House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable Lucien Lamoureux

• (10:30 a.m.)

FIRST SESSION—TWENTY EIGHTH PARLIAMENT

The twenty seventh parliament having been prorogued and dissolved by proclamation on the twenty third day of April, 1968, and writs having been issued and returned, a new parliament was summoned to meet for the dispatch of business on Thursday, September 12, 1968, and did accordingly meet on that day.

Thursday, September 12, 1968

This being the day on which parliament is convoked by proclamation of His Excellency the Governor General for the dispatch of business, and the members of the house being assembled:

Alistair Fraser, Esquire, the Clerk of the House, read to the house a letter from the assistant secretary to the Governor General informing him that the Right Honourable J. R. Cartwright, Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate chamber to open the first session of the twenty eighth parliament of Canada on Thursday, the twelfth day of September, at ten thirty o'clock.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is the desire of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that this honourable house attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Members of the Senate,
and Members of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but this afternoon, at the hour of three o'clock, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this parliament.

• (10:50 a.m.)

And the House being returned to the Commons chamber:

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

MR. LUCIEN LAMOUREUX, MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF STORMONT-DUNDAS

[Translation]

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Fraser, the first and one of the most important tasks of the members upon the opening of a new parliament is the election of the Speaker of the house. The member whom we choose will preside over our deliberations and direct the services which are essential to the efficient guidance of our business; he will also represent us on numerous occasions in Canada as well as abroad.

[English]

To perform these functions, and to perform them to our satisfaction, he will require a formidable array of qualities. He must enjoy our respect without losing our affection. He must be firm yet sensitive, a master of language and a good listener, able to interpret the law and to understand human nature. He must be prepared to cite a precedent, and to know when to distinguish it. It will be helpful if he has a good sense of humour, and if he can be equally witty in both languages. He needs the skills of a judge and a diplomat. He should combine the talents of a tight-rope walker, a juggler and, occasionally, a lion tamer. In short, he must be a born parliamentarian.

It was our good fortune to find such a man for our Speaker in the last parliament. At the beginning of this session it is reassuring to nominate a man who has demonstrated these qualities and who now has behind him the experience of an eventful and sometimes hectic parliament.

[Translation]

The distinguished career of the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux has prepared him particularly well to fulfil the role of Speaker. Born in Ottawa, where he also studied, he spent the greater part of his life within a few miles of parliament hill. After having been admitted to the bar in Ontario, he became executive assistant to the Minister of Transport. Since 1954, he has practised law at Cornwall, where he took an active part in public affairs, particularly in the field of education. Elected member for Stormont in 1962 for the first time, he was re-elected in 1963, 1965 and 1968. He was appointed Deputy Speaker of the house and Chairman of committees of the whole for the 26th parliament. He was Speaker of the house of Commons during the 27th parliament.

At the end of the last parliament, a large number of members from all parties paid tribute to the way in which he had fulfilled his duties by agreeing that his seat should not be contested in the election. I know that the hon. member firmly believes that independence is necessary to the good operation of the speakership and I welcomed with pleasure the co-operation of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and of the leaders of the other parties who did not contest his election as an independent member.

To propose a former speaker and an independent member for the speakership of the house constitute two precedents which I am pleased to create. Those precedents give an idea of the new role that the Speaker will be called upon to play.

[English]

At every session of parliament the amount of legislation and other parliamentary business increases substantially, while the amount of time available for debates in the house remains virtually the same. If parliament is to play its proper role we must ensure that the available time is used wisely and fairly. An active Speaker who enjoys the confidence and support of the members can greatly improve the performance of the house. This has been our experience and the experience of other Commonwealth parliaments.

In the last parliament we agreed to abolish appeals from the Speaker's rulings. All who were members of the house during that parliament would agree, I believe, that this improved our proceedings without detracting from the rights of individual members. The special committee on procedure, which visited the United Kingdom parliament last winter, reported:

> Again and again during the days we were at Westminster we were impressed by the key role as the impartial conductor of the work of parliament conferred on the Speaker.
> When neither rules nor understandings can be devised to guide, the wisdom and diligence of Mr. Speaker prevails. Experience has shown that an officer of his high standing is needed. At Westminster he has been given both heavy duties and countervailing independence and honour. Undoubtedly, the independence of the Speaker and the power vested in him constitute a condition precedent to the effectiveness of parliamentary procedure in the United Kingdom.

I am convinced that these remarks apply with equal force to our own house. That is why the policy of strengthening the Speaker's independence and increasing his responsibilities has been advanced and supported by many members in all parts of the house. That is why I feel certain that the members of the house will support me in urging the Speaker, with respect, not to hesitate to restrain abuses of the rules and irrelevancy, no matter on which side of the aisle they arise.

[Translation]

I am sure that all hon. members will want to join with me to express our feeling that, of all the members of this house, the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux is the most qualified by his temperament, his knowledge and his experience to assume the heavy responsibilities of the office for which I have the honour to propose his candidacy.

[English]

Therefore I take great pleasure in moving, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition, that Lucien Lamoureux, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Stormont-Dundas, do take the Chair of this house as Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Fraser, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to second the Prime Minister's nomination of the member for Stormont-Dundas as Speaker for this first session of the twenty eighth parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamoureux, who was elected Speaker at the first session of the 27th Parliament, has always since then discharged that important office with tact, diplomacy, firmness and with complete and scrupulous impartiality.

[English]

Coupled with these qualities has been an innate wisdom, comprehension and respect for the parliamentary process, for parliament and the rights of members of parliament.

I might mention, sir, that at Mr. Lamoureux's election the Prime Minister of the day addressed his words to the then Clerk, Mr. Raymond. Today, only a short time later, although the procedure is the same you, Mr. Fraser, have succeeded Mr. Raymond and at the opening of this new session I take the occasion to wish you well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The appointment of a permanent Speaker remains one of the necessary objectives of parliamentary procedure and parliamentary improvement. I hope we can all agree upon the urgency of taking action in this regard. I hope also I will be forgiven for saying here that I am proud of the role played by the members of the Progressive Conservative party in Stormont-Dundas in order that Mr. Lamoureux could come to parliament bearing as much as possible the stamp of non-partisan approval. But the traditional rights of party supporters to nominate candidates in Stormont-Dundas must not be forgotten. Therefore it is urgent in that respect as well as for the regulation of parliamentary procedure that early consideration be given to alternative methods of removing the election of the Speaker from partisan considerations.

• (11:00 a.m.)

I am glad to say it again: The choice of Mr. Lamoureux is a happy one. His past rulings show the attachment and the respect he has for the institution whose standing orders he had to apply. While men come and go, the continuity of institutions ensures the survival, the strength of democracy.

But the institutions must keep abreast of the times—and the same is true of parliament—and in that sense, I think that when the office of Speaker becomes permanent, we will have taken a step forward.

[English]

The Speaker is the chief officer of parliament. He has been the bulwark of the privileges of parliament and its members. In the continuity of the office of Speaker and its progressive removal from the exigencies of partisan conflict lie the best guarantees of parliament's survival as the basic institution of freedom. In the eyes of the Speaker there are no parties in parliament, there are only members equal as to rights and privileges, equally entitled to consideration. It is this which makes parliament the supreme instrument of man's designing for the defence of freedom.

Mr. Lamoureux has been and I am sure will continue to remain an outstanding exponent of these great principles and traditions. Personally and on behalf of the members of this party in the house I extend to him my congratulations, anticipating the outcome of the motion with great confidence, and my best wishes as he resumes his most important duties at the opening of this session of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Fraser, we already have had the experience and the pleasure of having Mr. Lamoureux as a Speaker, and he has always displayed fairness, kindness and wisdom. What more could we ask of the man who is now our Speaker?

[English]

I note, Mr. Fraser, that Mr. Lamoureux is sitting in the opposition benches of the chamber, determined to show his independence even before he is officially elected Speaker. This is perhaps characteristic of the man's sense of propriety, and humour as well.

I want to agree with the right hon. Prime Minister and the Leader of the Official Opposition on behalf of my colleagues and myself with the necessity of constitutional arrangements in respect of a permanent Speaker in this house, without any constituency in the land being deprived of the opportunity of an electoral contest. That step will receive all our support. I also noted that the right hon. Prime Minister, as an expert lawyer, emphasized the fact that the Speaker must be able not only to interpret the rules but also to distinguish them when the situation requires. In that agile effort of applying the rules with impartiality and good nature to the particular situation, Mr. Lamoureux has already shown himself to be a master.

It is with very deep pleasure that we of the New Democratic party support his candidature for this office and offer him the co-operation which I know he will receive from all hon. members of the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Fraser, when the appointment of a permanent Speaker was discussed some months ago, the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux was suggested for this position, and we were happy to think that he might become permanent Speaker of this house. The hon. Lucien Lamoureux possesses obvious qualities thanks to which he has shown himself to be, during the 27th Parliament, one of the great Speakers in the history of the House of Commons. He acted with impartiality, and even when Parliament was led by a minority government, he managed to do a difficult job very well, in spite of a situation which was often rather awkward.

This time, the Speaker will preside over the deliberations of a parliament led by a majority government, and this for the first time in six years. At this time, I feel that the hon. Mr. Lamoureux has, once again, all the unquestionable qualities required to know that we must protect the minorities. Now, we will be a minority. I am of the opinion, in short, I am already convinced that the hon. Mr. Lamoureux will treat the members of parliament, the appointees of the people as they should be treated in a democratic parliament. We have been appointed by the Canadian people: the hon. Mr. Lamoureux knows that.

We, of the Ralliement Créditiste, are indeed very happy to support fully the motion of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), seconded by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), for the appointment of the hon. Mr. Lamoureux as Speaker of the house during the session opening today.

Therefore, we wish every success to the hon. Mr. Lamoureux, and we feel sure that the members will be treated equitably, in all fairness, for the common good of the Canadian people.

[English]

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Lucien Lamoureux, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Stormont-Dundas, duly elected to the Chair of the house.

Mr. Lamoureux was conducted from his seat in the house to the Speaker's chair by Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau and Hon. Robert L. Stanfield.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members, I thank you for the honour you have just bestowed upon me, an honour which is shared by my family and by the constituents I represent in this parliament.

For the second time you have called me to the high office of Speaker of the House of Commons. I am deeply grateful to you for this renewed expression of confidence. When I stood before you as Speaker-elect to the twenty seventh parliament I undertook to serve this house and to serve parliament with fairness, objectivity and impartiality. This is my renewed pledge to the house on this solemn occasion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I will again consider it an honour and my duty to uphold the rights and privileges of individual members of the house and to maintain our parliamentary customs and traditions, and I am sure all hon. members will want to co-operate with their presiding officer to ensure that in its deliberations our assembly will always observe the highest standards of decorum, propriety and dignity.

[Translation]

I therefore thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, and I thank you, hon. members, for the great honour that you have just bestowed upon me.

I am deeply touched, of course, by the much too flattering remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and I am also grateful to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield who, in much too gracious terms, was kind enough to support the Prime Minister's motion. The remarks made by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition as well as those made by the hon. members for York South and Témiscamingue (Messrs. Lewis and Caouette) are for me today a source of comfort and encouragement and will be a source of strength, if need be, in difficult moments.

In the discharge of the high office devolved upon me, I shall do my utmost to deserve the confidence placed in me today by all members of this house.

As in the past, I shall count on the co-operation and goodwill of all hon. members. I will rely on them for advice, especially on those of our colleagues who bring to our debate the wisdom of age and a long experience in this house.

Such a co-operation will contribute more than any other factor to the orderly, efficient and dignified dispatch of our parliamentary business.

[English]

Hon. members, I approach my task with humility and fully conscious of my limitations, but sustained by your advice and counsel I shall endeavour to prove worthy of the trust committed to me by this house whose servant I am.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that this sitting be suspended until three o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the suggestion by the right hon. Prime Minister that this sitting be suspended until three o'clock this afternoon. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this suggestion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the sitting suspended until the ringing of the bells at three o'clock this afternoon.

At 11.15 a.m. the sitting was suspended until 3 p.m. this day.

• (3:00 p.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE AT TABLE OF FORMER CLERK

Mr. Speaker: Before commencing further proceedings, perhaps I might be permitted to recall to the minds of hon. members that on Friday, July 7, 1967, the following motion was adopted by the house:

On motion of Mr. Martin (Essex East) for Mr. Pearson, seconded by Mr. Diefenbaker, it was resolved,—That the Members of this House, desiring to record their deep appreciation of the long and distinguished service rendered by Léon-J. Raymond, Esquire, O.B.E., as Clerk of the House of Commons, and acknowledging the dignity and profound learning with which he graced his office, designate him as Honorary Officer of the House of Commons with an entrée to the Chamber and a seat at the Table on ceremonial occasions.

To give effect to the motion of the house Mr. Raymond today is sitting at the table of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three o'clock on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

• (3:20 p.m.)

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor General that this honourable house attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber. Then the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons have elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If in the performance of those duties I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable construction.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's person and government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions, and that their proceedings as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open parliament by a speech from the throne.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to report that, the house having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen upon me, and, in your names, and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

OATHS OF OFFICE

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[English]

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to welcome you to the first session of the 28th Parliament of Canada.

Across the land there are great expectations of what this Parliament will produce. My Ministers recognize the responsibility for leadership which these hopes entail. They are determined to do all that they can to carry out the mandate they received from the people of Canada in the recent general election. They recognize their duty to ensure that the wishes of Canadians concerning their Government be fulfilled as quickly and as completely as the general advantage will allow. At the same time my Government is conscious that aspirations and their realization have to be tempered by a sober awareness of reality. In the complexities of modern society, effective programs take time to develop and more time to implement. At all stages they require financial and intellectual resources which are not unlimited and must be used with careful planning and the hard judgement of priorities. It is a simple fact of life that everything cannot be done at once.

My Government has planned the legislative program of this first session in the context of a Parliament of normal duration. To make way for the consideration in later sessions of new programs that Ministers are already developing, it is proposed, during the current session, to elucidate priorities and to set in motion new policies. Of equal importance, though of far less drama, Parliament will be asked to deal with a host of matters essential to the smooth and up-to-date functioning of government which were not disposed of in the previous Parliament. My Government considers that its first responsibility, and the first responsibility of this Parliament, is to clear the accumulation of essential legislative adjustments, improvements and modernizations left over from the last Parliament. Unless they are cleared up promptly, efficient public administration and the effective operation of the Canadian economy and society will be hampered.

My Ministers believe that much of the delay and difficulty in the handling of Parliamentary business during recent years could have been avoided or reduced by the improvement of Parliamentary rules and procedures. It is their view that Canadians feel that Parliament is too far removed from the people it serves; its operations are too slow and ponderous; its deliberations are often insufficiently informed and its decisions are too few and too much delayed. In order that Parliamentary institutions may retain the confidence of the people, and in order that they may cope successfully with the vast scope and complexity of government today, it is essential that provision be made for legislative machinery that can act speedily on the large number of varied, detailed and complicated legislative, financial and policy questions that will be the normal, and indeed the growing, Parliamentary program of the future. My Government accords the greatest importance to Parliamentary reform and, to this end and as a matter of the highest priority, it has already had useful discussions with representatives of Opposition parties concerning changes in the rules and procedures of the House of Commons.

So that the Official Opposition, to which we in Canada give formal recognition as a vital part of our democratic process, as well as the other parties in opposition, may be in a position to cope more effectively with the heavy load of action and decision each session must face, you will be asked to make new provision for the Official Opposition, and the other parties in their Parliamentary role. You will also be asked to consider additional facilities for the better discharge of the functions of Parliament generally.

My Government is deeply and irrevocably committed to the objectives of a just society and a prosperous economy in a peaceful world. My Ministers believe that the unity of the country is fundamental to the attainment of these goals, as—indeed—to the enjoyment by each Canadian of the maximum possible liberty, happiness and material well-being. Constitutional reform remains the best long-term guarantee of Canadian unity and my Ministers are directing officials in discussions with the Provinces which are proceeding well and will, through a series of intergovernmental conferences, lead to proposals that Parliament will wish to consider. In the meantime, however, to further the objective of a united Canada, you will be asked during the current session, to enact a totally new Official Languages Act based on the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. You will also be asked to approve a new Publication of Statutes Act to change the way in which the law of our bilingual land is presented and made known in both the official languages of our land. You will also be asked to consider measures relating to Indians, to citizenship, to national symbols, to cultural agencies, to transportation of all kinds as well as to communications (including satellites), educational television, and the financing of the Post Office.

Some of these proposals involve the righting of wrongs and others the opening of opportunities long denied. Together they exemplify the essential connection between justice and national unity. The attainment of a just society is the cherished hope of civilized men. While perhaps more difficult to formulate for groups than for individuals, even the members of majorities—political, religious, linguistic or economic—must know what it is to suffer injustice. My Government is deeply concerned to provide and to ensure increased justice, dignity and recognition to the individual, particularly in an age which is characterized by large governments, industrial automation, social regimentation and old-fashioned laws. A great deal has been accomplished in recent years to make the Canadian society more just in terms of income distribution and security against the vicissitudes of life. Pensions for the aged, provision for the sick and for the needy have been made more effective by legislation passed in recent Parliaments and by action of the provinces. Notwithstanding such measures, poverty continues to exist in Canada. My Government recognizes that, but it also believes that it would be deluding and cruel to pretend that there is a simple, all-encompassing or instantaneously effective remedy. Poverty can be dealt with successfully and permanently only by continued and determined action in a variety of ways by all governments. For its part, Parliament can be assured that the federal government will contribute fully and assume leadership wherever it can properly do so. To this end, the proposals you will have for your consideration will include the establishment of a department charged with the objective of ensuring that people in all areas and regions of our country have as equal access as possible to the opportunities of Canada's economic development.

At the same time, there are other and broader elements vital to a just society, and my Ministers feel that these must receive, at this and in later sessions of Parliament, a degree of attention they have not had hitherto. Toward these ends, you will be asked to enact important changes in the Criminal Law, to provide new protections for consumers and investors, to up-date food, drug and health legislation, to revise or amend legislation relating to the machinery of justice, and to correct a number of particular injustices, including those resulting from certain provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. During the course of the present session it is anticipated that the government will receive reports from inquiries with regard to labour legislation and veterans pensions, and it is the intention of my Ministers to bring their proposals in these matters before you as soon as possible.

My Government believes that the objective of a just society must always include the pursuit of a prosperous economy as well as the fair distribution of its proceeds. Just as we have in the past tended, perhaps, to consider justice in our society largely in material terms, so we must recognize that there has been a tendency in Parliament and to some degree in Government to concentrate on the distributive aspects of our economy. In this course we have sometimes tended to neglect those aspects that can affect the productivity of our country, and hence the total provision of economic well-being for our society, and its competitiveness in the changing conditions of the modern world. The natural resources of Canada and the industries based upon them continue to be of immense importance to our economy but the advantages of our great physical resources by themselves are no longer an adequate base for a growing and prosperous modern economy. We shall increasingly have to compete on even terms with those countries of the world which are most advanced technologically in the provision of the sophisticated products of modern life. Unless Canada can maintain an economy that is efficient, competitive and productive in relation to the most advanced nations on earth, we cannot have the basis for a society from which poverty has been eliminated, we cannot maintain high levels of employment and income and we cannot ensure the standard of life to which Canadians generally aspire. It is against this background, as well as with the consciousness that the interests of all must be fairly balanced, that the government is approaching its policies and programs of an economic character. In this same context, Parliament will be asked during the present session to consider proposals for a systematic and continuous review of prices and costs in our economy.

Just as incomes cannot increase faster than productivity if price increases are to be restrained, so government spending by all levels of government cannot increase faster than productivity if we wish to restrain the increase in levels of taxation. These two realities are among the most important that Canadians and their leaders must bear in mind during the months and years ahead. Measures that you will have to consider relating to the Kennedy Round reflect the outcome of a major international effort to reduce the barriers to international trade and emphasize the opportunities opening up for a great trading nation like Canada. A measure to be brought before you dealing with the amendment of the Bretton Woods arrangements, results from comparable efforts to stabilize and improve the whole international financial system.

Conscious of the limitations it must place on its expenditures, my Government has acted within the framework of previously announced guidelines to select carefully the programs which in the light of regional needs and opportunities it considers most promising for the promotion of a prosperous economy. My Ministers will bring before you legislation relating to the encouragement of manpower programs, regional improvements, domestic investment, export development, and resource administration, including a Yukon Mineral Act and an Oil and Gas Production Act relating to Canada's increasingly important northern resources. In addition, my Government will propose a Freshwater Fish Marketing Act, and intends to investigate immediately a number of methods for promoting greater efficiency in the production and marketing of grains, including the establishment of a National Grains Council. You will be asked to approve amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Farm Credit Act, the Farm Machinery Syndicates Act, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. You will be asked to consider a Canada Development Corporation Act, a Federal Cooperatives Act and an Export Development Corporation Act.

The growth of our population and the changes in the nature of our mobile urban and industrial society lend a new importance to conservation in its traditional sense. We have taken and are taking effective strides toward economic conservation through progressively better use of our resources to achieve a high and long-term productivity. We must also give new attention before it is too late to the preservation of our natural heritage for the enjoyment of Canadians of future generations. You will be asked to consider measures concerning National Parks and Historic Sites and Monuments. These and other facilities for the repose of the mind and restoration of the spirit, for sport, and for physical relaxation are and will be of increasing importance to our social environment. They offer Canadians and to visitors to Canada the possibility of a quality of life richly satisfying and ever more difficult to come by in this and in other industrial countries. Of broader importance is the problem of pollution, which must receive increased attention from federal, provincial and municipal governments. My Ministers are actively engaged in preparing proposals on these subjects and, in due course, these will be brought before you for your examination.

The natural riches with which Canada is blessed must serve to remind us that we have a substantial responsibility and a great opportunity in matters of foreign aid. My Government intends to press forward its plans and programs for international cooperation and development which include the establishment in Canada of an International Development Centre.

In international affairs generally, my Ministers regard the current situation as uncertain and deeply disturbing. Talks are under way in Paris concerning Vietnam but so far negotiations have not advanced as we had hoped they might. The Government has followed with anxiety the attempts to promote a peaceful settlement in Nigeria and has participated actively in international efforts to relieve the sufferings of the civilian population. The situation in Czechoslovakia has also caused the gravest concern to the government, not only for its effects on the prospects of détente and future evolution within Communist countries, but also for its consequences for the freedom and well-being of the Czechoslovak people. For those of them who have to seek refuge in other countries, my Ministers have already taken steps to offer permanent homes in Canada.

The Government has undertaken and is pursuing a thorough review of our external and defence policies. Canada's contribution to NATO, relations with Peking, with Latin America and with Europe are being studied currently. Reviews of our relations with other areas will be undertaken later and, as conclusions are reached, Parliament will be invited to consider them.

The events in other lands to which I have referred are a vivid reminder that our good fortune as Canadians includes rights and freedoms as well as material advantages. They alert us to the need, not only for vigilance in the conservation of our democratic institutions, but also to the importance of constant concern for their improvement. Efficient government, responsive to public requirements and open to public participation, is essential to the meaningful operation of the democratic process. It will be the more vital in the future as technology and science provide new and more immediate means for the dissemination of information and for the involvement, as individuals, of all our people. The Government has already taken steps to review its information services in order to introduce, as soon as possible, improvements by which the flow of information into and out of the government will be more efficient and effective, permitting the people of Canada a continuing, informed, and more active participation in the activities of their government. In addition, as part of the continuing process of modernization and development of governmental machinery, you will be asked during the current session to enact a Government Organization Act. This measure will complete a number of changes in organization and structure announced by the Prime Minister some weeks ago and will complement the Parliamentary reforms so fundamental to the successful operation of our democratic institutions.

The reinforcement and renovation of Parliamentary and administrative machinery and the clearing away of the substantial backlog now outstanding in the legislative program, will free Parliament so that it can come to grips with difficult and pressing problems relating to youth, poverty, regional disparities, urban growth, individual welfare, and the application and encouragement of scientific technology. These subjects are of concern to all governments in Canada and it is clear that a great deal more has to be done than has so far been contemplated. It would be wrong, however, to expect solutions to be found easily or indeed to be found at all except on the basis of close cooperation in good faith between federal, provincial and municipal governments not only in planning but in implementation as well.

To assist in this process it would be useful to have available to all governments an institute where long-term research and thinking can be carried out into governmental matters of all kinds. At the present time there is no such facility available in this country and it is the intention of my Ministers to bring before you in the near future legislation that will fill this most important gap in our governmental apparatus.

Members of the House of Commons:

During the current session you will be asked to appropriate the funds required for the services and payments authorized by Parliament. In addition to this business, the legislative program that the Government proposes is very extensive but many of the items have been seen before or are of an uncontroversial nature. A list of the Bills relating to the matters to which I have referred will be tabled by the Prime Minister later this day and other portions of the program will be brought forward as the session proceeds. It is very important to the proper government of the country in the years ahead that the proposals for the current session be dealt with. In Canada as in other countries of the world democracy today faces a decisive challenge. It must adapt to new circumstances and new demands or fail in its purpose. This challenge is not abstract but a confrontation which you will have to face by virtue of your election to this Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

THE LATE COLIN CAMERON

TRIBUTES TO FORMER MEMBER FOR NANAIMO-COWICHAN-THE ISLANDS

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty this afternoon to pay tribute to the memory of one of the senior members of this house, whose death this summer has prevented him from claiming the seat he won in last June's election. I speak, of course, of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, the late Colin Cameron.

Mr. Cameron's outstanding success at the polls—he contested six federal elections, winning five of them—was exceeded only by the effectiveness of his presence in this chamber. His contributions to the debates of the house were of a consistently high level: Always pertinent, usually provocative and frequently witty. When Mr. Cameron spoke, members were assured of a contribution of the type which has made this place the great institution it is.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Colin Cameron displayed in his person the promise which is Canada. He came to this country as a youth and devoted his energies to farming and to work in shipyards, before turning the greater part of his attention to politics. Using his own talents in this land of opportunity, he came to this house where his lucid mind and forceful debating ability placed him in the forefront. He will not soon be forgotten in this chamber.

Neither will he be forgotten elsewhere in this land. It was part of the measure of this man that the tenacity of purpose which he displayed on the floor was matched by a courtliness and warmth which won him friends on all sides.

Mr. Cameron's loss, Mr. Speaker, will be felt by his family of whom he was so fond, by his party to which he was so loyal, and by this house to which he contributed so much. Canada herself can ill afford the loss of a man of this stature.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all the members of this party I want to join the Prime Minister in paying tribute to the memory and to the contribution made by the late Colin Cameron. He was a member of long standing of this house, and before that of the legislature of British Columbia. He applied his uncommon wit, intellect and eloquence to the great issues of his time. Simply on that record of three full and active decades in public life he earned the esteem of his countrymen. But I think it was the manner of his service which won for Colin Cameron the immense affection and respect of all who were associated with him.

He was a vigorous partisan, not simply of a party, which he served with distinction, but also of a point of view which he argued and advanced with a rare eloquence. He would set differences aside when the argument was done. I had the privilege of meeting him quite a number of years ago; but like others who came more recently to this house I knew Colin Cameron by his reputation as a spirited debater and a fine and gentle man, and our observations here confirmed that reputation.

This house will miss his vigorous presence, and we extend to his family and to his associates our very genuine sympathy.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témicasmingue): Mr. Speaker, I too, and on behalf of my colleagues, join the right hon. Prime Minister

(Mr. Trudeau) and the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in extending to the family of Mr. Colin Cameron our most sincere condolences.

We had the opportunity of knowing Mr. Cameron in this house during six years; he was a member of parliament for eleven years, after having sat in the legislature of British Columbia for several years. All of us, regardless of our political allegiance, have admired his hard work in this house. He was the financial critic for his party and, from that point of view, we were very much interested in the criticism he voiced. Even though we may not have shared his opinions and criticism, Mr. Cameron still was a model member, a member who minded his own business, a man who brought something worthwhile to the House of Commons, as well for the government as for the opposition.

The house will certainly suffer from the loss of this inveterate worker. In any event, the memory of Mr. Cameron dwells with us and we offer to his family our most sincere condolences.

[English]

Mr. David Lewis (Yorth South): Mr. Speaker, the words which have been spoken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) are very deeply appreciated not only by the members of my party who are in this chamber but also by thousands of our members across the country, and most particularly by the family who survive Mr. Cameron.

I had known him for over 30 years. We worked together in the C.C.F. party as in the New Democratic party and I learned, with all my colleagues in our party, to admire and respect Mr. Cameron as much in disagreement as in agreement.

We found him always, if I may put it this way, a civilized human being, a human being with compassion for others, a human being with sensitivity about other people, a human being with concern not only for the welfare but for the comfort, decencies and relationships among people. That deep human concern expressed itself in the vigour of his opposition as well as in the vigour of his support.

He was a man, as I know, and all others who worked with him for, as I have said, more than three decades in a party know—he was a man who was dedicated beyond exaggeration to the improvement of the human condition not only in his own land but in lands all across the world. He was, when one knew him personally, as deeply affected by the hunger and deprivation of millions of people in Asia, Africa or elsewhere in the world as he was by the hunger and suffering of people here in his own country.

It was this profound dedication to the welfare of human beings that made him stand out among his peers in this country. Added to that was an appreciation of language, a respect for the nuance of words and a poetic turn of phrase which made the expression of his concern for humanity a delight to listen to.

We are grateful to the Prime Minister, and to the others who have spoken, for their kind words about a colleague whom we in this party miss profoundly, as does this house.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an order in council appointing the Hon. George James McIlraith, Solicitor General of Canada, the Hon. Charles Mills Drury, President of the Treasury Board, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the Hon. Donald Stovel Macdonald, President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 143 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, intituled: An act respecting the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.32 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 13, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INTRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT BILLS IN BILINGUAL FORM

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have had conversations with hon. members in various corners of the house and I understand that the house generally would agree to have government bills introduced in bilingual form.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

PROPOSED CONTINUATION OF PROVISIONAL RULES FOR CURRENT SESSION

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the government has put before members of the opposition parties a number of suggestions with respect to dealing with the procedures of the house, both dealing with them on an interim basis—that is to say for the period of this particular session—and to provide a framework within which suggestions for procedural reform could be considered and dealt with by the house.

It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that there is not general agreement to the full nature of these suggestions put forward by the government, but it would be, in my opinion, perhaps reasonable if we could, on these particular discussions at least, proceed from the known territory in which the house has been operating for the last three sessions; that is to say, from the basis of the provisional rules which were in effect in the house up until the dissolution of parliament on April 23.

On that basis, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the house that we adopt that particular proposal and put into effect the provisional rules as they stood on April 23, 1968 for the period of the current session, unless of course in the interim the house makes any changes. If there is agreement to that proposition then I would be prepared to move a motion along that line.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I have the leave of the house to make some comments which normally I would not be able to do. We in this party are in accord that some interim arrangements should be made as soon as possible covering the 1968 session. We are not in agreement with the government as to the nature of those interim arrangements. We also feel that as soon as possible measures should be taken to undertake basic, fundamental and far reaching reforms.

These two questions are tied together and ought to be the subject of discussion and debate in the house as soon as we can reach an arrangement under which this issue may be debated.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to make it clear that we in this party were willing to agree to the immediate reinstatement of the provisional rules. Since there was not unanimous agreement that this be done, we are prepared to participate in further negotiations, hoping we can arrive very shortly at something upon which we can all agree.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, have no objection to continuing with the procedure we have been using during the last session. Therefore, we are not opposed to keeping the provisional rules in force until parliament has made a decision on the necessary changes to procedure and, until then, we have no objection to using the provisional rules, as we have been doing.

EXTERNAL AID

BIAFRA—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO RENDER ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the tens of thousands of Biafrans dying weekly of starvation, and in view of the failure to date of the government of Canada to pursue with energy and concern any plan to bring assistance to those starving civilians, will the Prime Minister tell the house what measures the government of Canada proposes to take even at this late date to avert what threatens to be one of the great tragedies of modern times?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to answer this question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no government has been more active in trying to bring to an end this horrible war in Nigeria, and no government has been more generous in providing relief supplies to deal with the great suffering and starvation existing in that country.

An hon. Member: Can they reach Biafra?

Mr. Sharp: Unfortunately it has been impossible for the International Red Cross, which is the association we have agreed upon as being the instrument best suited for the purpose, to reach agreement with the Nigerian and Biafran authorities as to an adequate route for the provision of supplies. I regret this very much. We have been working to bring about agreement, but this has not yet been possible.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What pressures has Canada brought to bear on the governments of Lagos and Biafra to encourage a mutually acceptable arrangement for the shipment of relief supplies to Biafra?

Mr. Sharp: As much pressure as we could bring to bear, Mr. Speaker. We have been in constant contact with the government in Lagos. Nevertheless, I think the Leader of the Opposition will agree that the best instrument which can be of help in these circumstances is an international agency such as the International Red Cross, the motives of which are beyond reproach. That body could do this work most effectively. I take it that hon. gentlemen on this side of the house and on the other side will agree that we ought to continue to work through the International Red Cross.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs not agree that this matter is of such concern to the conscience of mankind that steps ought to be taken through the United Nations to bring pressure to bear on Britain, the U.S.S.R. and all those who supply arms to the combatants in Nigeria, and to bring pressure to bear through the United Nations to permit international agencies of the United Nations to bring relief to the starving people of Biafra?

Mr. Sharp: I agree with the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition that it is incumbent on all the peoples of the world to try to bring to an end this conflict which is causing so much suffering. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Canadian government is as active in this connection as any other government in the world, and it is our desire, as it is his, that this conflict be ended. At the moment, however, the situation is this. The question has been referred to the Organization for African Unity, and the people of Africa have an even greater interest than have the people in any other part of the world in bringing this conflict to an end. We believe that if efforts are to be made to bring this matter before the United Nations that action should be taken, at this time at least, by those who are seized with the problem immediately, that is to say the African states themselves.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand that the position taken by the government is that the niceties of international arrangements are to stand in the way of the relief, or of effective pressure to bring relief, to tens of thousands who are in need?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Has the Canadian government been requested to lend or supply Hercules planes to transport supplies to areas of Nigeria affected by the hostilities? Has it agreed to do so and, if not, why not?

Mr. Sharp: The government of Canada has been asked by the International Red Cross to provide Hercules planes for the airlift which that organization had hoped to arrange. Unfortunately for all of us, after agreement has been reached with the Nigerian government the Biafran authorities refused to agree to the airlift. In these circumstances the question whether we should supply Hercules planes is at the moment hypothetical.

However, just as soon as arrangements are made for the use of an airstrip we shall be glad to provide additional aircraft.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask the minister whether in view of present conditions in Biafra the consent of the Nigerian government to the sending of planes to that part of the country might not be dispensed with in the interest of humanity?

Mr. Sharp: I think the hon. gentleman misunderstood me. The objection is coming from the Biafran authorities, not from the Nigerian government.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Is the minister in a position to tell us whether any Canadian aid supplies have as yet reached Biafra? If so, can he indicate their extent?

Mr. Sharp: The supplies we provided were first landed in Lagos. They have now been moved forward by the International Red Cross to areas to which that body has access in Nigeria. They are being used very effectively, I can assure the hon. member, for the relief of suffering in that part of the country. I regret very much, as I am sure we all do, that these supplies have not reached Biafra, but all the fault is not on one side in this connection.

Mr. Nesbitt: What are these supplies? Can the minister tell us?

[Later:]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could the Prime Minister say whether the government intends to intervene as concerns England—which he knows well—to stop the shipment of arms to the federal troops in Nigeria now guarding the Shell Company oil wells?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should merely like to mention that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already replied to this question, but that he might like to add something.

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, has the Shell Company contributed to the election fund of the party?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED ACTIVITIES OF FRENCH OFFICIAL IN MANITOBA

[Translation]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister recently criticized rather strongly some of the activities in Manitoba of a certain Mr. Rossillon, from France. Can he tell us whether the government has lodged an official protest with the French government concerning Mr. Rossillon's visit to Canada?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there was a meeting between officials of the Department of External Affairs and the French ambassador to Canada, and the Canadian policy is as outlined by me during a press conference some days ago. There is a cultural agreement between France and Canada, and we are glad that France is willing to promote the development of the French culture of Canadians. We wish it would do so through cultural agreements, and we made this known to the French authorities.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO MEET UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the absence of any reference to unemployment in the speech from the throne, and in view of the cancellation of the municipal winter works program, can the Prime Minister inform the house of the plans the government has to deal with the increase in the already high rate of unemployment which is anticipated to take place in the winter months?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There are many references in the speech from the throne to the many-pronged attack on the problem of poverty. One will be to ensure that there is increased productivity and, as the hon. member knows, there are already programs under way under our manpower department to attack the problems of unemployment. The whole purpose of the government is to replace programs which are a burden on the public purse and which are not as productive as the programs with which they are being replaced and will be replaced in the future.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lewis: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that some of the suggestions made in the throne speech are bound to take some considerable time before they have effect, has the government any immediate plans to deal with the increase in unemployment this winter by the provision of some works that would be productive and useful, or does it have any other plans that would absorb unemployment this winter?

Mr. Trudeau: As I just said, Mr. Speaker, the other plans are that we have manpower retraining and manpower mobility programs, and in the winter months these are being increased. They will be used to employ the unemployed in a productive way and make them more productive to the economy than was the case before.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, since the winter works program is a shared cost program with the provinces, could the Prime Minister tell us if the government consulted the provinces before deciding to bring it to an end?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the winter works program was discussed several times with the provinces. They knew that each year the possibility of putting an end to such works and replacing them with more productive ones was discussed and we informed the provinces this year of our decision.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, were the provinces advised before the Prime Minister made a statement? Were the provinces consulted?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as I said, the provinces knew that the program was being reviewed and they were waiting for our answer. We gave them our answer, which was negative.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, after the many protests received from Canadian municipalities, could the Prime Minister tell us whether the government contemplates reconsidering the matter of the winter works program, especially for the coming winter, with a view to using this program to fight efficiently against unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, we do not contemplate returning to that program.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

There were many protests but also a great number of congratulations from several municipalities which realized that the winter works program had not, in recent years, served its true purpose, that is the productive employment of Canadian workers in centres where the need was the greatest.

[English]

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FEDERAL MINIMUM WAGE PROVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Since the Prime Minister has stated that he agrees with the finding of the Economic Council of Canada that poverty in Canada is a national disgrace, and since the commission has reported that a great deal of this poverty occurs because people who are working are not receiving sufficient wages to enable them to bring up their families in decency and reasonable comfort, do the Prime Minister and the government intend in the very near future to increase the minimum wage as it applies to industries under federal jurisdiction, particularly as this would be an incentive or an example to the provincial governments?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will have to ask the Minister of Labour whether he has that under consideration.

Hon. B. S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour is always conscious of the needs of the working man in this country, and will give consideration to the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. Hees: Does the Prime Minister in the very near future intend to call a conference with the provincial premiers to discuss this very vital problem?

Mr. Trudeau: The question asked by the hon. member is one relating to wages, costs, prices and incomes. Our attack seeks to ensure that inflation will be curtailed in Canada. We believe this will be the best attack on the problem.

Mr. Hees: Can we take it then that the Prime Minister and his government intend to do absolutely nothing in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

GRAIN

PROPOSED STEPS TO TRANSPORT AND DRY CURRENT CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Having in mind the recent expensive wage settlement can he assure the house and the country that every effort will be made to get grain moving off the prairies, in view of what apparently will be a very difficult harvest and because it is of the utmost importance that grain begin to move in huge quantities?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It goes without saying that every effort will be made to get it off. The chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board a few weeks ago indicated that this was a "wheat crisis" situation, and that 175 million bushels had to be put in position for export purposes before the closing of navigation in the seaway. This will be done in the most efficacious and most dynamic way possible.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): What steps have been taken or are planned to handle the very large amount of damp grain likely to be harvested in western Canada this year?

Mr. Pepin: I have a list of 16 items, but I think I would be cut off short if I attempted to list them now. The Canadian Wheat Board and private grain firms are at work in every part of the world in an effort to obtain new sales. As everybody knows, we have some difficulty in respect of the implementation of international grain arrangements. A meeting of exporters is taking place at Canberra this week and another meeting will take place in London in a few weeks of the price review commission question. At the same time as we try to protect the price structure, every opportunity is being explored to maximize our sales.

Mr. Harkness: I do not know whether the minister caught the import of my question. I asked what steps have been taken or are being planned in order to handle the large amount of damp grain which is likely to be harvested. In other words, have the interior elevators been cleared so their drying facilities and so on will be available?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pepin: I am sorry if I did not catch the purport of the hon. gentleman's question. The drying facilities are mostly at the lakehead, and in the past weeks have not been available because of the strike. I am informed, however, that these facilities will be working on a 24 hour basis now to dry as much grain as possible.

Mr. Horner: Can the minister assure the house that during the long strike and wage negotiations no markets for Canadian wheat were lost?

Mr. Pepin: I cannot give this assurance, because this is an area of psychology. I do not know whether because of the strike some importers decided to buy elsewhere. They will not tell us, anyway. However, I know of no specific case of the specific loss of a market because of that strike.

Mr. Horner: Then, I assume there must have been losses.

[Later:]

Hon. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, since the strike at the lakehead tied up all grain movements for 57 days and the same route was also tied up prior thereto by the seaway strike, what special action is contemplated by the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Agriculture to ensure that maximum movement takes place through that channel for export and domestic use until the freeze-up ties up the waterway?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, every effort will be made to see that every available ship is used to transport the maximum amount of grain before freeze-up and to minimize the effects flowing from the strike to the maximum possible extent that weather will allow. We shall also add any days at the end of the season that are feasible.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that the president of a major shipping line, Mr. Peter Dalgleysh, has advocated the extension of the shipping season at Churchill? Is consideration being given to the extension of the shipping season there in order to facilitate the movement of grain?

Mr. Hellyer: I am not aware of this suggestion but I know that the question of extending the shipping season at Churchill is under study with regard to both the short and the long term, as well as the possibility of using new icebreaking techniques to assist in extending the season. That matter has been under study by the department for some time and is one of the more interesting research projects that we now have under way.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is the government giving consideration to taking early action to increase the pensions of retired civil servants as recommended unanimously by a joint committee of the last parliament?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): This matter is under continuing consideration by the government. No decision in the matter has been made at this time.

Mr. Knowles: May we expect a decision on the matter in the next few weeks?

Mr. Benson: In due course, Mr. Speaker.

RESEARCH

USE OF SUGGESTED SITE FOR PROPOSED TELESCOPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What are the government's plans regarding the future use of the Mount Kobau site and the Queen Elizabeth observatory in British Columbia?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we are consulting universities, government departments and our own astronomers have under very serious consideration a more useful application for this site. Investigations are not yet complete but every effort will be made to find a valid and useful application for it.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he would be prepared to make public these studies by scientists into this program and its discontinuance. Will he make those studies public?

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Greene: I will consider the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he does not think it essential to keep this instrument in service in order to keep in touch with the high cost of living.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REVIEW OF POSITION FOLLOWING OCCUPATION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in view of the unrest in western Europe over the rape of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet union I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any action has been taken by the Canadian government to strengthen our commitment to NATO in the interest of restoring world peace?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government continues to be a member of NATO and is participating in all the discussions which are taking place in respect of the implications of the invasion of Czechoslovakia. Our position in that respect remains unchanged.

IMMIGRATION

STEPS TO ASSIST REFUGEES FROM CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, has the Canadian government made arrangements with our embassies in Europe to make sure that the Czechoslovakian people who want to come to Canada may do so easily?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I could answer that question in part, but I think it would be more properly directed to the minister of immigration.

Mr. Fairweather: I would like an answer, and I do not really care who gives it.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, let me assure my hon. friend that special arrangements have been made with all our immigration officers in Europe to treat Czechoslovakian refugees on a priority basis. A relaxation of procedures has been undertaken so that refugees interested in coming to Canada may be processed as speedily as possible.

Mr. Fairweather: Did these special arrangements include having the embassy in Vienna remain open on Labour day?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, what special financial arrangements have been made to assist these Czechoslovakian immigrants to come to Canada and to establish themselves here after they arrive?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, special arrangements have been made and we are attempting to treat these refugees as the Canadian government treated Hungarian refugees some years ago. Where necessary financial assistance will be available to help them or to pay their transportation costs and the settling-in costs of these refugees in Canada.

Mr. Harkness: What is the per capita financial assistance that is provided?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is no way of determining the per capita amount. Each refugee will have to be treated as an individual case. Normally we would help or pay the transportation costs and their settling-in expenses in Canada, at least until they are able to obtain self sustaining employment. We have not enough experience as yet to know what the per capita cost will be, and I am sure it will vary in individual cases.

Mr. Harkness: Has the minister any idea what length of time this support will continue after the refugees arrive here and until they find employment, learn the language and so forth?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not think it is possible to say how long this will be necessary. We may get a very adaptable group of refugees with a high degree of skills, and it may be in many cases that it will not be necessary to provide any kind of settling-in assistance. I cannot give any estimate of the required length of time.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to make available these very generous provisions and the relaxation of the regulations to assist those refugees who have escaped from red China and are now in Hong Kong. Perhaps the minister did not hear my question or does not intend to answer it. Would he like me to rephrase it?

Mr. MacEachen: I have not given that question any consideration as yet.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Obviously.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, while we are dealing with the subject of Czechoslovakian refugees perhaps I could ask the minister of immigration or the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the flow of refugees already arriving in Canada includes only those Czechoslovakians who were caught outside that country at the time of the Russian occupation, or whether there are refugees coming now who left after that occupation.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to deal with all Czechoslovakian refugees on the same basis. I think the hon. gentleman will also understand that our concern is in respect of the Czechoslovakian people as a whole, including those who got out of the country and those who remain. He must also be aware that we should be very careful in dealing with this question so that we do not in any way prejudice the safety and well being of those Czechoslovaks who cannot get out.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, would the minister of immigration inquire into the allegations that Czechoslovakian refugees who have applied to Canadian offices in Dusseldorf, Cologne and Vienna have been told it will take at least two months before they obtain visas?

Mr. MacEachen: I think this situation may have prevailed before the special instructions went out to all immigration officers. Certainly at the present time there is no justification whatever for this statement being made or for this practice to be followed. It is not necessary to wait that length of time at all.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the minister indicate to the house when these special instructions went out to which he has just referred?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not have the date before me, but certainly the instructions went out early last week, just as soon as it was possible to determine the extent of the problem and to examine the procedures necessary to meet it. These instructions are now in application, and refugees in Europe will be treated under these relaxed provisions.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CHURCHILL, MAN.—NEGOTIATIONS ON DEVELOPMENT OF TOWNSITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position at this time to indicate when representatives of his government will be ready to confer with representatives of the province of Manitoba in relation to the recommended development of the townsite of Churchill, Manitoba?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I talked to the premier of Manitoba quite recently, and I indicated to him as I indicate to the house that I will look into this. It is a new problem for me, but not for the government. We will make sure that any undue red tape is cut away and that the matter is dealt with expeditiously.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpèque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works and ask when he will be in a position to make a statement with regard to the progress being made as to means which will be used by the government to honour its commitment to build a causeway to Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member might have addressed this question to his colleague the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who I think made a statement on this subject the other day. I want to tell the house that the hon. member for Hillsborough apparently knows more than I do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: What else is new?

Mr. Laing (Vancouver South): I am surprised that hon. members opposite applaud a statement by a member of their party that the project is not being proceeded with. I would assure the house that this matter is under continuing and most intense study in relation to other projects that are contemplated to relieve the economic situation in that area. When a decision is taken, I am quite certain it will be made in this house.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister what he did with McNaughton's bulldozer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROTECTION AGAINST PASSENGERS CARRYING WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the unpleasant habit of hijacking aircraft has now spread to Canada, would the minister look into the possibility of ensuring that passengers armed with dangerous weapons do not go aboard aircraft?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this would be extremely difficult to do, but I can assure my hon. friend that all the people concerned about this trend, the air line pilots, the Department of Transport, the air lines themselves and the Canadian Transportation Commission, are continuously monitoring every possible, reasonable step that can be taken in this regard. I think my hon. friend will appreciate the difficulties involved. The people concerned in this sort of situation are usually, in a sense, irrational, and it is very difficult to preconceive all the circumstances under which an incident might arise.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ATTENDANCE OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AT CONFERENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In the light of the conferences which are currently taking place under the Indian Act, which are attended by native Indian people and officials of the Indian affairs branch, will the minister take steps to ensure that members of parliament interested in this field have an opportunity, officially, to attend these conferences—because parliament will be the body which has to legislate in this respect—in order that they may glean the views of the native people?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, at each of those consultations, I sent an invitation to the members concerned in the province where they were held and I intend to continue inviting all the hon. members of this house to attend the consultations at the provincial level.

[English]

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would give consideration to the provision and paying of legal counsel for the Indian band representatives attending these meetings.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are taking all the necessary means to help the Indians be well prepared for those consultations.

As for the consultations now under way, they are the first series. This is an entirely new process for the Indians. We understand their difficulties, but I can assure the hon. member that there will be a second series of consultations and, at that time, the Indians will be still better prepared to contribute to the conferences.

[English]

Mr. Simpson: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister could assure the house that this request which I have put forward will be given consideration, and that it will be legal counsel of the Indian people's choice?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I shall examine this possibility.

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION IN EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister inform the house about an eventual decision of his department as regards the construction of an international airport at Farnham, or in the eastern townships?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not yet in a position to indicate to the house which site will be chosen for the international airport. A number of regions were studied by the consulting engineers who were retained for that purpose. They have made their recommendations to the department. More recently we have been in consultation with the provincial government to discuss with them the provision of ground services—for example, the ground transportation—to whatever site might be chosen. These discussions will continue at the technical level, and it is my hope that we can take a decision with respect to the site sometime before the first of December.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could the minister also consider the construction of an international airport at Rouyn-Noranda?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will notice that I have exercised considerable leniency this morning, but I hope hon. members will not take advantage of the situation to promote the construction of airports in all the constituencies of Canada.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Transport tell me when construction will begin for the Victoriaville regional airport?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that this question be entered first in orders of the day.

[English]

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN CASH ADVANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that western farmers are suffering from a dire shortage of cash due to the low grain marketings, would the minister assure the house that the proposed legislation to provide double the amount of interest free cash advances on farm stored grain will receive top priority in the government's legislative program for this session?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the priorities of the government's legislative program, I suppose this question would be more properly directed to the house leader or the Prime Minister. However, I think indications have been given a number of times through the press that this matter does have high priority now.

TRANSPORTATION

CONSIDERATION OF PROBLEMS OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister indicate the government's intentions with regard to the chronic and long time problems relating to transportation in the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are concerned with this subject. It is one of very real importance not just to the region involved but to all of Canada. The Canadian Transportation Commission is undertaking studies in relation to the transportation problems of the Atlantic region and I hope they will have a report, at least of an interim nature, perhaps some time later this year.

In addition, we still hope some ideas will be coming forward from the Atlantic premiers. We can discuss later all the ideas which are available, in the hope that we can do something constructive to improve the transportation facilities in that part of the country.

Mr. Coates: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate whether it is his intention to have the standing committee on transport and communications once again visit the area and receive briefs? Would he also indicate whether the government intends to provide any special assistance with regard to the l.c.l. rates that have been imposed, which are exorbitant and are causing great hardship at the present time to shippers in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Hellyer: On the first question, Mr. Speaker, the government's position has not changed in respect of a possible visit of the parliamentary committee to the Atlantic region. This is a matter that will have to be considered by the committee when it is formed and has chosen a chairman. We will be glad to discuss with the committee, through the chairman, what might be done once the committee is formed. With regard to the second question, I am not in a position to comment in detail at this moment.

Mr. James McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could the minister indicate whether he has received protests regarding the abandonment of the C.N. passenger service in Newfoundland and the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission in relation thereto, and what action is contemplated by the government?

Mr. Hellyer: I have received protests, Mr. Speaker. I think my hon. friend will agree that we all regret the abandonment of passenger services in various parts of the country. This is part of a change in the way of living of our society to which it is difficult to adjust, but my hon. friend will also agree that technological changes are taking place in our society and that the trend is to the greater use of aeroplanes and road transportation. It is also a fact that as the cost of train travel rises and the number of people who use the train service declines, it becomes increasingly impossible to maintain all the services which have been provided in the past. That is the reason, I presume, the Canadian Transport Commission has allowed the abandonment. I regret, as does my hon. friend, the inconvenience caused to some people, but it seems to be part of a trend that is more or less irresistible.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary question. Would the minister give consideration to withholding a decision in this matter until the committee has had a chance to sit in Newfoundland?

Mr. Hellyer: I am not sure I have the power to do that, Mr. Speaker. I think this is a matter for the Canadian Transport Commission. However, I believe this decision is subject to appeal, and to the best of my knowledge—although I could be wrong—no appeal has been launched up to the present time.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I wish to direct to the Minister of Transport, asking why only the Newfoundland railway passenger service was discontinued in view of the fact that all C.N. rail passenger services across Canada are costing money. Bearing this in mind, when are plans to be finalized for the discontinuance of railway passenger services in other provinces of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question might be considered argumentative.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Could the hon. minister inform us of the results of his conversations with the premier of the province of Quebec in June last concerning the Lauzon shipyards?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is public property and was published in the newspapers.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, has the Prime Minister considered the possibility of applying some Social Credit financial solutions to achieve his just society?

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether he intends to introduce at an early date legislation providing for the creation of a commission to look after the political appointment of defeated candidates in the next election, as often happens these days?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is out of order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL PARKS

QUEBEC—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Is it true that negotiations are under way at the present time between Quebec and Ottawa, as to the establishment of national parks in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will meet the hon. Minister of Tourism of the province of Quebec, here, next Wednesday, so as to discuss this very important subject.

[English]

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

REQUEST FOR GRANT BY FOLK ARTS COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he is in a position today to announce whether the Treasury Board will support the urgent request of the Canadian Folk Arts Council for a federal grant to travel to Mexico to take part in a cultural program at the Olympic games.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, maybe this question has not been settled to the complete satisfaction of the Folk Arts Council, but the department acted to the best of its ability and knowledge.

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT ON PENSION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs—prefacing it by my congratulations to him on assuming that portfolio—and ask him whether, in view of the serious situation among many veterans, the government proposes to bring in legislation in this session to implement the recommendations of Mr. Justice Woods.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the right hon. member for Prince Albert for his kind remarks. Of course I will do my utmost to be worthy of the confidence which has been vested in me, and will work for the welfare of veterans in Canada in a just society.

In reply to his question may I say it is our intention to have the Woods committee report referred to the House of Commons committee on veterans affairs as quickly as possible, and to act on the recommendations of that committee as soon as we receive them.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I wish to ask the minister whether he or the government is taking action at this time to provide further funds for veterans under the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, the amount made available under the V.L.A. was $74 million, which is 25 per cent more than the average for the past five years. This amount is being taken up very quickly, but we must remember that the veterans will have until 1974 to avail themselves of this fund.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the report of the Woods committee is referred to the veterans affairs committee, will that committee also be given authority to consider the position of those living on the war veterans allowance?

Mr. Dubé: Of course it is up to the house to specify the exact terms of reference which will be made to the committee.

TRADE

PROHIBITION ON SALE OF CANADIAN TURBOT IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister made any recommendations to Washington regarding the recent decision of the U.S. government to prohibit the sale of Canadian turbot on the U.S. market under the brand name of Greenland halibut? This represents about $11 million a year to the Canadian fisheries.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I can assure the hon. member that this matter has been very much engaging the attention of the Department of External Affairs, which has been working on behalf of Canadian producers.

HARBOURS

ROBERTS BANK, B.C.—PROPOSED LOCATION OF RAILWAY LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can he say whether representations have been received from municipalities and other groups in British Columbia protesting the proposed route of the Roberts Bank railroad? If so, what consideration has been given to this matter?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Representations have been received from a number of groups and from a number of British Columbia members of parliament, one of whom was the hon. member for New Westminster. The siting of the proposed railway line is a provincial responsibility in so far as it is a provincial railway being built within a province, and therefore the choice of the site and the responsibility for it comes under the jurisdiction of the provincial government. At the same time I do not think anyone could disclaim interest in this problem, which is of considerable importance to the people in the lower mainland and indeed to all Canadians. I can tell my hon. friend that as late as yesterday, I believe, the two major railways involved have again been in consultation with the local municipalities concerned, and discussions are continuing. I understand also there is now a liaison with the regional planning board for the lower mainland.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as minister in charge of housing. In view of the absence of any specific reference to housing in the Speech from the Throne, is he preparing any legislation to put before this session of parliament to deal with the growing housing crisis and the very serious, galloping increases in rents in Canada?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the conclusion should not be drawn, because there is no reference in the Speech from the Throne, that there will not be legislation dealing with this subject.

Mr. Lewis: This is why I am asking the question.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to answer it if the hon. member will give me the opportunity. The task force which is beginning its work in Ottawa on Monday will, I hope, report to the Canadian people and to the government of Canada by the end of the year. It is my expectation that following this report legislation will be introduced in parliament, probably in the latter part of this session but hopefully in time to have some influence on next year's construction program.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister inform the house whether the object of the task force, which I understand from press reports he is heading, is to find some solution to the problem or for the minister to indicate to the people coming before it what his solutions are?

Mr. Hellyer: I am sure my hon. friend would not be so lacking in charity as to believe that this inquiry is not a genuine search for the facts related to this very serious problem in our country, and also to obtain from all interested parties everywhere in Canada all of the ideas they may have in respect of possible solutions. This is the purpose of the task force. If in the process I can make any contributions, along with the other members of the task force, the hon. member can be assured I shall be happy to do so.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask a further supplementary question? In view of the many inquiries undertaken and reports published over the years on this problem, will the minister be kind enough to inform the house what areas of facts he is so ignorant about that he requires a further task force?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister about the studies conducted by his predecessor in this field. Is there no information available from these studies that could assist the minister in arriving at a decision on this subject?

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he is making any plans, prior to receiving the report of the task force to which reference has been made, to alleviate the very urgent housing situation in Canada, and particularly with regard to the possibility of funds being made available for the conversion of old homes into emergency housing units?

Mr. Hellyer: Every effort is being made to increase the supply of housing, which in the long run is going to be the best solution to the housing crisis. I am sure the hon. member will be pleased to know that the anticipated rate of production this year is going to exceed the government's goal of 175,000 units and may go as high as 185,000 units. This is a step in the right direction, and it includes the whole range of construction from apartment buildings to single family units, reconversions and so on. I think we are making giant steps forward but the need is great and there is more to be done.

[Later:]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport who is also in charge of housing. Is anything being done about the housing crisis that is facing university students? As the house knows, this is a very serious problem all across Canada, especially at this time of year. Is anything specific being done in this connection?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is making loans in the amount of millions of dollars for this purpose.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question. Could the minister indicate whether any students have camped on his lawn in the past few days?

Mr. Hellyer: Many of them.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

BREAD—REQUEST FOR STEPS TO PREVENT PRICE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the minister taken or does he propose to take any steps to prevent an increase in the price of bread to Canadian consumers, who are already overburdened by high food costs while our western granaries are filled to capacity?

Hon. Ron. Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the questions of prices and costs were referred to in the Speech from the Throne. A further statement on these subjects will be made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hales: May I ask a supplementary question? Can the Prime Minister advise the house when we may expect this statement?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, consultations have been conducted with our officials and representatives of the provinces. I have also begun consultations with representatives of labour and management. Our aim is to draw up a white paper which will be submitted for consideration as soon as the consultations have proven conclusive one way or the other.

HOGS—REQUEST FOR INCENTIVE TO INCREASE QUALITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether any consideration has been given to restoring immediately to its former level the bonus on premium grade hogs. If not, is any other form of incentive being considered by which we might encourage the production of quality bacon?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend is aware of our new grading procedures for determining high quality hogs. I am sure these will be beneficial in encouraging production of the kind of hog that is most acceptable to the consumer.

MANITOBA—PROVISIONS FOR HARVESTING GRAIN AND POTATOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he say whether officials of his department are engaged in drawing up contingency programs to be applied in the event the grain and potato harvesting situation in Manitoba worsens?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Of course the Department of Agriculture has responsibility for the Board of Grain Commissioners, which in turn administers the terminals at Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton and Lethbridge. There are in those terminals facilities for drying about 7,000 bushels of grain per hour. We are taking steps now to make sure there is sufficient space around these drying facilities so they can be used if and when they are needed. What we need even more, however, is three or four weeks of bright sunshine, which would obviate the necessity for using these facilities. I can assure my hon. friend that steps are being taken to make the maximum use of the facilities.

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture whom I congratulate on his new appointment.

While the minister is reviewing the western grain policy, could he also consider a dairy policy for eastern Canada and the province of Quebec and let us know about it in the near future?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): We have had consultations with the Canadian Dairy Commission and with many producers in Quebec as well as elsewhere in eastern Canada concerning their particular commodities and problems. As a matter of fact, about a week ago I made a trip to Quebec city and I had interesting discussions with some farmers who were there that evening. As a result I am better acquainted with some of their problems.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture who will easily grasp its meaning since he is a former Social Crediter.

I would like to know if the Minister of Agriculture knows about the matter and if he is now making some arrangements to have the subsidies paid to the milk producers, as they are complaining that they have not received anything since April and it is now almost October.

[English]

Mr. Olson: If there are any Quebec producers who are not receiving their payments from the dairy commission, I would be very happy to have the matter investigated if the hon. member would send me the names of the particular producers he has in mind.

FARM MACHINERY

STEPS TO BRING ABOUT PRICE STABILITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul Yewchuck (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the prices of farm products and farm machinery. As the house knows, prices of farm products have not gone up in the past 15 to 20 years to any significant degree; yet prices of farm machinery have more than doubled in that period. Could the minister tell me what specific steps he is taking to introduce some measure of stability in regard to the price of farm machinery so as to enable the farmers to continue their farming operations?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that this question as asked should be answered by way of a statement on motions rather than by way of an answer at this time.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—RENEWAL OF U.S.-CANADA AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the auto pact between Canada and the United States been renewed? If not, is it likely to be?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It is not necessary for the agreement to be renewed, since it was signed for an indefinite period. What we saw these past few days was a review of the Canada-U.S. agreement, and I feel that the review, as already mentioned, has been concluded to the satisfaction of Canadian producers.

There were talks also between the minister and Canadian manufacturers of automobiles and parts. Those talks are to be resumed at the beginning of next year. This is to make sure that the automobile agreement will bring the best possible results in the best interest of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the recent negotiations or discussions did the Canadian government make any effort with the Canadian automotive companies and also with their parent firms in the United States to bring about, if possible, similar pricing policies on both sides of the border, that is to say, policies established by the companies themselves and not by the dealers?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, this is a very broad problem. I was not on my feet at the right time this morning, Mr. Speaker, and I was supposed to table, as I will do on Monday, letters received from the automobile manufacturers in Canada giving me assurance that they fully agree with the spirit of the present operation of the pact and that they intend to continue to do so. I have also said previously to the press that I have received from the three or four most important manufacturers some idea of their intentions for the year 1969. These intentions have been reviewed and have been found satisfactory by the department and the minister. I also met with the auto parts manufacturers and answered most of their questions, I think. In this morning's Financial Post they declare that they are optimistic about the future. So I think that the situation in this field is one in which we can all take pride. Pricing policies are not under my control, but I understand that the differential between U.S. and Canadian prices is getting narrower.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister also consider tabling, either on Monday or some day soon, the result of the review of the auto parts agreement which he said had already been concluded? Have there been any changes, etc. and, if so, can we see what they are?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I issued a communiqué about two weeks ago and I will table it at the same time as the letters to which I referred.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—ACCEPTANCE OF INVITATION TO SEND OBSERVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The press reported recently that the Canadian government had received an invitation from the government of Nigeria to send observers to the areas of conflict in that country. Would the minister inform the house whether or not such invitation has been received and, if so, whether or not the Canadian government intends to send observers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government and the governments of Britain, Poland and Sweden, the United Nations Organization and the Organization for African Unity all received invitations of this kind. As the Prime Minister stated in his press conference yesterday, we have very serious misgivings about this proposal and are not altogether satisfied that the conditions relating to the activities of such observers are adequate for the purpose. We want to be sure that the observer can have freedom of access and so on.

However, acceptances have now been received by the Nigerian federal government from Sweden, Britain and the United Nations Organization, and notwithstanding our misgivings we feel that if there is going to be an international team of this kind we should participate. Its purpose, as the house knows, is to observe the conduct of the military operations and to avoid slaughter if possible.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the government has decided in principle to send an observer. He is Major General W. A. Milroy, who is currently commandant of the Canadian land forces command and staff college at Kingston, Ontario. I will be issuing a statement today on the conditions relating to Canadian participation.

TRADE

CORN—REQUEST FOR DUTY AGAINST U.S. IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue but in his absence perhaps I may direct it to the Minister of Agriculture inasmuch as it concerns both departments. My question relates to the importation of United States corn into southwestern Ontario at the time of our harvest season. I am sure the minister is aware of this situation. What steps are being taken to speed up action by the department concerned to impose protective duties on a temporary basis so that our corn harvest may proceed in an orderly manner?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the solution is quite as simple as putting up temporary barriers for this harvest season. One of the basic problems with corn marketing in southern Ontario is the need for an orderly system of marketing that will assure the users of this commodity a uniform supply and quality. There is also need to equate the returns on corn to the growers with the requirements of the users including the feeders who, I am sure my hon. friend realizes, must remain competitive in the North American market.

This problem has been under active consideration. I have had two meetings with representatives of the corn producers and we are exploring several suggested ways of dealing with the problem as a result of the market price having been lowered this year.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Queensway): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the continuing rise in the cost of living would the minister say what immediate steps he has in mind to protect the living standards of the consumers, and does he plan to contact the provincial governments in regard to this matter?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government, as the Prime Minister stated just a few moments ago, is having consultations on the question of prices and costs. In the course of the summer a number of our officials consulted with the provinces on this question.

EDUCATION

ST. LEONARD, QUE.—PROTEST AGAINST CHANGES IN LANGUAGE INSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Can the Prime Minister tell us whether he considers closed the intervention of the federal government in the matter of St. Léonard?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as concerns the protection of public liberties, the task will not be over so long as we have not reached our aim: the insertion in the Canadian constitution of a charter of public liberties binding on all levels of government. As regards school matters specifically, the hon. member knows that they do not come under our jurisdiction and that not only is the matter not closed but that it has not yet started.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PAYMENT UNDER CONTRACTS FOR PERIOD OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Norman Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. During the time of the postal strike a number of rural mail carriers in my riding who are under contract with the Post Office Department were available for work but did not receive payment. I wonder whether the minister intends to make certain that these people are paid. If not, why not?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, obviously any strike affects not only those who go on strike but all those whose operations are affected thereby. An automobile strike affects parts manufacturers, and so on. It is true that those letter carriers, both rural and in city service, who contract to deliver mail were not paid during the time of the strike because there was nothing for them to do. No letters were mailed and no such services were needed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kierans: Prior to the strike the department advised all those with whom it had contracts that their services would be suspended for the duration of that strike. One good example is the Rod Service strike. The strikers rebelled against the company and the company itself made an ex gratia payment. The government will not lose thereby.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): A supplementary question to the Postmaster General. When the government drew up these contracts with the rural mail carriers was there any provision in them to take care of such a situation?

Mr. Kierans: In the contract there is a clause which says that the Post Office Department can change routes, lengthen them, diminish them or reduce services partially. In these cases there would obviously be a change in the rates of payment.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Postmaster General not aware that many of these rural mail carriers were told to stand by? Some of them had to be on call every day. This prevented them from taking other employment. Would the minister also please reply to the letter I sent him some weeks ago on this subject?

Mr. Kierans: We advised all field directors and postmasters to advise those with whom they had contracts that the services they perform would not be needed. In one case in particular the postmaster of an area interpreted the contract badly and we have stood by our responsibilities and undertaken to pay that contractor who was told to be on standby, although we shall do so only when the proof is made available to us.

Mr. Gerald Laniel (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Postmaster General a supplementary question.

Is he aware of a clause in the contracts providing that the Postmaster General will have to give a 50 per cent compensation for breach of contract in case of failure to give three months notice? Consequently, I daresay this clause might allow the department to grant a 50 per cent compensation to the contractors.

Mr. Kierans: That clause does not apply in the case of a strike or in the case of services rendered by contractors, where rural and urban services are concerned. That particular clause applies only when it is decided to cancel the contract.

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question.

In my opinion, the notice which was sent by the Post Office Department to the contractors for a discontinuance of service, represents all the same a temporary breach of contract.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This has developed into an argument, a debate.

REQUEST FOR PRIORITY FOR SHIPMENTS OF EASTERN FEED GRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the feed grain harvest in eastern Canada, has the minister agreed to grant priority to the transportation of livestock feed grain to eastern Canada?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure how much grain the Canadian Feed Grain Board had to bring into eastern Canada by rail while the strike was on at the Lakehead but I know they were taking steps to make certain that a sufficient quantity of feed grain was on hand to meet immediate requirements. They have also advised me that they are taking steps to make sure that sufficient quantities are in position to take care of the ensuing feeding season.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in view of the time and considering that the house would normally rise at one o'clock, I think there might be general agreement in the house not to rise at one but to permit the hon. gentlemen to complete their customary speeches even though that may mean that we sit beyond the customary hour of rising. Perhaps that could be made an order of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. EYMARD CORBIN AND SECONDED BY MR. LEN MARCHAND

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate you on your election as Speaker of the house. The remarks made yesterday by the right hon. Prime Minister Mr. Trudeau, by the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and by the leaders of the other parties showed beyond any doubt that you will have the wholehearted support of the members of this house in the discharge of your duties.

Mr. Speaker, the honour which is mine in moving the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne is reflected upon the proud population of Madawaska-Victoria, which I represent here, and upon the whole of New Brunswick. I therefore thank my colleagues for the welcome they gave me.

[Mr. Dumont.]

The right hon. Prime Minister probably entrusted me with this task partly as a result of the warm welcome which he received in June from the people of my riding. He was only the second prime minister of Canada to come to Edmundston to meet the constituents; the first one was Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at the end of the last century. I wish to join my colleagues and my constituents in congratulating the right hon. Prime Minister on his victory and that of the Liberal party at the June 25 election.

The number of new people and young faces which we see for the first time in the house today makes us realize that the June election brought about a welcome rejuvenation in Canadian politics. This perhaps establishes a precedent, but it is also a sure sign that Canadians of all ages are anxious to take an active interest in the affairs of the country. I think that the youth of our Prime Minister, his dynamic personality, his tenacity, and the courage with which he faces our many problems as well as the sincere determination of the members of his cabinet to work for the country have given us a new confidence in Canada as it enters into its second century.

I must also offer my best wishes to the hon. leader of the official opposition and congratulate him upon his personal victory. I am sure that I will find in him a good colleague from the maritimes.

Allow me, on behalf of my colleagues from New Brunswick, to congratulate my predecessor who represented Madawaska-Restigouche for six years and is our new Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé). I am pleased also to call attention to the presence among us of the young 23-year-old member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) who inherited the riding from the former minister of fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) who is now sitting in the other place.

Mr. Speaker, the short time at my disposal does not allow me to praise my riding as I would like to do. I will therefore summarize my thoughts in words used so many times by other hon. members in praise of their own ridings and fellow citizens: "You could not find a more beautiful region in the whole of Canada."

My riding is adjacent both to the American border and the Quebec provincial borders, so that we do not think of ourselves as being ordinary Canadians and we often pride ourselves on living in the "Republic of Madawaska", without pretending however to an international mission or role. We have very cordial relations with the Americans of the state of Maine. On the other hand, a high percentage of our people comes from the province of Quebec, and we are fortunate to maintain excellent relations with these neighbours as well.

One factor which contributes greatly to a Canadian-American rapprochement in the "land of Madawaska" is, besides three international bridges, a ubiquitous American television station with its network of retransmitting stations, broadcasting its programs from the other shore of the St. John river. We are lucky to be able to enjoy that service and it often happens, however paradoxical it may seem, that my fellow-citizens are better informed of events taking place in Portland or in Washington than of those occurring in the national or in the provincial capital.

Such a condition can be explained by a lack of a reliable service provided by a far-reaching French-Canadian television station. There is a good national English network service. We are not complaining about that. But in a constituency where 80 per cent of the population is of French origin and culture and is French-speaking, we must admit that we are far from being satisfied with the French television service at the present time.

There would be several possible solutions, but I will not bother you with that to-day.

What must be well understood in the first place is that the French language television services in Madawaska-Victoria and in New Brunswick are generally inadequate, if not downright disappointing. Considering the justifiable complaints received for more than 12 years from the French population all over New Brunswick, we shall soon have to find a solution acceptable to the majority. Perhaps it will not surprise you either, Mr. Speaker, to hear that in New Brunswick an ever growing number of English-speaking citizens would really like to enjoy the French culture and the French language. In fact as far as the citizens of New Brunswick are concerned, I believe this would give a real boost to national unity.

Hearings by the Canadian Radio Television Council are to be held soon on that point in Moncton and we trust that a remedy to this situation will at last be found.

With regard to present modes of communication between Madawaska-Victoria and the rest of Canada, one must say that the situation has not evolved very much since 1867 compared with the rest of the country. The railroad remains the best mode of transport between Edmundston and Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and Halifax. There is a total lack of air transport. Still, we look more and more to this mode of transport to alleviate our isolation.

On the other hand, the planned corridor road to the neighbouring state of Maine, between the south of New Brunswick and the eastern townships in Quebec, would not likely help our regional economy. The individuals or groups supporting the construction of this route are in earnest about the success of this project, but I oppose it with all my might and I am convinced that my colleague for Temiscouata (Mr. Gendron) agrees wholeheartedly with me in this regard. The so-called Maine corridor-route would indeed be detrimental to the economy of Madawaska-Victoria, to that of northern New Brunswick, of Temiscouata, and all the people settled along the traditional line of communicaiotn between the Maritimes and the heart of Canada would be harmed. If there is a transportation problem in the Maritimes, and we all agree there is, it should be worked out through a Canadian solution.

• (12:30 p.m.)

[English]

I wish to take this opportunity to say how proud I am to represent the Indians of my riding. There are two Indian bands in Madawaska-Victoria. The largest, and perhaps the most progressive of all the Indian communities in the maritimes, is located at Tobique; a much smaller band of Maliseets is located near my home in Edmundston. It had been my intention to talk about some of the very real problems affecting the social evolution of the Indians of New Brunswick, but these problems are not specific to our area. Furthermore, since the seconder of the address, the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), is himself privileged to be a descendant of Canada's first citizens, and the first Canadian Indian to sit in this house, I feel he is most qualified to speak on the subject and I have no hesitation in declaring that the Indians of Canada will have a strong voice to speak on their behalf.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome with a great deal of satisfaction and a deep gratitude, the proposed reform of the Official Languages of Canada Act which is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. That new Official Languages Act will be based on certain recommendations of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism of which the late Mr. André Laurendeau was one of the architects. I never met Mr. Laurendeau but I always read his columns with a great deal of interest. The man is gone but his spirit remains. I am confident that the new legislation on the official languages of Canada will further strengthen our national unity and will bridge the few gaps brought about by repeated attacks against our federative system. It is in that sense that I am especially happy to read in the Speech from the Throne that constitutional reforms remain the best long-term guarantee of Canadian unity and that discussions with the provinces will continue in that direction.

Those statements, Mr. Speaker, were quite warmly welcomed by French-speaking residents in New Brunswick. The contents of the Speech from the Throne are, no doubt, also comforting for all the French Canadians living outside Quebec. It is desirable that English-speaking people living within majority French-speaking groups may also be able to avail themselves of all the benefits provided to them by this new legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Corbin: I represent here the English element of Madawaska-Victoria. Already, I know that my English-speaking constituents approve these projected reforms, which guarantee their own rights as well as those of the French language. It is in this direction that we want to advance in New Brunswick and in Canada. We had to wait a long time for such reforms, but are happy to see that they will finally be seriously submitted to the house.

I have given special attention to the recent statements of the right hon. Prime Minister to the effect that regional economic disparities may threaten national unity, as much as our linguistic and cultural differences.

Those are true words for us in the Maritimes who are looking forward to moving again towards the benefits of a just Canadian society and of a prosperous national economy.

We all noticed in the Speech from the Throne these words emphasizing the necessity of taking fundamental steps toward the betterment and welfare of the Canadian people, the straightening out of possible deviations, the redeeming of sins of omission and the atoning of past mistakes so as to give every citizen an equal opportunity.

I have not yet had the chance to learn about regional problems throughout Canada, but the presence here of members from every part of the country will give me this opportunity. The fact remains however that the economy of the Atlantic region is greatly in need of help, above and beyond anything that has been done for it so far. We shall not be necessarily satisfied with new programs. It is quite possible that rectifying mistakes might bring about more quickly that just society so greatly desired by Canadians and of which this government gives us the assurance.

There has developed in our riding of Madawaska-Victoria in particular, as well as in other regions of Canada, in the last several years, an attitude which I call one of stretched out hands to the government. That way of life has met with the disapproval of many citizens. I am not discussing here the necessity and the real value of numerous public programs of social welfare in which several levels of government take part but I see to what extent an important sector of the population—not to say whole regions—has become completely dependent on the government.

We are really privileged to live in a country which can afford such programs in the first place. But one knows to what extent abuse and dependence on social welfare programs can lead to a real deterioration of human activity and how such abuse shows scorn for those who earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow. That is why we must continue to search together for solutions such as, for instance, the retraining of manpower and other similar measures bringing about tangible and lasting results.

To face this problem, a group of well-informed and far-sighted men set up in my riding, hardly three years ago, a regional development council for north-western New Brunswick (CRANO). Farming has been rapidly outdistanced in the last decades by the tremendous improvement of technology and weakened, as everywhere else in Canada, by the ever-increasing problems of marketing, which put small farms out of business.

CRANO is now considering all areas of economic activity in the designated areas and defining a development plan which will have far-reaching effects if it can be implemented. Of that, I am quite sure.

Just to give you an example, CRANO is endeavouring to create a touristic industry, since the geographical attractions have remained so far utterly unexploited. In this connection, an important touristic project looks auspicious at Grand Falls, in Victoria county, and our citizens are very seriously considering other sites.

We are dealing, Mr. Speaker, with people anxious to study the best ways to better their condition. These people do not want to rely any more on government's charity alone. They have shown up to this day their desire and their ability to assume their own responsibilities. Their action will, in the end, reduce considerably the number of people depending on social welfare.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am Canadian, first and foremost. I belong to that generation, still young, born between the great depression and the second world war. It is with a very deep sense of concern that I sit in this house with colleagues devoted to the growth and the unity of our country. I feel a certain apprehension before the enormous task that lies ahead, and yet we must now get down to serious work.

Before coming to this house, Mr. Speaker, I worked as a newspaperman. I have always found that journalists and politicians both play a very significant role in the general guidance of public opinion and the common weal. Journalists must concern themselves with telling the facts and commenting them in the light of the people and events affected by them. Politicians and political decisions are quite often at the centre of things. To gain favour with the public, politicians and journalists must be mainly concerned with having a highly developed respect for truth, not always an easy thing nowadays.

However, it is with such an attitude and frame of mind that I wish to represent my constituents of Madawaska-Victoria and to work in the general interests of my country. Besides I can not see how, in the present situation, what would be good for Madawaska-Victoria would not also be good for Canada as a whole.

The Address—Mr. Len Marchand

Before I yield to the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) and with his support, I move:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Hon. Roland Michener, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, who was awarded the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

• (12:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo.

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. members of this house for the warm welcome they have extended to me. I am deeply conscious of the honour that has been paid to me in being allowed to speak at this time, an honour shared by my family and my constituents. I should like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his Cabinet colleagues for extending it to me.

Canada has seen many changes in the years since confederation. There have been many changes in society and many changes in government; but there is a special significance in the change brought about by the last election. We have now our first prime minister who was born in this century, a man who may very well be the agency through which Sir Wilfrid Laurier's famous phrase that the twentieth century belongs to Canada may come true. In any case, Canada now truly belongs to the twentieth century.

Our new Prime Minister has shown that Canadians who are dedicated to purposes beyond their own selfish ends can rise rapidly in public life. He has shown that Canadian people will respond to a challenge when that challenge is made clear to them. His career is a demonstration of what we have all known; that in Canada there are thousands, millions of people who believe in the destiny of our land, who believe that we can live together as civilized people, and who believe that we can overcome the barriers of the past—the barriers of language and of prejudice, barriers set up in too many places, and barriers which may hold back those who are not of the majority.

Here in Canada we may seek our goals and, so long as they are not in conflict with the public good, we are free to press onward. When the Prime Minister came to my riding of Kamloops-Cariboo he spoke to the people as though he had known them all his life, and they responded as though they had known him all their lives. Indeed in a certain sense they had, for he is to us all the exemplification of all the best that is present in the Canadian people and of all that is good in Canadian education. He is a man of many talents, a man for all seasons, a man of his times, and above all a man for his country and his countrymen. I am proud that my party, the Liberal party, has found this man who so specially meets the needs of our country, a man who has the special qualifications to meet the problems of today.

There is another historic point this session. We have, for the first time, a Speaker elected on a non-party basis. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you, sir, for you have richly earned the confidence of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I have watched Mr. Speaker from another part of the house many times. I was going to say from up above, but perhaps it might have providential implications. He has always shown unfailing courtesy, tact and wisdom; he has brought the house through many a tricky and sometimes difficult situation. This promises to be a great parliament, a parliament with many challenges, many problems, much work and much to do, but with a great deal of capability to meet the challenges of the times ahead.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, I represent the riding of Kamloops-Cariboo. I am conscious that this part of British Columbia has returned great men to parliament. I am conscious that I am taking the place of a great parliamentarian, a man of whom my constituents have been justly proud.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I hope I can fulfil the expectations of those who supported me, for there were many of them. As I stand here today to speak on behalf of all persuasions in my constituency I am mindful of the obligation and responsibility I have accepted. My constituency is large; it is a rich and varied part of a great and prosperous country; it has within it mines, forests, people engaged in the raising of cattle, sports fishing, hunting and recreational areas unsurpassed in all of Canada.

The natural wealth of this area is being developed by people who have the virtues which made it possible for Canada to be the country it is. Within the borders of my riding lies the first settlement in the interior of British Columbia, the site of the gold rush of the 1850's which began the real development of that great province. The spirit of those who came first, of those who opened that country, lives on in the hearts of the people today; not the greed which sometimes drove man to the goldfields but the courage, perseverance and the will to endure that enabled man to press on through the unexplored wilderness and make his home. My ancestors were there to greet them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Working together the people have created a vigorous community, a community of people who are not afraid of the future, people who believe in Canada and who love it deeply.

There are in British Columbia abundant natural resources. These are richly rewarding, not just to those who work directly to develop them but to all Canada. Although they are rich and although they are abundant, these resources require wise management. They must not be torn from their natural setting with no thought for another day.

If we are to continue with our prosperous life, our resources must be developed and used for the maximum benefit today, as well as the maximum long term benefit. This means planning. This means direction and leadership so that the planning will be in the best interests of all. We have abundant water in Kamloops-Cariboo, but others are not so fortunate. To divert and use this water without adequate planning would serve no one. The only way to benefit all who depend upon this resource is to plan the use in the best interest of the area affected. It is self-evident from our over-all abundance that the needs of Canadians can be fulfilled. It is equally self-evident that in fulfilling these needs we must consider future needs, which may not always be clear without full study.

I am confident the government will show the way by continuing the work of the water resources branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am confident that the government will provide the way by continuing the regional planning and resource use studies which have been so helpful in recent years. With the security of knowing that the best advice possible has been obtained, resource use can be planned in the best interests of all.

This planning must extend to other matters than the use of our resources. It must extend to the future of our economy so that the capabilities of the people are utilized to the best possible extent. An example of the planned benefits which can assist an area can be found in the extension of assistance to truck haulers who bring feed grains into British Columbia. This has meant that the cattle rancher is no longer only a herdsman, but can now get the maximum from his herd. He can fatten his stock and prepare it for the marketplace.

In my riding there is unexcelled range land. The hills and valleys are excellent for raising animals. With the opportunities now available the feed lots will expand and Kamloops will become one of the important areas providing meat for Canadian tables. I hope that members will not misjudge me when I say that the sun-soaked Thompson valley, the wooded north Thompson and the upper reaches of the Fraser make the finest and best riding a member can have the honour to represent.

The people who live in this area are Canadians with all the virtues and defects that other Canadians share. We are no different from others, and we are first of all Canadians. Most are English speaking, at least that is their primary language in day to day life. However, when the Prime Minister spoke to them, partly in French, they cheered. Many of them have told me they intend to learn to speak French. They want to make their fellow Canadians from any part of Canada feel at home when they come to visit, and they want to feel at home in any part of Canada they visit.

These do not seem to be extravagant demands. In fact they seem small. If we can approach our problem of unity in this spirit, other problems can be solved. And they can be solved by the good will of the people, because the people insist that this is one country with two official languages. This country contains divers peoples, some of whom speak French, some of whom speak English and some who speak other languages. Some of them speak Cree and some speak Shuswap, but all are Canadians. I said that when the people heard their Prime Minister speak French they cheered. They cheered even though few understood what was being said; they cheered because his message came from the heart and they recognized this. With this spirit who could say we cannot solve our problems?

Among our problems are those which concern the Indian people. I am the first Indian to sit as a member in this house and I am conscious of my responsibilities. I recognize that the people of Kamloops-Cariboo did not send me here to represent only a segment of that population. I know I must strive on behalf of all my constituents. However, I have an obligation which I could not escape if I wished to, and that is my obligation to my fellow Indians. I am an Indian who is a member of parliament. I am not just the Indian people's member; but I must speak as well on their behalf.

Hon. members know that the situation of many Indian families is deplorable. We all know that in respect of income, standards of health and living conditions many Indian people are below that standard of acceptability in this country. They are isolated from their fellow Canadians and they are shut off from many aspects of Canadian life. I do not think that racial discrimination is a factor. In view of the honour the people of Kamloops-Cariboo have paid me how could I feel otherwise? It is just a cruel historical fact of life beyond the control of the Indian people. The efforts to bring them into the world of today and to their rightful place in Canada must continue.

I must pay tribute to the right hon. gentleman who sits on the opposite side of the house and who is responsible for extending the right to vote to my fellow Indians and myself. This was a recognition of a people who needed to be recognized and who needed the assurance that they were not forgotten.

I should like also to pay tribute to the former prime minister, Mr. Pearson. It was during his term of office that the Indian people began to move ahead as they had not moved ahead before. The former minister of Indian affairs, now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) and the former prime minister did more to help the Indian people than has been done in any comparable period of Canadian history; and the Indian people responded. The last two prime ministers initiated many programs on behalf of the Indians. I know this work will continue and will become more effective in the years ahead.

I would like also to pay tribute to another former minister, Hon. J. R. Nicholson, now Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia. I should like to wish him well in his new duties.

Let me also make reference to some of the great work done by two former members of this house who have gone on to the happy hunting ground, Hon. Guy Favreau and Hon. René Tremblay. Much of this great work that was done during Mr. Pearson's régime, was started when these men were in office.

The cost of neglecting this social problem, left unsolved for too long, is very great. This cost in terms of unproductive lives and misery is more than Canada can afford. I have confidence in the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). He is a man with much human understanding. I have confidence that he will do his utmost with the resources parliament makes available to ameliorate and eventually repair this damage to that part of Canadian fabric. I have confidence as well that the Indian people will respond.

Indians are a proud race. We have much in our past of which we are proud. Our culture can make an even greater contribution to Canada than the very considerable one it has already made. There is much about Indian life that is good and there is much for Canadians to learn about it. We have been held back but we are on the move today.

Consultations are now taking place with the Indian people to determine their views about the kind of Indian Act they believe will work best in their own communities. The fact that they are being consulted on such a scale and to such depth augurs well for the future. I do not believe that any country has ever before made the attempt to ascertain so thoroughly the needs of a group of people as has been the case during these discussions. Meetings have been held in the Northwest Territories, the maritimes and Ontario, and next week a team will meet with the spokesmen for the Indians of Saskatchewan. I believe that very few understand how much this means to the Indians. We can speak at those meetings of the effect of the Indian Act on our own communities, and we have an opportunity to explain the needs and the aspirations of our people. Parliament will be better prepared to debate this Indian Act than it has ever been. There is an urgency here and I hope the new act will not be long delayed.

Not all our problems can be solved by the passing of an act by parliament. If they could, I am sure most of them would long since have been remedied. The solution to the problems of the Indian people will require a combination of effort on the part of all levels of government, of all Canadians including the Indians. With the available resources, this government has shown ample signs of being willing and ready to supply help. I believe Canadians will help when shown what is wanted of them, and the Indian people are showing many signs of their willingness to do their share. Ultimately it will be the efforts of the Indian people that will result in the solution of their problems. Ultimately it will be the Indian people, striving to overcome the barriers, who will make a solution possible.

Mr. Speaker, I hope it will always be possible for me to speak on behalf of my constituents and on behalf of the Indian people. I hope it will be possible for me to discharge both my obligations, for I am very conscious of them.

• (1:10 p.m.)

It is not important to the house that a member is, or is not, an Indian. It is not really important to the people of my riding whether I am Indian or not. It is important to the Indian people to know that one of us can become a member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): It is important for the younger Indians who are in school and at university to know that, with reasonable hope, they can aspire to become whatever they wish to become and are capable of becoming. It is important for all Canada to know that this is not a land of bigotry and prejudice. It is important for all Canadians to keep it that way.

Although the Indian people once held all this land and now have but little of it, although the Indian once was the master of his environment and is no longer, it is less than helpful to repine for a past that is gone; it is less than useful to yearn for other times when things were different. No one can turn back the clock. The useful, the important and the right thing to do is to master the environment that is. The younger Indian is using the opportunities provided for his schooling. He is taking advantage of education and of training programs so that he can become economically independent. He is looking ahead, not looking over his shoulder at the past. In doing so, he is not giving up any of his Indian heritage. He is making that heritage into a useful instrument for living in the world of today. He is applying the good things of the past to the problems of the present to make a better future.

In this we are no different from others. All Canadians are looking forward, looking ahead into the brave world of tomorrow. We have confidence that we can solve the problems that face us, confidence in our ability to repair the damaged fabric of society.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure every member of the house agrees that Canadians today, English speaking Canadians, French speaking Canadians, Indian Canadians, every kind of Canadian—all of us are looking ahead with the confidence born of a certainty that our country is capable of doing what has to be done, of correcting the defects of today to make a world in which we can be even prouder of being what we all are, Canadians, living in a great and fine land, a land which has much to offer the world, a land which has some problems but none that cannot be solved.

I wish I could speak French as well as my hon. friend from Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) spoke English. Although my name is Marchand, I do not speak French very well.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): With those words, Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in seconding the speech of His Excellency the Governor General so eloquently and graciously delivered yesterday.

On motion of Mr. Stanfield the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) the house adjourned at 1.17 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MONGRAIN—DISPOSITION OF CHARGE AGAINST FORMER MINISTER

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I beg your indulgence and I assure you that I shall be very brief.

On Tuesday, February 16, 1965, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson made, in the house, a rather long statement, and I shall quote only one paragraph or two as follows:

> In December of 1964, certain evidence was submitted to me regarding allegations involving the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville. These allegations were in connection with certain transactions in which it was alleged he was a participant during the year 1961. They were not related to his membership of this house or of the government. I saw the hon. member and advised him that the evidence submitted required an investigation. To this he agreed.
> I spoke to the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville again on Wednesday, January 20, after I had been shown a preliminary report on the investigation into the matters in question. It appeared to me, as a result of having that preliminary report, that it would be best in all circumstances, and without prejudging the conclusion of the matter, for the hon. member to cease to be a member of the government. After discussing the matter with me, Mr. Dupuis submitted his resignation, which was accepted.

On the same day, the member of the Privy Council concerned stated as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, if I have agreed to send my resignation to the right hon. Prime Minister, it is somewhat because I could foresee that some newspapers were ready to indulge in falsehoods about me, as I have mentioned earlier. I did not want those rumours and aspersions cast upon me to reflect on the cabinet, of which I was a member.

After a trial, the conclusions of which were not happy, the hon. Yvon Dupuis appealed the decision and the hon. Justice Montgomery ruled as follows:

> Under the circumstances, I would maintain the appeal and acquit Appellant.

Hon. Justice Taschereau in turn said:

> I agree with my colleagues and for the reasons they give, I would quash the verdict of guilty passed against the Appellant.

On the other hand, Mr. Justice Owen said—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be so good as to state his question of privilege before the house?

Mr. Mongrain: I am coming to that, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I had asked for your indulgence.

There is a question of Christian charity and respect for this house and for the Privy Council. Since this matter was officially reported in Hansard on July 16, 1965, I thought it proper, for the reasons which I have just mentioned, that this house should be apprised of the conclusion of this matter and that it should be recorded in Hansard, in order to safeguard the honour of this house and of all the members of the Privy Council as well as that of the family of the hon. Yvon Dupuis.

Mr. Speaker: I take the liberty of quoting to the hon. member and all the other hon. members, section 113 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary rules and forms, fourth edition. It reads as follows:

> A question of privilege ought rarely to come up in parliament. It should be dealt with by a motion giving the house power to impose a reparation or apply a remedy. There are privileges of the house as well as of members individually.

The hon. member did not follow up his question of privilege with a motion, and it does not seem to me that the privileges of the house or those of members individually are affected in the situation which was referred to by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières. Therefore, I have to tell him that his question of privilege, as such, is not in order.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RESPECTING AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I should like to table, in English and in French, letters which I received from the presidents of the three most important Canadian automotive companies.

Furthermore, in reply to a question of the hon. member for York South, (Mr. Lewis), I should like to table the press release issued by the Department of Industry, following recent talks with the United States with regard to the Canada-U.S. automobile agreement.

• (2:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INTRODUCTION OF ALL BILLS IN BILINGUAL FORM

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Your Honour will recall that on Friday last the house agreed to an order for the purpose of having government bills printed in bilingual form. In order that the practice of printing may be uniform in the case of all bills before the house, I ask leave to have the following order made at this time:

That, until otherwise ordered, private and public bills introduced by members of this house shall be printed in a bilingual form.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to submit this motion to the house at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTIONS TO BE CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AT NEXT SITTING

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are ten government notices of motion on the order paper today, may I be permitted to introduce a resolution to deal with all ten so they might be approved as a group?

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) moved:

That the house do go into committee of the whole at its next sitting to consider the several proposed resolutions which have been recommended to the house by His Excellency and which stand on today's order paper in the names of the Prime Minister, the Postmaster General, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Veterans' Affairs respectively.

Motion agreed to.

EDUCATION

TORONTO—REFUSAL TO SHARE COST OF INSTRUCTION TO IMMIGRANT CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether there is any change in the position of the government as announced by his predecessor in refusing to share in the cost of special English language instruction for immigrant children in the City of Toronto.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I should like to consider the decision taken by my predecessor. I shall be happy to give an answer at a later date.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister indicate when we might expect a decision on this matter?

Mr. MacEachen: Just as soon as I have had an opportunity to consider the question I shall bring an answer to the house.

