a biologist as community development director, will the minister give an assurance to the house that he or his officials will consult with this Indian spokesman and others before giving effect to the reorganization?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the government has noted the representations made by Indian organizations on the reorganization program and has assured them that the government, as part of its review of all social development programs, will study all submissions made by Indian organizations and other interested parties. As a matter of fact the minister made this statement in the house last week in connection with an Indian-Eskimo proposal for a new development agency.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister, and ask him whether there are any plans to place the subject of constitutional jurisdiction with respect to Indian people upon the agenda for any federal-provincial constitutional conferences, that jurisdiction being now vested in the parliament of Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the general subject of the constitutional jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments is on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the right honourable Prime Minister and I hope that he will be in a position to answer it today.

Does he intend soon to comply with the request of retired civil servants who are asking for increased pensions out of the Public Service Alliance fund, as recommended by a parliamentary committee in the spring of 1967?

Mr. Speaker: I think this question was asked just a few days ago.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, the question has not been answered, and if the right hon. Prime Minister cannot give a satisfactory reply today, I would ask that it be taken up at ten o'clock at the next opportunity.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to avoid a discussion at ten o'clock, I must say that the question has been answered repeatedly. It was answered last week, and I myself stated that the matter was under consideration. Indeed, there has been an exchange of correspondence between the representatives of the civil servants and myself. I indicated that we were not in a position to grant those increases now but that we would consider it as soon as possible.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question and ask the right honourable Prime Minister whether he is aware that the request of the public servants follows the recommendation of the parliamentary committee. I am not asking that government funds be used but rather funds taken out of the public service fund.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the estimates of the Treasury Board are listed for today perhaps the appropriate minister should be prepared to discuss this matter later today.

OIL

REPORTED REDUCTION IN U.S. IMPORTS FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce arising out of a statement he has made and out of answers given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister advise the house as to the terms and conditions of the cut-back in exports of crude petroleum from Canada to the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am replying now on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whom I replace today in the house, and in my own capacity.

The newspaper to which the hon. member refers, this morning's Globe and Mail, puts words in my mouth, as sometimes is the case with the best papers. I never used the word "quotas".

My hon. friend will remember that about a year ago I stood up in this house and gave an explanation about the kind of agreement we had entered into with the United States. At that time I referred to a "framework" of agreement. I never denied that some figures were contained in that, but I emphasized at that time, as I do today, that there were all kinds of qualifications, ifs and whens. So much so, I said at the time and I repeat now, that it would not be useful to members to know what were the exact figures. As a matter of fact this is the way the agreement has evolved. Because of delays in the construction of capline some adjustments had to be made.

I repeated these points, I believe, to the newspaperman yesterday, but he quotes me this morning as having said "quotas", which I deny.

Mr. Woolliams: In spite of the reservations the minister has mentioned, is he prepared to advise the house and the country whether there has been, by agreement, a reduction in the exportation of crude petroleum from Canada to the United States, forgetting about quotas?

Mr. Pepin: My hon. friend knows that the export of oil to the United States is a very difficult subject. He has good informants in Calgary, who tell him that Canada has to be careful not to upset United States markets. The government must take into account Canadian interests but also United States interests. And it is in our interests to take into account their interests.

Mr. Woolliams: Perhaps I can put it very simply. Can the minister explain now to the house why we had a different answer from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last week with reference to this very matter, and why he is contradicting the other minister.

Mr. Pepin: I read the answer given by my colleague and it was in accord with what I am saying now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is becoming argumentative.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Did the government agree to limit exports of Canadian crude oil to the United States?

Mr. Pepin: I said this was possible within the framework of the agreement. It would not be right for me to say yes or no, without qualification. I have never denied the possibility. I just repeated today that there were figures in the framework of the agreement, but I also said that these figures were qualified by a number of ifs and whens. That is quite clear.

Mr. Harkness: Instead of using so many ifs and ands, I wonder whether the minister could simply answer the question as to whether an agreement was made by the Canadian government to limit exports of Canadian crude oil.

Mr. Pepin: This matter is now in the hands of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but when these arrangements were made I was trying to implement intelligently a policy devised by the Conservatives back in 1960.

Mr. Hees: Does the minister realize that by his answer he is making Hon. Paul Martin look like a plain, blunt spoken man, and the essence of clarity?

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL MONEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In his absence I had intended placing it before the Minister without Portfolio, but since he is absent also I shall direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister who perhaps will take it as notice and pass it on.

Yesterday I asked the minister whether the amount of $170 million which is to be made available by C.M.H.C. for new housing starts this year represented any additional funds for housing construction in 1968. The minister said there has been no increase in the capital budget this year, but that this does represent an increase in the expenditures for this year. Will the minister therefore inform the house whether, prior to this announcement, there was a planned underspending by the government for 1968 in this critical field?

HARBOURS

ROBERTS BANK, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he can bring us up to date on a most important matter. Will he advise the house when it is anticipated that the question of jurisdiction, financing and the rail route to the new Roberts Bank development will be concluded with the government of British Columbia and the railway companies in order that construction can proceed as soon as possible to meet the contractual obligations made with Japanese companies?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could prevail on the hon. member and ask him to be here on the next sitting day, at which time the Minister of Transport will answer the question.

[Later:]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the one the hon. member for Vancouver East directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the truancy record of the Minister of Transport, can the Prime Minister assure us—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask a question which includes epithets. The question cannot be permitted on that ground. If the hon. member wants to ask a direct question he will be recognized.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver East, the Prime Minister asked the hon. member to wait until Tuesday, when the Minister of Transport will be here. The Minister of Transport was here only once last week. All I am asking the Prime Minister is whether he can assure us that the Minister of Transport will in fact be here on Tuesday.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the house that according to our arrangement, on days when matters coming under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport are raised there will be somebody in the house to answer the questions.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I ask him the direct question; after one week's trial period of this system of planned attendance does he feel it is working in the way it was intended, and would he explain some of the advantages to the house which he outlined on October 4?

Mr. Trudeau: I must say that the Conservative party is even more conservative than we thought. We hope they will keep trying this novelty.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can give assurance to the house that no crisis will arise within a department on days when that department is not represented by a minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, provided they are not engineered by the opposition.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

VICTORIAVILLE, QUE.—PROPOSED ABANDONMENT OF PASSENGER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the Minister of Transport a question but, in his absence, I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary.

Some time ago, the C.N.R. management announced that passenger service at Victoriaville would be discontinued completely. There was a general outcry among the population of that city of 23,500 inhabitants—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must ask his question.

Mr. Fortin: Can the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport tell the house if the decision to discontinue passenger service starting next October 27 is final and irreversible?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question should be put on the order paper.

THE BUDGET

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRESENTATION ON TUESDAY, OCTOBER 22

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Prud'Homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Finance.

Has the minister reached a decision regarding the date on which the budget will be brought down?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to bring in the budget on October 22. In anticipation of that I will be tabling the white paper the middle of next week.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It relates to his announcement that the budget will be brought down on October 22. Since that is a Tuesday, and since Tuesday is his day off, will he be here when the budget is presented?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think it is most likely I will be here.

Mr. Baldwin: That is the day there will be a crisis.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to announce the appointment of the new president of Air Canada.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Would the Prime Minister consider appointing Mr. MacIsaac and Mr. Anderson to the Senate to clear the way for a non-political appointment for this position?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

ORDER OF COMMISSION RESPECTING HEALTH OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of Transport but I do not see him here today. I thought the understanding was that his parliamentary secretary would be here to answer questions, but apparently he is not here either, so I will have to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Is the Prime Minister aware of the delay on the part of the Canadian Transportation Commission, in that its railway transport committee has failed to rule as yet on the application of the Canadian railway labour executive, which made representations in January of this year in respect of a general order on the matter of health and sanitation as they relate to railway employees?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that this is a general question of the type hon. members should put on the order paper.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian railway labour executive is meeting this day in Ottawa, and they have stated they have tried to get this answer from the government and have requested me to attempt to get an answer in the house.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROCEEDINGS AT DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicate whether the federal-provincial conference on consumer affairs will be open to the public or, failing that, to members of this house?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the federal-provincial conference called for October 28 is a meeting of federal and provincial officials. In line with the usual practice, this will be a closed meeting.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Would the minister tell the house whether a decision has been reached in respect of setting up a committee on consumer affairs, since the standing committees of the house have now been constituted?

Mr. Basford: No.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister tell the house what committee of the house will deal with the important matters that come under his jurisdiction?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, that is really a question for the house leader. I believe it is going to be the economic and social committee.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister have the white paper on prices and costs, which he promised on September 13, brought down in time for this meeting?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The white paper is not ready yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. Will he now tell the house when the special consumers' council will be set up? He has been putting off this question since the house opened.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. member meant to refer to the council by its correct name, which is the consumer advisory council. I have been saying that I hoped to appoint it shortly, and I meant that. I hoped to appoint it far earlier. My problem is that there are about 200 people in Canada who would make a tremendous contribution to the council and I am having some difficulty in reducing this number to manageable proportions.

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. After establishing the consumer advisory council will the minister refer to it the subject matter of price increases of automobiles, repair parts and safety devices in automobiles?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the consumer advisory council is an advisory council independent of the minister and the department. The work it will do is really a matter for decision by the chairman and the members of his council. I am not in a position to direct it to do any work.

Mr. Schreyer: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That being so, could the minister say whether he has referred or will refer this subject matter to anyone?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of very lively concern to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to my department and to the government as a whole.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If we are not to have a standing committee of this house to which to refer consumer affairs, will the minister see that either a special committee of this house is set up or a joint committee of the house and the other place, such as the one we had before; because there should be somewhere to which we can refer consumer matters.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question previously. I have said that the matter is under consideration. This is also related to the statements that I and the Prime Minister have been making about publishing a white paper on the question of costs. The two questions are related.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PROPOSED REFERENCE OF LEGISLATION TO HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman can now answer the question asked previously, as to whether the post office bill will be referred to the appropriate committee so that all concerned can make representations.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the representations that could be made before a committee would have changed from what they have been in recent years. I have met with all interested groups in the past several weeks. I think the bill will stay in the house and in committee.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO END MILITARY OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I am wondering whether the right hon. gentleman has had a chance to study the speech made by his distinguished predecessor at York University, to the effect that an end of the military operations in Nigeria-Biafra was of prime importance; and as a result, is the government considering any fresh initiatives in this regard?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the committee discussing this matter met until one o'clock this morning. We are awaiting any opinions or advice which might issue from that committee.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Another crime slaying has been reported from Montreal. Is the right hon. gentleman now prepared to take this matter seriously and co-operate with the attorneys general—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not acceptable in this form.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the answer to my recent question to the Prime Minister, could he tell us whether it is his intention soon to review officially the 1927 decision concerning the dispute between Quebec and Newfoundland as to the ownership of Labrador? Could he make a statement now?

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

NOVA SCOTIA—BYLAW RESPECTING BURIALS IN ST. CROIX CEMETERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the acting minister of justice or the acting minister of Indian affairs, whichever one would desire to answer it.

My question relates to a Nova Scotia by law which states that no negro or coloured person, nor any Indian, shall be buried in St. Croix cemetery.

A situation arose not long ago in which a child of non-caucasian descent was denied burial there. I wonder whether either of these gentlemen would take a look at this situation in the light of the bill of rights and in the name of equality and humanitarianism, to see whether this is a valid bylaw which should remain in existence.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I take notice of this question.

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—PROVINCES PREPARED TO ENTER INTO AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Would he indicate which provinces have now stated their intention to participate in federal medicare by March 31, 1969?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will have to take notice of the question. I do not have the information in my mind.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister, when looking up this information, determine whether the $35 million in the revised estimates includes the cost which will apply to all the provinces which have indicated their desire to enter medicare by that date?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer this question. The $35 million in the revised estimates is the amount which is expected to be spent in the current fiscal year on medicare.

Mr. Monteith: With all the anticipated provinces in the program?

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS ASKED OF MINISTERS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, which I can fully support by Your Honour's rulings throughout the last session of parliament, under which I and other members of the house were not permitted to ask questions of ministers which did not pertain to their own departments. In view of the fact that I and other hon. members were refused permission to do this, it should naturally follow that no minister should be permitted to answer questions which do not pertain to his own department.

The system introduced by the Prime Minister has thrown that all out of whack. For example, when the hon. member for Vancouver East asked a question which was directed to the Minister of Transport, he was informed by the Prime Minister he would have to wait for an answer until the minister's return to the house, which will not be before Tuesday.

The situation in which an urgent question is asked and we are told by the Prime Minister that an answer will not be forthcoming sometimes as late as five days hence is making mockery of parliament. It is also a mockery of parliament that today we have in the house only eight ministers out of twenty nine.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Matters of great importance are sometimes raised—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly state his point of order.

An hon. Member: How many members do you have on your front benches?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): With the Liberal side acting up again I did not hear your remark, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the would-be leader from British Columbia, wants to take the floor.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. The hon. member should state his point of order, on which I will give a ruling.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): My ruling, sir, goes back—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): It might not be a bad idea if I did give a ruling. My point of order is substantiated by the rulings of the Chair throughout the last few sessions of parliament, when hon. members were not allowed to ask questions of a minister unless those questions pertained to the department of the minister to whom the question was directed. Mockery has been made of that practice by the Prime Minister. It is time we had a definite ruling from the Chair, and it is time the Prime Minister was told how parliament should operate.

Mr. Speaker: I have no difficulty in making a ruling on the point raised by the hon. member. If he will remember the circumstances to which he referred, it was the hon. member himself who, along with other hon. members, attempted to ask questions of ministers in their capacity as alleged ministers for a province, and I suggested that questions could be asked of a minister only in his own purview. What is being suggested now is that questions be asked of acting ministers. This has always been accepted in the 100 years of Canadian parliamentary procedure, and from a procedural standpoint I see no difficulty in accepting that proposition.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): May I say, with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, that I do recall a ruling with regard to asking questions—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have made my ruling. The hon. member may not agree with it, but I am afraid he has to accept it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege will come up later.

EXTERNAL AID

NIGERIA—REPORTED RESTRICTION ON USE OF CANADIAN PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I must ask this question of the right hon. Prime Minister because today is not the day for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be here, and this is a matter which I suggest cannot be delayed until Tuesday. It arises out of a report that the Hercules planes which the Canadian government is now making available are to fly only from Lagos in Nigeria and not from any other base from which relief might be flown into the areas of suffering; that is, they are to fly only between Lagos and Enugu, both of which are in the federal military government occupied area. My question to the Prime Minister is whether this is the condition under which the Hercules planes will be available to the International Red Cross, and whether that condition was laid down by the Nigerian authorities.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have seen such a report, Mr. Speaker, but apparently it is a news report from a source which we have not been able to verify. It does not correspond to the facts as we see them.

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question. As the right hon. gentleman knows, this report allegedly comes from the international committee of the Red Cross in Geneva. May I ask the Prime Minister if he knows whether the Department of External Affairs is making direct inquiries to ascertain whether those limitations are to apply with regard to our aircraft.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Trudeau: We had notice of this report yesterday through the ordinary news wire. We are continuing to make the arrangements, about which we told the house yesterday, to organize flights from Fernando Po to the rebellious parts of Nigeria. Consideration is being given to the possibility of making these flights with the greatest safety. We are not affected by this report, and it is not our understanding that this is the way in which the arrangements will be made.

Mr. Forrestall: I wonder if they are not rebels with cause.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): The Prime Minister referred to flights from Fernando Po. Did he intend to exclude from the arrangements flights from San Tome, the Portuguese island?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. I was simply indicating that now that we have the agreement of the Lagos government that flights by our aircraft under the authority of the International Red Cross will not be considered a hostile act, we are placing our aircraft at the disposal of the International Red Cross so that that organization can fly these planes as best they see fit.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED INCREASE IN VOLUME OF THIRD CLASS MAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I have a question for the Postmaster General, based on reports that post offices are being flooded with third class mail from companies trying to avoid the government's rate increases. Can he tell the house what measures his department is taking to prevent possible consequent delays in the deliveries of other classes of mail as a result of these floods?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): I do not believe that poses any particular problem. There is a great deal of third class mail going through, as there will be until November 1. I imagine it is normal for such companies to try to avoid cost increases, but so far this has caused no deterioration in the delivery of other mail.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CANCELLATION OF ORGANIZATION MEETINGS OF STANDING COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, through you I desire to direct a most important question to the President of the Privy Council. Since it is his day off from orders of the day I therefore direct my question to whoever can speak for the President of the Privy Council today, or to the Prime Minister. In view of the expressed desire of the Prime Minister that the standing committees be organized and assume responsibility, can whoever may now speak for the government inform members why this morning we were informed that by order of the President of the Privy Council all organization meetings of standing committees of this house called for next Tuesday have been cancelled? I know you realize the importance of this particular question, Mr. Speaker, and I hope you will allow an answer to be given.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps while the matter is being considered—

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): May I ask a supplementary question. While the cabinet is considering the answer, could we have this time deducted from the time allotted for questions?

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF ACREAGE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of serious financial losses of western farmers because of the loss of markets, frost, rain and low quotas, will the minister consider re-establishing the emergency legislation concerning acreage payments?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is a possible or a potential serious loss to the farmers of western Canada, but I think the hon. member will realize that until the harvest season is completed it would be difficult to ascertain what the loss will be. There are several days, perhaps even weeks, left this fall when much of this harvesting could be done, providing the weather turns better. I feel it would be premature, therefore, to give this kind of consideration when we don't know what the harvest will be. I should advise the hon. member that the latest revised estimate by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics indicates the crop will be around 628 million bushels, which is a very good crop for western Canada.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, is the government carrying on consultations with the provinces and other interested parties to consider measures to alleviate the serious income problem now facing the prairie farmers and also to counteract the deteriorating crop conditions which are getting worse by the day?

Mr. Olson: We are doing more than that, Mr. Speaker. We have introduced legislation to increase by 100 per cent the cash advances on farm stored grain in western Canada. We hope the house will be disposed to approve this measure quickly so we can make it available to the farmers.