INCOME TAX

REPORTED AVOIDANCE PLAN BY NEWFOUNDLAND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and ask whether his attention has been drawn to charges made in the publication Canadian Petroleum to the effect that the Shaheen Natural Resources Company and Newfoundland Premier Joseph Smallwood have joined forces to avoid federal income tax.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): This particular question has arisen not only with respect to the company mentioned but with respect to several other companies as well, and we are presently examining the situation to determine whether they are taxable under present tax legislation, something which I am informed is not definite at this particular time.

Mr. Saltsman: As a supplementary question, can the minister inform the house when his investigations will be concluded? Can we have an answer to that question?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, these will be concluded soon. I should point out, however, that none of these companies have had taxable income to this point, to my knowledge.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS

On the order of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure yesterday of being in the small but most beautiful province in Canada, namely Prince Edward Island, and I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

The government has spoken of a causeway, an access road, from the mainland to Prince Edward Island, but the province is hearing nothing more about it. Does the government intend to proceed with the causeway, and could the Prime Minister tell the house whether this project appears on the list of government priorities?

Mr. Speaker: I believe I should remind the honourable member that this question was asked last week, and I do not believe it is in order at this time.

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF PROCEDURAL REFORMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as government house leader. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to indicate the earliest possible date at which the house could discuss interim procedural arrangements to cover the first part of this session, including the means to bring forward reforms of a permanent nature?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Well, Mr. Speaker, it would be our wish and indeed we would be quite agreeable to the suggestion that the provisional interim rules be brought forward for application at an early date and subject to an earlier time limit as suggested by the hon. member. I have been considering the proposals we have made, and also considering the hon. member's reply to my proposal. I hope to have an opportunity to discuss with him and other house leaders a régime for dealing with both the interim and long range rules.

An hon. Member: Régime?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, do I take it from what the President of the Privy Council has just said that there will be an early resumption of meetings of the house leaders to deal with this matter?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am looking forward to that possibility, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE EFFECT OF NEWFOUNDLAND OPERATION ON PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, whichever may be in a position to answer it. Has the government investigated the possible serious consequences to the Canadian petroleum industry which will result from the operation of the projected refining complex of the Newfoundland government and the Shaheen company at Come-By-Chance?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pépin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has just given an indirect answer to this question.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the answer given by the Minister of Finance had to do entirely with the loss of income tax. My question is in regard to the very serious disruption to the Canadian petroleum industry which this could cause.

Mr. Pepin: He will look at both sides of the question.

Mr. Harkness: As a further supplementary question, if it has been the subject of investigation, what action does the government propose to prevent these serious consequences? Is there no answer?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I answered.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Does the government intend to present a budget to parliament this fall. If so, when may we expect its presentation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to present a budget this fall. The present date we are aiming for is somewhere in mid-October, but I would not like to tie myself down to an exact date at this time.

Mr. Hees: As a supplementary question, is the absence of any mention of tax reform in the speech from the throne an indication that the government has abandoned any firm ideas that it might have had?

Mr. Benson: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The supplementary question is argumentative.

Mr. Hees: No? Mr. Speaker, please—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have indicated to the hon. member that the question as asked is argumentative and out of order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—ATTENDANCE OF CANADIAN MINISTERS AT FALL MEETINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada received a proposal to have him and the Minister of National Defence attend an emergency meeting of NATO ministers in the near future? If so, what is the government's decision regarding such a meeting?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions in the NATO council and among foreign ministers of the NATO countries regarding a series of meetings to be held this fall. Definite decisions have not yet been made as to the time and the place of such meetings.

Mr. MacLean: In view of earlier reports that in the light of the U.S.S.R. invasion of Czechoslovakia NATO countries had given undertakings to the alliance to not reduce their military strength in Europe, I should like to ask the minister whether any such undertaking has been requested of Canada or given by Canada and, if so, for what length of time.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Sharp: After the NATO council met a public statement was made. I do not have it with me today, but I could obtain it and it could be tabled if the house were interested. Canada subscribed to this statement. It did not involve any country giving an undertaking about the maintenance of its present forces.

Mr. MacLean: Perhaps I might be allowed a further supplementary. I should like to address this to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's statements about a reassessment of Canada's role in NATO, will the Prime Minister undertake to make a full statement to the house on Canada's position in this regard before the series of meetings to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred take place?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Sir, it would be normal that I only make this statement after the assessment is concluded. We are proceeding with as great haste as is possible but, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs just indicated, our general position in NATO does not compromise any reassessment we might like to make.

HOUSING

QUEBEC—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PROVINCIAL MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): In the absence of the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for urban renewal, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Could he tell us, following the statement made last Friday by the Quebec Minister of Municipal Affairs, the hon. Robert Lussier, to the effect that he would fight with all his energies the interference of the federal government in the field of housing, if he intends to change anything to the federal housing policy outlined in the Speech from the Throne?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the said minister is thereby indicating that he wants to respect the constitution, we are in complete agreement, and we hope that his government will respect it in every field.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Does he not think that it might be in order to offer a house to the Quebec minister through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

[English]

EXTERNAL AID

BIAFRA—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO RENDER ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Arising out of the questions that were asked on Friday regarding the disastrous situation in Biafra and the rather uncertain replies of the ministers, may I ask whether now, after three days of further contemplation, the minister is in a position to advise the house what action Canada intends to take in order to meet a situation that is pregnant with deep danger to the peace of the world. Has Canada been asked by Sweden for assistance by supplying aircraft and, if so, have the aircraft been supplied?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have reviewed the answers I gave on Friday and I do not think there is any necessity to add to those answers. I indicated that Canada has been very active and continues to be active both in trying to bring the conflict to an end and in the provision of relief.

As I said at the time, we had been asked to supply aircraft but this had proven to be hypothetical because there was no place to land. As hon. gentlemen in the house know, even the International Red Cross had to suspend its flights. I can assure hon. gentlemen that as soon as it is possible for supplies to be flown into Biafra we will be there to help.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The uncertainty still continues. I now ask the minister whether at the earliest possible date the government will provide an opportunity to this house to express opinions concerning what should be done in this regard, to put an end to the feet dragging that has gone on on the part of this government.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there will be ample opportunity during the next few days to discuss this question and many others of equal importance. If necessary I would be happy to participate in the debate.

[Later:]

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell us whether any Canadian relief supplies have reached Biafra as yet?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether any of the supplies that we have put into Lagos have yet reached Biafra, but they certainly have been reaching people who are now under the control of the Nigerian authorities. Our supplies are moving forward into areas where former residents of Biafra are now located.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister can give the house some indication of the nature of these supplies, and perhaps their extent.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, they consist in the main of high protein foods, fish and things of that kind, which are very much needed by the people of this area, who have had to get along on a very starchy diet, if any at all.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

REQUEST FOR PROVISION FOR VOTING BY INCAPACITATED PEOPLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. In view of its accent on involvement and participation, does the government intend to seek revision of the elections act so that in future bedridden and physically incapacitated people may vote by mail or exercise their franchise in some other way at election time?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): As hon. members will have noted, there is no provision for revision of the elections act at this session of parliament. I hope to be in a position to announce to the house some vehicle by means of which hon. members can express to the government their views on changes that might be made in the Canada Elections Act.

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING ELECTION EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a further question to the President of the Privy Council. In view of this underlining of the fact that there will not be any legislation to amend the election act, could he inform this house whether there will be any legislation at this session to implement the recommendations of the committee on election expenses?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Since the menu for the coming session has been set out very completely in the speech from the throne, it is not my expectation there will be legislation at this session to deal with any aspect of the Canada Elections Act. Of course I would be delighted to have the hon. member's views on that or any other aspect of this subject.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister inform the house whether there is a task force studying the committee report, or whether the committee's report will be referred to a committee of this house so that action on it may be taken soon? We have had the report for a few years.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This question is, of course, under active review.

FISHERIES

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ASSISTANCE FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, and I preface my question with congratulations on his appointment to this position. Would the minister inform the house now, or as soon as convenient, about the progress made in his talks with the fisheries ministers of the Atlantic provinces concerning the serious situation in the east coast fishing industry, and the course of action planned by the government to assist this important primary industry?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): First I should like to thank the hon. member for his congratulatory remarks. Second, I should like to say that the problems of the east coast fisheries are under review. The purpose of my meeting with the fisheries ministers of the Atlantic region was to do just that, review these problems. As soon as there is a statement to be made on policy it will be made in the house.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the serious marketing problems in the fishing industry, when can we expect a preliminary report on the in depth market research study which is being financed by the federal and provincial governments and the industry?

Mr. Davis: I hope we can have a preliminary report early next year. I understand a full and final report is scheduled for early 1970.

[Mr. Lewis.]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PAYMENT UNDER CONTRACTS FOR PERIOD OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. As the result of a certain amount of uncertainty or lack of clarity in answers concerning rural mail carriers on Friday, I wonder if the minister would mind making a statement on motions in the near future outlining the exact position of the rural mail carriers and the legal support the government has for the position it has taken.

Hon. Eric Kierans (Postmaster General): I am preparing a letter for all members of the house outlining our position.

Mr. Monteith: Is this going to be mailed to all members or will there be a statement on motions?

An hon. Member: By rural mail.

Mr. Kierans: I am addressing a letter to all members of the house explaining our position with regard to rural contracts in particular.

Mr. Monteith: When will that be forthcoming?

Mr. Kierans: I looked at the draft on Friday, and it will be going out soon.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Will the Postmaster General also consider providing information in this statement concerning the closing of post offices and the cancellation of rural routes which is being carried out by his department at the present time? Will he give assurance to the house that the service now available to rural people will be maintained?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, we are going through a normal reorganization of the services provided by the post office. It is true that we are closing down some revenue offices, but we are supplying in their place rural services that will be better. The revenue offices that we are currently considering closing are obviously those that are running at a considerable deficit and have no economic justification whatsoever.

Mr. Coates: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Postmaster General advise whether he considers as normal the closing of three post offices and two rural routes in a very small area?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will have to give that opinion privately to the hon. member.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSED RATE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General. Having in mind the government's declared intention of combating inflation, I wonder whether the minister could make an early statement as to how this policy is related to his proposal to increase the ordinary postal rates by 50 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for a statement that would normally be made on motions.

REPORTED DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION OF POST OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General.

Will restrictions imposed upon government expenditures affect the proposed construction of post offices in various municipalities, among others, those at Saint-Casimir and at Saint-Alban in the Champlain district. These seem to be put off indefinitely. Could the minister let us know the government policy in this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member that this question should be placed on the order paper.

[English]

POLLUTION

INQUIRY AS TO RESEARCH PILOT PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister please advise the house whether he has planned any pilot projects of a research nature with the object of the elimination of the pollution of our air and water resources?

Hon. J. C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, some such pilot projects are now under consideration by the department, along with a general study of the problem.

[Later:]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that a question has already been asked today of the minister of health and welfare in regard to water and air pollution, would he get together with the minister and decide which of them will answer questions of policy regarding water and air pollution?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I understood that the question was directed to the minister of health and welfare. Many of these subject matters cover several departments, and I take it that ministers will answer within their competence when questions are directed to them.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether the government intends to proceed shortly to bring some order out of chaos on the pollution policy?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, any government policy in this area will be announced in the proper manner. As the hon. member knows, the question of pollution was referred to in the throne speech.

GRAIN

WHEAT—STEPS TO MAINTAIN PRICE UNDER INTERNATIONAL ARRANGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware of the difficulties arising under the international grains agreement with regard to grading, which is having a softening effect on the price of wheat? If he is aware of this problem, what is the Canadian government prepared to do about it, in order to enforce the terms of the international grains agreement?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is also aware that there is a debate among wheat exporters as to what is the cause and who is the culprit, and that some countries are accusing each other of selling at less than the price agreed under the international grains arrangement. These accusations are refuted by each country, one after the other, and I understand that it is extremely difficult to assess these prices and to know whether one country in particular is selling below the agreed price.

Mr. Horner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the difficulty which exists, as the minister suggests, is the government prepared to guarantee to western farmers the floor price of a year ago of $1.95½, as they did in the past year?

Mr. Pepin: This is a question of policy, Mr. Speaker, and it will be announced in due course, if it is found needed to do so.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could he tell the house whether the said Mr. Rossillon, recently charged with being an agitator, is now a naturalized Canadian?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question for the order paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

METHOD OF DEALING WITH PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister intending to bring in the amendments to the Criminal Code under one bill, as formerly suggested by the Prime Minister, or does he intend to divide up the bill as he suggested?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I might say that there is no difference of opinion whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Who said there was?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is the present intention of the government to bring in the bill as one bill. I will have more to say about that when the bill is introduced.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Justice be prepared to table the recommendations and discussions with the attorneys general of the provinces in reference to these amendments to the code, which we appreciate have been submitted to his department?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): At the recent meeting of the uniformity conference at the end of August there were meetings with most of the provincial attorneys general. Some of the attorneys general have indeed, as the hon. member suggested, written to the department. I would think at the appropriate time I might well consider that suggestion when the matter is before the house.

Mr. Woolliams: Just one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister prepared to file those statements in the house at the appropriate time?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Before doing so, of course, I would have to communicate with the attorneys general, because their consent would be required.

FINANCE

STEPS TO OVERCOME SHORTAGE OF 25 CENT PIECES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. What steps does the Minister of Finance propose to take to overcome the extreme shortage of 25-cent pieces now in circulation? This matter causes great handicap and inconvenience to businesses large and small.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, we have changed to nickel coinage and there has been some hoarding of silver coinage in Canada. In order that we might have the Royal Mint devote its time to producing 25-cent pieces we recently agreed to purchase 75 million 10-cent pieces which are to be produced by the United States mint. This means that at the present time the Royal Canadian Mint is devoting its facilities to producing 25-cent pieces in order to meet any shortage existing in the country. I should point out that the shortage exists because some people in the country have been hoarding the silver coins which were in circulation.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This two-bit operation that the minister talks about—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hales: —is not overcoming the problem. Would the minister consider placing this order for the manufacture of extra quarters in some other country, maybe the United Kingdom?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, at the time we were looking for additional facilities which could produce coins for Canada we explored the possibility of having them produced in mints other than the United States, and were not successful in so doing. I believe that within a reasonable period of time any shortage of coins will disappear as the mint facilities, including the expanded facilities which we instituted a couple of years ago, are completely involved in producing two-bit pieces, as the hon. member calls them.

[Later:]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with the minting of silver coins which have been replaced by nickel coins.

Is the minister aware that the new coins cannot be used in automatic vending machines and parking meters of our cities and does he intend to compensate the companies which own those machines as well as the municipalities affected by that change?

Mr. Speaker: This question has already been asked in the house.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION AGAINST U.S. IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture of which I have given him notice. Due to the fact that Ontario turkey producers are being forced to sell their products at below the cost of production because of the influx of United States turkey imports, what action is the government anticipating in the way of emergency tariffs or import quotas to help prevent our Canadian turkey producers from being forced out of business? I understand that the turkey federation has made a submission to the minister in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this question should be answered by way of a statement on motions. This is a suggestion I make to the minister at this time.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, this is of very great importance to turkey producers all across Canada as well as to the feed grain producers, and I believe the minister has an answer which is not too long.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the answer is shorter than the question.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I assure you the answer is very brief, but its brevity is no indication of the importance of the question.

I may say that representations have been received from turkey producers, and I met with officials of the Canadian Turkey Federation with regard to the importation of turkeys and its effect on the Canadian domestic market. I have assured the officials of the federation and other interested producers that the government has this problem under active consideration.

Although this question does not deal specifically with the matter raised by the hon. member, it is about all that can be properly said at this time.

CORN—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the Canadian commercial corn harvest is only just beginning and the price quoted to growers is so disastrously low as to be considered below the cost of production, can the minister indicate whether immediate steps will be announced either to establish a floor price of $1.50 per bushel as requested by spokesmen on behalf of the industry or to ensure in some other manner a just return to the growers for this major crop?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, last Friday a question of a similar nature was addressed to me, and the answer today is the same. This matter is under active consideration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DAIRY PRINCESS OF ENGLAND AND WALES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I wonder if I may be permitted at this time to draw Your Honour's attention to the presence in your gallery of a very distinguished visitor. I refer to Miss Joan Harland, who is on an official visit to Canada in her capacity as dairy princess of England and Wales.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF STRAIGHT BASE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask whether he would be able to tell the house his views and intentions with respect to the straight base lines under the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, especially in so far as the west coast is concerned.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in order to answer this question properly I would have to make a general statement on policy. The policy is certainly under review, and I as a new minister from the west coast am very concerned with the subject the hon. member has raised.

Mr. Howard: As a supplementary question may I then ask the minister whether he would take the time to make a statement on motions about this very important matter, particularly with reference to the quotations which were attributed to him in the Toronto Globe and Mail concerning his intention to depart from the present policy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROTEST AGAINST WITHDRAWAL OF SALT SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the urgent situation caused by the recent abolition of the salt rebate to Atlantic fishermen, what interim action is planned to avoid a serious and immediate hardship to our fishermen so affected?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): As the hon. member knows, the salt subsidy to the cod fishery on the east coast has been discontinued. Other programs of a broader nature are under consideration. They are being developed with regard to the income and production of that industry.

Mr. James McGrath (St. John's East): Could the minister tell the house why he chose to do away with the salt subsidy in the middle of the fishing season?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Olson.]

LICENCES FOR VESSELS REPLACING THOSE LOST AT SEA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Tom Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Fisheries. The minister recently announced that no more licences would be granted to fishing vessels on the west coast. I have had urgent representations from fishermen who are concerned about the loss of their vessels at sea. What does the minister intend to do about vessels that are lost as a result of accidents beyond the control of the fishermen themselves?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member's question is not hypothetical.

TRADE

PROHIBITION ON SALE OF CANADIAN TURBOT IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister tell the house what action his department contemplates regarding the recent prohibition by the U.S. food and drug administration of the sale of Greenland halibut on the U.S. market and the disastrous consequences it has had on the Canadian east coast fisheries?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as was mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs last Friday, we made representations on this subject to the United States. I have been informed that the food and drug administration will hold hearings on this subject on October 2 in order to receive representations from all parties. We are in touch with the fishing industry of Newfoundland on this subject, and we are doing our best to bring their case before the U.S. authorities.

Mr. McGrath: Could the minister inform us what role his department will play when this appeal is heard in the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the supplementary question is in order.

[Later:]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure you of the urgency of this question which I direct to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Could the minister tell the house whether the prohibition on the sale of Greenland halibut is still in effect pending the hearing of the appeal to which he referred in his answer to my previous question?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, may I answer this question tomorrow because I still have a shadow of a doubt as to the actual situation.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FERRY SERVICE, SAINT JOHN, N.B.—DIGBY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he provide any facts additional to the announcement he made in Nova Scotia on May 30, 1968, promising a new Saint John-Digby ferry?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will have to consult the minister on that matter, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED NATIONAL COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the proposal in the speech from the throne concerning the establishment of a national grains council, will farm organizations and those most directly concerned with the marketing of grain have ample opportunity to appraise and submit their recommendations concerning any new legislation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I think the answer to that question is a very simple yes; they will be invited to do so.

Mr. Skoberg: I have a supplementary question. Could the minister say when this legislation may be introduced?

Mr. Olson: I am not sure that legislation is required for this. I believe the Prime Minister issued a press release either on Wednesday or Thursday indicating that a preliminary meeting would be held on October 16, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture are now in the process of issuing invitations to various interested parties to attend that meeting.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PICTOU, N.S.—REPORTED HEAVY UNEMPLOYMENT AT SHIPYARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Defence Production. I should like to congratulate him on his appointment and to point out that as Minister of Defence Production he has knowledge of the shipbuilding industry in the Atlantic area and of its importance there. May I ask him whether he received representations from the United Steelworkers of America and other organizations regarding the heavy unemployment at the Ferguson Industries Limited shipyard at Pictou, Nova Scotia, and if so what action the government intends to take in this regard.

Hon. Don Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I have received representations which I am examining now. A number of proposals have been advanced, and I hope that in the immediate future we will be able to ensure that these yards are given an opportunity to tender on whatever construction is planned.

INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Labour or some other appropriate minister. In view of the fact that the winter works program is being discontinued, does the government plan any alternative direct financial assistance to the municipalities this winter?

Hon. B. S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister and the minister of manpower answered this question quite adequately last Friday.

Mr. Rose: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister or the minister of manpower be more specific as to the nature of these provisions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED INTENSIFICATION OF RECRUITING CAMPAIGN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the recent report by the Institute for Strategic Studies to the effect that Canada has a smaller percentage of men of military age in the armed forces than any other western country, is it the intention of the government to take steps through an intensified recruiting campaign to bring Canada's forces to a point where a more realistic number of young Canadians may acquire the benefit of military training and discipline—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Dinsdale: —adding substantially to the capacity of this nation to defend itself.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recognize, I am sure, that the question as asked is out of order.

BATTLE OF BRITAIN—REQUEST FOR MILITARY OBSERVANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence of which I have given him notice. It concerns a matter that is urgent to many thousands of Canadians. Will the minister consider restoring the military role to ceremonies observing Battle of Britain on Sunday at local cenotaphs, in light of a week end resolution of the Nova Scotia command, Royal Canadian Legion?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I realize the importance of the question but the hon. member is referring to a situation which will not be arising for some months yet. Therefore I think the question should be put on the order paper.

REPORTED INTENTION TO REVIEW JOINT PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of his reported statement over the week end concerning the desirability of holding a federal-provincial conference to consider cutting down the money spent on certain joint programs, can he indicate what programs he has in mind and also whether this will mean reducing any of the amounts received under these programs by individuals?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, officials of the federal government and the provincial governments have met in the last two weeks to consult with each other as to which of these programs they might wish to consider jointly. Their reports will be made to the governments, and the governments concerned will establish the agenda. However, as the hon. member indicated, the general purpose is to re-examine all open-ended programs which are costing more than the federal and provincial governments can sometimes afford.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister answer the second part of my question, namely whether this will involve the cutting down of benefits or allowances paid to individuals?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course this will depend on the subjects which the provinces will agree to put on the agenda. These are programs which are established through joint action, and the federal government wants to discuss each of them before making any announcement.

HOUSING

TORONTO—SERVICING OF GOVERNMENT OWNED LAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. He is not here and I am not sure who is his parliamentary secretary. However, I shall address it to the parliamentary secretary.

In view of the urgency of the housing crisis in the area of metropolitan Toronto, and in view of the fact that since 1953 the federal government, together with the provincial government, has been the owner of 1,000 acres of land acquired for housing purposes, will the minister state whether arrangements have been made to service the land and how soon it is anticipated it will be available for actual housing construction?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that he place this question on the order paper.

FINANCE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMISSION ON TAXATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the minister indicated a few minutes ago that the government has not lost interest in tax reform, does the government expect in the near future to present its views on the Carter commission report on taxation and permit debate in this house on this most important matter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, although I would not like to be tied to this, may I say our present intention is to introduce sometime early next year a draft bill dealing with tax reform which, after first reading, will be referred to a committee of the house. However, this is subject to change.

COAL

REQUEST FOR MAINTENANCE OF DOMINION BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the responsible minister whether the government will give consideration to the plea of a charter member of the Dominion Coal Board, William C. Whittaker of Calgary, when he said that the board should be maintained with such modifications as these changing times require.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, may I have an answer from the responsible minister?

Mr. Trudeau: It is not an urgent question.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I read the representations of that hon. gentleman with considerable interest.

TRANSPORT

MELVILLE, SASK.—PROPOSED SHIPMENT OF POTASH BY TRUCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to address my question to the acting minister or his parliamentary secretary. Is he aware of the situation that is developing at the potash mine near Esterhazy, Saskatchewan? International Minerals has proposed trucking potash by rail to a United States border point for shipment via rail—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member kindly state his question.

Mr. Nystrom: I should like to ask whether the minister is aware of this situation, and in view of the situation what does he propose to do to prevent economic damage to the rail centre of Melville?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would invite the hon. member to place his question on the order paper.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the minister of consumer affairs. In view of the strong statement made this week end to the automobile companies in the United States asking them to hold their prices because of their high profits, is the minister considering making a similar statement in Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the operation of the automobile agreement falls under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I think the question should be directed to him.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the responsibility of the minister of consumer affairs for prices to consumers, I was wondering whether he would care to make a statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Saltsman: Then I will direct my question to the appropriate minister and ask him whether he intends to make a statement regarding these prices in Canada.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think we should first know what will be the prices of automobiles in Canada. If there is an increase, then I think we should give it some study before making any pronouncements on the subject.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister admit that it would then be too late to do anything?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Saltsman: A further supplementary question. In view of the fact that it is frequently more effective to head off this kind of situation by a strong statement on the part of government, will the minister consider making such statement so as to put the automobile companies on notice?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, September 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Eymard Corbin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), who had the honour of being chosen by his colleagues to move the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

It would be ungracious on my part to begrudge certain excerpts of his speech with which the opposition did not agree, but everybody will agree, I believe, that he showed himself a very pleasant speaker, and I am happy to add his name to the list of members I can understand without the help of simultaneous translation.

[English]

I do not know, sir, whether that is a compliment, but it is meant to be.

[Translation]

He is proud, and rightly so, of representing the constituency of Madawaska-Victoria. In view of his first participation in the business of this house, I am inclined to believe that his election is not so catastrophic as I would have had the people believe at the time of my pleasant visit to his constituency during the election campaign. I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that the very great discretion which seems incumbent on government members will not deprive the house of the pleasure of hearing the representative for Madawaska-Victoria.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) who seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I welcome him to the house for his personal qualities and for what he represents. He spoke eloquently on behalf of the native peoples of Canada and his presence here reminds us of some of our obligations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I also thank him for his courteous reference to his predecessor from the constituency he now represents, the Hon. Davie Fulton.

Again I extend my congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, and offer my best wishes to you. By achieving a permanent Speaker we will have taken a first step toward freeing the Chair from all suggestions that it is influenced by partisan considerations. Without reservation I offer my congratulations to the Deputy Speaker and to the Deputy Chairman of Committees. I express the hope that in future the Deputy Speaker may be chosen from a party other than the party in power.

In recent years it has been the practice of the Deputy Speaker to vote when the house has divided. It might be well, in order to enhance the dignity of that office and to render its incumbent even more impartial than at present, if the Deputy Speaker did not in future take part in divisions of the house. Certainly, sir, the steps which have been taken represent important steps toward parliamentary reform.

There has been much public interest, as there ought to be, and much discussion outside the house about the reform of the rules of parliament. It now appears that we may have to enter into discussions which will determine the interim arrangements under which we shall conduct our business until permanent rule changes are adopted. This party wishes parliament to operate as soon as possible under permanent rules that are agreed on by members on both sides of the house.

In the light of experience of recent years we want to make perfectly sure that this time the adoption of any interim arrangements is not used to delay or frustrate progress toward permanent rules.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Once bitten, twice shy. There is no question of being twice bitten. We are determined to surround the adoption of any interim arrangements with safeguards which are as foolproof as possible. We fully realize that it is necessary to include in any interim rules many of the previous provisional rules; but not all the previous provisional rules ought to be included. Under the present circumstances one or two of the previous provisional rules are now unacceptable to us. For example, we are faced during the present session with two sets of estimates. Under suggestions made by the government to the house on Friday last the house would be required to vote estimates for the government at a rate of up to $1 billion per day. The country will not take kindly to any parliament that acquiesces in such a procedure or to any government that imposes it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: We shall be, as we have been, a responsible opposition. We must resist any proposal that would fundamentally impair the discharge of our constitutional responsibility as Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I congratulate the new ministers and parliamentary secretaries who have been appointed to the new government. Also I commiserate with those who have failed to be appointed. I notice that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has declared his intention to change the incumbents of ministerial offices more frequently than has been the case in the past. After the Prime Minister has explained away or rationalized some of his other promises I am sure this particular promise will remain vividly in the minds of backbenchers on the government side of the house.

Incidentally, of the 16 parliamentary secretaries, seven come from Ontario, seven from Quebec, one from British Columbia and one from the Northwest Territories. I hope that when the Prime Minister makes any changes in future he will be able to appoint someone from New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta, since I am sure there are members from those provinces with sufficient talent to serve in ministerial capacities.

Naturally, I extend my congratulations to all members who have been elected or re-elected. More to the point, so far as the Liberal party is concerned, are congratulations to those who for one reason or another have not been re-elected. Mr. Byrne, for example, is with the Immigration Appeal Board. Mr. Macaluso has followed his distinguished predecessor to the Canadian Transport Board. Mr. Pickersgill showed the way. Whatever anyone may have said about Mr. Pickersgill's competence in the field of transportation, everyone must agree that he qualifies as an expert in marine matters since he knew when to get off a sinking ship in Newfoundland.

Mr. Matheson has received a county court appointment; Mr. Teillet is on the pension commission; Mr. Robichaud has been elevated to another place; Mr. Tardif is with the citizenship court and Mr. Stewart is giving on the job training to the President of the Privy Council. The most striking anomaly about the just society so far seems to be the uneven distribution of benefits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It may be that some of these appointments have come about because of the Prime Minister's determination to have decisions made by politicians and not by officials.

An hon. Member: Like recognizing Red China.

Mr. Stanfield: It seems that the Speech from the Throne is not a reliable guide to legislation that is to come before the house. The other night the Prime Minister seemed to suggest on television that the Canada Development Corporation concept was included at least in part in the Speech from the Throne because questions might be asked if such a concept were not included. In mentioning the Canada Development Corporation in the Speech from the Throne the Prime Minister extended a courtesy to it that he did not extend to the Queen.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stanfield: If he is going to disavow the Queen, let him do so openly. If he has convictions on this subject, let him express them. Let him explain this breach of precedent and courtesy which cannot but help disturb and offend countless Canadians who care deeply about the Queen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: So far as our party is concerned, our goal is, as it has always been, a united and strong Canada. We feel concerned about the future of our country and about the future of confederation and we shall do everything we can to strengthen Canada and confederation. We shall resist, as we have resisted in the past, any measure that will imperil national unity. We shall not make national unity a subservient part of partisan politics.

Quite properly the Prime Minister places great importance on constitutional reform. The continuing committee appointed at the federal-provincial conference of February last has not met since the conference. Officials have been meeting, but they have been meeting in private. I do not object to that in general. Yet those officials meet in absolute secrecy; absolute secrecy surrounds their deliberations and the country has no idea if any progress has been made, if any obstacles have been overcome or if any consensus has been reached. We do not even know what these officials are discussing. I think Canadians should be told what is going on. We all agree that national unity is a matter of the utmost priority. The Prime Minister may find that keeping the people completely in the dark for long periods of time is not going to help the cause of national unity and, indeed, may very well harm it.

The Prime Minister stated his views in Vancouver on the subject of certain priorities in connection with the constitution—language, the Supreme Court and the Senate. I must say I found it strange that in listing these priorities he should have made no mention of an amending formula for our constitution enabling us to repatriate it to Canada. Surely this is central to the question of constitutional reform. How would the Prime Minister propose to entrench a charter of individual rights? By going to Westminster for permission to amend the constitution? I am sure Canadians hope that when we are ready with reforms and amendments to our constitution we shall be able to achieve those reforms and those amendments here in Canada. Certainly Canadians want to repatriate the constitution. Certainly we want to work out our problems without interference from outside.

I agree with the Prime Minister in opposing outside interference in our affairs. There have been incidents recently involving alleged agents from foreign countries. Outside interference in our affairs is bitterly resented. When I first heard the Prime Minister mention this I thought he was referring to a new development. For example, I thought the activities of Mr. Rossillon were new in Canada. I was surprised to find they had been going on for years, back to 1964, for example, and I cannot but wonder why the people of Canada were not told about this before—told, for instance, of his activities in 1964. I wonder whether there are other foreign agents operating in our country about whom we have not been told.

The Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, is a failure in every respect. It could and should have been an inspiring document; it should have been a challenge to Canadians from their new government; it should have articulated a Canadian ideal. What we have is a let-down, a disappointment, especially to younger Canadians who thought only a few months ago they saw an exciting, dynamic and even uplifting new government. The Speech from the Throne contained in this flat, pedestrian document fails as an agenda for the new parliament. It fails even to recognize the problems facing the country. It could have listed on a page or two the backlog of business—taken two or three minutes for that purpose. We all know about that backlog; the whole country knew it. But the speech rambles on, resurrecting old items, distributing them through its pages, trying to join them up and trying to cover the nakedness of the "just society" which appears in it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Let me quote just a few lines:

> My government is deeply and irrevocably committed to the objectives of a just society and a prosperous economy in a peaceful world.

And in the same paragraph we find listed, among other matters, suggestions affecting national symbols and the financing of the Post Office Department as concrete proposals for the implementation of the just society.

The speech philosophizes about poverty and then leaps eagerly into what it calls "other and broader elements vital to a just society". All of a sudden the former Bill C-186 has become an integral part of the just society. In the last parliament it was merely a controversial bill which sought to regulate the power struggle between rival unions. It has been said by its opponents that it would fragment national bargaining units and lead to serious disruptions in labour-management relations. Now, however, the government has clothed it in the garments of the just society, and I suppose it will be irresistible.

The poor man is to be emancipated as to his conduct in his bedroom. Perhaps he will be able to buy a ticket in a lottery; perhaps he will be afforded better protection if he runs foul of the law. Fine. I do not downgrade the importance of that kind of amendment to the law. But the same man may be living in wretched housing, perhaps without a job—

An hon. Member: Without even a bedroom.

Mr. Stanfield: —perhaps one of a family not receiving the necessities of life, food and clothing, deprived of the opportunity for education or recreation and with no chance of enjoying scores of amenities which people receiving middle or higher incomes take for granted.

Throughout the speech there is evidence of a lack of a sense of proportion, a preoccupation with legalistic matters, an utterly casual approach insensitive toward economic injustice and the blight of poverty in our land.

This Speech from the Throne ought to have contained, besides a reference to the backlog of business, a statement of the government's concrete intentions concerning the urgent problems facing Canadians. For example, a real, not a phony war on poverty; an indication of what the government proposes to do about unemployment, the replacement of the winter works program; the problems of students; the intentions with regard to a prices review board to combat inflation, housing, tax reform, western and other agriculture and many other items, including electoral reform.

In the third place, the Speech from the Throne should have gone on to outline the direction the government intends to take and to indicate the priorities which it proposes to establish over the life of this parliament. We are told:

> It is proposed during the current session to elucidate priorities and to set in motion new policies.

What are these new policies, these new priorities, and where are they?

The speech goes on, tediously, laboriously and pedantically, lecturing us on every manner of subject under the sun. There is a repetition of the slogan "the just society". It is already becoming almost a parody of itself. Its currency is being devalued. The speech itself is an elaborate excuse for lack of action on the part of the government. Repetition of the slogan "just society" indicates that the just society is like charity in at least one respect: it covers a multitude of sins.

We have had our suspicions about this government for a few months. Now we find our worst suspicions confirmed. During the election campaign we all read advertisements saying, "Come, work with me." Since the election we have seen the establishment of regional desks and the installation of computers. There has been talk about brain banks and talent tanks, talk about involving people in exciting adventures. A whole sophisticated apparatus has been installed. But it is still the pork barrel where the action is at.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: So far as involving people is concerned, Mr. Speaker, many are called but few have been chosen. Even the most ardent supporters of the government must have been disappointed. The promises which were so high are already dampened, and the hope for a reasonable stride forward toward the just society died last Thursday in the first Speech from the Throne.

• (3:50 p.m.)

In five months in office this government has developed some very bad habits. It is perhaps too early to call this government reactionary, but it is certainly very casual. It is certainly insensitive. It has certainly become the most private government, the most secretive government in the democratic world. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, they really have in mind establishing not a just society but a secret society.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: In any case it is not just their obsession with secrecy that should raise our suspicions and our defences over the next few years. After all, they have a pretty good reason to be as secretive as possible. They have had no plans and they did not want anybody to find this out.

It is not only their secrecy that is involved. It is their strong tendency to be passive, to be careless and casual about problems that are serious and sometimes urgent—the tendency to let things simmer, to let nature take its course, to let things and people "stew in their own juice". And they play this waiting game with national problems, apparently indifferent, perhaps ignorant of the hurt and the hardship being inflicted on thousands of Canadians. It is an indifference, a carelessness that has already led to serious trouble. If this attitude is persisted in, Mr. Speaker, it will have this country in a turmoil before the government ends its term of office.

Look at the government's handling of labour-management disputes. Look at its handling of the postal strike. I suppose the government is congratulating itself that a settlement was reached within the guide lines it had established, and I suppose a few of the government's apologists are congratulating them on their success in sitting it out. What success, Mr. Speaker?

Negotiations were under way last January. The unions made their submission. But the government failed to make any money offer to its employees in the Post Office Department until six weeks after the unions had taken their strike vote. This was an incitement to strike. What kind of irresponsibility is this? What kind of example is this to set for other employees? The Montpetit report two years ago detailed shocking conditions and low morale in the Post Office Department, but the government was callous in its reluctance to press for the implementation of that report's recommendations.

So the government let the strike happen. Eventually a settlement was reached. Who says it could not have been reached without a strike? Who knows? The government never tried. Apparently the government was indifferent to the cost to the country, to the small businessman, to the disruption to the public, to the inconvenience to the public through the loss of an essential public service.

The government adopted the same casual approach to the grain handlers' strike which started in mid-July. In August Mr. Tysoe was appointed as mediator. He gave up finally, saying both sides were too inflexible. Then he went back to try to effect a settlement. In the meantime wheat troubles were deepening daily. After 54 days the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) called the parties together. If ever there was a situation calling for prompt and effective action, with vast amounts of wheat in storage and Canada's percentage of the world wheat market slipping, this was it.

I watched the Prime Minister saying in Winnipeg, "Yes, we have done a poor job selling wheat in the past but we are going to do better." They have made a fine start, Mr. Speaker, allowing the strike to continue for 54 days, with the performance of our wheat contracts being endangered and difficulties mounting in regard to making any new commitments to sell additional wheat. There was a back-up of millions of bushels of wheat in the hands of the farmers. At a time when a large, new wheat crop was expected there was every urgency, every reason to act, but the government let the situation ride. The Prime Minister said, "I am watching it." At about day 50 of the strike the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) said, "I think the employers are more responsible for this than the employees." The Minister of Labour finally did something and achieved a settlement.

Consider what this delay has cost our farmers. We in this party have grave concern about all the farmers in Canada, especially the western wheat growers. Others on this side of the house will have something more to say about this matter but I want now to condemn the government as forcefully as I can for its failure to accept and discharge its responsibility in connection with this matter.

Mr. Stanfield: One of the main reasons for labour unrest is the runaway inflation we have had for a number of years under Liberal governments. Since this government took office we have seen its failure, through its casualness, to convince the people of Canada of its determination to deal with this question. In addition we have had mounting unemployment which is creating hardship and further uneasiness among our working people.

When you turn to the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, you get another lecture on productivity. Well, we received a number of lectures from the former minister of finance. I myself have emphasized—we all have—the importance of economic growth. The Economic Council of Canada has emphasized it. But the hard fact is that Canada under this government has been falling far short of its goal of economic growth for the past three years and if this continues, Mr. Speaker, far from having a just society we are going to have a stagnant society. Certainly economic growth is a basic, central challenge to the government, growth to produce the number of jobs required, and if we do not achieve this growth then all bets are off so far as the achievement of a just or any other kind of satisfactory society is concerned.

The Economic Council of Canada has pointed out that we need an annual rate of growth of 5.5 per cent in order to develop the number of jobs required for young and new Canadians entering our work force. Since the spring of 1966 the economic growth rate has been between 2 per cent and 3 per cent, although it is a shade better at the moment. As a result we have increasing unemployment. In 1967 unemployment was at an annual rate of 4.1 per cent. This year the rate is 5.3 per cent, and of course it is much higher in some parts of the country. A total of 419,000 Canadians are out of work.

Surely this is a matter of urgency to government, particularly where older workers are concerned, particularly for younger workers without skills, and also for young students who hoped to make enough money this summer to be able to continue their education and who are now faced this fall with very serious and perhaps permanent damage to their careers. When you couple to this the situation faced by the western farmers and the predicted slowdown in the growth of our exports over the final six months of this year, it all adds to the inadequacy of any sense of urgency in the Speech from the Throne.

We know that a large part of the problem in regard to the rate of growth is related to inflation. The economic council suggested that between 1963 and 1970 we should not permit the price level to rise by more than 10 per cent, but already by 1968 we have had inflation to the extent of 16 per cent. This is eating into our growth rate. It is taking a bigger and bigger chunk out of what the wage earner makes. It is bearing more heavily upon our pensioners, upon those with low fixed incomes. Where do we find the concern of the government expressed in the Speech from the Throne?

We know that the inflation to which Canada has been subjected is largely the result of poor management by the government in Ottawa. The former minister of finance gave us a number of lectures on restraint. In that day the government imposed restraint upon the helpless. It chose to tackle inflation by deliberately injecting a little slack into the economy, bringing about a deliberate slowdown. Now the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) wants it the other way. I understand that a few weeks ago he blurted out at a press conference that his principal objective is high employment and if this involves a bit of inflation then he could stand it. So we have this process of backing and filling. What we have, of course, is excessive inflation and excessive unemployment.

What action is being taken to encourage restraint? As I said, certainly no restraint has been imposed on unemployment. The provinces on the one hand have been lectured and on the other hand blackmailed. What has happened to the prices and wages review board, or something like that, which the former minister of finance talked about last fall? Finally, in the crisis last winter the former prime minister announced that something was going to be done. Now, as I understand it, the present Prime Minister promises a white paper. I really think he is taking this thing fairly seriously. He has had two dinners to deal with this problem. It only took him one to deal with the situation last spring with regard to the question of regional disparity.

Seriously, the time for action on this commitment is long overdue. The offhand statement in the throne speech to the effect that parliament will be asked to consider proposals for a systematic and continuous review of prices and costs indicates that the government thinks this is another problem that can wait. We have had strong urging in the last couple of years from the Economic Council of Canada to implement what it calls a whole series of recommendations to strengthen the information base and public understanding which are essential for good performance and responsible behaviour in price and wage decisions. Among other things the council has called for the establishment of a standing committee on economic affairs of the Senate and House of Commons, the creation of an independent economic research institute, the timely documentation of economic trends and the stimulation of broader public debate about such trends, the substantial improvement of statistical information, especially in the field of prices, costs, productivity and income, and the development of greatly enlarged basic economic research. The council adds, "These promising possibilities suggested by the council remain largely untapped". Certainly this government is very casual in its treatment of the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada.

There was a reference to trade in the Speech from the Throne. What has become of the allusion to a dynamic Pacific policy? The Prime Minister was going to mobilize special efforts to expand trade with the nations of the Pacific area such as Japan, Australia, New Zealand, South America, Southeast Asia, China and the eastern U.S.S.R. I hope this does not turn out to be just another election speech.

Anyone who is concerned about productivity and about growth in Canada must be concerned about the ability of our provinces to provide essential public services. If we are going to fight poverty and if we are to achieve a satisfactory rate of development in Canada by Canadians, what about the ability of the provinces to discharge their responsibilities? I am not talking about provincial rights; I am talking about the responsibilities the provinces have. This ability is essential to growth and development, education, urban development and highways, not merely local. In effect failure means national failure.

There is no need for me to go over all the reasons to indicate why the federal government should be interested in these matters. In effect costs are escalating faster than revenues. The findings of the tax structure committee confirmed this. Last year almost all the provinces had to increase taxes and despite that had large deficits. I suspect that this government intends to stand pat and let the provinces stew in their own juices. But this is not good enough. I say that the government of Canada must stop using the knee and the elbow on the provinces because it is the taxpayer who is getting hurt. The situation is rapidly becoming intolerable. Today we have bigger and bigger chunks of our income going toward taxes. Yet federal taxes increased last year and provincial and municipal taxes increased last year. The average municipal property tax increase across Canada has gone from 8 per cent to 12 per cent in the last number of years and this year will be as high if not higher.

We must ask ourselves when this will stop. The way to begin to stop is by having discussion and agreement on priorities. The provinces want to talk but the government seems to be reluctant to talk with them. The country today is not getting a co-ordinated approach. This is only possible if there is active co-operation. There is only inaction in respect of the request of the provinces to meet with the Prime Minister to talk about tax reform. He said he would not meet with them on that subject.

In this regard the attitude of the government toward the provinces on the subject of medicare, for example, is not only cold but borders on the irresponsible. I believe that the provinces want a program of medicare but nearly all the provinces are concerned about the financial effect and the effect it would have on their other programs of high priority. Obviously the pressure to join in the federal program is mounting because the taxpayers across Canada are paying their share of the cost of the program in the provinces where the program is in effect. Here again the provinces have joined in asking the federal government for discussion in this regard and have been refused. Surely this makes a mockery of the reference in the Speech from the Throne to priorities.

What a piece of cynicism it is now for the government to embark on a federal-provincial study of joint programs as announced recently by the Prime Minister. It is not only the provinces which have concern about some of these things; it is also the cabinet. The Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans), as reported on January 16 by the Globe and Mail, said:

> If we insist in going ahead the kind of weight that we put on the economy is going to result—not by itself, but in combination with measures we take if we even ever take them to resolve our housing problem and our other problems—is going to put pressure on our economy to the extent that we will be facing a devaluation within a year or two at the outside.

This is what the present Postmaster General said in January. Again, in Halifax he said that the extra taxes medicare would require would hurt Canada's export position. Then in Toronto he said:

> I want medicare, and I want it very badly, but I don't want it with a financial crisis.

Then we have the new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) who said that medicare should be postponed until such time as it can be financed without tax increases and that medicare should not be implemented until two-thirds of the provinces with two thirds of the population are prepared to join. We have no less a figure than the deputy prime minister, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), saying, as quoted in the Ottawa Citizen of January 15, that a second look at medicare is needed. Then the following appeared in the Montreal Gazette for January 12:

> Government's medicare policy is "a little inconsistent". This inconsistency comes from the fact that the government is urging restraint on the one hand, while encouraging wide-scale spending on the other. Mr. Hellyer indicated that if he wins the leadership at the April 4-6 convention, he will launch a complete re-appraisal of the medicare plan.

In the light of these opinions within the government and the clear difficulties of the provinces with regard to mounting taxes I ask why the government of Canada will not meet with the provinces to discuss the financial problems pertaining to this program. Is this sort of political blackmail consonant with the "just society"? We on this side of the house said we would meet with the provinces to discuss this matter with them. This surely is obviously right. Many members of the present cabinet obviously think it is right and said so quite freely when they felt free to say

The most striking indication of coldness and casualness in the Speech from the Throne toward the poor people of Canada is that there is apparently plenty of room for the poor in the just society envisaged by this government. In the Speech from the Throne we were given a lecture on the difficulties, complexities and the time it takes to do something about poverty. We all know that. We did not need a lecture on that. What we needed, Mr. Speaker, was a challenge to us and to the people of Canada to attack this problem. What we needed was action. Of course, any serious anti-poverty program is complex and requires time. That is why it is necessary to start now. So far as we can judge from the Speech from the Throne, even a start on the anti-poverty program is some distance away.

I have long felt that the extent of poverty in Canada is a national disgrace. I have said here that I have dedicated this party to fighting it now. We realize it is difficult. We realize it takes time. We made proposals which were somewhat twisted and suggestions of irresponsibility were made. The members of the Economic Council of Canada, Mr. Speaker, are not irresponsible and they have thoroughly supported the position I took. Look at the names of the members of the Economic Council of Canada! You will find there some of the most responsible men in Canada. They find that poverty is a disgrace, that it is widespread. They find that present programs are inadequate and frequently trap people in poverty, involving as they sometimes do a 100 per cent tax on any earnings. The economic council finds a need for bold new approaches, both in terms of adequate coverage and in terms of rehabilitation. They suggest an examination of proposals such as the negative income tax now being considered in the United States, since it may play a possible role in getting people off welfare and back into the mainstream of society. Above all, the Economic Council of Canada emphasizes, as we have, the urgency of meeting the provinces and planning a start.

One might ask about costs. Let us consider the costs as they are today, the money cost of present programs as well as the hidden costs in respect of poverty, suffering and frustration, and the harm being done to our rate of growth and productivity. I say, Mr. Speaker, that constructive measures to fight poverty are demanded by any country wishing to use wisely its human resources. We must finance this program from growth, but we must start our planning now. The Economic Council of Canada challenged the Prime Minister, challenged the government. I challenge the government.

So far as the Speech from the Throne is concerned what we have is not a program but a lecture, a pretence, that the projected department of regional development constitutes a measure against poverty. The government of Canada has done precisely what the Economic Council begged us not to do, that is, confuse the problem of economic disparity with the problem of poverty which exists right across our country, even in our most prosperous cities.

I say that in the light of the report of the Economic Council of Canada the Speech from the Throne is a failure and shows a lack of understanding. This is the same government which recently abolished the program of winter works. Of course there were abuses in the winter works program. Of course there were reforms that should have been made. But the decision to cancel was wrong. We will see just how wrong it was when we get the statistics on unemployment in the course of this winter. There might not be much suffering in this comfortable green chamber but there will be plenty of it across Canada.

The decision to cancel the winter works program was wrong from the point of view of time, wrong from the point of view of the provincial-municipal partners since there was no serious consultation or examination of the effects. The decision was wrong because of the phony case the Prime Minister made to support his decision. The manpower programs are not applicable to many who would have benefited this winter from the winter works program. As the Toronto Star indicated, the critical question is whether the federal government has a better program to replace it. If it has not, there will be unnecessary suffering in Canada this winter and there will, of course, be an additional burden on our municipalities.

I mentioned regional disparity, and presumably I will have further opportunities to discuss this subject when the bill comes forward establishing the new department. I just want to say this to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. A few months ago he created high expectations with regard to curing regional disparity. I want him to know that we are going to hold him to those expectations. What happened to that Marshall plan for the Atlantic provinces? The only action so far of which anybody is aware is consideration of whether or not the Prince Edward Island causeway ought to be deferred. The Speech from the Throne ignored virtually everything the Economic Council of Canada had to say about economic disparity. There was no mention of the problems of transportation, and the findings of the Economic Council of Canada were that the policies of the federal government in the past have probably hindered as much as they have helped in curing economic disparity.

There is no recognition in the Speech from the Throne of anything like the degree of co-ordination of policy which the Economic Council of Canada recommends. We will hold this government to its commitments. I want to say that so long as the government of Canada continues a stop-start policy, starting the economy up and running into excessive inflation, tightening things up and slowing things down, thus killing any development there may be in those areas suffering from economic disparity, so long as the government does not do better than that with regard to anti-inflationary programs there will be no rapid cure or even substantial improvement in economic disparity.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we come to the problem of housing which is related to poverty but, of course, is a much broader question. There is no need to elaborate on the failure of government policy in recent years in the field of housing. The hardships inflicted on thousands of families as a result of rapidly climbing rents are well known. Even the city of Ottawa has asked the province for the power to control rents. These conditions are directly attributable to economic conditions in the country.

The Economic Council of Canada estimated there was a need for an average of 190,000 new units a year between 1966 and 1970. In order to meet this goal we are going to need over 221,000 homes each year in 1969 and 1970. We can hope for the best but in view of the performance of this government in recent years we really have not too much foundation for hope. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) is going off with his task force. Again, I hope for the best. I am sending a representative to keep me informed and do what he can to help in the development of government policy. They seem to need some help. When the Minister of Transport was asked whether he thought this task force would reveal anything new he said that he had a sneaking suspicion or intuition that it would. I pity the people of a country who must rely on the sneaking suspicions of the Minister of Transport.

One wonders about this task force, when Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is going to subsidize another, more promising effort, the conference sponsored by the Canadian Welfare Council in Toronto next month, and there will be people representing the official opposition there, too. This task force of the Minister of Transport is a one-shot effort. We have suggested a continuing task force with provincial and municipal representation, able to take account of different regional needs, different regional problems and different regional opportunities, but this has been brushed aside. The experience with previous regional seminars sponsored by the former minister is not very encouraging; we know that.

Then, of course, we have the question of the phenomenal interest rates that existed a few months ago and have trapped thousands of Canadians into being committed to paying astronomical interest rates for years because of the errors of judgment made by the Liberal government in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: When, in the course of the election campaign, I made a very modest suggestion, trying to afford a little relief to these people who were trapped by the folly of the government, the reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was that my suggestion would upset Bay street. If this is the sort of basis which he uses for policy judgments, it is no wonder that his attitude with regard to Czechoslovakia and Nigeria has been so mechanical and insensitive. I am sorry the minister is not in his seat.

Mr. Woolliams: And not very sensible.

Mr. Stanfield: So far as Czechoslovakia is concerned the attitude of the government seems to be pretty well summed up in the admission of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) last week that it was only a week before—I think on September 6—that he had instructions sent to his immigration people in Europe to render assistance to Czech refugees.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): He is still trying to figure out Inverness.

Mr. Stanfield: It was a long time after Russia had invaded Czechoslovakia that the minister moved. This is a pretty good indication of the detachment of this government with regard to the problems of Czechoslovakian refugees. I say, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians are not at all proud of their government in this regard, and they are not all proud of the government's half-hearted response to the starvation and misery in Nigeria. Far from reassuring Canadians that we are pulling our weight in trying to alleviate this extreme tragedy, with genocide perhaps involved, the response of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to questions asked him in the House of Commons on the Friday last simply confirmed the very widely held view among Canadians that this government has not been exerting itself and is not willing to do so in the face of this great tragedy.

The suggestion by the minister that the Organization for African Unity should be the sponsor of any appeal to the United Nations is completely inadequate, a lame excuse by a lame government. Thousands of members of the commonwealth are dying daily. The O.A.U. nations are not anxious to bring this question to the United Nations. They feel, I suppose, that it would be an admission of the ineffectiveness of their organization.

The O.A.U. opened its sessions on Friday. The Biafran war was the sixth item on its agenda. Four African nations appear anxious to discuss the question. In any case, how can a Canadian minister argue, in effect, that the Biafran question is a strictly African matter when Britain and the U.S.S.R. are so deeply implicated? The statement by the minister that no government is more active in providing pressure for a settlement, or more generous in providing relief, is a typical bureaucratic dodge. Surely Canada's performance is not to be judged by the performance of others but rather by the effectiveness of what we are doing.

I am told that women and children are dying at the rate of some 6,000 a day. They cannot live on comparisons. I say that Canada must lead. Canada must lead where others have failed to lead or are unable to lead. Britain, the U.S.S.R., France and the United States are either implicated or unable to act. We in Canada have a special responsibility. The commonwealth still exists, despite what some people think, and these people are brothers of the commonwealth.

The government of Canada should stop sitting back, trying to avoid its responsibilities, and should get to work. The government of Canada will have the people of Canada fully behind it if, even at this late hour, it bestirs itself to act. The casual attitude of the government has left a bad taste in the mouths of our people and certainly makes us look pretty cold.

There are many items which we will be discussing at another time, matters relating to NATO, NORAD and the whole field of foreign policy. It must be clear by now why we on this side of the house wanted an earlier sitting of parliament. We wanted it in order to get to work and to get the government to work on the backlog of legislation. We wanted to try to stir the government out of its casualness, to wake it up and get it moving.

In judging a government one has to be realistic. It would be nonsense for me or anybody else to attack the Prime Minister and his colleagues for not solving in five months all the problems of this country, many of which have been around for a long time. I can certainly be this generous: I will not even attempt to emphasize the legacy of failure they left the country under a former and different government in which 16 of them served, 7 since 1963.

However, I want to make the point that the present and future failures of this government cannot be attributed to inexperience. When the election was over, Canadians hoped that the government would achieve the expectations it had aroused and would begin to deal with these problems that have been too long ignored. The throne speech is not merely a disappointment of high expectations. That would be bad enough. The speech signifies a failure of responsibility to deal with problems which cannot be delayed and are not academic.

The excuse has been made that this is the first throne speech of a four-year parliament and therefore the government can be excused for concentrating on old promises and proposing nothing new. That is a very empty excuse. Surely this government is not so isolated from the real problems of the country as to think that the only backlog they have to worry about is on the registers of parliament. If they think there is a backlog of business here, let them look at the backlog of business in the country.

The effect of this throne speech is to commit parliament for at least another session to the priorities of the former administration, priorities which were inadequate even in their own day and which it would be very wrong to continue today. It would be rather as though the late President Kennedy had chosen in his inaugural speech to announce that Harry Truman had left a few things undone and he had a list of them right there. President Kennedy did not do that because his was a government of genuine commitment, a government of the heart as well as the head.

All around us there is accumulated in the country frustration, dissatisfaction, dissent and protest that has often descended to violence—protests against the failure of society to eradicate poverty, overcome prejudice and discrimination, and to find ways of living at peace rather than in conflict and war. Does this government really think that time is on its side, that it can plod its way mechanically and methodically through the agenda of the last parliament, and that Canada will be immune from the forces of dissent and challenge that have erupted everywhere else in the world? There is not a chance. These forces are born out of disillusionment and frustration, and disillusionment and frustration will soon set in in this country unless the government exerts itself to honour the expectations it aroused.

The most serious failure of the Speech from the Throne is the simple failure of commitment. This is not merely a dry document; it is almost inhumane. A stranger reading the throne speech would conclude that we are a country with few problems and not one bit of passion, a country whose most serious business is to listen to lectures about the nature of justice. Men were striving for justice in society long before this government discovered its mission and they will be striving for justice long after this government is gone and forgotten. But the process will not be advanced if we debase the goal of justice by making it an empty promise or an abstract slogan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It will not be advanced by a government which constructs plans and ignores people, nor by a government which, faced with the urgent priorities of poverty and unemployment, lagging growth and serious restraints, chooses to confine itself principally to legal conceptions and the inadequate priorities of the past.

The government warns us in tones of piety that there are no simple solutions. That is not news to anyone on this side of the house. It was not this party which trafficked in the illusion of simple solutions. But if solutions are not simple, they are at least possible. If they cannot be achieved immediately, and often they cannot, they can at least be begun. And there has been no beginning in the Speech from the Throne.

It is bad enough that the first Speech from the Throne tells us nothing of the plans of the government to meet the urgent and immediate problems of the country. What is worse is that we still know nothing of the long term plans of the government. Canadians do not know what the government plans to do with Canada. The ministers had a chance to state their plans for Canada during the election campaign and they chose not to. They had an obligation to do so in the throne speech and again they have refused. On that record it is fair to conclude that they have no plans, they have no commitments; they are simply not prepared to provide the leadership this country needs and wants.

We are at the beginning of a new parliament and at the beginning of what could still become a new era in Canada. During the celebrations last year this country became alive again and aware of its potential. There was everywhere the sense that Canada could become a nation of excitement and of excellence. We all knew it would not be easy but we also knew that fortune had been good to us. We are a nation unlike any other in the world, rich enough in wealth and opportunity to make the promise of equality come true and rich enough in cultures and in learning to set a high example for the world. There was a sense that we were a nation whose time had come. It was in such a spirit that we entered the election from which this parliament has come. Frequently in that campaign I urged Canadians to elect a government which would be worthy of this country. It is a personal tribute to the Prime Minister that many Canadians believed they had elected such a government. It is a matter of profound regret that default should be so immediate and so grievous. It is for this reason that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the following amendment to the address:

> But we respectfully regret that Your Excellency's advisers have refused to recognize or respond to Canada's current and urgent economic and social problems; and have failed to provide parliament with an agenda of priorities to define and implement the "Just Society".

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks by paying tribute to my distinguished predecessor, Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. If he had simply withdrawn to a well earned retirement, I would have wanted to say a few words about the long years of service which he devoted to the international community, to his country and to this house and about the many achievements which history will record under his name. How much more does he deserve our respect and gratitude for continuing his service to mankind on a truly global scale. All of us in this house who have known and worked with Mr. Pearson are aware of his deep interest in what may be the most important issue of our age—the division of the world into rich nations and poor. We can share Mr. Pearson's evident pleasure that as leader of a special task force for the World Bank he has found a way to make an important contribution to our knowledge of this problem and to our search for practical solutions. I am sure that all members of this house would wish to join me in expressing our admiration for this great Canadian of world stature and in wishing him success in his challenging task.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speeches of those who moved and seconded the address in reply. I was very much impressed by those two young candidates when, last spring during the election campaign, I spoke in their respective electoral districts.

Their speeches last Friday expressed clearly and logically their interest in, and I would even say, their devotion to the common weal, generally, and to the rights of minorities, in particular, and confirmed my opinion that they will become outstanding members of this house.

I also wish to welcome all the members who have been elected for the first time and those who have been re-elected.

Looking about me this afternoon, I have the feeling that the members constitute a parliament of extraordinary calibre. It was pointed out to me that the average age of the members is lower than it was in former parliaments, but that does not mean that in certain cases, those who have replaced older members lack experience or maturity. On the contrary, many of the new members have already had extremely successful careers in other fields, and are capable of contributing immediately to the knowledge and judgment on which any good legislation depends.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) claims that the Speech from the Throne rather surprised and disappointed him. He said it was a failure. The contrary would have surprised us.

In my opinion, had the speech been dictated by the Holy Spirit himself to the governor general, the Leader of the Opposition would have deemed necessary to present a motion of non-confidence to the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I must say, therefore, that his opinion did not upset me too much. I did not expect him to like the Speech from the Throne, but I did not expect him to be surprised either, nor did I expect him to say of the speech that it was a "failure".

All through last spring he told Canadians that if they elected our government it would be disastrous from every point of view. When the new cabinet was appointed, early last summer, he repeated that it was a major disaster. He should therefore not be surprised that the speech fell short of his expectations.

Still, certain aspects of the speech held his attention—we will come back to that later. However, there is one aspect on which I had not, until now, felt the need to speak and which the governor general did not bring up in his Speech from the Throne; namely, that of the monarchy.

I shall merely say that we are not of those who constantly feel the need to protest their loyalty in this regard.

I think that it is the responsibility of the opposition to oppose, but in my opinion there might have been a slight exaggeration when the Speech from the Throne was described as a failure.

I would not be surprised if the acting leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Lewis) should feel compelled to move a subamendment to deplore its deficiencies. But what is important, Mr. Speaker, is what we are going to do in this house—in short what all the members are going to do to contribute to the formulation of a forward looking legislation which will meet the problems, and it is a little on that subject I should like to speak this afternoon.

• (4:40 p.m.)

[English]

During the life of this parliament we will be called upon to discuss many important issues. But surely the central questions we should be asking ourselves at the beginning of this first session are about the kind of country in which we want to be living and the directions in which we should be moving to build such a country.

Part of the answer to these questions is quite clear from our experience in the election. It is obvious that the Canadian people in all regions feel concerned as never before about the future of the country and the quality of life it will offer to the individual. They are enthusiastic about that future and have great confidence in it; greater confidence, I must say, Mr. Speaker, than the opposition has ever shown or than the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) managed to show in his speech this afternoon.

The people of this country want to live in a land with a rising standard of living, equitably distributed among regions and individuals. They want a social security system which will underwrite the risks and hazards of modern life and provide minimum standards of health and welfare for every citizen. They want a country which is in the forefront of scientific and technical advance and which is adequately equipped with facilities for education and research. They want a society which has not lost sight of man's spiritual values, of his unquenchable thirst for beauty, for the pleasure of the mind and the body, and for companionship and solitude. In short, their expectations are extremely high.

The phenomenon of rising expectations has been observed in all parts of the world as communications and education improve and as the disparities between regions and countries become more evident. In Canada it is intensified by our proximity to the most prosperous nation in the world and by our increasing awareness of the enormous potential of our human and natural resources.

While it is desirable for a country and its government to be spurred on by the high expectations of its citizens, it would be irresponsible for political leaders not to point out the limits of the immediately attainable at any point in time. One obvious limitation to government action is the available supply of resources, not just financial resources but those of intellect, environment and time.

In marshalling its financial resources the government must co-ordinate its policies and actions with the over-all demands of the Canadian economy. It cannot, for example, ignore our pressing need for capital accumulation and investment.

The comparatively large number of young people in Canada creates a high demand for capital in housing, education and training institutions, and in the creation of new employment opportunities. Our national resource industries, which must be developed on a large scale to achieve low production costs, and our transportation and communication facilities, which are so important to the development of the country, require large amounts of capital.

Both our taxation and our borrowing policies must reflect these necessities. It would be self-defeating if the rate or incidence of taxes was to inhibit the growth of the economy or if the amount of government borrowing was to absorb a disproportionate share of available capital and exert inflationary pressure on interest rates. All these factors impose severe limitations on the size of government revenues.

Even if the government were to introduce no new programs, the costs of some existing ones will rise faster than any reasonable estimate of the rates of growth of our economy and of government revenues. Under federal-provincial arrangements which now exist in the field of health services, welfare programs and post-secondary education, for example, developments over which the federal government has little or no control will result in substantial and continuous increases in the demands on the federal treasury. The magnitude of this problem is apparent when we realize that the costs which are shared by the federal and provincial governments in these activities could more than double in the next four years from their current high level of approximately $3.5 billion.

In the case of new programs and expenditures it is not sufficient that they be desirable in themselves. They must be justified in relation to all competitive claims on the limited supply of resources. For example, the undeniable need for public investment in scientific research cannot be considered in isolation from the ever-rising costs of social welfare.

That is why it is an essential and continuous responsibility of government to choose, to plan and to set out priorities. As people demand more services of their governments this task becomes ever more complex. Valid choices can only be based on a thorough knowledge of the alternatives and on an estimate of the comparative costs and benefits of such alternatives. For this reason, we attach particular importance to the establishment of a research institute to assist government in its long term planning, similar to those already operating in other countries. This institute would conduct fundamental research both for the federal government and for those provincial governments who wish to avail themselves of its services. While initially it would be in part publicly financed, it would be an independent and autonomous institution. It would work closely with the proposed international development centre and should provide an important data and information bank which would be readily available to universities throughout the country.

Within the cabinet we have established a committee on priorities and planning whose function is to allocate our present and our estimated future resources according to the urgency of the demands on them. The balance between demands and resources can never be finally established, but in the present circumstances of competing demands and rapidly rising costs we must exercise the utmost restraint in introducing new programs or expanding existing ones. We must terminate any programs which have been replaced by more productive ones, and we must defer any which are not immediately essential.

In the past few weeks we have demonstrated our resolve to implement this policy by our decisions on the winter works program, the freeze on civil service growth, and other cuts in expenditure. We have also issued explicit guide lines to be used in the preparation of the estimates for 1969-70 and we will not hesitate to take whatever other actions may be necessary to restrain the growth in our expendiures.

Another inescapable limitation on the government's ability to satisfy the demands of many citizens results from the federal nature of our state. If federalism is to work, each level of government must restrict itself to those matters allotted to it under the constitution. Thus it sometimes happens that when citizens bring acute social problems or even injustices to the attention of the federal government, we find that the immediate remedy lies in the field of provincial action. In such cases, however strong our feelings on the subject, we have no alternative but to advise them to direct their complaint to their provincial government.

Of course there are complex problems whose many facets do not lie exclusively within one jurisdiction and which can only be resolved by co-operation between federal and provincial governments.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that it has been somewhat fashionable for some years now, to consider with a touch of irony that form of co-operative federalism, but if a federative system of government is to operate, it is obvious that this kind of co-operation is not only useful but absolutely indispensable. I want to reassure the Leader of the Opposition who seemed to indicate that I had refused to discuss with the provinces a number of problems relating to the matter of costs and cost-sharing programs. In fact, I want to remind him what I said again this afternoon in reply to a question put to me just before he rose. For quite some time, and no later than a fortnight ago, meetings had been held between federal and provincial officials preparatory to a federal-provincial conference where all those problems, those cost-sharing programs would be discussed, provided of course that the provinces choose to put them on the agenda.

Consequently, let him be reassured, we believe in the co-operation of the provinces and the federal government; we think that many of those questions can be settled only as a result of negotiations which could last for some time. But we are optimistic.

I want to reassure the Leader of the Opposition by telling him that I also wrote to all the provincial premiers during the summer to advise them about the meetings at the official level, in preparation for the federal-provincial conference at the government level. Moreover, I recently invited them by correspondence to find a date—during November or December—in order to continue this federal-provincial conference on constitutional questions to which we attach the highest importance.

[English]

Within these limitations, I would like to mention a few of the top priorities for government and parliamentary action over the next few years.

A primary responsibility of the federal government is to represent the Canadian people in international affairs.

Had the world required any evidence that the course of international events cannot be predicted with accuracy, it came forcefully in the latter part of August when several of the Warsaw pact countries invaded another of the Warsaw pact countries, Czechoslovakia. And had Canadians required any evidence that there are very real limitations to effective freedom of action in the international arena, it was provided by this same event.

We in this country are not so immature as to believe that we can, in effect, be the sole masters of our destiny in this changing and challenging world. We know that total freedom of action is not possessed by even the mightiest of world powers; that we live in an interdependent age which creates both its own expectations and its own frustrations. With these facts we are familiar. With these facts we must be prepared to live.

Our objectives must be pursued within the perimeters of our geographical position, of our dependence on foreign trade, of our special relationships with NATO and commonwealth members and those other countries, such as the French speaking states, with whom we have particularly close ties, and with those international organizations, particularly the United Nations, of which we are a member.

As we reappraise our place in the world, we need to give careful thought to our relationship with the United States. This government attaches importance to continuing the close and effective consultation we have enjoyed with the United States over the years, and this house is well aware of the numerous institutional arrangements that exist for this purpose. It is essential that this relationship should be pursued with the clear understanding, however, that Canada intends to have a distinctive personality and genuine role in the world separate from that of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I need not remind the house of the difficult problems that continually arise to bedevil Canada-United States relations. We must approach the solution of these problems with good sense and with a genuine appreciation of where Canada's real interests lie. I am confident that this motivation of our genuine national interest will be understood and, indeed, in the long run, welcomed in Washington. We, for our part, must also seek to understand the great burdens which fall on the United States by virtue of its leading role in the world, even though we may frequently disagree, sometimes quite strongly, with their policies.

One of the primary purposes of our foreign policy must be to ensure the political survival and independence of Canada. Such a policy should reinforce our national unity. Such a policy we propose to pursue. We propose in these respects to continue the consultations already commenced with provincial governments to establish procedures which take account both of the legitimate aspirations and needs of the provinces and the need to ensure that Canada remains strong and united and speaks abroad with one voice. It is intended that greater advantage be taken of the many opportunities inherent in the bilingual character of Canada to develop further our external, political, economic, and cultural relations abroad.

The review of Canadian defence policy commenced earlier this year is progressing, taking into account recent events, and anticipating so far as is humanly possible the course of world events as they may be expected to unfold.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

The review of Canadian foreign policy is continuing apace. Among other events, plans are now complete for the departure of a ministerial-level mission to South America in a few weeks' time. This mission will be charged with demonstrating to our western hemisphere neighbours the importance which the government attaches to our relations with them, and with the task of studying how best to promote these relations and Canada's interests in this hemisphere.

It is our deeply held view that despite the contribution which external aid has made, and continues to make, to the betterment of conditions in the developing countries, it cannot by itself provide an answer to the problem of the ever-increasing disparities between the developed and developing parts of the world. For this reason, we feel it necessary, while continuing to expand our aid efforts, to devote ever greater attention and energy to the provision of opportunities for these countries to better their lot through their own trading efforts.

In this spirit we are working with others to secure better trade opportunities and international financial arrangements for the developing countries. For example, we are most active in current negotiations for commodity agreements relating to certain tropical products important to a number of developing countries. As well, arrangements are being improved to encourage Canadians to place their energies and talents at the service of developing countries and to provide incentives to Canadian business and industry to participate in development projects.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to add a few words about the relations between Canada and France.

The Canadian government feels that it is of the utmost importance to maintain and develop the closest ties with France. Those ties are even more important at a time when the government has undertaken to strengthen the rights of the French-speaking Canadians throughout the whole country, at a time when the government has stressed the need to protect the right of the people to get their education and to communicate with the governments in the language of their choice.

We are very happy about the help that France and the other French-speaking countries might want to give Canada to further the French language and culture in our country. But we also want the French government to provide that assistance in such a way that it will improve the situation of the French-speaking Canadians throughout the country and not in a way that might contribute to divide our country. It is because that matter is of fundamental importance and not only a matter of protocol that the government feels that it has the right to be informed, consulted by the French government about activities such as those which made front page news these last few days. The government of Canada has made its position known to the French government.

But before ending my remarks on international matters, I would like to say a few words about the way many Canadians react at times of crisis in international affairs. Whether it is about Viet Nam, Nigeria or Czechoslovakia, Canadians have been less concerned with the political or military consequences of the events than by their impact on the human being. Canadians somewhat identified their interests with those of wretched people in each of those countries. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that such a concern shown by individuals for individuals is a very noble characteristic of Canadian opinion today.

Mr. Trudeau: This generous concern is certainly the supporting strength for a great many activities in university circles, for instance, and in other spheres, when they protest against the use of force or violence.

Those who want to find excuses are greatly tempted, at the time of a conflict, to hide the sufferings of peoples and individuals behind a surface of patriotism or pride. Reasons of state are often invoked and it is to the credit of all Canadians, especially the young, Mr. Speaker, to have shown that they do not accept automatically reasons of state as an excuse for suffering and death. They think of war in terms of human beings; they think of it in terms of women, children and innocent persons, victims of events. They ask questions which, until now, were primarily a subject of concern for philosophers or poets. Let us recall Pascal who said: "It is a fine kind of justice that has a river for its boundary". One remembers these remarks of a man who told another: "Since your prince is at war with mine, I must kill you".

But nowadays our youth, all our Canadian people are concerned about those problems, are acting as our conscience and for that we are grateful to them. I am deeply encouraged in seeing that in Canada such a sense of compassion was shown towards the starving people of Biafra, towards the refugees from Czechoslovakia and the village inhabitants in Viet Nam. That indicates the very deep human qualities of the Canadian people. On the other hand, I acknowledge the feelings of anger, futility, frustration, on the part of many Canadians, on account of our apparent inability to reduce such suffering. I acknowledge those feelings of frustration and anger as I believe we all have a share in them. They were expressed in this house last Friday, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) when, having been asked about our efforts to assist the refugees from Biafra, he indicated the difficulties holding back the efforts of Canadians to assist the parties in the conflict.

[English]

It is generally agreed that the most feasible channel of food aid and medical assistance to all the people of Nigeria is provided by the international relief agencies. We have accordingly supplied considerable quantities of food and other relief items to the International Red Cross which is co-ordinating these activities, and have promised additional help, such as the provision of cargo aircraft, wherever and whenever that help can be used. The difficulties which stand in the way of these humanitarian efforts come not only from the federal government of Nigeria, however; they come as well from the authorities in Biafra. The airlift relief supplies organized by the Red Cross and agreed to by the Nigerian government could not proceed because of a refusal of landing rights from Biafra.

• (5:10 p.m.)

I also want to speak about our humanitarian response to the events in Czechoslovakia. Our efforts are concentrated on assisting Czechoslovak refugees to settle in Canada. I think we can be justifiably proud of our record in this respect. Over the week end 280 refugees arrived, 267 of them on government sponsorship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: On Tuesday and Thursday of this week two more flights will arrive, totalling 266 persons. We are continuing to process applications. Our embassy in Vienna is conducting 150 interviews per day. As of Friday last the number of inquiries from Czechs totalled 2,374; the number of actual applications for entry to Canada, many of them involving entire families, was 901.

In all these matters, Mr. Speaker, we are limited, but we must never cease trying. We must never accept the view that there is nothing we can do. For these reasons I welcome the evidence of widespread Canadian compassion. I welcome suggestions from any source of ways that we might help our fellow man.

Cynicism and detachment are not part of the Canadian character. They have no place in our foreign policy. I will not accept them as synonyms for realism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Turning to our domestic problems, perhaps the most intractable is the continuing poverty of far too many of our citizens. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) dwelt at some length on this subject. I would like to do so too, Mr. Speaker. I would just add that we did not wait for the report of the economic council to discover this very great tragedy in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: This problem, however, is one which goes back into our history and which is made more acute by our geography. Even in a unitary state with unlimited funds and manpower we could not eradicate it in a short period. But if we are to live up to the expectations of the Canadian people we must make the best use of available techniques and devise new and better ones to deal with this cruel and costly blemish on our increasingly wealthy society.

I have often mentioned the responsibility of the more affluent segments of our society toward the less privileged ones. The majority of us have already satisfied our right to a minimum standard of satisfactory living. It is those who have not who need government help.

In order to focus programs on those who need them we must define, with as much clarity as possible, the essential components of a minimum standard for satisfactory living—not a subsistence standard but one which allows for dignity and decency. Defining the components of such a standard is a tremendously complex task. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is something which must be done if we are to fashion the tools with which to measure, with some precision, social investments. The development of more accurate tools of measurement is one of the first tasks which confronts a government determined to improve the effectiveness of its social programs.

Meanwhile, poverty cannot wait. Many of our people need help now. Most Canadians are unaware of the scope and scale of the programs at present available in this field. A recent index lists 159 of them. This is our common legacy from previous parliaments. They range from manpower retraining programs to student loans. In 1966-67 income security payments and health and welfare services cost Canadian taxpayers $5.4 billion. We have recognized that these measures, often devised on an ad hoc basis and never properly co-ordinated, are no longer adequate to deal with our current problems.

As a first step towards better co-ordination—and here again we did not wait for the report of the economic council to discover this—we have consolidated all our regional development programs into a single department. For several months the government has been carrying out an over-all assessment of its social security programs. The conclusions reached will enable the cabinet to consider alternative methods of ensuring that our diverse efforts in this field are concentrated in the areas of greatest need.

While poverty is a condition that exists in all parts of Canada there are particular aspects of the problem of underdevelopment and underemployment that relate to certain regions. While there are local exceptions it is broadly true that those areas of Canada east of a line at about Trois-Rivières have not shared in economic growth and development to the same extent as areas west of that line. The Atlantic provinces are deeply concerned by this problem and, indeed, at the constitutional conference of last February the premier of Nova Scotia stressed that the reduction of regional disparities must be one of the objectives of a healthy confederation for the future. This government fully shares that view, and it is for that reason that we made a matter of priority the consolidation of all regional development programs into a single department.

Substantial progress has been made since the government took office on the governmental reorganization that is necessary to achieve these and other objectives that I announced on July 5. Since that time 12 special task forces have been at work sorting out all the details of organization, personnel and administration that are involved in these changes of function. Legal provision has been made, in so far as it is possible, under the Public Service Re-arrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, and the new departments are operating in fact although they cannot be fully organized and cannot exist in name until legislation is passed by parliament. That legislation will be ready for parliamentary consideration just as soon as it can be reached in the program of work that I announced on September 12.

No government concerned about either the economic or the human development and future of this country can fail to be closely interested in the northern parts of Canada where so much development is still to be achieved and of which we hope so much. That is why I thought it right that my first major trip in Canada after becoming Prime Minister should be to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. It was not my first trip to the far north but it was by far the most comprehensive. Like all who have travelled there I was overwhelmed by its vastness, impressed by the beauty of many areas, concerned by the human problems of many of its people, and inspired by the prospect of what I feel sure we can achieve.

A great deal has been accomplished in bringing education, vocational training and better housing to the Indians, the Eskimos and others resident in the north, but much remains to be done. The welfare of these people must be a major and active concern of the government, and a vitally important part of that concern must manifest itself in our efforts to stimulate the economic development on which future employment and prosperity will depend.

It was for this reason that the government, under the initiative of the former minister of Indian affairs and northern development, entered into participation with Panarctic Oils Limited for a major oil exploration program in the Queen Elizabeth Islands. This was the first year of that program and already it is ahead of its initial plans. More than 600 miles of seismic work has been done and more than 1,000 miles will be finished by the end of the year. The first drilling, based on the results of the seismic work, is planned for March, 1969.

In the course of my trip it was brought home to me that there is another aspect to the human problem in the north, an aspect other than that relating to economics and development. It is the problem of isolation, the product of enormous distances and sparse population. There are many problems of life in the north that we cannot overcome but this is one we can overcome, not just in the far north but in the remoter portions of the provinces. The sense of isolation can be reduced and the possibility of participation in Canadian life enormously increased by better communications. That is why the government is going ahead actively with the development of satellite communications for this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: If Canada were to limit itself to microwave networks and other means of surface communications it would be almost impossible to cover our remote areas. By use of satellites distance can be obliterated. We can bring television to all parts of the country not simply for recreation and entertainment, although these are important in remote areas, but to inform all our people on everything of concern to them in the world and the nation. Since the publication of the white paper on "A Domestic Satellite Communication System for Canada," a publication which came out last April, the government has had a special task force at work on planning a corporation to operate such a system. Study is well advanced on the problems of design and launching the necessary satellites, and legislation to provide the legal basis for action will be ready for introduction in this session of parliament.

Just as the establishment of effective transportation helped to build Canada in the 19th and 20 centuries, the establishment of rapid and effective communications in the future will help to keep it together. The new department of communications will, I hope, help to speed up the growth of effective and up to date communication links everywhere and at the same time provide a measure of regulation and vigilance over developments which can drastically affect the life of every Canadian.

Development in a particular region promotes the general well-being of Canada. For example, in British Columbia we see a continuation of activity which, though regional, has a profound impact on the totality of our country. The expansion of our trade with Japan, which has doubled in five years to approximately $600 million in exports and $300 million in imports, makes Japan our third largest trading partner and emphasizes the importance to Canada of our Pacific trade. The growth in this trade and in particular the large new coal contracts with Japan require the development of such enterprises as the Roberts Bank ocean shipping terminal on which the federal government will spend $6 million to develop the waterfront installation while the provincial government will develop supporting facilities. Also associated with this development of Vancouver as the Pacific metropolis of our country is the intensive renovation by the federal government at a cost of $32 million of the Vancouver international airport which will improve our access to the Far East and also enhance our national air transportation networks.

The federal government has also recognized the national importance of the Fraser river and the national consequences of the severe floods which have taken place and could occur on that river. Through a joint program of $40 million, the federal government will provide $18 million with the remainder being provided in British Columbia to carry out a major diking and flood control program on the Fraser.

The long strike of the grain handlers at the lakehead has now been settled, thanks in large part to the efforts of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), and western grain will again be moving in substantial volume through the lakehead to the millers and consumers in Canada and abroad.

However, the western wheat economy still has its problems with which we are very much concerned. The world wheat market is currently characterized by an excess of supplies over effective demand. Canadian wheat production from the current crop cannot be accurately estimated. Weather conditions have recently shown a marked improvement and the crop will probably be in the range of 550 million to 600 million bushels. Both the government and the wheat board are determined to maintain Canada's share of the world wheat market. The objective is to secure 25 per cent or better of the world wheat trade, or 1.3 billion bushels of wheat exports, in the next three years. The government will give the necessary support to the board's selling operations. This will include extension of credit arrangements and continuation of a high level of wheat and flour content in Canada's food aid program.

The Economic Council of Canada has dealt in its last review with the question of productivity in agriculture, including particularly the yield per acre achieved by Canadian wheat growers. We have just announced that preparations are under way for setting up a national grains council in order to mobilize more effectively the energies, knowledge and efforts of all segments of the grain industry to assist in every way in achieving our objectives with respect to the grain trade.

As hon. members are aware, the international grains arrangement entered into force on July 1. The first months of its operation have revealed certain problems in the pricing area. A meeting of major wheat exporters opens tomorrow in Canberra where governments particularly involved will have an opportunity to consider the whole question of wheat pricing. The Canadian delegation is headed by the deputy minister of trade and commerce and includes the chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board. In early October there will be a meeting of the prices review committee of the International Wheat Council.

The Canadian government will be making every effort to see that these international arrangements work successfully and that we attain our over-all export targets while being prepared, at the same time, for more fundamental re-examination of the wheat economy. One specific step which the government is taking is to introduce legislation to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. This will make it possible to double the advance payment on farm stored grains.

[Translation]

There is another even more important priority with which the government and parliament will have to deal during the next few years, Mr. Speaker: the extension and the protection of the linguistic rights of all Canadians. Noticeable progress has been made these past months in the extension of linguistic rights in most parts of the country. One of the successes of the constitutional conference last February was the agreement reached by all participants to declare that the rights of French-speaking Canadians in the other provinces should, in all justice, be the same as those of English-speaking Canadians in the province of Quebec. The same federal-provincial conference also approved the appointment of a special committee of representatives of the federal and provincial governments to study the report of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism and to seek together ways of implementing its recommendations.

These decisions are important, Mr. Speaker, but constitutional protection is even more important. Canadians are not only entitled to a just and fair administrative and governmental policy in all parts of the country, but the basic law of the land, the constitution of the country, must guarantee that they and their children will, in this respect, receive a fair and just treatment.

We expressed our disappointment, last February, concerning the attitude of some of the provinces which refused to come to an agreement with regard to a constitutional guarantee of linguistic rights. The federal government, for its part, decided that French and English must have absolute equality in all parliamentary and federal institutions.

For several years, the government has administered an extensive program for the development of bilinguism in the civil service and some 7,000 public servants have attended various language courses which we have made available at public expense.

In addition, as we indicated in the Speech from the Throne, the government has prepared a bill on the official languages based on the recommendations of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. The bill will be introduced at an early date during this session and will put forward the principles governing the use of the official languages as far as the federal government is concerned.

For example, the plan will guarantee that in the different parts of Canada where the minorities using one of the official languages are large enough, the public may obtain in the official language of their choice, some services from all departments, agencies and other federal institutions.

There has also been some progress from the linguistic point of view in several provinces. A year ago, Quebec was the only province where the right to speak in either French or English in the legislature was formally recognized. From now on, the same will apply in the four Atlantic provinces and the two central provinces.

Some substantial progress has also been realized in the field of education. Now, for the first time, in the ten provinces, the use of the official language of the minority as language of instruction in schools is recognized in various degrees. This is important progress towards linguistic equality, Mr. Speaker. But it would be tragic if, at the present time, disputes concerning the use of an official language in a province would mean the end of linguistic rights extended to people in other provinces.

The province of Quebec has, for generations, and more than any other province, assured linguistic equality to its English-speaking minority. I am sure that the great majority of French-speaking Canadians wish this equal treatment to continue.

• (5:30 p.m.)

[English]

English speaking Canadians must not allow a single incident to cause them to forget the basic principle that linguistic equality requires all provinces to recognize the right of parents to have their children educated in the official language of their choice. Despite recent developments we are far short of that goal. It will not be sufficient for government leaders or public bodies to declare themselves in favour of bilingualism or even to pass legislation on the subject. Facilities for education and public administration in both languages must be made available in practice. Governments must be prepared to spend the necessary funds and to insist on co-operation at all levels of the civil service. Until there are schools teaching in each language and government services operating in each language in every region where the composition of the population justifies it, our work will not be complete.

I spoke about this requirement for a strong and united Canada before I was chosen leader of my party, and our party continued to speak of it in all parts of the country during the election campaign. The evident enthusiasm of Canadians shows their agreement that a properly functioning bilingual state ranks high among our national objectives. As a government and as Canadians, we must accept nothing less.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that until such practical things are done, we ought not to be surprised that linguistic minorities in Quebec or in other provinces look for support outside of their provincial governments or even the federal government, so that such pious intentions, even the legislation, may be put into practice.

I would be the last one to blame those minorities, especially French-speaking minorities which, for many decades, have had to face declarations of intent and quite often could not count on any agency to which they could appeal effectively. However, at the time when the whole of Canada gives serious, genuine and substantial indications that the country is ready to recognize a bilingual Canada, I urge them once more to keep on developing and making their needs known, and not to retreat, not to get discouraged.

[English]

As I stand in my place, Mr. Speaker, I occupy two roles: the one as a member of the present government, the other as a member of parliament. The first of these roles is dependent upon the second. The greater honour, the greater responsibility flows from my membership in this house. It is an honour and a responsibility that we all share. We sit here as representatives of the people of Canada. We do so with pride, pride in this historic institution of parliament, pride in the democratic process which brought us here, and pride in the techniques which have evolved to convert the needs and wishes of society into legislative practice.

But our pride must not blind us to the fact that at this very moment thoughtful questions are being posed in this and many other western countries as to whether our systems of government have outlived their effectiveness, whether new approaches and new institutions are necessary in order to preserve and enhance the human values which our society prizes. We dare not remain immune from these questions or these criticisms.

It would be easy indeed for us in this house to ignore the discontent expressed in some quarters of Canada, particularly from the young, that the institutions of government are not reflective of the demands of 1968. It would be easy to do so, but it would be wrong. There is abroad in Canada and elsewhere a spreading concern that the traditional techniques of governments are incapable of responding adequately and in time to the changing needs of society. This concern we ignore at our peril. We ignore at our peril as well the accumulating evidence that governments in the past have all too often responded to the symptoms of social unrest rather than to the root causes, that they have done so because their distance from the people has filtered out any direct involvement with the daily problems of the individual. We know from our own experience as parliamentarians that from time to time we sense frustration in our seeming inability to contribute to this house fully of the energies and talents which we have brought here with us.

This criticism, this evidence, provides a challenge not just to the government but to parliament. We are given an opportunity in this place, in this session, which may not again present itself. It is the opportunity to prove to Canadians, ourselves included, that a parliamentary form of government is not only capable of meeting the demands of this complex age, but that it is more capable of doing so than is any other form. It is the opportunity to prove to the world that a democratic system is not only representative of the wishes of the majority but that it does in fact protect the minority. It is the opportunity, in short, to illustrate that parliament is both protective and effective, protective of those traditional values which we all cherish and effective in recognizing and dealing with the present needs of our contemporary society.

I firmly believe that this institution of parliament has for centuries proven its superiority over other forms of legislative bodies because it has demonstrated its ability to meet adequately the changing demands made upon it. Neither the parliament of Canada nor the parliament of any other country has every added to its stature by clinging to its past at the expense of its future. When hon. members discuss the need for procedural reform, they do so mindful of the strength which parliament has attained from the wise evolution of its procedures over the years. The problems which now face Canada, and which her elected representatives are dedicated to solve, are not the problems of a Walpole or a Pitt or a Gladstone or a Churchill, nor are they the problems of a Macdonald or a Laurier. Within the areas of responsibility of this twenty eighth parliament of Canada are matters of economic and social consequence of such depth and breadth, and of such complexity and number, as would have staggered the imagination of many of our predecessors.

By common consent the role of government has spread into areas where it had never previously extended. By obvious need, the entire panoply of scientific achievement is now mustered in aid of any legislative solutions. Notwithstanding these increasing demands, the time available to this house each week for the conduct of its business is not significantly greater than it was a century ago, nor have the traditional and proper roles of government and opposition changed. It is the government's function to propose legislative solutions. It is the opposition's task to question these solutions and attempt to improve them or propose alternatives. Neither role can be subordinate to the other.

It goes without saying that any proposal for procedural reform must assist both sides of this house to function more efficiently. Anything less would be self-defeating. Anything less would diminish the very institution which we seek to assist. The discussions which have been proceeding on and off for the past fortnight, or even longer, among the representatives of the several parties in the house must not be permitted to continue indefinitely.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Nor should they be permitted to lead, either by agreement or in the absence of it, to procedural changes which will upset the delicate and essential balance between government and opposition so necessary to the proper functioning of parliament. Members on this side of the house should not forget the investment of time and energy—the opposition may even think, perhaps too much time and energy—which has been necessarily devoted to the preparation and presentation of legislative proposals. They should not forget this lest they assume that hon. members opposite are somehow able to study and consider those same proposals in a fraction of that time. Good legislation, effective legislation, requires the expenditure of extensive effort on both sides of this house.

It is our responsibility as members to engage here in discussions which are as knowledgeable as possible. Every opportunity to learn more about proposed legislation, and more about the social or economic or other situations which have given rise to that proposed legislation, must be followed by all of us. It is my feeling that the advantage in this respect has too long rested with the government. For that reason a most important concept which has been proposed to members, along with other procedural reforms, is the provision of public funds to permit opposition parties to obtain the services of researchers, advisers and experts to assist them. The government cannot function without expert assistance. For the same reason, neither should the opposition be expected to do so.

Withal, however, we must keep constantly in mind the temper of the people of this country. The public expects this house to be productive, to be efficient, to be wise in its deliberations. We must not contribute to any belief that we here are more involved with the sound of our voices than with the good of Canada. I am sure this sense of urgency is fully shared by members of this house.

This concern about the substance of our deliberations, however, may prove of little value should we be unable to break out of the procedural strait-jacket which now embraces us. Conducting business on the basis of the old rules to which we have reverted is not entirely without a certain degree of charm, I must admit. There is, for example, a touch of history revealed in the names of the committees of the house. My favourite is unquestionably the agriculture and colonization committee. But all the colour of its title will not equip that committee to do the work required of it. For one thing, it has 60 members, almost one quarter of the total membership of this house.

Under this system we cannot accomplish a fraction of what this house agrees must be done. The whole structure of committees simply must be reviewed and overhauled as the first step in the process of procedural reform.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: There are other contemplated changes that may require intensive study. A possible change, for example, but one which must be examined carefully, is the practice of delegating legislative authority, in terms of ministerial orders and orders made in council, and in the sense of decisions of quasi-judicial bodies. Whatever we decide, it should be based on a full knowledge of both the strengths and the weaknesses of our present practices. Accordingly, I have asked the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) to give attention to these particular practices.

We have all had occasion to observe recently the heartening phenomenon in Canada of widespread involvement in political activities by many segments of the community which until now were detached. We have all had the opportunity to note the frightening consequences in other countries, and it is noted in some places of our own, of the alienation of large numbers of people from the mainstream of a country's political life. Like it or not, we in this house bear a heavy responsibility for promoting healthy involvement and for discouraging unhealthy alienation. We discharge that responsibility through our activities here, by projecting throughout this land an image of a parliament aware of its responsibilities, alert to its opportunities, cognizant of its traditions, and determined in its role.

These are not easy tasks to perform. Worth-while tasks never are. But should we not reform our procedures, these tasks may prove impossible. In that event, the involvement of Canadians in the political life of this country, through participation in political parties, may decrease, and we the elected politicians will have only ourselves to blame. The benefits of a better functioning parliament will not be enjoyed only by the members of this house; they will extend to all the people of Canada now and in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, during most of this speech I have been talking about problems and solutions, but I would not wish to sit down without referring, however briefly, to the unlimited potential of this country and its people. Whenever our problems begin to look overwhelming or insoluble, we should try to see them in a wider perspective. Compared to most of the other nations of the world, we are fortunate indeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Our internal divisions, damaging though they are, must appear minor to the inhabitants of many other regions of the globe. Our treasury of resources, both human and natural, is probably unmatched. We must renew our resolve to prove ourselves worthy of the great bounty which nature and our ancestors have bestowed upon us.

Since this house last sat I have enjoyed the opportunity of travelling in all parts of this country and of meeting great numbers of Canadians of every origin and occupation. I return with increased confidence in the ability of the Canadian people to meet the challenges which lie ahead. As their elected representatives we must demonstrate that we are capable of handling the nation's business in the decisive and orderly manner which is expected of us. We must make this first parliament of our second century the best in Canadian history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF MEMBERS OF CARIBBEAN LEGISLATURES

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling on the hon. member for York South may I be permitted to bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a very special delegation from sister commonwealth countries in the Caribbean.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: These special guests include three premiers and one Speaker, or perhaps I should say one Speaker and three premiers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: They are in Canada under the auspices of the Canadian branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. On behalf of all hon. members I extend the warmest greetings to you, gentlemen, and express the wish that your visit to Canada will be pleasant, interesting and fruitful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Eymard Corbin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Stanfield.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, of course I am prepared to continue at this time but I wonder whether the other members of the house would prefer, as I myself would, to call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to standing order 6 (1) this sitting is suspended until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

• (8:00 p.m.)

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, because my time is limited—and I do not say that by way of complaint—I do not intend to attempt to range widely over the many subjects which were treated by my predecessors.

It is with very real pleasure that I join the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address. The elegance of their expression and the depth and sincerity of their thought give us assurance that they will make important contributions to the deliberations of this house.

It seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, that in their person as well as in their remarks, they showed the diversity of Canada and drew attention to some of the problems that must be solved to create true unity and a deep sense of justice in our society.

Both are happy about the opportunities offered by our country but each of them was forced to remind us of the great wrongs which make our society much less than just. The Canadian of French origin said that he was worried about the lack of facilities which would enable his compatriots in New Brunswick to learn about their country in their own language. The Canadian of Indian origin, a member of the community which was the first to people Canada, is deeply affected by the degrading conditions in which his own people still live. In short, Mr. Speaker, the two speeches pointed out the problems of bilingualism and social injustice which threaten unity throughout our nation. It seems to me that those questions and many other aspects of our national activity should have been strongly pointed out in the Speech from the Throne, but this was not done. I know that the Speech from the Throne is a traditional formality and it would be useless to try to find therein some grounds for inspiration or even some enlightenment, but during the election campaign, millions of Canadians, young people mostly, had set their hopes in the new Prime Minister. They expected from him a new political style and a new, deeper commitment for the attainment of a richer, more exciting life not only in Canada but throughout the world.

[English]

It is therefore, Mr. Speaker, a very great pity that these expectations have not been even partially met. Exactly the opposite is true. Since this government took office we have read of the appointment of numerous defeated and disappointed Liberals to positions in the other place and on boards and commissions, as detailed earlier by the Leader of the Opposition. If I may, I want to remind the Prime Minister, who is just entering the chamber—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Apparently, Mr. Speaker, the members of this house still have the expectations for which the people of Canada fell. I want to remind the Prime Minister that for decades this kind of appointment has been the cynical mark of the old politics, riddled with favouritism, nepotism and patronage. That the Prime Minister is following the same line makes a mockery of the alleged "new politics" about which he has boasted.

In the field of economic policy all we have had so far is retrenchment, and emphasis on the irrelevant concept of the balanced budget. This is not merely outdated, especially at a time of sizeable unemployment, but it creates a financial strait-jacket which makes it impossible to deal imaginatively with the problems crushing many sectors of Canadian life.

No one is so naïve as not to realize that long term programs require time to develop and to implement. I am therefore prepared to hope that such programs are in contemplation and under study. But if so, I simply cannot understand why the speech from the throne was so silent or so vague about them. During the election campaign, and in one or two places in the speech from the throne, and in the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon, there were and are references to the need for involving the people of Canada in the democratic process, as reflected in parliament and in government. The throne speech gave the Prime Minister and the government the opportunity of speaking to the people of Canada in a way which might fire their imagination and evoke their interest. How else is it possible to involve people in the democratic process, except through full and frank information and the articulation of inspiring national goals and programs pointing toward those goals? But the speech from the throne has nothing of this. It consists of the customary and tired emphasis of the obvious; it is a sonorous collection of little homilies which make Shakespeare's Polonius a model of originality. It lacks intellectual depth and moral concern.

Somewhere, something happened to stop the swinger in his tracks, and to transform the promising modern into the dull traditional. How did this happen? I suggest that it derives directly from an economic and social philosophy which makes it extremely difficult to meet the challenge of the modern age. The intention is no doubt good but it is frustrated by an out-of-date approach.

Somewhere near the beginning of the speech from the throne there is a statement—and it is put in a tired way, if I may say so respectfully to the right hon. gentleman —that financial and intellectual resources are not unlimited. This is the kind of fatherly admonition which is as obvious as it is misleading. Enunciated in 1968, it shows a failure to appreciate the significance of the modern scientific revolution and the potentialities of the age of automation and cybernation. I agree, of course that at every stage of development priorities must govern policy.

But history has rejected the timid, fearful caution that confines policy within the limits of human knowledge available at a particular point of time. The fact is that the limits have been constantly extended by scientific development and by human ingenuity. The capacities to produce goods and services, to develop a rich environment in which the physical, moral, and spiritual joys of life may be available to all, are almost beyond exaggeration in this age of cybernation. The problem before us is not the limit to our capacities and resources, but their efficient use and the just distribution of the fruits of that use.

Our problem also stems from an important difference of opinion as to what constitutes efficient use of our resources. I am not concerned merely with higher productivity and more production, regardless of the kind of product or service that is the result. This kind of efficiency we have known for a long time. It has too often resulted in the production of luxury amenities for a relatively small group, while the large group at the bottom of the income ladder was almost ignored. What is perhaps worse, it has resulted in wasteful expenditures on products and services which are socially unnecessary as compared with the urgent need for houses, schools, hospital beds, parks, universities and recreation centres. We reject this kind of use.

By efficient use of our resources and capacities my colleagues and I mean higher productivity and more production of goods and services which are socially necessary, and which are essential to the building of the just society. This involves careful allocation of resources according to social need. It involves government control of investment, government standards and a degree of government intervention in the economy from which conventional wisdom still recoils. In many instances it will involve public investment on a considerable scale, because private investors will lack the courage or imagination or because they will think they can make a faster buck elsewhere.

These thoughts seem to me self-evident. Yet the throne speech shows no inkling of relevant, modern social analysis. Because the government leans toward the old, traditional economic and social ideas, because it does not seem to be able to adopt policies which can take full advantage of the immense potentialities of the age of nuclear power, automation and the computer, the people of Canada may well be in for another great disappointment.

The likelihood is, and I hope I shall be proven wrong—and I will apologize to the Prime Minister if I am wrong—that we shall wake up four years from now and find the same 20 per cent poor, almost the same regional disparities, a similar crisis in education, in housing and in urban life generally. No doubt there will be a patch here, a repair there, and an improvement elsewhere, because whatever the stripe of the government we always manage to make a little progress. But the major inequalities and most oppressive social neglect will still be largely with us. The just society will still be a political slogan and a seemingly unreachable dream. More, Mr. Speaker, is the pity, because it is so unnecessary.

Somewhere else in the speech from the throne there is another statement of economic philosophy which is equally disturbing. This is the notion that all incomes should be tied to productivity and even that government spending must be so tied. A very little thought shows how false and dangerous this attitude is and how it builds another straitjacket, hampering the development of useful and imaginative programs.

This typically bureaucratic notion assumes, first, that there is an acceptable measurement of productivity, which is itself very questionable. It assumes also that productivity can be measured in all cases, which is patently absurd. How do you measure the productivity of a teacher, or a nurse, or a researcher, or even a postman?

Second, the throne speech theory assumes that the inequalities in income in our present society must remain, and that the low wage and salary earners must be satisfied to make no more relative progress than the high wage and salary earners. I suggest that anyone who articulates this crass philosophy, and at the same time talks about the just society, suffers either from self-delusion or from heartless cynicism.

To tie government spending to productivity—whatever that means—is equally fallacious. It suggests, whether intentionally or not, that in time of low production resulting from a recession or from other causes, government spending should be low, and that at a time of high production government spending should be high. This certainly stands John Maynard Keynes on his head.

Surely it is now accepted conventional wisdom that precisely when the economy is slowing down government expenditures must rise to fill the gap. To speak of balancing the budget when the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment is 50 or 60 per cent, higher than the highest rate of 3 per cent urged by the Economic Council of Canada, presages a policy which will certainly make our society more rather than less unjust as far as the unemployed, the poor, the young and the old are concerned.

Furthermore, and just as important, it means the government accepts the notion that the size of the public sector must remain relatively the same. It must not increase. Yet it is surely clear that increased public spending is essential if manpower training is to be effective, if urban problems are to be solved, if Indians, Eskimos and Metis are to be rehabilitated, if regional disparities are to be eliminated, and if the problem of poverty is to be tackled meaningfully. Indeed, it is surely also clear that public spending on education, on manpower training and on research is the major means for increasing productivity itself.

Mr. Speaker, the fifth report of the Economic Council stresses the necessity of increasing technological research in Canada. It analyses our industrial structure and deplores its lack of rationalization and efficiency. In so doing, the report only dwells on what experts have been saying for years. Since its second report, the council has been urging the necessity to multiply our efforts in the field of education.

There was a time not so long ago when education was sought for itself, when a thirst for knowledge and the study of the universe were very exciting objectives. For many, that still obtains, but the automation age has given to education what might be called a practical dimension. Jobs are increasingly scarce for those who have little education. And the time is gone when one could keep his job for a lifetime. Most people will now have to learn two or three trades, go through retraining almost every decade. Therefore social investment in education has become an economic requirement.

[English]

The industrial society is producing or aggravating other acute problems. Air and water pollution poison the atmosphere in our cities, and not only offend our senses but threaten our health. The pressures of living in the jet age are producing a shocking rate of mental illness, and hundreds of thousands of disturbed children for whom there are no treatment centres and no hope. Crime is on the increase and juvenile delinquency haunts homes in every economic class. As we develop new and more abundant means to meet our material needs, we endanger the quality of our lives. A people that awakens to these dangers must be ready to deal with them collectively. No one can do so on his own.

As Professor Galbraith expressed it, "Nearly all of the investment in individuals is in the public domain. And virtually all of it is outside the market system." Yet our traditions cause us to question public investment in people, whether through cash payments or through the provision of health services, educational opportunities, safe roads, clean waters, fresh air, decent homes, green belts, planned cities, slum clearance, recreational facilities or artistic and cultural activities. All these are essential to a decent, human, civilized quality of life and all of them require public spending on an ever increasing scale. Yet when governments spend money their action becomes immediately suspect, even though without it life would be almost as dismal for the well-to-do as for the poor.

Thus I reject the philosophy which seems to animate this government. The public sector is not expendable; it is essential for growth and justice. It must not stand still; it must and will grow in response to collective needs and goals. In my view, it is irresponsible private power which must be curtailed and controlled to serve the public good.

I do not mean that every public expenditure is right because it is public; not at all. It is necessary to review public expenditures periodically, to change their direction and emphasis. Indeed, we believe there should be a permanent government agency to review expenditures on a continuing basis so that they may be put to the best and most productive use. But in our view it is impossible to think realistically and honestly of building the just society without an ever-increasing role for public participation, public planning and public control. Because the speech from the throne seems to be timid about this, the pretensions about a just society may turn out to be a mockery.

Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly aware of the fact that it is possible to suppress a good many social injustices which have not been brought about, in part or in whole, by economic factors. We are in favour, as we were during the previous parliament, of the various proposals to amend the Criminal Code, of the introduction of legislation to implement, within the federal jurisdiction, the recommendations of the Laurendeau-Dunton commission, and other important legislation of the kind we will wish to support.

We agree in principle with the fact that our parliamentary procedure must be brought up to date. In fact, it is something which we have been advocating for some years now. During the last session, on April 20, 1967, the leader of our party, Mr. Douglas, recorded on page 15141 of Hansard, eight proposals providing for a reorganization of the business of the house. They dealt with most of the main questions under study. Therefore, our party is prepared to support any reasonable proposal which would result in an improvement and modernization of the business of our house.

[English]

But I should like to emphasize that in our view changes in the procedures of parliament must not be such as merely to assist the government to increase its power and control over parliament. They must also respect the rights of members of parliament, particularly those in the opposition. A parliament which is completely under the control of a majority governement cannot represent the views of the people as a whole and would be an unfortunate step in the direction of a one-party state. From the words of the Prime Minister this afternoon and from other statements I can recollect, I have reason to hope that the government agrees with this approach. I merely emphasize that while we intend to give active support to changes in the rules which will render parliament more efficient and more up-to-date, we do not intend to support proposals which may reduce to impotence the role of parliament, a role which can only be fulfilled if the opposition has the fullest freedom and opportunity to scrutinize, criticize, propose alternatives and investigate thoroughly the manner in which the government is carrying out its trust. We feel, Mr. Speaker, that it is important to do so, not only to make parliament work more efficiently, but also to allow us to study estimates and legislation more rapidly and more conscientiously, and above all to make Canadians have greater confidence in parliament and in the democratic process.

I fully agree with what the Right Hon. Prime Minister said this afternoon in this connection.

In this connection, we welcome also the promise contained in the speech from the throne that additional assistance will be made available to the official opposition and to other opposition parties in order that they may carry out their work with more information, more understanding of issues and more appreciation of the programs with which this parliament will deal. It is unnecessary to emphasize that it is the presence of an opposition in our legislatures which distinguishes the democratic from other societies. And the more opportunity the opposition has to be relevant, alert and effective, the better our democratic system. It is true that the social reforms and the reorganization of government and parliament are important, but they do not impinge on the major areas of economic and social ills in our society.

Mr. Speaker, I could hardly believe my ears when I listened to the speech from the throne and found that there was not a word about housing, or urban development, or the problem of galloping rents,—not a word; and not a suggestion about the mounting difficulties assailing our people in the growing urban centres of our society. Yet urbanization in Canada is proceeding at a rapid rate. Some 70 per cent or more of our people live in urban centres now, and in a few years the percentage will be 80, but the speech from the throne contains not the slightest awareness of this fact or of the crushing problems it has produced.

Inside and outside parliament we have had endless discussions about the housing crisis, the growing problems of large urban centres, the traffic congestion, the lack of amenities for decent living, and the growing pollution of our air and water. We looked in vain for effective action from past Liberal governments, and as far as the speech from the throne is concerned—and the speech of the Prime Minister this afternoon did not help—we are still at a loss. Instead of action we have yet another task force.

[Translation]

The relative poverty affecting millions of Canadians to-day has existed in our country for many years; in fact, it has existed since the very beginning of our society. It is obvious that western societies, and Canada is one of them, have done much to somewhat improve the condition of the poor and underprivileged. Certainly it is true that we have made great strides during the past three decades from the time when we had virtually no social security and a small number of laws on social welfare. But those humanitarian measures always were, in my opinion, reluctantly adopted, incomplete and even miserable. They were rather aimed at insuring men's survival and neglected to study the causes of poverty and the factors which made poverty hereditary from generation to generation in a family, community or region.

Some years ago, Mr. Pearson and his government which counted amongst its members several of the present ministers, declared war on poverty. It was a war which was waged on paper and, in the end, the paper itself was discarded for reasons of economy. Today, the Economic Council of Canada has revived the subject and the present government still acknowledges its existence. But the Speech from the Throne and the speech that the Right Honourable Prime Minister delivered this afternoon both emphasize more particularly the long period of time necessary to eradicate poverty, forgetting completely to point out the means to reach this objective. Boldness and determination which we have a right to expect have given way to prudence and timidity.

[English]

I am sure that the Prime Minister will be the first to admit that talk about the just society is not new or original. I have been reminded in the last few months of a cry of the Chartists in Britain a century and a half ago, in the following words, "The just society is the only worth while object of political warfare." Apparently the Prime Minister agrees. So do we. So does everyone. Indeed this has been the declared objective of all democratic governments, but progress toward the just society has been painfully and unnecessarily slow.

We have had variations on the theme. In the country to the south of us we had talk of the "great society." Mr. Pearson talked about the "good society," and the present Prime Minister talks about the "just society." They all mean the same things, and until now they have on the whole been mere political catchwords. I hope that the impression given by the speech from the throne is wrong, that this Prime Minister and this government really means to do something in the next four years, but it is my duty to point out and to underline that so far there is no evidence of this, that the tone and the words are but echoes of the past giving little more hope than in earlier years.

Not only on the domestic front but also in the international sphere the speech from the throne is flat, stale and unfeeling. Imagine, sir, the proponents of what they are pleased to call the just society asking flippantly, "Where is Biafra?" in relation to a conflict which has seen tens of thousands of innocent people mutilated and starved to death. Imagine a speech from the throne which in these circumstances does not even mention the word Biafra.

On Friday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) uttered, and today the Prime Minister repeated what I can only describe as a shameful half truth. It is true, according to my information, that the first airstrip which was offered by Biafra and agreed to by the federal government of Nigeria was subsequently refused by Biafra because the federal government insisted that nothing else but outside relief supplies land on it. At that time Biafra was using it for landing weapons, which it was buying mainly on the black market simply because the big powers were selling to the federal government.

But surely the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if not the Prime Minister, ought to know—and if they do not know, then we ought to know why—that Biafra has built a second airstrip and offered it for delivery of supplies to the starving people. But the federal government of Nigeria has refused to agree to this second airstrip. Surely the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister ought to know that Sweden has agreed to lend a plane to the International Red Cross. If it did, why can't Canada? I suggest that when one is dealing with so painful a situation as the mutilation and starvation of tens of thousands of people, half truths in this parliament are particularly reprehensible.

Imagine also, Mr. Speaker, a statement about Viet Nam in the speech from the throne which sonorously reminds us that there are unsuccessful negotiations going on in Paris —no condemnation of a war which in my view is legally unjustifiable and morally indefensible, not even a repetition of the government's appeal to our big neighbour to stop the bombing of North Viet Nam. And imagine, finally, a puny reference to foreign aid which merely promises the same inadequate program we have had until now, characteristically embellished by the establishment of a study centre.

In short, Mr. Speaker, there is no sense of urgency in the speech from the throne, neither about the evils at home nor about the threatening events and suffering abroad. There is primarily a technocratic preoccupation with organization and structures as if they alone can solve the social problems facing Canadians and the world.

Mr. Stanfield: And appointments.

Mr. Lewis: And appointments. There is no argument about the desirability of building a just, or compassionate, or good, or great society: This has been the goal of human organization for centuries. The argument centres on the elements of a just society and how to achieve it, and this is where we in this party differ from the approach laid out in the throne speech.

We do not believe a society can ever be just or good when it is characterized by glaring inequalities; when effective control of the use and allocation of resources is concentrated in a few centres of private economic power which have no legal obligation and little moral incentive to give priority to the public welfare.

We do not believe a society can ever be just or good when its system of values places material success, however attained, at the top of human achievement, regarded more highly and envied more frequently than the works of the artist, the writer, the athlete, the teacher or the spiritual leader. We do not believe a society can ever be just or good when fancy office buildings take priority over homes; when doubtful defence expenditures are considered indispensable while the Indian, the Eskimo, the Métis and the poor generally must wait long years before they are given the opportunity to join the mainstream of life; when the social system places competition and conflict ahead of human co-operation.

[Mr. Lewis.]

And we believe that to achieve the just or good society we must restructure our economic system and our social relationships. Admittedly this cannot be done overnight; but it cannot be done at all by those who do not question the basis and values of our present society, who are governed by conventional wisdom and by traditional attitudes. No doubt this government will accomplish some good things, as have all governments in the past. But there is no suggestion of a new approach, of a new life-style, as the modern phrase goes. In the result we will continue to have the basic inequalities, human degradation and injustice which mar the face of our society and haunt the social conscience.

I am of course aware that material well-being is merely the foundation of a good or just society, that there are other elements which are essential to an intelligent people eager to shape its own destiny, collectively and individually. There is today, particularly among the young, a feeling of alienation from the social order, of being overpowered by big business, big unions, big government, large schools, large universities, and by rules and disciplines imposed from above. I think that this lies behind the restlessness and revolt on our campuses and in our streets.

I appreciate that we must find new ways of using the modern media of communication and new relationships between the governors and the governed in every sector of our society and in society as a whole. This is why I welcome the reference in the speech from the throne to an inquiry into government information services. But, I must admit, that again I have some fears.

There are obviously two alternative purposes for government information services. One is to provide the people with objectively accurate information to guide their thinking and acts, and to evoke from them a desire to participate in social and political activity and to enrich the democratic process. But government information services can also be used as a political propaganda machine to serve the party in power and to befuddle instead of educating, to confuse rather than to clarify. We shall be on guard, as I suggest all members in all parts of this house should be, to ensure that the first and not the second purpose is served by the consolidation and improvement of information services which this government is planning.

In this general area we also have a duty to provide our people with means of defence against the alienation imposed by bigness. We should establish effective machinery by which the citizen, without cost and without fear may challenge authority when he feels aggrieved.

Mr. Speaker, I am reaching the end of my remarks in which I shall be moving a subamendment to the amendment. I am sure the Prime Minister will be the first to agree that his election first by his party and then by the people shows that Canadians are willing to be challenged, to accept a new approach, to embark on new adventures. I have always believed this of our people. But I venture to suggest that to challenge them, particularly the young, and having reached the pinnacle of power to let them down with a dull thump is the cruellest act of all. This is a sure way of undermining democratic participation and eventually of undermining democracy itself.

This is the disappointment of the speech from the throne: The promise was great, the performance is dismal. Instead of going forward, we are back where we were. The style may be different, but the actions are the same.

I have always believed that the Canadian people can be mobilized for national goals in peace as they have been in war. Expo and the centennial underlined our collective pride and potentialities. We need only imaginative and meaningful leadership to fulfil the promise which is ours. But to reach that goal we must become much more independent and self-reliant. The throne speech ignores the problems of constructive Canadian nationalism, except in the reference to the language bill. The government is apparently satisfied with the foreign control of our economy and with our satellite role in international affairs. These basic problems affecting our future as a nation do not receive even a mention. Nor does the problem of our inequitable tax system, analysed and condemned in the Carter report, the reform of which is surely an essential first step toward the just society.

Perhaps the government will do better in the future. For the sake of our country, I devoutly and sincerely hope so. But on the basis of the throne speech and the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon, it is impossible to have confidence in the ability and intention of this government to deal with the new and old problems crushing so many of our people.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "social problems", the following words:

"including housing, urban development, unemployment and poverty;"

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to extend my warm congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand). They discharge their duty very easily and in a remarkable way.

I also wish to extend to you, on behalf of my colleagues, our most sincere congratulations upon your appointment, without opposition, to the office that you now hold. Indeed you know the satisfaction felt by all members of the House of Commons for the impartiality with which you always treated us in the house.

Mr. Speaker, we listened, last Thursday, to the reading of the Speech from the Throne. This afternoon, the Leader of the Opposition moved the following amendment:

But we respectfully regret that Your Excellency's advisers have refused to recognize or respond to Canada's current and urgent economic and social problems; and have failed to provide parliament with an agenda of priorities to define and implement the "Just Society".

The acting leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) moved an amendment to the amendment reading as follows:

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "social problems", the following words: "including housing, urban development, unemployment and poverty;"

Those are very worthy motives, very ordinary reasons expressed in the House of Commons for many years. And it is for that, Mr. Speaker, that at the dissolution of parliament on April 23 last, there were eight members of the Ralliement créditiste and there are now fourteen. You noticed it yourself, Mr. Speaker. I know that is a surprise for my good friend opposite, who interrupts me; it is a surprise not only for him, but for many others, because people were anticipating the disappearance of the Créditistes in the House of Commons.

You must admit that the Liberals did not get us elected. You must admit also that the journalists did not get us elected. Nor was it the C.B.C. with its free time broadcasts. An hon. member has just said: It was Johnson. It was not Mr. Johnson, from the province of Quebec, either, who got us elected, Mr. Speaker.

After the elections, a study of the free advertising given to the various political parties in the province of Quebec alone showed that the Liberals had received 42 per cent of it, and the Conservatives 38 per cent. The latter did very well. They managed to get four members elected in the province of Quebec with 38 per cent of the free advertising. The New Democratic party got 19 per cent of the advertising in the newspapers of the province of Quebec, including the fat Montreal newspaper La presse, the Montreal Journal or the Journal de Montréal, the great patriotic newspaper Le Devoir, Montréal Matin, Daniel Johnson's newspaper, the Journal de Québec, as well as small weeklies all over the province.

The Ralliement Créditiste was treated generously. We were given 1 per cent of the free advertising granted to political parties. And thanks to all that advertising, Mr. Speaker, we came very close to unseating three ministers. I see one of them not far from me. He expected to be beaten by the big organization of the Union Nationale. While the Union Nationale was spending perhaps $100,000 or $200,000 to defeat the Minister of Forestry and Regional Development, the Créditistes came second, the Union Nationale behind them. I admired, that night, the courage of the minister who said on television: I am happy that the second place went to the créditistes. He was happy also to say—and I think he was the only minister who spoke with a little sense that night: The Créditiste vote is a warning to us to propose deep economic reforms in Canada. That is why people voted for the Ralliement Créditiste, and not for reasons alleged or put forward by newspapers such as Le Devoir or Montréal-Matin in their June 27 edition. Listen to this, Mr. Speaker, and tell me if it is not intelligent. "P.S.", which stands for Paul Sauriol of Le Devoir, another intellectual with his head lost in the clouds, wrote as follows:

> While the Liberals made considerable gains in Ontario and in the Western provinces, they have barely retained the number of seats they had in the previous Parliament. In spite of the popularity of Mr. Trudeau, the poor regions of Quebec cast a protest vote which did not go to the Conservative party, as in the Maritime provinces, but to the Créditiste party.
> The fifteen ridings won by the Créditistes—

They are now fourteen, because we lost one to the service vote.

> —in southern and northern Quebec correspond to the under-developed areas of the province.

That was written by Paul Sauriol. According to him, had there been no underdeveloped areas, we would have won no seats in Parliament. But look at each on the members of the Ralliement Créditiste in the house, study the economic situation in their respective ridings, and you will see that there is less poverty in the riding of Beauce, for example, in the riding of Bellechasse, where we defeated "Ti-Gus" Choquette, in the new riding of Villeneuve, in Roberval—in fact, there is less poverty in Abitibi, Mégantic, Lotbinière, Portneuf and Shefford than in the ridings of Saint-Denis and Lachine, in Montreal. The greatest number of people who are not only underprivileged economically but mentally backward is found in Montreal, in the province of Quebec. You meet them on the street and ask them: Who is your representative in Parliament? They do not even know.

According to a radio news bulletin this morning, 38 per cent of the poor live in the city of Montreal; there are 87,000 unemployed in that city, 26,000 families on welfare. And they vote red. These are underdeveloped people, Mr. Speaker. They do not fight for reform, but I shall come later to the reforms we advocate. I hope, at least, to hold the attention of the Prime Minister on that question, that he might study the possibility of making changes. It is all very well to travel across Canada distributing pecks to 14-year old girls, but that does not change the system.

Yesterday morning, I left Ottawa by plane for Prince Edward Island where I addressed the young students of 18 to 22 of Prince of Wales College. I met the lieutenant governor and other personalities. We talked of the causeway the government has been promising for the last seven or eight years. For perhaps 25 years now the people of Prince Edward Island have been promised a causeway; a carriage road from the mainland of New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island. Two years ago, I heard the former minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tell us that a complete survey had been made, and that the government of the day, the Pearson government, had decided that they would go through with it, that it was decided.

Mr. Pepin: We were talking about the Bay of Fundy at that time, and not about what you are discussing now.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I did not understand what the minister said.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I said that a decision was reached on a survey of the Bay of Fundy and not on the problem the member is now discussing.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, have no surveys been made on the feasibility of that causeway between the mainland of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island? Ministers went to the site during the recent election campaign. The Prime Minister also went there, saying that the matter was settled, that it was decided. Time passes, then we are told: It is feasible. But what is lacking? I shall come back later to what is lacking for a just society.

Mr. Speaker, all honourable members will realize this tonight, or I am no longer true to myself, I can assure them. There is a limit to promises that are only followed by speeches. Every possible subject is being raised, but nothing concrete is being done. They mean well, but that is all. The speech from the throne reads, in part:

> In the complexities of modern society, effective programs take time to develop and more time to implement.

It takes years to develop them, then three times as much not to implement them. They forget to implement them. At every stage, governments in power require financial resources; on that point, this government is right. Intellectual resources which are not unlimited and must be used with careful planning and the hard judgment of priorities. It is a simple fact of life that everything cannot be done at once.

This morning, it was announced on radio, that 22 years today, I was elected for the first time to the house of commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: On September 16, 1946 I hardly managed to be elected and I was much more easily defeated three years and a half later in 1949. I came back, nevertheless, but at that time, the same comments could be heard. We have a new Prime Minister. The right hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King was prime minister; in 1948, he was replaced by the right hon. Louis St-Laurent. We kept on reading about the same thing: planning. Nothing can be done right away, everything cannot be done at once. That was 22 years ago and nothing has yet been done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: We also had successive Leaders of the Opposition. While I was here, we have had the hon. Mr. Bracken as Leader of the Opposition, followed by Mr. Drew. Later on, that is in 1958, we had a Conservative government under the former prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince-Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The government then had 208 members out of 265, that is, the greatest majority ever granted a political party to administer the country. There was no lack of majority, but what matters were dealt with then in the speeches from the throne? The very same:

> —financial and intellectual resources which are not unlimited and must be used with careful planning and the hard judgement of priorities. It is a simple fact of life that everything cannot be done at once.

Mr. Speaker, throughout the country, we have had the opportunity to attend the meetings of the regional economic councils. We have now the report from the Canadian Economic Council, the cream of all the economic councils in Canada. Throughout all our regions, those people have the required intelligence to study the problems, and they do study them. They are part of our intellectual resources and they come out with a planning system. I went to Ville-Marie in my constituency not so long ago in order to find out about the studies being carried out in the fields of agriculture, road maintenance, development of natural resources and others, and the chairman of each committee gave us a report at the end of each day. Mr. Speaker, it was really something to listen to those reports. Therefore, it seemed that it was possible to make wonderful things in our country, according to the regional economic councils. Then, I asked them "When shall we start to implement these measures?"—"What!"—"Yes, when?"—"Well, as it is now, we have not got any money. We cannot do so. We must wait for some help from the governments. We are going to suggest it to the government and they will decide." When we make suggestions to the provincial government, they reply: "We have no money". We then turn to the federal government.

The Prime Minister spent a quarter of an hour this afternoon to tell us that the government has no money. However, during the electoral campaign—it was wonderful—the Prime Minister stated: "Governments have only the money the taxpayers are willing to give them." What we are willing to give them, that is what the government has.

"We are no magicians. We are not Father Christmas. We are just men eager to turn Canada, and the whole world as well, into truly liveable places."

Mr. Speaker, I agree about the fact that the Prime Minister is no magician, but if he really believes that the Canadian Parliament is indeed a sovereign Parliament, who then is the magician that provides subsidies to wage war while subsidies to enforce peace at home remain unavailable?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: I shall come back to that point in a moment, anyhow.

It is all very well to make us say: we are no magicians. But who are the magicians? After the recession, at the beginning of World War II, the national debt of Canada was around $3 billion. Five years later, after the fighting was over, it amounted to $17 billion. Who then was the magician that raised $14 billion, while the slaughter was going on? The prime minister is well aware that during the carnage, during the war, the government of Canada was never heard saying: "We lack money to dress the soldiers, we lack money to enlist 800,000 young Canadians and to send them to the battle-fields. We lack money to make guns and shells." The prime minister knows it, because we probably fought a bit together against the war expenses during that period. If money was not available during the economic crisis for fathers and mothers to bring up their families decently, how could it be allowed to send our young men to their death during the war? The prime minister knows how things were.

Mr. Speaker, during that war, every Canadian of my generation, those who were a little younger than I or a little older, fared better in Canada than during the economic crisis. Meanwhile, 800,000 of our young men were kept away from the production of commodities for Canada. We dressed them, housed them and fed them decently, and we had them looked after by doctors when they became sick. This cost nothing. Things went along fine. Meanwhile also, Mr. Speaker, we spent billions of dollars to make guns, shells and deadly weapons. Our people behaved bravely, gallantly, on the battle-fields. As for all the bombs that we dropped on Hitler's head in Germany, do you think that the Canadian government sent notes saying: "Do pay C.O.D. Otherwise, the bombs shall not be dropped"? We delivered all the bombs free for the duration. Dividends were paid to the Germans during the war, and today, in peace time, the prime minister tells us: "Well, there is such and such a priority. Besides, we cannot do everything at once."

Since June 25 last, we often hear about a just society. Canada has never experienced as many labour strikes. There is a strike going on at the door of an institution at Rouyn. Why? Because the young people are not satisfied, because people want greater buying power, a better standard of living in a country able to provide it. But the Prime Minister or the government, in the Speech from the Throne continue to say: "It is a simple fact of life that everything cannot be done at once." And that is not all.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that the Speech from the Throne mentions language, priority or respect for languages, politics, religion, and speaks of mutual respect. I shall come back to that later, if my time does not run out.

Here is another excerpt:

—Pensions for the aged, provision for the sick and for the needy have been made more effective by legislation passed in recent Parliaments and by action of the provinces. Notwithstanding such measures, proverty continues to exist in Canada. My Government recognizes that——but it also believes that it would be deluding and cruel to pretend that there is a simple, all-encompassing or instantaneously effective remedy.

Here is where we do not agree with the government. That is exactly where the problem lies, Mr. Speaker, if the government thinks that it would be deluding and cruel to pretend that there is a simple remedy. Let us see what the Economic Council of Canada has to say. At the bottom of page 134, an explanation reads as follows:

Various forms of guaranteed minimum income—

The Council suggests the provision of an annual guaranteed income. Here is what it has to say:

Various forms of guaranteed minimum income have been proposed by different writers.

The simplest form would be a minimum income grant paid by the government to all regardless of means.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the national dividend that the Social Credit party wants to distribute to one and all without exception, regardless of their means. And this brings me to set forth the four basic principles of the Social Credit party. It is all very well to listen to speeches, to hear people refer to the Speech from the Throne, but they do not suggest anything as an alternative. That will not bring about a constructive legislation. And what are the Créditistes saying? For once I shall resort to the English language.

[English]

The following are the four basic principles of the Social Credit party. First, Social Credit firmly believes that the individual is the most important factor in organized society. Because he is a divinely created being with spiritual, mental and physical needs and potentialities, he has inalienable rights which must be respected and preserved. Because of this belief Social Credit is unalterably opposed to communism, fascism and all forms of totalitarian government which make the individual citizen subservient to the state. It stands opposed to any political organization whose aims are the furtherance of the sectional interests of organized labour, business or finance.

Reverting to the first sentence which says that Social Credit firmly believes that the individual is the most important factor in organized society, let me say that no matter whether the individual is white, black or yellow, whether he speaks French, English, Ukrainian, Italian or any other language on earth, no matter what his beliefs are, he has the right to be respected anywhere in the world and especially in our country, Canada. These inalienable rights should be respected anywhere, as well as in the province of Quebec.

When people ask that their rights be preserved in the province of Quebec because some of them wish to learn English instead of French, it is their right to learn one language instead of the other. We would of course suggest that everyone should learn the two official languages of our country. When I went to Czechoslovakia a few years ago I found there people who spoke as many as six or seven languages. I thought it was wonderful of them to speak so many languages. Here in Canada there are some people who, because they are French and do not understand a word of English say, "to heck with English, I don't want to learn it". We also hear people who speak English only saying "I cannot understand French and I will never learn it in my whole life". Those two people are two kinds of separatists whom we should not have in our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Lewis: That is true.

Mr. Caouette: It is true, is it not? I have the support of the hon. member for York South, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: A hearty one.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I say there are limits to narrow-mindedness. Canada was not built by people who spent their time devouring one another and it is a country that belongs to all Canadians; we maintain our positions. In the province of Quebec, we were not elected because we talked about of two nations or of a special status, and I am a French Canadian, everybody knows that. There are nevertheless 400,000 people who voted for us in the province of Quebec.

[English]

It is said there are two nations, but it is one nation which is Canada. We are Canadian. We have two official languages, French and English, and we have a multiplicity of cultures, such as English, French, Ukrainian, Italian and German. We have all kinds of cultures in our country, and the nation is the richer for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: We have the Chinese group, and we also have an Indian representative right here in the House of Commons. We are happy that an Indian should sit in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: So this is our stand; and those people who called for a special status for the province of Quebec and for two nations nearly disappeared from that province. They were not accepted. This was so because we do not want to hear these things. During an election we want action—that is what we want. We do not ask for a special status for one province. I do not want a special status for Quebec, a special one for Ontario or one for Prince Edward Island, where I was yesterday. What I want is a Canadian constitution which will permit each province to maintain its identity in this country of ours, Canada.

We have one province in this country, namely Quebec, which is predominantly French. Let us have a constitution which will ensure the fullest respect for the rights of Quebeckers as it will for the rights of the other provinces. I do not think it would be wise for any province to interfere with the rights of the other provinces. However, it would be wise for the Canadian government to give us the assurance that each province will be treated with fairness, and that each province will have the maximum autonomy.

The second basic principle of Social Credit is that the government must serve the individual. The major function of the democratic government in organized society is to secure for the people the results they want from the management of their public affairs, in so far as such results are physically possible and morally right.

The third basic principle is that the individual must be free and have economic security. The individual can only attain his full stature in a society where his ability to make moral choices is restricted as little as possible. Economic security is a necessary means for attaining this freedom, not as an end in itself to be attained by restrictions. This is the difference between those people who advocate economic security and those who advocate freedom in the hands of the government. We have seen that type of government, Mr. Speaker, in many countries. When we visited Czechoslovakia we found that though some people call them a communist country they do not call themselves communists, but socialists.

We have also been told that Sweden is an example to follow because in Sweden there is no such thing as unemployment. It is true, Mr. Speaker; there is no such thing as unemployment in Sweden. The men work, but in order to attain a decent standard of earnings the women have to work too. Sometimes a man is on one shift, his wife is on another shift and the children are looked after by the government. When in Sweden I remember boarding a bus. On the bus there was a bus driver, another man whose sole task was to sell tickets, another man to punch the tickets, and a fourth man in the corner watching the other three.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the house allow the hon. member to proceed with his remarks beyond the time allowed by standing orders? Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I very sincerely thank the honourable members for the fine courtesy they have shown me by letting me proceed with my remarks; I shall make no abuse of it. I will be brief. I was speaking about Sweden and since I was speaking in English, I will continue in English.

[English]

In Sweden, Mr. Speaker, monthly wages are in the order of $55 to $65 a month. Although they say that the cost of living is lower in Sweden, if you want to buy a car you will pay twice the price there that we pay in Canada, where wages are at least three times, maybe four times, the level in Sweden.

When I was in Czechoslovakia I visited the Skoda plant where 6,000 men were working at a wage of $45 to $55 a month. This little Skoda car sells in Montreal city for $1,775. In Czechoslovakia where the car is built it sells for the equivalent of $6,200. Therefore no one in Czechoslovakia can afford to buy a car; the people either walk or use a bicycle. I asked the vice president of the plant in Czechoslovakia the reason for the price being so high. He told me: "We have increased the tax portion of the price because we do not want our people to buy cars. If they buy cars we will then have to build some roads".

Mr. Lewis: That is not right.

Mr. Caouette: I hear my hon. friend from York South saying that I am wrong, but I know I am right in this instance because I spoke to the vice president of the plant in Czechoslovakia. I asked about salaries and the production of cars for export only, not for internal use. I also priced refrigerators and T.V. sets. Refrigerators sold in Czechoslovakia for the equivalent of $700.

In Russia, Mr. Speaker, the situation is even worse: They do not have any refrigerators. When I was a young boy we were obliged to use window space as a refrigerator for our quarts of milk, our bread and butter. That is what they do in Moscow today, after 50 years of freedom, of what they call democracy for the people. I have seen men, women and youngsters working in these countries.

I hear my hon. friends from the New Democratic party saying that they have the solution to our problems. They had the solution in England, which can be considered a close parallel to the Canadian scene. For years England was ruled by the Conservative party. The labourer, the workingman, then became sick and tired of the Conservative party and voted Labour. He went "N.D.P.", though that is not what the English party is called. They seem to be associated anyway.

During the election compaign the deputy leader of the New Democratic party in the province of Quebec, Mr. Robert Cliche, was asked on T.V. one night how his philosophy was helping England. He replied: "Well, that is a different situation. There is a bad situation over there which is not easy". So the interviewer said: "Well, you say you are able to keep people out of trouble. If they are in trouble in England, what are you doing to help them?" "Well," replied Mr. Cliche, "never mind about that; let's get back to Canada where it is easier to work out solutions".

There was a socialist government in the province of Saskatchewan for 17 years, following which the government was defeated. The leader of the socialist party in Saskatchewan was defeated in a general election. He was then re-elected in a by-election. Now once again he has been defeated in a general election. This is not because the leader of the New Democratic party is not a fine gentleman; he is definitely a fine gentleman. But his solutions are not going to solve our economic problems. Those solutions are to abolish free enterprise, as do away with personal initiative. I would ask the N.D.P. members to show me where in the world, in countries that have abolished personal initiative and freedom of enterprise, conditions have improved instead of worsened.

In the province of Quebec there is a good friend of the hon. member for York South by the name of René Levesque. Mr. Levesque was minister of national resources in the Quebec government and in the 1962 election campaign made an issue of the nationalization of electric power. He stated that this was the key which would permit the people to become masters in their own province. The government was re-elected on the strength of the promise that the people of Quebec would become masters in their province. Electric power was nationalized in 1962. We are now in the year 1968, some six years later.

Mr. Lewis: Are you opposed to nationalization of that sort?

Mr. Caouette: Yes, definitely opposed.

An hon. Member: Are the Liberals?

Mr. Caouette: That is a matter for them. I am not a Liberal, but a Social Crediter.

Mr. Lewis: They were agreeing with you a moment ago.

Mr. Caouette: They may well agree with me when they understand my explanation.

An hon. Member: What about the position of B.C.?

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Caouette: I am opposed to nationalization even in B.C. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, power in Quebec was nationalized, and look at the situation in which Quebec Hydro finds itself today. In former days minister René Levesque was telling the people that the big profits realized by Shawinigan Water and Power would be distributed among the population of the province, that they would benefit in the form of a rate cut. So, after six years we ask ourselves one question. Are we better masters today than we were in 1962? No. Have the rates been cut? No, they have been doubled.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: And Shawinigan is not making any profit—oh, no. The government of Quebec could not even pay Shawinigan for the nationalization cost. So the government made an agreement to pay interest on the money they owe to Shawinigan.

In the last few years Shawinigan had been making a profit of 4.2 per cent on its capitalization. Now, without having to administer anything, without workmen having to climb posts, without having to put up wires, the company is receiving from the government of Quebec 5.8 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: That is the result of socialization or nationalization.

Free enterprise makes profits, yes. Free enterprise will give us results; governments, whether provincial or otherwise, will not give similar results with our own money because no one in government wishes to be responsible. When you fall into the hands of any government agency or bureaucracy you do not find people who are willing to take responsibility. One man will send you to another and this other knows nothing of your problem and sends you somewhere else. You keep going round and round. On the other hand when you go to someone in private enterprise, to someone who owns a private enterprise, he will deal with your problem. He will tell you about the extent of his enterprise.

A man in private enterprise will tell you, "We are making so many millions a year." Where are the men in Canada today who can write out a cheque for $1 million? Where are such free enterprisers? They are not piling up their millions in the corners of their rooms. They are using their money to expand industry, to create more jobs, more goods, to fight inflation and to fight unemployment.

We do not think the government should do everything for us in our society. We are strongly opposed to all political organizations the aims of which are the furtherance of the sectional interests or organized labour, business or finance.

I come to my fourth point, after which I shall have finished. The physically possible must be regarded as the financially possible. Whatever is physically possible, desirable and morally right can and should be made financially possible, and the Prime Minister need not be a magician to bring about such a state of affairs.

He knows that we have the necessary men with skills, as well as goods and productive capacity to create enough goods and services for all our people. In so far as we have the capacity to use our national resources, credit ought to be provided to make their utilization possible. In other words, we should make financially possible what it is physically possible to carry out.

I have been talking about the government of Quebec and I wish to read something that is in French.

At the National Harbour Board, we have asked the president, or rather the bridge superintendent, what was the cost of Montréal Jacques-Cartier bridge, what amount we had to pay in interests, since it had been built, and what was the amount of our debt on Jacques-Cartier bridge. Well, here is the content of the letter that Mr. J. A. Clément engineer, bridge superintendent, sent to a certain Mr. Chénier, and I quote:

Mr. Jos. A. Chénier
Greenfield Park, P.Q.
Dear Sir:

Your letter of May 9, 1968, requesting some information on Jacques-Cartier bridge, has been brought to my attention. I am pleased to supply you with the following informations:

1. Original cost of Jacques-Cartier Bridge: $18,571,308.71.

That is the cost of the bridge: materials, labour, contractors, anything related to the construction of the bridge: $18,571,308.71.

3. Interests paid so far: $20,198,266.53.

The amount of our present debt on the bridge? $14,065,605.39.

An hon. Member: The just society!

Mr. Caouette: That is what the just society is!

An hon. Member: Just for the fun.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is private enterprise.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Caouette: There is a distinction. This is not private enterprise; it is the private enterprise system, and the government is responsible for this state of affairs.

The other night on television the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), who now represents the constituency of Hochelaga, said in so many words, "Well, the interest is nothing. You can see all the cars and all the trucks and people which have crossed that bridge. All that traffic paid for it in the end. What is the $20 million when we have made $100 million out of the investment." At any rate, that was his explanation. I want to ask this: If his explanation is right, then the bridge cost us $18 million. Why then have we not built a second bridge with the $20 million of interest so that we can transport more goods, more people and more of everything over it and be $20 million better off?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is the solution, beyond the shadow of a doubt. If the Prime Minister really wants a just society, let him study these four points; if he does not have the time to study them, he should have the people around him study them, his private secretaries, and let us have first some order in our finances. This afternoon, the Prime Minister told us: we cannot carry out these works, we cannot undertake this other thing, nor can we carry on any longer this other project because we lack money. However, he knows full well that we shall continue paying practically one billion and a half in interest this year alone on our public debt. And that will not be to the advantage of the Canadian people. The monetary system is wrong. I am looking at the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). He knows what I say, he understands it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: I hope that the Minister of Agriculture will have some influence on the Prime Minister, in order to make him understand the importance of monetary reform. We go back to our ridings and we get reelected. We come back here and we have problems. I had the visit of a member of the just society and people like him I receive by the hundreds, Mr. Speaker, every day, between the sessions, because we have to pay for our stamps at the parliament in Ottawa, we the members and even the party leaders. I have myself paid about $800 in stamps, while working for my constituents, for the Canadian people, as a member for the riding I represented at that time.

Mr. Speaker, it is inconceivable that we must pay such sums. But to come back to the just society in which we live, and more especially to the famous social welfare that exists in all the provinces, in Quebec as elsewhere, the federal government provides for 50 per cent. That is a joint program. We must get together to decide whether the joint program must be reduced or not. In any case, Mr. Moïse St. Denis who is 75 years old and whose wife is 63 presented himself last week at my office, in Rouyn. Mr. St. Denis used to receive a pension of $107.10 and his wife used to get a supplement of $30 which gave them $137.10. Last year, Mr. St. Denis managed to find a small job that enabled him to earn $500. The government learned of that—officials of the welfare office. Then, last week, he was told that $10 of his money will be kept back every month to refund the sum which he received while he was working last year for two or three months. Today he gets $127.10 to live on with his wife. He pays $75 rent monthly. Can one imagine how with $52.10, a man and a woman can live today. That is the just society in which we live nowadays.

Mr. Speaker, we know that poverty in this land is a fact and the Prime Minister might well say it. We know that there are poor people, but we just want to replace their plight by a just society. In my view, only one step needs to be taken if we are to achieve a just society in Canada; that is to put our finances into order and not only our taxation system. The Prime Minister may well introduce programs, as those expected in a mid-October budget, to divert money from the wealthy to the needy, and I shall say in English——it is the system by which you take away from the "haves" to give to the "have nots". Finally you will have all kinds of "have nots" and no more "haves" in Canada.

[English]

• (9:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

That is what is going to happen.

So Mr. Speaker, we hold that what is physically feasible—not on the moon but here below in Canada, in our own country—may be financially possible. Once such a system is adopted, other reforms will come about easily. It will not take ten, twenty or twenty five years. Once order is restored in finances, the rest will come out very easily. Such is the solution, the means, the way to achieve a just society in Canada. If the Prime Minister is serious whenever he speaks about a just society, I hope and I wish he will be serious when introducing the legislation that will bring the financiers to reason and allow the government of Canada to put Canadian abundance at the disposal of Canadians who need it, and at the same time to assist the foreign countries that need our assistance.

[English]

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, when I put my name on the list of those who wished to speak I did not realize I would follow such eminent speakers as those to whom we have been listening today. Indeed I feel somewhat guilty to be following the hon. member for Temiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) who spoke so humourously, and who made so many excellent points.

I should like to begin by congratulating you, Mr. Speaker, upon your appointment, and by extending congratulations also to Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) and to the Deputy Chairman of Committees, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard). I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) who moved and seconded the motion for the address in reply. Both did excellently and I have no doubt we shall hear much more from them in this house.

This afternoon and this evening we heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) list a long litany of subjects which were not referred to in the speech from the throne. This was not in it, they said; that was not in it—and so on. The hon. member for York South spoke about originality. Well, I do not think it would take very much originality for any one of the 265 of us in this chamber—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Allmand: —to call attention to matters which were not mentioned in the speech from the throne. I note that the hon. member did not refer to any of the 47 bills which were tabled after the speech from the throne had been delivered, and neither did the Leader of the Opposition. None of these bills was mentioned, although they were a clear indication of the intentions of the government with regard to legislation. I though this was a strange omission, because in that list were such bills as the bill to lower drug prices and the bill to amend the patents legislation. I recall that when this party was seeking to leave the House of Commons in order to elect a new leader, members of the New Democratic party insisted that we stay here because that bill was so important that they did not wish parliament to adjourn without dealing with it. Yet today the leader of the N.D.P. comes to the house and says there is nothing of value in the speech from the throne.

As I said earlier, it does not require much originality to make statements of that kind. I myself feel there are many important pieces of legislation among the 47 bills listed; for example the languages bill, the agriculture legislation, the legislation concerning the Bankruptcy Act, and many others.

Both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for York South referred very often to the subject of poverty, and drew attention to the statements made about poverty by the Economic Council of Canada. But as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said this afternoon, poverty was not discovered by the Economic Council when it put out its report. The Liberal party has been trying to deal with poverty for more than 30 years and has been doing a reasonably good job.

I would remind hon. members opposite that it was the Liberal party which secured the passage of the Canadian assistance plan legislation; it was the Liberal party which was responsible for the passage of the Canada Pension Plan, the medicare program, the manpower program and many similar pieces of legislation. So we have been trying to wage this war on poverty for a long time. When I listened to the Leader of the Opposition and to the hon. member for York South the question which occurred to me, as it did to the hon. member for Témiscamingue, was this: If it is so easy to eliminate poverty, why did not the Leader of the Opposition, who was premier of Nova Scotia for 11 years, deal with this question in some of his speeches from the throne. The last time I was in Nova Scotia it appeared to me that poverty had not been defeated there, despite the programs put into operation by this government during the past five years. If it is just a matter of putting things in speeches from the throne, why was more not done in the 11 years during which the Leader of the Opposition was premier of Nova Scotia?

Then again, as the hon. member for Témiscamingue put it, if the New Democratic party possessed these magic solutions, if it knew these answers during the 17 or 19 years during which it held power in Saskatchewan, why was there still so much poverty when it left office there? The hon. member for York South spoke about reprehensible actions and half truths. I thought it was very reprehensible for the hon. member to make the statement in this house—and members of his party applauded him—to the effect that other members of this house were making the same mistake as the Canadian electorate had made. Too often members of the N.D.P. take the attitude that when the voters become more intelligent they will vote for that party. They leave the suggestion that the voters are not too intelligent at present, but when they become better educated they will vote for N.D.P. candidates. I find this a reprehensible attitude. The Canadian people know better than either the Leader of the Opposition or the hon. member for York South who can best handle the business of this country—and it is the present Prime Minister, and the party to which I belong. The people have the good judgment and the intelligence to know it, though they are aware that there are no panaceas, as we pointed out during the campaign. The hon. member for Temiscamingue made a good point when he reminded us that if the New Democratic party or their colleagues in Britain did, indeed, possess magical solutions we might have expected them to embody those proposals in speeches from the throne and proceed to eliminate poverty.

What is wrong with speeches from the throne? In my opinion they are anachronistic, completely out of date in this modern age. Under this system a man who is a politician, a man who knows where he is going, has to prepare a speech to be read in an impartial way by someone who is non-political. I should like to see the session started with a speech from the Prime Minister, and the debate would go on from there. I do not know exactly how it would be arranged. Possibly when we appeared in the Senate chamber the Governor General could say a few welcoming words before concluding: "Now my first minister will deliver the program for this parliament."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Allmand: We should not have to attend here and listen to the first speech in this house being made by the Leader of the Opposition. The first speech should come from the Prime Minister. He should set the tone for the work of the session. As the procedure is now, even if the speech were read by Christopher Plummer I do not think he could come up with anything inspiring, whatever the content. As I say, I believe the present procedure to be anachronistic, and feel it should be changed.

One of the points I wish to bring up this evening concerns the Canada Elections Act. I feel we should not allow our experience of the election to become too distant before correcting some of the provisions in that legislation which in my opinion are unfair, and which denied the franchise to many Canadians.

Today a question was asked of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) by, I believe, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler), about whether amendments would be made with respect to bedridden people, and so forth, and the President of the Privy Council replied that he would be quite willing to hear suggestions. I think we should give him suggestions now, while these things are fresh in memory.

The election was held at the beginning of summer, just when the vacation period had started. Some people had planned their vacations a year ago. They had bought tickets to go across Canada, to go south or overseas. There should be a provision in our election act for absentee voting in such cases, and it should be more elaborate than the present two days advance voting. With all the technical advances we have, there is no reason why people who have been enumerated cannot vote, despite the fact that they are not in their constituencies on election day. Their votes could be transferred to another returning office in Canada, or to a consulate or embassy abroad.

It is also unfortunate that Canadian citizens living abroad, such as members of the foreign service, cannot vote through their embassies and consulates. Other countries have procedures whereby this is done, and we in Canada should do likewise.

Since this is the debate on the speech from the throne I would like to put on record some of my goals for this parliament and some of the goals of the people living in the Montreal area particularly, since my constituency is in Montreal. I know that the poverty program is a matter of priority. I have already mentioned the drug bill which will assist the war on poverty and help achieve the just society, despite what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) may say.

I feel that in my constituency poverty is felt most by the older people. They suffer more than any other group. I would hope some things could be done to improve their situation. Although this party has done a lot in that regard I think we should do more. For example, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see the extra $500 exemption, which is now given at age 70, granted at age 65, particularly because we have lowered pension eligibility to that age.

Montreal is one of the principal transportation centres in Canada, and many people in that city have been wondering when there will be an appointment to the presidency of Air Canada. This important crown corporation has continued for a considerable length of time without a president. People in my area feel there are good men available. They do not believe it is good for the morale of the company that it continue to operate without a new president and I think the government should act on this matter as quickly as possible.

A frustrating experience with air transportation, despite the advance in aircraft technology, is the time taken to reach an airport from one's home. In the Montreal area one can spend more time going from his home to the airport, and from another airport to his ultimate destination, than he spends in the air. Something should be done about this problem, especially with respect to the proposed new airport in Montreal. I understand the government is taking this matter into consideration with respect to that new airport, and I urge that every effort be made to make the best use of fast jet travel.

I also wish to mention questions of security and labour problems at the port of Montreal. Last spring the Minister of Labour did a fantastic job of settling a potential strike at the port. However, I wish to point out to the house that the agreement reached then will last only until the end of this year, and then we will be faced with another situation.

Several things to make life more agreeable for men working in the port should be done by the government, but it appears that these things are not being done as quickly as possible. I refer to the provision of rest rooms, restaurants, waiting rooms and so forth. They have been sought for a long time and the government has promised them. I understand that a pilot project has begun, but I believe the government should act more quickly.

There is also the question of security in the port. The other night I read an article by Bruce Taylor in the Montreal Star, describing the lax situation that exists, whereby anybody can go on to the docks in Montreal and steal goods. This comes at a time when a royal commission is sitting to investigate the question of security of the docks. One would think that the National Harbours Board could do much more to prevent theft and improve security on the wharves.

I hope that within the next three or four years this parliament will do something definite with respect to the pollution problems of air and water. Anti-pollution measures have been adopted in the United States and other countries. We are starting to act on these problems in Canada, and we should adopt a national water act as soon as possible. We are one of the richest countries in the world so far as water resources are concerned, but unless we act quickly these resources will not be preserved in a good state. To combat air pollution better automobile exhausts must be devised, and there must be legislation to maintain the purity of air.

The Prime Minister and the government are to be congratulated upon their intention to introduce an official languages act. It is important that the federal government set an example by introducing that bill as quickly as possible because some extremists in Canada, extremists on both sides, want to try to eliminate the language of those with whom they disagree. At present in Montreal a group of new Canadians, mostly of Italian origin, live in an area where the local school board is controlled by a group of people whom I call extremists, people who are trying to eliminate the use of the English language in the local schools. I hope that by passing legislation such as the proposed official languages act, a higher level of understanding between language groups will be reached in all provinces of Canada.

I also hope that we will continue to press for the incorporation of a charter of human rights in the constitution, so that no school-board, no municipality, no province can take away the language rights of citizens. Mr. Speaker, I have confidence in the government and I know it will do a good job for us.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: May I inquire what will be the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Tomorrow we will continue the resumed debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the amendments thereto.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock this house stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At ten o'clock p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 17, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETINGS OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the right hon. gentleman tell the house whether in the meetings of the federal-provincial officials concerning the constitution, to which he has referred, consideration has been given to the question of an amending formula for the constitution?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The questions which are being discussed by these officials are those which were decided at the meetings held at government level last February by federal and provincial heads of government. The amending formula, it was decided then, was not among the priority items. The committee agreed it was more important to try to reach agreement on the substance than on the mechanics of changing that substance, as had been attempted for years and years, so we agreed to reverse the order and that is why the officials are not discussing the aspect to which the hon. gentleman referred.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the Prime Minister undertake to make a full report to the house in the near future as to the agenda for the meetings of the officials? Could he also give the house a report as to what progress has been made in the various areas under discussion? If he is not prepared to report as to progress, can he not at least give a full and precise report regarding the agenda of the meetings?

Mr. Trudeau: The agenda can easily be found; it follows from the agenda established in public in front of television cameras last February. I should not like to say more about these discussions at the moment for the simple reason that the provincial and federal governments decided jointly that the officials should hold their discussions in camera and that no public statements should be made.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the Prime Minister not prepared to inform the house precisely as to the agenda which is being discussed?

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition should understand that this is not a strictly federal matter. This is being done in co-operation with the provinces. It was decided that these meetings should be private; the provinces have been quite firm in that respect, and I think they are quite right.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a complementary question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that high officials are meeting at the present time, when does the Prime Minister envisage a meeting between the federal and the provincial governments to discuss constitutional matters?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday or the day before, I have written to the provincial premiers to suggest a conference of the Prime Minister and premiers in the second half of November or December. I am still awaiting their answer, but that is the date we suggested.

[English]

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the announcement reported in today's press that Chrysler has raised the price of cars in the United States, will the minister inform the house whether he is getting into contact with the Canadian subsidiaries of the United States auto makers in order to make sure there is no increase in car prices in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The purpose of the automotive agreement was, among other things, to reduce the differential between the cost of automobiles in Canada and in the United States. Over the period of three or four years this has been done to a great extent. When the agreement was put into operation the price differential between Canadian and United States cars was about 8 per cent. It has now been brought down, on an average basis, to about 3 per cent. I have made inquiries and I understand that some standard cars are sold in Canada, wholesale of course, at the same price as in the United States. I also understand that if one shops around properly he might find some cars being sold in Canada at a slightly lower price than they are in the United States.

Mr. Woolliams: Where?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): That is only to cabinet ministers.

Mr. Pepin: I could not give names of cars because—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It appears to me that the minister is now going beyond the terms of the question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Lewis: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, do I understand the minister to say to this house and to the people of Canada that when the United States price increase is just a little more than the Canadian price increase, then the purpose of the auto pact will be served; or is he going to take steps to see that the price is not increased in Canada unless such increase is fully justified?

Mr. Pepin: I was just trying to say that the effects of the automobile agreement on prices have been concrete. I was just trying to demonstrate that, and if I had been given more time I was going to say that these moves are expected to continue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the minister should be given more time.

Mr. Lewis: He has no answer.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the letters which the presidents of Canada's three largest automobile companies recently sent to the minister made no mention of any undertaking to increase Canada's share of North America's automobile production in the 1969 model year, has the minister since been in touch with these company presidents to make sure that Canada does receive a satisfactory increase in the 1969 production year?

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Pepin: I do not agree with that at all, Mr. Speaker. In the letters which were sent to me by the three leading manufacturers up to now—and I expect other letters from the less important ones—

An hon. Member: Less important?

Mr. Pepin: —they gave me clear indication that they agree with the automotive agreement, that they have made progress under it and are going to continue making progress. And they gave examples of the kind of progress they have in mind.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pepin: This is only part—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might go into another subject.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—OPPORTUNITY TO DISCUSS RENEWAL OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister make a statement in regard to the renewal of the NORAD agreement which, as the house knows, was contracted since the dissolution of the last parliament; and will parliament be given an opportunity to discuss this important commitment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there will of course be an opportunity during the throne speech debate to discuss this matter, but it is the intention of the government to give parliament ample opportunity to discuss all aspects of Canada's foreign policy. A special effort will be made to bring these matters before the parliamentary committee, at which time the NORAD agreement can be discussed; but if the house wishes me or the Prime Minister to make a statement in the house at some appropriate time then we have no objection whatever.

Mr. Brewin: As a supplementary question, is the minister aware that the former prime minister said on March 11 that his government—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Brewin: —would make its decisions—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member obviously is not asking a question that is in order. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat? The hon. member is asking whether the Prime Minister is aware of a statement made previously. That is not a question that can be put at this time.

UNITED NATIONS

CYPRUS—POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, because this question concerns two departments I direct it to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the Canadian contingent serving with the United Nations forces in Cyprus. Archbishop Makarios has stated that our contingent there could be withdrawn now without danger to the peace of that island country. Costing Canada, as it does, $3½ million a year, and Canada bearing the responsibility for this payment as does no other United Nations country for its contingent, does not the Prime Minister consider the time is now appropriate to end this beneficence on the part of Canada?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will be glad to discuss this with the two ministers mentioned by the right hon. gentleman.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO FORM OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the light of the answer he gave the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings yesterday, in which he mentioned the proposed date of the budget, would the minister advise the house whether this will be in the usual form of a budget preceded by a white paper so we can discuss the whole financial situation of the country, or is this to be merely another tax-grabbing budget?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): It will be a full budget.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Will the minister advise the house whether this budget will include tax reform proposals, or has the minister abandoned the proposal that his predecessor in office made to this house that the tax reforms would be preceded by a white paper, and that legislation would follow in due course?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I answered this question yesterday.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY FRENCH FOREIGN MINISTER RESPECTING PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the government taken official cognizance of yesterday's extraordinary statement by the foreign minister of France, Mr. Michel Debre, accusing the Prime Minister of making false statements; and is Canada forwarding any official protest?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. Politicians even of this country accuse the Prime Minister of making false statements. I don't.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING JURISDICTIONAL CHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could he tell us whether the Quebec government entered into conversations with the federal government last summer, in order to assume responsibility for unemployment insurance and vocational training, as suggested on March 27 by honourable Paul Dozois in his budget speech?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have had no conferences with the representatives of the government of Quebec on any of these proposals.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—PAYMENT TO ONTARIO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. On or about June 7 the then minister of agriculture announced a payment of $60 per acre to farmers of southwestern Ontario for not growing sugar beets. I wonder whether the minister can say when the farmers will receive their cheques.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I will take the question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO PREVENT FUTURE STRIKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Owing to the fact that the people of the nation are viewing with alarm and anxiety the increasing number of strikes which affect the public interest through curtailment of vital functions in our economy, does the government plan to take any action that would be helpful in these situations?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There is a committee on labour questions which was set up by the previous government. I have talked to the chairman of that committee, Dr. Woods, and I understand there will be a report before Christmas. We will decide then what action should be taken on that report.

An hon. Member: Which Christmas?

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, since the right hon. Prime Minister says we must wait for the report on strikes, could he tell me if we must wait for that report to end the strike at the Garage Royal in Rouyn?

TRADE

WHEAT—STEPS TO DISPOSE OF CARRYOVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the D.B.S. figures just released indicate that the wheat carryover in this country on July 1 was the second largest in history, would the minister take the opportunity provided by the throne speech debate to outline to the country and the house what steps the government plans to take to sell this enormous carryover of wheat?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I will consider this generous offer.

[Mr. Olson.]

AGRICULTURE

ONTARIO—INQUIRIES AS TO MEETINGS WITH CORN PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Agriculture received a request from the Ontario Farmer's Union for a meeting to discuss the serious marketing and pricing problems of this year's corn production? If so, what date has been set for this imperative meeting?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the farmers' union of Ontario has already had one meeting with the Minister of Agriculture and senior officials of the department. That meeting was held in August. There are three other groups also representing corn producers in southern Ontario who have requested a meeting. One meeting was held a few days ago and another will take place this Wednesday. Perhaps we will be able to hold another meeting with the F.U.O. regarding this problem before the end of this week, providing we have had the opportunity of hearing from other groups who legitimately claim they also represent Ontario corn producers.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been raised on several occasions, but I should like to ask the minister how soon he can make an announcement in the house as to the intentions of the government in respect of this very serious problem.

Mr. Olson: I will consider an announcement as soon as the groups who in fact represent the various sections of the corn producing industry agree on what action the government ought to take.

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Eastern Quebec farmers, especially in the riding of Bellechasse, have suffered heavy losses due to crop damage in 1967.

Has the Quebec government or any farm group made representations to the Minister of Agriculture so that financial assistance may be provided to the farmers involved, prior to the coming into force of the Quebec Crop Insurance Act?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there have been many requests to the federal government during the past three years for what might be called special ad hoc assistance programs. For approximately the last three years the position of the federal government has been that it would participate in approved crop insurance programs to the extent of 50 per cent of administration costs and 25 per cent of premiums. It is very difficult to deviate from this program when the emphasis has been in that direction in order that we may have established crop insurance programs all over the country to deal with these problems as they arise.

CANADA COUNCIL

INQUIRY AS TO GRANT TO FRANCOIS DORLOT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that Francois Dorlot, the recipient of a Canada Council grant for study in France, has been linked with the Rossillon affair, and the strong stand taken by the Prime Minister on this subject, what action is the government taking in the matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, we have been in touch with the Canada Council about that matter. It is true that the council has granted that student who, I am told, is very brilliant, upon his teachers' recommendation, a scholarship to write a thesis on a matter as far removed from contemporary politics as the waterway traffic in Canada around the 17th century. The Canada Council told us that it does not investigate the recipients' political beliefs and awards its scholarships according to the candidates' intellectual and academic qualifications.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should be more specific. What action will the government take to assure that Mr. Dorlot will not be one of Mr. Rossillon's secret agents to agitate among the French speaking minority upon his return to Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HARBOURS

POSSIBLE MOVE OF BOARD HEADQUARTERS FROM OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the acting Minister of Transport, and may I express the hope that the minister's absence from the house will be only temporary. Will the National Harbours Board headquarters be moved from Ottawa to Montreal, and can the minister give any possible reason for this move?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, in the absence from the house of the Minister of Transport I would like to reply to the hon. member. There is no plan to move the National Harbours Board from Ottawa to Montreal. However, the future use of the administration building at Expo is being studied, and it is possible that the management of the port of Montreal, which is part of the National Harbours Board system, will be moved to this building. It was for that reason that there was a misunderstanding and an inaccurate report in the press, but I emphasize that there is no thought at the present time of moving the headquarters from Ottawa.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister instructed Mr. William Lee to countermand the invitation extended to his friends to use the switchboards of the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister for the purpose of relaying calls—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Coates: —to his new firm, in view of the fact that the first contracts obtained by Mr. Lee and Mr. Neville in their private capacity have been from the government of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

INDUSTRY

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DESIGNATED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Could he tell us whether a study is now under way with regard to underdeveloped areas and whether we can expect to receive shortly a report on the areas which, in his opinion, are to be considered as underdeveloped in 1969?

[English]

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister I will take that question as notice and refer it to him.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister advise the house whether it is his intention to transfer the responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board from the present Minister of Trade and Commerce to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: Maybe I could rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: You had better.

Mr. Woolliams: Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to transfer the Canadian Wheat Board from the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It doesn't sound much better, does it, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Woolliams: May I rephrase my question in this way, Mr. Speaker. I direct it to the Prime Minister. With reference to the export of grain, is the Prime Minister aware that a contract has now been signed between France and Japan which will take the final amount of grain that we would be shipping to Japan under our export contract?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question as asked is not in order. I indicated earlier to an hon. member that to ask simply whether a minister is aware of a particular matter is not in order.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

BIAFRA—SUGGESTED ACTION BY UNITED NATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder whether Canada is going to try to have the United Nations deal with the tragic war in Nigeria?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government, as are all members of this house, is very, very concerned about these tragic events in Nigeria and Biafra. We have been exploring the best means by which the force of public opinion in the world could be brought to bear, and the question of bringing the matter before the United Nations has been considered. As I said in answer to a question the other day, the best way this matter could be brought before the United Nations would be by the neighbouring countries of Nigeria.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why not by Canada?

Mr. Sharp: The Africans are on the spot, very much concerned, as we are; and I am sure nobody in this house would suggest that we in Canada are more concerned than are the people of the neighbouring countries of Nigeria about the tragic events of these days. If the countries of the Organization for African Unity are not prepared to take an initiative—and we must wait to see—the Canadian government would have no hesitation in bringing before this world body the humanitarian aspects of this conflict.

An hon. Member: Why not now?

Mr. Sharp: There are two questions involved here. One is that I do not think we should intervene in the political affairs of the people of Nigeria. I do think, however, that we, like all the other people of the world, are concerned with the humanitarian aspects. That is why we have been concentrating our efforts in that direction. I can assure the house that if this were the best way of bringing the matter before the United Nations, the Canadian delegation would not hesitate to take the initiative.

Mr. Fairweather: I have a supplementary question. Is the minister not aware that the Organization of African Unity has declined to take the initiative at the United Nations, and does this not now free Canada's hands?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is possible to give as definite an answer as that. The Organization of African Unity is still seized of the question and meetings on this question are going on currently in Africa and elsewhere. However, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me most important that we should govern ourselves in terms of how we can be most useful in this situation; not whether we can satisfy our own humanitarian instincts, which are so strong, but how we can act most effectively on behalf of the people of Nigeria and Biafra. This should be the test which should govern all our actions, both in Nigeria and elsewhere.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs think it would be any use in going to the United Nations after all these people have starved?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the events surrounding the efforts that are being made to supply food are well known, but perhaps not as well known to all members of the house as they are to myself as the minister for external affairs.

An hon. Member: Tell us about it.

Mr. Sharp: Strenuous efforts have been made by the Canadian government over a very long period to open the way for these supplies.

An hon. Member: When did it start?

Mr. Sharp: We believed that the best means of getting adequate supplies of food was by a land corridor. This was turned down by Biafra for reasons which I can understand.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Sharp: They felt this would provide a corridor for military efforts by Nigeria. So, that having failed, we concentrated on an air lift, and so did the International Red Cross. An agreement to an air lift was apparently reached on September 3 by the International Red Cross, who thought they had the agreement of both Nigeria and Biafra for this purpose. Unfortunately, as has happened on so many occasions, when the time came to implement this agreement not the Nigerians but the Biafrans turned it down on exactly the same ground, that it would interfere with their military effort.

These are the facts, Mr. Speaker. This is a most terrible war but it is being fought on both sides as a war for survival ahead of the humanitarian purposes which we all share. We are doing the best we can to make the humanitarian considerations predominate, but we have failed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the fact that what is taking place against Biafra has all the appearances of genocide, is this not a matter that Canada as a member of the Security Council should bring before that body if the negro states surrounding Biafra refuse to act? Surely this is something that Canada could bring before the United Nations, being noted among the nations for its independence. Why does the government not act?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this is becoming a debate, but I ask for your indulgence to continue it for a few minutes.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister is willing to answer the last supplementary question.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there have been charges by the Biafran authorities that the purpose of the Nigerians is genocide, that their purpose is to wipe out thousands or millions of the people of Biafra. This may be so, but we do not know.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): What are you doing to find out?

Mr. Sharp: We are following the developments very closely indeed. For us to go to the United Nations and charge the Nigerian government with genocide is a step which I am sure we would all hesitate to take. Therefore, as I said, our purpose in all these exchanges and in all our efforts is to put the humanitarian considerations first and try to reach the starving people of Biafra and Nigeria. I believe that under these circumstances this is the best we can do, and I do not believe we should interfere and say that either Nigeria or Biafra is right in its political objectives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister a further supplementary question. Like all the others I share his concern about the situation. However, could the minister tell us whether it is not possible to bring this matter before the United Nations without making charges, but to insist that both Nigeria and Biafra explain the situation to the world? If it is not possible—and if it is I will want to ask a question based on this—in view of the fact that between the 13th and 16th of this month the International Red Cross organized about 13 flights to Biafra with inadequate planes, why is the government refusing to lend at least one Hercules plane to the International Red Cross to carry out this great humanitarian work about which the minister speaks with such feeling?

Mr. Sharp: I should like to say in answer to the first question that this is the course of action we have been considering and which we hope the African states which are neighbours of Nigeria might take; because surely it is more appropriate for the neighbours of Nigeria to take this action before the United Nations than it is for a country like Canada to do so.

Mr. Lewis: Why? It is either right or wrong, and if it is wrong why does the government not take action? Why does it have to wait for the African states to do so?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the minister for a moment to remind hon. members that we are still in the question period. I realize that questions have been asked regarding a very serious matter, but even though the matter is of considerable importance we should still observe the normal rules applying to the question period.

Mr. Howard: Maybe we should have an answer period.

Mr. Sharp: As I said in my earlier answer, what we are seeking is the most effective way to help the people of Nigeria and Biafra. I am sure members of the house would agree that if we can get the African states which are neighbours of Nigeria to take this matter before the United Nations, it would be the most effective possible course.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: However, I will repeat what I said earlier, that if that failed we would not hesitate to do so ourselves. Our objective is to help these people in the best possible way, not just to satisfy the humanitarian feelings which we all have. To be most effective, I think the house will agree that it would be better for the neighbours of Nigeria to take this matter to the United Nations than for us to do so. However, if they will not do so we would certainly not hesitate to act.

Mr. Woolliams: How long will you wait?

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of his concern over the African states taking the initiative in the Biafra situation, and since they have taken the initiative of calling for a cease fire, will the minister, on behalf of Canada, join them in requesting a cease fire?

Mr. Sharp: We have called for a cease fire on many occasions. We have put our views before the Nigerian government on many occasions. We are opposed to a military settlement of this dispute. This has been the Canadian position from the beginning. This view has been expressed privately and publicly by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of the Canadian people.

Mr. Lewis: I do not blame the Secretary of State for External Affairs for having missed the second question I asked. May I rephrase it, because I think it is of importance. Is the minister aware that the International Red Cross has made quite a number of flights into Biafra with supplies and that it is in urgent need of additional aircraft? In that situation, why is the government not prepared to lend the International Red Cross at least one Hercules plane for this purpose, even if the flying is done during the night?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have been having discussions with the International Red Cross about the provision of additional aircraft. There is no hesitation on our part in providing aircraft of this kind. The issue that arose earlier, and which to some extent is not now so important, was that we did not believe we should put Canadian air force aircraft, manned with Canadian military personnel as had been suggested in many parts of our country, into jeopardy by flying contrary to the wishes of the Nigerian government. If the planes were to be attacked under such circumstances the Canadian government would be involved in a very serious incident.

I suggest to the hon. members that is not a course that would commend itself to this house. No government in the world is flying supplies contrary to the wishes of the Nigerian government. What is happening now, and

I am sure it is agreeable to the house, is that we are working with the International Red Cross. We have no hesitation whatever in helping.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder if the minister could assure the house that the relief supplies now being loaded on a ship in Halifax will reach Biafra.

Mr. Sharp: I cannot give that assurance. All I can say is that the supplies will go to the starving people of Nigeria-Biafra.

[Later:]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister foresee the possibility of Canada ever using her military strength to interfere with the desires of another foreign state, if in the opinion of the Canadian government that foreign state—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is much too general in nature to be acceptable at this time.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

INQUIRY AS TO WINTER POST OFFICE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works.

Could he tell the house whether the government intends to keep on building post offices next winter, especially in designated areas?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member could easily put this question on the order paper.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

OAKVILLE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO DERAILMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. L. Whiting (Halton): I should like to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio, Hon. Mr. Richardson. Will the Department of Transport immediately set up an inquiry into the Canadian National passenger train derailment which occurred yesterday in the town of Oakville. In this tragedy one person was killed and eight were injured.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, immediately upon learning of this unfortunate accident the district inspector of the railway transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission went to the scene. He has already filed a preliminary report. The Canadian National is conducting its own investigation, but up to this moment the cause of the accident has not been determined. However, I can assure the house and the hon. member that further investigations by the Canadian Transport Commission and by the Canadian National will be undertaken.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): May I ask a supplementary question. I should like to ask which came first, the answer or the question.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—REPORTED AUTOMOBILE TRAFFIC PROBLEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Tom Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): I should like to direct my question to the acting Minister of Transport. Since there has been a major crisis in connection with automobile traffic to and from the Vancouver international airport during the last two weeks, resulting in long delays, what steps are planned by the minister's department to cure this serious problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question, as well as the previous question, should be placed on the order paper. If I may say so, the Chair may have been too lenient up to this moment in allowing questions. The normal procedure, as hon. members know, is for questions to be put in writing on the order paper. It is only in very special circumstances dealing with matters of urgent national importance that verbal questions should be allowed. I believe all members desire to observe this general rule. I suggest that the question asked by the hon. member might be placed on the order paper.

GANDER—REQUEST FOR IMPROVED FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the serious implications emanating from reports that the stretched jets and other large aircraft are bypassing Gander international airport and landing in another country because of inadequate terminal facilities, and in view of the announced $32 million expenditure on a west coast terminus, could the Prime Minister say what action is contemplated—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

MANITOBA—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION AGAINST VEGETABLE OIL IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister recently received representations from the oil seed industry of Manitoba with regard to the importation of foreign vegetable oils below our cost of production, which is having a very serious effect on this important segment of our agriculture industry?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest the hon. member should place this question on the order paper.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): The situation has reached crisis proportions. I suggest this is a serious question which should be answered.

Mr. Speaker: It is because it is important that I suggest it be placed on the order paper.

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF SPECIAL TASK FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister indicate when it is anticipated that the report of the special task force on agricultural policy will be available to the government, and whether that report will be made available to members of the house.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say when the report will be made available to the house. We have asked for an interim report for December, and the task force has indicated that it is working toward delivering that interim report in December.

FINANCE

VALIDITY OF ORDER IN COUNCIL REDUCING CUSTOMS DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and it relates to an order in council passed by the government when parliament was not in session concerning a reduction in customs duties. The order in council was based on the Financial Administration Act. In view of the fact this order in council is similar to one passed in 1962 which was found later to be such that it had to be validated by parliament, can the minister inform the house whether all aspects of this were checked by the Department of Justice before approval was given to this order in council?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I will have to take this question as notice. I wonder whether the hon. member would send me the number of the order in council?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will be glad to do so if the minister is not aware of it.

HOUSING

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO VISIT OF TASK FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I have a question for the minister responsible for housing, but in his absence I will address it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the extremely critical shortage of housing in Newfoundland, would he indicate when the minister and his task force will be visiting that province? Has the minister accepted an invitation from the inter-faith social action committee of Corner Brook to attend their conference on housing in October?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): In the absence of the Minister of Transport, who is not in the house today because he is with the task force on housing, I can only reply that I am certain the housing problems of Newfoundland will be very much the concern of the task force. I am sorry I cannot give the exact dates when the task force will be in Newfoundland.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BAIL SYSTEM AND CRIMINAL RECORDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Is it the intention of the government to include in the omnibus bill which is to contain amendments to the Criminal Code amendments concerning the bail system and the expunging of criminal records?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): At the moment I am undertaking a review of the omnibus bill with officers of the department. Representations are being received from all over the country and from members of the house. The amendments in the omnibus bill will be resubmitted, and they will include the subject matters of the original bill. I hope at an early date to be able to incorporate other Criminal Code reforms, including the matters raised by the hon. member, in a subsequent piece of legislation.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether at the appropriate time after the introduction of the bill he would be prepared to refer it to a house committee, so that a thorough examination in committee could be made?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether this question might not be asked when this bill is submitted to the house.

TRADE

PROHIBITION ON SALE OF CANADIAN TURBOT IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I supplement an answer I gave yesterday to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) with respect to Greenland halibut. The ruling of the United States food and drug administration which I talked about yesterday does not involve any prohibition on the import of Greenland halibut to the United States until November 20, the deadline for the delay that has been granted.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, September 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Eymard Corbin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, the amendment of Mr. Stanfield (p. 62) and the subamendment of Mr. Lewis (p. 81).

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to add my sincere congratulations to you on your re-election to the distinguished office you have graced in the past with so much honour and intelligence and such knowledge of the rules. My congratulations are all the more hearty because of the different circumstances under which Your Honour now occupies the Chair. I shall come back to that in a minute.

I also wish to congratulate the Deputy Speaker, the chairman of committees, and the deputy chairman of committees for having received the support of members of the house and having been elected to the positions they hold. I concur thoroughly with the remarks my leader made earlier in this debate. Without in any way disparaging the personal qualities of the incumbent of the Chair I think it is correct to say that by placing the Chair in a position of far greater independence than was the case before, we in this house have taken a considerable step forward. In this regard great credit belongs to my leader since it was largely through his initiative that this step was taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: The Chair is the pivot around which this house moves. It is the foundation on which our functions rest. When one talks of the independence of the Chair—and I make these remarks without meaning to cause embarrassment to anyone—that independence must be considered in several ways. When a member of this house occupies the Chair he takes himself out of the arena of active political consideration, as he must. Nevertheless, other aspects of his independence must be kept in mind and enshrined in the position of the Chair for the benefit not only of our present Speaker but for those who will occupy his position in the future.

I congratulate the Prime Minister, of course, for his success, as well as the members of his cabinet and their parliamentary secretaries. The people of Canada have come to a decision. We on this side of the house will have to live with the government for four years. The people of Canada will have to live with both of us for the same period of time. During that period it is absolutely essential that there be the greatest measure of co-operation among all members of the house in an attempt to carry forward the business of the country, which may or may not always be the business of the government.

We in this party will undertake to be as co-operative as possible and willing to forward in an expeditious way all business of the house, subject of course to the overriding consideration that there is a duty placed on this party in its capacity as Her Majesty's loyal opposition to protect the interests of the people of Canada. If it becomes necessary to protect those interests we shall exercise all rights we possess to the utmost.

I have been characterized as a kind, gentle and amiable person. I accept that description. No doubt the members of my party and my leader thought these characteristics were similar to those displayed by my distinguished predecessors, Hon. Michael Starr, Hon. Gordon Churchill and Hon. Howard Green, all of whom could be termed gentle and amiable unless the occasion arose when they had to fight for the rights of this house, as I shall fight and as all members of this house will fight.

I am sure the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) will agree that I have been amiable, just as I agree that he has been amiable. I suspect that the extent of his amiability is circumscribed by the extent to which he gets his own way for the government.

I congratulate the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) for his fine and skilful speech when he moved the address in reply, which indicated that he will become an ornament of this house. I am convinced that we shall hear more from this distinguished addition to the house. I also congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand). I listened intently and with great interest to his speech. I was glad to hear him say that he comes to this house not solely as a representative of his people, although God knows his people have many wrongs which need to be corrected, but also as a Canadian and as an Indian to help solve the problems of the white man.

• (12 noon)

One of my opponents in the last election was a young member of the same Indian group, a fine, distinguished young man who had been a graduate of the R.M.C., had served in the air force with distinction and made a great contribution to the election. It was unfortunate, I thought, that so early in his political life he had been seduced by the wiles of hon. gentlemen to my left, because I think he would have fitted better into the contours of the views which our party expresses. But it is very heartening and encouraging to see this come about, and I wish well to the two hon. members who moved and seconded the motion for the address. Indeed, I wish well to all the new members who have come to this house. I understand very well that having reached a peak of exultation shortly after the election they have come to Ottawa and found that there are various levels of members of parliament, at least outside this chamber.

Let them always remember that this house is the repository of all the powers of the people of Canada, that it is a court of last resort. It may well seem to many of us and to many of those outside this chamber that much of this power has been given away and now resides in the hands of government agencies and of various administrative boards and tribunals which have been set up. If this is the case it is only because we saw fit—in many cases unwisely, in my opinion—to abdicate our responsibility and invest power in agencies rather than in this parliament. If we come to a situation which involves the use of power, remember well—and I say this particularly to the new members—that it flows from an action which was taken in this chamber by a House of Commons which preceded this one. With this in mind, guide well your actions, your thoughts, your votes and your speeches from now on.

My colleagues will be dealing with many other aspects of the speech from the throne. I wish particularly to direct my attention to the question of parliamentary reform and changes in procedure as outlined in the speech from the throne and as more particularly defined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday when he addressed this chamber. Generally speaking, I have no quarrel with the philosophical position which he took yesterday. Such speeches are made very frequently. Read the pages of Hansard. Examine the history of other democratic countries. Philosophical dissertations of this nature are made and repeated from time to time; the pages of Hansard are filled with them. It is all very well to talk about creating a brave new world but what concerns me is the blueprint, the plans, the specifications, the construction in accordance with which we undertake this course. Here is where we come to the parting of the ways—not in every respect, but in some respects.

I heard the former prime minister make speeches in 1964 and 1965 which, though differently worded, embodied precisely the same attitude toward the manner in which this house should conduct its business and to the reforms required to make it competent to do so more effectively. Nothing came of this. So while I listened with respect and in agreement with the right hon. gentleman to a considerable extent when he spoke yesterday on this subject, I must file a caveat and say that I remain to be convinced. I hope I am wrong. I trust I am wrong. I should like to think that when this parliament is through the government will have shown that its acts are as good as its words. But so far I am unconvinced.

I wish to make particular reference to two comments made by the right hon. gentleman. As reported on page 73, dealing with the discussions which have been going on the Prime Minister said:

> The discussions which have been proceeding on and off for the past fortnight, or even longer, among the representatives of the several parties in the house must not be permitted to continue indefinitely.

With this I am in perfect agreement, but I think there is an implication in that statement which needs to be corrected. There have been discussions, some of them directed to questions of far-reaching reform, which can well be discussed by house leaders but which cannot be resolved other than by this house itself and which, in my opinion, are best the subject of attention by a special committee. Reforms in the rules and procedures of this house are far too important to be left to the leaders in the house. They are and always will be the property of the members of the house. I wish to be very careful, because I must not disclose anything which took place, but I am justified in saying that it was only the day before parliament opened that concrete, specific proposals by the government with relation to the interim arrangements, the whole package of interim arrangements which would come into effect at the beginning and carry on through the first part of the session, were outlined. We have had discussions pro and con. I had advanced my views, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had advanced his, and the representative of the Ralliement Creditiste had stated his position, but it was only the day before that the specific package was outlined.

I am not criticizing the government in this regard but I do say it is quite wrong for the impression to be created—I am not suggesting that the right hon. gentleman was insincere, or that he was attempting to create it—that discussions had been going on for two weeks involving specific proposals which had in any sense been agreed to prior to that date. As was my right as the representative of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, I had views in disagreement which I advanced. They were not acceptable and it was on this basis that the government finally made its proposal on Friday through the leader of the house. Let there be no doubt about that situation, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

> Nor should they be permitted to lead, either by agreement or in the absence of it, to procedural changes which will upset the delicate and essential balance between government and opposition so necessary to the proper functioning of parliament.

Later there is a suggestion that the time has come when this matter should be brought to the floor of the house. I agree with that. I think there has to be a debate, hopefully not on all of the areas which can be covered but on an interim arrangement. We in this party, as I propose to indicate later, have never departed from the position that there must be an interim arrangement to cover the procedures of this house during the first part of this session. But implied in the Prime Minister's statement I see a threat that negotiations on this occasion must mean a reasonable time to accept or reject the government's propositions and, if they are not accepted, the matter will come back to the house and the government, with its majority, will have its way.

I assume that this will be the case. I am assuming that the characteristics of the Liberal party have not changed since the very well documented publication issued by the right hon. gentleman some five years ago when he had occasion to describe the Liberal party's attitude on their current issues as one of being quite content to accept the views laid down by those at the top. His words were very specific and very definite. No matter what the issue may be I am assuming that when the government determines to have its way it will have it. In my view this is not the way in which negotiations should be conducted. I am hopeful that, as has been indicated, meetings will continue for the purpose of arriving at an interim arrangement to cover the first part of this session, and that we can then hopefully go on to more drastic and more permanent changes. This has been our view. It has been my view. It has been the view of my leader as expressed in the election campaign and it is still our view. It was our view at the opening of this session.

The rules of parliament are important not only because they affect this house but because they are part of the constitution of this land. In its broadest sense the constitution is an aggregate of the statutes, the conventions, the practices, precedents and rules under which parliament is conducted. In my view, as I have expressed it earlier, this is far too important a matter to be left to be discussed and decided at the esoteric level of a few people with a mechanical knowledge of the rules.

I think there should be a greater measure of publicity given to this subject. If a committee is established later I would like to think that the proceedings of that committee would be published. This is the practice in the United Kingdom. Let there be a general debate. Let there be a debate to some extent in the country, in the press and certainly in this house so that when we come to change our rules, when we come to modify and adapt our rules in such a way as to permit members of the house to carry forward the business of the country, the changes will be based on the fullest understanding and on the support which will come as the result of an open discussion.

Many of the problems which have been created are problems which arose because past parliaments were dilatory, but I say quite objectively, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think the government can escape most of the blame for the fact that today there is piled up a large amount or, as the Prime Minister said, a backlog of parliamentary work. In 1965 parliament, with at least half of its allotted span to go, was summarily dismissed after two and a half years by the then prime minister and an election called in order to help him obtain a parliamentary majority. Because of that election and the consequences which flowed from it there was a great build-up of estimates and legislative proposals. These matters still remained to be attended to. Precisely the same situation existed in April of this year.

The Prime Minister occupies a dual position. He is the head of a political party, and he is the Prime Minister and head of the government. At that time in April he had to make a choice. He had to choose whether or not as Prime Minister he should come back to the house, meet parliament, and attempt to put through with expedition and promptness many of the serious and important bills awaiting attention which had been on the order paper for some time, and as well deal with the estimates. He also had to come to a decision, as the leader of a political party, whether the opportunity was propitious for him to go to the country and secure a greater measure of support for his party. The decision he made was a political decision and, as such, for political purposes obviously a wise one. But I suggest it was not a wise decision so far as this parliament and the country were concerned, and today we see the aftermath, we see the results.

Some question has been raised as to what has happened to this parliament, what has happened to this house, and why we have not been able to proceed with changes in the rules. I go back to the period with which I am intimately familiar starting in 1964. The record is a sorry, dismal one. Part of the blame may fall upon the house but I submit the greater part must fall on the government.

In 1963 a committee was established. That committee simply met two or three times and said, "There is a problem; we will meet it by setting up a committee next year." In 1964 another committee was set up, a very good committee on which I had the honour to serve with you, Mr. Speaker. It made some very solid, very reasonable, very forward-looking, fundamental proposals. Those proposals followed many months of discussion, many months of research, many months of meetings, but the sad fate of many of those proposed far-reaching reforms was that they were washed out. The government rejected them.

Then just before the end of that session the government brought in its own measures, which in many instances were inadequate but which to a great extent provided the foundation of the provisional rules under which we operated during the last two years. However, a promise was made that another committee would be set up the following year. Such a committee was set up which met twice and dissolved.

A further committee was set up during the last session of the previous parliament. But it was set up late. It was only established following continuous pressure from this side of the house. But even in the limited time available to it—I think I am justified in saying this—it made some first rate, very substantial proposals not only with regard to far-reaching reforms of a fundamental nature but also with regard to immediate reforms that could be implemented. Several of its proposals were brought in many weeks before the house was finally dissolved but with the holding of the election they went down the drain. Now we find ourselves in our present position.

Because I anticipated this situation, as did other hon. members on this side of the house, during the course of the election campaign I issued a statement on behalf of our party in which I indicated what our approach would be, an approach to which we still hold. I suggested that because of the summary dissolution the proposals then before the house for parliamentary reform had been neatly scuttled and that the harsh atmosphere of an election which spills over into the immediate post-election session of parliament could easily cause delay in getting back to where we were on April 23. I pointed out that many of the rules under which the House of Commons had been operating in the last few years had been provisional, that some did represent an improvement and others had been found by experience to be unsatisfactory. That is still our position today.

The majority of the provisional rules have the approval of members of this party. Others are useless, have been found to be unsatisfactory or have not achieved the purposes for which they were intended. I also point out that we were prepared to consider committees constituted for the duration of a parliament. In this way there would be continuity and the opportunity for members to become conversant with particular subjects. They must also know that the representations and recommendations they made would in fact be presented to the house and would not be held up merely because they were embarrassing to the government. Committees should be reduced in number and the membership lowered. There should be a committee on delegated authority.

I do not have too much time but I must stop here for a moment to emphasize this tremendously important issue. Most of the regulations and most of the authorities which affect the ordinary person in Canada, together with the pressure of large government corporations or crown companies, have come about as a result of authority which this parliament has delegated to others to exercise on its behalf. We live in one of the very few democratic countries that have taken no steps to provide an opportunity for the ordinary man and woman, through the medium of a committee such as I have proposed, to ventilate and bring fourth his argument in respect of any grievance he may have which has arisen not because of an act of parliament but because of something done under authority given to others to act under an act of parliament. This has a grave effect on our democratic society. I will not willingly, so far as I personally am concerned, pass over the opportunity for parliamentary reform without something being done about this.

Four years ago I spoke in this house to Right Hon. Lester Pearson, then prime minister. He agreed with me and quoted to me the terms of Lord Hewart's book, "The New Despotism." He said that the government was looking into this problem and would establish some procedure such as a parliamentary ombudsman. He said that they would deal with it in this way. That was four years ago. Nothing has yet been done. I suggest that this opportunity should not be allowed to pass without securing from the government an undertaking to set up a committee. It may well be that the government has other ideas as well, but surely a committee could be set up for a limited period which would have authority not to look into the policy behind the exercise of delegated authority but to look into cases of abuse under delegated authority where it has been used far beyond the extent that was contemplated. This is something which must be rectified at this time.

I see that the time is rapidly passing. I intend to conclude in a few minutes. It may well be that the house will see fit, before Your Honour intervenes, to provide a limited time, which I shall not abuse, for me to conclude the remarks I am making.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: I also feel that on an interim basis there must be given to members of the house generally as members, not to the government alone, the right to move that measures be sent to committee before second reading without killing the bill. A feeling is held in many parts of Canada that governments do nothing but govern and that members of parliament are here only to say yes or no to government measures. I disagree with this very violently.