Mr. Burton: Will the minister consider making representations to the house leader to give this legislation a higher priority on the list of house business?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I am wearing two hats today, one as Minister of Agriculture and the other one as acting house leader. We have already suggested, and I thank the Postmaster General for his agreement, calling this farm legislation for one more day, namely next Tuesday. We would be prepared to call Bill No. C-111 first, followed by Bill No. C-110, followed by Bill No. C-113, followed by Bill No. C-112. We should hope the house would give us authority to proceed with the provisions contained in those bills.

Mr. Southam: May I ask a supplementary question to my earlier question concerning cash advances? Does the minister not realize that the provisions concerning cash advances are going to limit the amount of money available to the small farmer because of a lack of quota?

Mr. Olson: I realize it is going to double the amount of money available for every type of grain, wheat, oats and barley. As soon as this legislation is approved, cash advances will be increased 100 per cent.

Mr. Burton: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister consider calling the bill concerning cash advances immediately after consideration has been completed of the Farm Improvement Loans Act?

Mr. Olson: Certainly the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Farm Credit Corporation bill and the cash advances measure are all vital pieces of legislation. We certainly do not want to be in a position where we have to cease operation of the Farm Credit Corporation because the capitalization is not sufficiently large for that corporation to continue.

CORN—INQUIRY AS TO STABILIZATION OF MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, in view of the fact I have been informed that the price of Canadian corn fell another 4 cents a bushel yesterday. When is it expected that the government policies indicated by the minister might have some effect on stabilizing this market?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we were extremely anxious that action be taken to restore some stability to the corn market both in Canada and the United States, because as my hon. friend knows one is related to the other. I had some very useful conversations with Secretary Freeman of the United States department of agriculture. These have been followed by meetings in Washington between senior officials of the Canadian and United States government.

A press release was issued at six o'clock last night by my department and by the United States department. While no specific action has been agreed on at this point I think it is useful to know and, indeed, significant that the United States has agreed that it is urgently necessary to consider the several proposals placed before the meetings in order to find ways and means that are to our common advantage in stabilizing this market situation.

Mr. Danforth: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether his departmental officials feel, after meeting with their counterparts in Washington, that a decision can be expected from Washington before the change in administration?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we certainly hope a decision will be made sooner than that. I am sure my hon. friend is aware of the very, very complex background to our international agreements. I do not think it would be useful or beneficial to our corn producers if we were to speculate on the proposals that are under consideration, since if we were to do that the meetings might be frustrated.

[Mr. Olson.]

INDUSTRY

NEWFOUNDLAND—PROPOSED ASSISTANCE FOR LUMBERING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, but in his absence I will direct it to whoever will take it. In view of his announcement last night that various projects are planned to boost the Newfoundland lumbering industry by conditionally approving public measures to aid developments in Happy Valley and Stephenville, can the house be informed what these conditions are before approval can be given?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. The house again in committee of supply, revised estimates of the Governor General and Lieutenant Governors for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969. Vote 1 will be found at page 188 of the blue book, with the details listed at page 189.

GOVERNOR GENERAL AND LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS

(The following items were agreed to:)

1. Office of the Secretary to the Governor General, $685,400.

Item agreed to.

5. To authorize reimbursements to the Lieutenant-Governors of the Provinces of Canada of the costs of travelling and hospitality incurred in the exercise of their duties up to a maximum per annum for each as detailed in the Estimates, $145,000.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: That disposes of the estimates of the Governor General and Lieutenant Governors. We shall now proceed to the estimates of the privy council for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, vote 1, to be found at page 380 of the blue book.

PRIVY COUNCIL

Item 1:

1. Maintenance and Operation of the Prime Minister's Residence, $40,300.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make one or two comments. The first is with regard to the position taken by government and by the Prime Minister in particular in connection with the constitutional difficulties which the country has been experiencing. Some time ago I asked the Prime Minister if he did not think it was now time to establish in this parliament a parliamentary committee to examine the problems in connection with our constitutional position and the changes that are proposed so that we could all be brought into the picture. The Prime Minister made a slick, glib reply and suggested that the opposition parties had not made up their minds. That is no so. Our position has been made clear, but that is beside the point. For far too long the government and the Prime Minister have taken the arrogant and secretive position that constitutional changes are too precious to be entrusted to any but those who are hidden in the bureaucratic recesses of the government.

The people of this country are entitled to know what proposals are to be made. They are entitled to participate in debate through their elected representatives in this chamber. The prime minister of Quebec recently grappled with this problem and saw fit to disclose publicly the proposals which had been discussed in the constitutional committee of that province. We may or may not agree with those changes. Yet nothing, I submit, is more important to the people of this country than the opportunity to decide whether certain areas of responsibility shall be left with the federal or provincial governments.

I suggest to the government it is time it stopped hiding behind the barricade it has erected. It is time to bring the people of Canada into the picture. It is time to turn this matter into a national debate. The people of Canada are entitled to have some say and we are entitled to have some say on their behalf.

I submit that the Prime Minister cannot long delay. I know he has a majority and can deny our request. I suggest to him, nevertheless, that authority and majorities ought to be used with great circumspection. It is high time a committee of this parliament was established so that we might air in public all areas and all problems associated with this matter. I know that when it comes to working out details we shall require legal and economic experts. I submit this is far too important an issue to be left bottled up. I suggest that the Prime Minister should seriously consider revising his opinion, climb off his high horse and bring this matter before parliament where it should have been long ago.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might have some direction. I do not know whether under this vote I may discuss the matter of royal commissions or whether I ought to wait for another occasion.

The Chairman: I think it would be appropriate to deal with that matter under this item.

• (12 noon)

Mr. Howard (Skeena): My remarks will be relatively brief. I suppose that at some time in the past royal commissions served a valuable purpose, but in the last 10 or 15 years they have been considered to be commissions appointed for the purpose of sidetracking complex, controversial or difficult problems. Some of them are spending many years on their deliberations and coming up with worth-while suggestions and recommendations which, because of the political climate and the feeling of the government at the time the report is made, tend to be sidetracked. Neither I nor anyone else apart from the minister knows the extent to which the report of the Carter commission on taxation will be reflected in the budget, but if the present Minister of Finance holds views similar to those of his predecessor the findings of the Carter commission will remain inoperative and the commission will have proved to be a complete waste of the taxpayers money. It will have served no purpose whatever except as a subject of academic conversation.

I turn now to the request in these estimates for $668,000 for the commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. I look upon this vote as being a further waste of money in addition to the $5 million or $6 million which has already been spent on this commission. This commission was appointed in the first instance as a result of a particular political party seeking to gain a political advantage in one of our provinces, namely, the province of Quebec. I do not want any of my remarks to be considered as anti-Quebec or anti-French speaking or anything of that sort, but I believe it is a political fact of life that before the federal elections of 1962 and 1963 the Liberal party was groping desperately for something which would appeal to the electorate in the province of Quebec and finally conceived the idea of a royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. The origin was political. As a matter of fact, as I said earlier in this house, I fail to see how there can be such a thing as a bicultural situation. A person is a part of a culture, or he is not; it is not capable of division within an individual. The question of linguistic ability is something else.

The commission's latest report has in my submission invaded the constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces when it deals with the subject of education. To my mind this commission represents money wrongly spent, taxpayers' money spent on a royal commission which does nothing more than make recommendations concerning what the provinces should do in a field over which they have clear constitutional jurisdiction, namely, that of education. This jurisdiction is defended with great vigour by the very province which seems to have the greatest interest in the subjects placed before the commission. If anyone at the federal level were to say that Quebec should do certain things in connection with education it would immediately result in a reaction from the various authorities in Quebec who resent intrusion into this particular field. Yet we have spent millions of dollars on a royal commission whose recommendations infringe the jurisdiction over education which many provinces guard so jealously.

I shall not resort to the formality of voting against this item in the estimates when it is called. I read in the newspapers not long ago accounts of steady requests from this royal commission for an extension of time to permit it to continue its studies. I understand that these requests have so far been granted. But I think we should now tell the commission: Make your final report; we are giving you no more money; six or seven million dollars is sufficient for the study you were charged to make. Then we should let the matter rest, because in my opinion we are pouring money down the drain at this stage.

As I say, I shall not vote against the item, because there are a number of other expenditures included in it. I simply wish to express my disagreement with proposals to spend additional sums of money on a royal commission which so far has not made any suggestion that has been generally accepted, other than to say it is in favour of intrusion upon provincial jurisdiction relating to education.

It is possible to argue as to the value of other royal commissions, whether anything worth while comes of them. I simply wish to express the feeling that when the government appoints a royal commission it is in my view admitting, first of all, its inability to cope with a particular problem and, second, that the vast resources of our public service, with all the scientists and experts it contains, are likewise insufficient to produce an answer. It seems to me we should not perpetuate a system whereby we spend millions of dollars upon what we consider to be the best professional minds available to us in Canada, and then say to them when we are faced with a knotty problem: We do not consider you are competent to deal with this matter; we shall set up some other group to cope with it. Generally speaking, money spent for this purpose is money wasted. Why cannot we employ the good minds which are available to us within the public service to find an answer to these questions rather than appoint royal commissions which in many cases come to nought and merely represent a source of additional expenditure? If the government is really serious about curtailing public expenditure I suggest this is one area in which it could exercise common sense and halt the squandering of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak for a few moments on the subject of ministers who are not available during the question period to answer questions raised by members on the opposition side of the house.

We all know that questions asked during the question period must be of immediate consequence and of national importance. If you look at the schedule, Mr. Chairman, outlining the days when ministers are supposed to be in the house to answer questions, you will find that the third minister on the list is the Secretary of State for External Affairs who holds about the most important portfolio of all. You will see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is required to be in the house only on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays. This means he is absent on Mondays and Fridays.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Matters that come up that fall under his jurisdiction are matters of great national and international importance. They are immediate questions, questions that require an answer right away. If today a question arises and it is immediate, as it must be to be recognized by the Chair, and it is asked of the Secretary of State for External Affairs today it cannot be answered until five days later, next Tuesday. That shows how ridiculous this whole system is because by next Tuesday that question will be as dead as yesterday's newspapers.

Another matter that shows how ridiculous this whole system is is the fact that it is supposed to save ministers from the wear and tear of parliamentary duty.

Mr. Bell: They are afraid.

Mr. Hees: Of course they are afraid, but the theory the Prime Minister has put forward is that ministers should be saved from the wear and tear of parliamentary duties so that they can devote more time to parliamentary committees, cabinet committees or some other kind of work. But everybody knows that in any country the man upon whom the great responsibility falls is the Prime Minister. He is the one who has to make the decisions. Of all the members of the cabinet, if anybody is to be saved for decision making and relieved of the wear and tear of daily parliamentary life, if that is necessary—and this Prime Minister seems to think it is for his cabinet—the Prime Minister is the one man who should be preserved for more decision making, thinking and planning and not put through the daily wringer of the House of Commons. But the Prime Minister is the one who has decided that he will be here all day each day and he, because his ministers are absent a great deal of the time, will have to do a lot of answering for them because they are not here to do the answering for themselves.

Anybody who has been in government will recognize that for a minister to be in the house every day is the best thing in the world for him. Knowing that he is going to be subjected to questions each day requires him to be far sharper, far more on the job, far more alert to anything that may be going wrong with his department or with matters under his jurisdiction. If he knows he has to be in his place each day in the House of Commons and answer all manner of questions about matters under his jurisdiction then he is going to be far better informed day by day on the things he should know about for the good of the country.

So, Mr. Chairman, this whole plan is wrong from start to finish. It saves the wrong people. It overtires the man who should be saved the most, the Prime Minister. It provides for the absence for five days in a row, from Thursday until the following Tuesday, of the most important minister in the cabinet next to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Any question that is asked of him must be of great importance. It is of national and international importance, but by the time that five days have rolled around the question is of no importance whatsoever.

Once again, we in the opposition ask the Prime Minister to reconsider the decision he has made to bring about this change, not because we want to be small about this matter or dictate to the government how it shall operate but simply because we have been through the same procedure that the present ministers go through each day. We have been a government. We who were ministers know what it is like to answer questions. We know whether it is a good or a bad thing for a minister to be in the house each day to answer the questions put to him. We know, and ministers across the aisle know perfectly well, that it is a good thing for them to be in the house each day knowing they have to be prepared to answer immediately any question that is put to them about matters under their jurisdiction.

Therefore, once again on behalf of our party and on behalf of the opposition I appeal to the Prime Minister through the government house leader, who is in the chamber, to reconsider this plan because we think it will be for the benefit of the better functioning of parliament and the better running of the affairs of this country if these ministers are available in the house each day instead of being absent, as so many of them are each day because of this rather ramshackle, hit or miss plan that has been thrown at the House of Commons with very little consideration by the Prime Minister. We ask the Prime Minister to be a big enough man to say: We tried it; we do not think it is good and we will go back to the former method of making ministers available in the house at all times.

To the newer ministers in the government I can say they will find out as time goes along that there is only one thing worse than being asked a lot of difficult questions each day and that is not being asked any questions at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I must say it is very useful that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has taken the opportunity to comment on this matter, not because of the argument he makes but because of some of the misconceptions demonstrated in the point of view he is taking. It is not without significance that he should have referred in particular to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and should have advanced the proposition that willy-nilly, come what may, whatever the arrangements, five days a week the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be in the House of Commons during the question period to answer questions. We should pause and reflect on this attitude of the hon. member.

In the first place, in the state of modern diplomacy, in the state of the many responsibilities of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it has been traditional during the government of which the hon. member was a member, during the government that preceded this one and now during the present government, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be absent from the House of Commons for long periods of time, not absent because of any lack of respect for the house or lack of concern about his responsibilities in the house but absent because the proper discharge of his office requires that he be absent. For example, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just returned from participating in the general debate at the United Nations General Assembly. That has been the custom over the years. Having participated myself in a general assembly session I know of what value it is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and for the foreign ministers of other nations to attend the general debate, to participate in it, and to have the opportunity it provides to discuss current trends in international relations with the representatives of other nations.

But the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings would not have this. He says that external affairs is the second most important portfolio and that the minister should be here come what may. I must say I would disagree with this.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I never said at any time that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be here come what may. I obviously said that he should be here if he is in Ottawa, not at the United Nations or at some other foreign conference where of course he has to be present. All secretaries of state for external affairs have always attended these conferences and we have wanted them to attend. I simply say that if he is here in Ottawa he should be here in the House of Commons, not in his office. He cannot be here if he has official duties in New York or some other foreign capital. Don't be stupid and make a statement like that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am glad the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has recognized—

Mr. Hees: Stupidity annoys me very much indeed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I must say to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings that while we find that quality in him we have always found it to be charming.

Mr. Hees: You just do not have the knack of being funny.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): You seem to be the only one who thinks so. I think it is interesting that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings speaks almost better from his seat than on his feet. I am glad the hon. member has clarified the situation because it was clear from his previous remarks that he insisted the minister should be in the house. I am glad that at least he has clarified his party's position from this standpoint.

There are two things about the proposal before the house which I should like to emphasize. First, we are not talking so much about the importance of individual ministers being available here during the question period as we are of the importance of having them answerable on certain days in the house for their departmental and functional responsibilities. Second this system has been in vogue in the British House of Commons at Westminster for very many years. The system we are proposing provides a much better opportunity than does the British system for the questioning of ministers. It has been suggested that this system is undemocratic and is not in the interests of effective parliamentary democracy. All I can say is that if that criticism is justified then it must apply a fortiori to the British system.

We feel that an appearance three times a week by a minister to answer questions on matters concerning his departmental and functional responsibilities gives a first class opportunity to members to raise questions within the limits of the minister's responsibilities.

The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings referred to the fact that many ministers sit through entire days without being asked a question. The question this automatically raises is whether this is really the best employment of a minister's time, that is, to have a minister sit here for up to an hour, after having had to prepare for the event, just so that he will be present if someone wishes to ask a question not perhaps for the purpose of seeking information but rather for the purpose of tendering information, especially when, as the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings indicates, the questions are very often ruled out of order.

I think ministers have a responsibility in respect of answering questions in the house but I also believe that ministers should also have an opportunity to attend meetings of cabinet committees and to deal with other departmental matters during some of this time. In this regard a conflict occurs in the parliamentary system because ministers are required not only to be executives but also to bear their responsibility as members of parliament and be present in this house. It would seem to me that the system we are putting forward is the only way under a modern and effective system of government that we can assure that there is an opportunity for parliamentary questioning and also an opportunity for the ministers to engage in their departmental responsibilities.

I have made reference to the British system. There seems to be some considerable misconception about it. It might be useful if I were to address a few remarks to the house on this point. First of all, the British system requires that questions not be asked, as the vast majority of questions during our question period are asked, without advance notice to the responsible minister. It requires that written notice of the question be given to the table. It reserves to the table, or to the clerk of the house, the responsibility to decide whether or not the question is in order. Apart altogether from the question of order it reserves to the decision of the Chair whether or not a particular question should be accepted at the time just from the standpoint of the sheer volume of questions coming forward.

In the United Kingdom parliament—and I do not think it is an undemocratic institution—the ministers are not required by the rules of that house to be in the house every day five days of the week. Rather, a roster is established whereby in practice a minister may be questioned in the house perhaps only once every three weeks or so. If I may use the Canadian ministries as an illustration, the situation there is that the roster would call for, first, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, second, the Minister of Finance and, third, the Minister of Agriculture. In the British system all outstanding questions of which notice had been given to the secretary of state for external affairs would be called and spontaneous supplementary questions would be allowed at that time. The effect, therefore, under the British system of government would be that a question after it has been accepted by the Chair might not be responded to for as much as three weeks after having been put forward.

I believe it can be fairly said that in an attempt to provide at the same time an opportunity for a minister to take care of the heavy demands on his time and an opportunity for members to pose questions in the house, the proposed arrangement is very reasonable. Hon. members are not being asked to do what I understand was the practice at one time in this house, that is, give advance written notice, even the courtesy of advance written notice as little as an hour beforehand. Members may ask questions without any notice at all to the minister. They may direct a question on three days of the week either to the minister directly responsible for a particular department or to the acting minister. If the purpose of the question really is to seek information, then surely it obviously is better that the minister be given at least the courtesy of an hour's notice of the subject involved in the question which the hon. member proposes to ask him.