Surely no other body of men and women is better qualified to act as a pipe line or liaison between the people of Canada and the government. Surely the people should have the opportunity, through the medium of committees, to bring their views before this house and the government with regard to spending proposals being advanced by the government. Governments must initiate and when the time comes take the final responsibility. I do not for one moment differ with that point of view, but as a result of my experience here, not only as a member of this house but outside, I say that there is a great opportunity for the legislative proposals which are advanced to be moulded, modified and adapted to meet the human needs of the people of Canada and not necessarily the views of those who live in ivory towers in Ottawa. I have seen this happen.

One might look over the list of statutes which have been passed in the last four years. Much more than 50 per cent of these are amending statutes. I admit that it is not possible for a government, even a Conservative government, to anticipate fully all the contingencies and vicissitudes in the conduct of affairs of mankind, but I suggest that many statutes have been ill conceived, badly prepared and badly completed in that they have not been properly, adequately and intimately discussed in this house before leaving here in the finished form. Consequently they are brought back for amendment year after year after year.

I speak, I hope, not only for the members of this party but for all private members when I say that we must be far more intimately concerned with the legislative process and that the government must be prepared to accept this up to a point. I repeat what I said before, that the time must come when a government will say that it cannot accept a proposal because of the financial considerations involved. I am satisfied, however, as much as I have ever been about anything, that there is room and opportunity for the private members of this house to be able to make a much greater contribution to the affairs of government and the legislative spending proposals which affect so deeply and intimately the lives and fortunes of 20 million Canadians.

I conclude by saying that I hope, as I have every reason to, that we will continue our discussions in order to arrive at an interim arrangement. This party has always indicated its willingness to make concessions and has made them. I hope the government will take the same position. I hope and expect that we will include many of the provisional rules, as we have already indicated. Many of the former provisional rules will have to be carried forward. I hope some of the suggestions I have made will be considered by the government as part of the interim arrangement.

I hope also that a select committee will in fact be set up and that it will be directed by mandatory provision to report back to this house by a given date so that the interim arrangement will disappear. The interim arrangement should be for a specific period. There will then be pressure on the government, the opposition and all hon. members to come forward with permanent changes at least by that time. Time is not on our side. I should like to conclude by quoting what I think is a very important comment by a very distinguished British philosopher who also served his apprenticeship in parliament, in the House of Lords. I refer to Lord C. P. Snow who said:

> I can't help thinking of the Venetian republic in their last half century. Like us, they had once been fabulously lucky. They had become rich, as we did, by accident. They had acquired immense political skill, just as we have. A good many of them were tough-minded, realistic, patriotic men. They knew, just as clearly as we know, that the current of history had begun to flow against them. Many of them gave their minds to working out ways to keep going. It would have meant breaking the pattern into which they had crystallized. They were fond of the pattern, just as we are fond of ours. They never found the will to break it.

Mr. Speaker we in this house must find a way to break the pattern into which we have fallen.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be words of congratulation to our colleague the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lamoureux) for having, perhaps as much by his own personal qualities as by the mood of the house generally, made it possible for us to move toward a position where we in this Canadian House of Commons will have a Speaker in the chair with that degree of independence which has been enjoyed in the mother of parliaments for many years. I am sure we all share the feeling that this is desirable from the standpoint of our parliament. I should like to congratulate the hon. member on his own personal achievement and on his representation which has permitted movement forward on this particular question.

May I also take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) and the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) on their appointment to positions of responsibility. The suggestion has been made—perhaps it is no more than that—that in some way their appointments to these positions have been something less than this house might wish. I disagree with that suggestion. I have entire confidence in the fairness and open-mindedness of these two hon. gentlemen. I am personally satisfied that they will discharge their responsibilities in these honourable positions in a manner just as exemplary as that of the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas when he occupied those positions.

Let me also express my congratulations to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) for their excellent speeches in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Perhaps I should pay a particular compliment to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria. Over the years in this house we have seen many examples of the perfect bilingualism toward which all Canadians should aspire but which so few attain. We witnessed during the speech by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria a perfect example of that ideal. His speech was one of the great oratorical performances I have witnessed in this house.

At this time I rise to continue the thread of debate introduced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in relation to parliamentary reform. I intend to refer in greater detail to those discussions in which he took part along with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the house leader for the Ralliement Créditiste. As a result of proposals I put before hon. gentlemen in August on behalf of the government we have had a series of discussions in recent weeks.

One of the first things that was said to me when I came to this house was that the hon. member for Peace River was indeed an able lawyer. He has been an ornament to that profession in Alberta, a bencher of the law society and has demonstrated a very considerable forensic skill. It has been said that the real measure of a good lawyer is not that he make the best of a very good case, but rather his ability to make the best of a very bad case. I think there is a general feeling in the house today that the hon. member was at his very best this morning during the argument he put forward to convince us that he and his colleagues were the hares rather than the tortoises of parliamentary reform.

I did not wish to commence a debate on the question of the discussions that have taken place among us in recent days, but it does seem to me only fair, since the hon. member made reference to the position I put forward on behalf of the government, that the house should have the opportunity of hearing this position from the government's point of view. Hon. members may then compare it with the viewpoint partially put forward by the hon. member this morning.

As I have said already, on behalf of the government I elaborated certain proposals for the revision of the standing orders of the house. It was intended that these proposals should be adopted during this session of parliament in order that we might attain a better dispatch of public business and a better examination of the public business which, after all, is the purpose for which the electors of Canada sent us here. These proposals were in very large measure founded upon the recommendations of the special committee on procedure in the last session. The hon. member for Peace River as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre participated in the work of that committee.

As a result a complete blueprint, although perhaps not an entirely comprehensive one, for the reform of procedures was devised. These proposals were put forward in August and, as the hon. member has indicated, there were a number of discussions during which he and other house leaders talked with me as to the general schema of the proposed rules reform.

The hon. member suggested that only the day before the house met did we give any indication as to how we thought the business of this particular session and more particularly the first half between now and Christmas should be handled. I think that he, upon reflection, will agree that this suggestion is scarcely fair. During the early stages of these discussions we discussed the problem that would occur if we wanted to deal with the 1968-69 estimates under the provisional rules. If we had proceeded under the provisional rules there would be very little time left to deal with the legislative programs which I am sure hon. members would like to see brought before the house.

Perhaps it might be useful at this time to indicate in arithmetical terms what exactly is involved in this question of dealing with the estimates even under the relatively advanced provisions of the provisional rules. There is a period of approximately 70 days between the commencement of this session and some judicious date in December shortly before Christmas when the house might adjourn. Assuming all the time available is used, approximately ten days will be devoted to the present order of business, that is to say, the proceedings leading up to and including the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said this morning, the government intends to introduce a general budget. Under the rules a further six-day period could be taken to debate that budget. If the provisional rules had been accepted the house would also have had the maximum of 38 days to deal with the estimates for the 1968-69 fiscal year. The experience of the house is that the maximum becomes also the minimum. This would have meant that out of approximately 70 days between the opening of parliament and the Christmas recess approximately 54 days would have been used for these debates without any reference to legislative programs.

It seems clear to me, and it should be clear to all hon. members, that some interim arrangement is desirable in respect of the 1968-69 estimates and, indeed, that it is desirable to adopt some interim arrangement in respect of those rules which have been adopted in the last three or four years on a provisional basis for dealing with the other business of the house. The proposal which the government put forward really dealt with four essential elements in respect of this question. If the hon. member wants to tax me for not having finally set this down in writing until the day before the house met, he can do so, but I do not think he can justly tax me for not having made the government's views known in the discussions which took place.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is suggesting that I am charging him with not setting them down before, that is quite incorrect and I did not intend to convey that impression. I intended to convey that the government advanced a number of proposals, we advanced some counter-proposals, and it was only the day before the house met that the government's position was made clear as to where it stood on the entire package.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention of the hon. member. I think it will be clear that, far from there being a unilateral diktat on the part of the government that rules, either on an interim or long term basis, should be applied, there were genuine consultations, discussions and exchanges back and forth with hon. members. We arrived at the situation earlier this week where it was found not possible to restore the rules on a provisional basis.

I have made reference to the provisional rules and to the fact that the government proposed that for the period of this session the provisional rules might be restored so that discussions on this question could proceed from a terra cognita, the basis upon which we were proceeding prior to April 23, so we could take advantage of the experience of the last four years. The hon. member referred to the fact that it is his party's wish that a time limit be provided with respect to the provisional rules. I make it clear in public, as I have made it clear to him in private, that the government is agreeable to this, namely, that if the provisional rules were to be reapplied they would be subject to a specific time limit with the result that there would be a clock ticking on all of us to make sure we got down to business and dealt with the provisional rules. This is the proposal, basically, with regard to the provisional rules, since we would hope to arrive at a final conclusion soon.

The hon. member also mentioned that his party would like to arrive at an early agreement this session on reform of the rules. It would seem sounder to continue with the provisional rules for a period of several months, rules which are known, rather than try to arrive at elaborate recommendations on a provisional basis. Other hon. members have suggested there are provisional rules which they do not like. The net effect is that there would have been an initial discussion, perhaps a lengthy one, on rules which would be in effect for only a very short period of time. It seems to me still, representing the government, a most reasonable course of action that we should continue on the basis of those rules under which we would have been operating still if, to the regret of hon. members opposite, the house had not dissolved last April. I have indicated that I would be entirely agreeable to putting a time limit on those rules, and I hope on that basis we might find that it is acceptable to them.

There are other matters to which I shall refer in this respect. There is the question of dealing on an interim basis with the business of the house, that is, with the estimates for the 1968-69 fiscal year. Under the provisional rules the time available this autumn for dealing with these estimates would have been a maximum of 38 days. There was a proposal—and I think it is fair to say it was not a proposal which I originated—that we might make an immediate reference of all those estimates to the standing committees of the house.

I will say more later about the framework of standing committees of the house. This suggestion was made so that the departmental spending estimates could be examined in detail in those committees and that the total time to be taken both for motions for supply and for dealing with the reports back from committees might be agreed at a maximum of 19 days. I gather that proposal is not acceptable but, given the arithmetic to which I referred earlier, I suggest this might be the most reasonable way of dealing with the time we have available between now and Christmas. I say "we" and I point out that not we as a government, not we as members of the House of Commons, but the people of Canada would expect not only expenditures to be examined but legislation to be proceeded with.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the minister a question? I do not wish to interrupt the even trend of his thoughts, but has the minister given any thought to the very desirable situation which would have arisen had the government been persuaded to have the house meet earlier, when these discussions could have been initiated at an earlier stage and we would have had more time to consider them?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): One of the difficulties I had, of course, in initiating early discussions on this question was the relatively late appointment of the hon. gentleman as the opposition house leader.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I can understand the problem because the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was, after all, hoping that the former member for Ontario might be returned to this house.

Mr. Lambert: That is nonsense.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): May I suggest that this discussion has not suffered at all from the timetable. I think the hon. member would agree that there has been plenty of opportunity to discuss these proposals. Had they been proposed in July or August, the fact is that there are certain attitudes, perhaps not representative of the hon. member, but representative of members around and behind him, with respect to parliamentary reform with regard to which there may be genuine disagreement.

The third of the proposals put forward was with respect to the committees system itself. As hon. members know, we have at the present time reverted to an antique committees system under the 1962 rules, one which speaks to us from the 19th century. Even the proposals incorporated in the provisional rules have in some respects been found not to be acceptable. It had been the government's intention, and it still is, to find an area which would receive general support. The introduction of changes in the committees system was to reflect clearly the division of responsibility among departments.

The fourth of the propositions we put forward to the house leaders was with respect to the constitution of a special committee on procedure to consider the government's proposals in areas which we felt were the key areas on this question, which committee was to report back to the House of Commons by December 1 recommending not merely certain general outlines with regard to the rules, as the special committee did last session, but also specific changes to the standing orders. That seemed to the government to be a reasonable way to proceed.

We are, as I have said, entirely willing to accept the suggestion made by hon. gentlemen opposite that we should put a specific time limit on this arrangement. That is completely in accordance with the government's wish to proceed with this question with the greatest dispatch possible. But I suggest to the hon. gentleman and his colleagues that a far more rational way of handling the business between now and Christmas would be in accordance with the proposals we have put forward both to deal with supply and to act under the proposals in the provisional rules.

There was a reference in the remarks of the hon. gentleman to the importance of a committee on delegated legislation. He and I have discussed this question. I share his concern about the over-all question of more effective control of our executive and administrative processes. This concern is shared by myself and the Prime Minister and was the reason for a reference in the Prime Minister's speech to the specific responsibility of considering and recommending to the government certain procedures which might be followed with regard to the effective review, both legislative and legal, of administrative action.

There are a great many possibilities here, such as the British institution of a committee on delegated legislation, setting up an ombudsman system, and the French institution of conseil d'état. I am not suggesting that any one of them should be adopted without consideration and applied in the Canadian format, but I am suggesting the time has come—and here the hon. member and I are entirely in agreement—to provide a better and more effective scrutiny of administrative action, perhaps through a committee on delegated legislation which would look at the whole picture gallery of administrative action or in particular cases to consider the individual picture through the institution of an ombudsman.

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the minister a question? Is the government not one of the principal parties in dealing with this particular problem, and is this not an illustration of a litigant in litigation setting out the rules of the game? Would not the minister honestly feel that a committee on delegated legislation would, among other things, be examining a better and more detailed way to come to grips with the problem? Does he not think that members of parliament as one of the parties involved should be able to make some proposals of their own?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would agree that this is perhaps a more definite indication of the hon. member's notion of the committee on delegated legislation, and it is a useful suggestion, but I took his term to refer to something similar to the British committee which, as the hon. member knows, does not have the responsibility of suggesting further instruments for administrative review.

The government's general principles with respect to the revision of the rules represent an attempt to deal with a problem which is not unique to this legislature but has been dealt with by all parliamentary legislatures in the commonwealth. Indeed, solutions have been found to the problem both in the United Kingdom and in sister commonwealth countries long before arriving at one here. It is the problem that in this particular institution, which was founded so closely on the evolution of British party politics in the 18th century, we have a set of procedures which never contemplated both the expansion and the ubiquity of the government in society and the increasing complexity of its problems. I am sure that the hon. gentlemen back in the 18th century would have been amazed to see the intervention of the government in many aspects of human endeavour which were entirely foreign to them then. They would have been equally amazed, to illustrate the second point, at the complexity of questions such as those which parliament will be asked to consider, for example, that of a synchronous communication satellite.

What is involved here is the responsibility of putting through a very large volume of legislation and of doing it in such a way that it can receive the full scrutiny of the elected representatives of the people. It seems clear to the government that the only way to meet these two objectives is by an expanded use of the system of functional standing committees. It would be the government's view—and I have already indicated it in the interim arrangements which we proposed—that the spending estimates of the various departments should be referred, either automatically or, if desired, after debate, to the functional standing committees. In these committees individual members would have the opportunity to confront the minister and leading functionaries of the department and inquire not only into the detailed items of the estimates but also into the broader area of local and private but none-the-less important questions which arise in connection with constituency problems.

It is also proposed—and this was the pattern set forward in the report of the special committee on procedure tabled in March of this year—that in view of the fact that there would not be consideration of estimates in committee of the whole, the number of days to be devoted in the house to purely opposition matters would be stipulated and, as proposed by the special committee on procedure of which the hon. member was a member, that these questions would be dealt with systematically throughout the parliamentary year. In the same way, it is the government's view that just as the detailed examination of the spending estimates requires time and effort on the part of individual members, so the detailed examination of legislation which commonly occurs under our procedure in committee of the whole stage should be dealt with in the functional standing committees of the house so that these committees, which we would hope would build up a certain expertise on these matters over a period of time, could, together with the officials responsible and the minister, propose and deal with amendments and at the same time find opportunities to seek outside opinions by way of evidence from other persons interested in the legislation.

One of the examples cited to me of some success in this role was the manner in which the house dealt in the last session with one of the most complicated and far-reaching provisions in our law, the National Transportation Act. It would be hoped that over a period of time the rule could be established that this should become the general procedure, that is, that the committee of the whole stage would take place in the functional standing committees.

However, it is appreciated that the house as a whole must have the opportunity to consider the questions raised in the standing committee and to cast a final decision on whether or not the recommendations should become the law. Therefore it is proposed that we should not go through the committee of the whole stage once again in the house but that there be a full parliamentary debate on the report of the standing committee, either at the report stage or perhaps on third reading. It is hoped that in time it will be established that this would be the time when the house would really commit itself on whether or not the bill should go forward. It has struck me as an anomaly, which I believe has come about as a result of precedents, that the house should make what is virtually a final declaration with regard to the principle of a piece of legislation at the second reading stage. It seems to me far more logical that this fulcrum point should occur later.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River and I have had an opportunity to have a full miniature debate on this question, and I wonder whether I might be permitted a few more minutes when we resume to complete my remarks, bearing in mind our discussion. If so, may I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to standing order 6(2) I do now leave the chair until 2.30 p.m.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, when we rose at one o'clock I had given some indication of the government's intentions with respect to reform of the rules and procedures of parliament. I will give a brief precis of what I had been saying up until that time. I indicated it would be our proposal that those aspects of parliamentary business which require the greatest, detailed scrutiny, and therefore are most time-consuming, would be transferred to the functional standing committees of this house under which we have operated for some years, and perhaps as they may be amended during the current session. In particular we would refer the detailed studies of the estimates and the clause by clause consideration of most legislation to the standing committees so that they could be considered fully in the committees.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would that be before or after second reading?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In the case of the ordinary legislative process it would take the place of the committee of the whole, that of course would be after second reading.

In so far as the estimates are concerned the intention would be, after having tabled the estimates, to refer the estimates immediately to the functional standing committees. In making these remarks I should also like to make it clear, as the member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) indicated this morning by his question whether the system would be continued whereby broader questions of public policy could still be considered in committee. I am sure the hon. member had in mind the successful consideration by the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons of the question of divorce and other difficult public questions which have been the subject of consideration from time to time. I only affirm it would be the government's intention to have such matters studied. Indeed, it would be the government's hope that, for example, the government's forthcoming white paper on antidumping legislation would be considered by the finance committee.

One other change we would propose would be to streamline the procedures in ways and means. A famous English student of the parliamentary process referred to this as being a prime example of parliamentary mumbo-jumboism or a prime example of what, in some circles, is considered the importance of being ancient.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question before he continues? Suppose a particular matter which is controversial is submitted to a committee. When this committee makes a recommendation, will the government accept the recommendation made? I ask that question in view of the fact that, as I recall, in March or April of 1968 the committee considering the abortion amendment said there was not sufficient evidence to support the claims of the proponents of that legislation. Would the government accept the recommendation of the committee in this regard, and would they start with the recommendation concerning abortion made at the last session?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It seems to me that if a government did refer a subject to a committee and then accepted their recommendation without any further judgment on the part of the government, that government would be really giving up the governing role. The government would have to accept the political consequences of having failed to take the committee's recommendation.

Further questions should be considered by the special committee on procedure, and we think it would be desirable to make arrangements covering the question period, statements on motions and certain emergency procedures. I made some reference this morning to interim arrangements which the hon. member for Peace River, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) have been discussing with me. Perhaps I could refer again to a proposal which I believe is acceptable in some quarters of the house, and which may be acceptable to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) now that he is here. I refer to the suggestion that the provisional rules which were in existence immediately prior to dissolution on April 23 should be readopted for a limited period of time, at least until the commencement of the session in January, 1969.

At that time such new rules as may have been developed in the committee on procedure could then become applicable. After a debate to be held in the house, the special committee on procedure should be set up with responsibility for reporting back to the house detailed recommendations for changes in the standing orders not later than December 1, 1968. The 1968-69 estimates should also be immediately referred to the standing committees. There should be a stipulated time in committee of supply in the house, both for supply motions and for reporting back from committees, and that period should be limited to a total of 19 days. I repeat that this suggestion did not originate with me as government house leader.

Finally, shortly after this debate has been completed we should make permanent changes in the committee structure of the house so that those committees may more completely resemble the structure of government organization as it now exists. I hope it may be possible after hon. members have been able to consider that proposal, and assuming that my hon. friends in the New Democratic party and the Ralliement Créditiste also find it acceptable, that we might find that this particular recommendation could be adopted and we could get on with those changes in parliamentary procedures which we all desire.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister permit a question? I wonder whether he would also include in his suggestions about what might be done the possibility that any revision of the committee structure might be agreed upon before we refer the estimates to those committees, so that we will not be faced with the necessity of making changes after the committees have started their work?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I apologize for not having made that clear. It would be my intention that the committee structure would be altered and the reference of the estimates would be made afterwards.

I thank the house for its kindness in permitting me an extension of time. Perhaps in conclusion I might refer to a statement by a distinguished British student of political science, the government house leader in the United Kingdom House of Commons. He made this statement in that chamber in December, 1966, on a relatively identical occasion, that is, the introduction of new rules in the house. At that time Mr. Crossman said:

I believe that there are three questions by which the working of the House of Commons can be tested, both today and for future change: First, is the legislative process designed to enable policies to be translated into law at the speed required by the tempo of modern industrial change? Secondly, can our timetable, so long as the finance bill dominates our procedures, leave room for debating the great issues and especially for the topical debates on matters of current controversy which provide the main political education of a democracy? Thirdly, while accepting that legislation and administration must be firmly in the hands of the government, does the House of Commons provide a continuous and detailed check on the work of the executive and an effective defence of the individual against bureaucratic injustice and incompetence? It is by these three tests, I suggest, that we should try out both our existing procedures and the proposals for modifying them put forward by the various schools of parliamentary reform.

I suggest that these three tests may be applied to our present procedures and they will be found wanting. I am suggesting it would be useful to apply the same criteria to the new proposals, and I hope the house will have an early opportunity to do so in connection with the new procedures.

Mr. Jack H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, without hesitation may I congratulate you on your elevation to the position you now hold. I am sure that in the future as in the past you will grace your office with that wit and wisdom to which we have become accustomed. May I also congratulate the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) on being appointed Deputy Speaker. I am sure that the Deputy Speaker will spend many hours learning to perform the duties of his office with wisdom.

I congratulate the mover of the address in reply to the throne speech, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin). We all hope to hear more from him in this house on controversial matters. We hope that at all times he will give us frank appraisals of problems, and by "frank appraisals" I mean not only of what is good for his party but what is good for the country. I congratulate especially the seconder of the motion, the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand). If I may put it this way, his coming to this house is a first. His responsibilities and obligations are great, and I hope he will take part in many of the debates in this house.

Before launching into my chosen subject I wish to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). He made the right choice when he jumped the fence. Apparently he landed where he wanted to. I know that his knowledge of agriculture will stand him in good stead. We on this side of the house hope to assist him from time to time in trying to find solutions to the challenges facing agriculture.

I am particularly glad that the house has at last been reconvened. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) may complain that he has only 72 days in which to get the business done but we in western Canada would have been happy if the house had met at least one month earlier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner: If the house had met earlier perhaps the terminal workers' strike at the Lakehead would have been settled one month earlier and the wheat situation in western Canada improved correspondingly. The striking workers had to meet one deadline only. They had to settle their strike before parliament was reconvened. The strike was settled at great cost. I was surprised to hear the Minister of Agriculture openly blame the elevator companies. Whether or not he likes to admit it, most of the elevator companies belong to the farmers and it is those farmers who will have to pay the additional costs incurred in settling the strike. Those costs may well be borne by some farmers who can afford them but statistics show that most farmers cannot afford them.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) was proud of his intervention in settling the strike. He suggested that the elevator companies had not made a serious proposal and that the onus was on them to settle the strike. It is interesting to note that the terminal workers asked for an increase of $1.06 and received $1.05 over a three year period instead of two years. The elevator companies cannot be blamed. The evidence shows that they went more than half way to meet the demands of the terminal workers.

The cry in our society is for efficiency. As recorded on page 8 of Hansard the speech from the throne says that the government "intends to investigate immediately a number of methods for promoting greater efficiency in the production and marketing of grains." The speech then mentions a number of agricultural acts which are to be amended. When one looks at the legislation on the order paper one cannot help but come to the conclusion that intended legislation will bring about an increase in interest rates. One wonders, is the main reason for including such legislation on the order paper the increase in interest rates as they apply to agriculture? Increased interest rates may force small farmers off the land that much more quickly. That may be one way to promote agricultural efficiency. If the government has that in mind it is a surprising attitude for any responsible government to take.

The onus is on the government to create a just society for all our citizens and to provide equal opportunities for all segments of society including farmers, be they big or small, well off or otherwise. The farmer will have to fight for survival even in the just society of which the Prime Minister talks in such glowing terms. Look at the plight of the western farmer and see whether that is not so.

In the present debate the Prime Minister said that the international wheat agreement has not solved the problems that it was thought it would solve. He took a different position during the election campaign when he said, "The United States has now signed the international wheat agreement and this will prevent any falling away of prices." In the throne speech debate he said, "There is a danger that the international wheat agreement will not do what we thought it would."

Wheat negotiators are meeting in Canberra, Australia, to try to thrash out difficulties in grading. Western Canada is in a state of flux. The farmers are having difficulty harvesting their crop. In some wet areas grain has sprouted from two to three inches. We shall have a poor and difficult harvest, and on top of that we are faced with a government that is indecisive and hesitates to act. Because of this a great deal of pessimism exists in western Canada with regard to agriculture.

Legislation outlined in the throne speech, as I see it, represents an effort to increase agricultural interest rates. About 80 per cent of the money which was lent through the Fram Credit Corporation went out at 5 per cent. The objective of the new legislation seems to be to raise that rate.

Mr. Woolliams: That is what they call flexibility.

Mr. Horner: For example, look at the legislation on the order paper to do with the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The government allowed the provisions which permitted loans to be made at 5 per cent to lapse. The result has been that farm machinery sales this summer in the province of Saskatchewan have been down about 30 per cent. Let us look at how farmers borrowed money in 1967. Between July 1 and September 30, 1967, 21,000 farm loans were made to farmers for a total of $55 million. During the same period this year the necessary legislation was not in effect. Is the government really concerned about farmers?

It is interesting to note that the report of the Economic Council of Canada says that our agricultural efficiency or productivity is 20 years behind that of the United States. Why should we be 20 years behind the United States? One of the reasons for this difference is the greater use of capital in the United States. What has the present government done during the last three months? It has held back $55 million, practically speaking, under the farm inprovement loans legislation. How can we in Canada catch up when we are handicapped by this kind of negative response from a government which is supposed to be interested in helping the people? We must do better than this, Mr. Speaker, if we are to catch up.

Lest there be any mistake about what is contained in the report of the Economic Council of Canada on agriculture regarding the efficiency of Canadian farmers, let me point out that the report states on page 98:

> Canadian agriculture has achieved a rate of growth of labour productivity well above that recorded in any other sectors of the economy.

In other words, farmers have not shown inefficiency; their efficiency has improved more rapidly than in any other segment of the economy. So why does the Prime Minister say that the inefficient farmer has to go, that there is no room for him in the just society which is envisaged? There is no such thing as an inefficient farmer, practically speaking. Here are the facts as they appear in the d.b.s. figures: agricultural efficiency measured in terms of manpower output is rated at 276; in general manufacturing it is 176 and in the non-agricultural commercial sector, 152. These figures give us some idea of efficiency in the agricultural industry compared with other sectors. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics it has led the way. Nevertheless, the Prime Minister says in the speech from the throne that new means must be found to ensure greater efficiency in agriculture and that farmers who do not respond must go. It is the duty of the government to create a climate enabling all people to reach a standard of living comparable with that enjoyed by the rest of Canada. This is not the case when it comes to agriculture today. Here is what the economic council had to say as recorded on page 82:

> However, average farm incomes have remained significantly lower than average non-farm incomes.

So while our efficiency has increased to an extent far greater than that of any other segment of the economy, farm income has not increased comparably.

Like it or not, the government is the prime marketer of our western wheat and the prime negotiator of tariffs and trade which affect the sale of our commodities. The government has failed to hold farm income at a level in any way comparable with the level which is desirable. The onus is on the government to make room for the farmer in the just society. The present society is practically crowding the farmer out of business.

Lest there should be concern about the situation in which the consumer might find himself, let us see what the d.b.s. has to say in this regard. A year ago an attempt was made in some of the consumer representations to place the blame for high prices at the door of the farmer. In 1949 a family spent 24 per cent of its income on food. In 1965 the average family spent 20.3 per cent of its income on food.

Meat is always the goat, it seems to me, in the question of food costs. Let us see what part of the food dollar is spent on meat. According to these statistics, in 1949 22.4 per cent of the food dollar was spent on meat. In 1965, 21.7 per cent was spent on meat. So we farmers are proving that we are able to produce commodities in exchange for which the consumer has to work fewer hours every year. Our efficiency is not surpassed by any other sector of the Canadian economy.

It is true the council suggests we are behind the United States. This is an interesting point. Why are we behind? We are behind the United States because, basically, we have failed to take advantage of three things. We have failed to make improved and greater use of capital, we have failed to make improved and greater use of advances in livestock technology and we have failed to make improved and greater use of technological advances affecting field crops in recent years.

What have we done to improve the livestock industry? We have turned Canada into a stopping-off place for Charolais cattle. Whatever may be said about this breed I believe it has a part to play in the improvement of our livestock industry. But by making Canada merely a stopping place we have enabled it to contribute to the efficiency of the industry in the United States.

It is true a ruling has recently been made under which these cattle are supposed to remain in Canada for at least three years, but this rule is not being enforced to any extent. Favourable responses to applications—2,200 last year and 1,700 the year before—were given and permits doled out to the very people who send these cattle to the United States. The whole question of the importation of Charolais cattle and the way in which permits are dealt with should be looked into closely. I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that in order to clean his slate of the old brush marks made by previous ministers he should set up the agricultural committee immediately and refer the question of Charolais cattle permits to that committee for study with a view to setting up a new system which would aid the Canadian livestock industry by allowing those cattle to make the greatest possible contribution to that industry and enabling us to take advantage of new advances in technology.

What does the economic council say with regard to this point? At page 86 we find the following:

> Inputs related to livestock deals measure purchases of livestock, breeding stock on farm, and feed. Evidently, U.S. farmers have increased inputs in this area much more rapidly than Canadian farmers and to the extent that these purchases have improved the quality of feed and livestock, Canadian farmers have not kept pace with U.S. farmers.

This is one of the reasons for our failure to keep pace. Clearly, the best possible provision is not being made for the contribution which Charolais cattle could make to the improvement of our livestock industry.

What else could we do? We could perhaps make better use of discoveries in the field of hormones. In several parts of the United States experiments are being made in the use of hormones. Some ranchers are averaging 130 to 140 calves out of 100 cows instead of 70 or 90, following a greater use of hormones. Artificial insemination must be developed more in the years ahead so that by the choice of semen a rancher can raise nothing but steers instead of heifers. This would bring about efficiency in output.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Canada has also fallen behind in the development of new strains of field crops simply because the federal government has not played its part in the development of new cereal grains. Some 50 years ago Canadians developed a number of new wheat strains which contributed a great deal to the efficiency of the western farmer. The Chinook strain and a few others were developed in recent years but this work has fallen behind the accomplishments of other countries. I mention triticale as one new development in wheat achieved by crossing rye with wheat. The University of Manitoba has contributed much to the success of this new grain. Some new strains have not been too successful but other strains should be tried and we should endeavour to close the development gap that exists between this country and the United States in grain yields.

This brings me to the question of what else we can do with respect to capital investment. I maintain that other policies could be devised that would produce a greater return for the farmer. It is interesting to note the conflict in views between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and his predecessor in office. His predecessor said that he saw no value in a two-price system for wheat. As reported in the Regina Leader-Post of July 27 last the present minister said he wholeheartedly endorses a two-price system for wheat.

Mr. Stanfield: That was before he got the word.

Mr. Horner: I am sure many farmers will look forward to seeing the minister implement such a policy. I quote from that issue of the Leader-Post:

> Mr. Olson agrees with the proposal for a two-price system for wheat, a platform plank in both the Liberal and Social Credit farm policies in the last three elections. He said Canada is about the only country that sells domestic wheat at the same price as exports.

We on this side of the house will do our best to encourage the minister to implement such a policy. It would increase the net income of farmers in Canada generally and particularly those in western Canada.

I note that the speech from the throne forecasts legislation covering interest rates on loans granted for agricultural purposes. We shall strive to improve these separate legislative items because we want farmers to make greater use of their provisions.

A number of years ago we provided that the Industrial Development Bank could make agricultural loans. As a result there was a great upsurge in the number of such loans made by that bank. However, recent statistics show that there has been a tapering off in the volume of these loans.

The agricultural industry needs a greater inflow of capital to assist in the marketing of goods, whether those goods be fruit and vegetables, dairy products, or other types of goods. By developing better marketing we can make sure that farmers receive a price that is above their costs of production.

In the past four years the government introduced a system of accelerated depreciation for grain storage facilities, but it is going to end now. Many western farmers would like to see provision made in the coming budget for retention of that scheme. That scheme encouraged them to build and buy storage for their grain. At the rate the government is now selling wheat farmers will have to build and buy more storage in the years ahead and the accelerated depreciation scheme would help them.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) is now in charge of the wheat board and I note that the government, through the Speech from the Throne, suggests the establishment of a Canada grains council. What will be the purpose of such a council? Various cabinet ministers have commented upon it. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), who at one time was in charge of the wheat board, has said that the proposed grains council is not a slam against the wheat board and that its main purpose will be to produce new ideas. Has the wheat board been lax in this aspect of its work? We in western Canada would like to know. We think the wheat board has done a terrific job over the years.

A few years ago the wheat board issued a little pamphlet listing 11 of its functions. These basically cover the selling of grain at the highest possible price with the greatest efficiency, and the development of grain exports at the highest possible price so that grain farmers may receive a good return on their product. Is the proposed grains council to act as liaison between the wheat board and the eastern feed board, or is it merely going to be window dressing?

I note that the Minister of Agriculture is not in the chamber, Mr. Speaker. I have no particular axe to grind with him, but I think it is a pity that as a minister from western Canada he is not responsible for the wheat board. Without that responsibility what effect has he in guarding agricultural prices for western producers?

The other day we heard that the new Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) from Saskatoon is going to take over responsibility for the wheat board. The wheat board has come under the control of five ministers in less than three years, and such uncertainty does nothing for the western farmer. It should be placed in the hands of a western minister who knows something about western agriculture and who is prepared to do something. I believe it should be placed in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture. He is supposed to be responsible for the well-being of farmers, particularly western farmers since he comes from western Canada.

The former minister of forestry condemned the wheat board. Now we see a national grains council being advocated. The government does not explain what it will do, whether it will be window dressing, providing jobs for a bunch of Grits out to enjoy a just society. We want the uncertainty to end. We want the indecision to end. We want confidence restored but this cannot be done when there is indecision about the international wheat agreement and confusion over whether it is going to be effective and enforced.

At present the Minister of Agriculture is in charge of little that affects western Canada. His biggest responsibility is the dairy industry. We in western Canada have milked a lot of cows in our day but are not necessarily noted for that being our major concern. The previous minister of agriculture can chalk up to his credit that he got rid of more small dairy farmers than any of his predecessors. Throughout the election campaign the Prime Minister suggested that inefficient farmers must go. I do not want the new Minister of Agriculture to be charged in a few years time with getting rid of more farmers, and not just dairy farmers, than any previous minister.

I firmly believe that people want to return to the land. I believe people do not accept the thesis of economists and university professors that everybody wants to get off the land and that the only solution to our agricultural problems is to get half our farmers to leave the land. I believe there are thousands of people living in the cities today who would welcome an opportunity to get back to the farm. It is a duty of a just society to try to provide an opportunity for those farmers to return to the land. They should not be pushed or moved off the land.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister suggested that the small farms must go and that some kind of a new board should be set up which would prohibit the sale of marginal land to new farmers. In other words, the land should either be sold to the crown as public land or sold to another farmer to enable him to enlarge his holding. This is not good enough. In agriculture today we see more and more farmers returning to the farm and working part time on the farm and part time off the farm. Certainly this is acceptable. In fact some figures which I read recently suggested that something like 69 per cent of the farmers paying income tax in the United States are actually carrying on part time jobs. Perhaps this is the way we are heading in this country; I do not know. Certainly if a farmer finds it necessary to take a part time job we should encourage rather than discourage him. We should encourage him to live on the land and not force him off it.

I hope we can clear up the confused situation in respect of grain handling and grain marketing. I also hope that before long the Canadian Wheat Board can be called before the agricultural committee so that the committee may study the whole question of whether or not the international grains agreement can be enforced and whether or not the floor prices under the international grains agreement will in effect be the floor prices at which Canadian grain can be sold on the world market.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark and Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, it is a very humbling experience to have the great privilege of speaking for my first time in Canada's parliament. I wish at the outset to underscore the usual courtesies paid by previous speakers in this throne speech debate to yourself, to the leaders of this house, to the leaders of the parties, to the senior and sophomore members and to the freshmen like myself.

As you know I am the member for Lanark and Renfrew. My riding includes portions of three counties within the Ottawa valley, the county of Renfrew, the county of Lanark and the county of Carleton. I was born in the Ottawa valley and I have lived for 23 of my 33 years within 100 miles of this the nation's capital. As a result I have been privileged on many occasions to sit in the visitors' gallery and gain, by a kind of osmosis, the feel, the cut and thrust, of parliamentary debate. It is thus for me a double honour to be able to take an active part here on the floor of the house itself.

We must always be sensitive to our history. It was a much more brilliant man than I who reminded us many centuries ago that he who is ignorant of what happened before he was born is destined to remain a child forever. I agree. Where we have come from is vitally important in determining where we are going to. Especially is this so if we are to have ourselves, and imbue in our people, any sense of destiny and purpose.

I am well aware also that perhaps everything I say today may have been better said in this house at some earlier date. I do not pretend to have discovered any insights that are uniquely new. Rather, my purpose is to accentuate some of those subjects that I believe need our attention now and in the days and years that lie before us. It seems to me that we are not here to glorify the past but to plan the future. We are not here to reflect the average opinions of the average Canadian but are here to uncover greater possibilities than we have ever yet had.

Our task is one of leadership. I know that Canadians did not elect our esteemed Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) because they believed he would follow them. We elected the right hon. gentleman because we know he will lead us and blaze new trails and set new standards for a new age. Similarly, as I look around me today I am convinced that all hon. members in this entire house were sent to parliament because their constituents believed, through the power of the ballot, that they would be the most creative, the most forward looking persons available to come to Ottawa to sculpture the future forms of our beloved nation.

Allow me to set out in both broad and specific terms what I as a novice in the house consider to be the most urgent problems facing us all. It is a cliché to say that we live in a fast moving age. It is also true. As Cardinal Léger used to say, the facts are also the truth. For many people all over the world, the only constant factor is change itself. Rapid social change creates an inevitable sense of rootlessness at the personal level.

Just yesterday we were reminded in this house that in the immediate future people probably will have to enter three different vocations during their lifetime and be educated all over again three different times. We must be aware of the result. It is too easy in a life of continuous change for the individual to come to believe that he is dispensable, which in a very real sense is true, and experience an increasing sense of loss of any feeling of personal worth and value. Such lowering of one's estimate of one's own innate ability to count for something is the initial cause of the majority of all mental illness. Thus we will and do need as never before in our history to take definite steps to emphasize personal value and the uniqueness of the human dimension.

It seems to me that we must within Canada create and maintain an environment wherein we not only produce persons to work with machines but also persons to work with people. As I said earlier I do not belittle history. But this is a future-oriented age as illustrated by the emphasis upon youth in our culture and even as demonstrated in this house where I, at 33, am some 11 years older than our youngest member.

I, in agreement with the government, want Canada to be a director of the future and not one of its victims. For that reason I am a member of this house. The future, by all indications, will produce an ever-shrinking world. We cannot be isolationistic. We must think of ourselves as citizens of Canada, but we must also think of ourselves as citizens of the world. The day is very near when mere nationalism, if it is that and nothing more, will have a very parochial ring. It is one thing to say that we are among the most fortunate people in the world. Let me give you a devastating quotation:

> The rich can only be happy so long as the poor suffer in silence.

Today in a land like Peru a poor peasant woman goes to market down the mountain trail with her chickens and meagre produce piled high upon her head. She has an intimate acquaintance with poverty, disease and illiteracy. Her parents before her were the victims of povery, disease and illiteracy. They assumed that the whole world was poor, diseased and uneducated.

At first sight nothing seems to have changed. This woman's situation is the same as it has been for others for centuries. But there is one thing different and it affects this House of Commons. As she went to market this morning on that far-off mountain trail she likely walked with a very low-cost transistor radio pressed to her ear. She, unlike her ancestors, knows that all the world is not illiterate, diseased and almost destitute. Her situation is the same but her attitude is changed. The rich can never be happy again because the poor, in an age of mass communication, will never keep silent again.

What does this mean? Our foreign aid has hovered around one half of one per cent of gross national product in recent years, and since the United Nations has recommended that a minimum level of one per cent of gross national product be the target for developed countries it means that if we are to seek a peaceful world and be future oriented we must in a very hard headed way go out across this land and convince the taxpayers that increased foreign aid is not simply the pipedream of some idealist but rather an essential investment in their own children's well-being.

I hope too that we in this twenty eighth parliament can reflect the fact that we live in a pluralistic society. We must, and I believe we will, revise laws restrictive of human rights, for example, laws restrictive of proper family planning, laws which tend to permit the wealthy to attain what the poor are denied. We must reassess, as the throne speech has committed us to do, the lumping together in a legal sense of such diverse chemicals as marijuana and heroin. In short I want, like the Prime Minister, that this be a parliament for the people.

I would, Mr. Speaker, be less than honest to my own integrity if I sat down without mentioning Biafra. In a family the children belong to the parents just as Biafra belongs to Nigeria. In our culture we have assumed for a long time that if the parents to whom the children legally belong brutalize those children, even if they are disobedient and naughty, then the neighbours must take steps for the children's protection. If the neighbours on either side of the home take no action, is the neighbour in the next block thereby excused from taking the most direct and useful action possible for those children's protection? I think not. Similarly, just because it is my brother, a part of my own family, and in this instance of the Commonwealth, who is brutalizing his children it seems to me I am no less required to intervene.

I am distressed by reports this morning from Nigeria. We in Canada are already doing much and that must be recognized, but we must do more and we must do it now. As a novice in this house I want this opinion to be heard very clearly.

Socrates and the ancient Greeks had a definition of leisure to which I wish to draw the attention of my colleagues. To the ancient Greeks leisure was the time a free man spent in pursuit of government, what we might call being civic-minded. The purpose of such effort was to create the great society, a phrase, by the way, borrowed by our brothers south of the border without credits. It seems to me that we in this House of Commons are free men in pursuit of government. I hope and am daily becoming more convinced that the product of our labours will dispel any suspicion among our constituents that we are not, within the modern-day distortion of the original term, using our leisure in the pursuit of government.

My constituents in Lanark and Renfrew have paid me a great honour by sending me here. I hope my contribution in this house will justify their confidence.

Mr. Robert Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be of congratulation to yourself on your re-election to the high office you hold and on your record established in the past in this high office which has allowed politicians to set aside partisan considerations. I must congratulate you for your efforts which have made it possible for you to come back to this chamber as an independent member, thereby giving greater honour and prestige to your position. I believe that you have, Mr. Speaker, taken the first step of many that will eventually place you in the position of being the finest member that has ever occupied your high office and I look forward in the years to come to even greater and more outstanding examples of your non-partisanship and your willingness to serve the members of this chamber.

I should also like to congratulate the chairman of the committee of the whole on his election to that office. I feel certain that in the days ahead he will show this same non-partisanship in carrying out the duties of that position and will serve the members of this house in a diligent and forthright manner.

Let me also offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Corbin) and the seconder (Mr. Marchand) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was very impressed with both these young men and I am sure they will make a great contribution to parliament in the days that lie ahead. It is my hope they will find it possible, along with other members in all parties in this house, to participate often in debates and thereby contribute to the building of this nation.

Before I commence the theme of my remarks I should like to offer my congratulations to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for the the outstanding contribution he made to this debate yesterday. Surely that contribution is a clear indication that the official opposition in this house is ready and willing to place frank questions before the government even though they often produce sterile and barren answers much like the document that is the basis of this debate. I refer to the throne speech.

I should especially like to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition for referring to a very obvious omission in the throne speech. I find it shocking to the sensibilities of many Canadians that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country should ask the Queen's representative to read a document when the Prime Minister does not even acknowledge the Queen. I think many Canadians will find it less than acceptable to hear the Prime Minister of this nation say we do not go around bragging about our loyalty to the Queen, especially when that same hon. gentleman only last spring, when a debate was taking place in the province of Quebec on a resolution to determine whether this country should go forward as a republic or as a member of the commonwealth recognizing the Queen, said he was so disinterested in that debate that he would rather go fishing. I would think he should have been anxious to indicate to all Canadians that he did have loyalty and allegiance to the Queen.

I believe, therefore, that the Leader of the Opposition was right in telling the government that they should say either yes or no when they are talking about loyalty to the Queen. Certainly what the Prime Minister has said to date is unacceptable to me as a Canadian who is loyal to the Queen, and I am sure it is unacceptable to many Canadians in this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote the following words:

> Like the diet prescribed by doctors, which neither restores the strength of the patient nor allows him to succumb, so these doles that you are now distributing neither suffice to ensure your safety nor allow you to renounce them and try something else.

[Mr. Coates.]

So spoke Demosthenes 2,300 years ago; yet no words can better describe the plight of the Atlantic provinces today in the light of this throne speech. It was a bitter disappointment, for it followed in the footsteps of the ill-conceived and unfulfilled promises of the Pearson administration that made our area the afterthought area of this nation. This afterthought philosophy persists with the present administration, as exemplified by the statements of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer).

The government acted quickly and without hesitation in announcing a new air policy that will result in the expenditure of $600 million in the construction of two new air terminals for the cities of Montreal and Toronto but offered only the prospects associated with studies of transportation in the Atlantic provinces, plus the ultra-conservative philosophy that dollars and cents will be the determining factor in passenger services that will be available in the future to the residents of the Atlantic provinces, and more especially to the province of Newfoundland.

It is no wonder that the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) rose immediately in this house and asked when the government was going to start cancelling passenger services in the rest of Canada. What other approach could any new member take after hearing that kind of statement from the Minister of Transport regarding a serious problem facing his constituents?

I recommend to the Minister of Transport the words of a great Liberal, the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who said more than 30 years ago:

> The test of our progress is not whether we add more to the abundance of those who have much; it is whether we provide enough for those who have too little.

The voters of the Atlantic area moved in open revolt against an administration that said much but did little. The self-styled despots of the region had little control over the voters, for they had failed to make the federal government recognize their plight. Like Demosthenes, they saw our region as one that could neither survive nor succumb with a government whose every action pertaining to our region was an afterthought.

While the voters of Atlantic Canada witnessed the hysteria that followed the Prime Minister wherever he travelled in this nation, while they heard the words "just society" and "regional economic disparity" pour forth from his lips when he spoke, they recalled the utterances of other Liberal leaders and were not deceived. The visionary, turned mundane housekeeper, has at least confirmed in the minds of the voters of the Atlantic provinces that they chose wisely. We remain in the position where only one leader in this century has matched performance with promise, and I am pleased the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) still graces this chamber with his presence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: I know that we in my part of Canada can continue to depend upon him. He is the greatest friend we have ever had in politics in this nation, and I know he will continue to assist us in our determined fight for equality of opportunity with the remainder of the people in this nation.

If the leaders of this nation are not concerned about the plight of our area, if they are unwilling to consider the shocking revelations provided by statistics, statistics that tell them that even though we are already underpopulated there is a migration from our region that has reached alarming proportions, statistics that tell them we are continually operating, and have for years, with an unemployment base that varies from two to three times the national average, statistics that tell them we live in an area with a per capita income between 70 per cent and 75 per cent of the national average and that the gap has widened, not narrowed, in recent years, statistics that tell them the region cannot hope to become a viable entity unless a new transporation policy is produced for the region, then, Mr. Speaker, we are placed in the position where we must reassess the value of our Canadian citizenship.

Such a reassessment would require that we determine the contributions we make, the sacrifices we make and the benefits accruing from our citizenship. The citizens of the Atlantic provinces stand shoulder to shoulder with citizens in other parts of Canada in our loyalty and dedication to one, united Canada. The rewards for this loyalty and dedication have not been equal in all parts of the nation and we have suffered most from this disparity.

We have never sought charity but only the opportunity to make use of the potential that surrounds us. Like Franklin Delano Roosevelt who said in 1935 that "continued dependence upon relief induces a spiritual and moral disintegration fundamentally destructive to the national fibre" and "to dole out relief in this way is to administer a narcotic, a subtle destroyer of the human spirit", we desire only the kind of philosophy from the federal administration that will guarantee our people the right to equality of opportunity.

We in Atlantic Canada are a proud people with a determination to remain, even through adversity, in our region. We have long been known as the exporters of brains to the remainder of Canada, and our people serve today, and have throughout this country's history, in the highest offices in government, industry and education. Those who visit our area from other parts of Canada discover a unique beauty, a warm and generous people, and a degree of progress in which we take special pride, for in recent years it has been almost solely maintained by financially strapped provincial governments. Two of the initiators of our drive for industrialization now sit in this chamber. Both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. Flemming) deserve the highest possible commendation for the leadership and the new spirit they instilled in the people of their respective provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: We learned recently that Toronto the good had carried out a special study of the maritimers who come to that great city seeking work. This study group recommended that the city inform federal manpower centres that they require no future citizens from the maritimes. They gave some very uncomplimentary descriptions of those who had migrated in the past. The philosophy which initiated, produced and publicized such a study is reminiscent of that in vogue in Hitler's Germany and is unacceptable and inexcusable in the Canada I know. I say to these Toronto men of warped reason that we are as anxious as they to keep our people in the maritimes and that almost without exception our people desire to remain there. What we require is a drastic change of pace on the part of the federal government, one that will provide the weapons for us to overcome adversity, not the agglomeration which represents today federal government policy in the Atlantic provinces.

We have the great projects which could transform our region from the have not to the have category, but we require action and imagination on the part of this government. For years we have spoken of the three C's: The causeway, the corridor road and the Chignecto complex. Already this government is preparing the causeway for the guillotine. The mover of this debate has urged the government to give unfavourable consideration to the corridor road, and the Chignecto complex awaits the same fate from a government which up to now has reacted to one study by setting up another.

The Prince Edward Island causeway would be a self-liquidating project based on present federal government expenditures to maintain a transportation link between that province and the mainland. The corridor road has long been promoted as the means of moving our goods much closer to the markets of central Canada, but because this young man, at this early stage of his political career, cannot see beyond his constituency, he counsels the government to kill a project which might well become the cornerstone of a new transportation system for our region.

Naturally I must hope that the foresight of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) will allow him, with time, to see the problems of the area on a regional rather than a constituency basis. If the causeway and the corridor road face the guillotine, can we anticipate the same fate for the Chignecto complex?

It is my view that the problems of the Atlantic region are so severe as to require daring on the part of the federal government. This means the undertaking of the harnessing of the Bay of Fundy tides as a source of power as soon as the government has the assurance it is feasible from an engineering standpoint. We cannot afford the luxury of an economic debate but rather need the kind of courageous decision for Atlantic Canada that was displayed for central Canada in the construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway and for western Canada in the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam.

We are told by the Prime Minister that the government will approach this matter through its manpower policies. If the government persists in this philosophy, the Atlantic provinces will become the training ground for industry in central Canada. Our people will be trained or retrained for non-existent jobs in the Atlantic region and then provided with one-way tickets out of the region. The ghost of Walter Gordon casts its ugly shadow over our area once again.

[Mr. Coates.]

A new breed of man must appear on the scene in Atlantic Canada. He must be fearlessly determined to protect our area from the afterthought philosophy and from further economic erosion. The 32 members from the Atlantic provinces must become the vanguard of the army at home which will fight for equality and justice. I have had the pleasant experience of meeting a man in the present administration who might well provide enlightened leadership to this vanguard in Ottawa, namely, the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Jamieson). I will watch with anticipation his words and actions in the days ahead. If he meets my expectations and if his deep concern for our problems continues, progress is assured.

This new breed of man must generate inspiration to the legions at home so they may fight discrimination and win equality of opportunity, thereby guaranteeing that the words of Demosthenes will not be the epitaph on our tombstone.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join those who con-congratulated you and your assistant on your respective appointments. I know that you will both discharge your duties with great dignity, decorum and competence.

Please transmit my best wishes and congratulations to the Speaker of this house upon his appointment. By first sitting as an independent member and then becoming Speaker of the house, he has, in my opinion, created a precedent which does him special honour, as do also his rulings based on other precedents.

I also wish to congratulate the sponsors of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand). In my opinion, they have made an excellent start and need only follow the road they have chosen.

As for myself, Mr. Speaker, I have been elected for the fourth time. My former riding, that of Quebec South, included the town of Sillery, part of the city of Quebec and all the old historic part of Quebec City. Redistribution unfortunately removed the historic part of the city of Quebec from my new riding of Louis-Hébert. However, it added thereto the cities of Sainte-Foy and Cap-Rouge.

I wish to thank all those who took part in my election campaign. I want also to thank all the voters who had faith in me, who enabled me to pass the test rather successfully, and the best way to thank them is for me to represent all Canadians here. I am determined to work to that end.

We will have to study legislation which might prove controversial, but when that time comes, we will have to remember that when voting on any given legislation, we do it as representatives of all Canadians and not only as members of particular ridings.

During the election campaign, I lived through a rather interesting experience: I saw the young take an interest in politics, and that for the first time. Young people from 15 to 20 years of age, who could not even vote, came to the offices of my organization committees, asking me to hold forums, political information meetings. I did so with great pleasure and I gained a lot from the interest shown by these youngsters for public affairs. I was also amazed by the seriousness of their questions.

We live in a fast changing world whose influence on youth is greater than ever. Still very young, they come down into the street and demand things which never came to our mind when we were the same age. Our students demand participation in the management of universities and in the elaboration of their courses.

I say that this is a modern phenomenon which was perhaps crystallized during the last election campaign by new leaders, and especially by the leader of my party who was able to get the youngsters interested in public matters.

So, I say we must now start a dialogue with the young, interest them in public affairs, make them participate in our debate, in our exchange of ideas—that is what I intend to do with my colleagues—in an endeavour to quietly institute democracy through participation, the participation of all the citizens, at every level and, I would even say, of every age group.

Mr. Speaker, I assure you that this experience, which was new to me, was also very useful for the progress in my way of thinking on public life. This brings me to the address in reply.

The main criticism voiced by the opposition is this. It contains nothing but generalities. Obviously, this is something new. It does not give, as usual, a list of legislative measures, a catalogue of laws. On the contrary, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) decided to present a motion to table a list of legislative measures mentioned in the Speech from the Throne.

This speech outlined a philosophy, a policy for the future with general objectives; and we want to have adopted pieces of legislation enabling the achievement of those objectives. We want to establish in a reasoned, sensible manner, according to our means, an increasingly just society. We shall succeed if everyone participates.

As you know, established traditions and an entrenched economy cannot be changed without a degree of rationality, allowing for the time required to effect those changes. However, I think we have taken the right steps in this direction, and all the cabinet ministers have worked hard this summer to prepare the legislation which is to be submitted to the house.

As a member of parliament, I also have to deal with matters in my riding and in my area, and as concerns achievements, I have tried for the last few years to effect certain improvements. Some projects have been implemented, but some others have not yet been carried out.

At this stage, I should like merely to mention the Quebec City airport. We should not forget that Quebec is, after all, a capital. Now, the airport we have at present is not worthy of that city; essential services are completely lacking, from baggage service to the conveniences that could be made available to travellers. I know that a study concerning the renovation of the airport is under way and I am going to ask the honourable Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) to see that it is carried out as soon as possible.

So, with respect to the challenge confronting us, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention my first impressions. Upon coming back to this house last week, I felt like entering a new parliament. I believe there are about 60 new members on the Liberal side and more than 40 in the various opposition parties. Among the new-comers on the government side, I noticed many young and serious representatives, who are really anxious to work and improve our society. I believe we can observe on the opposition side the same concern for progress with respect to all Canadians.

I believe the atmosphere pervading the opening of this parliament is auspicious and that we shall be able to achieve, in the near future, the goals set in the Speech from the Throne.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, as a newly elected member from a newly created riding I am pleased, through the courtesy of my colleagues, to be able to take part in this debate at this time. If I were to say that I did not come here to talk, that statement would be both inaccurate and misleading. It is not, however, how much is said but rather the quality and relevance of what is said that will determine whether this parliament can reverse the trend of electoral drop-outism which is found in an increasing segment of Canadians. It will be my objective, then, to deal with matters before this house in a positive, conscientious way.

Other speakers have offered congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, upon your election to this important office. May I be permitted to add mine, with the observation that last Thursday you advanced to your position from the back row of the opposition benches. I will accept this as a good omen for others in my row interested in upward social mobility, although I doubt that our rise will be quite as rapid.

Laudatory words of congratulation to the right hon. gentleman who is our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have also been extended repeatedly. I hope that in adding my voice to the chorus I will be forgiven if I fail to launch myself into stellar flights of oratory of a kind comparable with those words which have come from the government side of the house. There are three major reasons for my ungrudging but comparatively subdued greeting. First of all, I sit in the opposition, so in that sense my mission here is to bury Caesar, not to praise him. Second, my presence here is not a result of this gentleman's popularity in the recent election. In fact, the contrary is the case and I am here despite it. Finally, but most importantly, much of what has been said in reference to the Prime Minister has implied accomplishment of what is but yet potential. Wishes are not facts; sentiments are not solutions. Good intentions are but pavement on the road; they are never to be confused with progress along it.

This brings me to a crucial point in considering the rather dreary document before us, the speech from the throne. One would have anticipated a 20th century banner of excitement and verve to be unfurled, an imaginative, courageous blueprint for a new Canada. This is what our country hoped for and deserved, but we did not get it. At a time in our history when pride in ourselves as Canadians was glowing as never before we were ready to be challenged, anxious for the new look and famished for idealistic leadership. But, Mr. Speaker, we were disillusioned. We were served with a skilfully vague reiteration of the status quo when we had every right to expect, from advance notices, a ringing manifesto for social change. This speech will send no one to the barricades, sir—more likely to the rail.

Reform in parliament we can all support, I believe, but it does not necessarily follow that reform in government will be the result. Forms are much more easily amended than substance. People may be fooled for a while by what looks like improvement, but if the "just society" turns out to be "just a front" their revenge may be devastating.

I am certain that my constituents, the pensioners, the veterans, the rural poor, the unemployed, the fishermen, the Indians, the educated, the uneducated, the sick, the weary and the discouraged, will all be fascinated to discover how past governments could be accused of concentrating on the distributive aspects of our economy. Only a week ago we received the report of the economic council which sets forth in alarming terms the contradiction that 40 per cent of Canadians are on the short end of the distributive stick. Many people in my riding will give great support to a government willing to give greater concentration to an even better distribution of the wealth of our country. The plain fact of the matter is that, despite our affluence, far too many people in Canada have far too little of the things necessary for hope and happiness and dignity.

The government knows full well that exhortations to work harder, to show more individual initiative, will have little effect on the productivity of the unskilled and unmotivated. Millions of these people struggle now in a circle of hopeless drudgery and inflation is forcing them to run harder just to stay where they are.

Lectures on outmoded economic theories will not help, either. We are short of money to spend on the things we need, like schools, hospitals, universities, research and retraining, because we have squandered millions on things such as Bobcats, Arrows, Bomarcs and Norads, that we do not need or no longer need.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): How do you know we do not need them, or did not?

Mr. Rose: No, I think the secret of improved productivity lies in improving the skill of the average Canadian; and this implies a massive investment in the human resources of our country, especially in education. Canada is no longer a rural society, although many look back nostalgically to when it was. We are, rather, a nation where fewer than 10 per cent of our people live on farms and the rest now live in urban centres. When we remember too that over half of the parents in this country have only grade 8 education we can then appreciate the tremendous job ahead in transmitting educational values to the young.

John Porter had this to say recently, and I quote it because I believe it to be of great relevance if one wishes to tackle the problem of productivity with diligence. He said:

> If a society as it is becoming industrialized fails to upgrade its labour force ... there is an alternative open to it, and that is to go and get its skills some place else, and that is what Canada has done to a great extent. It is quite fair to say that the high level of industrialization which Canada enjoys today rests not only on the importation of foreign capital but on the importation of foreign skills and professions Canada has failed to produce.

The path seems clear then, Mr. Speaker, as to what might be done to begin to improve productivity. Our people are neither stupid nor lazy; too few have had enough education of the right kind. Far from having too much of this free stuff, many have had too little.

The story of the average Canadian is the story of wasted talent because of inadequate preparation to meet the demands of the technological society. Our lag in regard to education can be seen when we recognize that 15 per cent of Canadians have enjoyed post-secondary training compared with over 40 per cent in the United States. Too often, of course, it is not the most able who go on, because the financial demands of higher education are insurmountable to all the most dedicated of the poor.

It is no longer news that a disproportionate number of the sons and daughters of upper income families are to be found in our secondary schools and universities; yet middle and low income groups have the most brain power simply because they contain more people. I believe that this state of affairs is no longer satisfactory. It is too late for such wastefulness. It is the ability to learn, not the ability to pay, which should determine who is to go on.

Now is the time to renounce once and for all the outmoded and inefficient concept that the federal government has no business in education. The national government has already stuck its toe in the water of vocational, agricultural and university education. Now is the time to plunge right in and come up with a bold program. I agree that there is sound constitutional validity that primary and secondary education remain the preserve of the provinces, but there is nowhere near the historical justification for post-secondary institutions of learning to be exclusively under provincial control. At the time of confederation institutions of higher learning were privately endowed and not state supported. It seems to me, therefore, that provincial claims to exclusive rights here are extravagant.

The products of higher education are a natural resource of prime importance. Their mobility, expertise and contribution to our country's development make it essential that a greater interest and investment in post-secondary education be undertaken by the national government. More and more young people are knocking at the doors of these schools and finding them closed. I suggest that this condition can only perpetuate the teach the best, shoot the rest elitism we have traditionally accepted in Canada. More schools must be built and different kinds of schools developed for the vast variety of talents and skills possessed by our youth and to provide an educational alternative to those not wishing to go to colleges or universities. This is a way to increase productivity. Our neighbour to the south has enjoyed outstanding industrial success largely because it has deliberately broadened and democratized its educational system and produced the most skilful work force in the world. The broader the base, the higher the pyramid it can support.

The lack of federal consideration of education is inconsistent with the objectives of a modern state. A patchwork of ten provincial systems each running off in all directions is an extravagance 20 million people can scarcely afford. I propose that a national office of education be established, whose functions would include the following: First, to assume leadership in establishing some uniform grade and subject standards across the land, so that children of our mobile work force will no longer be educationally penalized nor psychologically disadvantaged by moving abruptly from one school system to another.

Second, we need a national office of education to stimulate and co-ordinate educational research in Canada so that we will not remain as dependent on the importation of foreign research as we are on foreign capital and skill. Third, we need a national office of education to administer grants, directly to institutions, if necessary, in order to hasten the day post-secondary training and retraining at public expense are considered as much a right as we now accept education to be in the elementary and secondary systems.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I must express my regret that the government has recently allowed a 2 per cent increase in the Canada student loan interest rate. This regressive measure penalizes those who can least afford it. Why has the government not moved in exactly the opposite direction? Why has it not provided more able young Canadians with the kind of incentives it offers university officer candidates for the Canadian forces? I have no objection to paying young people $187 per month to go to university because I know the whole country benefits in the long run. But it does evoke some comment on our priorities that we willingly pay $187 per month to train young men to kill and be killed while we raise the loan rate for future teachers by 2 per cent.

Fourth, we need a national office of education so that no country in the world will be in doubt that the educational address of Canada is not in Victoria, British Columbia or Quebec city but is in the parliament buildings, Ottawa. We must in future avoid a recurrence of the recent controversy and national embarrassment caused by the attempted extraterritorial extension of provincial educational rights. Finally, we need a national office of education to improve and make more meaningful the cultural life of Canadians.

I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, about the grim technocratic nature of the document before us. It has little or nothing to say about the quality of life to which many Canadians aspire. It comes through to me as having a clinical, sterile, impersonal quality emphasizing efficiency and muscle in an age when technology seems on the verge of releasing man for a new renaissance of creation and re-creation. Campus activists who are demanding a greater share in decision making are but the tip of the iceberg of youthful discontent. Many young people find it no longer acceptable to have their educational systems so completely ordered by adults that they are likely to emerge from schools as dehumanized units destined for industrial and commercial oblivion.

What man does with his leisure is largely dependent upon how he was educated. And one of man's greatest new problems is likely to be how to fill in the time between birth and death constructively. It is inconceivable to me that a cabinet led and dominated by Latins could articulate the Puritan ethic more admirably. May I ask: Oh where, oh where, is your Gallic flair?

I am honoured today, Mr. Speaker, to speak before this assembly. I am deeply grateful to my constituents who have given me the opportunity to work with great Canadians on both sides of the house. I am happy to take my place here along with more than 100 new members and I express the opinion that reform in this parliament will be greatly facilitated by the fact that so many of us have so little to unlearn.

Fraser Valley West is a new riding created from the former ridings of Fraser Valley, once represented by A. B. Patterson; New Westminster, represented by the present member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) and Burnaby-Coquitlam, formerly represented by our national leader, T. C. Douglas, who is temporarily delayed but we expect him here soon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rose: The riding is bisected by the Fraser River from which it derives its name and is approximately two-thirds rural and one-third urban or suburban. This beautiful area includes six municipalities and parts of three others and boasts of well-kept homes, some beautiful rivers and lakes, a seaport, fine farms and much rugged natural parkland.

The Fraser River, of course, has long been a major producer of salmon as well as being a navigation artery for commerce, a gateway to the interior of our province in the early days, and today vital for the transportation and storage of millions of logs each year for this major B.C. industry.

On the north bank of the river, between the Fraser and Burrard Inlet, is a hilly area commanding a view of the valley. This is the area served by the Coquitlam school district and is the fastest growing urban area in B.C. This is where I make my home. I grew up on the banks of the Fraser and for 35 years of my life have lived within a mile of its shores. It is not only what you know about an area but what you feel about it that is the crucial thing, and I would like to tell this house in the time remaining to me how I feel about a few matters affecting my riding.

For all purposes, and with apologies to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), the Fraser valley provides the only corridor to Canada's west coast. In fact the Fraser delta is Canada's Pacific coast. The two major rail lines, a freeway and the river have sought this natural way to the sea. In addition, the best of the 2 per cent of B.C. land suitable for agriculture is found here. Our planners tell us that the population will double by the turn of the century, and today the pressure of subdivision and suburban encroachment on the remaining farm land is reaching alarming proportions.

Joint efforts on the part of Fraser Valley municipal governments toward the solution of regional problems are worthy but are just beginning. The concept of regional planning received a cruel, if not fatal, blow recently by the intrusion of a third rail line right through the middle of some fine farms. This was done against the advice of the planners, against the wishes of municipal governments, and of large numbers of citizens who feel the presence of this B.C. Hydro and Power Authority line to be largely redundant, politically motivated and an affront to good planning. Many people believe, Mr. Speaker, that this new line for unit trains to the federally-financed Roberts Bank superport was located in the best interests of the railroads alone, ignoring recreational and conservational factors. And so do I. Many also believe that if the federal government is not guilty of complicity with the B.C. government in agreeing to the route it is, at the very least, guilty of a weak, waffling posture on the whole matter. And so do I. To take 100 car unit trains of coal up a mountain, through rich farm land and finally along the best bathing beach and waterfowl area in the lower mainland, when there is a reasonable alternative open, is a decision that appears ludicrous.

Mr. Rose: We are pleased in the valley, on the other hand, that at long last some concrete federal-provincial legislation has appeared designed to overcome the devastation of the periodic Fraser flooding. Certainly those who remember the 1948 flood now have better cause to be optimistic although legislation by itself is seldom watertight enough to protect the land. We shall not quarrel either with the timing of the announcement and visit by the minister himself to my riding during the early weeks of the election campaign; we must agree that progress in this problem of flood control is now possible. I do submit, however, that dikes are relatively temporary measures and the permanent solution to Fraser flooding probably lies in controlling the run-off by means of storage dams in the Fraser canyon.

A very serious problem confronting my riding also concerns the waters of the Fraser and its tributaries and Burrard Inlet too. With the pressure of expanding population and the limited means available to municipalities to raise revenue, it is almost inevitable that our waters be gradually polluted. Raw sewage is a distinct problem in Burrard Inlet as is the spillover of sulphur from the Canadian Pacific bulk loading facility. Fraser fishermen at Fort Langley tell me it is now possible to ascertain when the people 20 miles upriver at Mission City have eaten asparagus for dinner. Moreover, the Coquitlam river, an excellent sports fishing stream, is constantly being despoiled by the activities of gravel companies whose depredations along its shores have at places turned it into a Hollywood set suitable for a life on the moon series. Much more federal leadership in the standards and control of pollution is vital if we are to avoid poisoning ourselves, and I await with much interest and anticipation the specifics to follow from the reference in the speech from the throne to conservation of our resources.

I should be remiss, Mr. Speaker, if I did not bring before this assembly on behalf of the municipalities I represent their concern for the manner in which the winter works program was guillotined. The explanation given by the government that the program was not the most effective way of using funds may contain some measure of truth, but to suggest that manpower training programs can immediately replace winter works is a statement which completely boggles the mind. If winter works were to be discarded at a time when municipalities in my riding were seeking a five-year extension, surely an adjustment period of a year or two might have been in order. One can become accustomed, I suppose, to losing one's hair a hair at a time, but it is particularly startling to be scalped without warning.

Mr. Knowles: Ask the Solicitor-General (Mr. McIlraith).

Mr. Rose: I wonder whether the government will not later have regrets about the discontinuance of this program before other measures are made available to soften the blow.

I suppose that any speech can be criticized on the ground of what it has left unsaid. I too looked without success for any reference to the Carter and Watkins reports in the speech from the throne. I was particularly disappointed to see no reference in the speech to what government action we might expect on the Watkins report on foreign ownership, for I think that it will be exceedingly difficult for the 20th century to belong to Canada if our country soon belongs to the United States.

Certainly the sin of omissions applies to my remarks also today. I hope to overcome these omissions in the years ahead and work effectively on the issues as they arise. I am determined to do this because this is why I was sent here. I know of no $30,000 government appointments available to the members of my party once they are defeated.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rose: But in closing I must bring before the house matters which transcend both constituency and national concerns. The speech from the throne contains this sentence:

> My government intends to press forward its plans and programs for international co-operation and development which includes the establishment in Canada of an international development centre.

It is my hope that among the problems which will be brought before this centre are what I consider to be the three P's of world concern and unrest. They are: population, pollution and poverty. If our government is successful in retarding any one of these evils which are steadily pushing the world's people toward the abyss, it will have justified its existence. For as certainly as the gap is growing between the haves and have-nots within our borders, so is the distance that the technologically emerging nations must travel to catch the industrially developed. If we are not successful in lessening these disparities and solving these problems, we will have lost the race with disaster, Mr. Speaker, and whatever else we may do here becomes irrelevant.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, just as previous speakers, allow me to offer you my heartfelt congratulations on your election. Before I begin my speech, I would like to make a small correction concerning the title given to you. In French, an "orateur" is one who delivers speeches before a meeting or a very eloquent man, while a "président" is the person who conducts the proceedings of a meeting or a court, according to the definition of the Larousse dictionary. I will take the liberty during my speech to call you in French "monsieur le Président".

Mr. Speaker, allow me first to congratulate warmly the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, the member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette).

Since Thursday last, I have experienced my first hours as a member in the House of Commons. And we knew the most serious and pleasant moments Monday evening, September 16, when the hon. member for Témiscamingue took part in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the unusual attention then prevailing in the house was an indication of the good faith of its members and an encouragement for the 400,000 electors who supported the Ralliement Créditiste.

Mr. Speaker, like all my colleagues, I approve the subject of the Speech from the Throne: the establishment of a just society. We now have to discuss the means to be taken so as to establish that just society.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) certainly indicated in his answer to the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that the time for good intentions was past. I am very glad to hear it, Mr. Speaker, but I am afraid it may only be the same old story which all government leaders have told over the years, as the hon. member for Témiscamingue so well demonstrated in his speech.

It is time, Mr. Speaker, to think of passing concrete measures to solve the problems facing the Canadian people. Let us stop talking about problems and find solutions. To make financially possible what is physically possible is not an empty election campaign promise. I am ready, Mr. Speaker, to support any government measure which would put credit or money at the service of the citizen. This system proved itself in wartime. The billions of dollars put into circulation in the form of credit during the period 1939-45 started an era of prosperity which continued even for a few years after the war, in fact until we applied again those famous restraints which result only in making the rich richer and the poor poorer.

As a matter of fact, we simply want a just society. We want every citizen to be reasonably well off. We want a fair distribution of all the riches of our country. We want all Canadians to be equal culturally, while being equal financially, with a vital financial minimum.

This brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the main topic of our times in Canada, and even sometimes abroad, the situation of Quebec within Confederation and the problem of the existence of the French-Canadian nation in this vast country of ours.

To wish for the emancipation and the complete fulfilment of one's nation can hardly be considered as a violation of the national integrity of any country. When I said to the people of the Champlain riding that I would champion the rights of Quebec in Ottawa, I was simply doing my duty as a responsible citizen who wants to contribute to the expansion of the whole country through the complete development of the characteristics which Providence has deigned to bestow upon us.

Quebecers or French-Canadians do not have any animosity or hatred against their compatriots of other origins. It is unfortunate that their sincere desire towards emancipation and improvement is often interpreted as something negative, if not destructive.

The example of the difficulties in Saint-Léonard shows very well the rather odd situation existing in Quebec, particularly in the greater Montréal area, where 90 per cent of the immigrants are being assimilated by the English-speaking community. If I decided to live in Spain, it seems to me obvious that I would have to adopt the Spanish culture, as well as I would have to become Russian if I were to settle in Russia. Why then should the Italian, Portuguese, or German who settle in Quebec not accept to become Quebecers?

Furthermore, the federal government should assist in the integration of those immigrants into the Quebec French-speaking community. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because, if the present pace is maintained, in view especially of the progressive, and even alarming, decrease of the birth rate in the province of Quebec, we cannot be sure that French-speaking Quebecers will still form a majority in Quebec 15 or 20 years from now. It is understandable why we think of self-preservation, when we have to answer the question: "What does Quebec want?" Canada as a whole should not contribute to that new-style genocide whereby a nation would slowly waste away unnoticed by its political elite which is present here, in this house, precisely in order to safeguard the fundamental rights of the nation.

I am sure, as was so rightly said one day by a certain general, that whatever the problem, time will provide a solution, on condition we stop, as soon as people express pro-Quebec feelings, placing them in a priori categories and interpreting their position as a stand against Canada.

Now, may I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to underline an abnormal situation concerning the very foundation of a just society, namely a provision of the Military Voters Act.

After my election, a judicial recount was held in the riding of Champlain, and I thus had the opportunity to see for myself the anti-democratic character of this vote. I understand, Mr. Speaker—and I congratulate our armed forces officers—that our soldiers are very well trained. They file past in step, they eat together, they follow together a hard and formative discipline. But I would never have believed that this discipline was so strict as to compel all our soldiers to write the same.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Matte: Yes, Mr. Speaker, on checking the registered military vote in the riding of Champlain, to our surprise and later to our merriment, in which the astonished presiding judge finally joined us, all the voting papers bore identical signatures in favour of the candidate of the party in power.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the same rules should apply to the vote of the military as well as to that of the other citizens. I would therefore suggest:

(1) That the list of the military in a riding be posted like the ordinary voters list.

(2) That the military should vote at the same time as the other voters and that those who are stationed away from home not be prevented from voting in the temporary polling booths set up across the country.

• (4:30 p.m.)

(3) That they use voting papers identical to the ones used by the other voters and not the small yellow slips on which they write the name of the candidate for whom they wish to vote.

(4) That all the military vote in a single riding set up expressly for them, or else in the ridings where they have in fact a home.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let there be an end to the vote of the unknown soldier.

Here are a few suggestions which could be applied immediately to improve the lot of the population of the Champlain riding. That huge riding which stretches along the St. Lawrence river, from Portneuf to Ste-Marthe-du-Cap-de-la-Madeleine, and extends as far north as Parent, that is some 250 miles, has heterogeneous interests.

The southern part of the riding is made up mostly of farm parishes. One knows, Mr. Speaker, that in Quebec, where there are so many paradoxical things, the farmer who is called upon to feed the people is hard put to feed himself. The satisfactory solution would be to guarantee the purchase of all his production, and until that policy is established by the Quebec government, the federal government should be much more generous in granting subsidies.

With regard to the other workers as a whole, it seems rather funny to them that those who strike already make two or even three times as much money as they earn as a rule. Many more municipalities should be considered as designated areas in order to get help that would enable them to improve their economy.

The people of the northern part of my riding are particularly concerned about another problem. From La Tuque to Parent, all the inhabitants or workers—there are a few thousands—are deprived of television coverage. It seems to me that is an injustice, the more so as these isolated people are in greater need than others of excellent information and recreation media.

Radar towers which are now placed 25 miles apart as far as Parent could be used right away. So, with hardly any coats, these people could enjoy television, which is an indispensable thing nowadays.

The northern part of the riding of Champlain is not the North Pole after all, and it is unthinkable that in 1968, this everyday service has not yet been extended there.

Another suggestion, Mr. Speaker. It is about the implementation of a plan already submitted to the government concerning the establishment of a rehabilitation centre on the former radar base at Parent. I visited the site last summer and I found it disgraceful that such a place which cost some twenty million dollars is left in utter neglect while it could easily be converted into a rehabilitation centre. The establishment of such a centre would enable the development of a whole area.

We can only hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will consider these few remarks or suggestions, and you can rest assured that I will heartily co-operate in any endeavour leading to a just society.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my first words are to join with other hon. members in extending congratulations to you, who we hope will be our permanent Speaker, and to join with those who have extended congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply.

In rising to take part in this debate I have no desire to burden hon. members with further criticisms of the speech from the throne. I believe the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) dealt with it adequately. He dealt with its shortcomings as did other hon. members. Suffice it to say it was a flatulent restatement of things already done, a poor statement of policy for a just society, and a great disappointment to the people of Canada who expected much more from this new government.

It was only exceeded by the Prime Minister's vain attempt in his speech in this debate to try to explain it. If these speeches, the speech from the throne and the Prime Minister's speech, are to be our first full measure of what the just society is, then we can only pray for its demise.

There is only one more observation I should like to make before I leave the subject of the speech from the throne. I have in mind the fact that this is the first time in the history of our country a Canadian government has been forced to apologize in advance for its failures. Usually they have been able to wait two, three or even four years before explaining or attempting to alibi their legislative and administrative shortcomings. Great expectations have already dwindled to puny expectations.

I would be happy to let the speech from the throne quietly die, were it not for a phrase that runs through it like a refrain—its only distinguishing aspect. That phrase is the one we have heard much of since this debate started. I refer to the much heralded "just society". I find this choice of words by the Prime Minister to describe his new Canada disappointing to the people who look for a bold new approach to government by a government that was to fire the imagination of young Canada.

I find it offensive when I think of my native province, and when I think of my constituents in this context. It is a hollow mockery of the phrase "the just society" when there are Canadians in this country today living in socially and economically unjust conditions, aggravated, if not indeed produced, by the past neglect and the very indifference of the people who now join in the alleluiah chorus and talk about the just society.

In my opinion no political party and no Canadian government carries a greater share of responsibility for the social and economic injustice so prevalent in this country today than does the Liberal party and the government of this country. Ask the people of Atlantic Canada. Ask the people of Newfoundland. Ask the people of my city, my constituency. Ask the 6,500 Canadians who still live without hope and in despair in the mining town of Bell Island. This industrial community, the oldest in Newfoundland and one of the oldest in eastern Canada, was the scene of an iron ore mining operation carried on successfully since the turn of the century. These operations were curtailed in 1963 by A. V. Roe, placing out of work over 1,400 people, their dependants, and those who worked in service industries.

At that time these people looked for justice to the new government of that day. At that time it was not the just society; it was the war on poverty. Well, we still have the injustices of poverty in this country. After the war on poverty we now have the just society. The people of Newfoundland did not buy it. They defeated six Liberal candidates who sat in this last parliament because they know it is too late to try to excuse the neglect of the past five years with empty catch phrases. The people of Bell Island today live in despair. They live without hope. They live under the cruel soul shattering, morale destroying, welfare which is today their lot. They are not permitted to work. They are not permitted to retain their pride by working for a living, because under the provisions of the Canada Assistance Act which grants funds to the provinces for relief purposes they are not permitted to work for their welfare. Our people want work and they want to hold their heads up and work for what is just and rightly theirs.

For too long, Mr. Speaker, the government of this country has been content to close its eyes to the urgent social and economic problems and needs of the Atlantic provinces. For too long the government has been content to close its eyes to the serious problems facing Canada's tenth province. The government has been content to sit silently in this house and allow Newfoundland to remain the sealed off personal fief of Joey Smallwood, in return for a solid seven Liberal members and supporters.

Times have changed and our people want a better deal. The man who likes to refer to himself as the only living father of confederation is tottering on his throne. The people of my province have rebelled against 20 years of neglect and injustice. Mark my words, they want their place in this just society. They feel they are entitled to a place in this just society, if there is to be one. They looked with hope in 1949 for a just society that never materialized.

I could find no such reference in the Prime Minister's book "Federalism and the French Canadians". I should like to read from page 68, so you can see if there is something missing from my concept of what this phrase means:

> —the continued complaints of the maritimes finally won them preferential treatment in 1932—

He writes about preferential treatment for the maritimes in 1932, but this is the key phrase:

> —and last, in 1949, Newfoundland made the federal government pay dearly for its entry into confederation.

This is what the Prime Minister wrote. But if this is the just society that we are to expect from this new administration, then the people of Atlantic Canada, certainly the people of my province, want no part of it.

Is it a just society that would allow the Shaheen deal to go through? I refer to the deal concluded by the Newfoundland government with the Shaheen group whereby the government of Newfoundland has deprived the people of Newfoundland from their birthright. That government has made it possible for this New York financier to buy up for a mere $2,000 the entire untaxed profits earned over a 15 year period of a provincial crown corporation.

Who is to speak for the people of Newfoundland in this just society? This financier has accomplished this fantastic deal without risking one penny of his own. The deal has been called many things, two cabinet ministers resigned from the Newfoundland government because of it, and the throne man of Newfoundland is tottering because of this and other abuses. Suffice it to say this is a monument to the folly of unchallenged Liberal power in Newfoundland and is a gross perversion of the intent of crown corporation legislation.

What will the federal government do about this situation? What about the new minister from Newfoundland, whom I congratulate on his appointment to the cabinet—what will he do? The people of Newfoundland look to him for a fair measure and share of the justice we have heard so much about.

In any event the people of my province have been cheated in such a blatant fashion there is a moral obligation on the government of Canada to do something about these things. The people of my province are justly concerned about the abuses that are still carried out in the name of government. The only real evidence we have seen of the just society, if indeed one can continue to term it such, has been the cancellation of programs by this government. In the midst of the fishing season the salt rebate program was cancelled, without even any suggestion of what is to replace it. This has caused hardship to hundreds, yes, even thousands of Newfoundland and maritime fishermen who depend upon this salt rebate as a means of increasing their already meager earnings.

We have seen the evidence following the cancellation of the winter works program. This will result in great hardships to the cities of the Atlantic provinces, indeed to the cities of Canada, but especially to the cities and municipalities in my province which already suffer from the highest rate of unemployment in all of Canada. This program was cancelled without even a vague suggestion of a replacement for it.

What reference is there in the speech from the throne to this very serious crisis facing the fishing industry in Newfoundland today? This is an industry from which 150,000 Canadians directly or indirectly derive their livelihood, an industry which in economic terms represents almost 3 per cent of the gross national product in this country.

There has been no reference to the serious housing crisis in Canada. We have heard about the minister's task force and we are looking forward to being in Newfoundland when it arrives there. There has been no reference to what this government intends to do about the thousands of Canadians who, because of rising interest rates, are deprived of their rights under the National Housing Act, and the effect on those in lower income brackets.

In my city our people suffer from a lack of adequate housing and from a lack of adequate subsidized housing, and a means to buy such accommodation. Yet no reference is made to housing in the speech from the throne. This is a very serious problem which affects all Canadians but which adversely affects certain areas in Canada more than others. When the people of the maritime provinces suffer because of the inadequacies of a particular federal program it means a real hardship to the people of Newfoundland, a hardship which they are expected to bear, and bear silently.

The people of Newfoundland want justice and want to be treated like other Canadians. If a just society means the end of programs which mean so much to Atlantic Canada and particularly to Newfoundland then we want no more of it. We have lived through the war on poverty but we still have poverty in abundance. We have people who still suffer because of the highest per capita cost of living ever, and the lowest per capita income in all of Canada. Hon. members do not know what poverty is and the Prime Minister does not know what poverty is, but his colleague from Newfoundland knows about it. He has seen it on the south coast of his constituency. My colleagues from Newfoundland know what poverty is; they have seen it in every bay and inlet in the province. My colleagues from New Brunswick know what it is; they have seen it in the northern part of that province. Poverty is a real thing, not something you can legislate by trite phrases. It is something that has to be tackled with concrete programs.

One of the real inadequacies of our federal system results from the fact that the implementation of national programs does not give due regard to the peculiar and special economic circumstances of the different regions of the country. The National Housing Act, as it now exists, is fine for the people of urban Ontario, but for the people of Newfoundland and certain other parts of the maritime provinces it means they must be content to remain outside the pale; they must be content to keep their large families in substandard housing and to go without the things they see others having in abundance.

We want justice. If there is to be a just society, we want to take part in it. We want to see an end to the pork-barrel system of politics that we in the province of Newfoundland have suffered from for 20 years, and which we now see evidenced as the first and only step this government seems able to take with any degree of assuredness.

We want to participate in the Canadian life. Our people want adequate housing. They want a fair return for their labours. They want jobs. They do not want to suffer the morally crippling effects of welfare. They want to be able to hold up their heads and earn an honest living like other citizens of Canada. I am sure my colleagues from Newfoundland, as they talk about the fisheries crisis which we have, as they talk about the failure of the Liberal government to live up to its promise to implement the 12-mile fishing limit of 1963, as they talk of hardships imposed upon our people because of the National Housing Act as it is now constituted, will re-echo my words. They will re-echo my words when they talk with feeling and experience of the real poverty that exists in this country and the crippling effects of this poverty, on the young especially. They will say, as I say now, that if there is to be a just society, let it come quickly because we want to be a part of it.

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am pleased to join with those who spoke before me to congratulate you for the trust put in you by parliament, a trust which, everyone agrees, you deserve to the highest degree. All hon. members can testify to that in this house.

I wish also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand). It is interesting to note the particular characteristics of those two young members.

The first one, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria, symbolises for us that race of hardy pioneers, the Acadians. In hardship as in the struggle for survival, they always showed tenacity, courage, pride and efficiency and that is an example for all the citizens of our great country.

The second one, member of the great Amerindian family, represents a proud group also, a group which only asks to be allowed to live and progress on the vast territory of Canada. Both, their presence and their influence, make us understand the prodigious mosaic of the peoples who work together towards the development and improvement of our country.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the great hopes set by the Canadian people as a whole on the new team, the new cabinet which now governs our country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) especially deserves the admiration of the Canadian community. We believe he is one of the most cultured Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to address myself to you once again. I am proud to represent again, in this house, my constituents of Rimouski.

During these last few minutes, Mr. Speaker, I intend first to express to you my humble feelings about the contents of the Speech from the Throne and to deal briefly with a few problems of rather regional concern but also, in actual fact, interregional in scope.

We all remember the platform outlined by the Liberal party during the last election. Based on the fundamental principle of a just society, that platform indicated the measures to be taken in order to achieve four basic objectives: the Canadian unity, the just society, a booming economy and the efficient and reasonable role of Canada in the world.

A perusal of the Speech from the Throne shows us that the government, at the very start of its term, applies faithfully its platform which is for us a source of satisfaction. I know that our colleagues in the opposition behave like disappointed men.

We know that the Canadian people want action, efficiency, results and that the efficiency is always evidenced by tangible results. To act, a program is necessary, planning is required. The Speech from the Throne is a program, it is a supplement to the platform of the Liberal party, of the government.

The Speech from the Throne deals with problems which will be the object of our efforts in order to find solutions. We do not doubt that this session, which is at its very beginning, will see at work an active and dynamic government. The projects which the present government intends to present and put into effect during the session will certainly continue to take shape. It must be admitted that the government takes care not to make nice promises, merely election promises, to the Canadian people.

The Speech from the Throne, in our view, truly reflects the principles and statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister during the last election. Drawn up in a spirit of restraint, it takes into account in a constructive, objective and practical way, the social and economic problems of our country. We must first be pleased by the fact that it provides for the improvement and modernization of parliamentary procedure and this will allow the hon. members—the representatives of the people—to discuss freely but rationally the legislation introduced during the last session.

For example, during the last session, several bills remained outstanding because of the chronic slowness with which the house dispatches its business. It is easy to understand why the present government must bring up again some of its bills which are important and assential to the evolution of the country.

Moreover, one can only congratulate the government on undertaking, after dealing with these essential matters, its program intended to provide the conditions necessary for the materialization of the just society of which the Prime Minister has spoken so much, and rightly. It is also not only normal but necessary that the government, having considered all aspects of the building of a just society, should establish a priority list before setting to work. Hon. members have already seen that one of the priority items is the unity of the country, and that constitutional reforms will naturally have to be suggested in order to ensure this unity. Whatever some people may say, it is clear that the government will continue to intensify the war against poverty by asking for close co-operation at all levels of government. We can therefore hope to see a greater co-ordination which will ensure the implementation of the measures taken in this respect.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski).]

We all recognize that a great step forward was taken lately as far as respect for the languages of our two main ethnical groups is concerned. The government has announced that measures will be taken in order to make sure that every citizen will be able to use his own language when dealing with any federal government agency or service.

The Speech from the Throne also refers to problems affecting Canadians in their private life, as for example regional disparities and urban development. The Economic Council of Canada recently advised that the social policy of the government should be entirely re-examined. Both regional disparities and war against poverty are, among other problems, very complex matters, as shown by world history.

It is therefore normal for the government to proceed with caution instead of resorting to hasty solutions, and we understand that. Each component of the Speech from the Throne is a reminder of the over-all picture suggested by the Prime Minister during the last election. Not only is he urging government members to action but also, it seems to me, opposition members.

Along with the majority of people who voted for this, we welcome the Speech from the Throne heartfully and we anticipate at the beginning of this session an era of dynamic evolution for the Canadian people who are proud to follow such a leader as the right hon. Prime Minister. Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would be greatly interested, as I mentioned at the beginning, in touching on a few regional problems, bearing in mind inter-regional interests which are part of the Canadian policy.

I am particularly interested in the regional development policy of this government, as I was in that of the previous governments, because everyone knows that the constituency of Rimouski is part of the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé regions which have been labelled as a "pilot territory".

During the election campaign, I had the opportunity to mention different facts and ideas about these regional development projects in our region. I did not mention the name or the title ARDA; neither did I mention the title BAEQ (Eastern Quebec Development Board). The reason for this is that I was under the impression those names or designations had become somewhat taboo among people in general. People in our region, as every Canadian knows, are eager for results. They are industrious people, people who want some action. That is why we are sometimes inclined to forget that surveys are necessary. It is obvious, however, that they must not last too long.

That is why, during the election campaign, I limited myself to speaking about our five-year program. Instead of speaking of planning, I merely spoke of our five-year program while thinking of the government program administered by our Liberal party. Like all the members, I was not ashamed to speak about it as our program, because out of $260 million to be spent in the implementation of this five-year program, $212 million will be paid out by the federal government. We had the pleasure, towards the end of April, of welcoming the present Prime Minister of Canada who came to our riding to preside over the historical signing of the agreement the premier of Quebec on behalf of the provincial government, and by the then Minister of Forestry and Rural Development for the federal government.

The program which will be implemented as the result of this agreement, interests us to the highest degree. That is why the people back home live in hope and look with confidence towards the Ottawa government.

This program is divided into eight points. To sum it up quickly, it is related first to the development, the reorganization of agriculture in our area. It also relates to the rational redevelopment of our forests as a whole, our fishing industries and to the tourist industry. It also concerns the review of wages paid to manpower in urban development, in transport, which are of prime importance in this part of Canada. This program should also provide an incentive for scientific research which is of the highest importance for the economic development of an area or a country.

Our people are mostly concerned with the role played by Ottawa, by the government of Canada, in the implementation of this program.

In view of the responsibility that the federal government assumed when it decided to spend $212 million for the implementation of that program and the rational redevelopment of our region, we all know that it is of the utmost importance that the federal government should exercise very close and adequate supervision.

It is obvious that, on account of our constitution, the implementation of that program is first of all the concern of ARDA-Quebec. But, on the other hand, everyone agrees that the part played by the provincial officials in the implementation of those objectives should be supervised, not because we lack confidence in them, their work, their research and their realizations but because we fear that their scientific or intellectual or theoretical interest in the study of those projects might lead them to forget that we expect results as quickly as possible. That is the area where our people hope that the federal government, with the Prime Minister of Canada, will play a prominent part.

One aspect of this program in particular attracts our attention, the problem of farmers. Because of the movement of rural people towards the cities—which seems to be at a point of no return,—a movement which is not particular to Canada but is worldwide—our farmers are very anxious and wonder how they will be able to earn a reasonable enough yearly income with the present evolution of our social and economic order.

I would like to draw the attention of the house and the government on two points in particular. Our farmers are specializing in the dairy industry. They have problems of quotas about which we heard so often in recent years. This quota policy is improving every day thanks to the interest taken in that matter by our governments and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). On the other hand, since the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé area, which is anxious to live in keeping with the Canadian development, has been selected, as I said earlier, as a special development area, the farmers would like the hon. Minister of Agriculture and the Canadian Dairy Commission, to pay a special attention to the allocation of quotas in their area.

If, because of the present legislative structures concerning those quotas, it is impossible to prevent, so to speak, the abandoned quotas from leaving the area, would it not be possible to take a special measure so that the farmer of a pilot area may get an additional quota, so that he too could play his own part in the rationalization of our own dairy industry, our farmers' specialty.

In the program implementing the federal-provincial agreement which followed the report submitted by the Eastern Quebec Development Board, there is a point concerning cattle breeding. In our area, we are not trying to compete madly with anyone; we simply want to keep what we have and to develop it. It would seem that, in our areas, a certain specialization might be developed, even if not on a very large scale, at least on a reasonable scale, and cattle breeding would be that specialization.

For two years, we have been taking steps to develop and promote that business at home that new farm industry, if one may put it so. We encountered many difficulties. In conjunction with the further steps that I shall certainly take in favour of our people at home, I ask in particular the Minister of Agriculture to pay special attention to that problem in order to help us solve it and encourage our farmers to practise breeding rationally, for the good of our area and in the interest of interregional co-operation for which our country is renowned.

Before concluding my remarks, I wish to emphasize the problem of transportation. The district where we live is located in the eastern part of the province of Quebec, and we have air and sea transportation.

Back home, air transportation is operated by a private company. In accordance with the policy and the philosophy of the responsible members in this house which encourages private enterprise, co-operation should exist between private enterprise and government agencies. It seems to us that federal agencies which are also carrying out studies on transportation should give a special attention to private transportation in the province of Quebec, especially in our region. The Crown corporation which ensures transportation in our country is the pride of all Canadians. But we cannot understand that this air company should sometimes enter into very close competition with certain private and responsible companies working for the rational development of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you for having given me once more the opportunity of speaking in this house. I believe that when reading over the last Speech from the Throne, in the light of the small problems I have just raised and for which we hope a solution will be found as soon as possible, the people of our areas, particularly those of my own district, will be proud to belong to Canada. I feel confident that this difficult problem of regional disparities so often referred to in the Speech from the Throne will gradually disappear. Within a few months, we shall all find that our efforts and our work will have brought results and we shall be even more proud to live in Canada in unity, justice and prosperity.

[English]

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, as I look around this chamber I find that things have changed a great deal since the last time I had occasion to address the house. They have certainly changed, but I must add quickly that they have not changed for the better. I am reassured, however, by the sight of one familiar figure, and that is the presence in the Speaker's chair of Your Honour. I can think of no more auspicious opening for a new parliament than Your Honour's elevation to this high and important office, and I take this opportunity of offering my congratulations.

It is traditional, too, to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I take pleasure in doing that. Having said this, perhaps I may be forgiven if I take the opportunity also of congratulating at least one of the survivors from the twenty seventh parliament. We should all be remiss in our duty if we did not recognize, for instance, the elevation of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), our new Minister of Agriculture. I congratulate him upon having received his reward for services rendered in the past. The farmers of Canada hope that since the minister comes from a farm area he will break a pattern of the past five years of Liberal rule and show some awareness of the plight of Canadian agriculture. While congratulating the new minister I must say that I should have appreciated the courtesy of being informed that he was coming to my riding on two occasions on crop inspection tours. Since both tours took him within one mile of my farm I might have been able to assist him in his look around the country.

It is not heartening for one who represents a rural constituency to note the scant attention paid to agriculture and agricultural problems in the speech from the throne. I hope that the speech was an outline of the government's legislative intentions, that it was not just a public relations gesture and that the new minister has plans and measures to bring forward to amplify in the weeks ahead what is contained in the speech. I trust that he will have more success than did his predecessor in office in convincing his cabinet colleagues that there are still farmers in Canada, that real and pressing problems face them and that there is an urgent need for government action. From my understanding, the speech from the throne gave little reassurance on that score.

For too long the Liberal party has simply refused to admit that an agricultural community exists in Canada. That party has consistently written that community off. They have ignored it. For the past five years they have been content to advance only a token agricultural policy. During the election campaign the Prime Minister pronounced a Liberal agricultural policy. The best that can be said for it is that at least that is something the former leader of the party and the former minister did not achieve. It will be interesting to see whether the policy that was enunciated on the hustings will be carried into government policy. The Pearson government solved the problems of agriculture in its own way: It had no policy. Let us hope that the present administration will not be that short-sighted or arrogant.

Since 1963, I am afraid, the Canadian farmer has become the forgotten man, the expendable man. This I believe is a result of deliberate and calculated Liberal policy, based on the fact that a larger harvest of votes is to be garnered in the urban areas and that larger financial contributions may be expected from eastern industry.

There are, however, one or two points about the Canadian farming community that the Prime Minister and his government will do well to bear in mind. Agriculture earns $1 out of every $8 that is earned by Canadian trade. On the basis of 1965 figures, the latest available, farmers pay about $1 of every $10 paid in income taxes. Disregarding taxes and personal savings, the agricultural community has more than $1.5 billion to spend annually. It spends that money roughly in the proportion of 50 per cent on services, 40 per cent on non-durable goods and 10 per cent on durable goods. These facts surely are of some importance to the rest of Canada.

While it may be true that the farm population and the number of farms have been cut in half over the past 35 years, the actual number of acres devoted to agriculture has increased substantially. The value of all Canadian agricultural products in 1966 approached $3.5 billion. The total capital value of Canadian farms in 1966 was close to $20 billion. Farming, the industry of agriculture, has certainly changed, but only in nature and not in importance. I hope this government will bear some of these facts in mind, since the speech from the throne reflected only a dim awareness of them.

In the speech I noted with particular interest the sentence concluding with the words:

> —intends to investigate immediately a number of methods for promoting greater efficiency in the production and marketing of grains, including the establishment of a national grains council.

I shall deal with the first part of that statement later. At the moment the latter part is of concern to me. In the past Liberal governments have been strong for establishing bodies with high sounding titles and sweeping terms of reference. Unfortunately, once set up those bodies have largely been ignored by the government, particularly when the advice of such bodies or their recommendations happened to be at odds with the party political interests of the moment.

The setting up of a national grains council is a most commendable step. Such a body could be of great assistance to the grain industry and the Canadian economy as a whole, provided it is not used as a niche in which to hide Liberal bagmen or defeated candidates. The grain council will be of little use to anyone if its setting up is mere window dressing, if its recommendations are sidetracked and ignored by the Liberal government, or treated lightly, as have so consistently the reports of the Economic Council of Canada over the past five years.

Another interesting part of the speech from the throne was that part dealing with plans to set up national marketing boards to deal with various types of agricultural produce. This part of the speech has a brave and progressive though not new ring. The carefully chosen wording reveals nothing of the constitutional hurdles and other problems that make the establishment of such boards difficult and long drawn out affairs.

The speech also mentions widening the credit term for farmers, increasing payments for farm stored grain, as well as other measures. In their way all these are necessary and admirable. At best they are palliatives, not cures; stop-gap measures, not lasting remedies. The Canadian agricultural community needs more from this government than gestures and token actions. It needs the assurance of the government's genuine and continuing concern. It wants full recognition and fair treatment. Surely one small corner must have been set aside for agriculture in the great, new just society.

On his inspection tour of Manitoba's sodden grain fields, the new Minister of Agriculture saw no immediate crisis. Actually, the crisis in those agricultural areas began last winter as the result of dropping wheat sales, higher interest rates and other inflationary pressures. By allowing the Farm Improvement Loans Act to lapse the government added to the credit burden which was already made critical by rising costs and farm prices that, in some instances, are lower than they were five years ago.

I have mentioned the favourite slogan coined by the Prime Minister during this last election campaign, the just society. In the light of recent events that phrase has a hollow ring in many parts of Canada. Many people in many areas and not only in western Canada, are aware that under this government, the watchword of which is "the just society," the disastrous strike of the lakehead grain handlers was allowed to fester throughout the summer until the entire Canadian economy was infected. It was cruelly ironic to launch the just society in such an atmosphere of flagrant economic injustice.

In the light of these events, one may wonder about the professed concern of this government for regional disparities, and about their professed devotion to balanced national economic growth and development. By now we are all well aware of the Prime Minister's reluctance to intervene in labour disputes. The effects of the postal strike are still with us. One would think that the chief architect of the just society would have welcomed an opportunity such as that offered by the lakehead strike to bring justice to a great majority of Canadians who were intimately affected by the strike, but unable themselves to do anything about it. It is true that this particular strike has been settled. But why only at the 11th hour? Why was it not settled before the maximum damage had been done? Settled it was, eventually, but at what cost to the west? At what cost to Canada?

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), according to his own accounts and those of a friendly press gallery, emerged as the tough, no-nonsense hero of the settlement. This may be true. But what farmers in the west are asking, what the merchants of the west are asking, what all the thousands upon thousands of Canadians who depend for their livelihood upon the grain trade between the lakehead and eastern ports are asking, and perhaps most important of all, what Canada's foreign wheat customers are asking, is: Where was the minister, where was the government of Canada, during the long, hot, strike-ridden summer?

[Mr. Muir (Lisgar).]

It was only last June that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) set as his goal the sale of 1,300,000,000 bushels of wheat over the next three years. I wonder whether, when he made that statement, he knew anything of conditions prevailing in the world wheat market.

I would like to recall to members some of the salient facts of the international wheat picture and Canada's place in it. At the same time I should like to point out that 60 per cent of prairie residents depend directly or indirectly upon the harvesting and sale of our grain crops and that it is a well known fact that wheat sales and prosperity go hand in hand on the prairies.

At the end of the crop year on July 31, there were 665 millions of bushels of wheat in storage. There were a further 247 million bushels of wheat still on the farms. Piling up behind this mountain of grain is a crop estimated in mid-August by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics at 649 million bushels. Since that time, private estimates have reduced this estimate to around 580 or 590 million bushels. But that is still a considerable amount of new wheat.

The storing and shipment problems have been vastly complicated by the strike at the lakehead. At its end there were an estimated 11,000 freight cars of wheat waiting to unload at the twin ports. Frost and excessive moisture have damaged the crop and made it certain that there will be a wider than normal variety of grades to be handled, not to mention problems of drying, and other problems which have to do with poor grades of wheat. Latest figures show that wheat and flour exports for the first 11 months of the last crop year were down 40 per cent from the year before—16 per cent below the ten-year average, at 291.8 million as compared to 479.3 million bushels. Sales to Russia and China are down almost 50 per cent. Shipments to Japan are off 30 per cent or more and shipments to India are down by 75 per cent. All this must be faced in conjunction with the faulty operation of the new international grains agreement and a changing and increasingly tough sales picture abroad.

The international grains agreement minimum price schedule of $1.95½ to $2.38 is up 21 cents a bushel from the old international wheat agreement. But Canada cannot get that price for her wheat in today's market. So far we have stood firm at that price, but sales have dropped off and our co-signers of the I.G.A. are either already price cutting or contemplating such action. We are tied to the

I.G.A., and it is faltering and in danger. A price war is a very real prospect. France and Australia have been accused of cutting the minimum price by the device of manipulating grading. The United States has so far stuck to its bargain with Canada under I.G.A. but is faced with a huge wheat surplus and a promise by the Secretary of Agriculture that this year's sales target is the same as last year's—750,000,000 bushels—and that he intends to sell it by hook or by crook. The United States incidentally was the only one of the four large exporters to increase shipments last crop year.

On top of all this, the customers are changing, buying patterns are changing, demands are changing. In July, Prime Minister Gandhi announced that India's aim was to abolish wheat imports by 1971. France has stolen a large part of the Japanese trade and there is a rumour she did so by pricing as much as 18 cents below the minimum. Traditional European customers have developed their own agriculture and changed tastes and buying patterns. There is a revolutionary change in the traditional wheat picture. Nothing short of revolutionary new thinking will serve this government in approaching the problem.

The too-often ignored Economic Council of Canada in its 5th annual report recently said wheat yields in Canada are low, and falling behind other countries. It noted that wheat and other cereal crops received an unduly small share of research funds and efforts. The United States puts out twice the research effort per million acres of wheat that Canada does. Until the war, every country but France showed lower per acre yields than Canada. Today, all but Australia have caught up to us, or even surpassed us.

Canada dropped from 20th to 28th place since the war among wheat producing nations in terms of yield per acre. Cereal crops account for about 25 per cent of Canada's total cash crop; fruit and vegetables for about 10 per cent. Yet about twice as much research effort is expended upon fruit and vegetables as upon cereal crops. The western farmer has demonstrated his willingness and ability to produce. What he needs is assistance through research and in marketing. Yields per acre must go up, variety to meet changing demands must be studied, selling techniques must be brought into the modern international setting. Individual farmers cannot do these things for themselves. Government must act to help them, or the whole nation will suffer. We have been too timid or too complacent in our approach to selling. This has become more pronounced in recent years. In 1957, faced with a record 904 million bushels of wheat, the Conservative government boldly broke this narrow selling technique. They took the unprecedented step of backing our foreign sales campaign with the use of government credits. It was criticized. It was deplored. But it was necessary—and it worked. Today it is all we really have to sell with.

The wheat was sold in quantity then. The wheat was moved. True, the western farmer benefitted greatly, but then so did the whole of Canada. Selling was so brisk that by 1962-63 the Wheat Board was forced to slow down in order to maintain an adequate minimum surplus.

The former minister of agriculture used to say that the Liberals sold more wheat in recent years than the Conservatives ever did. He neglected to say, however, that it was sold under pioneering sales techniques and credit arrangements instituted by the former Conservative government. A lot of it was merely delivery of wheat already sold in the early 'sixties. In the 1962-63 crop year, Canadian wheat sales under the I.W.A.—exclusive of sales to communist nations—had reached 41 per cent of the export trade as compared to 23 per cent in the United States. Last year in the United States this proportion had risen to 43 per cent. In Canada it dropped to 27 per cent. All the devices to which Liberal governments have resorted in recent years, including the guaranteed floor price, which did not in itself sell any wheat, will be of little use if the wheat remains unsold.

This is where bold, new action is most needed. We have to move the wheat and we must sell it. We need new determination, new methods, new efforts, and I hope we have new ministers who will make new efforts. But this appears to be unlikely, in the face of the traditional Liberal apathy toward things agricultural. Under them the agricultural community has had no priority and, so far as I can see, it has none today. They talk about regional equality and economic justice but this seems to apply only to those areas that consistently return Liberal members to parliament. Certainly the maritime provinces and the prairies have had short shrift from Liberal governments up to the present day.

There is another area of agriculture, Mr. Speaker, that has suffered as much recently from government action as from government apathy. It is a comparatively new industry and one that is vital to my riding of Lisgar. The oil seed industry has been hard hit in recent months by the free flow of cheaper foreign material into Canada. I am one who feels the Canadian farmer was sacrificed to industry in the recent Kennedy round negotiations at Geneva, and was used to buy preference for manufacturing in the agreement subsequently signed by our government. Consider only the plight of the oil seed growers I am talking about.

On September 3 the Altona, Manitoba, crushing plant told its sunflower seed growers that the price of sunflower seed oil had not improved since last May, that it had remained at about nine cents per pound as compared with the average price of about 14½ cents over the last ten years. The blame for this condition was placed squarely on the cheap free flow of sunflower seed oil into Canada from eastern European growers, mainly the U.S.S.R. and its satellites.

The report stated that a brief, which was supported by many seed crushing plants and by the rapeseed Growers Association, sent to the federal government had offered the full co-operation of the vegetable oil industry in working out the pressing problems of the industry. To quote the report:

> To my knowledge the industry has received no response from the government as to their intentions regarding our requests.

Here again is glaring proof of the government's indifference to the problems plaguing various sectors of the agricultural industry.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of the house to a question of particular importance to my area, although I believe it to be equally important to the province of Manitoba and to the country as a whole. I mention it because I received a faint glimmer of hope from the reference in the speech from the throne to the government's concern about the threat of growing pollution of our water supplies.

The question I refer to is known as the Pembina river basin development. It is an imaginative, necessary and quite practical plan to ensure industrial and agricultural expansion, and economic prosperity for a large tract of land both within Canada and across the border in the United States. The Pembina river system lies in the extreme south of Manitoba and includes territory across the border in North Dakota. For this reason, when the idea was first advanced it was passed as a reference to the International Joint Commission for an opinion. That was done back in 1962. By 1965 public hearings were held in the area by the International Joint Commission, and on October 6, 1967 that body reported favourably upon the development scheme to the Canadian and United States governments.

To Manitoba, as to any other region, water is vital. It becomes more so as the population increases, and as industrial and agricultural development increases. Manitoba is abundantly supplied with water, but unfortunately a great deal of the supply is in the more remote and inaccessible northern part. This makes the control and conservation of water available in other regions, particularly in the south, a matter of utmost urgency. This is even more urgent when those areas are the ones containing the maximum population, and industrial and agricultural potential. Such an area is the Pembina river district.

The great problem, one that increases as development increases, is that the natural supply varies widely in rate and volume with the seasons, and over a cycle of years. Left in its natural state the water supply of southern Manitoba varies from over abundance in the spring to near drought in fall and winter. Over a period of years the area may experience, unpredictably, abnormal supplies of water or practically none at all.

This makes it essential to take steps to ensure a steadier, more reliable year-round supply, year in and year out, from our natural water resources. As with all resources, the key is control and conservation. It is no exaggeration to say that water is the life blood of this important segment of the Canadian economy. Without it agriculture might struggle along on a hit or miss basis. No industry would be developed. The population would progressively dwindle as young men and women were driven elsewhere in search of work, and what could be a rich, flourishing and valuable part of the Canadian economy and of Canada's social fabric would be lost.

When the matter was referred to the International Joint Commission it was asked to look into and recommend on three points, domestic water supply and sanitation, control of floods, and irrigation. In the spring of 1965 the commission reported that they had three plans that were "practicable, economically feasible and of mutual advantage to both countries." These plans were found to be sound on the basis of the three main points that the commission had been asked to consider, supply and sanitation, flood control, and irrigation.

Maurice Western, in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 15, 1965, wrote in part:

> The most urgent needs of the lower basin are protection from floods and, paradoxically, the provision of an adequate water supply for urban, industrial and agricultural purposes.

The International Joint Commission study, on which public hearings were held in June, 1965 said in one passage:

> If conditions are left as they are, the population of the basin can be expected to continue to gradually decrease . . . lack of dependable water supplies has retarded both industrial and urban growth.

I have used these quotations to emphasize a point because it is the most important point about this development, one that has entirely escaped the minister responsible in the federal government, or perhaps been deliberately avoided by him. The point is that the Pembina development is not primarily designed as an irrigation measure or as a measure to help agriculture alone. It is a measure to stimulate industrial and social development for a very large area, an area whose potential could only bring great benefits far beyond its own region and even far beyond the province.

The complaint of the people of the region, and my chief complaint today, is that this project, already studied exhaustively, and approved by a body representing two national governments, has been callously pigeonholed by a new minister without even the courtesy of a full explanation. In Winnipeg recently the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) dismissed the whole Pembina river development as "a low priority" plan whose chief value lay purely in its role as an irrigation work.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member since his time has expired, unless he has the leave of the house to continue beyond that time. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Pembina development has been assigned the same low priority by the government as has Canadian agriculture and the Canadian west. In the interests of justice, of economic self-interest and of national development, I urge the government, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) in particular, to take another look at this international development project, and to look at it in its full implications, not simply from one narrow point of view. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that my people may hope for some crumbs of justice from the so-called just society.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to join with those who have preceded me in extending to you, sir, something more than merely a perfunctory congratulation on your re-election to the high office as Speaker of this house. During my comparatively short experience here I have come to appreciate the dignity, the capacity and the ability with which you have discharged the duties of your very high office. At the same time I wish to extend to Mr. Deputy Speaker my congratulations on his appointment, and to wish him well. He is comparatively young in office and I am confident that he will improve with age. I think we can expect also that he will preside over the proceedings of this assembly with dignity.

I should like also to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both gentlemen have discharged with eloquence the role assigned them in this traditional debate. This speaks well of their ability to perform the duties they will be called upon to perform as members of the house.

In the relatively short time at my disposal as succinctly and as clearly as I can I should like to place before the government and before the house the economic conditions of the Atlantic area today, and of course with particular reference to the economic conditions as we find them in my province. I do this in the hope that the government will act just as quickly as is humanly possible to correct the regional disparity which now exists between this area and the rest of Canada.

We in the Atlantic provinces of course wish to make the fullest possible contribution to Canada's development, but we also want to participate in that development. As the Economic Council of Canada so very correctly pointed out just a short time ago, the ultimate purpose of our economic and social goals must be to provide all Canadians with access to a higher material standard of living and a higher quality of life. That is the recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada.

Therefore I say it is most important to recognize that if all Canadians are to share in higher living standards there must be a strong and stable over-all growth. Nothing else will satisfy. In the past six or seven years there has been a sustained economic growth in Canada as a whole. I believe it can be correctly stated that the economy of Canada has been expanding over the last five or six years without too many reversals. But that has not been the case in the Atlantic provinces.

I should like to take this opportunity to place on the record some very tangible proof that our economy is not expanding in ratio with the expansion taking place all across this country. First of all, if we look at total personal income, we find that in Canada as a whole between the years 1961 and 1966 personal income increased by 50.3 per cent. That is an increase of 50.3 per cent in Canada as a whole. In the Atlantic region however this increase was only 42.7 per cent, almost 8 per cent less than the national average.

In 1966 the personal income in the Atlantic provinces averaged only $1,480. What was the Canadian average? It was $2,134. In other words, the average personal income in the Atlantic region during that period has been only 69.4 per cent of the Canadian average. I am sure all hon. members of this house will recognize that this is not as it should be.

Perhaps before I begin to become too involved in figures I might be permitted to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McQuaid: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was attempting to point out the economic disparity which exists between the Atlantic provinces and the other areas of Canada. As proof of this disparity I mentioned the difference between the per capita income in the Atlantic area and the rest of Canada. Let me suggest as a very clear example of this that in my own province of Prince Edward Island the average per capita income is only $1,382. That is the second lowest of any province in Canada, and this is only 64.8 per cent of the national average.

Let us look at the unemployment which exists in the Atlantic area as compared with the rest of Canada. Our unemployment rate of 7.9 per cent continues to be excessively high, when compared with the 5.3 per cent in Canada as a whole. This is the situation in spite of one of the greatest periods of expansion in Canadian history. As evidence that our unemployment rate continues to remain unacceptably high, I would point to the fact that in 1965, for example, the unemployment insurance commission paid $52,500,000 in unemployment insurance claims in the Atlantic provinces. Our rate of population growth is also very far behind that of the rest of Canada. Between 1961 and 1966 the population of the Atlantic provinces increased by only 0.8 per cent per year compared with almost 2 per cent per year for Canada as a whole.

Migration from the area has been a major factor in this small regional increase. This migration comes as no surprise, when we consider the per capita income gap between our region and Canada as a whole. When one considers that large gap, there is naturally a tendency to move from the Atlantic provinces in search of better opportunities elsewhere. The maritime provinces have been losing population since before confederation. Since 1881, with the exception of one ten year period between 1931 and 1941, migration has never been less than 75,000 people every ten years. Since 1961 we have been losing more than 20,000 people per year. If this present trend continues we will have lost about 200,000 people between 1961 and 1971.

Migration on this scale must be examined very carefully, because if it continues at this present high rate we may very well have less than the labour force required to produce the goods and services necessary to provide a level of income sufficient to prevent a widening of the present income gap between our people and those in the rest of Canada.

This trend has left us with a comparatively small number of people in what we like to call the productive age group, that group between 18 and 64 years of age. They are the ones who are most likely to be in the labour force and they, of course, are the ones that are most likely to leave when the income is not sufficient to sustain them. About 30 per cent of our total population falls within the less than 15 year age group, and 55 per cent falls within the productive age group, as compared to the Canadian average of 58 per cent.

I think this situation was pointed out very well some years ago in a report known as the Economic History of the Atlantic provinces, from which I should like to quote:

> For years, the movement of population has been out of rather than into the maritime provinces with the result that the population is heavily weighted on the side of the very old and the very young, leaving the number in the now productive age group relatively lower than in other parts of the Dominion; and this, in itself, other things being equal, lowers the average income.

There is one more important implication to this problem of migration so far as the government is concerned. If the number of taxpayers in proportion to the population is relatively low, and it is on this basis that we in the Atlantic area legitimately agree that we are entitled to more help from the central government here in Ottawa, not by way of handouts and not necessarily by the transfer of income to our region but rather through the generation of income within the area. That is what we want, something that will generate income within this area.

I am not particularly knowledgeable about the financial condition of the provinces in the Atlantic region, other than my own, but I do know about the situation in Prince Edward Island. I should like at this time to place on the record some figures which will indicate the serious financial position in which the province of Prince Edward Island finds itself today. We have a population of only 110,000 people, with a per capita income which is the second lowest of any province in Canada. Naturally, therefore, with such a low per capita income our people are not able to contribute to the treasury by way of taxes to the same extent as people living in other provinces in Canada who have higher incomes. However, as citizens of Canada we are entitled to enjoy the same essential services enjoyed by people living in other provinces.

Our provincial government is doing its best to provide these services, but in attempting to do so it has brought the province almost to the brink of bankruptcy. On March 31, 1968 the net debt of the province was $64,490,000, and it is estimated that by March 31, 1969 this debt will be $65,506,000. This is a per capita debt of $595, the highest per capita debt of any province in Canada. This is a province which is not rich in natural resources but is dependant almost entirely on two primary industries, fishing and farming.

In addition to that net debt of $65,506,000 the government has contingency liabilities of $15,500,000 making a total of $81 million or a per capita debt of almost $737. Debt charges alone and this will give an idea of how serious the situation is—amount to $7,817,000 or almost $22,000 per day.

Do hon. members know how much in taxes the taxpayers of Prince Edward Island are able to contribute to the treasury. One member of the provincial government suggested the other day that the saturation point had been reached. This year we will collect through taxes only $14,788,000. It is going to cost $7,800,000 just to pay the interest on what we owe. How are we possibly going to finance the departments of government? This is only a small province, but education alone requires an expenditure of $12 million, health services require the expenditure of $9 million and highway maintenance, capital and other expenditures amount to $9 million. This is only some of the money we must have in order to provide our people, as citizens af this country, with the essential services to which they are entitled.

Something must be done to close this economic gap which now exists between the Atlantic area and other parts of Canada. Some action must be taken by this government immediately. I would make one suggestion as to how we might help close this gap, and to do so would be of tremendous assistance to the province of Prince Edward Island. The government should immediately commence construction of the Northumberland strait crossing. This is something that has been definitely promised to us by the Liberal government, but at the present time there seems to be some uncertainty as to whether the government intends to go ahead with the project. There seems to be something hollow about the statement that the project is to go ahead, something disquieting about the mumblings that there will be delays in starting the project. Let me remind hon. members that this causeway is not a gift to Prince Edward Island. Our gap in communications compared with the rest of Canada needs to be effectively closed, as guaranteed by our entry into confederation.

In 1965, very shortly before the last general election, the then prime minister announced that the causeway would be built. I quote from a newspaper report of July 8, 1965:

> Prime Minister Pearson announced today that tenders will be called later this year for a combined tunnel, bridge and causeway between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Construction is expected to start next April, and Mr. Pearson said at a press conference he hopes it will be completed in late 1970.

That, I suggest, is a definite commitment by the government to go ahead with this project. They immediately sent the then minister of mines, Mr. MacNaught, to New Brunswick, put a hard hat on him, put him on a bulldozer and he turned the first sod. However, Mr.

Speaker, I suggest that he drove the bulldozer too fast, because he turned the first sod that day, and perhaps the last.

Then an election was drawing closer and the government decided they would definitely convince the people of Prince Edward Island that the causeway would be built. They sent to the island a man who was at that time the champion of Prince Edward Island, the man tagged as the best friend the island ever had, the then minister of transport, Mr. Pickersgill. Hon. members will remember him. When he was in opposition he was up and down in his seat like a jack-in-the-box, popping questions to the government as to when they would start construction of the causeway. Perpendicular Jack; he was up more than down. He told the people of the island that the causeway would be started. He said, "My heart bleeds for the people of Prince Edward Island." Wasn't that sad. The poor old fellow must have bled to death, because there was an election that year, the Liberals returned no members from Prince Edward Island and we heard no more from him afterwards.

Then they sent over the then secretary of state for external affairs. I suggest that he made history when he came to the province, because for the first time in a long political career he really gave an answer to a question. Somebody asked him if the government were really going to build the causeway, and he said yes, the causeway would be built. Then we had the election. No Liberal members were returned from Prince Edward Island in the 1965 election, and the causeway was apparently forgotten until we again came close to an election. I have here some statements that I should like to place on the record. I think these statements should convince the members of the government that each and every one of them is committed to the construction of this project.

On October 5, 1967, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) said:

> The strait crossing will become a reality because the Ottawa government is committed to it.

What more concrete statement than that do you want? The then minister of finance, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) said on July 12, 1967:

> What surprises me more than anything is the fact that so many islanders seem to feel that the Northumberland strait crossing will never be built.

He gave the reassurance that the crossing not only would be built but, in his own words, would be built in accordance with the original schedule that was announced, namely that the crossing would be completed by not later than 1970. He told Prince Edward Islanders that face to face, right in their own province.

The then minister of public works said on May 31, 1967, as reported in Hansard at page 779:

> I would like to conclude by reasserting the government's intention to continue with this project. I might add that the causeway approach road on Prince Edward Island will soon be completed, and tenders for construction of a highway interchange at Albany, P.E.I., are expected to be called this summer.

These, I suggest, are very definite commitments on the part of this government to proceed with this great project. Now we have the era of the new society, the just society. This was going to be "it" for sure. Surely now, with a just society, we would get a causeway. They took the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) over, they had a pipe band, the pipers played "Road to the Isles", the Grits cheered, and this was going to be "it"; there would be no delays and we would have the causeway. So far nothing has been done. I think the Prime Minister said this was going to be a jumping parliament. I have not seen much jumping yet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McQuaid: The only jumping I have seen is the Liberals jumping in and out of the pork barrel. I suggest that if they really want to jump, they had better jump on their own band wagon and give the people of Prince Edward Island the promised causeway, so that the economic gap between our province and the rest of Canada can be at least partially closed.

Mr. Smerchanski: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McQuaid: Yes.

Mr. Smerchanski: Is it true that the people employed in the ferry industry between Prince Edward Island and the mainland are not desirous of the causeway because it will put them out of employment?

Mr. McQuaid: They of course represent a very small proportion of the people in the province. We would hope the government would make the same arrangement with respect to these people as they made for the people who were living in the Canso area when the Canso causeway was completed, and that some alternate employment would be provided.

An hon. Member: The hon. member from the west does not know where Canso is.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset congratulate Your Honour on reappointment to your office. May I also offer my congratulations to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) on his new duties. I do not see him in his seat at the moment. I am sorry that my companion member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) is not present, because I very much wanted to say to him that I hope that, with me, he will be able to forward the business of Canada, which I am sure is the main purpose for our being here.

I think it is well that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) went to western Canada recently and looked at the situation which exists there, particularly in southern Manitoba and southern Saskatchewan where we were severely plagued by bad weather during the harvest season. As he quite properly noted, it would be a week or two before we can properly assess the situation. Weather has to take its course, and all of us sincerely hope that we will get the fine weather which is needed to enable these farmers to harvest their crops. As the minister observed, and as I did when I drove through that area, the ground was so wet at that time that one did not see much harvest machinery in operation. I am sure that if these conditions continue, the minister will come to the house with some recommendations on what might be undertaken. However, these are natural factors with which farmers must live. I am sure the minister has learned this during his lifetime, as indeed have I.

What we are concerned with here are the things we can do ourselves and which the government can do to improve farming conditions. We are concerned about the rate of unemployment in the cities and in the countryside; we are concerned about the levels of farm income and about the interest rates which farmers must pay for the loans they must have to continue their operation, just as also do the city dwellers to run their businesses and to build and maintain their houses. We are concerned about grain sales and about prices which affect not only the farmers but also the city dwellers. In short, what we are concerned about is the ability of the individual to survive in the economic jungle of this society and to make a place for himself and a living for his family. It is well that the government is also concerned about it, as was made evident in the following statement from the throne speech:

> My government is deeply concerned to provide and to ensure increased justice, dignity and recognition to the individual, particularly in an age which is characterized by large governments, industrial automation, social regimentation and old-fashioned laws.

I do not know much about old fashioned laws. It seems to me that most of them are old fashioned, because we live in a society which is governed by common law developed through the centuries. However, if we can protect the rights of the individual and if we can enhance the living standards and the quality of life of the individual, this is what we should do. I doubt we can do it, however, by cancelling the winter works program. Very shortly after my election, and before coming to Ottawa for this session I received a number of resolutions from the city of Saskatoon, roughly half of which is in my constituency, and the town of Biggar, which is a small town serving the C.N.R. and the farmers in the surrounding areas. Both of these communities asked that the winter works program be continued and that it be carefully discussed.

As a result of one of those wires, I sought and had a meeting with the mayor of Saskatoon because frankly I felt I needed more information. He explained to me the benefits of the winter works program, especially in relieving unemployment, and the way in which the city and the surrounding communities were able effectively to use it. Very shortly thereafter and before this parliament met—and this may or may not have been significant—the winter works program was cancelled. In the coming winter we will feel the effect of that decision in the communities I mentioned. These communities are carrying a heavy load. The potash industry around Saskatoon is steadily developing, and as it employs a greater number of men it will throw a greater load on the surrounding communities on which it depends for services and for housing for the people who work in that industry. In effect, the city and towns such as Vanscoy, Delisle and Asquith have become the dormitories of the potash industry. These communities must house the people, must educate their children and must provide all the amenities of living required by a fast growing community.

Saskatoon is faced with the installation of a $6 million sewage system to control pollution and to dispose of the wastes of a great city. It seems to me that under these circumstances the government should be moving forward, not backward, in helping such urban communities. As is described by the Economic Council of Canada, these communities must also take care of the manpower surplus which comes from the farms. People are moving away from farms and are swelling our urban centres.

In the last year or 18 months we have been faced with rapidly increasing interest rates which have not only affected the cities and small communities but also our farms. As a result, in the last eight months or so farmers have simply not been able to get farm improvement loans. These loans are essential to the well-being of our farmers because this is the method they have used for keeping and maintaining adequate machinery on their farms. Without such a loans program, farmers will not be able to keep the kind and the number of machines they need to run their farms efficiently. I know because I tried it myself.

Farmers who have gone to banks asking for farm improvement loans have been refused them. They have been told they could have all the money they wanted but had to pay the current interest rate, which may be as high as 7½ or 8 per cent. We were told in the throne speech that some provision will be made to alleviate the situation. However, I hope that as a result of such a provision the interest rates will not be raised and that we will continue the same stable interest rates on farm improvement loans which will enable us to obtain the money we need for farming. The Economic Council of Canada has said that it is essential to expand the farming community by increasing efficiency in production. One of the things which will be needed is easily available capital at rates which the community can afford.

From the information I have received, in a good many instances the story connected with the Farm Credit Corporation is not much better in respect of the amount of money lent than is the case with farm improvement loans. I have received a letter from a farmer in west central Saskatchewan whose son wanted to buy a quarter section of land. He said he approached the Farm Credit Corporation and was told he would have to mortgage two sections of land, including the home quarter and buildings, and as well agree that the son would have use of a complete line of machinery at no cost to him. This man suggested that instead of such a drastic step he would allow the corporation to hold title to one half section, but the offer was flatly refused. As a result a land company, with finances from outside the provinces, bought the land. I am using this man's experience only to illustrate the situation. He stated that this is a common occurrence throughout the prairies. Here a man is asked, in order that his son may buy a quarter section, to mortgage eight quarter sections or put under mortgage the total land assets he has acquired in probably a lifetime of work.

This man's experience is typical of the assistance we are offering farmers. I suggest that if this sort of policy is continued we will fall far short of the increased productivity and efficiency about which the economic council is talking. It is the practice, and it is the tradition of our farm lending agencies to serve the farmer, not to exploit him. When security of this type is sought, it falls little short of exploitation. I hope that when these policies are reviewed we will correct this sort of thing and that we will maintain a stable interest rate. If necessary, I hope we will subsidize the rate of interest.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that there must be priorities. Well, all of us who are mature know that there are always priorities. We live with them every day of our lives on the farm. We paint the house or we buy another machine. We make a choice. In this society, we are going to have to make a choice. If we are going to have enough houses in the city of Saskatoon, and if we are going to have enough machinery on these farms, we shall have to maintain an interest rate that will make these things possible.

The Economic Council of Canada suggests that in the last decade the prices of farm products have increased much less than the prices of other products. I quote from its report:

> With slow growth in demand for farm products, prices of farm products have increased much less than prices of other goods and services over the past two decades. This has meant that the prices of the goods sold by farmers have, on the average, increased less rapidly than the prices of goods purchased by farmers. And this has meant, in turn, that part of the income generating benefits arising from the rapid rate of growth of agricultural productivity have been shifted from the farm sector to other sectors of the economy.

The short term for that situation is the cost-price squeeze. We have been living with it for a long time in the farming community. The situation has to be corrected by applying price supports and by giving other advantages to the farm sector if we are going to have a healthy agricultural economy. There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to continue with the volume of wheat sales we have and the prices we have had in the last year, we will be in serious economic difficulties in western Canada.

This morning one speaker said that farm machinery sales had dropped 30 per cent in one province. This is the first sign of difficulty. This chapter in the report of the Economic Council of Canada from which I have been quoting also focuses on the need for increased research in agriculture. The economic council believes this to be a matter of great importance. It says that the amount of research conducted, especially in the field of cereal grain, has lagged far behind. Certainly, it has. The last time I checked we had one full-time man doing wheat research in the province of Saskatchewan. We put "the wheat province" on our licence plates, but we devote the time of only one man to the task of getting the best varieties that can be grown in our province. As I said, if we are going to measure up in this field, then we have to increase our wheat sales. I note the government has committed itself to wheat sales amounting to 1.3 billion bushels in the next three years. This will be a little better than 400 million bushels of sales per year, which would be about 20 per cent less than the normal production.

If you really want to calculate some priorities, Mr. Speaker, try to calculate them if you are running a wheat farm on a six bushel quota. This really takes some priorities. I wanted to say something about the proposed national grain council. While I do not like to be overly critical about a program that is proposed, because I think we need all the programs we can get to assist us, I did check with two national farm organizations, the National Farmers Union and the head office of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Both of these organizations informed me they had not been consulted about the formation of such a council and had not yet received any invitation to join. I do not place too much emphasis on the fact that an invitation has not been received because the invitations may not yet have been sent out. However, I do consider it important that these organizations have not been consulted. It is almost a tradition by now in western Canada that when we change our approach to wheat marketing or change the marketing structure, we do consult thoroughly with farm organizations. I think it is important. We face some pretty important decisions in western Canada in the field of grain.

The international grains agreement has come under fire or pressure. News reports have been telling us this ever since it was signed. Negotiations were no sooner completed in Geneva when price cutting began. The United States cut prices, and on that account we were in the doldrums all last winter. According to news reports we are still in the same position. Many people are advocating solutions. We are told by all kinds of people to do this, that or the other, whereas we really need a thorough examination of our entire position.

To date we have failed to use effectively the facilities which we have, such as the excellent laboratory facilities of the Board of Grain Commissioners. We could have used those jointly with the Canadian Wheat Board in an effective selling and promotional campaign such as our competitors make use of. We need a more effective staff overseas and we must know to a greater extent what our competitors and purchasers are doing.

Somebody out west told me that we have no agricultural attaché in Moscow. I did not believe this until I came down here and checked into it. One would think that our government would take the step of appointing such an attaché so that we might be informed adequately about the volume of grain production in Russia, about weather conditions, the varieties and qualities of grain being grown, and so on. The Wheat Board has two agencies overseas. I do not want to be too critical, Mr. Speaker, but we ought to have a more effective promotional and selling campaign overseas than we have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gleave: And if the minister needs counsel to tell him that—well, that is up to the government.

We need a more effective research program. In its report the economic council tells us that we are spending in research far and away less than one of our competitors, the United States. I have talked to people in Saskatchewan, at the university and experimental station level, and I have found that the best way to describe our research program is that it is just plainly inadequate. We should correct that situation.

I notice that a news report of September 12, I believe it was, said that grain industry men were to be called to a meeting to give the views of the grain industry. I hope that when those ministers responsible for the grain industry call the leaders of the industry to the meeting they will remember that the farmers are part of that grain industry. The farmer's interests and needs must be taken care of and his voice must be heard.

I conclude with a plea to this government to consider seriously the needs of the farmer and the predicament in which he finds himself. The farms of Canada have an immense productivity; but that productivity has not yet been fully developed. If our productivity is to be fully utilized and if our farm areas are to be fully developed then, surely it will be because it is worth while for people to stay in farming as a vocation and make it a way of life.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour for me today to be called upon to express before this historic house the thoughts, wishes, problems and aspirations of the 67,000 citizens of the riding of Lotbinière, which is not necessarily behind the other ridings, even though, contrary to all the expert predictions, the majority of its people voted for the Ralliement Créditiste. The honour which has been given to me of speaking on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is accompanied by the great joy of being able to sit by the side of a great man who has remained true to himself and who fights sincerely to defend convictions more important to him than any material comfort. I speak of the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I cannot begin this first short speech without greeting the Deputy Speaker and the Deputy chairman of Committees, who will, I am sure, show themselves to be most helpful and understanding fowards a new member such as I.

Finally, I should like to greet all my new colleagues from all parties, to whom I extend my co-operation at any time for the advancement and welfare of our people and democratic institutions.

It is not easy to comment on a Speech from the Throne such as the one now before us, as it compels us to go into deep thoughts the like of which are not found in it.

Mention was made, in the Speech from the Throne, of an elaborate legislation in terms of priorities already established. I should like to say, at this time, that the government should take into consideration the suggestions made by the opposition as regards the establishment of priorities. Otherwise, the situation would be very serious. For one thing, Parliament would lose its meaning. For another, if you consider carefully the Speech from the Throne, you soon realize that almost all the priorities stressed by this government are minor ones and relegate the individual to a place of minor importance.

We are told about 47 bills, but the main point does not lie there, and that is putting the Canadian dollar at the service of human beings. As long as money runs the world and crushes the individual, our society will reek with injustice, dishonesty, crime and despair to those who cannot rest at night without worrying about the next day. And there are hundreds of those people in each one of our ridings.

Since I have become a member of this new parliament, I have become acquainted with the reports of royal commissions of enquiry on banks, on government organization, on taxation, including those of the Economic Council of Canada and more specifically the last one.

If, on the one hand, one goes deeply into those reports, which are based on facts, on consultations, hearings and briefs and, on the other hand, one sees the inhuman means our fellow citizens resort to in order to survive and to live, as a young and new member, one could expect a positive Speech from the Throne, that would dig deep and invite the members of this house to tackle the roots of the real problems.

But what do we see?

We are invited in the Speech from the Throne to legislate on some 47 bills, most of them dealing with interests which are very limited geographically, socially and economically.

Of course the debate now going on can only be superficial—just like the speech itself by the way—since hon. members do not know what the various bills outlined in the Speech from the Throne contain or mean because everything is kept secret. That Speech from the Throne reminds me of a man who wants to give his little family a proper home but whose hopes are soon thwarted because the monetary tool is either missing or too expensive; he must therefore be satisfied to dream and wait, which is what the government is doing. As I said a little earlier, we will be asked to consider 47 bills. But what good will they do? Will a governing principle preside over their drafting?

The Prime Minister, with his dream of a just society, will claim that they will be, but it is undeniable that his economic philosophy is based on conservatism, and not on progress and modernism.

At this point, I now refer to the Speech from the Throne where we can read:

> We have taken and are taking effective strides toward economic conservation through progressively better use of our resources to achieve a high and long-term productivity.

By so doing, this government is advocating a doctrine of non participation in economic life.

There is a constant theme, a leitmotiv as it were, but this perfectly conceived refrain has a strange sound of status quo. And that is distressing.

I thought that a majority government would not be afraid of putting through reforms in depth and advocating a modern and progressive legislative philosophy.

I say this because as a Social Crediter I am convinced that the greatest problem in Canada is to connect fittingly three things: firstly, economic efficiency, secondly, social justice and thirdly, individual freedom.

Now, to achieve economic efficiency, social justice and individual freedom, the present financial institutions and others must be set at the pace of the human being and the community, because, in fact, institutions exist to serve those who want them, that is individuals. Let us not forget that unsuitable institutions, overtaken by technological development will certainly impair economic efficiency, in a context of social justice and individual freedom.

I would like the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to define his just society in unequivocal terms; I would like him to tell this house what he feels it is in reality in relation to people and things, within our Canadian society of 1968. I should like him to show me the exact relation he sees between the 47 bills he proposes and announces in the Speech from the Throne and his just society.

In my opinion, the Speech from the Throne and the bills are one thing and the just society of the hon. Prime Minister is another.

We know full well, Mr. Speaker, that social and political conditions derive from and depend largely upon the economy. When the necessary economic controls are missing or blocked by inadequate or too conservative measures, any social, political or even constitutional legislation, becomes practically impracticable or inapplicable due to the restrictions imposed by the economy.

This is so true that the government recognizes it in the Speech from the Throne where it says:

> In the complexities of modern society, the effective programs take time to develop and more time to implement. At all stages, they require financial and intellectual resources which are not unlimited and must be used with careful planning and the hard judgment of priorities.

Mr. Speaker, the economic, social, and political concepts are closely related and it is most urgent to restore our scale of values. We must give back to the individual the place which is rightly his, in other words we must put the economic concept and the results which follow to the service of the human being.

We must equip ourselves, as soon as possible, with the necessary economic controls so that we may, as administrators and legislators, fulfil our duties in an appropriate manner on the one hand and in conformity with the wishes of the people on the other hand.

Economic controls are a means and not an end, as is still believed by some of us in this house. They are tools provided to adjust, rectify, step up, restrain not the human being but the whole system or the national economic complex. The legislation submitted to us in the Speech from the Throne is silent about all those economic controls. It is rather obsolete, out-of-date, and inefficient. Frankly, I expected a modern, dynamic, balanced and mainly human legislation which would emphasize consumption and the consumer, in our automated world, and I confess that I am very disappointed.

Since in our modern economy machine takes on gradually the duties of man, the economy, directed by administrators and lawmakers, must be more and more man-oriented. In this field, the government must not shirk its prime and vital responsibilities for the welfare of the nation it administers.

For instance, the idea which gave birth to the Bank of Canada is now outmoded and obsolete. In our system of overwhelming capitalism, where the rich get richer at the expense of the poor and where only big financiers can indulge in capitalization, the role of the Bank of Canada has become secondary and we even tend to wonder whether or not it still exists. Its duties are vague, its members are kept in the background, its administration is concealed, its achievements are unknown, and its links with the government of the Canadian nation are illusory.

Yet the Bank of Canada could be one of the most important levers of the economy if only the right decision was taken. But the governments which have followed one another for almost a hundred years have been unable to pull themselves together in order to make such a decision.

Politics must not be the art of making promises but rather the art of doing what is possible. What really matters is policies translated into facts. If the just society is to exist, it will have to be translated into facts, because people judge from facts.

I note that the Speech from the Throne lacks a philosophy of action looking towards the future.

The time for wishes is past; now is the time for determination and concrete action. Governments and parliamentarians should have taken, ages ago, the necessary steps to insure the defence and the promotion of consumers.

The problem of production and of productivity is solved once and for all. Considered in itself, our productivity is unlimited. We are on the wrong track, Mr. Speaker, if we believe the speech from the throne that suggests that the most serious economic problem in Canada is that of production. I declare here, in this house, that the major problem is related to the consumption of products and resources of our country and of other countries. The distribution of resources among consumers: this is the basic problem that is facing us and all Canadians expect us to come up with a fool-proof solution.

That is why several thousands of persons have voted for the Ralliement créditiste during the last election!

The Social credit did not die as some people predicted; it is very much alive and kicking, because people increasingly understand what the problem is.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Something one should never forget and which is at the root of this problem is the fact that income is not equitably apportioned out among the producers, the distributors and the consumers once they are left on their own. The consumers are thus deprived of a large fraction of the assets they had secured in their productive capacity as workers.

The point is therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the first place to protect the consumer from being inevitably taken advantage of on account of his weakness.

I feel really frustrated, as thousands and thousands of Candians do, by the fact that the problem of consuming and distributing our resources, in a fair, non-socialistic way does not appear on the list of bills mentionned in the Speech from the Throne.

I feel the same way about the very serious housing problem which is not even alluded to and which is related to consumption.

According to the Social Credit creed, there must be a constant balance between production and consumption, that is to say that at any moment of economic activities, consumption must reach the same level as production.

To serve man, to serve the citizen, all citizens, Mr. Speaker, regardless of race, color, cultural heritage and language, such must be the governing principle of the entire economy.

Any economic system that fails to attain this end does not accomplish its vital function and therefore deserves to be condemned. In judging the actual economic system, I respectfully ask the members of this house if it accomplishes its end with regard to the human beings, to each of the provinces and to Canada as a whole?

So that we may have prosperity and not poverty in the midst of affluence, it is therefore essential that the mechanism of production, consumption, distribution, be cordinated and interconnected so as to fulfil its end, which is the satisfaction of human needs, in a word the establishment of a just society in fact and not only in theory.

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne explicitly recognizes that poverty still exists in Canada. It repeats thereby the very interesting statement of the fifth annual report of the Economic Council of Canada. But the Speech from the Throne differs from the latter in that it does not suggest any solution.

It is a fact, poverty exists. But shall we be able to meet the challenge?

Mr. Speaker, in order to impart to the people of Canada the knowledge that, in a country like ours, poverty exists in the midst of plenty, an official report of the Economic Council of Canada—the fifth one—has been necessary.

Previously, when the Créditistes urged the government to take immediate steps in order that the needy might receive bread and butter, the party in power always remained deaf and the newspaper did not bring up the subject. Today, faced with the recommendations of the report, several important personalities and leading newspapermen have shown great surprise at the wide-spread poverty here. And yet, Mr. Speaker, this poverty exists, we see it every day in our midst and sometimes in our own families. Many of our politicians have turned a deaf ear when we tried to tell them about it.

Poverty does not occur suddenly. It is the result of a lack of adequate policies on the part of our leaders for a number of years. The way things are going, one can wonder whether it is not almost too late to avert certain misfortunes or catastrophies which befall these poor families. These people have reached the stage where they feel rejected and almost as if they did not belong to our society. For them, poverty is a sort of insufficient access to some goods, services, and way of life available to all others and considered as essential to a decent standard of living.

For the poor, education, labour movements, spokesmen and associations to represent them and express their views, their yearnings, and their needs are things unknown. Why? Because, on account of their condition, they had to stay away from them. Consequently, they retreated into their humble ghettos, where lack of education, illness, want of money, hunger, cold, isolation, fear—and sometimes crime—touched them and left their stigma on each of them.

What was the government doing in all that, Mr. Speaker? As usual it refused to listen to those who tried to advise it. Of course family allowances, pensions, unemployment insurance benefits were being paid. But what was being done to help the poor help themselves to put them in conditions where they could increase their income, to develop their own possibilities, to improve their circumstances through ther own efforts?

The créditistes had remembered the poor, advocating a guaranteed minimum income for every family. The Prime Minister did not invent the minimum income, Mr. Speaker. They also advocated adjusting family allowances according to the cost of living index, a health dividend, adequate purchasing power for the consumers, a basic income tax exemption of $3,000 for unmarried people and $5,000 for married people, a maximum interest rate for finance companies which exploit the people, low rental housing and, in co-operation with the various departments and industry, helping the students find summer employment, a guaranteed minimum price for the products of a family farm to ensure the sale of farm products. Those are constructive measures which we expected to find in the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker. Those are only some of the points of the créditiste program to create a just society, and we hope that the Prime Minister will take note of them.

To remedy the problem of poverty, it is necessary first of all to maintain a high employment level; secondly, to get the people interested and somewhat committed to eliminating poverty; thirdly, to direct policies towards the people who need help and not towards those who dispense patronage; fourthly, to maintain incomes and increase the ability of the poor to participate; fifthly, to make economic use of funds and skills to get the most long lasting results for each dollar spent. Will that challenge ever be met, Mr. Speaker, since it is still possible unfortunately to say today that the rich get richer and the poor get poorer? The just society, if it is to be, must first fill this serious gap and without delay. Will the Créditistes be heard this time with a little more attention? We all hope so, for the fate of millions of those poor people will be at stake.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the house any longer. I should like to thank you, to congratulate you on your election and to offer you my closest co-operation as member for Lotbinière. I hope this speech and the debates to follow will be useful to the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Ray Perrault (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, as I rise for the first time in this house I want to congratulate the mover of the address in reply, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin). The province of New Brunswick has made a remarkable contribution to this nation. The people of New Brunswick have made a contribution totally beyond their numbers within confederation. The province of British Columbia has benefited greatly from the contribution of people from New Brunswick, although I may say that for more than nine years I have been battling one of its more distinguished sons in the legislature of the province of B.C.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the seconder of the address in reply my good friend and colleague the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand). He will be an able member in his own right. The fact that he is a Canadian of Indian origin adds to the richness of this house, to the diversity and representative character of it.

I congratulate you too, Mr. Speaker, on re-election to the office you hold, because your reputation goes before you. Among those who have served in all the democratic assemblies and legislatures of this nation the Speaker of this house has earned an excellent reputation.

My constituency, Mr. Speaker, is made up of two of the most constructive and progressive areas in the country, and I am grateful to them for the support which they gave me in the recent election. I have the privilege of representing several thousand residents of the municipality of Burnaby, which is the second largest urban area in British Columbia, and as well I represent many of the families of North Vancouver.

We are richly endowed with resources in these areas. We have some fine mountains. May I suggest to the government through you, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to improve communications in this country we should schedule a series of federal cabinet meetings from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast so that in the years ahead, the cabinet can meet with every section of this nation, and if the cabinet would like to have a summit conference in North Vancouver on top of one of our mountains we would be glad to play host to it.

There are thousands of families living in my constituency faced with the problems of families throughout the country. They do not have housing. Too many of them are unemployed for certain periods of the year. They need greater assistance to develop their potential. I intend to advocate measures in all these fields during my period of service in this house. I may have difficulty at times in this assembly. Before I left to come to Ottawa they had a going-away party for me at which the chairman said, "Ray, is it going to be difficult, after serving so long in the opposition, finally to be on the government side?"

[Mr. Perrault.]

Here I am. I am with the government in spirit, but my physical location is still in opposition. If I have a conditioned reflex, a Pavlovian reflex, and I am overly critical—and I hope I am not too unfairly critical of the government at times—it may be because of my position in the house.

I congratulate the opposition parties upon their strenuous efforts to attempt to destroy the speech from the throne. I have been in opposition too long to suggest in any way that the rights and prerogatives of an opposition should be curtailed. No party in this country has a monopoly on good ideas. All the parties in this house have made their contribution. Fair and reasonable opposition is necessary if we are to keep our parliamentary system healthy. Anyone who has experience in opposition must be sympathetic with the problems which confront Her Majesty's opposition when they attempt to stand up and be watchdogs of the people. Laurier said:

> I here form part of the people's jury and it is my duty to render a conscientious verdict, regardless of pension or party.

With reference to the speech from the throne the question is, has the verdict been conscientious. I have listened with interest and with some bewilderment to the quality of the opposition which has been advanced during the past few days. The suggestion that this throne speech or any other speech from the throne is supposed to be a complete catalogue of the program of a government is a ludicrous and irresponsible suggestion. This definition of a throne speech is given in "Government of Canada" by Dawson, 1963:

> The throne speech reviews the state of the nation and recites in fairly general terms the program which the cabinet proposed to submit to parliament in the coming session.

May I suggest to the opposition that in the review that was given in the speech from the throne there is a foundation program for the coming four years and a belief on the part of the government that before we can create the base the foundation must be such that we can support social reform and pay for advances in all areas. If we attempt to finance the just society on the basis of the base coinage of our inflation, we are courting disaster. In that sense the speech from the throne has been responsible and meets the test of the traditional message from His Excellency. The speech from the throne provides a direction, it provides a pattern for the future. It can only suggest a limited number of areas where government action is anticipated. But when criticism is directed toward the speech from the throne on the basis that it is not specific enough, perhaps the opposition should be reminded of the unprecedented action of the presenting of 47 bills on the very opening day of the session.

There has been a suggestion that the government is indifferent to the problem of those without shelter. Yet even now a task force is commencing its journey from coast to coast in Canada seeking the opinions of people from all political parties and vocations in an effort to obtain the best ideas in order to have a program at the time of the building season at the beginning of the year.

I was bewildered by the quality of the attack on the speech from the throne launched by the leader of Her Majesty's official opposition. He said, as recorded at page 55 of Hansard:

> Throughout the speech there is evidence of a lack of a sense of proportion, a preoccupation with legalistic matters, an utterly casual approach insensitive toward economic injustice and the blight of poverty in our land.

There have been other speeches from the throne in other forums and not just in our provincial legislatures—and not all in the province of British Columbia. One speech from the throne was delivered in the Nova Scotia house of assembly in 1967, the last year the right hon. gentleman seated to the left of our flanking group was premier of that province. Let me read into the record the kind of defence entered by that right hon. gentleman when his speech from the throne was brought under attack. These are the words recorded in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly, as they are set down at page 107 of the House of Assembly Debates:

> I am sure that any member of the house can present a list of projects which are desirable and important. Any member can stand in his place and say that this should be done and that should be done, but our resources are limited in comparison to the needs to be met, yes, inadequate in comparison to the needs to be met.

I ask hon. members to consider the quality of the opposition by the right hon. gentleman the other day and compare his remarks then with his defence in 1967 in his own legislature when he was endowed with responsibility. Then he continued:

> We are certainly not meeting all of the needs, but we have tried to allocate the resources that are available toward the most pressing needs in an effort to produce the most beneficial results that we can offer our province and its people.

Those words are somewhat reminiscent of some of the language in the speech from the throne we have before us. Has the hon. gentleman's philosophy altered during that intervening time?

We have a similar situation with regard to the members of the New Democratic party. I am familiar with some of them. The attack launched by the members of the New Democratic party in this house was an attack by a group enjoying the luxury of an opposition which has the positive knowledge they will never be called upon to form a government in this Canada of ours. But there was a time when they were empowered with the responsibility of government. I had the privilege and pleasure of attending the convention of the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour the last year the C.C.F. governed the great province of Saskatchewan. We are told in this house that today the New Democratic party believes that through planning we can bring about full employment in this nation; yet I have never in my life heard a more bitter indictment of any government than the indictment in 1962 by the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour of the C.C.F. because of their failure to fight unemployment.

Again vested with power and responsibility these opposition parties demonstrated a different philosophy and a singular lack of success in providing neat, pat solutions to the major problems which beset this nation. This reminds me of a baseball manager I spoke with last summer. His team was in a 13 game losing streak. He said it was very difficult to go to the baseball stadium every night when the fans were yelling down to put in a new pitcher, and asking why someone was not getting a hit or why the team was making so many errors. His comment was that, while up in the stands every fan was a 30 game winner with a batting average of 350, and might never make a field error, one could not coax them down on to the field.

I am glad to note that in this throne speech we are anticipating and contemplating parliamentary reforms which will enable any member of the opposition in this house with a good idea to contribute that idea effectively to the standing committees of the house. Not only that, such a member will be financed in the process. If any ideas exist among members of the opposition, and I am sure that there are many, this government will give the members a chance to put those ideas over.

Some of these 350 hitters will have a chance to get up to bat.

Anyone who listened to the speech from the throne with any degree of detachment heard, first of all, an acceptance of responsibility for the leadership which has been bestowed by the people of Canada on this government. This was not a speech festooned with piecrust promises not possible of fulfilment. We were told we must marshal our intellectual and financial resources and that priorities must be established. We were told that a firm foundation for the future must be established during this first session of the twenty eighth parliament. That foundation is going to include procedural reforms.

We have been told in effect that we cannot run a $12 billion corporation along business lines established in the 1880's, and that is one of the reasons the government advocates parliamentary reform. We have been told that procedural reform is a priority matter because the volume of work to be handled by this house is to be such that improved procedures are imperative.

We have also been told that national unity is a priority and that appropriate action is to be taken to strengthen and improve confederation. We in western Canada have made progress. This is one of the most rapidly growing provinces in Canada and we are as concerned about national unity as we are about economic growth.

British Columbians of all parties love their province and their country, and no one has a monopoly in this respect. Centennial year intensified our love for our nation. We respect the commonwealth and we respect the institutions which the commonwealth represents. The 16 members from British Columbia look upon our presence here, at least in part, as an opportunity to strengthen the bonds of confederation and to play a constructive role in building a new and better future for Canada.

The history of our province and its development since we entered confederation is one of a progressive people who have progressed, not because they have been standing unalterably across the highway blocking progress or by gazing nostalgically into the past refusing to act, but because they believe that times are changing and that the nation is changing. We are prepared to demonstrate that this nation has in that specific province a strong western bastion of confederation. We hope to assist in the intelligent and reasoned consideration of confederation and the constitution, as well as ways to improve both. The vast majority of us want to join every national dialogue about Canada's future because we believe that much of Canada's future lies in this province and in the west.

We have much to offer that dialogue. British Columbia is the fastest growing province in the nation. It is a wealthy province with a great fund of human and physical resources. The settling of our province was accomplished by co-operating, hard-working racially diverse people drawn from every Canadian province and from throughout the world, who came here and together conquered the wilderness. Whether they stepped ashore, or arrived from overland like my ancestors, they were met by individuals like the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo.

In British Columbia we have a diverse racial culture, we are united and we have something to say to the rest of Canada about unity. If we do not understand completely the French-English dialogue perhaps it is because we have been building a future in the most difficult geographical area in Canada. Perhaps we have had insufficient time to ponder this question.

The issue today as far as British Columbians are concerned does not involve French Canada or English Canada but rather an unhyphenated Canada. Our concern cannot be related to the linguistic and cultural future of Canada alone: it involves very much Canada's economic future as well. Without a strong economy, cultural institutions of any kind have little chance of growing and developing.

The province of British Columbia was settled by people of all races, faiths and philosophical tendencies. The first ties binding us to Canada were woven by people coming from Asia. By the thousand they contributed, through their labour and sometimes by sacrificing their life, to the construction of a railway connecting us with the rest of Canada.

These people came from all over the world and from the other provinces, seeking a higher standard of living.

The co-operation of all those groups was necessary to overcome all the obstacles met in the wilderness which was then British Columbia. The citizens of British Columbia are now proud and happy of the progress made.

Some of those who claim that they are speaking for our provinces seem to think that there is an impassable stone wall between British Columbia and the remainder of Canada.

I would like to tell the house, Mr. Chairman, that the record number of Liberal members from British Columbia elected to the Canadian Parliament bears out the fact that the people of British Columbia are no introverts, scowling behind a stone wall.

The great majority of citizens in British Columbia believe in the future of Canada and are ready to strengthen the ties of Confederation and make all necessary adjustments which could be required in the process.

Much has been said about the language rights of the two founding races. Some are afraid of being forced to speak English or obliged to speak French; but in Canada as it is today, and more and more in the Canada of tomorrow, I want my children to be bilingual, indeed I would like them to be able to express themselves in many languages, the more so since they will have to live in a shrinking world, a world in which progress will depend upon the knowledge of other languages, other cultures and other peoples.

[English]

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian of tomorrow should know English, French and as many other languages as he can assimilate. He will be a better Canadian for it and a better world citizen.

If there is a sufficient number of French speaking citizens in any area of Canada who want their children to be educated in French as a primary language, by all means let us grant them that right. At the same time let us encourage them, for the sake of their children, to develop the greatest possible fluency in English as well as in French.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Canadians have everything to lose and nothing to gain by relying on alleged historical, statistical and legalistic precedents to deny their neighbours cultural and linguistic equality. Canada has made more progress in its brief 100 years of existence than any other nation in the world. We have not made all that progress in this brief period of time by opposing change, innovation and reform.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DUMONT—CORRECTION OF NAME IN NEWSPAPER REPORT

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

In a statement published in today's issue of the newspaper Le Devoir, mention is made of a reply to a question by the honourable member for Bellechasse, Bernard Dumont, whereas the representative for Bellechasse is Adrien Lambert. I would therefore ask for a correction of this article which reads as follows:

Crop insurance:

The Honourable Horace Olson, Minister of Agriculture, stated that the federal government would participate in approved crop insurance programs to the extent of 50 per cent of administration costs and 25 per cent of premiums. This was in reply to a question from Mr. Bernard Dumont.

Of course, this should be Mr. Adrien Lambert.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, this question of privilege is not in order.

CONGRATULATIONS TO MEMBER FOR PRINCE ALBERT ON BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Leader of the Opposition will forgive me if I exercise my position as Prime Minister to report on the activities of one of the most select organizations in Canada, the prime ministers' alumni association. This group, Mr. Speaker, has but three living members and they are all very distinguished Canadians; but the House of Commons chapter has but a single member, and I must say that that chapter has never been in better shape.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Its distinguished and very active representative here is known by different names to different peoples—Chief Great Eagle, Chief Walking Buffalo, Chief Many Spotted Horses—and some of us from other tribes call him by other names at other times. But in the House of Commons and to the people of Canada in general he is the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

His unbroken tenure of office in this house, 28 years, is unmatched in length by any other member except the distinguished hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. McIlraith). The contribution of the right hon. gentleman is one of the greatest in Canadian life. Indeed, it has become a legend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: The opportunity I have seized to make this report to the House of Commons is on the occasion of the right hon. gentleman's seventy third birthday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: On behalf of the government, indeed on behalf of all the people of Canada, I want to wish him very many happy returns of the day. I hope I will have occasion for many years, and possibly even my successors will have occasion, to make this annual report.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could offer him a blue flower as an expression of good will from the flower people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all say to the Prime Minister that I wish I found all his statements as agreeable as this report he has made to the house this afternoon. On behalf of the official opposition, the Progressive Conservative party and personally I am delighted to join with the Prime Minister in extending congratulations to our very distinguished colleague the right hon. member for Prince Albert. As members of parliament we are conscious of his great contribution to this chamber, the great part he has played here and the fight he has always made on behalf of the rights and traditions of parliament. His dedication has few parallels in the long history of this parliament of Canada.

Birthday Wishes to Mr. Diefenbaker

I am sure members of the house will understand that my reference today extends beyond the outstanding role of the right hon. gentleman as a House of Commons man. His great imprint here has made an even more enduring mark upon the country he has served in so many capacities, and in particular as prime minister. If I may speak very personally, sir, I know the esteem with which he is held by the people of my part of Canada. As the premier of a province I worked with the right hon. gentleman, and I know how deeply that esteem is deserved.

The right hon. gentleman has won a lasting place in the history of this parliament and the affection of the people of Canada. We have been personal colleagues for many years. It is a great privilege and a great personal pleasure to join other members of this house in extending to him congratulations on his birthday and to wish him many happy returns and many full and active years.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I could not possibly attempt to match the charm and grace with which the Prime Minister introduced this subject. I wish to join him and the Leader of the Opposition in extending our very best wishes to the gentleman on his birthday.

I have not been a member of this house for a very long time, but I had the honour of sitting here when he was prime minister and again when he was leader of the opposition. One could never fail to notice the way in which his very rising from his seat electrified the house, whatever the electricity produced. One could also not fail to note his very great love for this institution and his devotion to parliament as a place of democratic battle. "Battle" I think is the appropriate word.

It is with very great pleasure, sir, that all of us in the New Democratic party wish him many happy returns, and wish him health so he may continue to make his unequalled and incomparable contribution to this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in my own name and on behalf of my colleagues of the Ralliement Créditiste, I am happy to join the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), as well as the acting leader of the New Democratic party to extend my warmest congratulations and my best wishes to the former Prime Minister and former Leader of the Opposition and now hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on his birthday.

I am always surprised to see him so young and so combative, but I have learned to know him especially since I have been in the house and I understand better why he stays so young and so active. Knowing his love for work and politics, it is easier to understand why he remains so young and so able.

In closing, I would like to wish him good health and a long life among us, because his presence is always for us a source of incentive and a cause of increasing wonder.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, nothing can come in one's life to equal the unity of feeling in the House of Commons that from time to time indicates the oneness of this institution. The longer hon. members are in parliament the more they will love this institution. To the young members who have just come in I would say that for the first six months after you are here you will wonder how you got here. Then after that you will wonder how the rest of the members ever got here.

Words fail me to express my appreciation to the right hon. Prime Minister for his very gracious and eloquent words. I was particularly impressed by one statement, that he hoped that for years to come he would have the opportunity of joining with me in celebrating my birthday. I am glad to have that assurance from him because last fall, among all the honours I received, a Jewish congregation in Vancouver gave me the Torah, the Tree of Life. When I made inquiries as to what it meant I was informed that it meant I would live as long as Moses, one hundred and twenty years. I am told that when that information was relayed to Ottawa there was consternation. That consternation has been ended now by the Prime Minister with the realization that such an eventuality would not do harm to this institution. I thank him again, and if the result of the placing of this flower on me will allow me to approach the results he achieved by that means I will be happy.

To my own leader I express my deep appreciation for the words he has spoken. To the leader of the N.D.P., that great exponent of parliament in its finest form, I give my thanks and appreciation, as I do to the acting leader of the Ralliement Creditiste. I say thank you to all honourable members from the bottom of my heart.

The House of Commons is a place where from time to time we reveal an understanding of each other, and an appreciation of members sitting opposite which dispels the acerbities of party warfare and which causes each of us to form deep and abiding admiration for those members who sit in every part of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask whether, in view of the fact that the meetings of the Organization of African Unity are now over and the countries of that organization have decided not to bring the Biafran crisis to the United Nations, the minister will now undertake to bring this matter before that world body.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the resolutions and decisions made by the Organization of African Unity we have been exploring with the secretary general of that organization and with the Secretary General of the United Nations how best this matter might be brought before the United Nations.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs give us some assurance, in view of the fact that thousands of people are dying there daily, that this serious crisis will in fact be brought promptly before the United Nations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, such matters can be brought before the United Nations only by a group of countries. We have explored the possibilities of bringing this before the security council, and the soundings we have made show that is not a very fruitful way to proceed; but we believe we will find a group of countries that will be prepared to join with us in bringing this matter before the United Nations general assembly.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the minister, when did these explorations commence?

Mr. Sharp: These explorations have been going on for some time, having in mind the very serious nature of this crisis.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs can tell us what representations Canada has made to Britain for that country to cease supplying arms to Nigeria.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has not made representations to the British government on this subject.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of news that reached us this morning by press and radio, what is the minister's assessment of how much longer Biafra can exist as a de facto state, in view of the military progress of the Nigerian government?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that kind of information is not available to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The house will have observed from the newspapers this morning that the Organization of African Unity is supposed to have asked—I cannot confirm this—the Biafran authorities to surrender, so as to save lives, and the Biafran authorities have said they intend to fight on.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Following the minister's reference yesterday to the terrible war in Nigeria, I should like to ask the minister whether he has been in consultation with his colleagues the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Defence concerning the possible employment of Canada's mobile command in its peace restoring role?

Mr. Sharp: I do not know that I quite understand the purport of that question. It gives me the opportunity, however, to say that we have been moving food from Vancouver to Halifax to put on board the ship that is leaving soon for Nigeria. We are flying the supplies, using Hercules airplanes of the Canadian Armed Forces.

Mr. McIntosh: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not know what the mobile command has to do with the transportation of food, but in view of the imminent removal of the Canadian contingent from Cyprus can the Minister of National Defence or the minister of external affairs indicate the extent of readiness of the mobile command in the event of Canada being called on for action if this government offers to commit its forces in a peace restoring role?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is much too general in nature and also slightly hypothetical.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, it is a very specific question. It is directed to—

Mr. Speaker: It is specifically hypothetical.

INQUIRY AS TO MINISTERIAL MISSION TO LATIN AMERICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Can he tell the house whether it is still his intention to send a Canadian ministerial mission to latin America in the fall and if so, can he tell us the names of the ministers and officials who will participate in that visit?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I answer this question. The mission to Latin America is now being planned. We have been discussing with the governments of the Latin American countries the most suitable dates for our visit. When the itinerary has been decided upon in agreement with these governments, an announcement will be made, and the names of the ministers who will be participating will be announced at that time.

MIDDLE EAST—EFFORTS TO REMOVE CAUSES OF TENSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of the repeated incidents between Israeli and Arab forces since the truce in the six day war of June, 1967, and in particular the more belligerent attitude of the parties in recent weeks, what active efforts has Canada been making both in the security council and the general assembly of the United Nations toward an eradication of the root causes of the tension which everyone in the house recognized existed at that time in the Middle East?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our general policy has been to support the Jarring mission. We believe this is the only body now available which seems to have the necessary authority to discuss a possible solution with both the Arab and the Israeli sides in this conflict.

Within the next few days Mr. Riad of the United Arab Republic and the foreign minister of Israel will be in Canada and we will have an opportunity at that time for an even more detailed consideration of the possibilities of resolving some of these fundamental questions. I can only say that so far Mr. Jarring and his mission have not met with great success, which I regret very much.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which is obviously also directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the interesting surrounding-states doctrine in international affairs which was propounded here yesterday to resolve Biafra's problem, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs waiting for a resolution from the surrounding Arab states before some initiative is taken in resolving Israel's problem?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would have thought, having in mind the events surrounding the invasion of Czechoslovakia and the efforts that have been made to interfere in Canadian affairs, that most members of this house would support very strongly the principle of non-intervention in the sovereignty of other countries.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the continuing rise in the cost of living and the reference in the speech from the throne to a continuous review of prices and costs, will the minister consider the establishment of a standing committee on consumer affairs?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. Has the combines branch completed its study of the Batten report on food prices and food retailing on the prairies? If so, will it be on the agenda for the federal-provincial conference on consumer affairs, and has the date for such a conference yet been set?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the question, the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act has submitted his annual report to me, which will be tabled in the house within 30 days. With regard to the second half of the question, the agenda for the federal-provincial conference has not yet been settled. The date is the last part of October. I am not sure that all the provinces have yet agreed on the date, and I do not want to announce it until they have.

TRADE

WHEAT—STEPS TO DISPOSE OF CARRYOVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and ask him whether, when he enters the present debate, as I hope he will soon, to outline what steps the government will take to sell our record wheat carryover, he will also take that opportunity to outline what steps the government intends to take to overcome the sharp drop which has taken place in Canada's industrial production.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The hon. member is always full of generous offers, and I thank him, as I did yesterday.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question. Would the minister be so good as to consider these two very important matters seriously and assure the house that he will enter the debate and give a sensible answer to these two important questions?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, it is well known that even when I smile I am serious.

AIR TRANSPORT

TORONTO—LANDING RIGHTS FOR ALITALIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio who is associated with the Minister of Transport. Has the government reached a decision with regard to the granting of landing rights to Alitalia at the Toronto international airport?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless this question has an urgency which is unknown to me, it should be placed on the order paper.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO RECEIPT OF FINANCIAL STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received an audited financial statement from the Expo '67 corporation, and if so will he table it?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I take this question as notice? I really do not know whether I have received it, but I do not think I have.

[Later:]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question raised earlier this day by the hon. member for Wellington, may I say that the audited financial statements of Expo have not been received by my department. At the present time the financial statements are in the hands of the Auditor General, and he is probably closer to the Auditor General than I am.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT BY U.S. STATE DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the United States state department to the effect that Soviet military intervention in West Germany would lead to an immediate allied response in accordance with the NATO treaty, was the Canadian government consulted about this statement and asked to associate itself with it? If so, what was the response?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, when the United States government speaks through one of its ministers it speaks in its own name, and it does not engage any other country. Its opinion of what is needed would be the opinion of a sovereign state, but NATO decides according to its own treaty arrangements.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the Prime Minister leaving the house with the impression the United States would take immediate action under its position as the leader of NATO and leave Canada completely, shall we say, on its own, at loose ends?

Mr. Trudeau: That is not the impression I believe my answer gave, Mr. Speaker. I said the United States was a sovereign state and could act in the way it decided. However, the members of NATO will only act in the way that NATO decides under the charter.

INQUIRY AS TO DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION OF MAINLAND CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Harding (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the Prime Minister's statement on the need for diplomatic recognition of the government of mainland China, made both during and after the federal election campaign, I should like to ask whether it is the government's intention to extend recognition to the mainland government of China. Will action be taken at this session, and has any move toward recognition been initiated to date?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have been working actively toward this objective, which remains an objective of the government. We have not yet, however, had direct negotiations with the government at Peking.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Where does the activity come from?

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Will Canada support the bid of continental China to be a member of the United Nations this year?

Mr. Sharp: I do not expect there will be any change in the attitude of the Canadian government on this question at the present session of the general assembly. We intend to proceed in parallel in relation to recognition of Peking.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the house with whom Canada has been negotiating, if we have not negotiated directly with mainland China?

Mr. Sharp: I did not say we had been negotiating with anyone. I said we were working on the matter. We have been consulting with our ambassadors around the world. This is the type of consultation that is necessary. I think the house will understand that this negotiation is going to be particularly difficult, and it is one in connection with which there must be adequate preparation. I make no apologies whatever for taking adequate time because there is no objective of this government I consider more important than this one set forth by the Prime Minister and by myself during the election campaign.

BANKRUPTCY

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Is it the minister's intention to introduce in this house soon a new bill concerning bankruptcies, which he promised on June 29, 1966 and which has not yet been introduced?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): There has been a committee working on a revision of the Companies Act subsequent to the amendments which were made in 1966. I expect a report by the end of the year. We will work on the report, and I will be introducing a revised and totally new bankruptcy act as soon thereafter as possible.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ESTABLISHMENT OF STRAIGHT BASE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the Territorial Seas and Fishing Zones Act passed in this house in 1964. In view of the importance of this legislation as a conservation measure for the Canadian fishing industry, which is facing serious economic problems now, would the minister undertake to provide members of this house as soon as possible with a report on the efforts to date to reach an agreement with other countries on this matter, and also give us any alternative proposals planned by the government in order to reach a conclusion to this thorny problem?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would certainly be glad to take the opportunity to make a report. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might raise the question on my estimates or ask me to make a statement on motions. I would be happy to do so.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PAYMENT UNDER CONTRACTS FOR PERIOD OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Lind (Middlesex): I should like to address my question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the very loose way rural mail carriers were advised with respect to their services during the postal strike and the lack of written instructions in connection therewith, I feel there is a moral obligation on the part of the government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask a question but he cannot make a speech.

Mr. Lind: —I feel that there is a moral obligation on the part of the government to make ex gratia payments in the light of these apparent administrative errors.

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE REPLACEMENT OF MUNICIPAL NAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Has a decision been taken by the postal authorities in Montreal to replace by numbers such historic municipal names as Lachine, Pointe Claire, Dorval, etc., which are over 300 years old?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I invite the hon. member to place this question on the order paper.

Mr. Rock: Mr. Speaker, the question is urgent because this decision may take effect on October 1.

Hon. Eric Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, a decision has been taken to apply zoning numbers to existing post office addresses, but no decision has been taken, and indeed there is no intention, to take away any historic names. All that happens now in a large region such as metropolitan Montreal is that the municipality of Pointe Claire, for example, may be divided into seven zones and the address will be Pointe Claire 700, and that is all.

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF MEAT FROM ARGENTINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister received protests from the representatives of either the federation of agriculture or the farm union in respect of the importation of meat from Argentina? Does he propose to take any action to protect their interests?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have received a number of letters from many organizations and many individuals in respect of the importation of cooked beef from the Argentine. In reply to the hon. member I would say there has been no change in our health regulations with regard to cooked beef coming from the Argentine. The only amendment was to include "cooked plyofilm wrapped" beef in addition to "cooked canned" beef. The new product is beef that has been boned, cooked and then frozen and packaged in polyethylene wrappers rather than packaged in tins. Its main use will be for industrial purposes, and the importation of this product—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wants more information he can put a question on the order paper.

CANADA COUNCIL

PAYMENT OF EXPENSES OF ARTIST FROM NEW YORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to preface my question by saying that it is not a criticism of an agency which I hold in high regard. I should like to ask, in view of the constant requests for funds emanating from individuals and organizations of merit throughout Canada, what steps can be taken to prevent the expenditure of money by the Canada Council on such ventures as the subsidization of Ralph Ortiz, the axe wielding artist from New York, whose air fare of $284 was paid by them to attend his show in Vancouver—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should place this question on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lincoln Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Secretary of State. In view of the backlog of citizenship applications in centres because of citizenship court judge vacancies, could the minister advise whether all appointments of citizenship court judges have been made, thereby filling the vacancies?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that several citizenship courts are now without any incumbent, but appointments are under consideration and should be made very shortly.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Within the framework of a just society, and considering unfairness displayed by some newspapermen in the discharge of their duties, would the Prime Minister consider sending a copy of the official report of the House of Commons Debates to every Canadian family head?

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to put my question to the hon. Minister of Transport but in his absence, I shall direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister, since he is concerned in the matter.

Yesterday, we were delayed over five hours at the Quebec and Montreal airports. Might it not be possible for the government to study the possibility of building an international airport in an area free from fog and far from the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Can the minister tell us whether the federal government made any offer whatsoever prior to September 1, 1967 to Mr. Edmond Joly, of Lotbinière, with regard to the purchase of the Seigneurie de Lotbinière, which—

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question of the hon. member should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Further to the appointment of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Richardson), could the Prime Minister tell us how many relatives of the aforesaid honourable minister have some interest in the Canadian Pacific?

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—STATEMENT ON PAYMENT TO ONTARIO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Lambton-Kent asked me a question which I took as notice. In reply to the question about transitional adjustment grants to Ontario sugar beet growers, I may say that we are now waiting for the records of growers' 1967 plantings, which are to be forwarded by the Ontario sugar beet growers marketing board and the company, on which these grants will be calculated. When this information is received we will then request approval of parliament for the provision of the necessary funds to make the payments.

I should also like to say there is no delay, because even if the sugar factory had been operating or was still operating there would be no initial returns from this year's crop as of this date in any normal growing season.

DRUGS

PROTECTION AGAINST COUNTERFEIT PRODUCTS—CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax): Mr. Speaker. I would like to direct a question to the minister of health relating to a series of questions asked in this chamber last March regarding the presence of counterfeit drugs on the Canadian market. I should like to ask the minister whether these drugs have now been removed from access by the public, and further whether any criminal proceedings were instituted by the food and drug directorate as a result of the investigation.

Hon. J. C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have investigated the matter and are now satisfied that these drugs have been largely removed from the market. As far as prosecutions are concerned, this question is presently under investigation and no conclusion has been arrived at yet.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—COMMUNICATIONS WITH COMPANIES RESPECTING PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grace): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce further to a question which was asked in the house the other day. Has the minister been in touch with the Canadian automobile companies regarding their 1969 prices and, if so, could he tell the house what were the results of his discussions?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did indeed learn today that the Chrysler corporation has announced its price increases for the current model. The increase in Canada is $78 for the 1969 model, as compared to $91 in the United States. Again, the difference between the price in Canada and the price in the United States has been reduced.

[English]

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that he advised the house today that a select committee will be established, would he refer the question of the price of cars to that committee?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is in error. I said I would consider the establishment of a committee.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received the report of the royal commission on security matters and, if so, when will the report be published and presented to this house?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the report is not in my hands as of yet but I understand it is about ready. There is the translation to be finished, and as soon as it is finished the report will be given to me. I understand this will be in the very near future.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know when the house might expect to receive the report.

Mr. Trudeau: Shall I repeat, Mr. Speaker? I understand that the report is about finished but the translation is not. The translation is presumably from French into English and I do not want to publish the report in French before it comes out in English. Therefore I am waiting for the report to be supplied to me in both languages, which I understand will be very soon.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister undertake to submit the report to the house when it has been completed and he has received it, read it and considered it?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is conceivable that there will be matters in it which I will not want to table in the house. The report may concern security matters which should not be made public. I do not know; I want to see it first. The hon. member cannot ask me this kind of hypothetical question and expect an answer on the subject.

UNITED NATIONS

CYPRUS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF REDUCTION IN CANADIAN FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I want to refer to a question asked of me yesterday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert concerning the withdrawal of forces from Cyprus. I have been informed by the minister of defence that the Secretary General of the United Nations has requested a reduction in the size of our forces there. Accordingly, next month Canada will reduce its forces from 872 to 587.

I should like to pay tribute to the Canadian servicemen who, under very difficult and trying circumstances, have served their country well in an area where the United Nations decided it was appropriate to have them.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): A supplementary question on the statement that has just been made by the Prime Minister. Has Canada put in a bill to the United Nations for the cost of maintaining our forces in Cyprus over the past several years?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think this question is addressed to me. As the hon. member knows, we have improved the situation inasmuch as we still pay for the keeping of our troops —that is, their pay, allowances and feeding —but we have been able to recoup transportation costs. That is the best we have been able to do.

Mr. Harkness: My question was whether any bill has been put in to the United Nations for the cost of this force, as was done previously in the case of some of the other forces we allocated to U.N. peace keeping operations, although the bills were not paid.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): No bills were put through my department, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER RESPECTING RESERVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development arising out of a statement purported to have been made by the premier of Saskatchewan in an interview on Tuesday, September 10, that Saskatchewan does not want to turn over one more inch of land to the federal government for the creation of Indian reserves. Does this mean that any outstanding land commitments to the Indians of Saskatchewan under treaty will not be met?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have received no communication from the premier of Saskatchewan to the effect that he is reluctant to transfer land as required by the terms of the agreements concluded with the Indians.

My Department has undertaken negotiations with the Saskatchewan government on this question, and they are continuing at the present time.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING RIVERS AIR BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Craig C. Stewart (Marquette): I wish to direct this question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the government's emphasis on regional development and the growing need for tri-service training for Canada's armed forces, will the minister announce soon the expanded role of Rivers air base in order to allay present uncertainty?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): As everyone knows, we have been studying for the past three years what we call a project for consolidation—that is the objective of these studies—and we expect to arrive at an over-all assessment of the necessity of the bases we have in Canada. When conclusions are reached we shall have to announce whatever decisions have been arrived at respecting all bases in Canada.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): In his consideration of these matters would the minister pay particular attention to the excellent facilities at Rivers base so that it might be expanded, thereby reducing dangerous congestion of the airways—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now making a representation rather than asking a question.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF PUBLIC SAFETY BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Perhaps in his absence I might be allowed to ask the parliamentary secretary to take it as notice. Having in mind the fact that traffic accidents across Canada are now claiming one Canadian life every 90 minutes of every day, can we expect an early report on the work of the public automotive safety board established by this house last session?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): I will take notice of that question.

AGRICULTURE

BRITISH REGULATIONS RESPECTING HANDLING OF LIVESTOCK AND FOWL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of Canada's extensive agricultural trade with Britain, has the minister examined the new British regulations concerning humane methods in the handling of livestock and fowl for the production of meat and eggs to see whether Canadian standards meet British requirements and do not jeopardize our exports?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his submission and I assume it has been noted.

FISHERIES

NEW BRUNSWICK—OYSTER SEASON IN CARAQUET BAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): My question is intended for the Minister of Fisheries. What action does the minister intend to take concerning a statement made by the Maisonnette, New Brunswick, board of trade and published in a New Brunswick newspaper this morning to the effect that the people of Maisonnette were being discriminated against in connection with the granting of a fishing season in the oyster beds of Caraquet bay?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not in a position to determine whether this is a matter of urgency, but I am inclined to think the question might be placed on the order paper.

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF SALMON LICENCE LIMITATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries; the matter is of some urgency because many salmon fishermen begin at this time of the year to prepare for next season. Would the minister be prepared to refer the declaration about licence limitations on the salmon industry to a parliamentary committee at an appropriate time so it can be considered publicly?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): The answer is yes. I may also say that a special appeal board has been set up on the west coast to look into these matters.

[Translation]

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Does the minister anticipate any increase in Canadian family allowances in the near future?

[English]

Hon. J. C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED MISAPPLICATION OF HOUSING FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I have a question for the minister responsible for Indian affairs who is, I know, sincerely interested in the welfare of the Indians in our province. Would he investigate the situation at the Eskasoni Indian reserve, where moneys allocated by his department for housing improvements are now being used for the construction of 50 outhouses, an action which has brought about the resignation of five councillors?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Again, the hon. member has made a representation and I assume it has been noted.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): On a question of privilege, this may seem somewhat amusing but it does represent a serious situation, inasmuch as five or more band councillors have resigned their positions and there is a bit of an uprising in the area.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

INDUSTRY

NEWFOUNDLAND—AGREEMENT WITH SHAHEEN RESOURCES COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): My question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue; it is a very serious question. Did the Minister of National Revenue take part in any negotiations with the provincial government of Newfoundland with respect to an agreement between that government and the Shaheen Natural Resources Company?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I can answer that question by saying no.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

CONSIDERATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF FORMER CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. Can we be assured that the government will give early study to the recommendations made by Mr. Castonguay concerning absentee voting and a permanent or continuous voters' list?

May I also ask whether there is a possibility of these recommendations being referred to a committee of this house?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): As I said to the house earlier this week, or perhaps late last week, the government is currently considering some means of enabling hon. members generally to give attention to this question. I hope to be able to announce a date on an early occasion.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, September 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Eymard Corbin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment (p. 62) thereto of Mr. Stanfield.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I first offer you my very sincere congratulations upon your re-election as presiding officer of the House of Commons. The accolades that have been extended to you over the past few days well express the feelings of the members of this distinguished house. May I also extend felicitations to your assistant, the Deputy Speaker, and to the Deputy Chairman of Committees. They too, I know, will preside properly and wisely over the deliberations of this chamber.

I wish to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to bring you greetings from my constituents in the electoral district of Vegreville, and particularly from the centennial capital of Canada, St. Paul, Alberta. This patriotic town engaged in over 100 centennial projects to commemorate Canada's 100th birthday, ranging from the opening of a recreational centre to the building of a launching pad for objects from outer space. I am deeply honoured and grateful to have been chosen to represent this great riding, a riding which contains people of vision, enthusiasm and dedication.

As we are debating the address in reply to the speech from the throne I shall confine my remarks generally to a discussion of manner in which the throne speech affects the constituency I represent. The Vegreville constituency is an area in east central Alberta comprising 9,000 square miles and containing in excess of 65,000 industrious people who are of all origins, including the two founding peoples, French and English, and the first Canadians, our native Indians. Regrettably, in a throne speech which is dedicated to a just society no mention is made of the ethnic groups which constitute such an industrious, cultural and dedicated group of Canadians throughout the nation. I hope that this does not mean that these people are to be treated as second class citizens.

My presence in this house during the deliberations which are forthcoming will be to ensure that these people will enjoy equal rights and privileges, equal opportunity, never again to be caught in the web of limitations as was the case before the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) removed the barrier by proclaiming the Bill of Rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: These people believe in and want one Canada, united, with no special status, no special favours. All they want is equality. The throne speech in no way gives these people that assurance.

Representing an agricultural area, Mr. Speaker, I would like to devote some time to outlining some of the difficulties that are being faced by the farmers in my constituency, as well as by those in other parts of western Canada. I would first like to offer my sincere congratulations to my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) on his appointment as Minister of Agriculture. It is very pleasing to know that some consideration has been given our fair province by his appointment to this very important portfolio.

In a rural constituency such as Vegreville the economic pulse of all our communities is directly dependent on agriculture. In no way can we ever have any doubts about that. But what is happening? Farmers are being forced to sell. As a matter of fact just before departing for Ottawa I was told by one of our local auctioneers that business was never better. He has had more farm auction sales this spring and has already booked more for this fall than he has ever had in any previous two years combined.

I am told that many of these farm folk are selling their liquid assets and are abandoning their units in search of jobs through which they can survive. Many are attempting to sell their land and, failing that, they will let it go for taxes. There is just no way that a farmer can survive with the rising cost of machinery, repairs, taxes and interest rates, yet the throne speech offers nothing by way of relief for the farmers of western Canada. As a matter of fact the amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act and to the Farm Credit Act will add further to the cost-price squeeze by allowing interest rates to rise still further.

The emphasis in agricultural programs has been on productivity, both in real terms and in terms of substituting capital for labour. In farming, unlike other industries, output is widely dispersed and difficult to control. It is geared toward maximizing productivity in order to justify higher investment and rising costs. But production which exceeds demand results in declining prices, thereby retarding the economic advantages of greater technology.

In a recent booklet entitled "Agricultural Output—Canada 1968" published by the Canadian Department of Agriculture it is shown that the farmer's prospects are indeed grim. May I quote a few excerpts:

Wheat. Prices which are now lower than a year ago are expected to be maintained in the lower part of the international grains agreement range for the remainder of the current season. Under average conditions, a smaller acreage than in 1967 could produce all supplies needed to meet anticipated demands in 1968-69.

But what has happened? We have an increased acreage, and we see pressure being placed on the international grains agreement through a system of adjusting the grades and through a lower price than what the agreement calls for.

Oats. Oat supplies for 1967-68 are about 20 per cent below the recent five year average. The effect of the large 1967 United States corn crop and the trend towards greater consumption of high energy feeds may prevent prices for oats from showing much increase. Stocks at July 31, 1968, are likely to decline. To maintain our build-up of stocks, additional acreage of oats will be required.

Barley. Prices were lower in 1967 than the year earlier and will probably continue below the 1966 level. Because of competition from alternative feed grains, with barley yields rising faster than those of oats, a larger increase in the acreage to barley than to oats in 1968 would seem justified.

Rapeseed. The price of rapeseed was down during the early part of 1967-68 and will probably stay relatively low for the remainder of the current crop year. With an expanding domestic market and steady export market, rapeseed acreage should be maintained or increased slightly.

Hogs. Prospective hog slaughter in both Canada and the United States in 1968 will average below the high levels of 1967. Prices in Canada are not likely to show any sizeable rise before the fall of 1968.

With the reduction of the government bonus on premium bacon the price has deteriorated still further.

Cattle. Fed cattle marketings in Canada in 1968 may be about the same or slightly above those in 1967 and prices are expected to remain above the export equivalent price in the United States.

The destruction of the traditional family farm gravely concerns all of us. The major problem that is facing the agricultural community is the continuing and rapid rise in all farm costs on the one hand, while returns for farm commodities have either remained stable or moved downward.

The current investment required does not provide returns that compare favourably with other industry. As a result there is no incentive for young people to become engaged in agriculture because of the high capital requirements and the very low return. At the present time the average age of the farm operator is 57, which places not only the family farm, but the complete industry in very grave doubt.

What does this government plan to do with these people who are being forced to leave their way of life? Are they going to provide them with employment? Are they going to train them and adapt them to other ways and means of securing a living, or are they to go on welfare? And believe me, Mr. Speaker, many have suggested that this might be their solution. The speech from the throne in no way offers a prescription to remedy this very important situation, which is rapidly becoming the most urgent concern not only in my constituency, but in all the western prairie provinces.

May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that this country would be in sad shape if it were not for agriculture. Even with declining exports it still commands one fifth of the total export markets. Farmers last year spent some $500 million on farm machinery and repairs, and in addition fertilizer sales last year exceeded one million tons.

Total farm expenses were about $3 billion, and if you add to that the other durables purchased such as cars, trucks, refrigerators and so on it increases significantly. So you see, Mr. Speaker, farmers are big spenders, and at the same time it has been said that for every dollar's worth of agricultural product produced, there is created $7 worth of income to others who are associated in some way with the product.

My final plea is on behalf of the native people across the nation, and in particular those of my own constituency, the Indians of the Saddle lake band. For too long our native peoples have been abused. In our society of today, where we enjoy more and more a multitude of benefits, the Indians are gradually finding their similar privileges diminishing. Basic needs such as housing, health services, employment, education and an adequate water supply, prime requisites so necessary to every Canadian today, are not enjoyed by our Indians and Eskimos. Until our native peoples are given equal opportunity to participate in a full and rewarding life, they will not be able to live with dignity with their fellow Canadians.

The Indian Act is now in the process of revision. Let it not become a document to be interpreted only by bureaucrats, but by men who have an understanding for their fellow man. Our laws should surely put people before policy, and to this end I intend to devote my efforts and energy in the years ahead.

In closing my remarks may I say that it is indeed an honour and a privilege to have had the opportunity of delivering my first speech in the House of Commons today on the occasion of the seventy-third birthday of my distinguished and honoured friend, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

[Translation]

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, first of all, may I congratulate you on your appointment as Speaker of the house. From what I have seen and heard, you may be one of the best Speakers, and possibly the best, in the history of Canada.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

May I also congratulate the two honourable members (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand) who moved and seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, according to custom.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, although I spent a few years observing the proceedings of this house from the gallery, and part of that time as a ministerial aid, it is hardly the same as actually sitting as a member. I am most grateful to my constituents of Cochrane for giving me this opportunity to serve Canada. I feel a great sense of pride and privilege at being here. I am proud also of being a part of a great team which throughout the election campaign we called the "Trudeau team" and which was recognized by the Canadian people as the team that should run this country for the next five years.