Mr. Hees: Would the minister allow me to ask a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): By all means.

Mr. Hees: Does he think for one moment that during the six years we were in power either Mr. Pearson, Mr. Martin, Mr. Chevrier or Mr. Pickersgill ever gave any minister notice? I can assure him they did not.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I see. Well it seems to me that that only brings forth the observation that two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. Hees: Then for heaven's sake stop preaching to the house.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have difficulty preaching to the hon. member. I wish he would open his ears as freely as he opens his mouth.

Mr. Hees: I am opening my ears but I simply object to a lot of the nonsense you are uttering.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am not trying to provoke the hon. member and I am sure he is not trying to provoke me. I hear some very useful advice from the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

Mr. Hees: You had better stick to the straight line. You are not funny.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think it is obvious that in our parliamentary system we must make some adjustment because of the fact that there is now more business to be dealt with and the matters to be dealt with are of increasing complexity. I think it is important to recognize that the parliamentary institution which we have inherited has grown and evolved over the years. It will continue to evolve and grow but we hope to find on the other side of the house a greater receptiveness to this kind of parliamentary change instead of the negativism that would indicate that, because things have not been done this way in the past, no changes should be made.

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, now that this subject has been opened again I should like to make a few comments. I agree with the President of the Privy Council that it would be ridiculous to insist that every minister be in his place in the house every day of the session. There are people like the Secretary of State for External Affairs who occasionally have to be away for a day at a time and sometimes for a week at a time. In fact, this is true of all the ministers of the cabinet. There are times when their absence is imperative either because of an important engagement in some other part of the country or elsewhere or because of illness. We recognize the fact that to have 100 per cent attendance on the part of cabinet members every day is impossible.

What we think complicates the situation is that the Prime Minister, on top of these absences that take place naturally, has imposed what seems to be a requirement or an order that on certain days certain ministers shall stay out of the house, whether or not they have to be somewhere else. We have already experienced the situation where ministers, according to the roster, are not supposed to be here for the question period and they come in afterwards. I do not know where the President of the Privy Council was this morning. He was not here during the question period but he came in afterwards.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): What would you say if I told you I was at a cabinet committee meeting?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that the answer for the 18 or so ministers who were absent this morning? Were they all at the same cabinet meeting?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's observation perhaps I should state that while I am not at liberty to say who was at the committee meeting there was a cabinet committee meeting this morning and a substantial number of my colleagues were at that meeting. I think it is appropriate that we have such meetings.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope the President of the Privy Council will not have his knuckles rapped for having made a cabinet leak, but I can tell him that I regard this as a legitimate reason for a minister being absent. It is legitimate for ministers to be absent when some emergency arises and a cabinet committee meeting takes place. It is precisely because there are so many of these legitimate reasons—appointments at the United Nations and throughout the country, and cabinet meetings, or because of illness—that I think it is unfair to the house to say that over and above these there are certain days on which certain ministers will not be here because of the roster.

The second comment I should like to make is this. The Prime Minister assured us when he announced this system in the first place that it was not his intention to impose upon us a notice requirement any more stringent than now prevails. Of course, there is no notice requirement at all. At any rate, this was the assurance. Later on when this issue became a rather warm one we were assured again there would always be someone in the house for each department. We were assured that the minister, the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary would be here to answer questions. Failing that we were told the Prime Minister would be here. In this way we could get an answer of sorts on any day.

This situation seems to have changed. This morning the Prime Minister told one or two members to be here on Tuesday or Wednesday to ask their questions at that time. In other words, we are being shoehorned into a system under which we must ask questions about certain departments on certain days whether or not there is an emergency.

The whole effect of this is a weakening of the question period, making it less important and cooling it off. I think this is bad for parliament. Sometimes we do not get as much information during the question period as we would like but the question period is, I submit quite frankly, not just a time for asking and receiving information. It is a time of straight political warfare. I see nothing wrong with it. I think it is part of the parliamentary process. It is an opportunity for the opposition to keep the government on its toes. The question period is one opportunity we have to do this.

It is my submission that if the government continues as it did this morning, and this takes place every Friday, we will have trouble keeping the opposition members here. They will ask: What is the use of being here on Friday? I think this is a serious attempt to make the question period much less effective and less important. I believe the government is doing a disservice to parliament because of this course which is being followed.

Every time this discussion about the question period is raised someone tells us how this is handled at Westminster. The President of the Privy Council was not ploughing new ground when he did this today. It was interesting last February that there was almost a unanimous feeling on the part of the members who visited Westminster that Westminster had much to teach us, but not in this area. When members of this house went over there and saw how their question period operated they said: This is not for us. Some of the members of that committee are in the house at this time and I am sure they agree with me.

The other point I want to make is that you just cannot compare the two systems, because they are completely different. The minister suggests that over there written notice has to be given in respect of every question. This is 99 per cent true, but there are such things as very urgent and "super-urgent" questions which the front benchers on the opposition side can ask. But for the most part questions are put on the order paper. In addition, there is roughly an hour every day which is virtually an hour of debate or political warfare.

The minister says that on most days only one minister will be answering questions. That is true, although on some days there can be two or three. We all know what happens here. The parliamentary secretary gets up and says questions numbered so and so are answered. Over there the minister gets up and goes to the dispatch box to answer questions. After each answer there may be six or eight supplementary questions and a debate of the kind we have here on orders of the day.

What bothers me is that ministers like the President of the Privy Council want to adopt the aspect of the British system which requires that notice be given of questions but do not seem to want to adopt the practice of having the discussion period which they have over there. I think it is quite unfair to make this kind of a comparison. Even with the liveliness when the Prime Minister was on the griddle we felt there was something lacking because members were not able to put questions to other ministers.

Let me remind you that the responsibilities of the United Kingdom house are much broader than ours. We sometimes refer to the fact that theirs is a unitary system of government while ours is a two level system. They have what amounts to three levels in one. They are dealing with matters that we deal with federally, provincially and municipally. These matters are all dealt with on the floor of that parliament. On top of this they have their debates on adjournment motions. There are all sorts of opportunities for venting grievances and airing things that bother them.

If I felt this government was trying to move in the direction of creating more opportunities for legitimate political warfare, such as is involved in the question period, I would go along with it. I am thoroughly convinced that the government is not trying to move in that direction but is trying to move in the direction of cooling off the question period. If we have many more mornings like today with only six or eight cabinet ministers here we will have fewer members on the back benches and Friday will be a worse day than it is now.

Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, speaking of questions, my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East asked a question this morning in the absence of the President of the Privy Council, who we now learn was at a very important cabinet committee meeting, about the announcement that all the organization meetings of committees slated for Tuesday have been cancelled, not just this one or that one but the whole works. I am told the external affairs committee will still meet on Tuesday morning, but all the organization meetings of committees on Tuesday have been cancelled.

This was of concern to my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East, who prefaced his question by referring to the importance being attached to committees and getting them going and asked, therefore, why the organization meetings have been cancelled. I have a suspicion as to why they are being cancelled for Tuesday. Monday is a holiday and the fear is that there will not be as many members here on Tuesday morning as there would be on a normal Tuesday morning and therefore we might just as well not hold the meetings.

I mention this in the same vein as when I talked about the downgrading of the question period. We have enough trouble as it is getting members to be here. We all live in glass houses in this respect; all parties in the house have this trouble. Therefore, let no one try to throw stones, because he is in the same trouble himself.

I submit that this downgrading of the question period will add to the problem of house attendance, and I hope the government will consider my suggestion. I still feel that it was rather strange that this system should have been started the very day after we had agreed to set up a committee to study the rules and procedures of the house. The Prime Minister rose and unilaterally announced this change and we just had to take it, whether we liked it or not. Well, Mr. Chairman, we do not like it, mainly because we think it is doing damage to parliament.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I think the intervention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been useful in this regard, as it generally is on procedural questions, because it opens up a number of avenues for further consideration of this question. Also, I think it perhaps sheds just a ray of light on the solution to the problem of the question period.

The hon. member conceded that it was entirely legitimate that I and other colleagues, who shall remain nameless, who were members of a particular cabinet committee should have been absent from the house this morning. From that concession there seems to flow a further logical principle. Given the fact that the governor general in council, that is, the executive of this country, is required by our system of government to make a very large number of decisions, many more than can be handled in one or two cabinet meetings a week outside of the ordinary business of the house, it is inevitable that there will be more than one committee meeting that will conflict with the sittings of the house. I think it follows equally logically that if there is this great volume of business coming forward at cabinet committee meetings, they should be scheduled so that ministers can engage in the executive work which must necessarily be performed by the cabinet. As the hon. member said, if there is legitimacy in one particular case of having such a meeting, there is legitimacy in establishing over the period of a whole week a framework of cabinet committee meetings so executive decisions can be made and the work dealt with on a regular and systematic basis.

[M. Knowles (Winnipeg-Nord-Centre).]

The hon. member said that parliament as a whole will decline if the question period is downgraded. I think he may have made that remark for rhetorical effect. I believe that parliament is very much more than the question period. I am very much intrigued by his reference to the practice followed in Great Britain as a lively hour. Questions appear on the British House of Commons order paper and those requiring oral answers are called by prearrangement for the minister responsible to answer them in the house. Apparently an hour is taken up with this procedure. I think this might be a practice to be followed in our house. I believe there is merit in what the hon. member said.

I refer to one of our current rules which it seems to me has become a dead letter. I am talking about the institution of starred questions in this house. I put this suggestion forward for the consideration of hon. members opposite and perhaps we will at a later date have an opportunity to discuss it. I think it would be advisable to adapt the starred question procedure in such a way that we would have the opportunity not only of advance notice of starred questions, which come not only to the attention of the minister and the department but of all hon. members and of whoever may be watching us in the house, but also an opportunity for the minister to give a prepared reply. Then there would be further opportunities for hon. members generally, but particularly the initial questioner, to ask supplementary questions following the minister's reply. I believe this could be a very useful practice within the framework of the question period.

The hon. member said that I appeared to be trying to take one aspect of the British question period and not others. I remain very flexible in this regard. This is another aspect of the British question period that might be considered. Perhaps we will be able to consider it in the not too distant future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, would the President of the Privy Council permit a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the suggestion the President of the Privy Council is now making, that there are matters we might discuss and consider, does he not agree that it would be better to arrive at changes that way rather than by the method of just announcing them unilaterally from the government side of the house?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister and I have conceded that this system is experimental. I think it would be advisable to continue the experiment. I will have the opportunity to discuss these matters with the house leaders of the other parties, but I think it would be useful to carry on with the experiment. If it does not work, I would be the first to suggest that it be abandoned. I say, on the other hand, that objections to the system on the very first day it was put into practice should be taken with a grain of salt, because after all we are without any practical experience of how it will work. As I say, I think we should continue the experiment.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a few minutes to deal with one or two points that I believe should be emphasized. The first is the question raised by the President of the Privy Council when he concluded his remarks, namely, that objections made on the first day of the system being put into effect should be taken with a grain of salt. I think the President of the Privy Council must recognize that the government took absolutely the wrong approach to the problem in an effort to do something that should be progressive. In this case I hope the objective was to make the question period more useful to parliament. The point is that instead of doing so the result has been the opposite.

We are well aware that it is difficult for ministers always to be in the house during the question period. We all recognize that it is extremely difficult for them to do this. We also recognize that it has always been one of those things that they wish they could avoid. There are so many other things they have to do, so many questions that they perhaps are not quite up to, so many things that might be asked.

As has been pointed out, ministers also have duties overseas at times or in other parts of the country and, although I will not go as far as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did, they also have to attend emergency meetings in the parliament buildings. But it has always been the practice, and as far as I know there has been nothing wrong with it, that ministers should, whenever physically possible, be in the house for the question period of 30 minutes on Wednesdays, one hour on Mondays and 40 minutes on the other days. This is not a long period. More than that, it is a prescribed period; they know exactly when it is going to take place within the minute, unless motions are made which mean that the question period is extended.

There has always been the understanding that ministers have a problem in this regard. I think the house has always been willing to recognize the problem. The house has always been willing to recognize that when a minister is out of Ottawa on government business he is certainly not available here for questions. This is the flexible way in which the question period has always been approached and I believe it has worked out satisfactorily. Of course there have been problems, but it has never been the case that ministers present in Ottawa have sat in their offices instead of being present in the house to answer questions.

The new system would work perhaps if there were a guarantee that an absent minister would be here on the day he is supposed to answer questions. Perhaps there is something in the suggestion that he may have to be away on a certain day but that he will be here the next day. I think we might even go along with that if the Prime Minister could say the absent minister would be present the next day. But the fact is that on a day the minister could be here he sits in his office upstairs, while on the day he is supposed to be here he gets a call to go somewhere else.

This week we had the strange situation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources sitting in the house during the question period on Monday presumably ready to answer questions—I am sure he saw me rise to put a question to him—but drifting away so he would not be caught in the house on a day when the timetable said he should not be here. But on Wednesday, when he was supposed to be here during the question period, in answer to my question the Prime Minister said the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had gone to a meeting of the council of resource ministers in eastern Canada so he certainly could not be here. The minister must have known he was going—there was no emergency—and he should have made himself available on Monday and Tuesday when he was right here in the building. This is where the whole system is failing. Whoever dreamed up this idea, whether it was the Prime Minister, the President of the Privy Council or anyone else, instead of making the system more flexible and realistic has made it so rigid that it will never work.

We are not trying to oppose it for the sake of opposition or to cause the government embarrassment. That is not our sole reason. I recognize that we have to make our point by ridicule, but that is the only way in which we can do it in a ridiculous situation. That is all we can do in these ridiculous situations. We cannot meet the weight of the government's majority by just sitting here and being walked over. We have to point out to the public and to the house that this is a ridiculous situation. This is the only way in which we can deal with it.

This system might as well be dropped because it cannot possibly work in this rigid way. The very success of the question period depends on its flexibility and the ease with which unexpected situations are met. The ministers should be here when they can be here. Of course, if they are away for long periods of time, although it is difficult to understand the reason for it we would certainly not make an issue of it. When we know the Secretary of State for External Affairs is in New York, no one rises and asks why he is not here unless we have a suspicion he is staying down there to avoid questions.

If we had been given an opportunity we could have explained to the government before they initiated this system why it would not work. However, they decided not to consult us about it before they brought it into effect.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Is the hon. member saying that the opposition was not advised of this matter?

Mr. Aiken: The minister is using the very word which points out what the government did. It advised the opposition, it did not consult us.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Is the hon. member for Peace River saying he did not know about this proposition?

[Mr. Aiken.]

Mr. Baldwin: No, we are not saying that.

Mr. Aiken: I am saying that the President of the Privy Council advised us, but that is not consultation. Is that the way the President of the Privy Council will handle the committee on procedure? If it is and if he is only going to advise us what he will do, he will find some other proposals in as great a mess as they are now. There are a few members here who are perhaps not too brilliant but who have had a few years of experience. I know some of these proposals will not work because they have been tried and they failed. There is no use in the government coming along and saying they have a mandate, so they know everything. It is wrong for them not to consult us. We will accept a new idea if it is good, but this was a very bad one.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think there are some useful concessions in what the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka said. In the first place, he was kind enough to indicate there was no sinister intent in what we did, although some of his colleagues have not been so generous in admitting that. But I would say to him in this regard, and I will deal with his last remark first, that I do not agree with his theory that the opposition should have a veto in this matter. I am prepared to concede that the hon. member may genuinely disagree with me on the way in which this house should operate, but just because he disagrees with me does not give him the right to say we cannot do this because he disagrees with it. I want to make this perfectly clear.

Mr. Hees: No one said that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka was very successful in finding fault with the argument put forward by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. He conceded it was not to be expected that ministers would be here at all times when questions might be put. It seems to me it is obvious common sense and therefore it should be accepted that ministers cannot be in the house at all times. This is the fallacy in their argument.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I never said that at any time. It has always been recognized that ministers have to be away. When they do not have to be away they should be here in the house to answer questions, but when they are away on important business we have always agreed this is right and no questions have been raised.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I thank the hon. member because it seems to me that there can be no more important business than the conclaves of the cabinet and its committees, and when the cabinet committee is sitting to consider important executive business that is reason enough for the minister to be away.

The Deputy Chairman: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at one o'clock I was addressing a few remarks to the question of the roster of ministers during the question period. There is a final observation I should like to make on the underlying reasons for this practice. It is related basically to the importance of making sure that there be effective political control if I might use a pejorative term, of the bureaucratic establishment. The function of a minister, as I said before, is not only to be here in the house and respond to questions. I accept the general legitimacy of that proposition. It is also important for a minister to assume responsibility as political head of a department in dealing with the vast apparatus of modern government which has grown up.

One underlying reason that has necessitated the practice the government has followed has been the importance of balancing a minister's time so he could be involved not only in dealing with the executive decisions made in cabinet committee but also that he will have a more effective opportunity to keep in contact—and I do not think the word is too strong—and in control of his department. It is for this reason, in addition to the other reasons I have stated, that I think the change is not only a reasonable but a desirable one considering the need to maintain political control of the establishment.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I make no apologies for the fact that we have had this debate. I feel it has been very useful. I think we are probably developing in the open here the discussion that might well have taken place in a committee room had there been the consultation to which the President of the Privy Council has referred rather than the arbitrary imposition of this practice. It is a question of advise and consent, which is a term we all know as applicable to the United States Senate. I understood the President of the Privy Council to say he had advised us of this proposal. He did advise, but that does not mean consent nor does it necessarily imply consultation.

I think this is the real problem before us today. Legislative bodies in democratic societies all over the world are puzzled and perplexed by the problems which confront them. The problem is to balance the necessity of putting together the facts that ought to be explained and the responsibility of the legislative branch to make sure that the best interests of the people are served. I think this is our problem. It is easy for the government to produce proposals. They are satisfied those proposals are right and, with all the conscientiousness of virtue, they suggest to the House of Commons that our task should be limited to that of a simple protest.