The face of parliament has changed. We have over a hundred new faces sitting in the house. Canadians expect a change from the House of Commons. They expect parliament to be more effective, with less harangue and with a great deal more logic. I recall about a year ago a member of the opposition from Brome-Missisquoi, who I believe now has a seat in the official gallery, chided members on all sides of the house for their childish attitude and for their overly exaggerated partisanship. He stated at that time that the people of Canada were sick of it; that the people of Canada did not want any more of it and that the people of Canada, particularly the young people, were expecting something better from this house. And in all of the time that I have sat in the gallery watching the proceedings of this house, that was the only time that I saw the public in the galleries applaud, and applaud freely. He had put his finger on the very thing that has been bothering the people of Canada for a number of years, and that is the performance of the members in this house.

Are things going to be different in this new parliament, or are they going to remain the same? We have new members; we have a new government; we have a new group which is dedicated to change. There is talk about a reform of the rules. Perhaps I am a novice at considering the intricacies and the nuances created by some of these rules; but to me, and I am sure to a lot of logically thinking Canadians, it seems completely ridiculous that we should have a system in this house which permits a minority representation, who lost the election, to move a want of confidence motion in a government which began to sit only two days before and which by a large majority had been given a vote of confidence by the Canadian people by means of a general election. A year from now I could understand why it would be the duty of the opposition to look over the record of the government and decide whether or not they wish to vote non-confidence. But two days after the house sits, and before we even get started in our legislative program—? to me it is completely ludicrous.

I wonder whether the members of the opposition really understand the new philosophy which has been brought into Canadian politics by our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and other people who are forward-thinking, as he is—a philosophy which caught the imagination of the Canadian people; a philosophy which we would like everyone to understand. But I wonder if the members of the opposition really understand it. Do the members of the opposition have a philosophy? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment and subamendment which were placed before the house show that the opposition still does not understand. They criticize for the sake of criticizing. They said they wanted a more detailed throne speech. Could it be that they wanted more to criticize? Is this the true role of an opposition? I do not think the people of Canada want that kind of opposition. They expect the opposition to oppose and to keep the government on its toes, yes; but I am sure that they do not expect the opposition to criticize just for the sake of being in opposition. They spoke about poverty; they spoke about poverty as if it just suddenly came about and we had never experienced it in the past in this country. What do they expect the Prime Minister to do? Is he supposed to wave his wand and all of a sudden, 'poof', no more poverty?

This government has taken the most forward-looking step of any government in recent years by attacking the problem of poverty sensibly and logically, with the establishment of a new department of regional development. This is the way responsible government should be. But when we listen to an irresponsible tirade on the part of the opposition concerning a program which has not even been given a chance to start, then it seems to me that the opposition obviously is not interested in good government, that they are interested only in opposing and in criticizing.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has obviously changed his tactics. He did not used to be like that. This is perhaps one time that he should have used his old tactics. This is one of the times that he should have said what he has so often said before, "Well, we'll see; we'll see." I think I understand why he has adopted this method. He is so afraid of being upstaged by his predecessor, the right hon. gentleman, that he feels he should beat him to the draw.

Speaking of the right hon. gentleman, those of us who have a great filial affection for the former prime minister are very happy with the tribute paid him today, and we are happy that his position in the official protocol list of precedents is so lofty. As a former prime minister he takes precedence not only over the previous prime minister but also over his own leader. This must make him very happy; and we are very happy with him.

Something that made me very sad indeed was to hear the Leader of the Opposition make reference to the fact that Her Majesty was not referred to in the speech from the throne. This to me was an obvious attempt to make a political issue out of the Queen. These are the old tactics that were used by the opposition in the past, concerning the flag. It seems they would like to have the Queen now made into a political football. Do they honestly think that the Queen is their personal property for them to protect? This is an issue that should not even have been mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, if he was sincere about his desire to help bring about good government in this country.

And then there is that group further to the left of Your Honour, whom I suppose we could call the leftists. I think the people of Canada spoke far more eloquently then I can as to their fate. Except for an accident of provincial considerations in Saskatchewan they have been religated to where they belong. Again in this parliament we see them cloaking themselves in the shroud of self-righteousness and making sanctimonious pronouncements. Canadians are no longer fooled by this. Throughout the whole of the election campaign they were up to their old tricks, talking about the Carter report which most of them have not read, condemning a rise in the price of stamps as something against the poor workingman, when they knew so well it would have been the big firms that would have paid for it.

They say they are the friends of the workingman, and that is another myth that was dispelled in the last election. It is not the man on the street that goes along with their philosophy, but perhaps some of their organizers and leaders of the labour groups do.

In any case we threw them out of northern Ontario in no uncertain terms, and that is where they were so sure of support. They even boasted that they would win Cochrane. Out of the 12 Northern Ontario ridings we won 11, and they almost lost the twelfth, and might have, if it had not been for the personal popularity of my good friend Arnold. It certainly was not his party that got him in.

The leader of that group, to Your Honour's far left, moved a subamendment deploring the fact that the throne speech did not go on in detail about the housing crisis. Isn't that a logical approach. All Canada knows that my good friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) has tackled this problem in a very forward looking way, and I can tell you that if he does not succeed in solving the housing crisis, there is not anyone inside this house or outside of it who can. But the leader of the N.D.P. would rather hear a lot of words on the subject. I think we should leave the words to him, sir. This government will take the action.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I represent a riding which is not a constituency but a country. It stretches from Hudson Bay to lake Superior and as far as the Quebec frontier to the east. It is a vast constituency which is approximately the size of France and which is less favoured than the other parts of the country.

During the election campaign, the Prime Minister spoke about regional development and singled out northern Ontario. We find this very encouraging because, in the past, it was customary to think of the Maritimes or eastern Quebec when less fortunate areas were discussed. It is time now to think of our region and to try and develop it. We have always been forgotten in the past, but I am convinced that after the Prime Minister's visit to our region, the riding of Cochrane and the north in general will no longer be forgotten.

In the first place, northern Ontario is an area rich in natural resources. It has tremendous mining possibilities, forest resources that are almost unexhaustible, unequalled tourist opportunities. To develop all these, five-year or ten-year comprehensive programs, taking into consideration all aspects of life in the north, should be carried out.

[Mr. Stewart (Cochrane).]

But why has the north been neglected in the past? Why were some people maintaining that our area was not so deprived after all? It was mostly because studies were based on unemployment statistics. If one visits northern Ontario, Mr. Speaker, or if one knows the climate of this part of the country, one would be inclined to think that it is too severe for one who does not work to live there. This means that if a person does not work, he just leaves. That is one of the reason why unemployment statistics do not indicate this area as one in need of government programs.

[English]

It is becoming more and more apparent that we cannot use the sole criterion of unemployment to designate an area. In the light of newer criteria the claims that we make in northern Ontario for special treatment are valid in the over-all national development.

Let me quote what Professor Brewis said on this subject.

> It is the absence of agreement on these basic political questions no less than the absence of an economic appraisal of alternative courses of action that weakens federal policy. Meanwhile substantial transfer payments are made to the poorer provinces and these sums are augmented by abnormally heavy unemployment insurance payments. Continuation of such payments is almost certain to be a less fruitful way of assisting poorer areas than a program of aid designed to encourage development and migration. Welfare payments in general do not strike at the cause of unemployment and poverty. Indeed to the extent that they reduce the urgency of the need to find solutions, they can be expected to perpetuate these evils. A more positive approach to the problems of the poorer parts of the country is needed.

The economic council is turning its attention to the issues involved, and there is some possibility that the geographical branches of government will devote more of their resources to the problems of industrial location and urban development. Hitherto the overwhelming emphasis in their work has been on physical geography.

Of course in all of these programs continuous and effective federal-provincial liaison is undoubtedly an overriding requirement. As far as my area is concerned, I believe that the provincial government has been very interested in going ahead with various programs, and it is evident that there will have to be co-operation between the two levels of government.

It is very interesting to note that although Ontario is the wealthiest province in terms of personal income, approximately 20 per cent of the Canadian low income farm families are within the boundaries of Ontario. In the north there are strong regional concentrations of rural poverty. Northern Ontario possesses regions that are facing different problems. Any over-all policy for developing the area must take adequate account of this diversity, and selective programs must be adapted to the particular needs and prospects of the varied subregions.

One of the important things we must consider about northern Ontario is the fact that there are significant natural resources. Near Moosonee we have deposits of lignite unequalled, we have deposits of columbium which are being developed, and we have the possibility of oil wells throughout the whole of that area. Of course the rich forest industry is concentrated in northern Ontario and that is our principal industry.

The big problem we have to overcome in northern Ontario is first of all that of transportation and accessibility. Everything we mention seems to come back to the old problem of transportation. There are not enough roads and the service offered by the railroads is inadequate. The question of freight rates is uppermost. If we want to induce industry to come into the north, we have to make sure they can send their products out to market at a reasonable rate. If we want to encourage local farmers to raise beef cattle, we have to assure them that they can send their animals to the slaughterhouse at a reasonable rate. If we want to encourage people to grow vegetables, we must be able to tell them that their products can be sent to market at a reasonable rate. But the present situation in respect of freight rates is such that none of these things can be done advantageously.

We have, as I have said, a very important industry in northern Ontario, that of forestry. Various people in this area have opened factories to make plywood and other by-products of the forest industry. They are constantly running into difficulties and cannot compete with other Canadians on the market because they have to pay such high rates to ship their products on the railroad. Is this the way to develop the north? It is not. This is why I am so confident that our governement will take a close look at all these problems. It is going to consider regional development for northern Ontario from every aspect and come up with answers that will make it possible for our people to live in a reasonable fashion.

When we come to plans such as ARDA, the Prime Minister knows, because he and I went over the figures together, that not one cent went to developing anything in my riding. Of course the people have to request these things, but they do need some guidance. I know that some money was spent in the region to research a new type of blueberry. That certainly did not help the local people very much. When we asked why more had not been done, the bureaucrats gave us the answer that "Ontario does not have easily definable regions of concentrated rural poverty." That is a typical, bureaucratic answer and it is the kind of answer that will not do. I hope that the minister who has taken over the new department of regional development will not listen to that kind of reasoning, but will go ahead and develop our northern area.

The recent approaches to the problem, as described by those who have made a study of regional disparity, have stressed the over-all dynamic aspects of regional development in relation to the national economy as a whole. In this way Canada will accept sacrifices not only for the future benefit of less developed regions but for the future gain of the entire country. Moreover, sources of potential development will be sought all across Canada and not just in such traditional areas as the maritimes. In that search there will be put forward no misleading averages for provinces in order to hide the real truth about depressed areas.

Also, there is a consensus among the scholars that it is very much in the interest of society at large for a high standard of social services to be maintained in all rural areas, even those where sparse population makes these services more expensive than elsewhere. This is particularly important with respect to education.

If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention here the cultural situation in the riding of Cochrane. I would like to see, in the whole development of the northern area, some consideration given to culture. Why should our young people be deprived of that which others in the south are receiving? There is no such thing as a cultural centre in my riding. I am trying right now to get the government to take over a building—which, by the way, they could get for practically nothing—in the town of Kapuskasing. Part of this building could be used as a cultural centre, and I suggest that the other part could be used as a forestry training school. This would benefit the area and would be good for the future of the young people.

I hold in very high esteem in this country, Mr. Speaker, the national youth orchestra. In fact, I go to hear it every year, even if it means travelling several miles to do so. I do this because I think it is one of the finest projects in Canada. I would like to see some of our young people from northern Ontario selected for that orchestra. But how can they possibly be considered when there are no facilities for culture in the north? This year the national youth orchestra had a member from the Northwest Territories, which leads one to believe that Yellowknife has far more to offer culturally than northern Ontario, a mere 500 miles from Toronto. This situation must be corrected, and I hope it will be part of the over-all consideration when we are talking about regional development in northern Ontario.

According to modern thinking in general, public funds in the past which have been ineffectively spent in the less developed regions could have brought a high return if ways had been found to channel them into social infrastructure improvements within the depressed rural communities.

I would like to speak about agriculture, Mr. Speaker, but because of the shortage of time I will mention only one aspect of agriculture as it affects my area. I refer to the situation of the market for potatoes. I wonder how many hon. members have gone into a supermarket in Toronto, Montreal or Ottawa and seen a sign saying "Cochrane potatoes". Nobody has, of course. I venture to suggest that hardly anybody in the house is aware that there is a fine Cochrane potato. Every year potatoes grown in the Cochrane area take awards. The soil in our part of the country is conducive to a heavy crop of potatoes, yet most people have never heard of the Cochrane potato? Why? We have heard of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick potatoes, which travel a great deal farther to the market. This is an area which has to be developed.

Again we come back to the old problem of freight rates, which are too high to allow people to compete in the market with farmers from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. There is no reason why a potato chip factory could not be established in northern Ontario, but of course we would have to assure such an industry that it would be able to send its products to markets in the south, on payment of a reasonable rate.

One of the main possibilities for our part of the country, when one is considering regional development, is tourism. Attractive areas are numerous and tourists can enjoy many pleasant activities, such as fishing and hunting. Unfortunately the tourist industry is not fully organized in most of the region. This is a field in which the government can help. There are not sufficient roads, and there is a lack of motels and hotels. Of course the tourist industry is under the control of the provincial government and action should be taken by them to improve roads, publicity and accommodation; but there is no reason why the federal and provincial governments cannot work together in this matter. There is certainly room for more government programs in the riding of Cochrane.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, northern Ontario will remain an underdeveloped region as long as the problem of the high cost of transportation remains unsolved. The absence of secondary industry is harmful to the economy of any area, for primary industry has great drawbacks. Agriculture and the lumber industry are seasonal activities, while mining may be interrupted because of poor lodes or obsolescence. Secondary industry, on the other hand, is relatively stable and minimizes the risk of great economic fluctuations.

It has already been suggested that a road should be constructed between Cochrane and Moosonee, in order to serve also the country surrounding Kapuskasing. This initiative would be the first step in the economic development of the area. It will certainly not be undertaken by the province alone; the province, in fact, cannot do it. But it seems to me that we could establish a joint program in order to achieve this project.

Before closing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention something that concerns me greatly. It is the lack of authority on the part of the government concerning crown corporations. When a member asks a question in the house about one of those corporations, the answer is invariably: I do not want to meddle with the administration of that corporation, because it is autonomous.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should adopt another attitude. The Canadian people are paying and we are here to represent them. It seems to me that we should have our say in cases of maladministration of these companies.

As an example, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, so they tell me, is full of separatists that are remunerated by us, the taxpayers, to enable them to work against us. It seems to me this situation should not exist. On the English network of C.B.C., we hear nothing but voices with foreign accents. Does it mean that nobody in Canada is able to contribute to the corporation? Evidently, we should be able to express our opinion on that.

We could say the same thing about the Canada Council, the Canadian National, the National Arts Centre which is close by and which has cost $45 million to date. One forty-fifth of that sum could have helped build cultural centres everywhere in the riding of Cochrane.

But what is going on? These corporations have been left alone, in their independence, but they have been spending our money. Then, maybe the time has come to have a look into this and change our way of thinking as concerns the administration and authority of these crown agencies.

A while ago, I referred to the Canadian National. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the railway service in the Cochrane riding was better 50 years ago than it is today? I cannot exactly call this progress. Rather, it would seem that we are going backwards. The situation needs to be corrected and I hope that this government will keep all these considerations in mind when setting up the northern Ontario regional development program.

Mr. Speaker, we have always been left out in northern Ontario; my constituents feel that we are neglected. I am sure that this government, with our new leader and the new team, will take steps to improve the situation, so that prosperity may be enjoyed not only in the Cochrane electoral district but also all over northern Ontario.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Mark Smerchanski (Provencher): I should like to add my congratulations to Mr. Speaker upon his recent elevation at the first session of this parliament to the high position of permanent speaker. I hope that the legislative assembly of the province of Manitoba will adopt a similar rule to the one adopted by this house, and will also elect a permanent speaker. I also wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), both of whom gave an excellent account of themselves.

I have the pleasure of representing the constituency of Provencher and of bringing from western Canada Liberal representation for that constituency. I wish to express my appreciation to the constituents in my riding for having placed their confidence in me and having selected me as their Liberal member of parliament. Of course I do not possess the powers of elocution or the eloquence of some other hon. members of this house, but as an engineer I shall try to do my best.

My constituency is 225 miles long and slightly over 75 miles wide. It covers a total area of some 17,000 square miles and has a population numbering 60,000. I can say truly that my constituency is a land of great variations. In its southern portion it has the lumber industry, the dairy industry, cattle raising and grain farming. Some of the largest poultry and turkey farms in Canada are to be found in its central part. In its northern part there is fishing, fur farming, trapping, mining, the pulp and paper industry, and one of the most modern atomic research plants at Pinawa, which is known as the Whiteshell nuclear research centre and is one of the world's first organic cooled heavy moderated reactors to probe the mysteries of the atom and harness its energy for peaceful uses.

We also have five hydroelectric power plants on the Winnipeg river which supply electricity to the city of Winnipeg. The major portion of the northern section of the constituency is covered by rock outcrops known as the pre-Cambrian shield. Hundreds of lakes and rivers are to be found there. They are ideal for sport, sailing, fishing, swimming, camping and canoeing. Also solitude can be found in the more remote areas of this constituency, at a very short distance from the busy vacation resorts.

I should like to take hon. members through a small part of the historical background of my constituency. The Red river which originates in North Dakota flows north into lake Winnipeg and forms the western boundary of my constituency. The Winnipeg river flows across the middle portion of my constituency and empties into lake Winnipeg. These two rivers are very symbolic in the western Canadian history and played a great part in the development of the west.

In 1812 the province of Manitoba was settled by the Selkirk settlers who came to York Factory in the Hudson bay, and then travelled in York boats to lake Winnipeg and up the Red river to establish the Red river settlement. In recent years I travelled this route by canoe and marvelled at the hardships encountered by these men and women who travelled in the York boats through the mosquito and blackfly infested swamps.

For many years the Winnipeg river served as a historic water highway for the fur traders who came from Montreal to the head of the lakes, and then continued west and over the height of land into the headwaters of the Winnipeg river. This is a fast, treacherous river, and some of the hardships which the voyageurs encountered while travelling down the Winnipeg river are unknown to today's travellers. The present area through which the Winnipeg river flows is generally the same as it was 200 years ago.

In 1738, Jean Baptiste La Verendrye was the first explorer to discover the beautiful Winnipeg river. This explorer-voyageur in search of the western ocean, discovered the fur rich northwest and lake Winnipeg. Little did he realize that the Winnipeg river is only half way between Montreal and the Pacific ocean. However, it became the most important and the most travelled water highway for the thousands of brigades of freight laden canoes which came and went from lake Winnipeg. Mackenzie and Simpson, the founders of the Hudson's Bay fur trade, were frequent canoe travellers on the Winnipeg river.

The explorers and voyageurs were followed by many men from new France and the British Isles, a large percentage of whom remained in the area and took Indian wives. Today their children are known as the Métis. Today, in the constituency of Provencher, the past is remembered with pain, pride and hardship. Time has helped to heal these wounds. Time has taught tolerance and understanding to those who came into this area from distant lands seeking a new life. These people knew what poverty was and won their own war on poverty through hard work. They became good citizens of Canada. Today there are over 20 different ethnic groups working and living together in my constituency. These people, their fathers and forefathers, live together harmoniously, contributing their talents and energies to this fine land of ours, not only the province of Manitoba but the country as a whole.

These people have not and do not believe that any government, whether it be federal or provincial, should take care of them from the cradle to the grave. My academic training has been in the field of geological engineering. I am fully aware of the potential, and of the development of our natural resources in most of the mining areas of Canada, whether in New Brunswick, in the Gaspé, north of Noranda, in the Elliot Lake uranium fields, in the nickel-copper sections of northern Manitoba at Thompson and Flin Flon, in the copper occurrences along the Coppermine on the shores of the Arctic ocean, in the silver development in the Osoyoos area of southern British Columbia, or the magnetite, sand and iron deposits in the Queen Charlotte Islands. I am pleased to be a Canadian when I see the potential wealth of this great country of ours.

However, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but become involved and enthused in so far as the speech from the throne is concerned. It describes the policies of the Liberal government. These policies resulted in the election of the Liberal party by the people of Canada. During the last few days we have heard such critical phrases as, "tidying up", "new ventures", "secret society", "use wisely the human resources in the country". I find myself in complete disagreement with these phrases. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and our just society came through the election campaign with 154 seats, as against 110 scattered among the other parties. This is proof of the appeal these measures had for the people of Canada. I believe, and I believe very strongly, that all of us in this house should apply ourselves to criticizing constructively and contributing to good government. What we do or say will make tomorrow a possibility.

In particular, Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the government upon the placing of ARDA, FRED and ADA under one department. This combined and unified effort will produce results. We truly have an excellent opportunity to develop manpower programs, make regional improvements, and thus give to the people of Canada as is stated in the speech from the throne, "as equal access as possible to the opportunities of Canada's economic development". Limits should be instituted on the assistance given to costly industrial plants, because most of them are highly mechanized. They use a limited amount of labour. Instead, small industrial development should be encouraged in the rural sections of our country. These would provide jobs in rural areas and displace poverty. Small business development funds should be encouraged by the government in participation with free enterprise. Let industry have a vested monetary interest and in addition provide the management and know-how for industrial development. The government should not be directly involved in this type of program. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we now require the same type of free enterprise as that which built Canada economically and industrially to the point at which we find ourselves today.

In this way we would give the residents of the poverty areas of our country an opportunity to earn a reasonable wage, recover their pride and restore their dignity. We would give them an opportunity to contribute to the success of a just society. The effort has to come from the people within the areas now described as poverty areas. The establishment of small industries throughout the rural areas of our country will make Canada grow. There are too many people leaving the rural areas and crowding into the urban areas, which have become greatly congested. I am firmly convinced that this government, under the leadership of our Prime Minister, will not only talk about these problems but will do something about them.

This is not the task of the Prime Minister alone, Mr. Speaker; this is the responsibility of all elected members of the House of Commons. I too am concerned and worried about the impact of continued unrest and violence upon the mood of the Canadian people, and about the resulting social problems. A great deal of this unrest is, because people are idle, on welfare or not gainfully employed. There is a great deal of frustration about this kind of violence which, if allowed to continue, will lead to social paralysis.

The forefathers of the citizens of Canada, Mr. Speaker, were sturdy pioneers who developed the country and laid the foundations for our agriculture, our transportation network, industry and our economy. I believe that in this house, and particularly on the government side where there are so many new members, there are capable and competent representatives who, in their own way, will blaze new trails and will continue to pioneer and lead us forward to further economic development, responsible living and good fellowship, and thus bring about a more united and better Canada in which to live. I have no hesitation whatsoever in recommending to the care of these new and competent members of parliament the future of Canada. Indeed, the future will take care of itself. We may at times, Mr. Speaker, suffer disappointment but we will certainly not become discouraged. If we do become disappointed we should make immediate plans to try again. This type of approach when taken by government, by business or by the professions will spell progress.

Mention was made the other day of the fact that our defence and military expenditure is too high and unjustified on the one hand; on the other hand we were told that we were not taking a positive enough stand to restrain the Nigerians from annihilating the Biafrans. I cannot reconcile these two types of thinking, Mr. Speaker, coming from the same source, on the same afternoon and almost within the space of a few minutes. If we are to be responsible members of this house I think we owe a duty, not only to ourselves but to each other, at least when we rise to our feet to channel our thinking in such a way that we do try to remember what we have said before.

The throne speech outlined a number of matters about which there is urgency. For example, the government is proposing a Freshwater Fish Marketing Act, the establishment of a National Grains Council, amendments to the Farm Machinery Syndicates Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Farm Credit Act, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. These are but a few of the far reaching and progressive programs that are to be dealt with at this session of parliament. When one realizes the supporting information that is required and the large amount of research and hard work that is necessary before passage of these bills, Mr. Speaker, then perhaps the opposition may understand why there are 47 bills now before the house.

The prospect in store for me as the new Liberal member of parliament for Provencher, Mr. Speaker, is truly a challenging one. I shall apply myself to the best service of my constituency by pledging myself to work diligently and conscientiously with government members during the current session. Let us have all the various specifications and analyses of every kind—call them what you will —but we must get on with the job of providing the necessary background to, and the favourable atmosphere for, the economic and industrial development of this country, and the creation of a just society.

This country, Mr. Speaker, does not owe any one of us a living, but it does owe all of us the opportunity to make good if we so desire. In this regard our model—a model that has been quoted by others—should be, not what one can get from one's country, but what one can give one's country.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, would my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Smerchanski) be willing to answer a question?

Mr. Smerchanski: Yes, I shall try to answer it.

Mr. Mongrain: I heard my hon. friend mention the name of La Verendrye as a discoverer of the west. Does he know that La Verendrye was a native of my riding and that he lived there all his life?

Mr. Smerchanski: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that, but if he was, then that makes us related brothers from Provencher.

Mr. Mongrain: He was from Trois-Rivières.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to congratulate you warmly on your election as Speaker of the house, but the fact that you have obtained the full confidence of all members easily explains the respect which is shown to you everywhere, and I am quite pleased to point this out.

Allow me also, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as well as the ministers, the party leaders and all the members for having obtained the confidence of the people whom they represent. To all, I extend my best wishes of success.

Needless to add that I would have been pleased to congratulate the new Quebec Conservative members, but I realize that I will have to wait until the next elections.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly would have many things to say, but due to the time allotted for my speech, I will, in the next few minutes, take advantage of this occasion to be practical in my judgment, even though this may seem difficult for some to accept. At any rate, I am convinced that my opinions are permeated with a sincerity which everyone is looking for and I am equally convinced that truth will serve my constituency, my province and my country.

Mr. Speaker, needless to tell the right honourable Prime Minister that everyone living in my constituency and in la belle province de Québec is anxious to see as soon as possible the realization of the just society which he promises. I need not tell you, my dear colleagues, that I wholeheartedly endorse this noble ideal called the just society.

Before going any further, I think it is essential that I say why I spent so much energy and worked so hard to get a seat in this house. It is precisely because I hoped—and I still hope—to give the province of Quebec and the French-Canadian people the representation that is essential to its emancipation and its expansion, all this for the greater benefit of Canada as a whole.

As a newcomer to this house, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that I represent, first of all, the aspirations of my fellow-citizens on the provincial level. What I say may be disputed, but I am firmly convinced that my first duty in this house is to work for my province as a whole. Similarly, I recognize that the same duty falls to my colleagues of the various other provinces. If we do so, together we will build marvelous provinces, co-ordinated, of course, by the central government. I say "co-ordinated" and not "centralized", because I see a huge difference between the two. That very fact will bring us to build a country and the provinces will be proud to be a part thereof.

I shall limit myself to a very few remarks on the Speech from the Throne, because those who preceded me have said so much that we will end up thinking that the Prime Minister should never have presented such a program at the opening of the session.

I will say right away, Mr. Speaker, that I am well aware of public opinion regarding the loss of valuable time in the course of each session. I do not have to tell you that I am very interested in changing our parliamentary procedure which will, above all, preserve the practices of a true democracy. Being a new member, it comes to my mind that instead of wasting about ten days in reply to the Speech from the Throne, which is really a repetition of criticism or an oratorial contest, I wonder whether it would not be more logical to allow the party leaders the liberty to edit this speech, if necessary, to approve it or to submit suggestions that would improve the agenda of the current session. This would, in my opinion, eliminate this loss of time in order to deal with priority legislation in the best interests of the Canadian people.

Among other things, it is regrettable that in the Speech from the Throne the right honourable Prime Minister thinks about constitutional reforms over a long period of time. You will agree, Mr. Speaker, that as a Quebecker, I cannot ignore such a declaration. Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister has considered that, due to a rather important vote of confidence he has obtained in the province of Quebec, he is justified in postponing constitutional reforms. If such were the case, he would commit a tremendous error in repeating everywhere that Quebec is a province like the others. This is not right and he knows it.

How can a just society be achieved if, at first, the state of mind and the particular status of French Canadians living in Quebec are not recognized? Whether it is admitted or not, I say there exists a French-Canadian nation in this country and 85 per cent of its people live in Quebec. On behalf of this nation, Mr. Speaker, I want you to believe that there is an urgent need to elaborate this new constitution. Furthermore, in the interests of Canada and considering the future of our country, this is a serious warning I am giving. It is quite urgent that all the party leaders show courage in order to have the rest of the country admit the fact that Quebec is not a province like the others. Only then, realizing our differences and each having his own mentality and his own way of thinking, will we be able to sit around the same table and build the most beautiful country in the world. I would be shirking my duty if I did not say that.

I agree with the Prime Minister when he says that it is not what he says that is important, but what he is going to do. It seems to me that he will find it hard to escape what he said in Montreal on April 2, 1967. For the instruction of the English-speaking majority of the country, he made some rather strong demands concerning the recognition of the rights of French Canadians, among others, a maximum of material and cultural freedom and comfort. He wished for a strong Canada and asserted that the best guarantee of progress for Canada itself was a strong and dynamic country.

Quebec indubitably has a special place in the national scheme. It is impossible to believe in a just society if the new constitution refuses to recognize that Quebec has a certain influence in the field of social security, manpower and vocational training, immigration, radio and television.

Eventually, the house will have to determine to what extent decentralization is necessary so that Quebec, on the one hand, and the federal government, on the other, might fulfil their role efficiently. I trust that the Quebec members in this government will take the measures and the stands required for that purpose.

May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to deeply regret the attitude of this government with regard to a recent decision, namely the winter works program. I have heard the answer given by the Prime Minister to questions put to him recently in the house to the effect that the municipalities were expecting that decision. What is inacceptable, in my opinion, is the fact that such a decision has been taken without official consultations with the municipalities.

In my riding and everywhere in Canada, municipal budgets had been prepared on the basis of those subsidies. Furthermore, it was done at a time of the year, when we already have more than 400,000 unemployed, whereas those works represented for our economy $200 million in wages, materials and so on. I say it again, so that the right hon. Prime Minister can hear it, a just society, it is not quite that.

Mr. Speaker, let us hope that a just society will, in the shortest time possible, attend to the discrepancy between the pensions of the disabled and the blind and those of the old people.

I would not like to miss this opportunity to ask, in the name of justice, that the package bill be introduced in part at first. In view of the various mentalities and beliefs prevailing in this house, a free vote on this question, in due time, is absolutely necessary if we truly believe in a just society.

Before closing my remarks, I too should like to tell the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) that the new international airport would provide for a great deal of opportunities if it were built in the area which I represent. Therefore, in view of the fact that a portion of the north bank of the St. Lawrence river is adjacent to my riding, I think that it would be appropriate to carry out a study on the establishment of the maintenance centre in Lanoraie, which in the first place, would relieve traffic in the Montreal harbour, while at the same time contributing greatly to the economic expansion of that area.

Along the same lines, in view of the fact that, in the northern part of the Montcalm riding, the tourist industry is the first source of income, I would be very happy to see a study carried out on the feasibility of a small airport for two-engine aircrafts in St. Donat. I am convinced that such a venture would provide for the economic stability necessary and longed for in that part of my riding.

I cannot finish my speech without urging the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to act quickly in order that the producers and farmers whom I represent may have the advantage over imported commodities to sell their products.

I must yield to another member, but allow me, Mr. Speaker, to acquaint the Prime Minister with a thought which often occurs to me: What can a member do for his constituency when he is in the opposition? To that, I answer that the undertaking of Prime Minister to establish a just society leads me to believe that the constituencies represented by the members of the opposition in a just society should receive the same attention than those of government members. If I am wrong, I would appreciate it very much if the Prime Minister would let me know.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues may rest assured that I have duly considered my views before stating them. I have done so, merely to serve my constituency, my province and my country, Canada.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to say how honoured I am to represent the people of Okanagan Boundary in this house and to speak in support of the government in this speech from the throne debate. I am particularly pleased to represent Okanagan Boundary riding because this is the first time since it was formed 64 years ago that our area of the country has been represented by a member of the Liberal party. I am most grateful to my constituents who have given me this distinction but I am mindful to a greater degree that they have placed their faith in the great leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Although Okanagan Boundary has not been served by a Liberal member before, it has been represented by men whom many of the members of this house will remember. My immediate predecessor, David Pugh, of the Progressive Conservatives, served in this house for ten years.

Hon. members will remember too the late O. L. Jones, a member of the C.C.F. party, who served with renowned dedication to the affairs of this house and his riding. In earlier years a distinguished politician and member of the Conservative party, Hon. Grote Stirling, contributed wisely and well to his constituents and to the history of the nation. It is my hope that I will do no less than their worst efforts and, God willing, that I may equal their best.

It is a tradition of this house that a new member may describe the beauties of his riding for the enlightenment of hon. members and the nation. As Okanagan Boundary riding encompasses some of the most attractive scenery in Canada, and as this is so widely known and so generally acclaimed, I will only mention it in passing because it is important to what I have to say a little later on.

When the first white men travelled through the valleys of the Okanagan, Similkameen and Boundary country, when they established the fur brigade trail from Fort Astoria through the Okanagan to Kamloops in the first half of the nineteenth century, they found a region of beautiful but unusual geography. Much of the region was arid, dry. The Okanagan valley is like a finger of the Great American Desert pointing across the 49th parallel into the heart of British Columbia. Water was the problem then and water is the problem now. Water will be the problem in the future.

Early settlers discovered that these arid bench lands would bloom like the Garden of Eden with the application of water. Today every orchard, ranch and home depends on plentiful artificial irrigation for its existence. Without it land returns quickly to sage brush, grease wood and cactus.

Just 20 years ago the first good paved road connecting the riding with Vancouver was built, and the tourist industry began in earnest. Since that time the population has mushroomed. Demand for water throughout the whole watershed has increased seriously and pollution has become an alarming factor. In the last seven years alone the population has increased by 25 per cent. It is anticipated that this increase will continue and accelerate.

Water consumption now averages about 340,000 acre feet per year. The average supply is approximately equal to the demand, but in dry years it is as low as 80,000 acre feet per year. We have a serious problem. If there were two dry years in a row the people of Okanagan would have nothing to drink but apple juice. A proposal to divert water from the Shuswap river has been made and this may solve the problem, provided a satisfactory arrangement can be worked out with the residents of the area from which the water would be diverted.

I said pollution was an alarming problem—alarming because the pollution time clock has suddenly started to speed up. Estimates of the time available to solve the problem made by knowledgeable authorities only three or four years ago have been reduced from 15 years to ten years, to five years, and now it is feared that in the case of at least one lake it may already be past the point of no return.

At this point I wish to digress very slightly to say that the pollution I am talking about is not raw sewage. Dr. David Clarke, a highly qualified, Harvard-trained medical health officer of the South Okanagan health unit, recently said, "We have about $5 million in sewage treatment facilities in the Okanagan and they are as good as any around." What I am talking about is the eutrophication of water, the growth of green and brown algae, vegetable matter, the kind of thing that occurs because of the input of fertilizers—fertilizers like phosphates in household detergents.

The people of Okanagan Boundary riding are prepared to help themselves in dealing with this problem. The city of Penticton, for example, has installed a system to pump treated effluent on to agricultural land for irrigation. The city of Kelowna will build a $1,370,000 tertiary treatment disposal plant this year. It will be the most modern plant in Canada, and I would point out that the cost will be borne by a city of 17,000 people. If outside assistance from the federal government were available, variations in the operation for experimental work could be included and all Canada would benefit. The problem is bigger than individual communities can meet. It is a problem that requires the active co-operation of all three levels of government, if it is to be solved.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that no member of this house is in favour of pollution. I am equally sure that no member of any provincial or municipal administration in Canada is in favour of pollution. But despite the avowed concern of all, the problem is not being solved fast enough. Rivers—yes, they can be brought back if badly polluted; but eutrophication of lakes may for all practical purposes be irreversible beyond a certain point.

Wherein lies the problem? The federal government has done much, that is true. The Burlington centre is an outstanding contribution to the study of pollution. In many other ways this government is to be commended for doing most of what is being done in Canada in this field today. But the most important link in the problem has yet to be forged. I refer to the need for effective co-operation between all levels of government, municipal, provincial and federal.

Inter-government co-operation so far has been almost a total failure. Pollution cuts across the jurisdiction of all levels of government. Each has its own rights and responsibilities, and all must work together. If ever there is to be a test of effective political manoeuvring it will be in creating an effective three level striking force to battle the causes of pollution.

I am well aware that the federal government has attempted to work with the provincial governments on this matter. Ottawa, ever sensitive to the need of provincial governments to appear competent in their own jurisdictions, has been extremely cautious of moving too fast, of stepping on provincial toes. Mr. Speaker, there is a time for caution and a time for action. In the case of the Okanagan water basin it is a time for emergency action.

Nearly two years ago, the then minister of energy, mines and resources proposed at a pollution conference in Montreal that his department would be prepared to enter into agreements with the provinces on investigation leading to the preparation of regional framework plans for water development. This offer was repeated again in a press release from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources dated May 5, 1967. To this date, the provincial governments of Canada have given little response to this offer. It is time then that this government took more direct action. Pollution will not wait. The people will not wait. The people of Canada must be told again that the federal government is ready, willing and able to act.

On behalf of the people of Okanagan Boundary riding I am asking that this government make it publicly and abundantly clear again that it is willing to enter into an agreement with the province of British Columbia to establish a water basin demonstration district in the Okanagan watershed.

I said earlier that water was the problem, the very life of Okanagan Boundary riding. A water basin demonstration district would provide the research for our pollution problem and it would tackle the problem of the total supply of water for the region. It could determine how soon our limited reserves of water will run out, where to acquire more water without disturbing existing interests elsewhere and how to supply water to arid regions without water now.

There are other ways that this government can tackle pollution and I should like to suggest two of them now. A major cause of pollution in many areas is the phosphate found in household detergents. Scientists estimate that as much as 35 per cent of this phosphate in our lakes and streams comes from this source. If this is true, then we must take effective action to eliminate this factor. We could encourage industry to find a suitable substitute by grants for research and, after a suitable period, we could and should penalize or even prohibit the use of phosphate-laden detergent.

Another area where this government could act now is in grants to industry for approved pollution control measures. At the present time, capital cost allowances are made to industries for this purpose but this method is wrong, in that an industry has to make a profit before it can take advantage of a tax write-off. New industries and co-operatives may well cause pollution but not have any profits.

One of the better recommendations of the Carter commission was that tax payments and incentives should be separate things. If the government wants to aid an industry, it should do so directly by grants and then collect whatever taxes are due separately. Here is an example of a logical application of Carter's theory. The need for an industry to correct a pollution problem has nothing to do with what profit it makes or indeed if it makes a profit at all. Let us eliminate the tax concessions and supply equivalent grants for pollution control where they are required.

I have now spoken for several minutes on the waters of the earth. I think it is only fitting that I should raise my sights and talk about the stars in the heavens. This problem affects the people of Okanagan Boundary at this time too.

I am sure that all the hon. members of this house will understand that peculiar feeling of dismay that I had when, upon barely arriving in Ottawa as the eager new member for Okanagan Boundary riding, I switched on the television and learned that the largest federal project under development in my riding, the Queen Elizabeth observatory, had been cancelled.

[Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary).]

My mind went back to the warm summer day two years ago when the then minister of energy, mines and resources officially opened the road to the top of Mount Kobau. There were very high hopes that day. The minister said in his remarks:

> Now, instead of the four freedoms, we have five freedoms—for we have added the right of every Canadian to look through the best telescope in the world and see the stars!

Yes, it was to be the best telescope in the world for, even though it was not the largest mirror, it was to be made better so that Canada would be ahead of the world in astronomy. In a report in April of this year by the dominion astrophysics observatory at Victoria, it is stated:

> A comparison of this blank and the inspection reports from all recent blanks over 103 inches indicate that it is by far the best large mirror blank ever made.

Now this is all finished. Like the smashing of the Arrow we are going to throw the great project on the scrap heap. The scientists that would have been Canadians will now give the benefits of their talents to other countries. It reminds me of that song that was popular in the thirties that went, "Once I built a tower to the sky. Now it's done. Buddy, can you spare a dime".

We have been told that the failure of the project was because of financial considerations. I am sure that the people of Canada can understand the need for economies; but if that is the cause and the whole cause, then surely we can look forward to the day when we can get our shoes half-soled again. Surely, at some time in the future, a nation such as Canada can find the money to complete so noble a project. But wait: We are going to sell the mirror. The best piece of optical glass ever made is going to be sold on the second hand market. Like impoverished nobility, we are going to pawn the family jewels for some pittance in a second hand store. I say to the hon. minister, turn back. The little money the mirror will bring will never pay for our loss of national pride and self-esteem. Canadians have seen the stars.

There is another reason to take a second look at this cancellation. Ever since the days of Louis Riel western Canadians have felt to some degree an alienation from the rest of Canada. A group of eastern Canadian scientists have reversed a decision affecting western Canada, and western Canadians are angry. The government decided to go ahead with the Queen Elizabeth telescope on the best scientific advice it could obtain. On that advice, it decided to locate the telescope on top of a mountain in British Columbia. It built a multi-million dollar road to the top of the mountain. It bought the world's greatest lens blank. It organized scientists to begin the construction of this great instrument and set up laboratories at the University of British Columbia. Then another group of scientists came to the minister and told him that the scientific secretariat was wrong.

The minister has apparently agreed with them and the project is to be abandoned totally, finally and irrevocably. What am I to tell my people? Am I to tell them that the Prime Minister's science secretariat is a group of blockheads; that they are incompetent; that they have led us into a monumental, multi-million dollar error?

It is important to Canadians and the world that this government reconsider its decision to cancel the Queen Elizabeth observatory. Canadians can and should lead the world in this field of peaceful research. If it must be delayed we can accept that, but we cannot accept the permanent cancellation of this great work. It is not too late to reconsider. Nothing of this great work need be lost and all Canada and indeed all mankind will gain.

On these matters I ask for the interest and support of members of this house.

● (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it has not been my policy during the years I have been in this house to join in repetition of the compliments that usually adorn the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. But there is one word that I want to say. Like all members of this house I am delighted at the re-election of Your Honour as Mr. Speaker. It is indeed a tribute to the manner in which you conducted the proceedings of this House of Commons during the last parliament. It is also an indication of the belief of all members that you can lead us as we endeavour to make significant reforms in the procedures of this house. I believe, and I say this having had the privilege of taking part in certain consultations, that we are a lot closer together than the gentlemen of the fourth estate might realize. It is my hope that we will make some advantageous and significant changes in the rules and procedures of this House of Commons, and I hope we will make them soon.

It may seem strange, it may even be hard to believe, if as an opposition member I say there are some things in the speech from the throne that I like and even some things in it with which I agree. I have already indicated that I agree with the proposal that there should be reforms in the procedures of parliament. I also want to state my complete agreement with the proposition that we should work toward a just society. Likewise I give my full support to every effort that can be made to eradicate poverty. I also believe that we are going to have to develop some new programs and some new approaches to our social problems. I accept the proposition that if we are going to achieve justice for our people we have to engage in economic development even beyond that which we have experienced up to the present time. I also support the proposition that we need to concentrate on regional development and on putting an end to regional disparities. We must make an effort to see that the just society extends from sea to sea and from our southern border to the northpole.

Even after it has been said and admitted by all of us that we agree with the just society and want to work toward the eradication of poverty there is still the burning question, what about the people who need help now? It is because that question is perhaps the kind of question that best represents the appeal of the people I represent, in the inner heart of a great city, that I rise to take part in this debate.

I urge that this parliament and this government, in its enthusiasm for new programs and for a just society in a decade or two from now, must not forget the poverty, the injustice and the suffering that many Canadians are experiencing right now. I emphasize the fact that many of these people in whose name I speak will not live to see the just society, will not live to see the eradication of poverty.

I am not prepared to settle for an academic exercise that refers to something better ten or fifteen years from now. I feel that this parliament has a responsibility to make life better for people who need help now. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, without the slightest hint of apology I return in this parliament to two or three subjects that the older members will realize I have raised time and time again for more than a quarter of a century.

I wish I had the attention of at least three ministers, but I see that at least one of those whose attention I want is here. I refer to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr.

Dubé). I mention these three because the particular areas of need that I think this parliament should do something about come under their departments.

First, this parliament will not be worthy of praise for having worked toward a just society unless it does something to improve the lot of our old age pensioners now. I realize that there is a tendency in this age of so-called affluence, in this period when we have done a lot in the social welfare fields, to say: Look at what we have done; we have got old age security pensions up to $75 a month, $76.50 this year and $78 per month in January; we have added to it a guaranteed income supplement which pays $30 on top of that for some people, and we have done a lot in this field, so why can't people like the member for Winnipeg North Centre leave this alone for a time?

This cannot be left alone because too many of our pensioners and too many of our older people hear on the radio and see on television comments about a just society, but their experience is one of struggle just to keep body and soul together. I suggest that one of the clear pieces of evidence that we have of that need, that we have not yet done enough for our present old age pensioners, is to be found in the statistics available with respect to the guaranted income supplement. This is the extra amount of $30 that old age security pensioners can receive if they meet a certain income test. The figures from the Department of National Health and Welfare indicate that almost 60 per cent of the people who are drawing old age security pensions have qualified for the guranteed income supplement. That means that almost 60 per cent of all the people in Canada 67 years of age and over have little or nothing else than their old age security pensions. I know that many of the other 40 per cent are little better off. I might also point out that approximately 60 per cent of those who do qualify for the guaranteed income supplement qualify for the full $30, which means that they have nothing else.

All the talk in the world about a just society, about a new age and about all the things we are going to do for youth—and for God's sake let us do all we can for the youth of this country while they are young and before they become old age pensioners—will not do away with the necessity in the name of justice and humanity of doing something now for our present old age pensioners.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

When the private members notices of motion appear on the order paper in a day or two, as they will, hon. members will find in my name a resolution which will be no surprise to them. I suggest in that resolution that parliament at this session should raise the old age security pension to $125 a month and that it should make that amount available to all our pensioners without any means or income test on any portion of it.

I also urge that the eligible age be brought down to 65 right away, and I urge that the arrangement for the pension to be increased as the cost of living goes up be altered so that the full increase in the cost of living will be reflected in the increase to the pension. It is not good enough to have an arrangement under which that increase can be only 2 per cent per year, particularly when you realize that for a number of years after the pension was set at $75 there was no increase at all. Therefore there is all of that backlog in the cost of living increase back to the day when $75 was the fixed amount. I say the adjustment of old age security pensions should take this into account.

There is also a problem that arises because of married couples of different ages. I refer to cases where the husband can be on a pension and the wife not, or vice-versa. Even with all of the social security and social welfare programs we have in this country, and there are many, there are still many people for whom there is nothing, just because they do not fit the letter of some law. In other words, here is an adjustment that will have to be made, namely seeing to it that if the breadwinner, at any rate, of a married couple is not working, the pension should be paid for the two of them, certainly if their ages are not more than five or ten years apart.

So I urge as strongly as I can that this parliament get over the notion that I think is here far too much, namely that this is not a subject to talk about, that we have done enough about this in the last few years, that we are going on and to build a just society, that we are going to reach the millennium 10 or 12 years from now; therefore let the old age pension stay where it is.

I quite agree that there can be better ways than the programs we now have in this and other fields. I favour the concept of a guaranteed annual income—I go a lot further than a negative income tax—to provide a generous allowance to all our people. We must get away from this business of tying the right to live to the question of whether you can get a job.

I favour the concept of greater economic development in order that we may support better welfare programs and provide a guaranteed annual income. I favour the tackling of regional disparities, and I believe this country will do these things. I hope and believe that ten years from now Canada will be a better country for all age groups. But there are people in their late 60's, 70's and 80's now who may not live to see this happen. These people are in difficult circumstances and need assistance now. I urge that action on this question be taken during the life of this parliament.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that there were three ministers whose ears I wanted to get, if I could. The second is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). I come again to a particular group on whose behalf the older members in this house have heard me speak times without number. I refer to retired civil servants and their widows, retired members of the permanent armed forces, retired R.C.M.P. personnel, and so on.

The battle for something to be done for these people is a long one. I have recounted it so often that I will not do so today. But I remind the house that on May 8, 1967, a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons tabled a report in which there was a unanimous recommendation for increases in the pensions of federal superannuates. We had the firm promise of the government that consideration would be given to that report. I personally had even more than that; I had the assurance that something would be done, and would be done within a limited period of time, indeed within a few weeks. That was in May, 1967. We are now in September, 1968, and still nothing has been done.

When I asked the Minister of Finance the other day in the question period whether something was going to be done to implement that report, I got the same old answer, "The matter is under consideration". The smiles on the faces of those on the front benches seemed to me to say, "There's Stanley again on this old question. Why doesn't he leave us alone?" Well, he is not going to leave them alone.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): These people are former employees of the federal government and we have a special responsibility to them, not only as old people and citizens but as former employees. These people hear all this talk about the just society, all this talk about an attack on poverty, and they wonder whether any of that justice will come to them. They also wonder whether any of their poverty will be removed before their days on earth are done.

The report our committee put in was a well documented report. We went into all the aspects of this question. We ascertained the amounts of money in the various superannuation funds. We ascertained the fact that the amount of interest being paid on the funds produces more money each year than is paid out in pensions. The pensioners themselves are quite convinced that their pensions could be increased by sizeable amounts without any drain on the treasury.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, in pleading for this to be done for retired civil servants I am pleading for the acceptance of a principle that I think we will have to put into effect with regard to pensions across the board, namely the principle that people should not be expected to live the rest of their lives on the amount of income that was indicated for them the day they went on pension.

Pensions have to be escalated. People in other sectors of society get a chance to improve their income in one way or another. Our old people are part of society. This is a day, and I welcome it, when there is a tremendous emphasis on youth, on the opportunities which should be created for youth and on the things youth should do for this country. But old age is also a way of life. Older people also have rights, and I suggest that an elementary right, justice itself, is being denied to these people when they are told, once they have their pension, that costs may go up, standards may rise, ways of life may change, but they must get by on the same amount. This means that their standard of living is deteriorated.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the name of the retired civil servants, and because there is at stake here a principle that I think we have to work into the whole fabric of our pension arrangements, I urge that the government stop the stalling and delaying that we have had on this important question. The government has admitted in part the principle that pensions have to escalate. We have that, of course, in the old age security pension, now that there is the automatic arrangement for an increase as the cost of living goes up. We have the same principle in the Canada Pension Plan. But in both those cases we have put on the 2 per cent ceiling to which I referred a few moments ago, which means that the increases people get do not reflect the over-all increase in the cost of living.

But I am pleading for more than that. I am pleading for more than just a sufficient increase in pensions, whether they be for retired people generally or retired civil servants, to cover increased costs. I am pleading for more than just enough to keep their purchasing power up to what it was; that would only enable them to buy the same basket of goods and services that they did on retirement. I am pleading for the opportunity for them to participate in the rising standard of living, in improved social conditions, the affluent society, and the rest of it. These people may be retired now, but it was their effort and work which brought this country to where it was when they retired. They laid the foundation for what we now enjoy. Therefore, surely they have the right to participate in the improvements that take place during their years of retirement.

We hear a lot about the just society. We hear a lot about humanitarian instincts. Let us apply these instincts to the young, the middle-aged, the working people and all our citizens. For God's sake let us apply them to the people who are starving in Biafra, but let us not forget this tremendous body of people in our own land, namely our retired population. According to the figures of the Department of National Health and Welfare, there are about one and a quarter million people on old age security, and in view of the fact that this is a universal program this would be the number of Canadians 77 years of age or over. Amongst those one and a quarter million people are far too many who are below the poverty line, and at the point where even subsistence is difficult.

So, Mr. Speaker, I urge as strongly as I can that the two ministers to whom I have been addressing my remarks thus far, namely the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Finance, bring in this session proposals regarding these two matters, that is, an increase in the old age security pension and increases in the pensions of our federal superannuates.

The third group on whose behalf I wish to speak in these few remarks this afternoon is that group of veterans whose income consists in the main of war veterans allowance. I am delighted to have the attention and the ear of the new Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé). I forgive him for his answer to me the other day when I asked whether the matter of the War Veterans Allowance Act would be referred to any committee dealing with veterans affairs, because, after all, he is a new minister. He said to me that whatever terms of reference that committee would have, would have to be decided by the house. He knows that any motion giving the committee its terms of reference, although it has to be passed by the house, would have to be drafted and brought in by the minister. I am pleading with him, if he is not prepared to bring in legislation of his own, to see to it that this subject is referred to any committee which deals with veterans affairs.

Much has been said lately about the report of the Woods committee. It is a very interesting document. Far be it from me to claim that I have read it all. I have a copy of it and it stands about a foot and a half high. The veterans organizations have welcomed it, but it deals exclusively with the administration of the pension legislation which relates to disability pensions. It does not deal at all with the War Veterans Allowance Act, which is the legislation to which veterans have to resort if they do not have actual disabilities on the basis of which to claim their pensions. As we all know, disability pensions are granted without any means test. On the other hand, allowances under the War Veterans Allowance Act are subject to a means test. I find that generally veterans across this country find it hard to accept the fact that other people receive their old age pension and their income supplements in addition to whatever income they may already have, but when a veteran living on the war veterans allowance receives his old age security pension or his guaranteed income supplement, he receives it as a matter of right but it comes off his war veterans allowance in accordance with the means test. I recognize that veterans living on the war veterans allowance as well as the old age security pension, the guaranteed income supplement and the small amount of the war veterans allowance which they get, are receiving a little more than some others. However, I do not think this is good enough in relation to the debt this country owes them, and to the principles that were established with regard to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

As I have said many a time, most of the correspondence which I receive as a member of parliament comes from people who are in need, such as old age pensioners and retired civil servants. There are about 45,000 retired civil servants and widows in the country. I have not yet heard from them all but it is getting pretty close to it. I welcome their letters and their support and I hope that before long we will win their case. I also receive a great many letters from veterans, but in almost all cases they are from veterans who have to depend on the War Veterans Allowance Act. It has been a godsend for the past several decades, but it does seem to me that real improvements can be made to it, and I hope the Minister of Veterans Affairs will do his best to bring in legislation on his own initiative to increase the allowances or to minimize the effect of the various means tests, particularly where other government legislation is concerned, or, failing that, that he will at least refer the matter to the committee on veterans affairs.

I can imagine what some people will say about this kind of speech. Here again is the member for Winnipeg North Centre who wishes to increase the old age security pension to $125 a month without a means or income test, who wants retired civil servants to receive increased pensions, and who wants war veterans allowances increased, and yet he has not said where the money is to come from. I make one suggestion. The government should look into the Carter report, particularly those sections of it which refer to those groups of people who are escaping taxation. No new rates need be imposed, nor does the income tax have to be increased. All that has to be done is to impose taxation on those sources of income that are escaping it, and the Carter report makes it clear where they are. The government will then have a sufficient amount of money to pay the various pension increases for which I plead, and a lot more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am happy to express again my pleasure that you, sir, have been re-elected as the Speaker of this House of Commons. I look forward to the improvements in our procedures which I am confident we will make under your leadership. I wish to say again how delighted I am at the idea that we are going to work for a just society, for the eradication of poverty, for the millennium in Canada. But it will take a little while, it might even take five, 10 or 20 years. In the meantime, I want and I urge this parliament to have enough human compassion and enough realization of what suffering means to do something at least for the three groups of people in whose name I speak this afternoon: our old age pensioners, our federal superannuates and our war veterans.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, allow me first of all to congratulate you on your appointment to the office of Speaker of the house. I am convinced of your impartiality and I remain convinced that your eyes will often turn to us to allow us to ask the questions which are in the interest of the Canadian people, because the members of the Ralliement Créditiste are the voice of the people.

At the beginning of this speech, Mr. Speaker, I would like also to extend my warmest congratulations to the Deputy Speaker and the Deputy Chairman of committees on their appointment.

I would like also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand). Their eloquence would have impressed Louis XIII, and yet they remained true to the pomp imposed on us by the British parliamentary system.

I also wish to congratulate, in this house, the member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), leader of the Ralliement Créditiste who, on September 16 last, celebrated the 22nd anniversary of his arrival to parliament. This worthy representative of the people was able to stir, in Canada, a feeling of pride in being a Canadian; in addition, he encouraged honest politics through the Ralliement Créditiste, refusing the help of election funds. It is costing our leader his health, his courage, his energy. Bourassa would be proud to hear a French Canadian fight for our rights with so much fairness. Indeed, after the great creditist speech he made last Monday night, I can say that we are at the dawn of a new era in Canada because the Social Credit will get rid of the obstacles created by man against national prosperity. The Canadian people, on their own initiative and by their own efforts, will bring about, through the Social Credit, an era of prosperity, liberty and security for all.

Since I represent here the riding of Frontenac, let me describe it for you. It lies south of the south shore of the St. Lawrence. Laurierville, Plessisville, St. Ferdinand d'Halifax, Inverness, Black Lake, Thetford Mines and Courcelles form its boundary and it includes 42 parishes and 34,000 voters. It is surrounded by good creditist neighbours, the ridings of Beauce, Lotbinière, Lévis and Richmond.

As everyone knows, the historic name of Frontenac comes from France. Count Louis de Frontenac, born on May 22, 1622, in the castle of Saint-Germain, was the son of Henri Buade, a comrade in arms of Louis XIII. In June of the same year, Louis XIII became the godfather of a baby who was later to become the Count of Frontenac. Educated by the Jesuits, he later took part in several campaigns during the Thirty Years' War as field-marshal. In 1672, he was appointed Governor General of New France. He had married in 1648 Anne de la Grange, who stayed in France to help her husband at the French court. On June 28, 1672, Frontenac sailed for New France from La Rochelle. Since he had had worthy predecessors in the persons of the sieurs de Courcelles and Jean Talon, there were no great administrative problems. Frontenac was twice in New France. Rather like some Créditiste members of Parliament, he came back a second time.

It was in 1680 that the Sieur Provost, commanding officer of the city of Québec, was informed by Abenakis indians from Acadia that a fleet was sailing towards the St. Lawrence from Boston. Realizing the attack was imminent, Frontenac ordered all available troops to be brought to Québec. Three days later, the Boston fleet sailing towards Québec under the command of Sir William Phipps was within sight shortly before 10 o'clock, on October 17. A pinnace with a white flag left the flagship and brought Major Savage to Château Saint-Louis where he presented Frontenac with an ultimatum, calling upon him, for his security and satisfaction, to accept immediate and unconditional surrender; failing this, the town would be stormed. Frontenac replied that he would not wait an hour before giving his answer, which became historical: "No, I can only reply to your general from the muzzles of my guns."

That proud reply of a patriot made immortal the name of Frontenac. Indeed, in the city of Québec, the famous Château Frontenac enshrines the names of the discoverers of Canada.

In this year 1968, the voters of the riding of Frontenac also said to those who contributed to the Liberal party campaign funds—in short, they said to the world of finance: "Go tell your master that we will answer through a Creditiste vote", for everyone has known for 100 years now that both grits and tories made fine promises, but did nothing about them. Concerning the team led by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the absolute majority he asked for has done nothing but, as a result of the Speech from the Throne, disappointed the people. "Trudeaumania" was brought about by a well-organized, highly expensive progaganda, after the style of the Beatles or with the enthusiasm of Elvis Presley, and has given rise in Canada to what we could call "Trudeaufraud", because the people have been misled as to the true intentions of the government. First of all, we hoped that family allowances would be raised as the cost of living increased, and we expected interest-free loans to school boards and municipalities, as is done in foreign countries. Nothing of the kind has materialized. On the contrary, we see a government disconcertingly uncompromising because of its majority.

Here is proof of what I am saying. In Biafra so far, two million people have died because the federal troops of Nigeria want to protect the oil wells of the Shell Company. The Nigerians are pushed to commit genocide by England which sells arms and airplanes to drop bombs on the civilian population of Biafra. While that goes on, our Prime Minister refuses to give the names of the subscribers to the party's election fund. I am asking the Prime Minister and his government if Shell did not make one of those $100,000 donations, which would explain why he will not get involved in the affairs of England which, once again, makes possible the murder of civilians by selling airplanes to the federal troops of Nigeria. Mothers, children writhing in pain appeal to the Prime Minister for help to alleviate their misery. Since he has no children of his own, I can understand that he may not be too deeply affected by that drama, but I beg him to listen for one moment to the cries of those children. If he had children who were crying: Mummy, I am hungry, I am sure he would hurry to England and make an attempt to prevent the sale of offensive weapons.

Our celebrations for the opening of this 28th parliament gave no indication of the tragedy going on in African countries. Mr. Speaker, I cannot but tell the Prime Minister: You who profess yourself a champion of human rights, who, as an adventurous young man, wanted to go to Cuba to congratulate Castro, hurry up and fly to-morrow to England to meet your masters and ask them to stop these great slaughters.

To his ministerial colleagues, I say: Understanding Liberals, who are compelled to accept such an adamant Prime Minister, arouse from your torpor, for if there was a time when remarks such as "Ti-Toine, shut up", could be heard in Quebec, now there is here a conspiracy of silence.

This is another example. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) says that the package bill will be divided into several parts; the Prime Minister says: No, no and no. Everybody objects to the discontinuance of the winter works; we ask that they should be carried out for another year. The Prime Minister says: No, no and no. It is not surprising that he should say to his ministers: You keep quiet, because in Cité Libre, issue of April 1962—which is fairly recent—he stated and I shall quote word for word because we are often accused of not doing so. For those who would like some information, all these details can be found here at the parliament. Therefore, I quote from page 4 of the diary written by the present Prime Minister, in the March 1961 issue of Cité Libre:

For instance, the contempt shown by the English for the French language never appeared to us equal in depth and in stupidity, to the contempt of those among us who spoke and taught it so abominably. The infringements upon the educational rights of the French Canadians in the other provinces—show the mediocrity—

Let my Liberal friends note this:

—the continuous mediocrity of our representatives in Ottawa.

Those were the words spoken by Mr. Trudeau in 1961.

I continue with a quotation from the same magazine Cité Libre. As may be seen on page 6 of the June 22 issue, the present Prime Minister stated:

• (5:50 p.m.)

... when St-Laurent gave his blessing to the Duplessis policy in the Ungava; when the party, as one man, declared against the provincial income tax; when Mr. Lesage was a centralizing federal minister; when Mr. Lapalme, imposed upon Ottawa to get rid of Godbout, still fought desperately to free himself from the reactionary clique; when the progressive views of a Jean-Louis Gagnon were considered annoying; when an Hector Langevin was held in disfavour by the party for lending his name to the Le Devoir subscription campaign; when the Liberal federation was still wet behind its ears; when the newspaper Le Canada disappeared for lack of readers, for lack of subscriptions and lack of ideology; when, in short—and that was not so many years ago—the provincial-Liberal party was still a heavy body without soul and Isocrates spoke of its "Convention of the Last Chance" ...

Here is a last quotation from the present Prime Minister, for we could produce several of them, and time flies.

I refer this time to page 10 of the April 1962 issue:

Consequently, if we consider the few nationalistic victories won in Ottawa after years of hard fighting, we could not probably find a single one which could not have been won at a single meeting of the cabinet by one of our representatives, had he been of C. D. Howe's caliber. We have to admit it, all the French-Canadian ministers put together have almost never weighted as much as a bilingual cheque or a hotel name.

It is still Mr. Trudeau who refers to our French-Canadian ministers of that time and he continued in his article of August and September 1962, with these words:

The Quebec electorate felt, in March 1958, that, if it voted Conservative, it would be able to get rid at last of a delegation which security had made pretentious, tyrannical, backward and incompetent. French Canadians did what they knew they had to do: the party of Laurier, Lapointe, St-Laurent, the party which claimed it was the only and undefeatable champion of the French-Canadian cause, the glorious Liberal party which, and so on, was cast aside like an old shoe.

That is still Mr. Trudeau speaking, Mr. Speaker. I shall quote one last passage. I have only gone over 75 pages of the writings of the present Prime Minister, and I shall quote one last one, written in 1957, when his trend of thought was already socialist and he was turning towards the New Democratic Party. I quote:

Finally, the height of impotence, both on the part of the Liberals and of the Conservatives, was, during that whole campaign, the absolute silence maintained by both parties concerning the pipe line scandal.

When one is reminded to what extent this scandal contributed to the Liberal downfall and the return to power of the Tories in June 1957, when one sees that, within the Tory party, such international financial combines have continued to create fabulous profits for a chosen few, to the detriment of our general interest, the silence of the old parties shows clearly their capacity for action. This is all the more surprising since, on both sides, there was much talk about pan-Canadian nationalism during the campaign. The Liberals came out with the promise of a Canadian flag which they had carefully stored away during their 22 years in power.

I am still quoting our new Prime Minister. I shall now read excerpts from this last article, which shows a socialist way of thinking.

the turn of mind of a Socialist who became a Liberal. In the October 1958 issue of Cité Libre, on page 9, he wrote that:

> Stanley Knowles, one of the leaders of the C.C.F., commented that resolution in the Social-Démocrate (May 1958, p. 6):
> —"Do all those changes herald the end of the C.C.F.? If our loyalty to the C.C.F. had only hinged on a name, it would be the end, indeed. The time has come to build an organization which will be the party of a greater number of citizens." Since the national C.C.F. strong in its distinguished parliamentary traditions and in the support of 10% of the voters, feels compelled however to admit the ineffectiveness of its present structure, we may hope that the Quebec C.C.F. will take stock, a bit more realistically, of its true efficiency and will modify its course accordingly.
> But we have not reached that point. I am still trying to show the poorness of the political thinking in Quebec and even though that of the C.C.F. has been interesting, it is a fact that it has hardly been present in our province.

As he could not see a C.C.F. presence, he chose to turn toward the Liberals.

May I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is now six o'clock?

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, before the house adjourns perhaps I could announce the business for tomorrow, which will be to continue with the address debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being six o'clock this house stands adjourned till tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to standing order, subsection (2) of section 2.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 19, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION RESPECTING OFF-SHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the lapse of time since the Supreme Court rendered its decision relating to mineral rights off the coast of British Columbia, is the Prime Minister able to inform us whether it is the intention of the government to proceed with any further references to the Supreme Court relating to mineral rights off the coast of other provinces or is the government now prepared to engage in negotiations with the provinces regarding off-shore mineral rights.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I believe there are two parts to the question. On the question of negotiation, Mr. Pearson had indicated that we did intend to reach equitable arrangements by negotiation with the provincial governments once the Supreme Court had established the law, as it has. These equitable arrangements will have to be found in negotiation with the provinces.

With regard to the position taken by other provinces in respect of Hudson Bay, our position is that the boundaries have been well defined by the 1912 act and that they follow the coast line of the provinces.

Mr. Stanfield: My question relating to other provinces does not necessarily relate to Hudson Bay but rather to possible differences with regard to the legal proposition. In view of the questions I put to his predecessor, the former prime minister, last winter requesting a declaration of intention on the part of the government concerning whether it intended to proceed with further references regarding rights in other provinces or whether it was prepared to engage in negotiations, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether in view of the lapse of time the government is now able to indicate to the house whether it intends to proceed by way of further legal proceedings or by negotiation.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand the question. We do not intend to proceed by further references. We intend to proceed by negotiation, and I will have a proposition for the provinces very soon.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question which relates to the underwater resources of Hudson Bay and the agreement reached by the governments of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba to divide those resources among themselves.

In view of the statement by one of the provincial ministers to the effect that the provinces had been led to believe that "if we agree, the federal government would withdraw", will the Prime Minister now confide to the house and to the country the nature of any negotiations or undertakings given by the federal government to these three provinces in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: No undertaking whatsoever has been given to these three provinces in this regard, but the offer to discuss the whole subject on an equitable basis is of course open to them. However, there has been no commitment by the federal government that it would do more than that.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—OBJECTIONS TO PROPOSED PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on a subject which has been dealt with before. In view of the fact that the administration in Washington has objected to the price of Chrysler cars in the United States, has the minister made a similar objection to the company in Canada, or if not does he intend to do so?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, from the beginning of this questioning on automobile prices, I have been trying to differentiate the administration of the Canada-United States automobile agreement from the general pricing policy. I have been trying to give an account of the advantages of the agreement.

The general pricing policy is one for which I am not individually responsible. The Prime Minister has already indicated what are his views and plans on that subject. This is the kind of division of subject that I have tried to convince the house should be made.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question and address it to the right hon. Prime Minister. I should like to ask him whether it is his or his government's intention to object to the increase in price which has been announced by the Chrysler corporation.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not exactly followed all the context, but the hon. member knows the federal government has no control over contractual price setting between a consumer and a dealer in respect of automobiles or other similar types of goods.

Mr. Lewis: I should like to ask a supplementary question. My question did not suggest that the Prime Minister or the government would impose any control. I asked whether he or his government as a whole intended to object to the increase in price as being unjustified, in the same way that Washington has objected.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member explain the way in which he thinks we could object?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the minister's responsibility for consumer prices, will he initiate an investigation into the increase of car prices in Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), that I was considering the establishment of a committee in this area. The Prime Minister earlier said that we as a government were considering our position with regard to costs, and the publication of a white paper. All these matters are closely related to each other.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the time involved in organizing the arrangements suggested by the minister, will he consider an immediate reference of this problem to the consumer advisory council?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the consumer advisory council has not yet been appointed. I have appointed the chairman, and expect to appoint the rest of the council by the end of the month.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF FREE POLITICAL BROADCASTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In order better to inform the public on Canadian politics, does the right hon. Prime Minister intend to suggest an increase in the number of free broadcasts on the national network, in French or in English, in order to let the public know what is happening in the House of Commons?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a question I should like to discuss with the Secretary of State.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING MINISTERIAL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of reports that Canada shares the opposition of France to a NATO ministerial meeting on the implications to the alliance of the invasion of Czechoslovakia, will the minister clarify Canada's position and say whether this country is or is not supporting the view that such a meeting should be held?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said in reply to a question yesterday, we have been participating with other members of the NATO alliance and the council in considering the implications of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia. Various proposals have been made in respect of a meeting of the council and the ministers concerned. No decision has been reached as yet. We are taking a position in accordance with Canada's interests, and we are neither supporting nor opposing anyone else at the present time.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, in view of the questions asked in this house earlier in this session and the answers given by the right hon. Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will the Prime Minister give a positive assurance to the house that there will be no change in either Canada's commitment or Canada's position in NATO without prior disclosure and the opportunity for debate in this house?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING FREIGHT RATE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that last week the minister could not indicate what action the government would take to assist shippers in the Atlantic provinces because of the exorbitant l.c.l. rates, can the minister now tell the house whether some form of immediate relief is contemplated?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there have been no specific developments in this area since last week. As I indicated then, every effort is being made to find something more effective for the Atlantic provinces than the provisions which have been in force previously. However, this is a very complicated matter, as my hon. friend knows, and the range of suggestions is not as broad or as promising as one would like to see. I can assure him of diligent study at this stage in the hope that we can come up with something a little more satisfactory.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the increases in l.c.l. rates range as high as 400 per cent over what was previously in effect, and that these rates have now been in effect since last September, could the minister place a moratorium on these rates until he is certain the C.N.R. should have imposed them?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, all possible alternatives are under study, but I am not in a position this morning to indicate what the government's position might be.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING LANGUAGES LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In the preparation of the official languages bill, has the government previously consulted the government of the province of Quebec, particularly in view of the statement made in Montreal yesterday by the cultural affairs minister, Mr. Tremblay?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated to the provinces that we would send them a copy of the bill after it was given first reading in this house in order that they may be able to express their views on the subjects, which only concern them very indirectly, in the establishment of bilingual districts throughout the provinces. The bill, of course, will deal with federal subjects, and it is only as a matter of courtesy and co-operation that we want to do this. There have been informal talks.

Mr. Thompson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I further ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to make two languages official everywhere in Canada, and whether that will be done by way of a constitutional amendment or by a simple statute giving this guarantee.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the official languages bill will be in the form of a statute. The position of the government, of course, and we indicated this at the federal-provincial conference in February last year—is that we hope there would eventually be agreement between the provinces and the federal government on the establishment of constitutional guarantees to the two official languages which would go beyond the guarantees which now exist under section 133 of the constitution.

What is happening in Quebec is that they are saying they are not doing anything anti-constitutional. I believe they are right. They are contemplating the withdrawal of privileges which have existed for the English minority in Quebec, and our position is that we hope that rather than withdrawing privileges from the English minority in Quebec, privileges will be given to the French minorities in the other provinces.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

QUEBEC JURISDICTION OVER INDIANS AND ESKIMOS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Can he tell the house if the transfer of the federal administration of New Quebec to the government of the province of Quebec is continuing and if the Indians and Eskimos of that territory are satisfied with the way that transfer is being effected?

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. member's question could easily be put on the order paper. It seems to me that this is a question of continuing interest and, in the circumstances, I would suggest to him very humbly to put it on the order paper.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE RESTRICTIONS ON COMPANY INVESTMENTS ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. What means has the government to enforce the program announced by the minister according to which overseas investments of Canadian non-financial companies will be restricted?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In general we intend to ask the companies investing more than a certain amount of money every year to report to us—this is stated in the announcement—and the report will enable us to check on the investments being made.

Mr. Harkness: I have a supplementary question. I realize it is possible to ask for such reports, but has the government any means of actually restricting these investments?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked in not in order. I suggest the hon. member is asking for an interpretation of the powers of the government in general. Such a question is not in order.

Mr. Harkness: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will these restrictions apply to the exploration, drilling and production of oil and gas by Canada's oil companies in overseas countries?

Mr. Pepin: The statement describes the criterion for decision and makes a distinction, for example, between the countries in western Europe and the less developed countries. So we will have to assess where these investments are going.

To revert to the first part of the question, it is specifically stated in the communiqué that "the companies are being asked to provide information quarterly on international capital transfers and on planned capital transfers to overseas countries for 1968 and 1969 where transfers in excess of $200,000 annually are contemplated". I do not think there is any reason to doubt that this will be done.

IMMIGRATION

STEPS TO ASSIST REFUGEES FROM CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. The Canadian Press reported last night that the Canadian government has sent a four man team to Vienna to help "especially qualified" refugees from Czechoslovakia who want to come to Canada. My question is, does this country intend to benefit by taking only the cream of the crop of these refugees or does it intend to give equal help to all refugees, irrespective of talent, who have fled that persecuted country to find freedom?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the provisions that have been announced with respect to entry requirements and financial assistance are available to all Czechoslovakian refugees. The purpose of the four man team is to assist the specially qualified Czechoslovakians who may want to come to Canada by exploring with them the opportunities that are available in this country. There is no intention, nor will this particular team bring this about, of taking any exclusive attitude toward any group of refugees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does this team intend to give the same kind of help to all refugees, irrespective of talent?

Mr. MacEachen: In a sense the team is composed of men from the scientific and educational fields, and within the limits of their skills they will be available to all the refugees. I think our own immigration officers are in a position to give all the necessary help to refugees in general, but in this particular case special assistance will be given by way of information to those who have special qualifications. For example, there is on this team a person from the National Research Council who might be able to advise Czechoslovakians who have decided to come to Canada what the situation is in the scientific field in this country. We think this is quite a useful thing to do. Another person has been suggested by the universities, and still another by the Canada Council. We thought this was extra assistance which could be made available to the Czechoslovakian refugees.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF SALT SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Is the government giving consideration to restoring the salt subsidy previously provided to maritime fishermen?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no.

Mr. Carter: May I ask a supplementary question. Has the Minister of Fisheries or the federal government received representations in this regard from the Newfoundland government?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked is not in order.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Malpeque.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not like to challenge your authority but, in a supplementary way, the hon. member has merely asked whether representations have been received from the Newfoundland government.

Mr. Speaker: As I have ruled before, the simple question whether representations have been received is not in itself acceptable.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT BY U.S. STATE DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is Canada prepared to back the United States warning that any Soviet military action against West Germany would be met with an immediate NATO response?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday we would be bound by the terms of the NATO treaty, and we would act accordingly. Any decision taken would be in conformity with that treaty.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): In view of the contradictory nature of the answers given yesterday and today and the doubts that will be created in the minds of not only Canadians but the other members of the NATO organization, I ask the Prime Minister whether there has been any change or alteration in article 5 of North Atlantic Treaty, which provides:

> The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by article 51 of the charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the north Atlantic area.

The answer given by the Prime Minister yesterday indicates there is some wobbling in this regard, and I should like to know whether that is true.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there has been no contradiction in the answers given. If there is any wobbling it is in the mind of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are not going to enter into a controversy about wobbling. I would be able to say something to the right hon. gentleman in that regard because that is a subject on which he is a past master. In the meantime I ask him this. Why deny the House of Commons the opportunity of knowing in advance and discussing what changes are contemplated? I say that in view of the various statements made during the election campaign regarding NATO. Why shouldn't this house know whether there is going to be any wobbling by this government?

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): May I ask a supplementary question? The question is very simple. In view of the section read by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, is this country committed now to go to the aid of West Germany if she is attacked by the Soviet union?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the question he has asked is similar to the question that was asked before. The answer might not be satisfactory to the hon. member, but an answer was given.

Mr. Hees: The question was not answered at any time, and the Prime Minister would like to answer now.

Mr. Trudeau: I think perhaps there was a bit of confusion because the supplementary question came before the answer to the first question. I do want to state quite clearly that there is no ground for believing Canada would fail in any way to discharge its obligation under the NATO treaty. This is point No. 1. I think the last part of the right hon. gentleman's question had to do with discussions about what we were going to do in NATO, and that is another question. It has nothing to do with the first part of the question. I am prepared to repeat what our position is. We have always said we were having a review of our foreign policy and of our military policy. When this review has become part of government policy, it will be discussed in the house. NATO will be part of this, of course. However, after that debate has taken place I do not want to make a specific commitment that I will tell the house before going to NATO whether our forces will be increased or reduced.

VIET NAM—U.S. KNOWLEDGE OF CANADIAN POSITION ON BOMBING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the Prime Minister's repeated statement that the bombing of North Viet Nam must cease immediately and totally during the Paris peace talks, has the Canadian government conveyed this position officially to the government of the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government of the United States is very well aware of the views of the Canadian government on this subject.

Mr. Harding: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I asked the minister whether this position as put by the Prime Minister had been conveyed officially to the government of the United States and, if so, whether he could give us the date—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he is merely repeating the question he asked in the first instance.

HARBOURS

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON SECURITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Labour.

As minister responsible to the house for the inquiry on security and pilfering in Montreal harbour, can he now give us the details in this respect? If not, when does the minister intend to give the house a complete report on this iquiry?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the minister will be prepared to make a complete report when the Smith inquiry finalizes its work, which will be at least a year from now. In the meantime I have been assured by Judge Smith that progress is being made, that questions and allegations appearing in local newspapers are being investigated and referred to the Smith inquiry. A complete report will be made both to me and to the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for the National Harbours Board and, therefore, the security of the port of Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the hon. Minister of Labour.

In view of the seriousness of the allusions made in the newspapers on the volume of the pilfering and thieving which, it would seem, are occurring in Montreal harbour and the fact that this situation is endangering the good name of the city and port of Montreal, can the minister in charge tell us if the newspaper statements are misleading or if the situation is really very serious?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot ask the minister to check or confirm newspaper reports.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ELIMINATION OF LASH AS PENALTY FOR CRIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address this question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister considered or reconsidered the elimination of the lash as a penalty for the commission of certain criminal offences?

Mr. Speaker: The question is very general in nature and normally it should be placed on the order paper.

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Is it the intention of the government to introduce amendments to the Juvenile Delinquents Act in this session? If not, why not?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take that question as notice and give the answer later.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

APPOINTMENT OF CO-CHAIRMAN OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

When does he intend to appoint a successor to Mr. André Laurendeau on the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have already discussed that matter with the co-chairman, Mr. Speaker. Certain names were proposed which I am now considering. At any rate, I think the appointment should be announced shortly.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary to the Prime Minister.

Would a delay in the appointment of the French-speaking co-chairman delay the work of the commission?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, it is only a matter of drafting.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the minister of trade and industry. In view of the serious economic plight of the western farmers through the loss of grain markets due to the 11 months lapse of the world wheat agreement, would the minister on motions give the house at the earliest possible date a full statement on the present status of the new international grain agreement?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was invited to do so by another member of the opposition, and I do intend to do so. However, the hon. member is aware that a meeting is going on in Canberra at this very moment and I am waiting for a report. In due course I will be taking part in the present debate on this subject.

[Later:]

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, may I give some complementary information in reply to a previous question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. I have just received a copy of the communiqué issued at the conclusion of the Canberra meeting. It is of great importance to grain growers in Canada, because it says:

> The group of exporters expressed their satisfaction with the operation to date of the new arrangement and their determination to achieve its objectives including the observance of the terms of the arrangement with respect to minimum prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

SHIPBUILDING

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that heavy unemployment has recently resulted from the discontinuance of subsidies on wooden ships, does the government intend to reintroduce these subsidies soon?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Comeau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What measures does the government advocate to replace jobs that are lost in this industry?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now asking a very general question which should more properly be answered by a statement on motions.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

TERMINATION OF HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANT LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I would direct this question as a matter of urgency to the minister of health and welfare. It has been announced that the hospital construction grant act will terminate on March 31, 1970. Will this impose hardship on hospital regional districts which have or intend to have approved projects under way, but uncompleted, at the termination date?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is referring to an event which will not take place for some months yet. Under the circumstances this type of question should be placed on the order paper.

THE SENATE

PROPOSED DIRECT PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Was the government house leader in the other place stating government policy yesterday when he expressed the desire to have direct provincial representation in that chamber?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not government policy yet, sir, but we have indicated that we do intend to review the whole composition of the Senate, perhaps to give it a greater function in terms of the regional composition and also the linguistic composition of Canada.

Mr. Flemming: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to recommend a change in the constitution to bring about that result when the constitutional conference takes place?

[Mr. Comeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have told the federal-provincial conferences that we wanted to discuss this subject with them, but we do not want to do it unilaterally if we can avoid it. We feel that this is a federal matter concerning all parts of Canada.

AIRPORTS

ROUYN, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Transport with regard to the proposed air terminal in Rouyn.

In view of the fact that the Treasury Board has already included that project in its estimates, can the minister tell us why the construction of that air terminal in Rouyn has not yet started, since the decision already goes back to several months?

Mr. Speaker: Maybe the hon. member will allow me to suggest that this is a question for the order paper.

TRANSPORT

JURISDICTION RESPECTING SAFETY OF RAILWAY WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport; it is of utmost concern to railway workers. In view of the formal application made last January to the railway transport committee for a general order setting out whether or not it has jurisdiction over safety as it relates to railway employees, would the minister ascertain whether the railway transport committee has yet made a decision?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO APPLE GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Has he received representations from the Quebec apple-growers asking some assistance from the federal government for losses which they have suffered as a result of damages caused by hail in 1967.

Mr. Speaker: I have already pointed out to the hon. members a moment ago that it is not enough to ask if representations have been made or if a request has been submitted to the government. The hon. member would perhaps wish to add something to his question.

Mr. Ricard: I could perhaps rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. Does the federal government intend to grant to Quebec apple-growers who suffered losses caused by hail in 1967 an assistance equivalent to that granted by the provincial government?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the hon. member means by equal assistance. If he is talking about the federal government matching the assistance that was paid out by the provincial governments I would advise the hon. member that the federal government has consistently rejected this kind of program. In many parts of Canada, and I am thinking now of the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and Alberta, during the past years assistance has been refused on the premise that we are prepared to pay 50 per cent of the administration costs and 25 per cent of the cost of the premium of the crop insurance program, and such programs would apply anywhere in Canada. It seems inconsistent for us to make that offer and at the same time enter into direct assistance programs.

Mr. Ricard: That's a long way round to say no.

REQUEST FOR ACCELERATED DEPRECIATION ON FARM STORAGE BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture although it is of relevance to other departments also. In view of the problems facing western farmers in the current crop year with regard to grain storage, and considering that Ontario farmers are also facing a problem with regard to corn storage, will the minister explore the possibility of providing accelerated depreciation on buildings constructed for the storage of grain and corn?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, representations have been made to the Department of Agriculture and to the Department of Finance with respect to accelerated depreciation on storage for the purposes the hon. member has talked of. I can advise the house that the departments of finance and agriculture are exploring the possibilities of carrying out the hon. member's suggestion on a particular basis, and perhaps under specific terms, to meet emergency situations.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Selkirk): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has received a significant number of complaints from affected farmers that materials needed for the construction of on-farm grain storage facilities are hard to obtain this year, for some reason.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not in order.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF DEFICIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the hon. Minister of Finance.

Could the hon. minister tell the house whether the government has committed itself to the payment of the deficit incurred by the city of Montreal concerning Expo?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. member is asking a minister to confirm or deny a statement, and I do not think that the question is in order.

[English]

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the hardship being caused to elderly people across Canada by the steadily rising cost of living, is it the intention of the minister's department during the present session to increase the basic old age security pension?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

LITIGATION TO RECOVER MONEYS UNPAID BECAUSE OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): My question is directed to the Postmaster General. Has the minister received notice from any rural mail carriers that they intend to enter into litigation in order to collect moneys they feel rightly belong to them by reason of their having been available for work throughout the recent mail strike.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that this is another of those questions which, in the form it is put, is not in order.

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED LOW WAGES OF POSTMASTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. In view of his announcement that two task forces are now being set up to probe the department's problems, could he indicate whether either of the forces will look into the question of the wages being paid to postmasters in the rural communities of Newfoundland, these men being paid at a rate as low as $22.20 for a 60 hour week?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN LEGISLATION RESPECTING MARIJUANA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Was the Minister of National Health and Welfare speaking government policy when in a recent speech in Regina he indicated that by amendment to the Narcotic Control Act or by new legislation, prosecutions and possible penalties for marijuana users would be in a different form than at present, and that penalties for marijuana users would be less severe than those for narcotic users?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the position of the government is that we have to apply the Criminal Code as it exists, but we honestly feel that there are many areas in which the Criminal Code could be amended. We have suggested many such areas. We feel that the whole question of narcotics users and the way in which they should be treated—whether such use is a crime or not—is open for examination, and I am happy that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is looking into the subject.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): In view of the dissimilarity of views as to the detrimental effects of marijuana it would be commendable if the government gave consideration to the setting up of a committee of the house to look into this matter, and to ascertain whether marijuana is more detrimental than liquor or tobacco, something about which I am unable to speak. I wonder if the Prime Minister would give consideration to this suggestion.

Mr. Trudeau: This is exactly our intention, Mr. Speaker, to have it discussed or studied by the minister's department. Then he will discuss the way in which we should bring this matter to the attention of the cabinet and the house.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I believe my question should be addressed to the Minister of Public Works. In the last house, under the minister's predecessor, it was suggested that a committee be set up to deal with matters of the national capital. I wonder if the minister could give consideration to expediting the setting up of such a committee in the near future.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, that question should be addressed to my colleague the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, who now has responsibility for the National Capital Commission.

Mr. Mather: May I address my question to that minister then.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Would the hon. member repeat his question? I did not hear it; I was discussing a very important problem.

Mr. Mather: Now that the minister is back from the forest I shall put my question to him. In the last parliament this house approved the establishment of a committee to deal with matters concerning the national capital. I wonder if consideration is now being given to the establishment of that committee.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This is something we shall look into, and we shall report to the house on it.

AGRICULTURE

SOYA BEANS—REQUEST FOR SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the very serious problem facing the edible oils industry of Canada, can the minister indicate whether a government decision has been reached with respect to recent representations made by the soya bean board? If so, was such decision in favour of their request?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice of his question after I entered the house, and I sent for a reply to which I shall now refer.

I met with representatives of the Ontario soya bean growers marketing board on August 19 and discussed problems of vital concern to the board and to Ontario soya bean growers. Following that meeting the Agricultural Stabilization Board reported to me on the question of a price support on soya beans. It was the board's view that it was not prepared to recommend a price support plan for soya beans at the present time. This was based on a feeling that the major problem facing the soya bean industry is that of imported oils, and that the Agricultural Stabilization Act is not the appropriate legislation to meet problems of this nature.

I have received further correspondence from the soya bean growers marketing board, and I am in active consultation with them. May I also advise the hon. member that the department is looking into the long run question of whether there has been dumping of vegetable oils in Canada. Because of the route over which these oils come into Canada it is very difficult to establish prices, and to prove that dumping has taken place under the formula we now use.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that this type of lengthy statement ought to be made on motions.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the serious situation facing the vegetable oil industries, as indicated by the hon. member for Kent-Essex, what action is the government contemplating in regard to the representations made to the minister by the rapeseed and sunflower industry of western Canada.

Mr. Olson: Well, Mr. Speaker, as of this date there have not been any direct representations made to me by representatives of either of these industries.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister must be aware of representations made to the stabilization board. What action does he contemplate with regard to these representations?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the stabilization board for a report of their consideration of this problem.

REPORTED SHORTAGE OF STRUCTURAL STEEL FOR FARM STORAGE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed also to the Minister of Agriculture. I would like to ask him whether he has ordered or intends to order an investigation into the causes of the serious short supply of structural steel for farm grain storage facilities.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not ordered an investigation. I am not sure whether this comes within the ambit of the Department of Agriculture, but I will certainly be prepared to ask some of my colleagues, who are perhaps more directly involved in this, to see if we can find some reasons for it.

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF SPECIAL TASK FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister advise the house whether the agricultural task force set up by the government early last session to study the various problems facing agriculture, and suggested remedies, has completed its work and when can we expect its report?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, the task force has not completed its work. We expect to have an interim report in December, 1968, but we do not expect the task force will have its complete findings and recommendations ready until some time later in 1969.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister's attention been directed to discrimination against students at the University of British Columbia by the campus branch of the Bank of Montreal, which has refused to allow the students to establish accounts on which they can draw cheques? If so, does the minister intend to take action to correct this situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt whether this is within the minister's responsibility.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER RESPECTING RESERVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the minister now met with a minister of the Saskatchewan provincial government with respect to the refusal of the premier of Saskatchewan further to honour Indian treaties which provide that certain lands may be designated as reserves if the Indian people so wish?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will meet a minister of the Saskatchewan government this afternoon and I hope that I will be able to meet the premier of Saskatchewan tomorrow.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, September 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Eymard Corbin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment (p. 62) thereto of Mr. Stanfield.

• (12 noon)

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker at the time of adjournment last night, I was speaking about the riding of Frontenac, in the eastern townships, on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, but I had not told you that Mr. Louis S. Fréchette was born in 1748 in St-Ferdinand d'Halifax—where I shall take up residence—and that he was a member of parliament for that county. Apart from being postmaster, he was mayor. The name "Fréchette" was one of the earliest to appear in Canada and it gives me great pleasure to know that a descendant of those pioneers has made his name illustrious in the Frontenac constituency.

Mr. Speaker, I did not mention either that this same riding of Frontenac is called the white gold region on account of the asbestos which is abundant there. In fact, its asbestos mines are the most valuable throughout the world. The preparation of $12 million urban development plan, to be spread out over a period of five years, is under way, for there is asbestos not only under part of the city of Thetford Mines, but also under a part of St-Maurice. There is a lack of refining facilities for this product in Canada in order to find work for our labour force and to obtain a product at a cheaper price as there are presently several asbestos by-products being used in the construction industry. Unfortunately, these mines are American-owned and we are, ourselves, but water bearers and wood hewers. Because of this mineral being exported abroad, Canada's economy is the loser.

As I was saying, speaking for the Rallie-ment Créditiste which is the official opposition party of Quebec in this house, our Prime Minister was backstroking the C.C.F. party in 1962 and making fun of the Liberals. He is now witch-hunting following the Rossillon affair in order to better conceal the economic problems.

I visited personally French areas out west where I was made very welcome. Last week, I called up Therrien, in Alberta, in the St. Paul postal area and my party at the other end of the line said to me. Now that a French Canadian is leader of the country, he will try to downgrade the value of French Canadians in the eyes of the other provinces in order to remain popular in the eyes of historians. When I visited the western provinces—I went as far as Vancouver—no one thought I was a spy. A fortnight ago, I went to Nova Scotia to find out to what extent that province is unilingual. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was premier of that province and did not do anything for the French, not even in the field of immigration. But in spite of that, I was not called a spy.

No, Mr. Speaker, "Trudeaulatry" is not catching on in the ranks of the Ralliement Créditiste and after hearing some of the members of the government criticize the Prime Minister yesterday, I am still convinced that tomorrow he will need the whole Agent X -13 adventure series to discover all his enemies.

During the last election campaign, the present Prime Minister visited the province of Quebec but "Trudeaumania" did not catch on there. Newspapermen even said that the hearts of the young girls were frozen by the easterly winds coming from the icebergs in the St. Lawrence which made them indifferent to our Prime Minister. And that good Prime Minister did not get a kiss. Deception, in spite of such seriousness. And yet, an aunt of mine, who was born in the Gaspé peninsula and now lives in Montreal, has always assured me that the people of Gaspé are hot-blooded and affectionate. However, they have unusual common sense and they did not respond to Trudeaumania, the art of worshipping idols having gone out of fashion among serious people. Besides, the present criticism of the man in the street, even here in Ottawa, about our Prime Minister is that he is good for a joke every day. As a proof of that, one has only to see this photograph representing our Prime Minister looking at himself wearing a new tie or trying on a kilt to see whether it fits him well. It seems that the Prime Minister who is at the head of such an adamant government, does nothing but political appointments. In fact, there have already been twelve and there will probably be others. This very morning, we were advised of another appointment, that of Mr. Thomas Paul D'Aquino. I quote:

> Mr. D'Aquino, who was a member of the staff at Mr. Trudeau's headquarters during the campaign for the election of the leader of the Liberal party, played an active part in Quebec political circles.

Another political appointment which indicates that patronage is even worse than during the Duplessis era. In his ivory tower, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister does not seem to know what is going on in some countries, as in Biafra, for instance, I read the following newspaper article this morning, and I quote:

> In a statement issued this morning, the Biafran information services in Geneva stated, in part: "When the survivors realized the extent of the disaster, they broke into tears. Even emergency units personnel could not help but cry at the sight of the bloody remains of human flesh on the market-place

In the meantime, our Prime Minister fidgets with his tie. Why are we silent while thousands of civilians are dying of hunger at this very minute, all because Nigeria, intending their extermination, refuses to let food supplies through? How can this genocide be perpetrated in 1968 without anyone objecting? Are not two million deaths enough? How many more have to die?

In the light of those facts, Mr. Speaker, should we not believe that the opening of parliament was delayed to let these people die and say, later on, that it is too late?

Mr. Speaker, I invite our Prime Minister to wake up, to put aside his adamant attitude and to make immediately some representations to Great Britain asking it to stop the sale of offensive weapons.

It is time to learn the address of Mr. Wilson, Prime Minister of England and to lodge the necessary protests, because at the present time a nation is dying. The Liberal party can rely on 155 members elected with money. I wish to give as an example one particular election, but the same thing happened in the 263 constituencies. This is the example which I wish to give you, and I quote:

> Mr. Robert Kaplan, Liberal member for Toronto-Don Valley spent $68,369 to defeat the Conservative candidate Dalton Camp in the federal election of June 25.