I am not going to go into all the details of this subject. It is a debate that is world wide. This issue brings us right down to the root of the problem. When the President of the Privy Council and the Prime Minister say, we told you that it was going to happen, they remind me of the phrase, "Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed that he has grown so great"?

The question period is predicated upon the issue of urgency. What might be urgent on Thursday or Friday may cease to be urgent on Tuesday or Wednesday. I believe Mr. Speaker would be justified in saying, if a question asked on Thursday can be answered next Tuesday, that it ceases to have the characteristic of urgency which is a condition precedent to the question being asked. We had an illustration of this situation during the question period today. I think the government is wrong. However, there are ways and means by which something might be worked out. I can readily understand the desire of the government to secure notice of certain types of questions. Something might be worked out with regard to some of these questions along the lines of the principle involved in the United Kingdom which provides for private notice questions. The proposition is that you reward those who give notice rather than punish those who do not give notice, which seems to be what is in the mind of the government here.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council are in fact saying that if we do not give notice of a question then it is going to be made much more difficult for us. I do not accept that proposition either. Through proper consultation and reasonable discussion I think this area of difference between us might well be worked out. I make the simple statement of fact to the government that every day this method continues to be perpetuated makes it that much more difficult to work out a logical, sensible solution such as we must have.

I do not mind saying that probably I was one of the members who was in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he talked about the trip to England. I do not mind admitting that the memo I gave to the special committee on procedure contained the suggestion that we should have a look at this system. I attended the question period at Westminster almost every day. I talked with private members, ministers, some former ministers and former privy councillors. I say to you, sir, and to this committee that the system has been a complete failure in the United Kingdom.

The other day I read a book entitled "The Power Of The Prime Minister" by Humphrey Berkeley, who is a liberal-minded member of the Conservative party. He has been most interested in this problem and its ramifications with regard to parliamentary procedure. In the book he expounds his views and recommends many things. Most emphatically and categorically he says that the present system in the United Kingdom is a complete failure. It simply does not work. He cites examples showing that members sometimes have to wait four, five or six weeks to secure an answer. That is not good enough.

I know that ministers have responsibilities which necessitate their absence from the house. It is wrong, however, for the government to invent additional, artificial reasons for ministerial absences. If committees of cabinet must meet during the question period I shall not object, nor would any other member, I am sure, on this side of the house. Yet I suspect that to justify or rationalize its proposals the government may schedule cabinet meetings to take place during the question period. Perhaps I am overly suspicious, but I confess that thought ran through my mind as the President of the Privy Council was expounding his views.

Ministers of the crown have behind them all the resources of government. There are ministers without portfolio and 16 parliamentary secretaries, and there is no reason for not giving immediate answers to questions that are asked in the house every day. Perhaps on a matter of great importance a parliamentary secretary or acting minister may say, if the minister is absent, "We shall take the question as notice and provide an answer later".

In dealing with their responsibilities ordinary members of parliament do not have at their disposal the resources of the government. We manage to be here. We are not worried so much about the questions that are to be asked during the question period; we are concerned about the answers. We are here to ask questions.

With great sincerity I urge the President of the Privy Council and the Prime Minister to review their decision which would arbitrarily impose this new arrangement on us. The matter ought to be referred to a committee and discussed in much the same way as some hon. members, in particular the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, have suggested other proposals ought to be discussed in committee. Then, hopefully, we may reach a plateau in our parliamentary procedure which will benefit us all. This must be done in a spirit of good will and co-operation.

No doubt the government, in trying to justify its position when it places before this house certain items of legislation or certain matters in connection with estimates, may feel that certain methods of procedure ought to be adopted. At that time the matter may be put to a vote. Nevertheless, I say to the President of the Privy Council and to the Prime Minister that in most of these areas, if there is a little give and take on both sides, we shall arrive at an arrangement that is reasonably acceptable to all members of the house.

I end by saying that the rules of the house belong to the members of the house. They are not for the benefit of the government or any political party. They belong to the private members of this house, to be of assistance in the discharging of the responsibilities which have been placed on the private members by the people of Canada. It is not good enough for the government to say: This is easier for us; therefore it must be so.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): When the hon. member speaks of private members of the house is he intimating that members of the privy council are not private members and therefore not competent to participate in the enactment of rules?

Mr. Baldwin: The President of the Privy Council is a private member of this house as well as a member of the cabinet. I am speaking primarily about private members, meaning by that most of those who make up the membership of this house. The President of the Privy Council came here as a private member. Since then he has been given additional responsibilities which he may not at present be too happy about.

Under the provisions of the Canada Elections Act the majority of the members of this house need not represent the majority of the people of this country, and the government must bear in mind that today the opposition parties represent in total a majority of the people of Canada. There are private members on the government side as well as on the opposition side and it is of great benefit to all if the views of those representing Canadians can be put forward in the house. Members of the government need not travel all over Canada in order to gain an idea of what the people of Canada are thinking on any topic. The representatives of the people will inform the government and in that regard the individual members form the best pipe line the government has to public opinion.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, although my experience is limited and although I do not pretend to be an expert on the subject, I have listened with interest to the debate. I think we need to bring some perspective to bear on the problem. The house leader for the official opposition has suggested that the rules of the house are the property of the members of the house, and I do not think anyone questions that. It is for the house as a whole to determine what the rules shall be and how they shall be changed. In the present instance no change is to be made in our rules. The Prime Minister made a substantial and useful offer, the reception of which has not been universally happy. One reason for that has been indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Drury: He said quite honestly that the particular period we are discussing, the question period, is devoted to political warfare. One cannot expect one side in any warfare to offer concessions gratuitously to the other side.

Mr. Baldwin: This is genocide, not warfare.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Drury: Well, if I am to be interrupted I would say the approach taken by the opposition would appear to be one of suicide rather than genocide.

The Prime Minister's offer was not couched in terms of the conduct of political warfare in the house. As has been indicated, there are a number of demands on the time and energy of the executive. One of those demands has been the customary, though unwritten one, that ministers attend in the house each day for a period varying from 30 minutes to an hour whether they are needed or not, whether anyone cares they are there or not. Though their presence may help the arithmetic of filled seats it is often the case that otherwise they carry out no useful function.

In order to make better use of the time of the executive, certain changes have been proposed by the Prime Minister. Under past practice, members of the opposition seeking information had to take their chance on the attendance of a minister. If he was absent they expected, and sometimes received, no answer at all; they were invited to wait until he returned, however long that might be. What the Prime Minister is proposing now is that on specific days of the week in relation to government departments, a definite number of departments should be answerable. Out of a total of five days, on three of those days, according to the choice of the opposition, the executive will organize itself in such a way as to produce answers to questions which are asked in relation to each department. This will be done either through the physical presence of the minister responsible for a department or through the adequate briefing of his parliamentary secretary or of an acting minister. Thus, on these three days, in respect of the departments designated, answers will be provided.

This has never been done before. This undertaking to answer, to give an accounting for stewardship at specific times, has never been offered before. Hitherto the opposition has had to depend on the physical presence of the minister concerned, governed by a number of external considerations, in order to secure information or answers. It was an adequate reply, in a minister's absence, to say he was away on public business. In the case of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for instance, he might be absent for as long as 11 or 12 days at the United Nations General Assembly. For the first time the government has offered, on three of the total of five days, to see that answers are provided either by the minister or by the acting minister or by the parliamentary secretary. This willingness of the government to account for its stewardship and inform the opposition is a distinct advance over past practice.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North—

Some hon. Members: Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Drury: To me, he is not a man of the centre; perhaps that is my problem. In any case, he has drawn attention to the crux of the intellectual conflict which is going on here, namely, that the question period is regarded by some as political warfare and that rules which tend to make that warfare more orderly lessen its fun and people do not like that.

While this proposal may detract from the fun of the warfare, it must be recognized by anybody who is honest about it as constituting a step forward inasmuch as it provides for the public and for members of the opposition a more certain and more orderly way of providing information or giving an account of stewardship. I must say I am surprised it has not been so accepted by the opposition. One is driven to the conclusion that the only reason they have for opposing it is that this move will project the image of a government which is serious-minded, purposeful and coherent in connection with the transaction of the business of parliament, rather than engaging in fun and political warfare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I must say I am somewhat surprised at the remarks which have just been made by the minister. He based his argument chiefly on the assumption that the system he proposes would provide more certain answers to hon. members' questions and lead to better order by guaranteeing replies to questions at specific times when ministers would be present in the house. I submit this is a complete illusion. It is exactly what has not happened. From this point of view the experiment has been a complete failure.

Yesterday, five of the ministers listed on the schedule, ministers who were supposed to be here, were not present. I wrote their names down at the time, intending to raise a question about it, but I did not get round to doing so owing to the direction which the question period took. At any rate, members of the opposition were obviously unable to address questions to those particular ministers.

Today for about half of the question period there were eight ministers present out of a total of some 28 in the cabinet. Later another minister came in, so there were nine. But throughout the entire question period fewer than a third of the members of the cabinet were present to answer questions. Questions to the Prime Minister in the absence of ministers responsible were answered in a flippant manner, words such as these: I hope the hon. member will be able to contain his curiosity until the minister is here on Tuesday next.

If this experiment was designed to make certain that members would know when they could expect to get answers from specific ministers, it is a complete failure. Ministers who were supposed to be here, according to the schedule, have failed to attend. And, of courses, others who were not on the schedule were also absent. So far this arrangement has served as a means by which ministers can evade to the greatest extent possible their responsibility to members of the House of Commons. This is a most serious matter.

According to our basic constitutional practice ministers are responsible to the House of Commons and are required to answer questions put by hon. members. In my view this experiment is an effort to place ministers in a situation in which they need no longer answer to members of the House of Commons—by absence for a good deal of the time or by the nature of the answer given on their behalf by whoever is supposed to be representing them, that questioners will just have to wait a few days for a reply. The whole trend is to erode the rights of parliament in this regard and weaken the principle that ministers are responsible to the House of Commons and are required to answer to members of that body. If this so-called experiment is continued we will have a very rapid erosion of one of the basic principles of our responsible, representative form of government. This is the most serious aspect of the matter.

The minister stated that members would be able to get answers at definite times. Can he give me any specific instances, during the two weeks that the new system has been in operation, where members have actually managed to get answers from the ministers concerned, at least in so far as the majority of the questions are concerned?

It used to be the case, and as a matter of fact this is the way the system should work, that if a minister was necessarily absent on government business, somebody else in the cabinet was acting minister and answered for him. During the upwards of six years that I was a member of the cabinet I was at different times the minister of two departments but I was also acting minister for one or two other ministers if they were away. At that time we considered it our responsibility as acting ministers to take notice, if we could not answer a question immediately, and bring in the answer the next day. The fact that ministers have to be away from time to time on government business is no reason in the world why they should not be in the house when they are in Ottawa, and when they are away an acting minister or parliamentary assistant should be able to take notice and answer a question next day. I can see nothing but a gradual decline in our whole constitutional situation and the effectiveness of this house if this experiment is continued.

Mr. Nowlan: Without being provocative, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks from the point of view of a member who is not on the front benches. I spoke on this matter the other day and I am not going to belabour the point. Having seen this experiment in operation for a week I can say it is a perfect example of theory which does not work when applied in practice.

To echo the words of the former minister of agriculture, if hon. gentlemen opposite had had the luxury of sitting in opposition and observing the practice of the question period from that point of view they would see how this theory does not work. The President of the Treasury Board supported the proposition that often theory does not work in practice, and I agree with him, not to mention the President of the Privy Council who said that the theory sounds logical, reasonable and businesslike. But the President of the Treasury Board says that this system represents an approach of a government that is serious and sensible and that this will be reflected across the nation.

If I were sitting on the treasury benches and had this rotation system imposed upon my movements, with the Prime Minister answering general questions and questions of policy, it would be an indication of how the Prime Minister regarded my competence in answering questions in the house. As we have seen during the past week it is the Prime Minister who is overexposed to handling questions from the opposition and he has to turn many of them aside for the responsible minister to return.

Because of the pressures of work there is a natural rotation of cabinet ministers. We all admit that no cabinet minister worth his salt, and even no private member, can sit in the house day in and day out. We and the cabinet ministers have other business to attend to outside the chamber. But to have an arbitrary rotation system imposed upon the natural rotation system is unnecessary, and the explanation given by the President of the Treasury Board of the arbitrary system proves the case for the opposition.

Only this morning the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Richardson) were not in their places to answer questions even though they were supposed to be here under the Prime Minister's rotation system. In fact, as already mentioned, there were only eight ministers present.

Under the Prime Minister's system, if a minister appears in the house three times a week he will spend a maximum of two hours and ten minutes in the house, 60 minutes one day, 30 minutes another day and 40 minutes on the third day. If he is on the short side of the rotation system and does not have to be present during the weekly one hour question period, he will spend only one hour and 50 minutes in the house. I admit that with motions and other measures ministers will spend longer in the house than that, but their attendance will vary from a maximum of two hours and ten minutes a week to one hour and 50 minutes a week during the question period. The Canadian people expect a little more seat time than that from our cabinet ministers.

The Prime Minister said that his system was logical and reasonable. Under the new system we have to give notice of a question. If it concerns a related department it will have to be repeated next day. There is also the functional problem of inter-related questions where, depending on the answer from the original minister, a supplementary question may be required to be directed to the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance.

According to the Prime Minister's new system, which is a complete change from traditional practice, departments will receive questions. He says that if the opposition organizes its questions someone responsible in a department will take them as notice. I repeat that this morning four ministers who were supposed to be here to answer questions were not present, and several times the Prime Minister asked hon. members to defer their questions to another day.

Reference has already been made to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Under the new system the Minister of Transport will be lost to the house at six o'clock on Wednesday and will not have to appear again until the following Monday. We know that that minister is engaged in housing discussions and talks and this week has appeared in the house only once. Therefore the Prime Minister's theory, which seems so logical as a theory, breaks down in practice.

From our experience of the past week we have seen that departments do not give answers to questions. Just to direct a question to a department, with only an acting minister or parliamentary secretary in charge of it, is as effective in getting an answer as the job a eunuch does in a house of ill repute.

There are two principles involved in this matter, one a small one and the other affecting the parliamentary system. We have already spent one or two hours today discussing this matter on the estimates of the Privy Council. If matters proceed as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested and the whole procedure is reviewed and reformed, there might not be the reaction and negative criticism of this system that we have experienced to date. The small principle involved is that the house gave unanimous consent to setting up a procedure committee to review all the rules, and the next day this rotation system for ministers was introduced arbitrarily. That did not help breed the confidence and respect that the cabinet must have.

This brings me to the larger principle so far as efficiency is concerned. To use the logic of the President of the Privy Council, if it is a question of numbers that is involved, often we might need only the Prime Minister in the house. If we extend the logic of the President of the Privy Council to its ultimate conclusion, there will be days in this house when one, two or perhaps at the most three ministers will be involved in the actual cross-fire and when the Prime Minister, as the person ultimately responsible for the government, will be the one accountable from this point of view.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

There is another point which I direct to the President of the Privy Council. Again it flows from some of the discussion which has taken place today. As a member of the house and as one who has practised before the bar he is aware that there are all sorts of rules. We have heard of the work to rule provision. I suggest that notwithstanding the rules of law there must be, for the effective prosecution of justice, some confidence built up between the protagonists. Justice prevails in the courtroom because both counsel have a mutual respect for each other which they have developed through their trial experience. In like fashion somewhat the same principle must guide us in this chamber.

There is no doubt that the government has sufficient numbers to steamroller the opposition. One member mentioned ridicule. Sometimes it is necessary for the opposition to revert to this type of thing in order to defend itself. I believe, however, that in order to pursue some of the objects the President of the Privy Council has in mind there must be some mutual respect and confidence between members on both sides of the house so that they will be able to develop the pros and cons of the problems and experiments without becoming lost all the time in political warfare. I am not suggesting that the question period is not the time for political capital or political deficit, depending on how the answers come forward. But after we have had this trial for a period of a week, have seen the question period really start to degenerate and have heard what the minister said this morning, I believe, having in mind the desire of the rules committee to look at all these rules, we should build up the respect and confidence between members when we experiment from time to time rather than say arbitrarily that we will proceed in a certain way because this is what has been decreed.

I believe we can say that this system has not worked. In this new parliament with 97 new members I believe some respect and confidence must be built up with regard to members across the way because our whole purpose in many instances is identical. There cannot be that respect when an arbitrary and unilateral move is made in an area where it ought not to be made, that is, in the reform of the rules of this house.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I have been listening very carefully but I am at a loss to explain in a convincing way, at least to myself, why there is all this fuss about this new measure, the roster of attendance for ministers. I have listened particularly to the observations of the opposition house leader. I listened to him very carefully as I have done in the past because he is an hon. gentleman for whom I have a good deal of respect. It struck me that he asked for the cooperation of the government. He suggested there might be ways and means by which to find a reasonable arrangement. I believe that is exactly what the Prime Minister asked in proposing this measure to the house. He asked for the co-operation of the opposition during a trial period of a few weeks or a few months, whatever the period is.

I should like to remind my friends on the other side that co-operation should work both ways. I do not believe that the opposition has co-operated in the last two weeks. They have been systematically shooting down absent ministers. They know the reason the Minister of Transport, for instance, is not here. They know because they read the newspapers. They have been shooting at the Minister of Transport more often than he would ordinarily have been shot at. I suggest that the members of the opposition should look both ways. Even if it should be true that the members of the opposition might have been more fully consulted, I should like to remind them of the saying of a United States president that to the victor belong the spoils.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: You are the master and will do what you wish because you have the votes.

Mr. Mongrain: I know it hurts. I know how much it hurts because I have lost a few elections myself.

Mr. Nowlan: Would you have been a victor this time as an independent?

Mr. Mongrain: Although I do not wish to be repetitious, I should like to remind members of the opposition that to the victor should at least belong some kind of leeway in administering this country because it is its responsibility. It is very easy for the opposition to criticize the government because the opposition does not have the responsibility to administer this country under present circumstances. The government, therefore, must be granted some kind of leeway somewhere. I think this is reasonable.

I have done some research. I have gone through Hansard over a period of several years, especially during the period when a Conservative government was in power. I thought I would find there a demonstration that their ministers in those days gave very precise answers on all occasions and that their attendance was near perfection. Well, I must say my observation is that the ministers in those days most of the time gave vague answers to the questions. Not only did they frequently not answer the questions, they frequently said that they wished to study the question before attempting to answer it. I might add that my research indicates that these ministers also were absent.

I believe that if the opposition had co-operated during the last two weeks we would have experienced a lot less difficulty. Even if I were to adopt the point of view of the members of the opposition that they should have been consulted further, it is a fact that this measure is now in effect. Therefore I believe it is only reasonable that the opposition should co-operate in respect of this measure and, if it does not work properly, we on this side of the house will be the first to find another reasonable arrangement. The opposition during the past two weeks has not co-operated and now is asking for co-operation. I suggest that this should work both ways and not only on one side of the house.

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask a question?

Mr. Mongrain: If I can answer it I will be very happy to do so.

Mr. Baldwin: Is the hon. member saying in effect that we should relax and enjoy it?

Mr. Mongrain: I should like my hon. colleague to tell me what it is he would be enjoying. I hope it is not my speech. I understand that it is the duty of an opposition to oppose. I know this. We cannot blame the opposition for criticizing the government. The members of the opposition are paid to do that; that is their duty. We understand that up to a certain point.

• (3:20 p.m.)

We need action and we need co-operation today. I was not the first one to talk about co-operation. The opposition house leader spoke about co-operation. Co-operation must work both ways. If we can count on co-operation from the opposition I am sure things will work out better. If things do not work out better then I would suggest we should make a change or find another reasonable arrangement and solve the problem in this way.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member a question. How can we in the opposition oppose someone who is not here?

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I will have to ask the hon. member to repeat his question.

Mr. Gleave: How can we do our duty as opposition members in opposing the wishes of the government when members of the cabinet to whom we wish to direct questions are not here? How can anyone oppose someone who is not present?

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I do not think my hon. friend is being serious. Members of the opposition have many opportunities to oppose the government by voting and making interjections. Those ministers who are not here at the time of questions will be here at some time. I do not think there are very many questions of such urgency they must be answered the same day.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, I would also like to express my views which could boil down to a few points.

First of all, it seems that this decision by the government lessens the importance of the representatives of the people. One would think that because the government has been elected by the majority, it is leaning on the power of numbers to lessen the importance of the opposition. One gets the impression, especially after listening to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain), that the party is arrogant enough to think that it can do anything because it is in office. That is what the hon. member for Trois-Rivières has just made clear to us.

It seems to me that the importance of being a representative of the people in the house should not be undermined to that point. If the cabinet does not feel strong enough to answer the opposition adequately, the consequences should not be borne by the representatives of the people. That is my impression; and how can it be explained that ministers are not there, as responsible ministers, for a few minutes every day, to answer questions. Is that not a clear indication that the representatives of the people have no importance and that it matters more to give precedence to something else over them? That is my impression.

It is for this reason that such arrogance displayed by the government, by its decision which deprives us of the possibility to question the ministers as we would like, is unthinkable. Why, Mr. Chairman, should these questions be postponed, as suggested by the government? It is very difficult to get an answer to an urgent or spontaneous question when the minister who would be able to give us the information we seek is not in the house. That is why it is absolutely necessary for the designated ministers to be present in the house. Everybody, even those who have an urgent question to ask, will understand that it is quite natural that the representatives of the people be the first to put their questions to the ministers concerned. I think people will not only understand that, but they will agree to put off a meeting till later, in order to allow a minister to defend his department in the house. I do not see why a matter of a few minutes or at most a few hours should inconvenience a minister so much.

Then, we get the impression that the government wants to reduce the importance of the whole house, especially of the opposition, by shortening the question period, or by boycotting it purely and simply.

Once more, I come back to the fact that the hon. member for Trois-Rivières has unquestionably demonstrated, by his own arrogance, that this is indeed the attitude of the cabinet, which has almost decided to boycot us.

Mr. Mongrain: Would my hon. friend allow a question?

Mr. Matte: Certainly.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend talked of regular attendance in the house and I am going to ask him a very polite question. Has he ever counted how many times the leader of his party has been absent from the house? He too was elected in order to sit in the house.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The member for Trois-Rivières has just pointed out that the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette) is absent. I must tell him—he probably does not know and cannot be blamed—that the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, the member for Témiscamingue, is not here because he is now in his riding due to the passing away of his father-in-law.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, it is customary in the house to express our condolences when someone passes away. I therefore take this opportunity to extend my condolences.

However, my hon. friend has not answered my question; he has not dealt with the topic under discussion. I put a simple question to the member for Champlain. I did not ask why the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste was away today. I said that of all the members he is probably the least regular at the house since the beginning of the session.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières should know that on those days where the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste was away from the house he was, as a Canadian delegate, attending a meeting of French-speaking parliamentarians in Paris. The leader was away only on those days, except for the absence the member for Abitibi has just mentioned. I feel that the responsibilities are even greater in the case of ministers. Obviously, making comparisons of the type the member for Trois-Rivières has just made is just too easy a way of trying to settle a question of principle. And it is not because the honourable member for Trois-Rivières has managed to find a good place for himself, that he should attempt, with his arrogance—and I say it again—to influence us.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

My honourable colleague for Champlain said that the honourable member for Trois-Rivières has found a good place for himself; that expression is already disparaging. He also adds that the honourable member for Trois-Rivières shows arrogance which is also disparaging. I should like to point out to him that he has not been in this house very long and we just realized it, after hearing his last remarks.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. There is no question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, you do not know whether or not I am rising on a question of privilege. You did not give me time to finish—

[English]

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the arguments which have been advanced during the past few hours with respect to the rights, privileges and freedoms of members of this House of Commons. I speak as one who has had considerable experience as a member of an opposition.

An hon. Member: Hurrah.

Mr. Perrault: I appreciate the importance of the opposition. A government is only as good as the quality of the opposition. I should not like to see any rights taken away from the opposition in this house or diminished in any way. However, I should like to suggest—

Mr. Danforth: Now comes the brick.

Mr. Perrault: —that the attempts to establish a case in the past few hours by the members of the opposition are based on a vastly overstated position regarding what we are discussing in this house.

We have heard some strong language. The word "arrogant" has been used. We have heard hon. members talk about the government "muzzling" their right to speak. We have heard members suggest that there are restrictions on their freedom contemplated by this proposal of the government to make ministers of the crown available for questioning on three days each week.

• (3:30 p.m.)

It has been suggested to this House of Commons that in some fashion democracy in Canada is being subverted. Let me tell you this, that after being a guest in many legislative assemblies across this country, after serving in my own legislature for nine years and after visiting the House of Commons of Great Britain, one of the most profound impressions I have received thus far is that the degree of democracy which exists in the House of Commons of Canada is as high as, if not higher than anywere in the commonwealth. I suggest to the opposition that they will be unable to cite any other assembly in the commonwealth where the opposition is granted more rights and freedom than right here in our house. In the light of what is very much a fact, it seems to me the language being employed in this house by the opposition is patently political and the motivations are political. If we compare our rules of procedure with those which exist in other parliamentary forums, we find that as much democracy exists in Canada in this house, as in any forum in the world one could mention.

We have an oral question period. In many parliamentary systems they do not have an oral question period. I think this institution is a great advantage. But it seems to me that the oral question period also imposes on the opposition a responsibility to be reasonable. Many questions are good, but, at times I have listened aghast to some of the questions from opposition members. On these occasions, it is my view that parliamentary traditions and principles are subverted by the facetious nature of some of the questions directed at government by the opposition. In addition to the oral question period, members have the opportunity to place questions on the order paper.

There is no suggestion—and it would be ludicrous to suggest otherwise—that somehow it is impossible to ask questions of ministers. Really, Mr. Chairman, it is ridiculous to make that suggestion. Not only are oral questions permitted five days a week, but a wide range of questions can be placed on the order paper. There are also opportunities to ask questions during the consideration of estimates and on many other occasions. It is to be noted with interest that no disapproval has been expressed by the opposition in this house to the proposal advanced by the government to provide special research assistance so that the opposition can do a better job this session. Apparently that proposal is acceptable; yet none of us has heard one word from the official opposition commending the government for its unprecedented action of extending this special assistance to the opposition.

I do not want to belabour the point, but surely government today is so complex that it is not unreasonable to suggest that ministers are not able to spend every day of the week for a certain period of time waiting to be questioned—yes, and waiting to be pilloried at times for on occasion the question period becomes little more than a political baiting carnival. If we are honest, we will admit this fact.

I believe that the role of the opposition today—and I speak as someone who has served some years in opposition—is not the outmoded concept of opposition, namely to oppose and oppose and oppose, but it is to oppose responsibly; and this includes using the question period to the best effect. It is my impression as a newcomer to this house that if questions were properly developed in caucus before opposition parties came into the chamber, the necessary questions could be asked intelligently and reasonably, and reasonable answers could be given. But if we refer to Hansard and read some of the questions which have been asked since the opening of the session, I do not think any hon. member of the house can take pride in the quality and motivation of many of them.

I simply reiterate what was said by my colleague, that surely this is a time when we should give the government's new proposal a fair test period. Let us see how it works. I assure members of the opposition that members on the government side of the house are just as concerned about the necessity for a strong opposition as are they. If this system does restrict freedom, I can tell you that I for one will seek to have the system changed, but it should be given a fair test. It seems to me we have belaboured this point long enough and that now we should set to the task of working constructively for the people of this country.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak only briefly on the estimates of the Privy Council. A survey of the expenditures is very revealing. We see a saving of $300 in the maintenance of the Prime Minister's residence, half a million dollars on general administration, half a million dollars on royal commissions, and $2⅓ million will not be required this year for visits of state, as in 1967. Obviously there are other savings that could be made, and if the members of the cabinet, or supporters of the government, will but take the time to keep in touch with the grass roots, the average working man, I am sure they will learn that his chief concern and the concern of Canadians generally is the rising cost of government and its wasteful extravagance.

We in the opposition have expressed our concern in this regard. We are concerned about the principle implied in the roster of ministerial attendance supplied to us by the Prime Minister. Here we are, with the largest cabinet in this country's history, the biggest crew, if you will, on board our ship of state that we have ever had, but now we find that the main reason for increasing the cabinet seems to be used as an excuse for more ministers being absent from the house when we wish to put urgent questions to them.

In my opinion it is the responsibility of the cabinet to be in this house to answer urgent questions when they arise. It should not be necessary for us in the opposition to have our questions juggled back and forth, like a yo-yo, while we wait for replies from the proper minister. In sailors' terms, we in the opposition today are bucking a headwind. We have urgent questions to ask, and we must tack back and forth over the whole spectrum of the cabinet while we wait for replies.

When I have an urgent question to put to the cabinet, it may not of necessity be an urgent question to me; but each of us, due to the redistribution act, represents approximately 75,000 people in this house. We are all equal, therefore, although I must admit that, if one may use a well-known expression, some are more equal than others. When I pose a question to a minister, it is posed in the question period because we can ask questions at that time only if they are of an urgent nature. Of course, if we must wait for two, three or more days for a reply, this destroys the very purpose for which the question period was established.

The estimates we have before us also make us aware of the fact that in government, as with a ship at sea, there is a tendency for barnacles to become attached to the hull, and nothing short of a complete refit will remove them. For example, we still have listed the expenses of the royal commission on pilotage, the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism, the royal commission on farm machinery, the commission on security procedures and the commission on the status of women. I want it clearly understood that I am not anti-French Canadian, but I point out that the bilingualism and biculturalism commission has already spent over $7 million of the taxpayers' money.

I believe that Canadians generally would welcome the termination of this most expensive royal commission in our history as an economy measure. I would be the first to state that the commission has been helpful. It has pointed out to us the necessity of giving certain recognition to those in our country who are of French ancestry. But we are facing serious economic problems at the present time and there is a need for a reassessment of some of these commissions.

The same thinking would readily apply to other commissions that are now sitting. For example, over half a million dollars are being set aside for the royal commission on the status of women. I criticized this expenditure during the recent election campaign, and I still believe the government could and should terminate this commission's sittings immediately. Canadian women today are well aware of their rights, their status and the place of importance they occupy in our society. They have the right to own property and to vote, they can run for the town council and the provincial legislature, and we have one lady member in the House of Commons. I believe there is more concern today over the rising cost of everything in our society, and it is the cost of these royal commissions as listed in the privy council estimates which is constantly increasing some of our costs and making it extremely difficult for women in all classes of society to make ends meet.

With these brief comments I will take my seat, but I do hope the government will give some thought to the matters I raised.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to cut off the discussion of ministerial absenteeism in the question period. Others who wish to continue may do so, but just as a little interlude I thought I might ask a question or two about the item that is before us. I am afraid that if I do so I will disprove a point I often make. I have often contended that we do not deal with the estimates here on the floor of the house, that we use the estimates as pegs for debates.

Mr. Drury: Do not disturb the practice.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There speaks a conservative. This is one of the reasons I have argued for a greater use of the committees. I think that that is where estimates should be gone over with a fine tooth comb. But just as an interlude, let me get out my fine tooth comb and ask a question or two about this item. It is item No. 1, maintenance and operation of the Prime Minister's residence. We are being asked to vote $40,300. According to the blue book in front of us, that is $300 less than we were asked to vote for the previous fiscal year.

The book that is before us now is called the revised estimates. Before that we had the unrevised estimates, and in it the figure was $41,100, so that it looks as though there is a cut of $800 in the expenses of running the Prime Minister's residence. This so called cut received very wide publicity, not only in the papers but in that program which perhaps is the best source of news, namely Max Ferguson's show in the morning. I think we all recall the interesting reception of businessmen which was held at 24 Sussex Drive one night just after this cut was announced, and of how the cleaning women were there at night because they were put on reduced wages and had to get employment elsewhere during the day, while at night they were cleaning the Prime Minister's residence. We also recall when the Prime Minister telephoned for taxis to get the businessmen away, because if they stayed much longer he would have to feed them. So a great deal of attention was given to the tremendous stroke of the Prime Minister in reducing by $800 the amount that was going to be spent on the maintenance of his residence.

But if we turn from page 380 to page 382 we will discover that according to this book—and I can only assume it is correct—the amount expended in 1967-68, although it is marked as estimated, was only $37,780. So when we are being asked to vote $40,300, if I can add and subtract, it looks to me as though instead of spending less on the Prime Minister's residence we are voting $2,520 more than was spent on the operation and maintenance of the Prime Minister's residence in the previous fiscal year. On the theory that this is the committee of supply in which we examine estimates in detail, could someone explain this to us and in particular tell us what one is to think about this business of giving the nation the notion that a saving of $800 is being made when in point of fact we are being asked to vote $2,520 more than was spent in the previous year?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that anybody made representations that savings were being made. Perhaps these were the conclusions drawn by those who did not analyse the figures put forward as thoroughly as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If he looks at the detail on page 382 to which he has referred he will see that the principal item in the cost of running this establishment is salaries and wages; and I think he will be aware, as most of us are, that during the course of the current year we have been engaged in extensive collective bargaining, the result of which has been generally an increase in the total emoluments paid by the government and received by its employees. One would expect that running the same establishment with the same staff and providing the same degree of facilities would cost more in the current fiscal year than it did in the previous one. As the figure shows, this in fact is borne out.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think it is now time for me to return to the minister the compliment he paid me a while ago. He told me I was describing the question period honestly. In return I congratulate him on his honesty. He is now making it clear that despite all the publicity about cutting down the cost of running the Prime Minister's residence we are actually going to spend more in this year than we did in the last.

Mr. Drury: That is correct. The hon. member knows that we do not control Mr. Ferguson in his programs.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps Mr. Ferguson will note this increase and give us another show on it next week.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks today, and hope they will not be taken as a sign of criticism, or as a complaint. I really want to raise a question about which members of parliament and the public should be concerned. There have been frequent reports from the press in recent months about the very sharp increase in the staff in the Prime Minister's office. I do not have the press clippings here with me today and I do not think it is important that I should read them, but in fact there has been virtually a doubling in the number of people working in the Prime Minister's office. I am not necessarily objecting to this.

When I think of recent Canadian elections in which attention has been focussed on the leaders of the various political parties, when I think of the results of the 1958 and 1968 elections, it seems to me obvious that the Canadian people—and I am not being critical—are paying a good deal more attention to the leadership of the political parties, and are increasingly voting for the candidate to the Prime Minister's office. They cannot do it as directly as do the people of the United States, when they vote for one candidate for president. The people in Canada vote in their constituency for the candidate of the party whose leader they want to be prime minister. I can remember that in the 1958 election in my constituency people came into the polls and wanted to vote for Mr. Diefenbaker. They were surprised when nobody would tell them who Mr. Diefenbaker's candidate was. This was the only time in the last 50 years in which a Conservative was elected in that constituency. As I say, I am not objecting to this. The people of Canada have a right to make this choice if they wish. However, it does seem to me that if we are going to do what, in effect, I think we are doing, that is moving toward a presidential system, then some changes would seem to be necessary in relation to the form of government we have had in this country for many years.

It seems to me that to the extent the Prime Minister's office becomes more important, to the extent the Prime Minister has a larger staff of experts and technicians dealing with general policy matters which traditionally have been dealt with by government departments, the importance of the cabinet is reduced. The Prime Minister's office takes on more and more authority and more power. I cannot vouch for the stories current in Ottawa that one gets from the newspaper people, and all sorts of other people. These stories are to the effect that the situation has reached the point where, if a cabinet minister wants to speak to the Prime Minister, he has to go through somebody in the Prime Minister's office.

Mr. Drury: Nonsense.