Mr. Camp had spent $38,400 at a time when the members of the Ralliement Créditiste spent only $1,600 on the election of our leader (Mr. Caouette). My own election only cost me $2,500.

Mr. Speaker, I would be ashamed to belong to a party which would force a member to spend astronomical sums provided by the election fund in order to remain in power, as in the case of the member whose election cost $68,369. This shows that, outside the Ralliement Créditiste, there is no individual freedom, because those who spend $68,000 to get elected, the next day have to obey those who provided the money they needed.

Among other things, is it not true that the Shell Oil Company may have provided funds to the Liberal party, since they refuse to give out the names of those who contributed to the election fund of the Liberal party? This same company, while helping certain political parties, is preventing the Biafrans from taking possession of their oil wells and England, an accomplice of these international financial dealings, continues to let our Prime Minister sleep quietly.

In view of all those facts, in view of all those urgent problems one does not want to solve, I say to the Prime Minister: Instead of belonging to the Laski school of thought—he studied in England—belong to our Créditiste school of thought. It will cost you only $5 to become an active member and receive our newspaper. Come to our Créditiste congress which will take place at Sherbrooke on October 12 and 13 next. Since you are the champion of freedom, since you can give food to the hungry—our western wheat, for instance —since you want individual freedom to be respected, then ask the essential minimum for every Canadian; freedom and security for everyone, in wealthy a country like ours, which to-morrow perhaps could become the storehouse of the world, instead of letting these people starve.

Since the government has not proposed anything to stop inflation, since unemployment persists, since the committee of the Ralliement Créditiste cannot at the present time have confidence in the government, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) that the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "social problems", the following words:

"in order to fight efficiently against widespread poverty in Canada by means of a national monthly dividend paid to each and everyone and based on the national productivity".

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to show to the Prime Minister and to his government that, in the near future—since he mentioned it himself several times—we will witness another attempt to get into the United Nations a country from which six million people have already fled.

Mr. Speaker, no doubt I shall be permitted to bring forward overwhelming proof against the entry of this country into the United Nations, and you are referred to all those fine representations made by each member of the Liberal party for acceptance of China, as can be seen from an article published in Le Soleil of September 7, 1968:

According to the worthy partisans of progressism and international understanding, communist China has to be brought into the United Nations; year after year, the same old arguments are brought forth for admission of mainland China to the United Nations.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Let us consider them and see whether they stand up.

First argument (a realistic argument opposed to an idealist one, a lucky find of our progressists"): "We cannot ignore 650 million Chinese and practise an ostrich policy". Certainly not. But it is precisely by not admitting communist China into the United Nations that we prove we do not ignore it. The main objective of the United Nations is to safeguard peace in the world; it is normal that communist China should be excluded. For those who may have some doubts about that, here is historical proof:

—Undisguised aggression against South Korea in 1950

—Barely disguised aggression against Laos in 1953 (aggression which is still going on)

—Bombarding the islands of Quemoy and Matsu in 1958

—Invasion and colonization of Tibet in 1959

—Cleverly disguised aggression against South Viet Nam (begun in 1954)

—Aggression against India in 1962

—Subversion in all Asian countries

—Threats, intimidation and provocative statements against all the countries in the world.

No other country in the world has committed so many acts of violence. It will then be considered "realistic" to admit communist China to the U.N. This is an idealistic policy, since the communist war activities are wilfully ignored in order to admit mainland China into an organization dedicated to peace. Magnanimity does not pay when we are dealing with Mao.

Second argument: The majority of the Chinese people have a right to be heard before the world. Certainly. However, does Mao speak for the majority? Surely not, whatever our fine minds may say. There is proof to substantiate this. First, let us consider the 6 million Chinese refugees who have succeeded in fleeing communist China as well as the other 30 million Chinese who have been massacred because of Mao's purges. Has this been forgotten by our freedom loving democrats? The Chinese minorities scattered over the globe unanimously disapprove of the Peking regime. Naturally, these opinions are ignored.

Mr. Speaker, on another plane, before my allotted time has run out, I would now like to mention the St. Leonard school problem. As I was saying before, I have been in British Columbia and Nova Scotia, but I have never been considered a spy. I cannot imagine that a person visiting here on a French liaison mission should be subjected immediately to comments when such a trip has been organized in order to meet friends. Therefore, I say that the only problem existing in St. Leonard is of an economic nature. If the English need a school, let it be built. If the French Canadians need a French school, a French school should be built for the French Canadians or those of French descent, and that will settle the problem.

Furthermore, the Prime Minister when discussing separatism, as reported on page 8 of on article in Cité libre, said and I quote:

—Generation after generation of Anglo-Saxons have lived in Quebec without getting around to learning three sentences of French. When these insular people insist, with much gravity, that their jaws and ears aren't made for it and can't adapt themselves to French, what they really want to get across to you is that they will not sully these organs, and their small minds, by submitting them to a barbarous idiom.

We must accept the facts of history as they are. However outworn and absurd it may be, the nation-state image spurred the political thinking of the British, and subsequently of Canadians of British descent in the 'Dominion of Canada'. Broadly speaking, this meant identifying the Canadian state with themselves to the greatest degree possible. Since the French Canadians had the bad grace to decline assimilation, such an identification was beyond being completely realizable. So the Anglo-Canadians built themselves an illusion of it by fencing off the French Canadians in their Quebec ghetto—and often nibbling at its constitutional powers through centralizing legislation—and fighting, with staggering ferocity, against anything that might intrude upon that illusion: the use of French on stamps, money, cheques, in the civil service, the railroads, and the whole works.

These words were written by the present Prime Minister in 1962 before he entered politics. He goes on saying:

Generations passed. Hopes of assimilating the French Canadians dimmed to a flicker (although right up to 1948, immigration laws continued to favour immigrants from the British Isles over those from France). But English-speaking Canadians have never given up their condescending attitude to their French-speaking fellows, even to this day.

Those are the words of the present Prime Minister, and to-day, when listening to him, one gets the impression that he would also like now, after fighting for that idea of our compatriots which had fallen into oblivion, to allow the French Canadians not to be respected in the French ghetto, to allow the minorities elsewhere in Canada not to receive the same treatment as we, in Quebec, are giving the English-speaking minorities.

He went on:

At Ottawa and in provinces other than ours, this nationalism could wear the pious mask of democracy. Because, as English-speaking Canadians became proportionately more numerous, they took to hiding their intolerance behind acts of majority rule; that was how they quashed bilingualism in the Manitoba legislature, violated rights acquired by separate schools—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I have to interrupt the hon. member whose time has now expired, unless the house unanimously agrees to grant him some additional time.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Dumont, seconded by Mr. Gauthier (Roberval), moved that the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "social problems" the following words:

"in order to fight efficiently against widespread poverty in Canada by means of a national monthly dividend paid to each and everyone and based on the national productivity".

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order about the acceptability of that subamendment.

I feel that the hon. member unfortunately chose the wrong place to insert his amendment, because we would then have a double negative. It seems to me that it would be better, and it is only a technicality, if he were to add his subamendment at the end of the amendment. That would make more sense, in my opinion, because as moved, it creates some technical difficulties. I am not saying that the subamendment is out of order, I simply want to draw attention to the way it has been drafted.

Mr. Speaker: Order. On the point of order, I think that the business of the house would be made easier if I read the amendment and the subamendment, as suggested by the member for Frontenac (Mr. Dumont):

But we respectfully regret that Your Excellency's advisers have refused to recognize or respond to Canada's current and urgent economic and social problems, "in order to fight efficiently against widespread poverty in Canada by means of a national monthly dividend paid to each and everyone and based on the national productivity".

The member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) suggests that this subamendment as drafted is ambiguous, that is possible. However, the intent and purpose of the subamendment are clear enough, and I think it would be preferable to accept it as such, instead of attempting to adapt it to the sentence or the term which the member wants to amend.

Mr. Dumont: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I can assure you that, in the English text, it is nonsense.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is of the opinion that the English translation is nonsense.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in its present form it is nonsense. It would make sense if it were added at the end.

Mr. Caouette: Yes, but at the end or after the social question? Personally, I am of the opinion that in French, at least, it is correctly expressed, the phraseology is complete.

Mr. Speaker: In any case, the amendment has been accepted.

[English]

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you are well aware that I have the honour, as have many members of this house following redistribution, of being the first elected representative of a completely new riding, Kent-Essex. On behalf of the citizens of that riding I must extend our congratulations to you on attaining your high office. I should also mention the respect and admiration they have had for the manner in which you have discharged your duties in the past.

This area is indisputably the most southern area in Canada. It is affectionately and practically known by those who live there and those who associate with the area as the sun parlour of Canada. May I offer to you on their behalf a standing invitation to visit this area, either in your capacity as a citizen of Canada or in your official capacity, during the vacations which will occur from time to time. Because of your arduous duties you richly deserve these vacations.

I wish to continue in a very serious vein and try to bring to the attention of the government the tragic, almost impossible position in which the great industry of agriculture finds itself not only in my area but throughout the entire nation. I think most of us on both sides of the house listened to the speech from the throne with increasing uneasiness, and as it approached its finish we were sick indeed. I do not mean this in a partisan way. The fact is that the men in agriculture and in the industries associated with agriculture realized, when they heard that speech, that either the government was completely unaware of the disaster facing many segments of this great industry in the near future, unaware of the sore economic position in which they find themselves, or had abandoned any constructive attempt to do something about it.

It is true that the Speech from the Throne indicated that amending legislation would be dealt with at this session covering farm improvement loans, farm credit, and loans under the Farm Machinery Syndicates Credit Act, and that a national grains council would be established. Farmers certainly need this money but they know, as does every hon. member of this house on reflection, that this action does not solve anything. It does not solve any of the basic problems of agriculture. All it does is put farmers deeper in debt; it increases land values, the price of machinery and most of the components that a farmer must use in carrying on his business. It is true that farmers now need more capital. They need more credit. In fact, more credit will be absolutely necessary if they are to continue their operations even in the year ahead. But certainly these measures can be only a palliative and in no way a cure.

I wish personally and on behalf of the citizens I represent to congratulate the minister on his elevation to office. He is a man with whom I have worked for years and for whom I have the greatest respect. I respect his knowledge and background in agriculture. But I am not optimistic about what he can accomplish while sitting on the front benches of this government because the government through its actions has so decimated the Department of Agriculture and spread agricultural activities throughout so many departments that it is difficult indeed for the department to function as an entity. I fail to see how the minister, regardless of his ambition, his ability and his good intentions, can bring about a single solution to any of the major problems facing Canadian agriculture today. I shall deal with some of the current problems that require consideration by him, but I am sure that because of pressure from his colleagues the solutions put forward to these problems will be found to be inadequate.

The last time I spoke on behalf of the agricultural industry was during a debate on the estimates. At that time I was accused by members in many parts of the house of singing a song of gloom. In fact, the then minister of agriculture immediately rose to his feet and from a large and lengthy document tried to establish to the satisfaction of members that the fate of agriculture was not indeed as we on this side of the house had portrayed it. He said that in fact all was well and, indeed, that farmers had never had it so good.

Mr. Baldwin: It was a pitiful document.

Mr. Danforth: One of the most outrageous allegations that minister made was that the borrowing by farmers of $400 million more from the government of Canada in the previous four years than ever before in history was an indication of their confidence in the government and its policy. In other words, he was saying that the deeper one goes into debt the more confidence one should have in the future of the agricultural industry.

What has happened since we last met in this house and discussed agriculture? The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir) and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) have put on the record evidence of the catastrophe that has befallen some segments of the industry. I should like to deal with other segments.

What do we find? Rather than farmers never having it so good, I point out that the sugar beet industry in Ontario has collapsed in 12 months. It no longer exists as an industry; it is finished. The fruit and vegetable industry is fighting for its very existence. In the great greenhouse industry of southwestern Ontario, which is concentrated mainly in Essex county, some of its most permanent establishments have gone into bankruptcy in the last few months. This event shook the whole economic climate of that area. The oilseed industry, faced with tremendous imports of edible oils, is trying desperately to find a solution to its problems in order that it may survive economically. Western grain growers have found grain piling up in the west and tremendous backlogs along the entire grain pipe line. The feed grain industry finds itself faced with overproduction and falling markets. The great corn industry in southwestern Ontario has found that the prices offered for this commodity are in many instances lower than the cost of production. These are the main segments of agriculture, the very backbone of the industry.

The federal government is supposed to encourage and develop the agricultural industry. What has happened? If you could have stood, as I did this summer, on one of the most progressive farms in southwestern Ontario, with an acreage of the finest head lettuce I have ever seen, and found that not one single head of that lettuce could be cut because there was absolutely no market for it at any price, if you could have stood on receiving platforms of farm co-operatives, as I did, and seen beautiful cabbage of top quality brought in, the very first offerings of the season, and found that the growers of this cabbage would receive for their produce as a starting price less than the price they received at the end of the last season, if you could have stood with me and seen a farmer leaning against a gate with tears in his eyes, watching the dispersal of a dairy herd which took three generations to establish; if you could have watched with me beside one of the largest and best buildings developed for the production of pork that I have ever seen, and have indicated to you by that farmer, a most progressive and businesslike man, that the entire operation had been shut down because the margin of profit would not even pay the interest on his investment; if you could have gone with me into a feed lot, which looked like blocks of pavement with its mangers, silos and automatic feeders, and found the feed lot empty because of lack of credit and lack of financial return, then you would realize, as I and my colleagues have done, that the agricultural industry of this great country is in dire straits.

It is no wonder that there is no levity any longer in the farming communities of this country. It is a sad thing indeed to go into a small farming community and find no gaiety or banter in the machine shops, no gathering of the ladies' groups at the local churches, no winter card parties, no dances, and no community life. Rather, there is an almost deathly silence, and the reason for this is that the farmer and his wife are out in the fields working from daylight to dark to try to increase their production in order to cope with falling prices. It is no fun to park your car in front of a bank and see farmers coming out one at a time, white-faced and shaken, knowing that they face bankruptcy or the curtailment of their business. It is no fun to read the daily newspapers and find column after column of advertised sales involving dispersal of herds, dispersal of farm lands and dispersal of farm machinery, and to know that these men will walk off their farms with their wives, their kiddies, their suitcases and nothing else after putting a whole lifetime of effort into the production on this land which they love so dearly. It is no answer to have the government say it will increase farm loans, give farmers a little more credit and set up a grains council and task forces. Something is wrong.

I wish to give the greatest of credit to the Economic Council of Canada and the men who form that great body for their insight into this problem. I want to pay tribute also to the men in the United States department of agriculture who are seized with this problem. These men have the facts. If the government cared to, it could read these facts. These men know how many men are moving off the farms. To speak of inefficiency on the farms is to use a deluding phrase, a phrase of apology which the government uses because it does not know what is an efficient farm today. I do not know what an efficient farm is because a farm that was efficient yesterday may, at the stroke of the pen and a change of government policy, become an inefficient farm tomorrow. This is something that the farmers cannot control.

The time is past for us in this parliament to be content with using the old, hackneyed methods to solve the farm problems of today. It does not do the farmers of this nation any good whatsoever to point to the plight of farmers in other nations and say: You are no worse off than they or you are almost as well off as they. It is time that we in this nation used the tools and the facilities we have at our disposal and started to create in this country an economic climate which will make it possible for farmers not to have more credit, not to exist on subsidies, but to sell their produce at a price which will enable them to make a fair margin of profit.

Farmers in this country today—we all know thousands of them—certainly deserve as much as any other segment of industry. Farmers today surely deserve a fair margin of profit for their labour and for their capital investment, equal to that of other segments of industry. If we could assure them that justice will be done there would be no farm problem and we would not be faced with these men leaving the farms. The tragedy is that the farm situation is so bad that farmers themselves are encouraging and almost insisting that their sons and daughters leave the farm and seek some other form of employment, no matter what it is. There is nothing that fills the heart with greater compassion than to see a man and a woman on a farm working from daylight to dark, barefooted in the mud, in a desperate attempt to get enough money to send their son or daughter to college in the hope they will not suffer the same fate as they have because they are farmers in Canada. We certainly cannot be proud of this situation.

The government of this country must take absolute responsibility for the plight of farmers today. I say this advisedly, not in a partisan manner but in the light of existing conditions today. We no longer speak of the law of supply and demand where farmers and their produce are concerned. We must speak of managed markets. It used to be possible for a provincial co-operative, in which farmers united to act as a group, to exert some pressure, to have some control of sales and to demand a fair price in the marketplace. Today this is not possible because of the changing trade patterns.

What can a marketing group do when there are now cartels and international food chains capable of buying food at bargain prices anywhere in the world and through their own organizations distributing produce to any single locality in the world where there is a prime demand for it? All too often this is so in Canada. We are producing perhaps a 30 per cent surplus of which we must dispose in order for agriculture to survive as an industry, and at the same time the records show that each year we import over $800 million worth of food produce. My point is that not only do we have managed markets and cartels but we have government action which by a stroke of the pen can destroy a market in this country that farmers have tried for months to develop. It is said that an unfavourable trade balance is why we have to make concessions to other countries to allow their products to come into Canada. The farmers have no control over this situation.

I could give a number of examples of the results of such action. The tomato canning industry in Ontario almost collapsed. Why did that happen? It happened because canned tomatoes were being imported into this country and delivered to the wholesalers at a price less than the cost of production in our own country. This was one result of government action. Millions of bushels of commercial corn were imported into Canada just prior to our corn harvest last year. The market collapsed and our farmers had to take 30 or 40 cents a bushel less. It was found expedient to allow this corn to come into this country.

It is no answer to the farmers of this nation, when they are faced with an influx of poultry, eggs and other products, to say that under present legislation the government can take no action. This does not put any money in the hands of the farmers. I say it is time the government began to show some backbone and started to think about Canada first. Within 24 hours other countries can impose a duty, in spite of the Kennedy accord, on our exports to them, so why can we not do the same? The government says we might offend the country in question. I do not believe that is so. I think we have to have a new approach, the same approach as that used by labour, management and business. I say it is time the government of Canada talked to the governments of countries exporting to this country and discussed quotas or ways and means by which trade can be carried on that would be of benefit to both countries rather than a boon to one and a calamity to the other.

There are many avenues in which we could move to establish harmony between nations and stabilize our agricultural economy. We expected to receive an indication in the throne speech that this would be done. We expected that the government would take an absolutely new approach to agriculture. They told us that is what they were going to do. We had no reason, other than their past performance, to doubt that they might. However, the speech from the throne and the Prime Minister's speech leave no doubt in the minds of the farmers of Canada that unless something drastic is done the great farming industry of this country will collapse. We are not going to solve the problem by moving farmers off the land.

If this government is under the mistaken belief that the consumers of this country are going to get any cheaper food if it is imported rather than produced here, may I say at once that will never come about. If anyone cares to follow the history of these matters he will find that once the local industry has been destroyed prices go up. I say, that we have had trading patterns. We have managed markets. We have restricted opportunities for sales in our own domestic market as a result of the amalgamation of companies. It is my opinion that in the case of some agricultural products offered on the Canadian market, the number of buyers has been reduced to about six or eight. There is no such thing as competition from supply and demand. We know that in many cases the price is an agreed price. The free enterprise idea in our agricultural economy is nothing but a myth.

I believe, therefore, that at this time this government should take a new look at agriculture. Here we are, a country that at one time was the envy of the world because we were constantly bringing out new varieties, new products, new methods of processing, shipping, storing and handling. Within a few years we find ourselves fighting for our very existence. We have the means and the research facilities. We have the Department of Agriculture. We have the facilities in this country. Let us not think in terms of subsidies, of continually increasing the necessary credit. Let us think in terms of pouring money into research. Let us show some leadership. Let us show some activity. We have universities that can handle some of these problems. Our great dairy industry is in danger as a result of competition from filled milk products. I doubt that many members on the government side know what a filled milk product is. These are the things with which we are faced.

The consumers are not going to pick up the tab because they are highly taxed already. When we talk about greater efficiency on the farm or inefficient farmers, we are talking about a myth. We have efficient farmers. As a matter of fact, our problem is that we grow many products that we cannot sell. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, let the government assume responsibility for this industry as it rightfully should. It is an industry that is controlled by governments, federal and provincial. Today the farmer is told what crops he can or cannot grow, whether he can or cannot have credit, whether he can or cannot increase the yield, whether he shall or shall not ship, how the product shall be packaged, and so on. What other industry is fenced in like agriculture? If governments are going to fence in this industry and try to drive it to the wall, then I insist that government has the prime responsibility. Why send out a task force to find out what is happening? We should do something immediately to solve at least one of the major problems facing agriculture today.

Mr. Hyl Chappell (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, it was a moving experience to take my place in this house amongst so many distinguished colleagues. It is with much diffidence that I rise for the first time. As did those who preceded me, Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate you and your deputies. May I also join with them in praising the mover (Mr. Corbin) and seconder (Mr. Marchand) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I wish to speak on the expropriation of land by the federal government.

• (12:50 p.m.)

As a new member, may I refer briefly to the new riding of Peel South, whose constituents I have the honour to represent. We are faced with a problem which could arise in any riding, namely, the need to balance the rights of individuals against the requirements of government in expropriation cases.

The boundaries of Peel South roughly conform with those of Mississauga, one of the largest municipalities in Ontario. At the south we have Port Credit, a major terminal in the seaway system. At the north is Malton, dominated by the Toronto international airport. The area is now about 25 per cent developed, but it is well planned for future residential, commercial and industrial development. Its enormous potential, along with the regional importance of the ports, makes the municipality of Mississauga a major factor in our country's economic strength. The shortest look into the future affirms that these ports and other services will have to be enlarged, and this brings with it the inevitable expropriation of homes and other property. Expropriation does and will take place in every riding, but the imminence of substantial further taking of land to enlarge the airports at Malton and Montreal leads me to speak on this subject at the earliest possible moment.

As chairman of the comparative law section of the Canadian Bar Association I have been obliged to examine the laws of other jurisdictions, and while doing so I was struck by the fresh approaches being taken in other countries. Those countries which have not yet brought their expropriation laws up to date and in line with today's concepts of what is businesslike and just are rapidly doing so.

The Expropriation Act under which most federal expropriations take place was passed in 1889. Since then there has not been one amendment that affected the principle of expropriating property or the method of providing compensation.

The act was adequate for the social conditions and governmental requirements of 19th century Canada. Then expropriations were few, business was uncomplicated, land was plentiful and easily replaced with a minimum of disturbance to the owner.

Since the first world war social change has created the need for governments and their agencies to take more and more land. Concurrently other forces have striven to acquire and regulate land which is now relatively scarce in many areas. This tremendous increase in governmental expropriations has brought the subject into the spotlight of public attention. Today everyone could be affected, and everyone cringes at the thought. While not denying the need for governmental expropriation, owners rebel at the manner in which it is accomplished. To me, a member representing one of the areas where new federal expropriation must take place, the shortcomings and antiquity of our act are most apparent.

What are these shortcomings?

No matter the complexity of the business being carried on or the extent of planning there may have been for expansion, there is no requirement that the owner be given notice of the intent to expropriate so that he may object and point out an error in choice or selection, or in the alternative adjust his plans.

Even when land is taken, which is done by the simple filing of a plan in the land registry office, the fundamental right of notice is not required; the owner is left to learn about it by chance. One wonders at this conflict with the bill of rights, which recognizes the right of an individual to enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law.

There is no requirement for the government to pay or offer to pay all or any part of the compensation at the time of expropriation, or even when possession is demanded and taken. Unless some amount is offered voluntarily, the owner is left to try to reinstate himself without funds. Needless to say, he cannot borrow on the security of his property because he no longer owns it.

In the event that the owner is unable to settle with the authority, he does not have easy and speedy access to a tribunal to determine the compensation. He must proceed by a petition of right in the Exchequer Court, with which he is unfamiliar, with all of the delays, expenses and frustrations which arise when there are no safeguards against them.

There is no guide line for the method by which his loss shall be determined. This has been left to case law. The case law principles, which determine the amount of compensation, fluctuate. There are gaps and inconsistencies in the statutory provisions. For example, if an owner's property is damaged by reason of the construction of a public work on neighbouring land, he may recover compensation. But if his property is damaged by reason of the operation of that same public work, he may not recover his damages.

He is entitled to interest at 5 per cent after he has given up possession, but this is not payable until the amount of compensation is finally determined by the courts. The interest rate was reduced in 1900 from 6 per cent to 5 per cent, and after judgment the interest rate is reduced to 4 per cent. When an owner is faced with paying 9 per cent mortgage interest on the land expropriated from him, and at the same time paying perhaps 10 to 12 per cent on money borrowed to try to relocate himself, such unfairness may force him to accept almost any offer.

Consider what can and does happen to an owner whose $18,000 home, which is subject to a mortgage for $12,000 at 7 per cent, is expropriated. If the authority should volunteer an advance of $9,000, say, all of this must be applied against the mortgage, leaving a balance of $3,000. Years later, when he receives the balance of his compensation, he must pay $23,000, say for his new home and be burdened with a mortgage of $17,000 at a higher interest rate. In the meantime he has had to continue to pay interest on the balance of the existing mortgage on the land taken, but he receives only 5 per cent from the authority. For all practical purposes he is deprived of a home, or at least one which he can afford.

Or if an owner who has a small home worth, say, $10,000, with a mortgage on it for $8,000, accepts an offer of $10,000, he usually cannot replace his home for less than $12,000 to $15,000 simply because of the inadequate supply of homes in this price range. Thus he suffers a loss for which he was not responsible. Just last week an owner who lost such a home in Halifax paraded on our lawn protesting such treatment. He and others in his position expect expropriated homes to be replaced with similar ones.

Although an owner's land is invaded and diminished in value by an expropriation of part of it, or an easement over it or through it, such as landing equipment around an airport, he cannot call on the authority to take it all, as is the practice in England.

Although an owner's land may be depreciated in value because of general knowledge of pending expropriation—generally referred to by text writers as pre-expropriation blight—his compensation is set as of the date of expropriation without any allowance for reduction, which may be very substantial and was caused by the authority. In England such an allowance is made.

Hon. J. C. McRuer, retired chief justice of the high court in Ontario, in his royal commission report to the government of Ontario quoted Hon. J. Thorson, then President of the Exchequer Court who, in dealing with a federal expropriation, said in a judgment in 1956:

> I am not aware of any other country in the civilized world that exercises its right of eminent domain in the arbitrary manner that Canada does, and unfortunately, the example set by Canada has infected several of the Canadian provinces in which a similar system of expropriation has been adopted.

Although all Canadians recognize the need to expropriate for public good, public good includes the need to protect the rights of individuals. There should be a better balance between the individual's rights and the public interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of the hon. member that it is slightly after one o'clock. I would invite him to continue his remarks when we resume the sitting at 2.30.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Chappell: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose for lunch I was speaking about expropriations by the federal authority under the Expropriation Act passed in 1889. I had pointed out the shortcomings and antiquity of the act and the need to bring it up to date and more in line with today's concepts of what is businesslike and just. Specifically I mentioned that the act did not require notice to be given of the intention to expropriate or of the actual expropriation itself; that it did not require the expropriation authority to pay any part of the compensation to which the owner was entitled, either at the time of taking or later when possession was demanded; that access to the courts was not simple and speedy; that the act did not provide guidelines for the method by which the compensation and loss should be determined; and that the interest rate on compensation was still 5 per cent, as determined in 1900, while the owner who lost his property would have to pay much higher interest rates on borrowed money in order to re-establish himself.

I come back now to where I was.

Although all Canadians recognize the need to expropriate for public good, public good includes the need to protect the rights of individuals. There should be a better balance between the individual's right and public interest. If the law lags behind contemporary attitudes, strains, discontent and distrust emerge.

I hope I have sufficiently directed the attention of hon. members to this problem, that we may immediately bring our expropriation laws more in line with ordinary concepts of reason and justice and thus lead the way for the provinces and perhaps ultimately lead to uniform expropriation codes for all parts of Canada.

I have full confidence in this government and believe that if defects in our laws are pointed out they will be corrected. In this case there is an urgency. In British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Ontario expropriation laws have been under review and are being changed. This is our opportunity to do more than patch up existing legislation. We must develop a new concept of compensation which will speedily put a man in the same relative position that he was in before government required his property or government activity affected it. If we act promptly our legislation may have the additional advantage of influencing the provincial legislatures before their new acts are passed.

The task is not as great as it may appear. England has kept her expropriation laws up to date for the last 120 years. New Zealand and Pennsylvania recently brought theirs up to date. In British Columbia and Ontario Hon. J. V. Clyne and Hon. J. C. McRuer have studied the whole subject and made detailed recommendations.

I understand from the Minister of Justice that a new act will be brought forward, but in the meantime, I am sure that the people of Peel South and all Canadians who are affected by expropriation may have the assurance of this government that everything possible will be done that may be done within the framework of existing legislation to relieve against the present deficiencies in our legislation.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Scarborough East): May I begin, Mr. Speaker, by congratulating you on your re-election and by congratulating Mr. Deputy Speaker and the Deputy Chairman of Committees for being elected to the important offices they hold. I also wish to congratulate the hon. members for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) for their excellent statements in moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I have the honour to represent the newly created riding of Scarborough East, situated on the eastern boundary of metropolitan Toronto. The residents of my riding were formerly in the riding of York-Scarborough and were so ably represented in the previous parliament by the hon. member who now represents York-Scarborough. On behalf of my constituents and on my own behalf may I congratulate the hon. member on his appointment as parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State. In a previous parliament my constituents—and they well remember this—enjoyed the energetic and distinguished representation of Mr. M. J. Moreau.

As hon. members know, the borough of Scarborough for the past decade has undergone exceptional growth. It may well double in population in the next 15 years. The eastern portion of the borough, that part covered by the constituency of Scarborough East, is growing even more rapidly and promises to double in population in the next five years. Much of the undeveloped land remaining in Metro Toronto lies in the constituency of Scarborough East and the pressures for residential and industrial development are extremely high. Indeed, five areas within the new constituency, each of which will result in communities of between 20,000 and 30,000 persons, are in various stages of development.

One such area is the federal-provincial land assembly scheme at Malvern, involving some 1,800 acres acquired 15 years ago in 1953 but on which the first housing is expected to appear only in 1970. Hon. members will appreciate the severe strains caused by such growth, not only in blending new areas with established communities but also the strains on municipal finances in providing water and sewer services, schools, recreation facilities, public transportation and other services. In a constituency such as mine, residents come to realize the limitations of many urban municipalities as presently organized, administered and financed to meet growth problems, and accordingly they expect greater initiatives from the provincial government, particularly in lifting a more substantial part of educational costs from local property taxation. They expect also a better co-ordination of federal, provincial and municipal functions than, for example, has been evident in the tragically slow development at Malvern even in the face of a mounting housing crisis.

They expect new policies and programs from the federal government to cope with growth problems in such fields as inter-city transportation, rapid transit, pollution control, housing, basic utilities, and the creation of new towns within regional development plans to relieve pressures on existing metropolitan areas. I will not expand on urban problems, Mr. Speaker, but I do hope to have an opportunity, together with provincial and municipal elected representatives in my constituency, to place a brief before the task force on housing and urban affairs when it visits metro Toronto at the end of this month.

I would like today to offer some thoughts and proposals for the development of policy in Indian affairs. I appreciate this is an extremely complex field, and though I have some small background in it I know there are many hon. members here more qualified by experience than I to speak on it because of the presence in their ridings of Indian communities. But I believe we were all encouraged to enter upon these problems by the references in the throne speech to Indians, to the righting of wrongs and the opening of new opportunities, and by the high priority placed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), shared by all hon. members, on the eradication of poverty and the attainment among us of a higher order of justice.

There is in Indian affairs in Canada a new citizen frontier. It is there because Indian citizens are now making a collective decision to integrate with general society. We cannot view this as anything less than a major turning point in the history of the new world. In our generation we are seeing a transformation of the life of native citizens, the giving up of historic communal isolation, as Indians come to see that taking possession of this land again really means sharing in the making of its future, and come to see that only by sharing in making a common future can they repossess themselves as full men and women and, as contemporary Canadians, be assured of retaining an Indian identity. That collective decision and turning point and our response to them are the new frontiers of opportunity and obligation opening before us in this parliament.

How are we to play our part? Let me begin by stating two basic assumptions that underlie what I propose to say. The first is that Indians in the main do wish to integrate with the general stream of Canadian life, to share fully in it as equal citizens but not to assimilate in the sense of disappearing as Indians. They seek to integrate as individuals and as entire communities while retaining a sense of communal or ethnic identity.

The second assumption is that the reservation community will remain the permanent base of Indian community life for the foreseeable future, hopefully in a modified and more developed form. I will not stop here to defend these positions but I do wish to make them explicit because unless each of us defines his attitude on these two basic questions he will, with respect, Mr. Speaker, be unable to help shape successful public policy, and will be unable to assist Indians to build those internal strengths and programs of self-help vital to progress.

Before suggesting some specific proposals in such areas as economic development I would like to recall very briefly to hon. members some facts concerning the situation of Indians in Canada today.

The more than 225,000 registered Indians of Canada belong to some 556 bands living in over 2,000 reserve communities set aside by treaty over the past 100 years for their exclusive use and designed to support a traditional way of life. Many reservations have populations under 100 persons. However, 60 per cent of Canada's Indians, and over 70 per cent of Ontario's 55,000 Indians, live in communities with populations ranging between 500 and 2,000, with the exception of the Six Nations reserve near Brantford of approximately 8,000 persons.

These larger communities, as well as certain smaller ones, offer opportunities for economic and social development. However, not only have they been isolated from the mainstream of social and economic life, they have also been insulated from each other by language differences, inertia, poverty and physical distance. A wide range in the level of cultural development separates Indians from each other.

Internal divisions arise within communities as to the best course to follow, and the lack of effective local government machinery capable of developing a working consensus further impedes action. To meet the wide variety of needs under these circumstances there are required special and flexible approaches not yet available under the existing Indian Act nor, I would add, under the present structure of the Indian affairs branch.

The outstanding fact of Indian life is poverty. Indian poverty is self-perpetuating. It goes around in a circle that has not been broken in a century. No matter where one enters the circle, at the point of education, or at the points of health, housing, employment, community development, pride in self, or motivation, one is led from one point to the other around the full circle. The circularity of Indian poverty and the inter-penetration of one condition with another surely means that only a broad, comprehensive approach can succeed in raising standards of life and personal development in keeping with current Indian expectations. The new Indian initiatives and the historical decision to integrate, to which I referred earlier, hold out the brightest promise in centuries that the cycle of poverty, with our help, can be broken in our generation.

You are already familiar with the main measures of the gulf of poverty across which Indian citizens live, and I will not review them here. Another fact of Indian life as important to us as poverty, and perhaps more important in its implications for a future of justice and development, is the sense of grievance and injustice harboured in many Indian communities. Again I do not intend to dwell upon this subject this afternoon apart from expressing the hope that the Indian lands claims commission bill will be introduced early in this parliament and, further, that we will deem it urgent and proper to amend the Migratory Birds Convention Act, passed by parliament 50 years ago and which, however unwittingly, did abridge and violate the hunting rights of Indians agreed to in solemn treaties.

I wish to turn now to some specific proposals which may contribute to progress. The first may be summed up as a plan for the economic development of Indian communities through industry and employment. Surely opportunities for gainful employment must rank in the forefront of all plans. One need not deny the central importance of education, but we tend to believe that education will solve all problems. Education is only one point on the circle. The essential point, I believe, is that success in other programs, like housing, welfare, health and general community development, depends to a major degree on building economies capable of supporting such programs and services. If we are to be serious about Indian communities and their self-reliance and not expect them simply to wither away, then we must integrate them as viable communities more closely with the mainstream, with standards of life approximating the general standard. This means attempting to create economic activity on or near reserves, wherever feasible, capable of providing employment and developing the community. In fact, as I see it a systematic program of economic development, such as I propose to describe, provides the essential incentives as well as the means for other developments. Let me suggest the outlines of such a plan to replace the present weak, scattered and unco-ordinated programs of low capability.

To achieve economic development in difficult circumstances, there should be established an economic development agency closely related to, though not necessarily located within, the Indian affairs branch and staffed with professional, technical and development personnel, including Indians. Such an agency should administer an economic development fund of perhaps $25 million but be charged with more than mere lending functions. It would, for example, with the collaboration of the band councils, undertake feasibility studies for industrial enterprises of various kinds on or near reserve communities. It would undertake an evaluation of natural and human resources of Indian communities; it would make repayable loans and certain non-repayable grants to assist in the promotion of industrial projects of Indian bands, co-operatives, individual Indians and approved non-Indian persons. The development agency, with the approval of band councils, would be prepared to supply technical and management personnel at certain stages of project development. With the approval of band councils, the development agency should encourage companies to locate certain operations on or near reserves to expand employment opportunities.

The agency should also seek to arrange with major Canadian industries to provide on-job training programs for selected Indian workers and be prepared to share in the wage and other costs of such programs. The agency should assume job placement functions and work in close co-operation with the manpower centres and existing vocational and technical training programs. It should co-ordinate and ensure the extension to reserve communities of existing development programs such as ARDA and FRED, the area development programs, and of provincial programs. An important function would be to conduct a study of credit available to Indians and to encourage savings and credit institutions in reserve communities.

Such is a brief outline of a development agency supported by substantial development funds and specialist personnel. It is designed to do a comprehensive job, recognizing that existing programs and facilities fail to meet the special needs of Indian citizens, and recognizing also that industry and employment are basic foundations for success in most other fields. An essential requirement in complex development fields is for an agency more flexible than a government department and more capable of tapping provincial and other resources.

I should also like to draw the attention of the house to another salient in the new frontier—the need to encourage mutual aid associations, self-help and other organizations among Indians and Eskimos. Such voluntary agencies and groups proliferate in general society but only now begin to emerge among Canada's native people. Not only do we too often fail to encourage Indians to establish such groups, we fail to support those that do emerge. Consider for a moment the importance to individual pride and group solidarity of the aid organizations developed by immigrants. The civil rights movement, for example, has been a powerful force creating group pride and self-improvement. Indians need such mutual help organizations. The evidence, I believe, is that group and individual pride and dignity are directly relevant to integration.

I would like to advance a proposal designed to bring assistance to Indian organizations and to serve an essential purpose in the cultural field which is so directly related to the question of Indian identity. This proposal, which is for the creation of a Canada Indian institute, is made as a response to Indian appeals and initiatives particularly on the part of Indian youth. Among the characteristics of a Canada Indian institute, as I see them, are the following.

It should be an autonomous national body established by the federal government upon the request, preferably, of a national conference of Indian people. Its relations with the federal government should be similar to those of independent councils and crown corporations, for example, the Canada Council. Its board of governors should be composed of Indians, Métis and other citizens. Its financing should be based largely on government funds but it should also actively solicit private funds from foundations, corporations and individuals.

Among the interlocking functions and activities of the proposed Canada Indian institute should be these: first, to affiliate with the Inter-American Indian Institute. This is an international body formed in 1940 and supported by some 18 member countries but not by Canada, I may say. It serves as a clearing house for information on Indian developments and on the methods of improving their social and economic conditions. There is no doubt in my mind that Canadian affiliation with the Inter-American Indian Institute would be of significant advantage to Indians of Canada. It seems to me there is every reason to expect that Canada's external aid program should include aid to other countries to assist in the development of Indian communities throughout this hemisphere and for cultural exchanges between Canadian and other Indian groups. Canada might indeed, a few years hence, become the host country to an international congress of Indian and other native people of this hemisphere to the great advantage of Canadian citizens, not only those of Indian and Eskimo ancestry. On the cultural plane alone, though I would add the political and social planes also, the native people of Canada have much to contribute to such a gathering. We know, for example, that some of the high art of the hemisphere has been produced by Indians of the northwest coast of Canada.

Another function of the Canada Indian institute would be to assist Indian, Métis and Eskimo organizations to develop, operate, assist, for example, and finance up to some reasonable point such organizations as the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians, the B. C. Native Brotherhood, the Union of Ontario Indians, the Alberta Métis Federation, the Manitoba Métis Association, the Quebec Indian Association, the Canadian Indian Youth Council, and the Canadian Indian Brotherhood. I mention only a few among many examples of regional, provincial and national native organizations. These organizations need financial aid to provide themselves with a small secretariat, to engage expert legal and other consultants, and to meet as organizations, and with other associations, in order to overcome decades of isolation as well as to examine problems and goals sufficiently to make solid contributions to development and to share in the decisions affecting their lives. It should be possible for government to contract certain community development functions to such Indian organizations since many of them can do the job better than government agencies.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Another function should be to establish a technical and a consulting group within the institute to provide educational services, research, much needed legal, financial and other advisory services to Indian and Eskimo communities and organizations.

The institute should sponsor an extensive travel program for Indian youth and adults on visits to other Indian communities and to other parts of Canada to familiarize them with their opportunities. It could and should assist in holding in Canada an annual Canadian Indian conference lasting perhaps one week and attended by representatives of all native communities and organizations, assisted by expert personnel. The holding of such annual conferences managed by native people and free from direct sponsorship by government would undoubtedly result in a growing self-confidence and consensus among native people as to their own goals in the days to come. It should result in an authoritative body of Indian people capable of enlightening the people of Canada and in influencing the course of future public policy.

The institute should undertake special programs to foster cultural development of Indian communities and cultural activity in the performing and expressive arts. This is a neglected area in Canada. Programs lack cultural focus and they falter. The new and promising cultural affairs section of the Indian affairs branch has subsided. The cultural field is one in which North American governments appear confused and unfamiliar, hence the need of a definite action capability on the part of the proposed Canadian Indian institute.

The objective must be to encourage native people to keep vital and to keep reworking those universal and particular elements in their cultural patterns that will assist them to participate fully in contemporary life while retaining their basic Indian or Eskimo identities.

Cultural development turns the key to community and general social development. We tend to forget this. It is here that internal strengths are generated, that a sense of communal identity and individual pride are rooted, and it is here also that native citizens make valued and unique contributions to the many cultural streams in the Canadian pattern. We can no longer conceal from ourselves, if we know what Canada means, that through indifference on the one hand or repression on the other, a people was deeply wounded through undermining the cultural source of their lives. If we are not blind, therefore, we will put in the highest category, above education, above economic development and above housing, freedom and support for those cultural rights and needs, whether in the performing or expressive arts, in language or other cultural modes which Indian and Eskimo people themselves determine to be the basic nourishment of their being.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

The institute should assist in establishing a Canadian Indian college, an institution largely unhampered with regulations as to previous academic requirements but geared rather to a flexible learning process and devoted to studies in Indian history, social and moral values, cultural patterns and attainments, and to their application to the needs of native people in the contemporary world.

I have been suggesting some rather specific new approaches and institutional arrangements in the development of policies in Indian affairs. I should like to conclude by telling hon. members that some months ago I had the duty, when president of the Indian-Eskimo Association of Canada, of writing to the then Prime Minister expressing concern at the underachievement and the apparent subsidizing of the community development program. I have to reiterate here that same concern regarding the non-realization of the great potential of that program.

At that time the association recommended the appointment of a task force—they have since proliferated—to examine the status of the community development program and to consider the feasibility of establishing an Indian development corporation capable of fulfilling complex social and economic roles not readily open to government departments.

The association recommended also high level discussions between the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces, believing that only when the provinces faced up to their constitutional and moral responsibilities to extend their services and development programs to reserve communities would real progress be attainable.

I would like here to renew this request for a ministerial task force and state that in my opinion the most important step that could be taken at this time is to engage Indian communities, Indian organizations and individuals as well as provincial authorities an other agencies in a sustained consultation to study the whole question in all its aspects so that new directions may emerge.

There is a tangled web of conflicting jurisdictions; there is an uncertain approach to responsibilities to Indians, Métis and Eskimos, and there is also a failure to consider the problems of urban and urban bound native peoples. There is a pressing question of restoring and upholding treaty provisions, the proper roles of such public service organizations as the C.B.C. and the National Film Board. There is also the question of the relevance of the present structure and functions of the Indian affairs branch to the changing needs of today and other matters on which a working body of information and knowledge independent of that now possessed almost as a monopoly in the Indian affairs branch would prove valuable to hon. members as they consider the role of this parliament in Indian affairs.

What I am suggesting is that the commendable start being made in the present consultations regarding changes in the Indian Act be followed by broadened consultations with Indians on matters they wish to have discussed so that they will in fact experience a direct participation and involvement in decisions affecting their lives and ours, as well as discussions with other relevant and responding resources, principally the provinces. This should not be another lengthy study by academics, valuable as that may be, but a study by a small task force touring the country and developing recommendations on policy and programs to guide this house in the steps I feel sure it will want to take at the earliest opportunity.

By suggesting a few initiatives I hope I have indicated a few of the considerations which such a task force might investigate.

It is my conviction that no group of citizens can in fact take greater strides to help us all create a just society than can the Indian peoples of Canada. We have not been listening to Indian citizens or responding to their needs. We can unite our futures in equality. An unrivalled opportunity to do so lies now before this parliament.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate you on your election to the position of Speaker of the house. I have heard others describe your ability in superlative terms and I am sure that these descriptions are accurate. However, since I have had the pleasure of meeting Your Honour only recently and observing your direction of the house for a short period of time, I would simply like to say that I am impressed with your pleasantness, fairness and stability.

I am told that it is customary to confine the remarks contained within one's first speech to matters pertaining to one's constituency and therefore I intend to speak in that light. The constituency of Athabasca is the largest in the province of Alberta and is situated in the northeastern section of that province. It contains approximately 55,000 people and a variety of natural and human resources. At present probably the largest functioning industry of the constituency is agriculture. However, since the Athabasca tar sands are located in the riding and the oil refining facilities which are being developed at Fort McMurray are progressing, the possibility of oil refining becoming the largest industry in the near future is quite great.

There are also vast forest reserves in the riding. Wood Buffalo park is contained within the riding, and in Wood Buffalo park there are approximately 17,000 buffalo, together with minerals and other natural resources. The population of Athabasca, as I have mentioned, is quite varied. There are approximately 25 Indian reservations and several Métis colonies. Therefore problems pertaining to Métis and Indians are of great importance to me.

There are no cities contained in the riding. The major population centres, starting from west to east, are the towns of Peace River, High Prairie, High Level, Fort Vermilion, Slave Lake, Lac La Biche, Fort McMurray, Bonnyville, Elk Point, Cold Lake and Grand Centre containing the Canadian forces base. The largest towns are Peace River and Fort McMurray. Because the riding is so vast, with widespread population centres, there are many problems. Isolation is a great factor contributing to problems in the more northerly sections, since road construction in the north has been rather slow and many areas are accessible only by air with any ease.

The major problems in the riding as I see them, and about which I wish to speak, fall into three categories. The first, of course, is agriculture; the second, poverty and unemployment, with particular reference to Indians, Métis and small farmers. In this category I would like to include housing, unemployment and health and welfare. The third major problem is that of isolation, with subheadings of communications, particularly in reference to the construction of roads, and radio and television services.

I would like, therefore, to begin with the problems of agriculture. Most of the farms in the Athabasca riding are of the mixed variety. The average farm consists of about 200 to 300 acres under cultivation. Because of soil conditions in that part of the country, and because of the economic state in which agriculture is today, this acreage is not sufficient to constitute an economic farming unit. According to the Alberta department of agriculture, somewhere in the vicinity of 600 acres of cultivated land is required to make a functioning, economic farm unit.

The greatest single factor which has contributed to making these small farms uneconomical is the fact that the price of farm products has not risen in the past 15 to 20 years. I am referring in particular to the price of wheat, hogs and beef. On the other hand, the price of farm machinery has more than doubled during this period. We might use as an example a tractor which pulls a three-bottom plow. In 1950 this machine could be purchased for about $2,500. Today the same tractor sells for somewhere between $5,000 and $6,000. Because of this unhealthy economic situation, many small farms are being abandoned.

In general it appears that the small family farm is becoming obsolete and is on the way out. But I question whether this is the best solution to the farm problem. Not every farmer wishes to give up his small farm. Many people who live on farms enjoy rural living and do not want to move to cities; yet because of unhealthy economic circumstances they are forced to do so.

Shortly after the election, when it became apparent that a party other than mine would form the government, I was asked by many whether there would be anything I, as an opposition member, could do in order to reach a solution to the problems which exist in the constituency. My reply was that I would try to promote what I thought were good ideas and that I would support anything the government did which I believed would be good for the area. I said I would oppose only those things which I thought would not be good for the area or the country.

With this in mind, I wish to say that I do support one of the things which is being done to aid the plight of the farmer. I am referring in particular to the functions of the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act or ARDA, which is already in operation. I am bringing ARDA into the picture at this point because the act is set up to assist rural communities to improve their economic status. Naturally, the farmer who is running a small, uneconomic farming unit should qualify for some sort of assistance through the ARDA program.

As I have mentioned, many people are giving up their small farms and some are enlarging their operations. The principles of ARDA are to help those who wish to enlarge their farms to purchase other, developed land or to clear and open new land. The ARDA program is also aimed at helping those who wish to give up their farms in order to be retrained and relocated in other jobs. This, in theory, sounds beautiful, but in actual fact the program is not working that way. The machinery of the ARDA program seems to be in great need of lubrication. It is ponderous and does not function effectively.

Only about two weeks ago I met with farm leaders in one of the areas of the constituency. They had attempted to deal with ARDA for the past couple of years. One of the projects, which was applied for more than a year ago, pertained to increasing the cultivated acreage. This was to be done through clearing and opening new land which existed on their farms. More than a year had gone by and nothing had been done to consider this project up to the time of our meeting. About three months ago some farmers applied to have their land assessed and sold through the ARDA program, and again nothing has been done to date.

The machinery of ARDA is set up in such a way that any given project proposed by a local community must go through five committees before it obtains final approval. The first of these committees is composed of ordinary provincial civil servants. If they approve the application it goes to a provincial deputy ministers' committee, then to a provincial cabinet committee and then to a committee in Winnipeg. Finally it gets to a committee here in Ottawa, which gives it final approval. If it takes more than one year to get by the first committee, how long will it take for a project to receive final approval? I am raising this matter because it is of some urgency. When ARDA was first described in my constituency farmers saw it as a ray of hope, but they are becoming disillusioned because of the slowness of the machinery.

Within the past six months, in one poll alone in the constituency it was found that 12 farmers had given up their small farms, but there was no ARDA assistance available to them for relocation, retraining or anything else. The program I have just discussed pertains mainly to farmers who are in great distress, but those who are not in as great distress also have many problems. I have already mentioned one of these problems, namely, the high price of farm machinery. I am therefore anxiously awaiting the report of the Barber commission and hope it will contain recommendations which will provide some element of stability with regard to the price of farm machinery in relation to the price of farm products.

The most glaring problem that farmers face today is that of the disposal of their products, particularly wheat. I am sure everyone is aware of the importance of wheat sales, and I am sure that any hon. member who has wheat farmers in his constituency will probably speak on this subject and will agree that action toward an aggressive world wide wheat policy as a long term solution to the farm problem is necessary, while a short term solution would be to make larger advance payments to the farmers for farm stored wheat. For example, I should like to see more of Canada's foreign aid be in the form of provision of food, particularly wheat, to other countries to a greater extent than has been done in the past. For instance, India alone has an annual birth rate of 21 million and is acutely short of food. Other far eastern countries are also short of food while we in our country have a vast surplus of food supply. It should be possible to neutralize these two great disparities in some way and at the same time to relieve problems of food shortage and lack of markets for our products.

The next major problem in the constituency which I wish to discuss is that of poverty and unemployment. As I mentioned before, it applies mainly to Indians, Métis and small farmers, but also to others. Along with this topic I might refer to the question of housing as it applies to my constituency. Reservations located in my constituency, as well as the Métis colonies which exist there, do not appear to be self-supporting at the present time. There appears to be insufficient capital on these lands to develop the land for agricultural use, and at the same time there are not sufficient numbers of other jobs on these lands to employ the people who live on them. This unhealthy situation contributes to a chronic condition of poverty, unemployment and underemployment with all its associated side effects.

It soon became apparent to me in my travels during the campaign through most of the reservations and Métis colonies that the majority of Métis and Indians live in houses that are not fit for human habitation. I hasten to add, however, that there are occasional houses which are reasonably satisfactory. Because of poor housing conditions, overcrowding is very common. Poor water supply or no water supply is common. Many people living on reserves and colonies drink water from sloughs, lakes and streams. This type of drinking water is a definite health hazard and therefore dysentery is quite common among the children. Because of poor housing, overcrowding and undernourishment, the rate of tuberculosis in these areas is higher than nearly anywhere else in the country.

Many factors must be considered in order to try to improve the status of the poor in our area. When one considers that the Athabasca riding is probably the richest in Canada in natural resources—and again I am referring to the Athabasca tar sands—it is difficult to accept the fact that it probably also contains the largest number of poverty-stricken people of any constituency in the country. Many of our people who are in the poverty-stricken state are, of course, receiving provincial welfare, while some of the Indian people receive welfare from the federal Indian department. However, this is no way of solving the problem of poverty. The method of doling out welfare adopted today probably originated with Robin Hood. The idea is to solve poverty by taking from the rich and giving to the poor. Here it is taken from those who have by the government and given to the poor by the government. But this does not solve the problem of poverty; it simply prolongs it. A poor person cannot be made not poor by a gift of money because once he spends the money he is poor again. Therefore I feel that giving people outright welfare is only a good temporary solution but is not a satisfactory long term solution to the poverty problem.

It seems to me that in order to eliminate poverty on a long term basis, resource development is required, and I am referring to development of human resources as well as natural resources. Human resources must be developed in such a way that a person can then look after his own needs on a permanent basis, and natural resource development must be carried out simultaneously in order to give him opportunity for employment in his home area.

The greatest factors contributing to poverty and unemployment in my constituency are lack of education, lack of trade skills and lack of jobs. These, of course, result in part from isolation, as mentioned before. So in order for a long term solution to be found, the poverty-stricken population must be assisted to develop to the point where they can eventually look after themselves. Therefore isolation must be removed, either by bringing training facilities to isolated posts or by moving isolated populations en masse to areas where they could develop their own potential, or else a combination of these two suggestions could be used.

However, education is only one factor in solving the problem of poverty. There are many others to be considered, such as community development programs, preventive social service programs, and the reassessment of the welfare program as it exists today. The reassessment of the welfare program is necessary because the present set-up discourages people from trying to look after themselves. A certain earning level is considered necessary to feed, clothe and shelter a family of a given size, and if a man earns a given number of dollars, then the difference between his earnings and his need is made up by the welfare department. However, if he earns less, then he simply gets more from the welfare department, and if he earns nothing he gets all from the welfare department. Sooner or later this encourages such people to earn nothing because they see no point in working when, if they do not, all of the money will come from welfare anyway.

I am not saying that this happens in the case of all welfare recipients, but am merely trying to point out the fact that the program as it exists takes away the motivation and the ambition of poor people to look after themselves. Therefore I suggest that the program be altered and that welfare assistance be given as a percentage of what a person earns or can earn after his earning potential and his needs have been considered so that to a certain extent, if he earns more he would get more from the welfare department. This would at least make him more motivated to continue seeking employment, however temporary it may be.

It has also been observed in my constituency where new industrial development is taking place at Fort McMurray that this does not necessarily solve the problems of unemployment in the area because many of the unemployed or underemployed are not trained for the jobs which are available, and also because many of them have poor working habits and cannot hold jobs for long. As a result, people from other parts of the country are brought in to fill the jobs and the local unemployment problem remains the same. Therefore, in order that industrial development in that area can succeed in removing the unemployment problem, a co-operative effort must be made involving both the needs of the industry and the development of educational facilities. I wish to point out that there is a program of this nature in Lac-la-Biche. It is called Alberta Newstart Incorporated, and is designed to upgrade the way of living of the inhabitants in the area and to increase the earning potential of the unemployed and the underemployed. I feel this is a good scheme and I give it my wholehearted support. I wish to assure the minister responsible that I will do everything I can to ensure the success of this program.

I know that at the present time the Indian Act is under review and hearings are being held across the country with representatives of various Indian bands. I do not claim to be a good spokesman for Indians. I was told by an Indian once that it takes an Indian to really understand another Indian and his needs. However, from my conversations with many Indians it is my conclusion that Indians should be given as much autonomy as possible in the management of their own affairs. I feel that for too long the Indian has not been given enough credit for his ability to manage his affairs. May I remind the house that he managed quite well before the white man ever got here. In many areas there exist distorted views of what the Indian really is. Some people consider him to be subhuman and treat him accordingly. Some people do not know that he has the same needs, feelings, emotions and potentials as any other human being. I feel that if an Indian is given a chance to manage his own affairs, he will do more to solve his own problems than can anyone else.

The final major point for discussion is the problem of isolation and lack of communication plaguing large sections of the constituency. It is urgently necessary that the roads to resources program in the north of a previous government be resumed in its original or in a modified form. Road construction through these northern areas. starting from Fort McKay, which is north of Fort McMurray, to Wood Buffalo park, with a branch to Chipewyan and then continued to join the highway to Fort Smith on the Northwest Territories border should be continued without delay. There has been delay in construction because of negotiations taking place between the federal and Alberta governments with regard to the boundaries of Wood Buffalo park. If the boundaries remain the same, and if the road must go through Wood Buffalo park, then the federal government is responsible for construction of the road within the park. The provincial government, of course, would be responsible for those roads outside the park's boundaries. I suggest that since negotiations concerning the boundaries have been going on for so long without reaching a definite conclusion, the federal government should go ahead with the construction of that part of the road which falls within Wood Buffalo park. This should be done in conjunction with the feasibility studies the provincial government is now undertaking concerning the best location for the road.

Once the road to Fort Chipewyan is built, then it could be extended to Uranium City in co-operation with the Saskatchewan government. Some communications on this subject between the two governments have already taken place. In any event, construction of this type of road would certainly be a great boom to further industrial development in that area, as well as in relieving the acute isolation of many settlements at the present time. While we are on the topic of Wood Buffalo park and the road, this may be the appropriate time to suggest that industrial development of mineral resources in Wood Buffalo park would then proceed. This development would provide employment for many of the residents in that region, particularly around Fort Chipewyan.

I wish to mention another type of communication at this time, and that is television and radio service to northern areas. The town of Fort McMurray has no television. The towns of High Level and Fort Vermillion do not have television service or satisfactory radio reception. Fort McMurray contains about 6,000 people, while High Level and Fort Vermillion combined contain approximately 4,000. The growth potential for these towns is good, and I would urge the development of facilities for these towns immediately.

C.B.C. television could be brought to Fort McMurray through Lac La Biche, and to Fort Vermillion and High Level through the towns of Peace River and Manning, thus servicing large population centres. The lack of television facilities in these northern towns contributes a great deal to the feeling of isolation. I know consideration is being given to satellite transmission of television in the north. I certainly hope this materializes. One way or another, I feel it is urgent that television service be provided within the next year. Television facilities in these areas would create better recreational opportunities and would be informative as well as educational.

I should like to give an example of what I mean. During the campaign, about two or three weeks before election day, I went to meet people in some isolated areas and introduced myself as a candidate in the coming election. Not uncommonly, the reply was "what election?" This certainly brought out what lack of communication means in a given area.

In recent months we have heard numerous eructations of the phrase "just society". I wish to make some comments on this. This term has been heard often, yet the originator of the term has never really defined this so-called just society. Does it mean socialism or does it mean greater emphasis on free enterprise? Does it mean social measures aimed only in the direction of the greatest need? I hope it does not mean the creation of general, socialistic measures. I hope it does not mean socialism because I feel that if any justice in our society is to exist it has to be based on a foundation of maximum freedom for the individual. Individual freedom was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Justice or a just society cannot exist without a foundation of individual freedom because if across the board social welfare measures are introduced on a compulsory basis this takes away one's freedom of choice in two ways, freedom of choice whether or not one wants the measure and freedom of choice whether or not one wants to pay for it. I hope, therefore, that in a just society humanitarian programs will be designed only for those who are in need and that freedom of choice will remain available for those who are not in need.

This brings me to the question of regional disparities. As I previously mentioned, solving the problem of the poor by taking from the non-poor is temporary and unsatisfactory. The problem must be solved not by taking from the non-poor and giving to the poor but by providing opportunities for the poor so that they, on their own initiative, can become non-poor. Local regional development would lead to increased productivity in that area and the regional disparity would disappear.

Returning to the just society, may I say I feel that a compulsory medicare program, is not just. I am not opposed to medical insurance. I think that medical insurance is good, as is car insurance or fire insurance. However, I am opposed to compulsion because compulsion takes away a man's freedom of choice. When you take away a man's freedom of choice, then you are creating a situation in which there is decreased justice. I know the medicare scheme has already been discussed at length but I should like to see reconsideration of it. I agree there should be a conference between the federal government and the provinces to reassess the scheme as it exists, to provide medical services for the needy but on a voluntary basis for those who are not in need. In my opinion, this would be more just.

These are my comments, Mr. Speaker, on the three major problems facing the constituency of Athabasca today: agriculture, with particular reference to the uneconomic farm unit and wheat sales; poverty and unemployment, with particular reference to the Métis and Indians; and isolation, with particular reference to northern road construction and television services. I hope the government will take up the challenge and face these problems without delay.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I trust I will be forgiven if I mention the fact that three lovely ladies from Chilliwack, which is some considerable distance from here, have apparently come to this chamber just to hear me make my maiden speech. I rise as a neophyte to participate in the throne speech debate. I am only too pleased to join my colleagues in extending sincere congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, on your appointment as Speaker of this house. The masterful manner in which you direct deliberations has already indicated that procedures here will be expedited. The province of British Columbia is especially proud that the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) was selected to second the motion for the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne which was so ably moved by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin).

At the outset I wish to pay tribute to my predecessor, Reverend Alex B. Patterson of Abbotsford, B.C. He served my riding with sincerity and desire for almost 18 years, broken only by a four year period from 1958. He was temporarily replaced by a more Conservative friend of mine, Mr. Harold Hicks of Agassiz.

I would also ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, to permit me to bring greetings from Mr. George Cruickshank of Abbotsford who was the last member of parliament of the Liberal party to represent my riding. He served the constituency diligently and well.

It appears fitting, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as my election replaced the acting leader of a political party and the election of the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) also replaced the leader of a political party, that we now sit as neighbours on the side previously occupied by our predecessors. I assure the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that although we are entrenched here next to the demilitarized zone, we shall at all times endeavour to represent our areas with a proper measure of decorum.

The speech from the throne confirms the pre-election assertions to my constituents—a pragmatic and fresh approach to good government.

My constituency is Fraser Valley East in the lush garden of Canada, British Columbia. By virtue of the comparatively limited space suitable for land farming, my area leans heavily to diversity in food production. The constant increase in urban population is creating new challenges to our farmers. The splendorous mountains serve to attract tourists but also severely limit future food production.

The preservation of green areas in the Fraser Valley has now reached a degree of urgency and is a challenge which must surely be met in the very near future. It is my fervent plea that during this session of parliament we will consider ways to provide leadership by persuading other governments, whether provincial, municipal or civic, to plan now for future land accommodation in the Fraser Valley, so as to meet the food requirements of British Columbia's urban areas and avoid costly transportation of products from east of the Rocky mountains.

The people of my riding view with increasing alarm the serious threat to our farm lands which will certainly result if plans proceed to establish new railway links through these rich lands. Our two national railways, acting in concert with B.C. Hydro, seem determined to impose the Roberts Bank railway line despite the alternative route which exists, a route which has the full support of planning authorities and a host of interested associations. Thousands of acres of fertile cash crop acreage have already fallen prey to industrialists who are unquestionably placing monetary expediency above the present and future requirements of the people. It is the earnest wish of my constituents, as evidenced by the multitude of submissions, that parliament promptly use whatever jurisdictional authority it can muster to revise existing plans based on the findings of the lower mainland regional planning board.

The wise decision of the federal government to assist in distributing cereal feed grains throughout Canada on a reasonably equitable basis has resulted in accelerated development of the production of animal proteins for our daily diet. This segment of the agricultural industry, coupled with small fruits, cole crops, field vegetables and tree nuts, provides adequate supply with surplus to ship to other markets.

Fraser Valley farmers are somewhat puzzled by the recent report from the Economic Council of Canada to the effect that there is a serious gap in agricultural technological advance compared with the United States. Those who have been heavily involved in the production of eggs, poultry meat, dairying, turkey production, cash crops and vegetables simply cannot agree. The degree of continuous technological exchange between the United States and Canada as related to the above segments of the agricultural industry has been great indeed. It has been a two-way street beneficial to farmers in both nations.

It is true that financial resources available for research and development are limited in Canada and this permits our American friends to make more rapid progress. However—and this is my point—we have found no evidence of any attempts to stifle technological exchange. The limiting factors, Mr. Speaker, are population disproportion, disturbing to the Canadian domestic market, plus the variables of volume of production. Technological advances cannot create markets. Conversely, Mr. Speaker, they can aggravate costly surpluses. My constituents have already taken the necessary steps to operate their segments as economic units, acting as procurement commissions to secondary industries. This highly successful approach to marketing has been in operation for many years and operates without benefit of governmental or civil service interference other than enabling legislation. Their theory is: "Production on a business basis to amply serve available markets with lower cost product controlled by area competition, subject only to necessary governmental ground rules".

My constituents were delighted to learn of the proposed federal marketing legislation announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). Our people are looking forward to providing assistance through consultation and planning.

At this date, Mr. Speaker, a serious problem exists within the sphere of turkey production throughout all of Canada. The threat of imports of live and eviscerated turkeys from the United States at laid-down prices which are less than the Canadian cost of production is severely damaging our turkey industry. A close study of the circumstances responsible for this problem indicates that the very future of the Canadian turkey industry is in jeopardy.

The existing inequitable competition created by vertical integration in the United States bears no relation to technological advances. Volume of production and consumer population of 20 to 1, which establishes overall cost quotients, constitute an insurmountable barrier under existing tariff schedules. My constituents are pleased to know the Department of Agriculture now has this intolerable situation under study as a matter of urgency. I am advised by my constituents that the farmers in my area are unanimously agreed that government subsidies should only be established as a last resort.

The Fraser Valley, and especially my constituency of Fraser Valley East, has been threatened with flooding by the mighty Fraser river on a regular basis. Floods which have occurred have been devastating. The recently signed agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of British Columbia is indeed a welcome respite. Our constituents are looking forward to phase two as related to water level control in the upper areas and reiterate their request that progress be initiated as soon as economically possible.

I am pleased to report that it is our privilege in Fraser Valley East to have a goodly number of Indian reservations within the area. It has been my privilege to meet with many of the chiefs of those bands and to become acquainted with their earnest desire to become involved officially in participation in the planning of the future of Indian communities in Canada. We are proud to be acquainted with Chief William J. Mussell of the Skwah band, a graduate of the University of British Columbia and a leader of community life in Abbotsford, British Columbia. One does not remain long in the company of our Indian friends, when they are in session at their regular meetings, without being convinced that any delay in the rewriting of the Indian Act would indeed be a travesty of justice.

Few areas in Canada south of the Northwest Territories utilize modern aviation to span the inaccessible approaches to remote sections more than the people of British Columbia. Even those areas now served by highways lean heavily on all types of aviation to reduce travel mileage and conserve time. My constituency alone boasts of seven licensed airports. The popularity of aviation is such that one airport, Abbotsford, now hosts the largest air show on the North American continent. A show which started as an air circus many years ago has progressed to where it now serves as the acknowledged market place and air exposition of international aviation. No less than 340,000 visitors attended the three-day show in August, 1968. Among them were many from the United Kingdom, France, Italy, Portugal, South Africa, and the United States. It is my pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to issue an invitation today to all those present within the House of Commons chamber to visit the show in 1969. It will be held in August.

My constituents place great faith in the future of aviation, especially at the general aviation or private flying level. Today's vast Canadian air transport system owes its favourable position to the pioneers who fought with unparalleled tenacity to prove it could be done. The Department of Transport must be highly praised for insistence in the belief that at some point in the past flying was here to stay. It is true that the development of huge aircraft now commanding preference for world travel is phenomenal. However, facts which are sometimes ignored indicate that general aviation and private flying have also advanced at an accelerated rate. It is the earnest hope of those who still pioneer the regional routes and fly privately that apathy relating to private flying will not develop in government to the point where Canadian aviation will be measured by the requirements of the large air transport companies. There is a challenge now for Canadians to insist that technological advances necessary in the field of air navigation and airports keep step with other nations of the world.

I would be remiss, Mr. Speaker, if I failed, even at this date, to mention the impact that Expo '67 has had in stimulating the Canadian tourist trade. Many exciting and rewarding experiences await those who travel the length and breadth of our land. More Canadians than ever are learning about Canada. I know of no better method of promoting Canadian unity than for easterners to travel west and for westerners to travel east. Many new members of the house, including myself, are now determined to learn the other official language, not as a requirement, Mr. Speaker, but as a privilege. It will be my pleasure to endeavour to promote the tourist exchange concept in my area and to extend a sincere invitation to easterners to come on out west and get to know all of your vast, firmly united nation.

Despite our affluent society we confess that there are areas requiring special development, either to initiate progress or replace industry which is being abandoned in the interest of centralization or integration. It is our hope that guidelines to include all unfortunate sections of Canada will emerge from studies of all depressed areas.

The immense challenge involved in establishing a truly just society will require the united efforts of all Canadians, for a just society cannot be established by laws alone. The election demonstrated that Canadians have, with good reason, placed their confidence in our brilliant chief executive officer, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). His steadfast determination to involve all Canadians in the task of moulding Canada into an even more united and purposeful nation is inspiring this great land as never before.

I am proud to be a member of this parliament. I look forward to serving and working with all the members of the House of Commons. I look forward to participating in the decisions of Canada's twenty eighth parliament which I am sure will be one of the most productive in Canada's history.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to extend my congratulations to you on being appointed Speaker. I am sure that you and the other officers who have been appointed will serve this house in a way we can all be proud of.

Before beginning my general remarks may I say that I was disappointed with several aspects of the throne speech. I wish to mention four or five matters that are pertinent at this time to my constituency. As many hon. members probably know, one of the world's largest potash deposits is to be found near Easterhazy in the southeast part of the riding I represent. It was recently announced by I.M.C., the international mineral people, that they are planning to truck the potash to a point across the United States border for shipment on United States trains to Chicago. If that happens there will be serious economic repercussions to the city of Melville, which is a potash transportation centre at this time. If the transportation facilities are not to be used it will mean that many families in the area will be without jobs. I just wish to bring that to the attention of the house and I hope that it will be possible to avoid bringing about this economic setback to the community in Melville.

I also wish to express my concern about the cancellation of the winter works program, since it affects the cities and towns in my constituency. The cancellation will bring hardship not only for the towns themselves but also for many families. I am sure that as a result unemployment this winter will increase, and I wish to second the remarks of members of the opposition and on the government side who have spoken about this matter.

I also wish to talk briefly about the problems of the Indian Métis people. I have grown up with Indian people. I was raised on a farm which was near a reservation. There are about six Indian reservations in the constituency of Yorkton-Melville, and I would like to congratulate the hon. member who seconded the address in reply for his discussion of Indian problems. It is about time the Indian people had equality with the rest of society. It is about time they were given the right to make more of the decisions affecting their own lives.

The most important issue in the constituency of Yorkton-Melville is, of course, agriculture. First of all I want to say I concur 100 per cent with what was said by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) in this house a couple of days ago. I think he quite adequately described the pressures facing Saskatchewan farmers today. He talked about the cost-price squeeze and its effect on the farming industry. The time has come when the government must act to alleviate the farmers' problems. We must introduce a vigorous campaign to sell wheat internationally. We must do something to raise the price of wheat. I suggest that the farmer receive $2.12 a bushel for all the wheat he sells abroad, and an extra $1 per bushel for wheat used domestically, up to a level of 1,000 bushels per farmer.

Something must be done about the skyrocketing increase in the price of farm machinery. Here I would suggest we begin by establishing a prices review board to investigate the cost of farm machinery. We must extend farm credit and make interest free loans available to young farmers wishing to establish themselves in the industry. Agriculture is the No. 1 industry in the province of Saskatchewan, and indeed is one of the basic industries in all of Canada. It is about time we started to realize this and gave farmers a better deal.

I would now like to introduce something new into the throne speech debate Mr. Speaker. I could go on to talk about many of the problems in my constituency but that is something I will be doing throughout the session. Now, however, I would like to introduce a new topic because it is very important to the government of Canada although it is something politicians, regardless of their political affiliations, do not talk about.

I do this for basically two reasons. First, I do not want to duplicate some of the things members of my party have already said and, second, more importantly it is an issue of very grave concern to this house and the country. I want to talk about young people and how they relate to this chamber and to the political process in Canada and throughout much of the world.

For young people democracy is on trial right here and now. We have heard a lot about alienation, about frustration, student unrest, riots, hippies, yippies, beatniks and similar groups within the youth community. All of these phenomena are important to this house for one reason. That reason is that the verdict on the democratic system by many of these young people has already been made and that verdict is guilty—guilty of irrelevance, guilty of lack of purpose, guilty of lack of meaning for their lives but, most important of all, the political system has been found guilty for its failure to produce results here and now.

I have mentioned alienation. What is alienation? It is the separation of the individual from his activity. Political alienation is the separation of the individual from what is going on right here in this house. What do I mean by this and how does one recognize this kind of alienation in society?

You can recognize this alienation in many different ways. The first way of recognizing it is by the sheer indifference that many have to the political process. On the one hand we have the drop-outs. I have mentioned the hippies, yippies, beatniks and the like, but on the other hand you have indifference on the part of what one could probably call the average kid, the average student who could not care less about the political process. This is the person who is a product of society's major institutions, the person who year in and year out has had the fact pounded into him that he must submit to authority without question. He has been taught to be indifferent, to be apathetic, to conform, and thus he does not really care what happens in the government of Canada or in the whole political process.

You also recognize alienation in a more articulated manner from many of the young people who have attempted to get involved in the decision-making process and have failed. You find groups of these people all over the world. To mention just a few there are the civil rights movement in the United States, the Viet Nam action committees in Canada, the United States and Europe, and we have student activists around the world.

This kind of activity is now cropping up in high schools. We have had recent instances of it in Montreal and in the province of Newfoundland.

This despair is found in student riots, for example, in France and Czechoslovakia. We can see it in many wildcat strikes breaking out throughout the nation. It is a frustration with the slow process of normal procedures of government.

What does all this mean to those of us who are here in parliament? I think it first means that young people are no longer interested in proving themselves to the political process as it exists. What it does mean is that the political process has to prove itself to them. It means that a government, a political party, and the leaders of political parties have to prove themselves to young people. And if they do not, not only will parliament be powerless in regard to the corporate interests of the country but it will also find itself powerless in terms of its relationship to an ever-increasing portion of society. This is the youth community and let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that about half Canada's population, or more, is well under the age of 30.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

This frustration is a real factor that we have to contend with in society. It appears not only in the youth community but in the slums and ghettos. It is becoming evident in the Métis groups and among the native population, and also among many of the small farmers in western Canada. I could mention various campuses and youth associations, but I will relate just one example which will demonstrate the point I am talking about. This is but one of the many examples where action was taken outside the political structure. Action was taken outside the political process to speed things up and make them more relevant, and it produced results.

The incident I am referring to took place at Simon Fraser University in British Columbia. The faculty and students of the university used to eat together in one huge cafeteria. Then one day some of the senior faculty members decided they wanted a separate eating place for themselves and so they constructed a wall across the cafeteria dividing it in two. The vast majority of the student body did not like this. They objected to the wall being built. They went through the normal political structure on the campus to have the wall removed, but their request got tied up in committee after committee until one night a number of faculty members and a group of students got together and tore the wall down, and the wall stayed down. This is an example of where the normal channels failed and people went outside them to solve the problem.

In many ways this parliament is similar to some of the senior faculty of the university I have just mentioned. This is an institution which is not relevant to many Canadian people. If we do not open our eyes soon many more walls may be torn down by young people, discontented farmers, minority groups and the poor. Parliament and the university are similar institutions in our contemporary society. They are both primarily middle and upper class orientated.

The difference between the two is that there is a growing awareness within the university community. It is becoming aware that education is a right, not a privilege. Members of that community are starting to talk about universal accessibility to education at all levels. They are starting to talk about abolition of student fees, about providing living allowances to students, about expanding university educational facilities and making a university education more relevant to today's society.

Meanwhile, on the other hand parliament, the government and the speech from the throne have all failed even to recognize the underprivileged and the powerless segments within our society such as the poor, the Indian and the marginal farmer, to mention just a few. If we do not open our eyes to this reality, Mr. Speaker, then many people within the near future will be left with no alternative but to start tearing down some walls of their own. These people are absolutely fed up with the verbal dribble, the fancy clichés and democratic rhetoric stemming from this chamber and that once again is found in the speech from the throne. It is becoming more and more apparent that the government cannot see the forest because of the trees.

I believe it was Rousseau who said, "Since inqualities exist within society it is the duty of legislatures to remove those inequalities." So far parliament is not playing an active role in supporting equality in Canada. If we do not affirm equality, dignity, and the right of people to act meaningfully in their own community, if we do not take some of the practical steps that have been suggested toward these ends, if young people do not get universal accessibility to education, if farmers do not get a two-price system for wheat, if the taxation system is not reformed, and if we do not do something about the ludicrous cost of housing and rocketing increases in rents then parliament will naturally become more irrelevant to people in Canada.

If the impersonality and power of corporate bureaucracy are not torn down to allow people to participate, then parliament will fade farther into the background of peoples' lives, and they will naturally seek alternative paths of social change. Idealistically, government should be an institution which people can collectively work through to solve the problems which they cannot solve as individuals. As the age of automation increases the sphere of meaningful individual action increasingly contracts.

The need for open participatory institutions in society is becoming more and more a necessity. The basic institution should be government, the people, in other words; but it will never be so long as we are committed to a philosophy of Liberalism which is a philosophy of limited government. The basic philosophy of Liberalism prevents it from attacking private centres of power in society that lie at the root of our country's problems. Instead of control of irresponsible private power the government is deferential toward it.

We can see this failure in every segment of our society. I have mentioned a number of aspects. We see it in the taxation system, in the failure to plan the economy and in the failure in any way to grapple with the foreign ownership problem of our economy. Young people and other people as well are starting to ask many very pertinent questions. They are asking where the real roots of power lie in our country. They are starting to ask why the Liberal party, the government, does not release an account of their contributors in the last election campaign. Why will they not do this? It is relatively simple; they will not because then the people would know who have vested interests in the government of Canada. This is one of the major binds on democracy that can be placed clearly on the doorstep of the people sitting across the aisle.

Later I shall be introducing a bill to lower the voting age in Canada from 21 to 18. This is just one important way to open up society for participation. We all know that in the election campaign the Prime Minister invited young people to participate. He said, "Come, and we will participate together in building a greater Canada for all". But then he denied them the basic right of participation, the right to vote. The more one watches the government the more one realizes it is an old man type of government with an old philosophy and reactionary ideas.

We must face up to many problems in our changing world. The government must not act as a deterrent to change. It should be in the forefront of change leading the way. We must eradicate things such as poverty and pollution. We must reform the tax system and we must alleviate the housing crisis. In fact we must set up new objectives and priorities for society. If the government does not soon face up to some of these facts, then the youth image of the Liberal party will become mouldy and musty with age.

I strongly believe that if we open our eyes we can make some of these things more relevant. I have a lot of faith in the democratic system of government. All we have to do is make it more pertinent, more modern and get the people participating.

I should like to conclude my first speech in this chamber by quoting a line often used by the late Senator Robert F. Kennedy just before his untimely assassination a few months ago. He said, "Some men see things as they are and say why; I dream things that never were and say why not."

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like at the beginning of my remarks to pay the customary respects to the Speaker, and to you also for your recent appointment as Deputy Chairman of the committees of the house. I am convinced that if you follow the example of the Speaker, you will discharge your duties perfectly.

I would like also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand). Both made interesting speeches and deserve our congratulations.

I also want, Mr. Speaker, to welcome to the house one of my university colleagues, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Gervais) who won his seat in the last election. We have always been a very good friends and, although we have had our political differences, our friendship has never been affected by them. I am therefore very happy to see him in this house.

Mr. Speaker, after a very eventful convention, the Liberal party elected a leader. Knowing the Liberal party as we do, we know that its members took advantage of the circumstances to place less accent on real leadership qualities but more on the candidate's gift for acting. In fact, during the election campaign, our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave good account of himself as such by giving kisses unstintingly and keeping a constant smile. While refusing to deal with the main economic problems facing our country, he nevertheless succeeded in getting great majority.

And as the Conservatives are always magnanimous people, may I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate him on the victory he won in the last election.

We were pleased, Mr. Speaker, to see the Liberal party at long last get an absolute majority in the House of Commons. How often has the official opposition not been accused of slowing down the business of the house, of systematic obstruction, of filibuster. Especially the last Liberal government accused us of so doing, to camouflage its lack of competence in introducing appropriate legislation in the House of Commons.

• (4:20 p.m.)

This government having been elected with a majority, we hope it will take over the leadership of the house and the honourable members across the floor may rest assured that we, of the Conservative party, are going to maintain our co-operation with the government in power in order to try and bring about for all Canadians legislation that will be beneficial to our nation.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister had intimated after the election that his government would introduce legislation and a speech from the Throne, both of an extraordinary nature. He went so far as to say that the Conservatives would be amazed. In general, Canadians were expecting that the new Prime Minister and his cabinet were to present some extraordinary legislation which would be spectacular, different, imaginative, that would create an impact on the imagination of all Canadians.

Some political friends of our colleagues opposite who had come to Ottawa with the resolution to applaud the Speech from the Throne went back home extremely disappointed because they found out, as we did, that the Speech from the Throne presented by the government contained nothing but left-overs from the previous Pearson administration, heated up again in a new frying pan by the present Prime Minister.

For this reason, we cannot evidently congratulate the government on its Speech from the Throne, because we feel that it suffers from a lack of vitality and dynamism which the country needs at present to resolve the problems that are facing it.

Evidently, we had thought that this government would be a "new look" government with a new vision. A youthful Prime Minister would obviously stand out the moment the session began, but we have noticed that expressions such as were used during the election campaign have been incorporated in the Speech from the Throne and they were not defined.

During the election campaign, smiling his famous smile, the Prime Minister talked of the just society. He never said exactly what he meant by it. He never adapted the concepts of a just society to the political, economic and social problems facing Canada at the present time.

There is nothing in the Speech from the Throne to illustrate the concept of the just society of which the Prime Minister and his team spoke during the election campaign. In our opinion, therefore, this is again a case of the Liberal party formulating grandiose principles, as it alone does so well, in order to gain votes during an election campaign.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, a government which calls itself modern in 1968 must legislate in order of priority. We have often said so in this house. Even though priorities were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister has not told us what priorities he has established. We must examine not only the long-term priorities but also short-term priorities, because indeed we must not be blind. We are up against an alarming unemployment problem, for statistics reveal that 400,000 people without work or looking for work at this time.

We also have a housing problem. In fact, we know that a third of the population in the larger urban centres is still living in slums and that the government has not found a practical solution to try to help those people.

We know also that the cost of living is still extremely high and that women with children have a terribly hard time to make ends meet.

In addition, agriculture is not in a very prosperous state, and when I hear my colleagues talk about the problems of agriculture in the west, I would like them to come to Quebec to see the alarming conditions which prevail in agriculture there.

Although 10,000 farmers from eastern Canada, Quebec and Ontario came last year to beg the Minister of Agriculture to give them better prices for their dairy products, that problem still remains. The other problems submitted by the U.C.F. to the previous government were left unsolved and the present government must have forgotten them since there is not a word about them in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Speaker, we also know that our economic growth is at a standstill. Our productivity needs to be boosted to make it more profitable and thus give a higher standard of living to all Canadians.

The economy of a country increases through the development of its natural resources, hence the necessity for a government that believes in priorities to advocate and introduce immediately in the house legislation for the establishment of short and long term programs so that our natural resources may be developed in a national way.

Another priority of the government is to introduce legislation and take decisions to increase the number of employment opportunities in our country. We all know that the government also intends to give priority to constitutional reform.

Mr. Speaker, that is the list of priorities which we would have liked to see in the Speech from the Throne.

I should like to come back for a moment to the question of unemployment. We were exceedingly surprised when the present government, which calls itself the champion of co-operative federalism, suddenly and without warning the provinces, cancelled its winter works program.

The right hon. Prime Minister answered me in the house that the provinces knew that the government would cancel the winter works program one day, but he did not have the tact to warn the provinces in order that some alternative formula might be found to help the unemployed who will find it extremely difficult to find work during the winter. Similarly, the government should have notified the provinces so that they might in turn advise the municipalities that had prepared projects which would have been carried out during the winter, as they used to do previously.

Obviously, this may not be the ideal formula but, Mr. Speaker, putting a sudden stop to this program deals our workers a heavy blow. Indeed, I am convinced that if the Liberal candidates had told our people during the election campaign that the winter works program would be cancelled, the Liberal party would not have won the same vote percentage in the June election.

All this to say, Mr. Speaker, that steps like these are only announced after the election. What are we going to do, Mr. Speaker, to replace the winter works program? The right honourable Prime Minister was asked if he planned any substitute and he told us there was a retraining program. We are in favour of retraining, but that does not give work, in the short run, to our people. Manpower retraining is a good thing, and with additional learning people are better prepared to face the life ahead. However, the present manpower program did not, in my estimation, produce all the expected results. I observed that in one municipality within my constituency, sixty-year old people were being retrained and made to attend sixth and seventh grades; it made me wonder whether this program truly pursues the intended objectives.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Isabelle: Better late than never.

Mr. Asselin: Did my respected friend from Hull say something?

Mr. Isabelle: Better late than never.

Mr. Asselin: But our people must obtain employment right away. My respected friend should try and convince the government, because next winter the unemployed in his constituency will ask him why the government has dropped so suddenly its winter works policy.

Some manpower retraining has indeed taken place. In your region, Mr. Speaker, some $250,000,000 are being spent, I believe, to retrain workers, revamp the social structures and renew the economic framework, so that these people might live. However, if one sticks to retraining alone and neglects the economic and industrial evolution, how on earth shall we be able to find jobs for all these retrained people? Retrain them by all means; well and good. But at the same time the government will have to consider creating new industries and new jobs so that those that have been retrained will be able to obtain some employment. Evidently, Mr. Speaker, the war against poverty is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Almost every speaker who took part in the debate mentioned it, but "war against poverty" is not a new term. Since 1963, we have heard that the government would introduce legislation to fight against poverty, but we are still waiting for it. The best way to fight poverty is indicated in the 5th report of the Economic Council of Canada. On page 131 appears a statement on the basic principles how to succeed in fighting efficiently against poverty and I quote:

> The maintenance of high employment and strong and stable economic growth is crucial. No policies are more effective in helping to move families and individuals out of poverty than the combination of demand and supply policies required to sustain new job creation and the increasingly efficient use of manpower and other productive resources. Without success on this front, other anti-poverty policies are unlikely to be of much avail.

This is what I said earlier, Mr. Speaker. It is absolutely necessary when considering the retraining of our people, to find ways of helping them to get jobs so that once retrained, they may become useful members of the community instead of being dependent on it. Now, when reference is made to "war against poverty", mention should also be made to war against social and regional inequalities, as mentioned by the Prime Minister during his campaign and in the Speech from the Throne. But they must not only be words or slogans. If extended studies on local problems are undertaken, as it has been done in your area, and if it takes ten years to obtain practical results, our people will have the time to die from hunger.

In my opinion, people who live with these problems understand them more fully. That is why, in dealing with questions of regional disparity, with underdeveloped areas such as yours, Mr. Speaker, mine and many others in eastern Quebec and elsewhere in Canada, a formula should be adopted which would make use of the economic development boards in each area and of the studies made by these boards, and the people should be asked what priorities the government should establish in order to help them to come out of their economic stagnation.

Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to legislate according to priorities, I think it will be necessary to amend the Canadian constitution. This is only a digression, for I do not intend to discuss the constitution fully today. Everyone knows that the whole Canadian people want amendments made to the constitution. However, it will be difficult to fight poverty properly if we do not first eliminate the overlapping of federal and provincial social security measures. At the present time, this involves a shameful waste of money, and we are witnessing the beginning of a fierce competition between the federal government and the provinces to see which of the two levels of government is best able to legislate in the field of social security. This has resulted in an overlapping and a duplication of federally and provincially supported social security assistance programs. In order to correct this situation, in my opinion, we must first review and amend the constitution so as to determine the precise extent of federal and provincial jurisdiction in the field of social security. As I said, money is being shamefully wasted at this time by the federal and provincial governments, because of overlapping jurisdictions when they want to compete in the field of social legislation.

So, a priority should be established and, in this connection, I think that the Prime Minister should follow the guidelines set forth in the report of the Economic Council of Canada. Indeed, page 139 of this report says, and I quote:

> In thus describing the kind of longer-term appraisal which we feel is required at this stage in order to develop more effective anti-poverty policies in Canada, it is important to keep clearly in mind the Canadian constitution and the fact that social policy is a field of concurrent jurisdiction in which all threee levels of government are active on a large scale.
> Nor have we referred to the important discussions and decisions regarding social policy which lie ahead of the federal and provincial governments between now and the expiration in 1970—
>
> Important changes in the relative roles of the different levels of government in the field of social policy appear to be in prospect.

And it adds:

> This is where a start should be made to amend the Canadian constitution in order to define the jurisdictions of the federal and provincial governments.

When the Prime Minister tells us that there are priorities in respect to the status of our languages, we agree, but the top priority should be the constitution. Constitutional changes would serve to remove concurrent jurisdictions between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to say a word about Canada's foreign policy.

Our Prime Minister has promised us that the foreign policy of his government would not show diffidence, since it would bear the stamp of independence and would, of course, be implemented in the shortest time possible.

• (4:40 p.m.)

This morning and during the course of this debate, several hon. members have referred to the human tragedy which is taking place in Nigeria. I shall not bring the matter up again but I am convinced—at least I hope so—that the references made in this house have shown the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) the importance of Canada using its influence and its prestige with the government of Nigeria in order to put an end to that genocide.

I am convinced that if the government disregards the susceptibilities of some nations, it has enough prestige, as I said earlier, to appeal to Nigeria in order to put an end to the slaughter and the starvation prevailing in that country.

I cannot congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister for his foreign policy with regard to France. Two years ago, the Liberal government—first the right hon. Mr. Pearson and then the former Minister of Justice, the present Prime Minister—launched a campaign against France. I must say that if that campaign continues, in view of the present course of statements, we are simply heading toward a break in diplomatic relations between France and Canada. Although the Prime Minister has declared in the house that he does not want any break, if he does not cease his present outright statements against the Quay d'Orsay, such as the one reported by today's Le Devoir, where he again accuses the French government of trying to demolish Canadian unity, he is heading for such an outcome. I thought that the Prime Minister as well as the Secretary of State for External Affairs had a well developed sense of diplomacy so that these quarrels and squabbles between the present government and the French government could be settled through diplomatic channels.

It is not my duty here to defend the French viewpoint, but I may nonetheless tell the right honourable Prime Minister of my country that one third of the French-Canadian people, whether they live in Quebec or outside that province, entertain cultural ties and are very closely related to France. If, unfortunately, this government should decide some day for some reason to break diplomatic relations with France, that would be the biggest breach ever perpetrated against this Canadian unity that everyone wants to achieve.

At the beginning of the session, the right honourable Prime Minister made a solemn declaration concerning the whereabouts in Canada of one Rossillon who apparently is an official of the French government. From what we hear from the French Canadians living in Manitoba, this gentleman was simply paying a visit there and was obviously inquiring about the French Canadians in Manitoba. In the meantime, the Prime Minister was telling a press conference about that visit. This action is not, in my opinion, bound to strenghten Canadian unity. I wonder if the Prime Minister has chosen this method in order to discourage the premier of Quebec from undertaking his trip to France or if he is simply aiming at a continuation of the escalation in unfriendly words. If the Prime Minister permits this kind of relations which have been going on for some time between France and Canada, I say that he is surely doing national unity a disservice on this account. I wish with all my heart that these discussions with France or other sovereign states were taking place through diplomacy on an international level.

Why air in public the errors a French citizen may have made on a visit to Canada? Why accuse this man of being a secret agent, an agitator in the pay of the French government? I am convinced that the right honourable Prime Minister overshot the mark when he applied those harsh words to a civil servant, a member of the administration of the French government. As a French Canadian living in Quebec, and on behalf of the French Canadians who live in the other provinces, I hope that the right honourable Prime Minister of our country will soon meet the President of France so that the two can sit together and discuss their grievances once and for all, and so Canadian unity might be preserved. If one wished to joke about it, one could ask the Prime Minister of Canada to accompany the premier of Quebec to Paris. The two could then perhaps, share together the warmth, the hospitality of the "Petit Trianon".

Mr. Speaker, for the sake of Canadian unity, I repeat, that once and for all an end must be put to the dissensions between those two sovereign states, those two countries we French Canadians love so well, France and Canada.

The right honourable Prime Minister told us that he was happy about the help France gives the French Canadians in developing their culture, their tongue, and safeguarding their traditions. I am convinced that if the President of France were to meet the right honourable Prime Minister, he would perhaps understand our situation on the national level, and the two might come to an agreement for the better interest of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to say before bringing my remarks to an end, that it is with great regret that we saw our friends across the way alter, during the election campaign, certain facts concerning the constitutional position of some members of our party. I mean, for instance, the legislation which the government is now introducing on the constitution, on the status of the official languages, on the recognition of the French fact in Canada, on which our party, as early as during its convention in Toronto, had made the first move, and the basic principles of which it had recognized.

During the election campaign, our friends opposite tried to mislead the Canadians into believing that the Conservative party wanted to divide the country in two, that the Conservative party favoured two countries. Mr. Speaker, we have never intended that, we have never meant to say that, nor have we ever said that either during or before the election campaign.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member at such a crucial moment of his speech, but the time allowed to him under the rules has now expired. Unless he is given the unanimous consent of the house, the hon. member will not be able to continue his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the house agree to grant permission to the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Yes, agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Agreed.

Mr. Asselin: I wish to thank my colleagues for giving me this opportunity to continue my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I shall try to be brief; besides, I think I shall be through in a few minutes.

As I was saying, the constitutional principles set out by the Liberal party and now brought forward in the Speech from the Throne had already been recognized by us during our convention in Toronto.

The right hon. Prime Minister speaks of the constitutional equality of languages. We too referred to it in a resolution, in Toronto. Now, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of the record and to make some Liberal members understand that we are not against national unity, that we are not going to tear apart Canada on constitutional matters, I repeat that we never said that. We never said, when we spoke of two nations, "The two founding people", that this meant two Canadas. We only meant one Canada made up of two large majorities plus other ethnic groups, which of course, would be minorities.

This is the reason why, when we presented our resolution in Toronto, we formulated great principles which, I think, are now being taken over by the Prime Minister of Canada.

We have said that Canada is and must remain a federal state and that Canada is made up of the two founding nations endowed with historical rights, to which many people coming from a number of countries have joined themselves. We said that the constitution should be drafted so as to allow and promote full and harmonious coexistence, as well as advancement and equality for all Canadians. We have repeated and we even included it in a document drafted and adopted at the Toronto convention that the constitution is a Canadian document which could not be changed anywhere else. Therefore, I fully endorse my leader when he says to the hon. Prime Minister that the very first constitutional step this government should take is to repatriate our constitution so as to allow us to amend it ourselves.