Mr. Orlikow: The President of the Treasury Board says it is nonsense. However I am told by what in the past have been reliable sources that this is so. It seems to me if we are moving in this direction, and at the moment I am not saying it is bad to move in this direction, then the members of the committee and the general public are entitled at some point to a statement from the Prime Minister outlining precisely what the reorganization on the Prime Minister's office has been. What has been the increase in the staff? How many people are there and what responsibilities do they have? In what way, if any, has this affected the responsibility of individual cabinet ministers to deal with the subjects that come under their departments?

This raises other questions for some of us, Mr. Chairman. For example, yesterday some hon. members were asking about an important problem, namely the facilities for drying damp, tough wheat. Does one go to the Minister of Agriculture with this problem, or would he go to one of the regional desks which the press have told us have been established in the Prime Minister's office? I do not know, and I doubt if any other hon. member in this house knows what the answer is. However, it does seem to me that at some point, and I am not saying it should be today because I did not give notice that I intended to raise this question, we ought to have an explanation from the government as to just how they see the changes in government structure they are making.

I want to make it clear before I sit down that I am not objecting to change. I am one of those who believe that life in the 60's and 70's will be a great deal more complicated than it was in the 30's and 40's. The government will have to play a much more important role in the life of the country than it has in the past. I believe we are going to have to have a great deal of change in government organization, but it seems to me we ought to have an explanation of the kind of changes which have been made.

Mr. Marshall: If I may, I should like to revert to the question of absentee ministers for a moment, because this is the first opportunity I have had to mention the subject. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières talked about co-operation. The best way I can deal with my point is to say that I am not interested in political warfare but rather more interested in the political intrigue that goes on in this house. I was not a member of the legislative assembly for nine years, nor was I in this house before September 12. I asked a very urgent question on behalf of my constituents.

I asked it by telephone on August 19, and came up to Ottawa on a special trip to get an answer. I went to the ministry of forestry and rural development; I went to every staff member, every assistant and every private secretary. I put the question on the order paper on September 16. I have been calling that particular department every day since then and I still do not have the answer, although it has been promised daily. They can talk about co-operation, but I did not even ask the question in the house. I went through the proper channels and co-operated.

The members on the other side seem to like sincerity, Mr. Chairman. All I am going to point out is that I have co-operated in every way possible but I cannot get an answer to a normal question that concerns my riding. I feel definitely there is a lack of sincerity on the part of the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask where in the estimates is the money for the Prime Minister's staff?

Mr. Drury: I think the answer to that is vote 10, the details of which are given on page 383.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Specifically, that seems to be for the staff of the privy council office, of which the President of the Privy Council is minister. I understand the operations of the privy council. There is a distinguished civil servant who is Clerk of the Privy Council, and it handles all orders, regulations and so on. What about the people who are attached to the Prime Minister's office who hold down these various desks and who are part of the personal staff of the Prime Minister? I am referring to the staff that works for the Prime Minister; are they included in this vote with the people who work in the privy council office?

Mr. Drury: I am told that they are included in this vote. This means that within this vote there will be a number of people, some of whom are appointed through the civil service mechanism, mostly in the privy council office, and some limited number of whom are appointed by order in council to the staff of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is there no way of looking at these estimates and getting an exact picture of the Prime Minister's staff as such? No matter how long I ask questions, I would not get an answer today, would I?

Mr. Drury: I am afraid not. This has been a source of regret to a number of us. I do acknowledge that this method we have employed in the past of putting total expenditures, I will not say "is designed to conceal", but it has this effect. I hope to be able to present to the public accounts committee a different and more effective system of setting forth the estimates so that one can distinguish main purposes, objectives and programs rather than have this global explication which does not explain too much.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the contention of some of us that all this could better be done in a standing committee.

Mr. Drury: My being here this afternoon is not my idea; I am here at the request of the house. The house chose to consider these estimates in committee of the whole rather than in a standing committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When the President of the Treasury Board is putting through the estimates of the privy council, may I ask whom he is representing?

Mr. Drury: I represent the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I pass. It is hopeless.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is a wise move.

Mr. Orlikow: When I spoke earlier, Mr. Chairman, I was not being critical of the government. I am looking for information and have no desire to prolong discussion on these estimates. Could the President of the Privy Council or the assistant to the Prime Minister tell the committee—and I do not insist on great detail—how large is the staff in the Prime Minister's office this year as compared with last year, and whether any changes have taken place. Are newspaper reports correct when they say that staff has doubled? Also what are the responsibilities of that staff?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the hon. member asked this question, since it was answered fully in the press release of July 31, 1968, which dealt with the reorganization of the Prime Minister's office and named those who are filling particular categories.

To answer an earlier question I cannot, as the President of the Treasury Board said, pin down to specific figures salaries paid in the Prime Minister's office. Job classifications in the office are described in the press release, which I commend to the hon. member.

Mr. Orlikow: Surely we have not come to the point where the government does its business through press releases, although I do not object to press releases. I asked a legitimate question and I should like to have an answer which can be printed in Hansard, and thus form part of the official record. By that I am not asking the assistant to the Prime Minister to read into the record a lengthy press release. Could we not have an answer which could be printed in Hansard? For instance, are there 30 people in the Prime Minister's office now, as compared with 15 formerly. What are their responsibilities and so on? It should not take the assistant to the Prime Minister long to answer such questions.

Mr. Nowlan: It might help the President of the Treasury Board and the parliamentary assistant if this matter were approached from a different standpoint. In considering the office of the privy council, as distinct from the office of the Prime Minister, I should like to know whether there have been increases in staff positions in the former office. The vote before us indicates that, as between one year and another, there has been an increase in man years, but that is incidental to my question. What has been the staff increase in the privy council office? The answer to that question will determine whether I shall ask another one. In other words, under vote 10, what increase is to be ascribed to the office of the privy council and not to the office of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Those really ought to be separated.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat difficult to separate those categories. Those who are aware of the physical workings of the operation will know that both operations are housed in the same building, and there is some degree of intimacy in the work and objectives of both staffs. While in general the function of the privy council office is to serve as a secretariat for the cabinet and for the Governor General in Council, it is obvious that a number of functions carried out under this head will serve the secretarial needs of the Prime Minister in his capacity as representing Canada at federal-provincial conferences. To try to separate the two functions in a clear-cut way is difficult. Frankly I am not sure of what the hon. gentleman is getting at; it is difficult to know. I regret that in their present form our estimates do not show the cost, in terms of total resources and dollars and cents, of performing a specific function, because the functions are lumped together. There are distinctions between different grades of personnel, but none is made with respect to total resources required for a particular function.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) who spoke earlier about the Royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. There was no need for him to apologize about his anti-French-Canadian feelings since I am in full agreement with him.

That completely useless item should be removed from the estimates and here is why: Everyone is perfectly aware of the situation in Canada and no inquiry is needed to bring it to light. In addition, there are organizations which will be happy to give us information free of charge and to divulge the facts without our having to spend millions of dollars to do it. For years the French-Canadian minorities of the nine other Canadian provinces have compiled numerous documents about the bilingualism and biculturalism of minorities throughout Canada.

As far as Quebec is concerned, we have been aware of the situation for a long time and the Sociétés Saint-Jean-Baptise have been fighting for years for the French fact. It would have been possible, and it still is, to secure all information from them, and better still, free of charge. Moreover, the Estates General of French Canada, thanks to their working groups, could also provide all necessary information.

Hence, this royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism constitutes an unnecessary expenditure and I would like to know the exact amount of salaries paid to the co-chairman of the commission, Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Annapolis Valley wish to speak while the parliamentary secretary is getting this figure?

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to direct two questions either to the President of the Treasury Board or to the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister or to the President of the Privy Council.

An hon. Member: He is right there.

Mr. Nowlan: The President of the Privy Council is right over here. What is the complement of the Prime Minister's office today as compared with a year ago? I should like to ask the same question with respect to the privy council office. I am not worried now about the dollars and cents; I simply wish to know the number of bodies employed as compared with a year ago. We are dealing with the privy council and I do not think it is asking too much to expect the President of the Privy Council, who is present in this chamber, to answer these simple questions.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member has asked me about the complement of the privy council staff. May I say that, except with respect to the parliamentary returns branch which has been transferred from the Department of the Secretary of State, I do not have direct responsibility for any aspect of the privy council office. This falls within the responsibility of the Prime Minister who is represented here today through his parliamentary secretary. The President of the Treasury Board is also present to give details in connection with his responsibilities.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the President of the Privy Council not agree that this is a perfect expression of the difficulties encountered during the question period in determining who has jurisdiction? I asked the hon. gentleman for an answer, but I did not get one. This illustrates the value of having as many ministers as possible present in the chamber during the question period. But since the amiable and genial parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear.

Mr. Nowlan: —is sitting just across the way, may I ask him whether it is possible to get an answer to those two simple questions I raised, or whether it is impossible?

Mr. Walker: No, it is not impossible; but it is not possible right at this moment. It is impossible for me to separate all the positions listed on page 383 under general administration, and say that so many are included primarily in their capacity as part of the Prime Minister's staff, and that so many others are employed in the privy council office. As the President of the Treasury Board said earlier, some of these people are working in both the capacities I have mentioned. I am pleased to give this answer to the genial hon. member for Annapolis Valley and trust he will be amiable enough to allow us time in which to get the information he wants, letting these estimates go through in the meantime. I will undertake to see that the type of breakdown that he wants is produced.

Mr. Nowlan: That proves how able and amiable the parliamentary secretary is, because his suggestion is quite agreeable to me. Whether it is acceptable to the hon. member for Winnipeg North is another matter.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not want to prolong this discussion unduly. I have looked at the press release which the parliamentary secretary sent over to me, which lists 17 or 18 positions. I guess that about 20 people work in the Prime Minister's office. I should like to be given a statement by someone representing the Prime Minister—a statement, not a press release—telling us first of all how many people work in the right hon. gentleman's office. I differentiate between these people—and I am not saying this in a critical sense—and the staff of the privy council who are, I presume, civil servants and stay on regardless of who is prime minister. I should like to know how many were on the staff of the Prime Minister in 1967, and how this number compares with the number on the staff in 1968. I should like to know who these people are, I should like to be informed as to their background and qualifications, and further—and this is of particular importance to me—what their responsibilities are. I do not insist that this be done today, on a Friday afternoon. But at some point we shall be bound to face up to the changes which are taking place in government, and to the implications of the much more important role which the Prime Minister's office is playing now as compared with the days when Mr. King worked with one or two secretaries.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to go into too many details; however, I wish to direct some questions to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), concerning—

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Chairman, please forgive me but I suspect the member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) has not finished his remarks. He is merely waiting for the reply of the parliamentary secretary.

With your permission, I should like to put a question to him.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): I should like to remind the honourable member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) that it is up to the President of the Treasury Board to decide whether or not he will reply to the question; in the meantime, I believe the debate should continue, and we can come back to the question when the President of the Treasury Board is ready to give his reply. That is why I recognized the member for Shefford.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, the President of the Treasury Board will probably not be able to answer all the questions which I want to ask him but he might be able to inquire.

With regard to vote No. 1, under the heading "Continuing establishment", we see that seven employees look after the maintenance and operation of the right honourable Prime Minister's residence. Could the President of the Treasury Board tell us, later if he cannot tell us now, and I am not asking that information for censorship purposes, what exactly are the duties of each of those seven employees? On vote No. 5, we see that in 1967-68, an amount of $15,000 was appropriated for the salaries of Ministers without Portfolio, while in 1968-69, the same vote amounts to $27,000, that is an increase of $12,000. I should like to get some explanation regarding that $12,000 increase.

I should like also to get some information regarding the following item:

Allowance to former Prime Minister, $16,667.

Could the minister also give an answer to that question?

I could perhaps put immediately a question with regard to vote No. 10.

Salaries and wages—

where we see a tidy sum of—

$1,842,500.

and

Professional and special services, $982,300.

For the time being, I shall be satisfied to ask this kind of questions only and to get some answers.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Chairman, may I now put my question?

Mr. Matte: Yes.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Champlain was inquiring about Mr. Gagnon's salary. It is not on the basis of a salary. It is on the basis of a per diem, which is the same as all the other commissioners and, depending on the number of days, this makes up the total amount of salary. The commissioners on that commission are paid $100 a day.

Mr. Orlikow: And they have worked longer than any other commission.

[Translation]

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): According to the member for Champlain, the commission on bilinguism and biculturalism would be completely useless. I would like to ask him if he believes that the bill on official languages which will soon be brought forward in this house and which will give full rights to all Canadians is also useless. This is not what could be implied from his speech.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, when the bill mentioned by the hon. member is passed, I will have some comments to make. It is perhaps too soon to make up one's mind, but I would add this: just because an area is called bilingual we should not thinks that it becomes so.

For example, in my area, that of Saint-Casimir, in the constituency of Champlain—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I thought that the member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) had completed his reply. He did well, a while ago, in saying that the matter could be discussed some other time. However, it is not his responsibility to answer questions such as the one the member for Cochrane has just put, for we are not discussing a particular item, and the responsible minister is the President of the Treasury Board.

Item agreed to.

Supply—Privy Council

The following items were agreed to:

Privy Council Office—

Ministers without Portfolio—

5. Payment, notwithstanding anything in the Financial Administration Act or the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of Parliament, to each member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada who is a Minister for whom no salary or allowance in addition to the allowances under section 33 and section 44 of the Senate and House of Commons Act is provided (the acceptance of which shall not render such member ineligible or disqualify him as a Member of the House of Commons) of a salary of $7,500 per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year, $27,000.

10. General Administration, $3,117,300.

15. Expenses of the Royal Commissions listed in the Details of Estimates, $2,105,000.

Mr. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, I have a question or two with regard to the royal commission which is inquiring into the price of agricultural machinery. I notice an item of $400,000 for its studies this year, and I would like to know when its report might be expected. Further, in view of the delay in receiving a report from the commission I would like to know whether the government is willing to take any interim action on the price of farm machinery? In view of the fact that the commission is going to spend at least $900,000 I think the government should make a statement on what it intends to do in the interim before receiving the commission report. It has taken so long for this commission to do its work that its data will be irrelevant. The farm machine companies are complaining about commissions such as this, and farmers are unhappy with them because they hold hearings, but the government takes no action on their reports.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, because I am not a member of the government I cannot give the hon. member a reply as to any interim measures that the government may or may not be contemplating. This question should be addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. However, I can give a specific answer on the work of the commission itself. As the hon. member knows, the commission was appointed in 1966. Work on the preparation of the commission's report is well under way and is expected to be completed, including translation, in June, 1969. The commission will be expected to terminate its activities shortly after that date.

Mr. Orlikow: Can I get some information from the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister or from the President of the Privy Council with respect to the second item on the same page of the estimates, expenses of the royal commission on security procedures. I had the impression that the commission had finished its work and made its report to the Prime Minister. Yesterday during the question period I tried to get Mr. Speaker's eye to ask the Prime Minister if my impression was correct.

In the vote for the commission for the coming year there is a sum of $226,000. How much longer will the commission take to complete its work, and when will its report be ready? I ask this for a very specific reason. The former solicitor general, who has now gone to another place, before he became a cabinet minister had a bill on the order paper which would certainly curtail, if not prohibit, the use of wire tapping and electronic eavesdropping. The present hon. member for York-Scarborough has a similar bill on the order paper now, and I also have one.

Up until now, when hon. members have raised questions about the advisability of passing legislation either outlawing such procedures or at least regulating them, they have been told they should not do anything until the government receives the report of the royal commission which is looking into security procedures.

I would be very interested in obtaining information concerning the status of that royal commission, when it might make its report and whether the government, once it has that report, will table it in the house.

Mr. Walker: I can report to the hon. member that the work of the commission is nearing completion and that the report is expected to be available to the government within the next month. This is the information I have.

I should also like to point out that on September 18, when the question of tabling the report came up, the Prime Minister answered in this way:

> Mr. Speaker, it is conceivable that there will be matters in it which I will not want to table in the house. The report may concern security matters which should not be made public. I do not know; I want to see it first. The hon. member cannot ask me this kind of hypothetical question and expect an answer on the subject.

I hasten to point out that the question to which the Prime Minister was replying was not asked by the hon. member who asked the present question. It is my understanding that the report itself is expected within the next month.

Mr. Orlikow: I might make the comment that of course one would not expect any government to make public a complete report which might very well deal in detail with security matters, and an investigation of espionage by our security personnel. At the same time I hope the Prime Minister will not expect members on both sides of this house who are interested in a law which would regulate and even prohibit wire tapping simply to take somebody's word that the report says we ought or ought not to pass legislation on this matter, without seeing at least that part of the report.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, earlier it had been my intention to engage in the debate relating to the presence of ministers in the house during the last couple of weeks. My hon. colleagues, however, have done such a commendable job in presenting the logic of the situation and in presenting the arguments for our side that I thought it unnecessary for me to take part in the debate in the present circumstances. I think the feeling of members of the house has been adequately expressed.

May I make one brief observation about the estimates. Some months ago the government in power made a decision in relation to the salt rebate which, of course, comes under the estimates of the Department of Fisheries. At that time $300,000 was automatically withdrawn from the Atlantic fishermen. I have just returned from having visited my constituency, where I found that 15,000 people faced a difficult winter as a result of the withdrawal of this so-called band aid policy.

Some weeks ago the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo attempted to justify the position of the government with regard to the abandonment of the band aid policy of support for the fishermen of the Atlantic coast. I believe it is generally agreed there was a great need for a long term plan or policy. How, therefore, can the government justify an expenditure last year, for example, of $600,000 to the commission on the status of women? I hasten to tell hon. members that on the east coast of Canada the women have a status equal to that of the women in eastern Canada. We do not take issue with this particular point. We are not attempting to suggest that we are not interested in a priority of this kind. We are wondering, however, how a government can justify placing the Atlantic fishermen in a compromised position while spending last year $600,000 and this year $584,000 on investigating the status of women.

I could also refer back to the estimates of $668,000 and $1 million for the B and B commission. This is a total of approximately $3 million for two investigations. The people in the Atlantic region are very conscious of their responsibility in relation to these two areas of endeavour, but for the life of me I cannot see the logic of approving an expenditure of $584,000, on the royal commission on the status of women, and at the same time robbing the fishermen of the Atlantic region. My question is very simple: What logic is there in the thinking behind the decision to appropriate approximately $600,000 to support the royal commission on the status of women.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, what strikes me in the items under consideration in the house today is that, last year, we gave $2,658,000 for the various royal commissions. This year, we are being asked $2,105,000 for five different royal Commissions and we do not know how much those commissions will cost once their work is over nor how much we will have to spend in the future for other inquiries of that kind.

We recall, for instance, that the Glassco commission cost a lot and that the government has taken from it a few good ideas concerning the improvement of its services. But the cost of the royal commission, as against the practical benefits obtained by the government, is out of proportion.

This is what strikes me. Those commissions sit and spend government money. We do not know when they will be through with their work but we are being asked year after year to vote new items. What will be the final cost of all those inquiries?

So, Mr. Chairman, in two years from now, we will have spent the tidy sum of $4,763,000 for inquiries only, and the government always seems interested in having new inquiries opened.

For instance, I should like the President of the Treasury Board to give us information regarding the royal commission on the status of women in Canada. Who were the members? What remunerations were paid? I should like that the assistant to the President of the Treasury Board to give us this information which I think he has. We would like to know, if possible, when this commission will end its sittings and when we shall get a report?

[English]

Mr. Walker: In answer to the specific question concerning the status of women royal commission, may I say that it is anticipated the report of the commission should be available by the end of 1969.

I wonder if I might say that I have considerable sympathy for many of the views concerning royal commissions that have been expressed here today. In speaking from this seat it may be difficult for me to express a personal opinion, but I do so in any event. I have often wondered—because there are some commissions which are better than others—whether some of the work done by commissions might not just as well have been handled by members of the other place, or by a special task force. I do not speak for the government in saying this, but I do believe that as members of the House of Commons we might look into something along this line in the future, so that our colleagues in the other place might undertake the work being done by some of these commissions. I hope this will not provoke an argument or discussion, but I should like to let the members of the house know that I certainly share some of the feelings that have been expressed here today.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I represent the riding of Abitibi.

With regard to item 15, I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for his explanations and I quite agree with him that the members of the Senate could very well do part of the work undertaken by some of the royal commissions. I should also like to say that I greatly admired the report of the Senate committee on aging. I think the members of that committee did a very good job and they should be encouraged to pursue their work in other fields. Indeed, I believe they would be prepared to do so, for we have noticed for some time past that increasingly younger representatives are appointed to the Senate, and I think they could accomplish some excellent work.

Now, I would like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) whether he knows if the government intends to establish other royal commissions in the near future, as we would like to know ahead of time.

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering about the usefulness of spending something over $600,000 for a royal commission studying the status of women when there are so many other problems to solve. I am thinking specifically of fisheries. I have difficulty answering some of the arguments which have been presented to me by my constituents. When I ask questions on behalf of the Atlantic people I am being very serious. I think one of our greatest problems here in the House of Commons results from the fact that when we talk about the serious fisheries situation many hon. members do not consider seriously what is being said. Very often these questions are interpreted as being facetious. Questions relating to this subject are very often glossed over or taken as a joke. I am very serious when I pose these questions to the parliamentary secretary and I should like a reasonable answer and I am not reflecting on your attitude, sir, when I make that observation: I am referring to the house generally.

Mr. Walker: I wish I could answer the hon. member's question in a satisfactory manner, but I am unable to do so. He has asked me to comment on the expenditure of a considerable amount of money on royal commissions when at the same time there are problems in respect of fisheries. This is not my role at this time. If the hon. member will take my word for this, he will realize that my role is not to explain the policies of the government to the house. My only role at this time is to provide whatever explanation I have available on these specific items. I cannot speak for the Minister of Fisheries, as I am not responsible for those estimates.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite who are speaking on behalf of the government this afternoon are experienced parliamentarians. They have both held seats in this house for some time. The people of this nation are concerned and familiar with the activities of royal commissions which have been given specific and important tasks. They know that the members of these commissions are appointed directly by the government and that their duties are set out in terms of reference. The people of this nation are concerned when they consider the tremendous amounts of money spent by these royal commissions and about what control the government has over them once they have been seized of their assigned tasks.

In view of my profession I am very much interested in the royal commission investigating the farm machinery industry. It was said this afternoon that the report from this commission can be expected about June, 1969. The terms of reference were given to this commission in 1966. Many people would like to know what the government does to follow up on these terms of reference. How is time allocated, and how does the government go about getting these commissions to report back within a certain period of time? I know the situation varies in respect of the subject matters presented to these commissions, depending on the complexity of the subject matter and the number of people who wish to appear before the commission, but the government must have some control. I should like to know how this control is applied. Does the government make a preliminary survey and anticipate the length of time required to investigate a subject, or what is the procedure in this regard?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to give a precise answer to this question. I suppose the result in each case is a balance between two conflicting principles. The object in appointing a royal commission is to seek the advice, the knowledge and the skill of someone who is independent and will be able to look at a problem objectively. We cannot gain the benefits of independence and objectivity if we try to control these people by telling them what to do and when to do it. If we do so we are in effect hiring the dog and doing the barking ourselves. Apart from a general outline of the problem to be considered, the matter is left to the royal commission which has been chosen because of the knowledge, skill, dedication and objectivity of its members. It is left to them to select the means of finding the answer in the most appropriate way.

Human nature being what it is, naturally people with responsibilities such as mine cannot avoid urging royal commissions to hurry up and get their work done. We urge them not to spend so much money, but these are in the nature of exhortations rather than controls. This is the way it should be. Perhaps that is not a satisfactory or precise answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Macquarrie: I have some concern, and I recognize certain temporal improprieties in discussing so briefly a matter such as a royal commission. I was very taken with the minister's simile about hiring a dog and doing the barking yourself; that is very good. I have only a little time to bark. In view of what he described as exacerbations, I am wondering if they are indeed exacerbations—and I am thinking about what has resulted from the bilingual and bicultural commission.

What are the results of this commission, apart from the attitude of people toward its goal and its contribution to national unity? I noticed a cartoon in the Globe and Mail regarding the appointment of a new co-chairman, where he is depicted as entering a room where the cobwebs have covered literally every person in the room, as well as all the equipment being used by the commission.

I see there has been a diminution of expenditure in the various fiscal years which have been listed. Can we assume from the cold, hard statistics, the $668,000 as against the $1,040,000 and the preceding figures, that in fact this massive exercise, research and study is approaching a stage where in all likelihood we can expect that this item might appear in next year's estimates as an expenditure not required? In other words, are we near the end of the line in the very, very important—I do not denigrate it at all—analytical job that is being done by this rather high quality commission.

Mr. Walker: Mr Chairman, I think the cartoon to which the hon. member referred did less than good service to the bilingualism and biculturalism commission, which I believe has in philosophy done something for the country in that it involved and interested many Canadians to the point that they tried to understand the mechanics of national unity in the country.

My patience might be as great as the hon. member's with regard to the length of time the report seems to be taking. However, I believe the sittings across the country have been completed and it is now a question of assembling the information and preparing the reports, some of which are prepared now. This is the work to be undertaken.

The hon. member questioned whether we could look forward to a continual reduction of the amount in the estimates. On the basis of the information I have, I believe this is so. The commission has now completed its deliberations on the education volume; it is in the last stages of proof-reading and editing, and will be ready for printing almost immediately. Would the hon. member like me to give some account of the volumes now under way, and the different stages they have reached within the staff?

Mr. Macquarrie: That would be a good idea, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Walker: All the data of information gathered from the public hearings is now being sifted, edited and put together, but I might well be misleading the house if I suggested that this would take only a matter of months. My information is that it would appear the commission's work will continue well into the 1969-70 fiscal year. I refer to the work of editing, drawing together and preparing the reports of all the work carried out heretofore.

It is perhaps pertinent in this regard to mention the great loss suffered through the death of the co-chairman, Mr. Laurendeau, who played a central part in the work of the commission. As hon. members know, this position has now been filled. I think we may run into the situation—and I hope I am right—where the expenses will be going down, but there is still many months work to be carried out, unless we are prepared to lose the total investment and not do anything with information which was gathered at great expense.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I would prevail upon the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister to give an undertaking to the committee that he will bring to the attention of the Prime Minister the remarks of my hon. friend from Gander-Twillingate with respect to what we in Newfoundland consider to be a very grave injustice perpetrated upon Newfoundland fishermen.

I am sure the Prime Minister, with his great sense of justice and his just society, would want to have this matter corrected at least for the balance of the year. The salt rebate was cancelled at the very worst time, a time when the Newfoundland salt fishermen were getting well into their season. I would ask the parliamentary secretary to bring this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister, perhaps with a view to having the vote restored.

Mr. Walker: I had already made a note to do that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make just a comment or two about the royal commission on the price of farm machinery. This inquiry has been going on for some time and many farmers in the west are now suffering a great deal of distress; their operations are being closed down because of the discrepancy that exists between their income and the price of farm machinery, and so on. This is becoming a matter of great urgency to the western farmer and, I presume, to the eastern farmer as well. I wonder whether the hon. member can give me some idea when this report will be forthcoming, and whether there is any intention to follow it up with some stabilization of farm machinery prices, and so on.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had replied to this question. I shall do so again. Work on the preparation of the commission's report is well underway and it is expected to be completed, including translation, in June, 1969.

Item agreed to.

17. Expenses of the Science Council of Canada, $377,900.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I intended to make some comments in connection with science policy. However, it is now nearly five o'clock and I find I can make my comments just as easily on the item which comes under Treasury Board, namely the National Research Council. In the interests of getting these estimates through, and on the understanding—which I am sure the minister will give—that I will not be restricted too much when we reach the item covering the National Research Council, I would be glad to leave my remarks until then.

Mr. Drury: I would welcome that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I intended to make some remarks at this time, but on the same understanding I am agreeable to letting this item pass.

Item agreed to.

Economic Council of Canada—
20. Administration, $1,601,000.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to begin my remarks now, or does Your Honour wish to call it five o'clock?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I hoped we might be able to take the one or two minutes necessary to complete the estimates of the privy council.

Mr. Gleave: Is it in order for me to proceed, Mr. Chairman?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Mr. Gleave: The Economic Council of Canada has made some fairly important recommendations in regard to agriculture. I am curious to know whether the recommendations contained in its last report, which is now before us, will be implemented. We have been talking about the farm machinery report, which will not be handed down until 1969; but the fifth report of the Economic Council of Canada makes some pretty important recommendations with regard to agriculture. It says that we could use more intensive research and development in this area. It says that we could use computers for farm management and that this should be tied in with the use and application of credit to farming operations. As far as I know, this recommendation has not been put into effect. For example, it has not been put into effect with regard to the subject about which we were talking during the last few days, namely the farm credit bills.

The report of the Economic Council says that special attention should be paid to the education of rural youngsters. In Regina, Saskatchewan, youngsters are complaining because they cannot get student loans with which to go to university. It is not the first time the Economic Council in its report has suggested this particular action. It has suggested this sort of thing in previous reports, but the recommendations have not been acted upon. It seems to me that if we are to pay the expenses of an Economic Council, if we are to pay the cost of operating such a body, some action should ensue in regard to the recommendations it makes.

By the very fact that the Economic Council is set up to survey the economic well-being of the nation we would expect that we are heading into an economy that will be planned and organized as the result of the findings of that council, and that a direction will be given to the economy which will benefit the people in the various vocations which are examined and discussed. For example, the report says that we should investigate the marketing and the production of grain. The council also said that we should increase the productivity per person and that efficiency should be increased. We are now seeing the results of the efficiency in the corn growers who travelled to Ottawa and said, "We have practised this efficiency and now we cannot sell at a profit the product which we have produced".

So I think the suggestions of the council are entirely relevant to this situation, in that if the people of Canada are to be urged to produce and to put all their efforts into it, then someone had better be given the responsibility of checking whether they are producing the right things and whether someone will want it when they have produced it. I think the Economic Council is well worth the money that is being spent on it, but there is not much use using the best brains in our country on the Economic Council, which makes certain recommendations, if we ignore those recommendations thereafter. I suggest that to a large extent, at least in agriculture, this is what has happened. If I am wrong, I stand corrected, but this is my observation.

About two years ago last winter a conference on agriculture was held in Banff. Experts from all over the world arrived to participate in it. At that time the council told us the same things which we find now in its fifth report. As nearly as I can observe, very little has been done in the intervening two years. If it is essential that we give more education to our youngsters, and the council says it is, then the government should follow this up if it considers the Economic Council to be a good institution.

I did not particularly want to make a plea today for agriculture. That is not my purpose. My purpose is to plead that when we have a commission with the prestige of the economic council that we act on their recommendations. If we are to act on those recommendations we will have to do something about what I may describe as the market economy, that is we must alter the market economy. We cannot urge sugar beet growers in Ontario, as we have done in the times past, in the general direction of efficiency and say to them, "you have to be better at producing sugar beets" and then have such small control over the economy as to allow some sugar company to put them all out of business within six months. It just does not make sense. This report suggests greater efficiency by the farmers and more productivity per man. It tells us how much we have increased productivity per man in Canada in the last 15 or 20 years. It points out that in the area where I farm, our increased productivity per man has been higher than in some other parts of Canada. But I can also say there is a lack of markets, and productivity per man will go down because there are no markets to absorb the particular item we are producing.

Perhaps some of you may have heard about the side hill dodger, who can only go round and round the hill all the time because one of his legs is shorter than the other. We are doing the same in our approach to our farm economy, the marketing aspects of which are being ignored. These are the points I wanted to make.

Item agreed to.

Public Service Staff Relations Board—
25. Administration, $1,409,000.

Item agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): This disposes of the estimates of the privy council.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, and public bills.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ALASKA-YUKON HIGHWAY AUTHORITY

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-9, to provide for the establishment of the Alaska-Yukon highway authority (Alaska highway).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would be quite happy to allow the bill to pass without debate. I say that because this is a very important bill, one which has been before this house in its present form several times. I would remind hon. members that in the twenty sixth parliament it was bill C-106 and in the twenty seventh parliament bill C-112. It concerns me very much that members of the house, particularly hon. members on the government side of the house, do not take more notice of this very important topic. As evidence that it is important I would just remind the house that it has been given unanimous support and approval by every chamber of commerce in the province of Alberta, northern Saskatchewan, northeastern British Columbia and central British Columbia. It has been given support particularly by the Montana Chamber of Commerce and many other local chambers of commerce throughout the central northwest part of the United States.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Beyond that, Mr. Speaker, it has drawn the attention of United States legislators. I have before me letters from men well known in Canada, such as Senator Bartlett of Alaska, Senator George Aiken of Vermont, Senator Mike Mansfield of Montana, Congressman Harold Johnson of California and many others I cannot take the time to list this afternoon. This highway represents one of the great epochs in the history of northwestern and western Canada. It is now more than 25 years since Canada and the United States agreed to the name, Alaska highway. This is a 1,523 mile road between Dawson Creek, British Columbia and Fairbanks, Alaska. I think perhaps we fail to recall what a tremendous feat the building of this highway was. It was built in haste but it has a place in history. It is something in which North America can take pride, Canadians and Americans.

In 1942, there was the threat of the Japanese coming to the shores of North America. The muskegs, forests and mountains gave United States engineers nightmares as they faced their task of building a military road through the wilderness in the shortest time possible. At that time the Japanese were pressing United States forces in the Pacific, and an invasion of North America, with landings on the west coast, was feared. A road to Alaska built through Canada was regarded as an essential defence undertaking. Construction was started in the spring of 1942. Six months and $140 million later, the highway opened to wheeled traffic. About 10,000 United States engineer troops and about 4,000 Canadian civilians completed this incredible task. In 1943 the road was improved with an all-weather gravel surface. There are 133 bridges of 20 feet or more in length. From the Alaskan border to Fairbanks, the highway is now paved. From the United States border through Alberta and beyond Fort St. John, the two provincial governments of Alberta and B.C. have constructed and paved connecting highways up to or better than trans-Canada standards. There are still approximately 1,200 miles unpaved.

This highway, built as a military road, does not meet the demands that civilian and commercial traffic now place upon it. A few years ago it was turned over to the Department of Public Works from the Canadian military, having been turned over by the United States military to the Canadian military at the end of world war II. The cost of maintaining this highway is now expensive, yet it carries an amount of freight which is even beyond our realization. It has been a land link between the United States, Alaska and that tremendously developing part of Canada which is northwestern Alberta, northeastern British Columbia and the Yukon.

In this particular bill, Mr. Speaker, I have designated the name of this highway as the Alaska-Yukon highway because that is exactly what it is. This bill presents a modern approach to a very complex problem. It would establish the Alaska-Yukon highway authority, a non-crown corporation. This corporation would be made up of members of the federal government, the provincial governments of Alberta and British Columbia and the territorial government of the Yukon. There is provision in this bill for associate membership by even municipal governments as well as foreign governments. On this basis the United States and Alaska could participate.

This idea of establishing an authority for the construction of an international project of such great importance to both countries involved is not new. It has been used several times in recent years for major projects. The idea came to me originally when I visited the tunnel that has been constructed through the Alps across the Swiss-Italian border. For years and years this tunnel was projected on the drawing boards and talked about at international conferences between Switzerland and Italy. These countries could never come to a position where they could agree to establish a joint committee for negotiations which would lead to an agreement for the building of the tunnel. Then, the idea was presented to set up an international autonomous authority to which the governments of both countries could contribute. This would eliminate the need to negotiate an international treaty and facilitate the necessary financial arrangements.

This Bill No. C-9 is drafted in such a way that not only can the federal governments of the United States and Canada contribute to the cost of construction but the provincial and territorial governments as well as the state of Alaska can also contribute.

It is my opinion that this is the only way this highway will be completed. It seems to me everyone who understands the importance of this communication road agrees that it must be built. However, there is not even enough interest in Ottawa for such a project to initiate negotiations between the two countries through the facilities of the International Joint Commission. This bill would establish a non-crown corporation which would permit participation of all governments concerned in such a way that this authority could reconstruct and pave this tremendously important road. Bills have been introduced in the United States Senate and Congress which would, if approved, permit contribution of funds on a 50-50 basis between the United States and Canada, because of the importance of this highway to Alaska to the United States.

There are other examples that could be cited where this type of authority has been used to accomplish projects which were too big for any particular level of government. I am thinking of the New York world's fair. The New York world's fair authority was established as an autonomous corporation to which the governments of the state of New York and the city of New York as well as the government of the United States were able to contribute in order to make this a joint project.

It is unique in other ways as well, and that is because it is a non-crown corporation. This non-crown corporation would be administered by a body that provides for regional, federal, provincial and other interests. This is the opportunity we have been looking for which would permit the construction of this highway without the long, tedious negotiations that are usually involved in such joint international projects.

Another example where this type of organization has worked very effectively can be found in the United Kingdom parliamentary charity commissioner, and in France in the commissaires-enquêteurs and rapporteurs. This system has allowed deputies of the French chamber and members of the British parliament to participate in various activities which involved different levels of their governments.

It is important to the economy of western Canada as well as to the economy of Canada as a whole to have the tremendous resources of the Canadian northwest developed. Air transport is playing its role in that development, but I submit it is only by utilizing road transportation to the fullest extent that the full potential of that part of the country is to be developed.

Chambers of commerce and members of provincial legislature have shown great interest in this bill. I am sure that the hon. member for Peace River, who seconded my motion to introduce the bill would, if time permitted, vouch for the tremendous interest there is in this project in his part of Alberta. There is great enthusiasm also for the subject matter of this bill in notheastern British Columbia and in the Yukon territory, as well as in Washington, Alaska and the northwestern states.

I commend the bill most seriously to hon. members of the house. We who are charged with responsibility for overseeing the economic welfare of the entire country, must not fail to recognize the economic benefits that would flow from the development of the highway. Some will say that the cost of building it is exorbitant. Certainly construction costs have risen in the last few years. Originally when hon. members of this house began talking of this project they envisaged an expenditure of about $125 million. We are told that construction and paving costs now would exceed $200 million. The United States government has already said it is willing to pay half this cost, and I am sure that since the Yukon territory and British Columbia stand to gain much from the project they would be willing to share in the cost of construction. Alberta thinks the project is so important that it has gone ahead and completed that portion of the highway leading to the border of British Columbia, the construction standard of which is higher than would be necessary if there were not extensive commercial traffic.

I commend this bill to the government. Since the economy of western Canada, to say nothing of the economy of the entire country, will benefit from the completion of this highway, I submit action ought to be initiated immediately. We must not procrastinate any longer. This is the kind of investment that pays for itself. It is important to the general development of our economy. I submit that the government will find no better way of approaching this matter than by allowing this bill to pass second reading, so it can be referred to the standing committee on national resources and public works.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am impelled to rise in support of the intent of this bill and wish to commend the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) for drawing the attention of this house to the importance of the Alaska highway in the continuing development of Canada's northland. Areas in Alberta, British Columbia and the Yukon, from Edmonton to Fairbanks, have benefited greatly as a result of the highway, which was rather hurriedly constructed by the United States government during the war as a partial defence for Alaska. Admittedly, it is somewhat unfortunate that more time was not available, as some sections are poorly located.

I hope to take a little time explaining the history of the road. I also hope to show how this bill may have application to it. At the end of the war the road was turned over to Canada, and the army took it over in the first period. It cost us about $12 million a year to maintain, and our army was in control. Later, the Department of Public Works inherited the highway and has been successful in reducing the annual cost of maintenance to about $6 million. This expenditure appears to have maintained the road at an operational level but has not allowed for any real improvements to be made to the highway.

There have been a number of consultations with the United States government, at arms length, with a view to the United States government paying half the costs of maintenance and paving. Some years ago the United States government sponsored a report which, I believe, was subsequently submitted by the Bettel Institute. Their findings indicated that the cost of improving and paving the highway could be profitable from the standpoint of a tourist attraction, alone.

I do not know what are the actual figures produced by the report. I do recall, however, that the government of Canada was impressed and encouraged by the findings. However, the government of Canada undertook a feasibility report on the highway. While emphasis was naturally pointed toward engineering, economics were also considered. The report appeared to substantiate that one third of the highway needed relocation, one third needed rebuilding, and one third was ready to pave.

The discouraging fact was that in order to complete an acceptable highway, it would cost $210 million. I understand that considerable time and effort was devoted to a study of the return to Canadians in terms of usage. It is conceded that during the war, and for a period following the war, a tremendous number of trucks used the highway, carrying goods north from Seattle. The loads consisted of housing materials, portable housing for Alaska, and other items used in expediting United States army units there. However, information brought to our government during the past few years indicates that commercial traffic has considerably decreased, and in fact is lessening each year. This is largely due to heavily improved water transportation on the west coast out of Seattle, and our own transport over the Canadian National Railways to Prince Rupert, and on to Alaska. This is taking a great deal of Alaskan business. Considering only the volume of traffic on the road, it is less important to Canada now than it has been.

[Mr. Pringle.]

Tourist travel, however, is still high and is growing. It is my opinion that it will continue to expand annually. There is little doubt that because of the dust factor, most tourists are unhappy about the highway as now constructed. It is also an uncomfortable highway on which to travel. Today's tourists with modern cars find distance less of a problem than in previous years, but they still require safe highways free from dust. In other words, tourists want comfort as well as safety on the highways.

It is my understanding that our government agreed recently, as a result of discussions with the United States government, that any further costs in connection with capital expenditures, required to improve the highway, should be shared by the United States on a 50-50 basis. I also understand that discussions along these lines are continuing.

It must be appreciated that at present the Alaska highway route is the only land corridor available to join two parts of the United States together. In fact, the discussions which have been held emphasize that for all practical purposes the Americans could find that the highway is of greater significance to the United States than it is to Canada. This is a matter of concern and continuing discussion between Canada's parliamentary group and the United States Senate group which meet annually. Canada has decided in the interim to maintain the highway and also to carry out some improvement.

There are approximately 82 bridges on the highway. Some 23 or 24 of them have already been replaced on a more or less permanent basis. Replacement requirements will probably accelerate, because the rest of the bridges are rotting and will not carry the weight of traffic. It is estimated that all of the 82 bridges will be replaced within the next three years. About $2 million was spent in 1968.

I understand it is intended to pave another 10 miles at the end of mile 83 which will bring the pavement in that area to a total of about 93 miles out of Dawson Creek. This is rather important to our American friends, and shows evidence of good faith. We are also paving six miles through the rapidly growing town of Fort Nelson in order to alleviate the dust problem there. There are 2,500 people in Fort Nelson now, so that the extra paving will be welcome to provide assistance in dust control. Twenty-five miles of paving is also to be laid at a section of the highway around Whitehorse, where expansion is increasing beyond expectation. The metal industries in two areas around Whitehorse increased their output from $43 million in 1965 to $141 million two years later. By 1970 it should reach a quarter of a billion dollars.

It is expected that heavy trucks will be travelling the highway to Whitehorse every ten minutes, so considerable attention must be given to improvement of the highways in that area. Our government has also co-operated with our American friends to improve Haynes highway through the provision of snow removal equipment. We therefore find that the future of northern development depends to a large extent on close co-operation with the people of Alaska.

My purpose in reviewing these facts is to bring to the attention of the house the heavy involvement of the federal government in the improvement and maintenance of the Alaska highway. It is evident there is a great deal of merit in considering future negotiations for capital cost, which would place some responsibility on the shoulders of the United States government. Were we to abandon the involvement of our federal government in the development of the highway, is it not reasonable to expect that insurmountable barriers could arise? If it is the intention of this bill to place the operation of the road in a corporation other than a crown corporation, it would not, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, be fair or proper to expect the federal government to foot the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pringle: I do not believe the bill goes far enough in connection with the terms of reference applied to the proposed corporation. No estimates are included which would enable the house to judge the amount of funds which would be required for capital costs in the immediate future, and no figures have been submitted covering maintenance costs.

I also believe that the reference to funding the required obligations is unrealistic. The cursory review I have made would suggest that a great deal of money is likely to be required. While the suggestion made with respect to bond and debenture issues appears to indicate that considerable thought has been given to the problem by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), I cannot but feel that the federal treasury would be petitioned for the major portion. If this is true, then it would follow that control of the spending of the money should remain with parliament.

In my opinion there is a valid argument that the time has arrived when all governments benefitting from the Alaska highway should get into the act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pringle: It would appear feasible that the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, working in close co-operation with the federal government, should become increasingly involved, from a financial point of view.

I do not mean to suggest from my brief remarks today that I see no merit in the bill. Indeed, I believe that the importance of arterial highways to the development and progress of Canada, especially in remote areas, is greater today than at any time in our history. Great strides have been made in highway construction in Canada during the past number of years, especially in western Canada. The great farming areas of western Canada are requiring industrial expansion as never before. Technological exchange has kept Canadian farmers abreast of the times in farm automation. Although I quickly agree that farm earnings are not adequate, it is my considered opinion that there is nothing wrong in the farming industry of Canada that expanded markets would not quickly cure. In fact, Canadian farmers have been producing to a surplus position instead of a consuming market for as long as I can remember. Food production has expanded through the encouragement of government to over-produce, to the point where today it has reached an exceedingly dangerous level.

• (5:40 p.m.)

During these early days in the twenty eighth parliament of Canada, I have heard many references made to the concept of family farms. I have been dealing with family farmers for years, and I heartily agree that they epitomize a way of life which is hard to beat. I also believe that well operated, efficient family farms will not disappear. I do not believe that bigness alone is a requisite of success. If this were true, Mr. Speaker, then the large department and mail order houses would have closed the smaller merchants long ago. What does all this have to do with a highway? I shall continue.

I freely admit that successful family farms are going along with the trend to specialization, and those who are recognizing the transition which is taking place will undoubtedly emerge successful. It is not the family farm that will disappear; it is the old concept of family operated diversified farming which is doomed. An advocacy of programming to maintain family diversified farms is as unfair as suggesting that rural electrification and highways are unnecessary.

I am convinced, as are many of my farmer friends, that the day is here when farmers must be prepared to establish area farming economic units, where they must produce to meet consumer demand, with the emphasis on the avoidance of costly surpluses. My point is substantiated by the statistics now available from segments of the agricultural industry which have, during the past six to eight years, established planned programs of production as procurement commissions for secondary industry.

The quiet revolution taking place in farm operations will undoubtedly spread. Expansion of this concept will grow in relation to consumer demand. What we need is more consumers. We need areas expanded through highways and good roads, areas which are close to raw materials such as those to be found parallel to the Alaska highway, so that farmers can become more involved in industry and so that they can give a hand to increasing the number of consumers.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I again commend the hon. member for Red Deer for his bill, although I cannot totally agree that the formation of a non-crown corporation is the correct approach to further development of the Alaska-Yukon highway. I commend the hon. member, because highways mean development. The highway between Edmonton and Fairbanks undoubtedly holds the key which will open vast natural resources. Accessible natural resources mean industry, and industry requires people. People are consumers. The urgent need for a more equitable balance between producers and consumers to enlarge domestic markets has never been more acute than it is today.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill, No. C-9, providing for the establishment of an Alaska-Yukon highway authority. I support the idea because it seems to me that some sort of co-ordinating body is required in order to ensure that more rapid progress takes place in the development of this highway. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) has stated that there have been rapid strides made in road construction. Maybe there have been, but if we look at the figures pertaining to this highway, 1,523 miles long, finished in 1943, we find that there are still 1,200 miles not paved, and generally in poor condition. I think this may have occurred because of the lack of a proper co-ordinating body to bring together the views of the various governments involved in the construction and maintenance of this road.

I do not need to repeat all the important developments that would result from improvement of this road. They have been mentioned by previous speakers, but tourism is one thing that cannot be overlooked. The Yukon contains a vast potential for tourist traffic development. The nice thing about tourism is that we are not really exporting anything. People come to look at our country and they leave their money here.

It has been stated that between $6 million and $12 million has been required annually for the upkeep of this highway under present circumstances, and that a total of $200 million would be required for completion of the pavement. It appears that the expenditures now taking place, multiplied over a period of 20 years or so, would cover the cost of paving the road. If an Alaska-Yukon highway authority were established, which would actively work toward this goal, it might be reached in the near future.

Because of the importance of this highway I urge that serious consideration be given to this bill. I shall not say much more because I do not want it talked out. I have heard the hon. member for Fraser Valley East support the bill, and I presume he was expressing the view of his party. I hope no further members will speak on it, so that it can be passed and sent to the appropriate standing committee.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to talk this bill out, but I too would like to commend the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) for introducing this very interesting topic to the house. I am one of the members from British Columbia. For years we in B.C. have been looking for a good access to the north as one of the major contributions which the federal government could make to the vital highway links that we need in the western part of Canada.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, for many years we have heard the slogan "Roads to Resources." That is actually what the hon.

member has raised in this important bill. I presume that, like the rest of us, he has become somewhat disillusioned with the federal government. He realizes, as many of us do, that it will take a number of years before it proceeds with a full program to pave this vital road link, and he has suggested that a highway authority be established. Personally I think it is a very good idea to approach other parties who are interested in this road link. I have in mind the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, the state of Alaska, the United States government, and of course our own federal government here in Ottawa.

I have been over the road, and I am familiar with a large section of the highway. It is very scenic although extremely rough. It is full of potholes and it is dusty, and anything but an asset or an attraction to the great tourist industry which it could and should serve, were it paved as it should be. It seems to me that far too little attention has been paid by the federal and other government authorities to the vast untapped and undeveloped resources which we have in the north, the northeastern and northwestern parts of our nation. We do have the trans-Canada highway, stretching from one end of Canada to the other, and there is not one section of our nation which has not benefited economically from the building of this road link.

In the Yukon we have another section of Canada. I believe that this important section of our nation should also have a road link of a standard at least equal to that of the trans-Canada highway. This of course is where the federal government enters the picture. It is not my intention to talk out this bill. There is ample time for us to put it through the second reading state this afternoon.

Although perhaps it would be better if the federal government were to look after the task of building this road link, the mere fact that the federal government has failed to do so, and the mere fact that we have had recent statements which indicate that in the immediate future there is little chance that this vital road link will be paved, prompts me to say that I have no hesitation in suggesting to the house that we endorse the bill which has been put forward by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson).

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I wish—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Watson: —to congratulate the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) upon bringing this bill to the attention of the house. I was recently a visitor to the Yukon and appreciate full well the tremendous benefits which would accrue to that part of Canada if the highway were paved from Dawson Creek to the Alaska frontier. I am told that not only do we need the 1,200 miles of pavement but that we also need to rebuild some 400 miles. I have learned also that all the bridges require rebuilding. The sum involved is high, but within our means. I agree with other hon. members who have spoken today that this is an economically feasible project and that we should be doing something about it now.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Watson: So far as the Yukon is concerned it would appear to me that we could substantially reduce commodity costs in that part of the country if transportation costs were reduced as a result of the increased speed which would be possible on the highway were it paved and partially rebuilt. One area of the economy of the Yukon which is undeveloped now is tourism. With the paving of the Alaska highway, tourism in the Yukon would blossom, and if access roads were built this blossoming of tourism would spread into the Northwest Territories as well. The faster access to the south would also be an additional stimulus to the development of the Yukon's tremendous mineral and timber resources.

For these and other reasons which hon. members have given today, the overwhelming economic evidence is to the effect that the highway can and should be built without any more delay. The tourist potential for Alaska alone underlines the interest which the people of the United States generally as well as the people of Alaska have in this project. There is no question but that Alaska would be visited by tremendous numbers of people from the northwestern parts of the United States who would like to see their 49th state.

I would hope that in the very near future the governments involved could get together in an effort to do something about this project. At the same time I would hope it would be possible for the authorities in the Yukon, who are concerned with having a corridor to the Pacific, to raise the question with the authorities in the United States and Canada so that we could solve these problems at the same time.

I have one final point which should be of particular interest to the maritime members present. In eastern Canada we have a similar problem. This summer I was happy to have been a visitor to the eastern provinces. One thing that struck me was the lack of fast road access to the maritimes. We have the state of Main jutting up into the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. If a corridor were built across this part of Maine I am convinced it would do more for the maritimes than all the money the Atlantic Development Board has been spilling around.

I should like to suggest the suggestion of the hon. member for Red Deer in respect of an Alaska highway authority be broadened, so that the authority would become a corridor authority in which money supplied by the United States government for a corridor through the state of Maine would be met by equivalent Canadian funds spent on paving the Alaska highway in the Yukon to the Yukon frontier.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? In view of the fact that he apparently is in agreement with the principle of this bill, as are all the other parties in the house who have spoken on this matter, does he think it would be a very good idea now to let this bill pass second reading so that the committee could really study the suggestion he has made, as well as the question of the Yukon highway?

Mr. Watson: I would propose that the federal government immediately convene a conference of the governments of the states of Maine and Alaska, the maritime provinces, Quebec, Alberta, British Columbia and the Yukon Territory as well as the Atlantic Development Board, as well as the federal governments of Canada and the United States to deal with both projects simultaneously.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock I must advise the hon. member that the period for private members business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I announced earlier today the business for Tuesday will be, one would hope, the completion of the committee stage of the farm improvement loans bill, followed by second reading of the Farm Credit Corporation amendment bill, then the committee stage of that bill carried through to conclusion, and later on that day I will be ready to announce the business for the remainder of the day.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether the ministers' attendance roster will be the same for next week?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Perhaps I should indicate to the hon. member that we are taking advantage of the very helpful comments made by hon. members opposite and will be glad to make one or two revisions to that roster.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the ministers who are supposed to be here on Monday be here?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member will know by the rules that no ministers are supposed to be here next Monday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): This house stands adjourned until two thirty o'clock, Tuesday, October 15, pursuant to standing order No. 2(4).

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.