I think that is the first priority from the point of view of the constitution and in that respect I fully agree with the leader of my party. We said also that, in our opinion, it was necessary to create a constitutional tribunal with the power to settle the constitutional problems which could arise between the provinces or between a province and the federal government, or still the problems which the Supreme Court of Canada could refer to it. That is one of the matters that were brought up during the federal-provincial conference on the constitution held here last February. We advocated also in that resolution that the constitutional equality of the French and English languages should be recognized to guarantee French Canadians throughout the country the right to get an education in their own language wherever possible, the use of the French language in the legislatures and before the courts, just as the English-speaking residents of Quebec enjoy those rights now. The status of the official languages is precisely what the Prime Minister wants to obtain today. It would mean that, at the constitutional level, we disagree. But it is precisely the constitutional policy, that kind of amendment to the constitution that the present Prime Minister wants to introduce.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think that we should agree on the need to amend the constitution. All Canadians are in favour of that. We must amend it so that all the groups living in this country can, under that constitution, enjoy equal rights so that Canadians of French, English and other origins can live in peace. Canadians must be able to live harmoniously, respectful of the rights of others, so that all together we may pool our efforts to build that great country we all love, Canada.

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have this opportunity to speak in this house. Even though I am almost an old-timer since this is my fourth term here, I still have many things to say, because the past efforts did not yield great results.

I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you on your re-election as Speaker. I offer my congratulations also to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand).

I will merely speak of concrete things in this speech, Mr. Speaker. Everyone speaks of a just society and of guaranteed incomes, but nobody ever defined these terms.

Mr. Speaker, I will now attempt to define these main terms. I would like to say to the people and to members of this house what are exactly the problems of our economy, where reforms should be made and where distributive economy should be applied, that is to whom should the benefits—or the products, if you prefer—of our economy go.

First of all, the human being should be protected if every citizen is to have full benefit of a living, active and progressive economy. All these conditions must be fulfilled if priority is to be given to the individual, who has been neglected in the past. Priority is given to finance, to capital, but the human capital is forgotten. Everything is done, nothing is neglected for the money capital, but the most noble, the most important one, the human capital, is neglected. This is what I intend to deal with and demonstrate in my statement.

All Canadians want a united Canada, but they also want a just society. Like everyone, we have been advocating a just society and a united Canada for a long time. That is nothing new.

The people heard vague words and believed that they were hearing something new. That is one of the reasons why they once again elected the great Liberal party. By the way, I should like to say right away, Mr. Speaker, that we intend to co-operate fully with the party in power and with all who present legislation intended to serve, protect and help the people and allow them to live decently. We will support all good legislation.

However, we will stand against all measures which do not protect the individual or which protect only capital. Naturally, we will oppose all tax increases, because they affect the individual unfavourably and because we are overtaxed already. We will support all good measures which are beneficial to the individual and which give him priority.

It is apparently agreed that we all want to build a united Canada in a just society which undertakes to eliminate provincial and regional inequalities. It is a worthy effort, a good attempt, a noble ambition, but a shared hope. There are inequalities not only in constitutions, but between the provinces, the different public organizations and the various regions.

First, there are inequalities affecting the family. Every individual must be allowed to live decently in his country. Canada is not only made up of more or less prosperous provinces and regions. A united Canada is made up also, and above all, of families enjoying more or less prosperity and of human beings who are more or less prosperous.

There are persons, families, regions, provinces, institutions, municipalities that are more or less prosperous in a united Canada, within a just society. That is a noble pursuit that does not omit any aspect of the just society, of a united Canada. Canada is made up mainly of these 20,700,000 human beings who are Canadian citizens, made of flesh and bones, each with their own mind who are members of some five million dwellings or families in Canada.

Therefore, it is first on a personal and family basis as well as on a basis of the essential needs of persons and families that an immediate foundation of a just society must be realized and which will result in a united Canada this very year.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

Assuredly, the large administrations on the national, provincial, regional, municipal, social and even on the international and world levels are important and deserve our continued attention.

Undoubtedly, all the great institutions were set up with the commendable idea of promoting progress, productivity and growth of economic activity in the interest of the whole community.

Nonetheless, Mr. Speaker, it should be realized, at last, that this is expected by the whole population, that is, our 20,700,000 Canadian citizens living in flesh, bone and spirit, and not only the 7,700,000 adult and productive citizens who are reasonably rewarded for their work or their capital.

Nevertheless, one should understand, in the end, that the whole population includes 13 million dependants, without work nor capital, without personal income, but entitled unquestionably to live among all of us, in a united Canada, according to the 1968 standard of living.

But for all that, it should be realized in the end, once and for all, that the right to live which every citizen without revenue is entitled to must be appraised and determined by a certain amount of money, the same way as a salary is set for any work, or the same way as interests are recognized by contract on any capital loaned or invested under conditions clearly determined between free parties.

So, if the 7,700,000 Canadian citizens contributing to national production receive a fair share proportional to their work or their capital, if, also those 13 million Canadian citizens without work or capital receive each month, in every home, a guaranteed minimum revenue, which constitutes their personal vital right, thus, and thus only, shall we have achieved a just society, a united Canada where every citizen will be happy and proud to live, respected and glorified, in the full view of the whole world filled with amazement.

Even though the right hon. Prime Minister did not make any promises during the last election, he said again and again that the objectives of his administration would be a just society and a united Canada. Those are happy words which were appreciated and which led the Liberal party to the victory. It is up to us now, Mr. Speaker, to convert those words into action, into deeds, into achievements.

Each citizen may have his own idea about a just society and a united Canada, but I think everybody would accept a conception whereby each Canadian citizen could share in the prosperity of Canada.

I feel the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the just society and a united Canada envisaged should provide for what I have just pointed out.

It is not, Mr. Speaker, by begging, grumbling or advocating separatism. No one seeks to break away from a group where it gets a fair treatment. In this prosperous Canada, production reached $68 billion in 1968, that is about $3,300 per head or $16,500 per family of five, which is marvelous and satisfactory for the majority of Canadians. There is no reason for allowing such a magnificent production to be so badly distributed among the population of this country. Why, Mr. Speaker, is there so much suffering, so much poverty and insecurity amidst such abundance, so many riches, such a tremendous production? Let us at least work in such a way that the most unfortunate may reach a viable and convenient human condition. It is not poverty, Mr. Speaker, that must be driven away, not poverty against which we must wage war, as many members seem to believe, but injustice. It is fraud, frustration of the rights to live of each Canadian citizen. This must be eradicated.

Poverty in itself does not exist. But injustice exists. Inequities must be replaced by a little more justice. This is the point I want to make, Mr. Speaker. Chapter 44 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1960, well specifies that each Canadian citizen is entitled to life, liberty, security of his person and enjoyment of property whatever may be his race, his national origin, his colour, his religion or his sex.

We are only considering here the right to live of each Canadian citizen who is penniless and unemployed. We are considering the recommandations of the World Charter of Human Rights and of the Canadian Charter of Human Rights passed in 1960. We are only demanding that this right to live be recognized to each Canadian who is penniless or unemployed by allowing him to earn his living as we recognize his right to receive wages and the right to collect a rate of interest on invested capital. Therefore, if in Canada at the present time, our production worth $68 billion represents the work and the capital of 7,700,000 Canadian citizens who take part in the national production and who are paid according to the proportions of their participation, it must be recognized that the 13 million Canadian citizens, men, women, children, sick, unemployed, or old people who do not receive any income for their work or capital have an undeniable right to part of that production.

This is the reason I am fighting, through the sole use of my intellectual powers, to induce the 29 ministers of the Canadian government and the 263 representatives of the Canadian people to admit that they are legally bound by this right to life of everyone, especially that of the 13 millions dependant Canadian citizens, who have no work and no capital.

The right to live is the first of all the rights of every individual, from his birth to his last breath. This is what is or will be a just society. It is that vital personal right for 13 million Canadian citizens which I demand in a united Canada, a just society.

Mr. Speaker, we could take 4 per cent out of those 68 billion of production to pay for that essential program of guaranteed rights to every citizen.

Therefore Mr. Speaker, since I have the honour to rise again in this house, I should like to show positive work, open to the best promises, taking into account the positive elements which make up not only this parliament but also and especially the whole people of this wonderful country Canada.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that under God, in this giant country, every Canadain should grow amidst prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, if the voters in the riding of Compton gave me once again a good majority over the candidates of the other parties, they have told me often that it is because I have talked many times in this house about a better distribution of income among all the citizens of Canada, about increasing family allowances and the other allowances, which would at least abolish misery if not poverty.

Therefore, I thank my constituents for understanding me and voting for me. I would now like the 263 members of parliament to understand clearly also the need, the urgency and even the opportunity we are given to achieve immediately a better distribution of income, expenditures and profits among all the citizens of Canada, between management, labour and dependants or between people, families and companies.

That is the crux of of the problem, if it could finally be understood.

It is not a matter of political party, nor of a philosophic system. It is a matter of fraternity, humanity, balanced economy and progressive policy, through unity, justice and goodwill. It is not a matter of race, nationality, religion, language, social classes. It is a matter of dollars, it is the right to live, to have the bare necessities. It is the right of a guaranteed minimum income for all Canadian citizens, 20,700,000 of them, of which 7,700,000 have incomes gained through their capital or their work, and 13 million are dependent on a productive citizen or society in general.

Let us open our eyes to this metaphysical and mathematical reality, capital and work are the two pillars of production, but production is geared to consumption. Now, there are in Canada, in 1968, 7,700,000 productive citizens and 13 million dependants.

There are in this country 7,700,000 citizens, drawing income from their work and capital, and 13 million citizens without any income derived from work or capital, but who all have the right to live in Canada according to the 1968 standard of living in this country. This right to live is a right that must be assessed and paid, as well as the right to give a salary for one's work or the right to draw interest from capital.

In our economic system, we are doing the opposite of what is required. Instead of paying a minimum guaranteed income to the 13 million dependent citizens, we are increasing wages and capital interests, thereby raising still more the cost of living for all citizens, even for the 13 million dependent citizens without work or capital and hence without any income.

In the case of the citizens who are producing through their work and capital, incomes increase while in the case of the dependent citizens, the expenditures are going up. The 7,700,000 producing citizens are taking advantage of an unbalanced economy while the dependent citizens and their dependants have to put up with this same unbalanced economy.

Here, I am convinced of bringing a logical and practical solution that can be applied immediately in the present and regular mechanisms of our Canadian monetary, economical and political systems of free enterprise, whether they are orthodox or capitalist. Why is no attention ever given to this problem? Why must I always speak in this desert? Perhaps I may hope that this desert will at last become a blossoming garden, not only for labour and management, but for all those without work or money and for all the needy who want a just society and a united country.

However, this unity can only be based on individuals and not on groups, companies, regions, provinces, towns or villages.

Canada is 20,700,000 people, and that is the basis on which we must establish a guaranteed minimum income, either through work, or capital, or the vital right of people without work or capital.

Why can the members of this house and this parliament not accept this suggestion immediately? That is why I say to them: Dear colleagues, in every one of your ridings, you saw them during the election campaigns, you saw citizens who have money, citizens who have work, and other citizens who have neither work nor money, who are dependent and without income, because they are too young, too sick, too old, too unfortunate, in short, for all kinds of reasons; you have even seen mothers who stay home and have neither income nor salary for the work they do as mothers and housekeepers.

Have you thought of that? In every home in Canada, to each citizen without work or money, we could distribute a guaranteed income of $1 per day per child, of $2 per day per teenager, of $3 per adult and of $4 per older citizen of 60 and more; have you ever considered how this could solve all personal and family problems in the field of daily finance?

That would be the end of hardship, poverty and insecurity. There would still be good and human poverty, sickness, accidents, occasional misfortunes, curable bad administration, but we would be through with hardship, poverty, insecurity in the normal and wholesome families of our hard-working, honest population which is willing to do the utmost in community life.

And do you know what all that would cost? It would cost 14 per cent of the value of the national production. Do you know that a single program could replace every one of the 200 costly plans administered under social welfare, that are a disgrace because of the famous inquiries which ruin the dignity and the respect of the human being and the private life of individuals and families?

Moreover, do you know that by so doing, society, Canada, and we here in this house, would together have done nothing more than something just towards human beings? Because the right to life, to the vital minimum, the individual minimum is not an optional charity, but a real right, a binding right according to justice, based on nature, on natural resources, on the divine fatherhood and on the rights of universal humanity.

During the Speech from the Throne, I was pleased to hear our gracious governor general utter the last phrases:

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

Could he not have added on the same tone: "and submit you to the sweet rigours of his divine chastisement".

For, in truth, we deserve chastisement. We can no longer let everyone lack the necessities of life in the face of the categorical statements of the most serious representatives of our political economy, the experts of our Economic Council of Canada. It is not up to me to start rewriting that instructive and well-documented volume. But it is my duty to draw attention to a practical solution which would abolish at least misery, poverty, insecurity in all homes in which live the 20,700,000 citizens of Canada, counted one by one, each of whom would always be assured of the necessary minimum income through his work, his capital or his own right.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, we have produced in Canada, in 1968, $68 billion in goods and services, of which $40 billion were used for the consumption needs of the population. Out of that production a surplus of $28 billion in profits was reinvested by a small number of citizens who already have more than they need.

Of those $28 billion in reinvested profits approximately 15 per cent or $4 billion come from individuals and 85 per cent or $24 billion from corporations.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, a table which would complement my speech, but which is too long to be quoted at full length. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would table it for printing in Hansard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. Does the house agree to the member tabling the table mentioned in the official report?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

We should know the source of this table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I must tell the house that the document handed to me bears no indication of its source.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is it an official table of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, or merely a table prepared by the member?

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, it is an official table taken from the Canada Year Book. It contains government statistics.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We will take the hon. member's word.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. In view of the fact that it is a rather short compilation, does the house authorize the hon. member for Crompton to include this document as part of his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The table referred to reads as follows:]

2. TREND OF THE VARIOUS ECONOMIC SECTORS, 1944-1967

	1944	1967	x by
1. National production: Revenues	11,400,000,000	62,000,000,000	x 5½

3. Family allowances: Child: 6 years old	6 a month	6 a month	x 1
4. Mother at home	0 a month	0 a month	x 0

Mr. Latulippe: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you also to all the hon. members.

Mr. Speaker, I come now to my closing remarks. All that can and must be implemented by this government, by our 263 ministers and members, within the regular framework of our constitution, in our present confederation. This is my challenge, this is what I can show you without limitation. I have taken precautions in that respect. That is all I can tell you, a demonstration can be made by all possible means, by letters, by figures and by sketches, by science and by conscience, by knowledge and by simple common sense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I am exceedingly sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member in the expression of such noble feelings, but the time allotted to him has expired. Unless he obtains the unanimous consent of the house, I must recognize another member.

Does the house unanimously agree to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Latulippe: I thank the hon. members for allowing me to continue. I shall try to be as brief as possible.

Our federal government, our governor in council, to use the expression used by the 23 ministers have the legislative power to raise family allowances immediately to one dollar a day at least instead of the present 20 cents per day, which does not even pay for a quart of milk now. One is surprised at such a statement. All of it is written in the law, Chap. 109 of the Revised Statutes of Canada on family allowances. A similar gesture was made along this line in 1957 by the Conservative government at that time, just before a federal election, for which he was rewarded with the biggest majority since confederation. Does the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) remember it? Has he regretted such an initiative? Why has he not repeated it more often? He is ashamed to tell us. Let us go back to page 2806 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, on family allowances act Section, 11, where it is clearly stated:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations to give effect and to carry out the objects of this Act,

Consequently, at the present time and according to the present legislation of family allowances, the governor in council, that is the 29 ministers of the present legislature elected by the people of Canada and according to the laws voted by the 264 members of Canada are the only ones empowered to increase family allowances by $1 a day, $360 a year for each child less than 16 years of age. They could also increase them by $1 a day for children from the date of birth up to and including 13 years and by $2 a day for children aged 14 to 21 as long as they are attending school in order to realize and put into effect the purposes of the present legislation which essentially consists in treating equally all the Canadian children. This is a matter of interpretation according to the talents and the sense of justice of the members of parliament, the ministers of parliament and the government of Canada. It is because of such points of the law that our ministers can increase the interest on bonds without the authorization of the members in parliament assembled. When it is a matter of the almighty gold, there is less shyness and it is less demanding. May I quote an example to you? Only yesterday, September 17, 1968, all the daily newspapers of Canada were announcing that the government of Canada was issuing new bonds in the amount of $500 million, that is half a billion dollars bearing interest at 6, 6¼ and 6½ per cent. The fine print of the advertisement points out that the funds so obtained will be used to redeem government bonds amounting to $260 million at 5 per cent maturing on October 1, 1968.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, our government of Canada being unable to meet its obligations. They have matured. The government must honour them but it is unable to do so. To those millionaires that were drawing 5 per cent interest for each million, there is an offer by the government that in the future they will be paid 6½ per cent or $65,000 yearly for a million instead of $50,000. This represents $15,000 more for "doing nothing" and for a period of 27 years, if you please, not to be reimbursed in advance as a precautionary measure. You will understand that this concerns the sanctity of contracts. However, to pay interest at a rate of $65,000 per million, instead of $50,000, did we think that low-income Canadians will have to pay higher taxes, that taxes will have to be raised, that the cost of living would go up? This will be terrible for children without the $6 family allowance, taxes will have to be raised, and the cost of living will be increased, affecting all citizens of Canada with no capital or earned income, who are dependent upon productive citizens or society in general.

Mr. Speaker, during the last election, at the time the campaign was in full swing, on June 15, 1968, the same gift of $500 million, or half a billion dollars, was presented, except this time, the maximum interest rate was set at 7¼ per cent, or $72,500 per million. Now, this was again used to replace about $283 million worth of bonds at 2¾ per cent.

• (5:30 p.m.)

This indicates, Mr. Speaker, how capital is well treated, how the golden calf is well treated, how capital is well taken care of. Why are human resources not as well treated, when it comes down to family allowances? They have not been raised once from 1945 to 1968. A real shame, Mr. Speaker. One does not want to do anything for human beings, but one can do everything for capital.

This, Mr. Speaker, will surely come to an end. However, I shall not be long, as I see an honourable member who tells me to stop, perhaps because he does not find this interesting. However, I think he himself is not much more interesting.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On the other hand, it was reasonable.

Mr. Latulippe: Let us consider, beside that, millionaires who receive yearly $27,500 in interest from the government and are offered $72,500, or a yearly surplus of $45,000 per million for doing nothing. That is not funny. Yet, it seems nobody thinks about that. However, it is still through taxes imposed in large measure on the humble people, on the low wage earner and on the penniless that is increased the income of those who have a lot.

I would have much to say, Mr. Speaker, but I shall in the future get other opportunities. I shall then tell the house, as well as the ministers and the Prime Minister, that we are poorly administered, that we make every possible effort to assist capital, that it is a shame to give everything to capital and to offer nothing to the family, which represents also a capital. Everything is done to help money capital but nothing to help family capital.

Here, I am fighting for the family capital, the family as a capital, is entitled to live. It is our national resource, by it can exist both our society and our nation. It is entitled to speak and entitled to live.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, in the first place allow me to tell you that I am quite proud and honoured of having the privilege to take part in the proceedings of the house.

Having witnessed last week the tokens of admiration and esteem which you have received from all those who not only have many years of experience, but also hold key posts within their party or the government, I take the liberty of telling you, on behalf of all the new members, and I am sure they will not begrudge me, that you can be rightly proud of all those praises. I wish to add right away my congratulations to those which you have already received.

I also want to join all those who congratulated the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand). Both stirred our enthusiasm by their brilliant first steps on the parliamentary scene, the first by moving the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne and the other by seconding it. But it is also important to emphasize that they have opened the way for a great majority of us who are new here.

[English]

I am very conscious and proud of being a member of this august chamber, and particularly proud to be one of the unusual number of new members in this new parliament. All of us I am sure approached this career with high expectations as to the possibilities of participating in this very vital and important work, and with a full knowledge of the sacrifices this life might entail. But whatever those sacrifices, I am sure all hon. members, particularly the new ones, are most eager to participate in the affairs of our country to the fullest possible extent. So, with these expectations and with the willingness to make the necessary sacrifices, we come to this chamber to see for the first time the manner in which this very important business is conducted.

What a tragic disappointment it was when we witnessed the performance of those who led the attack from the opposition side of the house in this throne speech debate. How disappointing it was to hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who appeared to be preoccupied with a small number of appointments made by the government to positions in the government service. I suppose that was an invitation to us to review the record of that great province of Nova Scotia, of which for so long he was such a capable administrator. Undoubtedly there was the implication that we would not find such a thing had ever occurred during his term of office.

In my view this is not just something to gloss over, something to be hidden under the rug, as though like a small child this government had been caught with its hands in a cookie jar. It seems much more important to me that we should face with reality the situation which I, as a member of this house and a novice in political life, intend to do.

It would seem that in filling positions in the government service this or any other government should have the opportunity, when choosing between persons of equal capability, to give some consideration to those who have come forward and made some sacrifices in public life. If there is any dishonour in this, then I think all of us have a very disillusioned view of what this life entails, and the very worth-while work involved here.

I was also disappointed to hear the Leader of the Opposition clinging so closely to a program that was introduced only a few years ago, concurrently I suppose with the term of office of a Conservative government. I refer to the winter works program. Most persons to whom I spoke before coming here applauded the decision of the government, a decision which on the face of it was bound to be unpopular with many municipalities. Nevertheless many of the leaders in the municipalities whom I heard being interviewed, and whose comments were reported in the press, said that although this decision upset some of their planned programs, the winter works program had failed and was not doing the job it was designed to do. In the interests of governmental policy to cut-back in spending, this was a courageous and forthright decision for the government to have taken at this time.

It is encouraging to know that this government is prepared to do this kind of thing. What particularly troubled me was the constant reference, not only in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition but in others to which I will refer in a moment, to the absence of government activity in the field of housing and the absence of a reference in the speech from the throne to this very important and vital program. They would appear to be suggesting that they have no knowledge of the very active and vital work of the task force which is going on at the present time, and which is dedicated to that very program. It would seem that they are not aware that in this very city at this moment the task force is at work over in the west block. It would appear also that they are ignoring the calibre of the people who are serving voluntarily on that task force. It would serve no purpose to mention them by name now, except to say that if anyone on the opposition bench had taken the trouble to examine the names of the people serving there, the work that the government is doing would be obvious. That task force is hard at work and began its work as soon as possible after this government came into office. It has received many briefs from all parts of the country, and has a full schedule laid out for the three forthcoming months. Its program is an ambitious one, indeed.

I should like now to refer to the speech of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) who followed the Leader of the Opposition. If this performance was not as great a disappointment to a new member, it would be from the standpoint of theatrics. The remarks of that hon. gentleman were delivered in perhaps a little more flowery language, with more pathos and tragedy, and more prosaic beauty, but they did not contain any more substance, or an appreciation of the basic nature and value contained in the speech from the throne. It is no wonder that in his remarks the hon. member for York South confronted the Prime Minister with a Shakespearean idiom. It was a theatrical performance at best, full of sound and fury. To carry the quotation further, it was full of sound and fury but signified nothing. That was the most disastrous thing about it all, except for his reference to the situations in Biafra and Nigeria. He spoke as if this government did not concern itself about these problems and was not aware of the grief, tragedy and starvation of these millions of people. From his observations one would be led to believe that this government was not aware of the genocide being permitted day by day, by red tape if nothing else, in many places of the world,—something we are powerless to do anything about.

What was particularly disappointing is that we waited throughout this diatribe to hear what it is that this government should be doing, what program, action or positive step the government should take, as suggested by the hon. member. In order to demonstrate the terrible default of this government we were finally greeted with precisely the proposal that the federal government of Nigeria has refused to agree to a second air strip. He then said that surely the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) ought to know that Sweden has agreed to lend a plane to the International Red Cross, and if that was the case why did not Canada do the same. After all this diatribe, this was the positive proposal put forward by the hon. member, in his effort to demonstrate the inadequacy of the government in this regard. This situation was covered, however, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who said that everything was being done by the Red Cross that could possibly be done and that when more could be done by Canada we would be prepared to assist. Obviously by his remarks the hon. member for York South has wasted the time of the house. He spent several minutes on a foreign affairs peroration having no substance whatsoever.

The only leader on the opposition side of the floor who did not fail to disappoint us was the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). With his good humour and his wild, fiery style he is never disappointing. Unfortunately, as I listened closely to his remarks, it seemed to me that, flowery as they were, and delivered with such good humour, they were irrelevant to the speech from the throne.

I am sure that I can find agreement among all new members on both sides of the house when I say that the common tragedy of this debate has been the failure of hon. members to recognize the fundamental character of the speech from the throne, having due regard for the majority position in which this government finds itself. For longer than we care to remember this country has experienced and has suffered from the dilemma of minority governments. One member of the N.D.P., against whom I campaigned, continually suggested that he preferred a minority government, that he espoused a government with a minority. I suppose the logical conclusion is that it is only in this situation that this party could acquire this artificial power it has never been given by the electorate.

Notwithstanding the espousal by the hon. member for the N.D.P., we all realize that this neglected country gave a clear mandate to the government. On June 25 of this year the electorate of Canada helped the Prime Minister to gain the success he deserved. They elected a sufficient number of members to allow him to sit in this house with a majority, and to carry on a program of work not only day by day or week by week, and surely not at the will or pleasure of the opposition, but for a period of some four or five years.

How fitting it is that the speech from the throne should outline the philosophy of the government and the programs it intends to carry forward. In this way it demonstrates the fundamental character of the programs that have been planned. It will allow time to plan the use of human resources, time to develop programs through research, time for study and active investigation by the capable committees of this house, and at the same time it introduces as a matter of urgent priority proposals for parliamentary reform. How appropriate it is that this reform and these far-reaching programs should be concomitant. This will allow parliament to receive and fully consider these programs in the months and years ahead. These are not day to day programs, and in none of the speeches I have heard or read by hon. members have I seen any recognition of this basic fact, or any understanding of these constitutional reforms. The subjects to be dealt with include matters of unity both in a personal and urbane sense, matters of justice and the Criminal Code, problems of industrial relations and disputes, and the system of continuous reporting on prices and costs.

There has been some reference to population expansion and the difficulties caused by urbanization. There has been reference to foreign affairs, including Viet Nam, Biafra and Czechoslovakia. All of these situations and conditions are a challenge to democracy. The programs that have been referred to will expedite our way of doing things and make it possible for us to keep pace with the times.

The challenge put forward in the speech from the throne relates precisely to the shaping up and sharpening up of procedures, so that we can be on time and in pace with the vast volume of legislation and work of this house that is now required to meet the growing needs of our great country. It is for this reason that I suggest those from the opposition who have spoken have failed to understand and appreciate the basic character of the speech from the throne.

Let me hasten to add my support to those who have spoken in support of the address in reply moved by that hon. gentleman on this side of the house, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), and seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand).

In addition to these general remarks about the speech from the throne I understand it is a traditional privilege given to new members of this house to say something about the beauties of their particular ridings, for the benefit of those hon. members who have not had the opportunity to visit them personally.

The riding of Sudbury is made up mainly of the city of Sudbury and the town of Copper Cliff. We have many beautiful lakes and wooded areas. We have a beautiful new university and a beautiful park which surrounds the one lake in the city. When describing the beauty of that city I must admit sadly that a great deal of the beauty is to be found in the people themselves, rather than in its physical characteristics. The reason I say that is that we have stood by and witnessed an ineffective program by the provincial government regarding the problem of air and water pollution, much of which is the result of the mining and smelting operations in the Sudbury riding.

One looks at the agricultural potential and the beauty of the area surrounding the city of Sudbury, and then, in a sense of pity, observes the devastation which has occurred to the natural beauty of that area as a result of smoke and gas emitted from the stacks of the smelters. What has been permitted over the years has allowed the mining operations to pollute the air and the waters, so that the grazing lands have been literally destroyed beyond all possible imagination. This has destroyed the beauty of the area and has done away with any possibility of agricultural endeavour. The area is no longer very beautiful, and this is no longer a very scenic city.

Either by constitution or by tradition, this area has been left to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial government, and its programs have been ineffective. The only guide lines or criteria of those programs have been directed toward the removal of the noxious sulphur content of the gases emitted by the smelter. But these efforts have been linked to guide lines which suggest that, as long as a smelter is economic, and as long as it has been able to provide for the removal of gas, it has been allowed to operate. As long as these companies have been able to make money, or in some cases even break even, the company has overlooked the pollution that occurs, and the noxious gases have been removed only to the minimum required for a profitable operation.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, there must be an area here for this government. Surely it is now time that the federal government moved into this field. We enjoy rights in this area, certainly, under health and welfare, certainly under agriculture, mines, energy and resources. We have clear precedent for authority in this area to get in and work, if not exclusively in this field then in co-operation with the provinces. I know that some legislation is intended, but I urge this government to look very closely at the problems of air and water pollution that exist in the riding of Sudbury which I represent.

It is easy for me to stand here and in my description of these problems condemn the companies that mine the ore and smelt it there, to condemn the companies associated with them in removing these noxious gases, or attempting to remove them partially only, to the extent that they are able to sell on the market the products gained thereby. But it is not quite as simple as that, for this is not the only area of our country that we leave to the industries, to be guided by economic necessities or economic advantage. A company is entitled to carry on its business for a profit. That is basic to the free enterprise system. Nor is it our function, or my proposal, that the government should be controlling the operations of companies to change that motivation or to in any way diminish the existence or the strengthening of the free enterprise system. But where the legitimate interests of two parties or two groups meet or are in conflict, where it is in the legitimate interest of the company to work its mines for a profit, at the same time it is surely in the legitimate interest of the citizens to be protected from these noxious gases wherever posible. Surely, Mr. Speaker, in order to fill that area in between there is a role for government.

If the provincial government were occupying that role and carrying it out to the fullest of its ability, that might be well and good. In fact, the tragic experience in my riding —which is what I am particularly concerned about—is that this has not taken place. I understand, from speaking with other members who are faced with the same problem, not only in the mining industry but in other industries as well, that they have had similar experiences in other provinces throughout the country. This all the more emphasizes the fact that the time is now for the federal government to move into this field with force, energy and vigour, to do the kind of things that the provincial governments have failed to do.

So in closing, Mr. Speaker, I would plead with this government to look into the problems of this vast pollution and contamination of the air we breathe and the water we enjoy, for the pleasures and for the necessities of life, because even as we stand here, at this very moment the expansion program taking place in the mines of International Nickel Company and Falconbridge Nickel Mines means that the operation is being carried on in such a way as to further prejudice the clear water and clean air that Sudburians are entitled to enjoy. So, Mr. Speaker, this contamination is taking place and is continuing. This government, I plead, should give urgent priority to this problem and see to it that where the provinces have failed, the federal government can succeed.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it is approximating six o'clock, could we agree to call it six o'clock, although I am prepared to speak at this time?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, or approximately six o'clock, I leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me extend my congratulations to you and to your deputy on the appointment to the positions of Speaker and Deputy Speaker respectively. I feel that the events to date have more than justified the wisdom of the selection of the presiding members of this house. I should also like to express a word of congratulation to the hon. members who have taken part in the debate to date, and to say without fear of contradiction or qualification that the calibre of the debate in this house is worthy of the trust which has been placed in the representatives of the various constituencies throughout Canada.

I should also like to express my appreciation of and to offer congratulations to a former member of this house and a member of the cabinet of the previous administration, who was my opponent during the recent election and also my predecessor, for the great contribution he has made to the house and upon his recent appointment, of which most hon. members are aware. I am referring of course to Hon. Charles R. Granger.

I need not reiterate the many observations made by my colleagues and other hon. members with reference to the speech from the throne. I need not go into detail in pointing out the ways in which the present administration in its blueprint for the immediate future has neglected to come to grips in any way, shape or form with the problems facing the Canadian nation at this particular period in our history. I need not point out the ways in which the government's planned program of action has disappointed the people of the Atlantic region, the people of Newfoundland, and my constituents in Gander-Twillingate, in failing to realize the urgency of the multitude of problems, general and specific, and the areas of inactivity to which the government must address its program.

No, Mr. Speaker, one does not have to repeat in this house, to the Canadian nation or anywhere else, any of the charges that have been made to date, for it is quite obvious, even to the least astute reader, that we have been presented with another document which contains a tremendous amount of philosophizing and, as my opponent said this afternoon, sound and fury signifying nothing.

I will not mention the fact that the speech from the throne made but one reference to the whole problem of the fisheries, especially as it pertains to the Atlantic area, and to the constituents whom I have the honour to represent.

I will not mention that the only reference to that subject was in relation to an amendment to the legislation governing the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, an amendment which certainly is a far cry from the fond hope for a fisheries policy which would help alleviate the burdens of a group of people, which I can say without qualification is the hardest working group of people in Canada, namely the Atlantic fishermen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: The only indication we have had of any planned action by the federal government in relation to our fisheries problem is the abolition of the salt subsidy. The higher cost of production of fish resulting therefrom, the reduction in the price of a quintal of fish, which ranges from $6 to $10, coupled with a general increase in the cost of living, makes the problem facing the fishermen in my part of the country one which has already reached emergency proportions. I say to this government that if action is not immediately taken—and I mean immediately, not next year or five years from now—in order to ease the burdens faced by thousands of my people, then many Canadian citizens on the east coast of Canada will have second thoughts about the virtues of being Canadian citizens.

I will not mention the fact that the whole business of regional disparity received but a passing reference among a dozen other things. May I be permitted to quote the following passage which reflects the government's position on regional development:

> My ministers will bring before you legislation relating to the encouragement of manpower programs, regional improvements, domestic investment, export development and resources administration, including a Yukon mineral act and an oil and gas production act relating to Canada's increasingly important northern resources.

This general reference to regional disparity appeared to be an afterthought which appeared somewhere toward the end of the throne speech. Is this the kind of priority which we were led to believe would become foremost in the proposed government programs to be brought before the house by this Liberal administration? This is not the kind of priority that we in the Atlantic area had expected.

I will not nauseate hon. members present by making reference to the just society. I think this concept, which was coined by Thomas More in his famous book "Utopia", has paid the necessary political dividends and is about to be considered another of the dead issues characteristic of past administrations.

No, Mr. Speaker, I refuse to address any detailed remarks to the points briefly mentioned above, for I feel I would be belabouring the obvious to the point of boring my colleagues. However, I will serve notice that now, and for the remaining years of my service to my constituency, I propose, as frequently as you will permit, sir, to draw the attention of this house to the multitude of problems facing my constituency, my province and the Atlantic region of which I am so proud.

I think perhaps that hon. members will agree, and bear with me with their usual attention and respect, if I take this opportunity to familiarize them with the constituency of Gander-Twillingate. I feel that it will be the responsibility of all my colleagues and of my worthy friend, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), to avail themselves of every opportunity to advance the position and make known the problems facing our island home, because I feel that, with few exceptions, the house has not had an opportunity to hear a realistic and frank appraisal of the problems which have forced Newfoundlanders to live in conditions which could only reflect the livelihood of people who are not bona fide members of this great Canadian nation.

The most northern extremity of my district falls in the provincial district of Green Bay, and all my colleagues and my many friends in this house who have visited that part of Newfoundland will agree that the blessings of confederation are virtues which these people only read about in the newspapers and in the recorded history of recent times.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

I have the privilege of representing the many island communities of Notre Dame Bay, specifically the island communities of Twillingate, New World island, Fogo island and Change islands. I think, sir, if any hon. member, regardless of his potential, determination and drive, were to dedicate his whole effort in an attempt to alleviate the unbearable burdens faced by many of the constituents in this area, he would have a full time job.

• (8:10 p.m.)

My colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), has drawn attention to the tragedy which has befallen what was a thriving community of 14,000 souls on Bell Island, Conception Bay. I think every Canadian who is worth his salt must feel a little ashamed when he realizes that he is part of a society which has allowed this kind of modern tragedy. The same type of tragedy is befalling the residents of the island communities of Notre Dame Bay. By way of example, may I point out the nature of the conditions on Fogo island. Fogo island presently has a population of 5,000 people. It is, as it were, a fishing vessel moored conveniently off the coast of Newfoundland amidst the abundance of Atlantic fish.

A couple of decades ago, it would have been an inspiration to anybody to visit Fogo island and observe a most industrious, prosperous and conscientious people, assuming their proud place amongst the prosperous communities of Canada. Things have changed on Fogo island and today the majority of the residents of this area are barely able to keep body and soul together.

Not too many months ago the only living father of confederation, the man who led Newfoundland down the blind alley and left it there, namely the premier of Newfoundland, enunciated a great federal-provincial plan to activate the economy and develop the communities of Fogo island. Hopes were revived that the pride which was theirs would return with the return of prosperity. We have heard nothing more of that, Mr. Speaker, and the whole business is being excused with the cliché that promises, like piecrusts, were made to be broken. These people are not only forced to endure the hardships of unemployment, the low standard of living which has befallen them, but are compelled, like many other residents of the island areas in the Atlantic region, to live in isolation from the cultural and economic advantages of the rest of our society. This situation is caused by the prohibitive cost of transportation to the mainland of our island province. It is a situation which this parliament has to remedy if it is to regain the respect of the residents of the whole of the Atlantic area and of the elected representatives of that area.

I could go into detail, Mr. Speaker, and outline another sad story. The whole region of the straight shore of Notre Dame Bay and the whole of the area of Bonavista North suffered from the crippling effects of the great fire of 1961. In 1961, as the result of the crippling effect of a great forest fire, with which I think all Canadians are familiar, the possibility for these people to earn a livelihood literally went up in smoke. The only difference between the situation now and seven years ago in Bonavista North and Notre Dame Bay is the fact that the only possibility for the people to earn a livelihood has gone without any replacement.

A couple of days ago I raised a question in this house by inquiring of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as to whether this government had any plans for Gander comparable to those he mentioned when he indicated that $32 million would be spent to develop air terminus facilities in Vancouver, which would then become the western metropolis for Pacific coast trade.

We in Gander are eagerly awaiting a positive response to this question so that Gander will become the eastern air metropolis for Atlantic trade. All hon. members will agree that the azimuthal factors peculiar to Gander do support and justify a tremendous amount of federal attention and federal investment in this area. I feel that the economic stimulation resulting therefrom will provide the boost needed for the whole of the east coast of our province. It surprises me that such a program has not attained fruition long before now.

It behooves me, Mr. Speaker, to mention the community of Bishops Falls, which has a population of over 2,000 people and which has, as its main source of revenue, the terminus of the Canadian National Railways. I am still amazed at how casually both the premier of our province and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), have taken the decision to abandon the rail passenger service which was announced by Hon. Mr. Pickersgill, President of the Canadian Transport Commission, from his summer home at Eastport after the June 25 election. We, the Progressive Conservative members of Newfoundland had the privilege of travelling across the island on that service immediately prior to the opening of parliament.

The only observation I have to make is that the service is being used to a greater extent than it ever has been, despite the calculated efforts of the Canadian National Railways to allow this service to deteriorate in order to discourage its use and thereby justify its termination. I call for an investigation into the actions of the Canadian Transport Commission, the Canadian National Railways and the negotiations of these bodies with the Newfoundland government. It must be obvious that collusion existed and the reasons ought to be exposed.

Questions posed to the Minister of Transport by my colleagues and me at the opening of the house as to why Canadian National Railways passenger service was being abandoned received replies to which I should like to draw the attention of all hon. members. I refer to Hansard, page 22, column 2, paragraph 3 where it is stated, in effect, that because of the cost and the declining usage of the service this action was taken. The minister made this statement despite the fact that passenger service is costing a mint of money across the whole of the Dominion. When I am faced with this kind of logic, I am forced to ask why Newfoundland was selected as the province to lose its rail passenger service.

Is this the kind of logic that is to be applied to other areas of our economy? I think all hon. members present, and the Canadian people as a whole, must sympathize with the position with which we are faced, especially when one realizes the whole of our passenger service is to be terminated, and not a little passing track. The whole of our passenger service is to be terminated as of April 15.

I am as aware as other members in this house of the great sums of money that have been spent in Newfoundland during the past 20 years of confederation. We feel pride in being Canadians. I do not believe you will find people anywhere in Canada with greater allegiance to this country than the people of Newfoundland. I have had many great moments standing before great gatherings of young people and hearing them sing our national anthem, with great enthusiasm. We are proud to be Canadians. I think that Newfoundlanders are aware that great sums of money have been spent in Newfoundland during the past 20 years.

We are not looking for handouts, Mr. Speaker. This is not the type of people we are in Newfoundland. The premier of Newfoundland might certainly have gained the reputation of being so inclined, and I think that the federal government might have reciprocated and enhanced this particular image. It would have been healthier for the government of Canada to have co-ordinated the efforts of all government agencies in an attempt to develop the great resources of our province, thus providing economic stimulus for the whole of the dominion.

I demand here and now, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government set up machinery immediately to investigate the ways in which federal allocations of money to Newfoundland have been used during the past two decades. I think that the federal government has a responsibility to see that funds are spent in such a way as to result in the desired development for which they were allocated.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in closing and in thanking Your Honour and this house for your attention, I challenge the government of this country to take its responsibilities seriously and make those changes that were guaranteed to the people of my eastern province in the terms of union of 1949. Let us stop treating Newfoundland as a young, irresponsible adolescent, one to be satisfied when an opportune occasion arises.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there have been, and rightly so, many tributes paid to Your Honour since the beginning of this particular debate. I know I speak for all members of the house when I suggest that it was the impartial, capable and firm manner in which you conducted the sessions of the last parliament more than any other single action that has hastened the day when this parliament may be blessed with a permanent Speaker.

I should also like to take advantage of this occasion to congratulate the mover and seconder of the speech from the throne. As has been pointed out on many occasions, their speeches in both instances were very eloquent, and it is obvious that both of these young men will make a meaningful contribution to the House of Commons in years to come.

I became a member of this house, Mr. Speaker, in 1962. Since then I have met many members and made many friends, not only in my own party but in other parties. I do not think anyone would mind if I said that I have some regret, on looking around the house, at finding missing some of my hon. friends in the other parties, members who accepted defeat gracefully, understanding the insecurity of our chosen vocation.

It has been my good fortune, as one who appreciates and who likes the House of Commons and the debates which take place here, to have heard the speeches of the various leaders of the four parties in this house. Perhaps in previous sessions I earned the reputation of being aggressive and belligerent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Never.

Mr. Mackasey: Thank you. I am glad you gentlemen have changed your mistaken opinion.

Mr. Woolliams: What are you looking for, a compliment?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay a compliment to the hon. gentleman who leads the official opposition in this house. Listening to his address, and while appreciating his criticisms, I was particularly impressed with the degree of sincerity expressed by the hon. gentleman and with the grasp and command of the French language seized by him during the short time he has been in the house. As one who comes from "la belle province" and who after 47 years still speaks French with an Irish accent, I can assure the hon. gentleman that his efforts were most commendable and certainly much appreciated.

I was no less impressed by the eloquence of the house leader of the New Democratic party. I think it is safe to say, Mr. Speaker, that this gentleman is one of the great debaters of this house, indeed of most previous houses. I think he is one of the great debaters of the last decade, even though, Mr. Speaker, as I have said on so many occasions, both his and his party's philosophies are more reminiscent of the 19th century than the 20th.

As for the hon. gentleman who represents free enterprise and Social Credit in this house, I think the humour which he brings to our debates in stressing his point, the Social Credit theories which we may not appreciate but which we all respect, is a welcome addition to the debates of the House of Commons.

This is my first opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to participate in debate for some considerable months, because of illness. Certainly it is the first time I have spoken as a member of the cabinet. It goes without saying that as Minister of Labour I intend to support my leader to the best of my ability. I have known the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for some considerable time. I remember his first public speech, which was made in my riding in 1965. I watched with fascination and with approval his rapid rise from the backbenches of this party to the highest position in the land. The victory of the Liberal party in the last election, Mr. Speaker, a victory which provided this government with a majority for the first time in a decade, proved to all of us that our Prime Minister more than any Canadian in political life today best personifies the spirit that characterizes the Canada of 1968.

I think Canadians everywhere, regardless of their political affiliations, are demanding a voice in government. They are longing for a Canada with a sense of purpose, a sense of destiny, a country on the march. Above all, Mr. Speaker, in the last election the people of Canada demonstrated as never before their belief in one country united from sea to sea, with two official languages, a country made up of people of diverse cultures. This was the real message of the success of the Liberal party in the last election. We have advanced—and I say this in all sincerity—to a position where all members of this house, certainly the leaders of all parties, accept this concept.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Perhaps I may be permitted to say a word or two in tribute to the former leader of my party, Mr. Pearson for whom I have particularly deep affection. As I travelled across the country during different political campaigns, concerned primarily with national unity I never ceased to point out that perhaps this great Canadian's contribution to national unity would be best understood and appreciated when he had left the political arena. I think that is the case, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether members of all parties would be so united tonight were it not for Mr. Pearson's wisdom in establishing the B and B commission. I wonder if our centennial experiences and successes of last year would have been as great without a distinctive Canadian flag which represented, I think, the pinnacle of success of the Pearson years.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, no.

Mr. Mackasey: I was speaking to a former minister of labour the other day—and incidentally he had represented a party other than the one I belong to—who reminded me that the minister of labour can never be a popular figure in the house.

Mr. Stanfield: Don't get discouraged.

Mr. Mackasey: At best, he is tolerated. If any strike that occurs is not settled within 24 hours the minister of labour is accused of being in default of his duty.

Mr. Lewis: We will give him 48 hours.

Mr. Mackasey: I am not a reactionary, but there are many who are on the hon. gentleman's side of the house.

To be perfectly fair and sincere, I must say that if the minister of labour intervenes too soon in a dispute he is considered a reactionary; if he waits too long to intervene he is accused by the Leader of the Opposition of lack of judgment, of being without any appreciation of what is inevitably described in every newspaper in the country a national emergency. That criticism has been raised in this house during this debate.

It is my duty, I think, to express my philosophy and viewpoint regarding labour and labour unrest in this country. I think too few people understand and appreciate the free collective bargaining process; too many in this country fail to distinguish between labour and management in assessing blame for a strike. On those rare occasions when we have found it necessary in this country to introduce ad hoc restrictive labour legislation, that legislation inevitably has worked against the best interests of labour and has come down on the side of management. That is not the type of action that I, as Minister of Labour, intend to prescribe to my colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: This government, Mr. Speaker, is a responsible government. It knows full well that it cannot initiate actions which will be isolated; it knows that each action produces a precedent and a basis which will influence future actions and attitudes. It upholds the philosophy underlying the collective bargaining process in this land and it believes this philosophy to be that most compatible with the aims and aspirations of our free society. It believes that extraordinary legislative action should be delayed as long as possible; that is, as long as there is a glimmer of hope that the parties to the dispute will settle that dispute according to their own formula, or as long as the national welfare is not fundamentally threatened on a broad scale.

If the pursuit of this belief leads to a situation where national strikes occur, causing inconvenience and sometimes short term hardships, then that is the price Canadians must be prepared to pay for our type of freedom.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, when visiting Poland I spoke to the minister of labour in that country and I was informed that there are no strikes in Poland, in Russia, in East Germany, or in any country behind the iron curtain.

Strikes are one of the penalties, one of the inconveniences that a free society such as ours must accept periodically.

The government believes that legislative action to end a strike is a serious and regrettable step, which may be taken only when it is established beyond all doubt that the continuation of such strike represents a threat to the national well being. The minister of labour would rather be criticized in this house for being too slow to take away the legal rights of hard working Canadians than complimented for being quick to do so. Frankly, I am tired of hearing people presume that the Department of Labour is nothing more than a necessary evil, that it reacts rather than leads, that it shows no initiative, that it plays little or no part in the settling of disputes. Above all, I am fed up with those who maintain that the department is not truly concerned with the seriousness of strikes and their potential consequences. The department is most vitally concerned and is constantly taking every step open to it to bring about settlements that will be just to the worker.

What of the record of the Department of Labour in this year of so-called strikes? Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite might be interested in some figures. Certainly those who represent urban constituencies will be.

An hon. Member: What about the farmer?

Mr. Mackasey: This year there have been 100 collective bargaining disputes which came under federal jurisdiction and were referred to the Department of Labour because they could not be settled through the free collective bargaining process without government assistance. Of those 100 disputes, Mr. Speaker, 94 were settled without recourse to strike action. I think that that is an excellent record of which the Department of Labour and the labour movement can be proud.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEwan: There are farmers, too.

Mr. Woolliams: Some farmers in Saskatchewan might agree with that N.D.P. philosophy.

Mr. Mackasey: We could abolish strikes; we could eliminate them, if that is the philosophy of the hon. gentleman who interrupted me just now.

Mr. MacEwan: Get on with your speech. Nobody interrupted you.

Mr. Mackasey: Of these 94 disputes where strike action was avoided, 78 were settled at the conciliation officer stage and the other 15 were settled by conciliation boards set up by the Minister of Labour. In other words, we have had six strikes out of potential of 100 strikes this year. At the present moment two strikes of minor consequence are still unsettled in this country. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that any reasonable man looking at these figures cannot deny that this is an excellent record.

It is pointless to review potential strikes or disputes where strike action was averted. I could direct the attention of the house to such disputes as the ones involving Air Canada, the CTV network, the Quebec Harbours Board and several others which, if they had gone to strike action, would have caused tremendous inconvenience to many people in this country and would have brought a tremendous economic hardship to many.

Personally I regard every strike as a breakdown of communications, as a failure on the part of labour, management or government, or all three, to communicate soon enough to resolve differences. I do not think that labour is without sin. I often wonder at the advice that some of the leading labour leaders in this country give to their membership; I often wonder at some of the distorted facts they publish and at their lack of co-operation. For instance, when the Prime Minister of this country suggests the establishment of a prices and income control board this board would inevitably work in the interests of labour. The co-operation of labour in the establishment of such boards is not always forthcoming.

I wish now to talk about a specific strike, that of the grain handlers, because that matter is of interest to many members on the opposition side. I think that that strike shows in a classic way the problems that the Department of Labour and the government are faced with in strikes of considerable magnitude. In the case of the grain handlers, as in the case of the seaway workers, all the procedures of the collective bargaining process had been exhausted. In both cases circumstances surrounding the strike and the serious consequences to the country resulting from the strike were under constant review by the department.

The main issue in any strike is this: When does a strike, unpleasant though it may be, become a national emergency? In other words, when does the public inconvenience become a public emergency? When does a private right become a public wrong and at what precise moment do the considerations to be given to these matters weigh heavily in favour of legislative action? The government must take into account a large variety of factors, including these: Has the legal collective bargaining process been completely exhausted by the parties? What are the long and short term effects of the continuance of the strike? Are alternative services possible and operative? Is there any real hope of a settlement being reached by the parties involved and, if so, at what time and how? Is there any physical suffering as a result of the stoppage? Is the safety and health of citizens imperilled or is the security of the country undermined or weakened? These are most, though by no means all the questions, Mr. Speaker, that must be considered in determining whether a strike truly constitutes a national emergency.

There is no standard formula that has yet been determined or developed that we can apply to one, let alone all the strikes affecting the public interest. We are always faced with the agony of careful judgment, of frank appraisal; but I think the entry of government through legislative powers can only be justified when a national emergency is clearly present and not when a reactionary press decides there is an opportunity to infringe once again on the free collective bargaining rights won so hard by the labour movement in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, there is no text book, no foolproof formula to decide what is the appropriate moment to move into these disputes. In the final analysis it is a matter of judgment when a strike becomes a national emergency, an emergency that justifies restrictive legislation. With respect to the lakehead dispute, Mr. Speaker, the strike referred to by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), he suggested that I should have moved into that dispute a month ago. We do not know what he would have had us do, or what he would have done a month ago to restrict the rights of the free collective bargaining process, thus forcing the men back to work.

I have no idea what the hon. gentleman had in mind a month ago, but I do know that a month ago there was no national emergency as a result of the strike at the lakehead in this country, and that is a fact I am quite willing to substantiate now or at any other time. Mr. Speaker, my justification for not intervening sooner in the grain handling dispute was based on facts and figures supplied to my department by people who know the industry. I have been able to establish to my satisfaction, if not necessarily to the opposition, that not one single grain sale was lost as a result of the strike. Not one market was jeopardized or one commitment not honoured. Our commitments to existing customers were filled.

There was sufficient grain, in anticipation of the strike, at the port of Montreal to look after the customers in the eastern part of this country, the domestic customers. In short, Mr. Speaker, two, three or four weeks ago there was no justification for government intervention in this particular dispute.

Now then, Mr. Speaker, what changed the condition? What made this particular unpleasant strike become a national emergency? I think those on the other side of the house who are more familiar with the west than I know and appreciate the real reason, and if they are honest they will support my argument. The new unpredictable factor which changed the strike into a national emergency was the condition of the new harvest that is about to be reaped in coming weeks. It became apparent that the drying facilities at the lakehead would be needed to make this crop saleable, and to make certain its quality would not deteriorate.

This really was the fundamental difference in the problem at the lakehead last week, as opposed to the basic problem five weeks ago when, if the Department of Labour had listened to the advice of the Leader of the Opposition or of editorialists around this country, we would have walked in again with compulsory arbitration and forced the men back to work. That is what he wanted to do—

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is my hon. friend suggesting that I suggested he should have ordered the men back to work?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for putting words in the mouth of the Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps he should have clarified what he said. I am quite prepared to sit down and ask him what he would have done, since he raised the question in his speech and suggested we should have moved in five weeks ago.

I will tell you what I was prepared to do, Mr. Speaker. I am quite prepared to tell you what I intended to do. I intended to introduce compulsory arbitration in the house at the first opportunity when the session opened, if the strike was not settled, based on legislation advanced back in 1958 by, I think, the opposition. But in addition I had prepared a measure, and obtained the permission of the government, to introduce and establish an industrial inquiries commission into the whole operation of grain handling in the west, to determine if management could afford the wages asked by the strikers at the lakehead.

In other words, if this house, or this government, or this Minister of Labour is going to be called upon in the future to introduce restrictive labour legislation in the House of Commons, then he is going to make sure it is restrictive not only on the rights of labour but on the rights of management as well. That happens to be my basic approach.

I realize full well the shortcomings of the Department of Labour. I do not want to mislead the house and say the department cannot be improved or that our record is without blemish. There are strikes we have not settled. There are two not settled this evening. But we have already taken action to upgrade the department, to introduce new methods and increase the size of the staff without reducing the excellence and the efficiency of the conciliation branch.

We are waiting for the Woods report, the task force set up two years ago at considerable cost, which will delve into the whole problem of labour from an academic point of view and a practical point of view, that concerns the working conditions in this country. We are waiting for this report to be tabled in December, as it should be if it is on time, and then we will submit it to a standing committee for its recommendations.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, we are not standing still. We are investigating and proposing amendments to revise the I.R.D.I. Act, so that we can supplement the Woods report to make the Department of Labour what it should be, one that the government, the opposition and Canadians in general can be proud of. That is my mandate. That is what I intend to work toward.

I think there is another point I should emphasize, and perhaps it is the most fundamental point to the whole free collective bargaining process. No matter how we streamline our rules and update the I.R.D.I. Act, and upgrade the facilities of the department, no matter what legislation we may import from Scandinavia, or England, or any other country around the world, or how many eminent jurists prepare briefs and hold hearings, the one main ingredient needed to avoid labour disputes is the will to settle a strike, the will of both parties, the desire of both parties to avoid strike action. This is precisely the difference between the 93 strikes that were settled and the seven we were not able to settle without action. That very intangible factor is the will to settle.

The work of the Department of Labour involves people, probably more than any other department of government. This is the point that is not always understood by our editorialists. It is not always understood by my colleagues and by members of the opposition. Without the will to settle, all the legislation in the world is useless, and the will to settle is a responsibility that lies just as heavily upon the shoulders of labour as it does on the shoulders of management.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that this week there has been a lot of talk about poverty. I am sure that concern for the poor people of Canada is not the exclusive domain of the Liberal party. Knowing so many people in this house, as I do, I am sure all of us are concerned about poverty and how to solve the problem of poverty. I think we are all agreed it will not be solved overnight, but I think one of the keys to its solution is the need to increase productivity, and increased productivity in this country depends on good will and co-operation between management and labour. That is what we should be working towards in this country. The day has long gone by when management can consider labour as a necessary evil and labour can consider management as something intolerable, an attitude still too prevalent in this country.

I think that possibly the problem of labour unrest in this country is not one solely for the domain of the economists. I think it should also concern our social scientists, sociologists and psychologists. There should be some forces, some people who can understand and reach labour and management and make both parties understand the value of communication. Both parties must understand that the prosperity of this great country depends on the productivity of our secondary industries; and productivity I repeat, depends on co-operation between management and labour, and a mutual respect for each other's particular problems.

Until we achieve that type of productivity, so that we can take advantage of the Kennedy round and the export markets around the world, and are in a position to compete successfully with other countries of the world, then we can talk about the just society for the next 50 years. Labour has a responsible role to play on behalf of the people who are not unionized. Seventy per cent of the labour force has no official spokesman. Who speaks for them in this house? These people have a right to share in the free society. Organized labour has a moral obligation to these people. It has an obligation to co-operate with management just as management has a moral obligation not to treat workers as slaves. Government, labour and management can increase productivity and make the just society possible.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the leader of the Senate, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) and many others who have helped me become elected to this house. I could not see how I would be elected until these people arrived in my constituency.

I am quite proud to represent the people of southwestern Nova Scotia in the House of Commons. I say this because it is a difficult constituency to represent. It is difficult because all problems exist in my constituency. We have the problem of disparity, housing, poverty, welfare and transportation. The fishing industry faces immediate problems, and many more. It is difficult also from a geographical standpoint because Nova Scotia is barely latched on to the rest of Canada. In addition I represent the southwestern tip of Nova Scotia. Due to this fact the governments seem to forget that people exist there. It is difficult from a racial standpoint because in southwestern Nova Scotia there exist—and I say "exist" because many are not living but merely existing—people of many races. As well as white English speaking people we have Acadians of French descent, we have many people of the Negro race and also a few Indian bands.

Yes, amid difficulties, people exist there. However, when asked by my constituents what I should do in respect of the disparity, poverty and other problems I have simply answered, "The just society will take care of that; don't worry, you will get your share." I hope that my statement will be justified. I hope that the fishermen of Nova Scotia will obtain the same prices for their catch as are obtained by the fishermen of British Columbia. I hope that the people who have emigrated to other parts of Canada will be able to return home to enjoy the same standard of living in southwestern Nova Scotia as is enjoyed by the people of Ontario and other parts of Canada. I hope that the just society will provide for the young people of Nova Scotia a place where they can remain.

We are not asking for handouts. However, we do desire long term planning with regard to the many problems which face the Atlantic area, particularly Nova Scotia and southwestern Nova Scotia. We require immediate solutions to our problems. We require an immediate solution to the problems affecting our fishing industry. The government has been warned that the fishing industry of Nova Scotia is in the midst of the longest slump ever, with warnings that it could collapse within two years. The chairman of the Western Nova Scotia Fish Packers Association has announced that only Ottawa can come to the rescue, that only Ottawa can relieve the problem. We read in the press that the fisheries ministry has no pat solution to these present problems. Six processing firms have been driven out of the market this year. Over 10,000 residents on the southwestern shore of Nova Scotia will be forced to leave the area. I hope that the organization which is projecting the just society will act soon. Otherwise, as one gentleman said, "We will all have to move out." We are looking for immediate solutions. In addition we are looking for long term planning of the fisheries problem.

The Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Jamieson) while in Nova Scotia on September 3 of this year said that planning is essential to ensure that a decent life, as well as good jobs, is offered to all. Planning is also essential in the field of public works. We are not asking that every village have a new wharf or breakwater. We are asking simply that there be planning so that we will be able to develop good deep water harbours, while maintaining and preserving the present wharves and breakwaters which are already in existence. We ask that the just society distribute evenly the funds available for public works.

There has been planning in the field of transportation. There has been planning for almost 20 years in relation to a Digby-Saint John ferry. I anticipate that soon this will be a reality. But we do not want 20 years of planning. The Prime Minister knows something about our transportation problems because he was fogged down in Yarmouth. At one Liberal campaign meeting Senator McLean stressed the need for improved transportation facilities, larger wharves and more adequate harbour facilities. I hope this statement will be honoured.

I hope that the new department of regional development will formulate some plan to benefit our region. As a result of the discontinuance of the shipbuilding subsidies the shipyards have closed and there has been heavy unemployment. It is our hope that the just society will provide alternative employment for these people, so that they will not find it necessary to go to Chicago, Ontario or elsewhere in order to find employment. Many of my constituents at the present time are not in a wage bracket that enables them to build homes under the National Housing Act. I ask the just society to remedy this situation.

[Translation]

I also ask that the just society fight for the rights of the French minority in Nova Scotia, the district I am representing.

I call Acadians in Nova Scotia second class citizens, because we cannot write or speak properly, either in French or in English, the two official languages of Canada. We must correct this situation with the help of French television and other means recommended by the B. and B. commission. Let us be fair when we distribute funds to the Acadians of Nova Scotia.

[English]

The government should not be afraid to get things done in southwestern Nova Scotia, because if four years from now I lose my seat in the House of Commons because things have been done in my constituency I will be proud that I have had some part in this.

I could continue, but I believe this is sufficient to convince the government that the people of the Atlantic provinces, and particularly the people of southwestern Nova Scotia are facing difficult times because of the lack of plans and foresight. I could talk about the harbours from Parkers Cove to Clyde River. I could enumerate the needs. I could go on to talk about a second ferry from Yarmouth to another American port. I could go on and talk about the many studies and inquiries that have been made in southwestern Nova Scotia without any action being taken, but I will leave my comments until later occasions when the ministers concerned are in thier seats. I doubt very much that they will read my comments in any event.

I want to emphasize in respect of this just society that we need action. I will support any government move to uplift the standard of living in the Atlantic area and particularly in southwestern Nova Scotia through any ARDA or regional development agency.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin, as almost every other member who has participated in this debate has done, by congratulating you on your re-election as the presiding officer in this house. A democratic system can only work if the people in the country, whether they are the majority or the minority, have the right to express their views. A democratic government can only work if the members elected, whether they be in the majority or the minority, have the right to express their views and have the feeling that they will be treated with fairness whether they sit on the opposition or the government side.

The years that I have been here since 1962 have been hard years, and they have not been easy years for the Speakers of the house, because they have been years of minority government. I am sure that the view I now express is that of every member, and certainly of every member who has been here during previous sessions, that the work of the House of Commons has been made a great deal easier as a result of the fairness, the wit, the humour and charm with which you have handled the difficult task you have been given.

We have heard a good deal in the past months about the just society. The people of Canada were told during the election campaign that one thing this government would do if it was re-elected was move toward a just society. There is reference in the throne speech on several occasions to the just society. However we were given little detail in the throne speech, or in the speech of the Prime Minister the other day, about what a just society means and how it will be implemented. We were given about as much detail as the people of Canada were given during the election campaign. In fact we were told, as were the people of Canada, that there was no need to worry about what a just society meant. We were told that we did not need to understand it or know the details of it, but that all we had to do was trust the Prime Minister. He said that in God's good time, and some of us wondered just who God was, in that sense, we would get a just society. We are still waiting.

I agree with those newspaper columnists who still have great admiration for the Prime Minister and who say that we cannot do everything in one year. Speaking for a great many people, not only members of this house, we would like to see a beginning made on a new, exciting and just society. We would like to see a beginning to the creation of a more equitable Canada of the kind we were led to believe we would begin to see if this government was re-elected. We have yet to see any signs of that.

Indeed, when you try to get anything specific from this government, you receive nothing but empty phrases. It is a common thing in this year 1968 for Canadians, whether they be politicians, university professors, newspaper columnists or ordinary citizens, to look at television, read newspapers and magazines and listen to the radio to learn about what is going on in the United States. We feel that we are quite a bit better off than those people. We are not directly involved in the war in Viet Nam, which many people in Canada believe to be an unjustified war. We do not have the race problems that exist in the United States, or at least we do not admit to them.

It is my belief that we are almost unanimous in our contempt for President Johnson. Last week when the Chrysler Corporation of the United States announced a price increase on the 1969 models, President Johnson, the one for whom a good many of us have a good deal of contempt, did not hesitate to condemn that action of the Chrysler Corporation. I am sure that General Motors and the Ford company will soon follow suit, at which time President Johnson will no doubt take issue with those automobile companies, too. The late President Kennedy not only condemned United States steel companies for increasing their prices, but forced them to rescind those price increases.

We have experienced increases in the prices of some very important and basic commodities within the last year or so. Some months ago we had an increase of about 15 per cent in the price of copper. This was brought to the attention of the government and it was pointed out that the copper companies, Noranda, Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting, and International Nickel, had never made a larger profit than they had during the last year, and that there was no need for that increase in price. It was pointed out that the price of copper was increased because there was a shortage at the time. This government did nothing about that increase.

Last week when Chrysler Corporation announced its intention to increase its prices, members of this chamber asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) if he would intercede. Today the Prime Minister was asked whether he would intercede. What did the Prime Minister say today? He said: "Well, what can I do?" The Prime Minister could certainly do as much as the president of the United States. He could at least express on behalf of the people of Canada their contempt and their regret that a company such as the Chrysler Corporation, as well as companies such as General Motors and Ford, who will undoubtedly follow suit in the next week or so, would increase prices at a time when their profits have never been as large.

Several years ago the government of Canada, formed by this same government party, made an agreement with the government of the United States under which the tariffs which had been collected on imported automobiles from the United States would be waived by the Canadian government. It was agreed that the $50 million savings in excise tax would go to the companies in order to establish a system under which there would be virtually free trade between the United States and Canada in automobiles. It was felt this would allow these companies to become more efficient, produce more cars at a lower cost and that the prices of automobiles would be reduced in Canada.

It has been said for many years that the reason cars have cost more in Canada than in the United States was the result of our industry being smaller, with smaller production runs, and that it cost more per unit to produce a car here than in the United States.

It was said, when the auto pact was implemented, that we would become more efficient and would not have to produce hundreds of types of models in Canada; that we would concentrate on half a dozen or a dozen models, would produce more cars in Canada, would not have to import them from the United States, and this would bring down the price of automobiles. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) tried to argue today, first of all, that the differential between United States prices and prices in Canada had been reduced since the pact was brought into effect. There is not a word of truth in that statement.

I have here some figures which were prepared by the united automobile workers, the union which I believe represents 99 per cent of the automobile workers in Canada. These figures show what has happened to automobile prices in Canada, as compared to those in the United States, in the years since 1964 when the tax was implemented. In 1964 a six cylinder, four-door sedan produced in Canada had a suggested retail price in this country—and these figures are in U.S. dollars, so that members of the house will understand that the comparisons are correct—of $2,569. In the United States the same car sold for $2,338, a difference of $231. The price in Canada was 9.9 per cent higher than in the United States.

The price in Canada for a 1965 model of the same car was $2,581. The price in the United States was only $2,350. There was the same difference in price, namely $231 and 9.8 per cent. In 1966 we had the same difference in price. In 1967 the difference in price was reduced by one half per cent. We were still paying 9.4 per cent more in Canada than they were in the United States. This year, the last year for which we have prices, the cost in Canada for this car was $2,727. The same car cost in the United States $2,501. The difference was still 9 per cent, that is, we were paying 9 per cent more for cars selling in Canada than they were in the United States, even though we have a free market.

It has been said, and not denied, that cars produced by the Ford Company in Oakville and sold in Toronto cost more than the same cars produced in Oakville, exported to Buffalo and sold in that city. If this is true—and I know it is—we can assume either one of two things, that the Ford Motor Company is losing money on every car it sells in Buffalo, which I do not think any member of this house would believe for one moment, or the profit for every car sold in the city of Toronto by the Ford Company is exorbitant. Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce simply waves this fact aside and refuses to do anything, as does the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

We are not talking about some poor fisherman in Newfoundland. We are not talking about some poor farmer in the interlake area of Manitoba. We are talking about some of the largest corporations in the world. General Motors has assets of over $10 billion. The Ford Motor Company has assets of over $5 billion. Chrysler Corporation has assets of over $2 billion. Are the Big Three automobile firms in financial difficulties? Are they not making adequate profits? Do they need this price increase? These are difficult questions to answer precisely because this government, which believes in a just society, has never taken the trouble to enact the most elementary legislation which would require the automobile and other companies operating in Canada, both Canadian and foreign owned, to publish financial statements showing their assets, the extent of their sales and what their profits are. Therefore we cannot be exact in regard to the figures of these companies but some very interesting, and I think pretty accurate, estimates have been made.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

An article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 19, 1965, said in part as follows:

> According to one estimate, the average annual profit of the auto manufacturers often has run to around 30 per cent of their net worth, that is the total amount of their invested capital compared with a more normal 10 to 15 per cent return in other industries.
> While the balance sheets of most of the major producers are closed to public scrutiny, one federal official estimated that in a good year the profit earned by one of the leading Canadian auto producers might run as high as 80 to 90 per cent of invested capital.

This is the kind of company about which the Prime Minister said today he could not do anything. I want to compare that in a moment with the kind of thing the Prime Minister said recently in connection with a group of workers who had the temerity to go on strike, something they had the legal right to do. We do know that in 1967 Chrysler of Canada made a profit, after taxes, of $27,797,000. We do know that the Ford Motor Company of Canada increased its profit between 1966 and 1967 from $16,781,000 to $31,580,000. In other words, Ford Motor Company practically doubled its profit in Canada between 1966 and 1967. Yet we are now being told that despite these very high profits the Chrysler Corporation—and I am sure that in the next few days Ford and General Motors will be doing the same thing—will be increasing the price of 1969 automobiles.

I make these criticisms of the government because I do not believe the government cannot do anything about automobile prices. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the government cannot order the automobile companies to hold the line on prices. Of course, the government cannot, or will not, institute price controls for automobiles. They certainly cannot do this if they are not going to institute price controls on everything else. But there are a number of steps which a government which believes in a just society could take. I wish to list just four steps which the government could take.

First of all, I think the government could, and should, protest publicly the price increases announced by Chrysler and the increases which I am certain will be announced in the next few days by Ford and General Motors. Surely the Prime Minister of Canada, who believes in and has spoken so often and so eloquently outside this house about the just society, can do at least as much as President Johnson of the United States.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Second, the government can, if it believes that the automobile companies of Canada are charging too much for their cars in this country, remove the tariffs on the importation of cars. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) gives just the answer I would expect from him; he shakes his head that they cannot do it. Of course they can do it. They can remove the tariffs so that if I, a Canadian citizen, want to buy a car and I am being overcharged, as I know I am, I can go to the United States and buy the same car, thereby saving a substantial amount of money. If the government did that, the Canadian car companies would bring their prices down and thus their prices would become competitive.

Third, the government can order an investigation into the operations of the automobile manufacturers by the anti-combines division so we could get a look at what is actually happening in that industry. Are they really making net profits of 40 per cent or more, as has been alleged by informed observers of the automobile industry, a net profit which is exorbitant?

Fourth, the government should, in the very near future, enact legislation requiring companies, including the automobile companies, to publish financial statements showing their profits year by year, so that the public could judge whether or not the profits of the companies, and therefore their prices, are exorbitant.

These are some of the things which the government could do, and I would urge them to do it. When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) have been asked in the past few days what action if any they will take, they have made it very clear that they have no intention of taking any action. Indeed the Prime Minister indicated today that there is no action which he could take. I find it strange that the Prime Minister, who believes in the just society and who cannot take any action to control the exorbitant profits of the automobile companies, can hold press conferences at which he lectures workers and tells them to be sensible, reasonable and patriotic, that they should not rock the boat and that they should not ask for exorbitant wage increases, which the Prime Minister implies they are doing.

I should like to quote a couple of sentences from two articles written by George Bain of the Globe and Mail published on July 17 and 18 in which he quoted extensively from a transcript of a press conference given by the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the members of this house to compare the Prime Minister's attitude when he spoke about the postal workers with that which he took today when he was asked to do something about automobile corporations and their exorbitant demands for an increase in the price of cars. This is what he said when he was asked about the strike and about the demands of the workers:

> You know that government is the only employer who can meet any wage demands, no matter how high or how preposterous they be, because the government... has no money of its own. It just takes money from the taxpayer, whereas in the private sector there is a rock-bottom... beyond which the employer cannot go because if he gives more he ceases to be able to operate efficiently.
> Certain wage increases mean just transferring resources from the shareholder to the workers, but there is a point which, if you transfer any more, the company goes broke ...

I do not know whether the Prime Minister was thinking about General Motors, Chrysler or Ford, but there is not much chance they will go broke; there is perhaps more chance that the government of Canada will go broke than that the same would happen to General Motors.

Mr. Bain had some very interesting observations to make about the Prime Minister's speech. It is reputed that the Prime Minister does not read the newspapers, and I am sure he does not read Hansard, so he may not read what I say any more than what Mr. Bain writes, but I find it interesting because during the campaign Mr. Bain was full of admiration for the Prime Minister, as were most newspapermen. This is what Mr. Bain wrote:

> Reactionary may not be the word. But the total effect of those words, to my mind, is to foster public prejudice against all wage demands in the public sector, without regard to whether a particular wage demand may be eminently justified to correct a gross inequity.

In other words, what Mr. Bain is saying is that if the Prime Minister thinks that the wage demands of the postal workers or of any other group of workers are exorbitant, he should say so and not blame all workers, as he did in this press interview, for being guilty of demanding exorbitant wage increases. I say the Prime Minister should adopt the same principle in both cases, that of the strikes and that of the price increases of the automobile manufacturers. He should give the people of Canada a lead. He should do as President Johnson has done and as President Kennedy did before him. He should say to the automobile companies of this country that they are big and efficient enough and that their profits are large enough so that they do not need the price increases which they have announced for the coming year.

When we talk about automobiles, we no longer refer to a luxury. Automobiles are a necessity in this day and age. In most cities of Canada workers often drive 10, 15 or 20 miles or more in each direction to go to work. Farmers need cars, and nearly every citizen of Canada feels he needs a car and buys one. It seems to me that if the Prime Minister and his government really believe in a just society, about which they talk so frequently and so eloquently, they should apply the principles, which one would expect in a just society, to the kind of case which I have tried to document today, namely the unnecessary and exorbitant increases which are being proposed in the prices of the 1969 automobiles by Chrysler and other corporations of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being 9.30 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 of standing order 28 to interrupt proceedings and forthwith put the question on any amendment now before the house. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment to the amendment? All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Dumont) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost. The question is now on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour of the amendment please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say, nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Stanfield) which was negatived on the following division:

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the government house leader what will be the government order of business, particularly following the throne speech debate, and the order of that business and its priorities, so that the opposition parties, including this one will be able properly to prepare to meet that particular order, which I hope will be given to us tonight?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. On the assumption that the throne speech debate would go to the full length, which would be next Wednesday, we would anticipate calling interim supply for Thursday. In the event that the throne speech debate terminates earlier than that, we would be calling a number of the items on the order paper, most probably with respect to farm financing, items Nos. 5, 6 and 7.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, with respect, the minister speaks in terms of probability. Cannot the government house leader tell us definitely what business will be put before the house following termination of the throne speech debate?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It certainly would not be the government's intention to cut off the traditional rights of hon. members to participate in the throne speech debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I have to suggest to hon. members that it is irregular to have a debate after ten o'clock.

Mr. Stanfield: Just on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I assume my hon. friend did not mean to deliberately misinterpret what I asked him. I asked him if he could not tell the house with certainty, rather than probability, what the order of business would be following termination of the throne speech debate, and the interim supply.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I repeat we expect to call interim supply immediately following the throne speech debate. I would certainly be glad to have further discussions with my hon. friends opposite regarding the order of business but we propose, as indicated, to call the legislation with respect to farm financing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This house stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

It being six minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 20, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

MESSAGES FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to inform the house that messages have been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate has appointed certain of the senators to act on joint committees of both houses, the library of parliament, the printing of parliament, and the parliamentary restaurant.

TRADE

TABLING OF WHITE PAPER ON ANTI-DUMPING

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, in English and in French, a copy of a white paper on anti-dumping. As hon. members are aware, to implement the anti-dumping code negotiated in the Kennedy round certain revisions are required to existing customs legislation. It is the government's intention to seek the approval of parliament in the near future for a separate statute dealing exclusively with the application of anti-dumping duties. The white paper is being made public at this time to provide hon. members and other interested parties with an opportunity to examine and comment on the kind of legislative provisions being contemplated to give effect to the anti-dumping code. I also suggest that the white paper be referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, as soon as the house agrees to set up this body.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short comment in this regard. It is particularly apposite that the white paper should be brought forward now. However, in view of the fact that recently the United States Senate passed a renegotiation bill which also contains provision for the repeal of the anti-dumping convention entered into by the United States, and as dumping affects Canada and the United States particularly, I think this house will want to examine this convention and the proposed legislation very carefully in light of events outside this country.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON REFERENCE RESPECTING HOSPITAL EQUIPMENT, ETC.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have tabled today copies in English and in French of the report of the tariff board on reference No. 134, together with a transcript of the evidence presented to the board at its public hearings.

Reference No. 134, equipment for hospitals and other institutions, covers items in the customs tariff which provide for the duty free entry of goods imported for hospitals, educational, scientific, religious and other institutions, and of goods imported for the benefit of afflicted or handicapped persons.

I assure the house that the board's recommendations will be considered carefully by the government. Interested parties who wish to comment on this report should do so as soon as possible.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: The house will note that on today's order paper there are some 100 public bills listed for introduction by private members. It would be difficult if not impossible for the Chair to review the provisions of each of these bills at this time. May I therefore suggest to the house that we adopt the procedure which was agreed upon by the house in several recent sessions; namely, that we proceed to the introduction and first reading of these bills so that each may be scrutinized between now and the time appointed for its second reading, in order to determine whether there be any defect therein with respect to the practices and usages of the house.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Therefore in order to save the time of the house, taking into consideration that perhaps more than two hours would be required to introduce each of these measures separately, it is suggested that by unanimous consent all the bills listed for introduction on today's order paper be deemed to have been introduced, given first reading and ordered for second reading at the next sitting of the house, subject of course to a subsequent examination as to the regularity of each bill.

Does the house agree to this procedure?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

DISCUSSION OF MATTERS RESPECTING TAX SHARING ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the existing tax sharing arrangements between Canada and the provinces expire, if I understand the agreements correctly, on March 31 next, has the Prime Minister taken any measures to invite the premiers to meet with the government of Canada to discuss what arrangements will succeed or continue after April 1 next?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am today sending a letter to the ministers of finance of the provinces inviting them to a meeting late in October. It is anticipated that we will have two meetings, one late in October and the other in December, which will deal with this and other matters.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the tax collection agreements relating to the tax sharing arrangements expire December 31 next, does the Minister of Finance not agree that it is a matter of very considerable urgency to make arrangements to carry on satisfactorily after December 31?

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. This matter will be discussed in October, which will leave two months before the agreements expire. The earliest date that I thought it would be possible to get the ministers of finance together to discuss this matter was shortly after the budget in October.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that it must be clear that all the provinces will now be preparing their estimates for the next fiscal year, how does the Minister of Finance justify leaving this question open for so long without having started negotiations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that his further supplementary question is argumentative.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BIAFRA—SUGGESTED ACTION BY UNITED NATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell the house whether the explorations to which he referred on Wednesday, with a view to bringing the urgent Biafran crisis before the United Nations, have made any progress?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the explorations are still going on. They are very difficult indeed because of the resolution of the Organization of African Unity, with which I think members of the house are familiar, in which the African countries meeting in Algiers among other things recommended that the Biafrans should lay down their arms, that the Nigerian government should observe a cease fire, and said "Please, no intervention".

It is very difficult under these circumstances to bring before the United Nations the aspect of the problem in which we as Canadians are particularly concerned, namely the humanitarian considerations, and to try to express our concern about this matter without involving ourselves in the political aspects of the dispute.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Before putting my supplementary question I express the hope that the minister will pursue these matters he has mentioned. Has it been possible to make further arrangements with the International Red Cross for Canada to supply transport planes so as to convey relief supplies to Biafra?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we are in continuous discussion with the International Red Cross to get supplies into both the Nigerian and the Biafran controlled areas. The International Red Cross is not pursuing for the moment the question of a plane because of the difficulties of flying in daytime, but just as soon as it is possible to use any transport that we can provide, it will be provided.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question. Do I understand the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be saying that Canada is reluctant to bring this matter before the United Nations to prevent the suffering and deaths of thousands of people because this country might be accused of interfering in the internal affairs of Nigeria?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, that was not what I said. I said we are very anxious to bring the matter before the United Nations but we are encountering difficulties in getting the kind of support that is necessary in the United Nations, because of the positions which have already been taken.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister say what nations have been approached and have agreed to join Canada in making representations in the United Nations along the line suggested by the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Sharp: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not catch the first words of the right hon. gentlemen's question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister advise the house as to what nations are prepared to join Canada in bringing this matter before the security council or the general assembly of the United Nations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we do not know the answer to that yet; that is the purpose of the exploratory meetings we are now having. I regret to say there is a good deal of reluctance on the part of several nations which we hope will join us in bringing this matter before the United Nations, because of the fact that they do not want to get involved in the political decision as to the form of government most suitable for Nigeria.

These nations would like us to put forward resolutions dealing with the humanitarian aspects of the problem, the relief of starvation, the relief of suffering, and the cessation of the loss of human life. This is our desire, as I am sure it is the desire of all the members of the house, and we have been taking an initiative in this matter. I hope that as many countries as possible will join us.

I should also like to say to the house that it is more difficult than might appear to us in Canada to get this kind of support because of the reluctance of many countries, including Canada, to interfere in the dispute between Nigeria and Biafra about the future form of government of that country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have one other supplementary question. What is the difference between interference in this particular case, where thousands are dying while Canada contemplates, and the position taken by Canada with regard to Rhodesia?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we did not encounter the same difficulties in the United Nations with respect to the Rhodesian question as we are encountering in the question of Nigeria.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: I can assure hon. members that this is a most delicate and difficult matter for countries which are members of the United Nations to decide how to give the most effective help to the people of Nigeria and Biafra under the present circumstances.

Mr. Dinsdale: While they die.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I may introduce my supplementary question by saying to the minister that no one questions his sincerity in the matter and that he does not need to beat his breast quite so hard.

I should like to ask him whether, in view of the fact that there is no required number of nations which must support the placing of the matter on the agenda, that it can be done by two or three as well as by 12 or 13, is he and his government prepared to ensure that this matter is placed on the agenda the moment that one other nation agrees with the notion that the humanitarian aspects of this matter should be discussed at the United Nations?

Mr. Sharp: The main purpose of putting any motion on the United Nations agenda is to get as large a degree of support as possible. I am sure the hon. member wants that too, and that is the purpose of the exploratory talks we are now having at the United Nations. It may give Canada some satisfaction to place this item on the agenda, but it will give us greater satisfaction if it has some practical result.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In another couple of weeks the Biafrans will all be dead.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): While the minister is considering this problem this morning, will he let us know what humanitarian considerations justify the latest food allocation, which by the way he announces in a press release rather than in a statement on motions, being shipped by sea rather than by air?

Mr. Sharp: Our purpose is to get as much food as possible to that area of the world as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) stated in his speech yesterday that the only way to fight poverty efficiently was to increase productivity. Therefore, is the government considering a system to distribute the present productivity, which is very high in Canada, when there is also a very large number of poor people?

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member not feel that his question is too general in nature to be asked at this time?

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Can he tell us whether he intends to announce, in the near future, the abolition or reform of the other place, according to the wishes of the present Speaker of the other place?

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could the minister tell the house whether his department is involved in the now famous Rossillon affair?

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Is the hon. Minister of Finance aware of the franc devaluation problem and, if so, will the Canadian government take some action in this regard?

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

APPOINTMENT OF CO-CHAIRMAN OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right honourable Prime Minister.

Yesterday, I asked the Prime Minister whether the delay in appointing a French co-chairman to the commission on bilingualism and biculturalism would result in slowing down the work of the commission, and the right honourable Prime Minister replied:

No, Mr. Speaker, it is only a matter of drafting.

I should like to ask the right honourable Prime Minister whether, in his mind, the drafting of the report is a secondary task which can very well do without, for the time being at least, the contribution of a French-speaking co-chairman of high calibre?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer to that question is still no, Mr. Speaker, but it is evidently related to what I said in the first part of my answer yesterday, namely that I had already discussed the matter with the co-chairman, Mr. Dunton, and I expect to appoint a very distinguished person quite soon, and that is why I thought the drafting was not delayed, considering that the report has to be published in both languages, that the thinking is still being elaborated and that the research is complete. It is now a matter of replacing the late co-chairman, but the fact that he has not been replaced yet, in my opinion, has not delayed the work of the commission.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question.

Could the Prime Minister tell the house whether he intends to appoint as co-chairman a person who is already a member of the commission?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are limited in our choice to a few people and, as far as possible, we shall appoint someone who would accept the position and who has already worked in some way with the commission, so that a newcomer will not have to become acquainted with this work which has been in progress for several years.

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Prime Minister tell us if, among the people he intends to appoint to the Laurendeau-Dunton commission, there will be some candidates defeated in the last election?

TRADE

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EXPORT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to direct this question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but in his absence perhaps the Minister of Agriculture would be prepared to answer since he is working so closely with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the growing anxiety in economic circles as to the state of Canada's wheat exports, would the minister be prepared to make a full statement on motions next week as to the amount exported this year and as to the future import commitments with other nations? Perhaps the minister might also include some comments on the Canberra talks.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The Minister of Trade and Commerce has already indicated he is going to respond to the invitation of hon. members opposite to make a statement on the subject the hon. gentleman has mentioned.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question. Would the Minister of Agriculture perhaps suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that when he makes this statement he advise the house whether the countries involved in the international wheat agreement have now signed the agreement, and whether those signatures have been ratified by the appropriate authority in each country?

TRANSPORT

INQUIRIES RESPECTING FERRY SERVICES IN MARITIMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Crossman (Westmorland-Kent): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. When will the ferry John Hamilton Gray, which is to be christened at Sorel on September 21, be put into operation between Cape Tormentine and Borden?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): It will be subjected to sea trials at once, and hopefully can be put into operation some time in October. The actual date has not been set as yet.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, on the general question of ferries. First of all may I welcome the minister back to the house following the housing conference. I hope he will be building ferries more quickly than he has been building houses.

Has the minister anything further to state to an expectant eastern Canada on the Digby-Saint John ferry which was promised in a certain election campaign, and promised unequivocally, by the Prime Minister and amplified in a press statement by the Minister of Transport? The last statement made in the house was on March 19, when the minister said that something would be coming soon.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, we are making excellent progress. As the Prime Minister said, we intend to go ahead with this project and with the terminals in preparation for the ship that will be provided by the C.P.R. I want to reassure my hon. friend, after all these years of waiting, that he can now assure his constituents that the progress is real and that it will not be too long before we will have a nice new end loading ferry there.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Will there be an item in the estimates for 1968-69 to cover the cost of new wharf facilities at both Digby and Saint John?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the estimates will be tabled very shortly. I think my hon. friend's curiosity will have to wait until then.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Nowlan: A further supplementary. Has the government signed an agreement with the C.P.R.—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Malpeque.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether his department is taking action to increase facilities on the Borden-Cape Tormentine service. The ferry now being built is to replace the Prince Edward Island, which I understand is going to be taken out of service. Therefore I would ask the minister whether he would take action to retain the Prince Edward Island in service until an additional ferry service can be provided, thus relieving the tremendous congestion on this route during the summer months?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I share my hon. friend's concern over the capability to meet the demand during the summer months. The whole question of what might be done in addition to the present capability is under active study by the department.

Mr. McCleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have had a number of supplementary questions on this general subject. I suggest we move on to another matter now.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will come back to it in due course.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

LUNENBURG, N.S.—CLOSING OF EXPRESS AND FREIGHT OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be the Minister of Transport's day because I too wish to direct a question to him. In view of the announced closing of the Canadian National express and freight traffic in Lunenburg and the effect that this action will have on our large local shipping, fishing, foundry and other industries, will the minister expedite his review of our l.c.l. freight charges in the hope that the necessary services of Lunenburg will not be removed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that this question should be placed on the order paper. Listening to the previous questions concerning a number of ferry services the impression I got was that the information given to hon. members in reply to the questions could have easily been obtained by putting the questions on the order paper.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

INCOME TAX

REPORTED AVOIDANCE PLAN BY NEWFOUNDLAND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance and ask him whether he has concluded his examination of the charges made in Canadian Petroleum magazine regarding tax evasion by the Shaheen Natural Resources Company in the province of Newfoundland. If so, is the minister prepared to take some action in this matter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the examination is not completed at this particular point. I should again point out to my hon. friend that Shaheen is not the only firm that is involved in an arrangement such as this.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question. The minister's answer demonstrates the urgency of concluding this examination. Can the minister say when he will be in a position to report to the house on this matter?

Mr. Benson: Soon, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO NATIVE PEOPLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the deplorable housing conditions being experienced by a great number of native people in Canada, particularly in the western provinces, can the Prime Minister say whether the federal government has any plans to confer with the provinces with a view to setting up a joint plan to render financial assistance in the field of Métis housing?

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF TASK FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Since the Minister of Labour in his speech yesterday said it has taken his task force two years to bring down a report dealing with the practical and academic aspects of labour problems, which report will not be ready until December, may I ask the Minister of Transport, who is at present conducting an inquiry into housing, how soon after his task is finished a report will be available.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Thirty days, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO COMBAT REGIONAL DISPARITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): My question is directed to the Prime Minister, and I hope his reply will show that the solution of the problems facing the Atlantic provinces is to be facilitated by the expeditious and efficient passage of certain business through the house. In view of the many unsolved problems facing the Atlantic area, will the Prime Minister be bringing forward legislation to cover the establishment of a new department that will combat regional economic disparities, so that our people will have some idea of the plans the government has for their area?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government reorganization bill is on the order paper; when discussing that bill we shall discuss the new department.

[Later:]

Mr. Trudeau: I wish to apologize to the hon. member to whom I said a few minutes ago that the government reorganization bill is on the order paper. It will be on the order paper soon. It was mentioned in the speech from the throne, and I discussed it in my speech during the address in reply.

Mr. Woolliams: That was the reading of the will.

Mr. Trudeau: It will be on the order paper very soon.

Mr. Coates: Will the Prime Minister assure the house that as soon as the bill is placed on the order paper it will be given priority in being brought before the house, so the people of our area may learn what the government plans to do in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, it will be one of our priority bills, Mr. Speaker, but it is important that the house understand that many of the things we intend to do are being done now. The government reorganization bill will bring about certain legal changes but the department, under its present name, is already beginning to do the kinds of things that will be done later.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIVE OF HOUSEWIVES ON ADVISORY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): My question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In making his appointments to the consumer advisory council will he consider including representation of the millions of practising housewives of Canada?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DISTRIBUTION TO UNIVERSITIES OF ALLEGED IMMORAL LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): I wish to address my question to the Postmaster General. I have given him notice of it. In view of the information placed on the record of the Senate yesterday with respect to the distribution of filthy and immoral literature in our universities, will the minister investigate the responsibilities of his department in this matter and take appropriate action?

Hon. Eric Kierans (Postmaster General): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR AVIATION FIRM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax): My question is directed to the Minister of Defence Production. Can the minister advise the house whether the government has any current plan to deal with the critically serious situation in which the Fairey Aviation plant finds itself, near H.M.C.S. Shearwater?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is difficult for me to know how urgent the matter is to which the hon. member has referred, but I presume the question could be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, may I draw to your attention that this is one of our largest, most sophisticated and complex industries and any losses in such an industry would bring about a most serious situation. I feel greatly concerned about the matter.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION OF HEADQUARTERS BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is directed to the Secretary of State. Since a precise schedule for the construction of Place Radio Canada in Montreal was announced last May by the Secretary of State, I think, what is the reason for the further delay of one month in opening tenders?

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not acceptable.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO MEET UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): In the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of a suggestion in the throne speech and from remarks made in this chamber that the manpower training program is expected to offset or deal with any added unemployment that may arise this winter.

I ask the right hon. gentleman whether he does not consider that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration ought to make a statement to this house, perhaps during the course of the throne speech debate, to indicate what additional plans are being processed by the manpower department to deal with increased unemployment this winter.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will discuss this matter with the minister, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): I should like to address a question to the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration and ask him what program is being devised to take the place of the winter works program which has been discontinued, bearing in mind that the number of places available to Canadian manpower centres in Ontario under the retraining scheme has been cut from more than 800 to 455.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): I have reason to believe I am the acting minister. I think it was announced on a couple of occasions last year that the winter works program would be abandoned this year. This was not news—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It was announced. Possibly some hon. members were not here, but it was announced that the program would be changed and that there would be something new. This is what I recall. Maybe hon. gentlemen opposite can check the record—

Mr. Stanfield: We will.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Do that, and I will do the same. Our intention was to increase the amount of training during that period. Remember, this program was not introduced in order to help the municipalities but to improve the employment position during winter time.

Mr. Rynard: Why then has the number of places been cut from over 800 to around 400? Why has this been done if the program is intended to increase training opportunities?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I would have to inquire into that aspect; it is a matter of agreement between the federal government and the provincial government of Ontario.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since a number of municipalities have asked that this matter be referred to a standing committee of this house so they might appear and make representations, may I ask whether this request will be considered by the government?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy to refer this question to the minister concerned.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Was the decision to cancel the winter works program, as indicated by the minister in his statement a few moments ago, relayed earlier to the municipal governments concerned in order that they could plan accordingly?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, we do not negotiate directly with municipalities.

Last year, when I was Minister of Manpower and Immigration, I met the responsible ministers in the various provinces, and together we looked into the possibility of changing this program which everybody considered inadequate and which was open to great abuse. All provinces were in favour of an amendment of the plan, although we did not have time to agree on an amending or alternative program.

[English]

Mr. Russell H. MacEwan (Central Nova): May I ask the minister why the government did not consult the special committee on winter works which I believe was set up at the request of the government itself—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SHIPBUILDING

INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACT FOR COASTGUARD VESSEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport concerning the subject of our coastguard and shipbuilding. Some three months ago the minister announced plans to replace the 56 year old Canadian coastguard vessel Estevan. At that time he announced that he expected a contract for a new vessel to be let within two months. I should like to know whether that contract has now been let. If not, when can we expect action on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My interpretation of the rules is that this type of question ought to be on the order paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister advise the house whether he will be tabling further supplementary estimates before the presentation of the budget?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board is responsible for the tabling of estimates. I think he will be tabling the blue book of estimates before the budget.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Then may I direct my supplementary question to the appropriate minister and may I ask him when it is anticipated that the revised blue book is to be tabled?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we hope to do this as soon as the rules of the house permit, which is on the first supply day after the conclusion of the address in reply.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. gentleman will concede that nothing in the rules prevents the tabling of the blue book. It is the presentation of individual estimates that is prohibited.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF BILINGUAL BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in view of the numerous telephone calls which I have received recently from members of the house and public servants, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Can he tell the house whether he intends to give the bonus for bilingualism to employees in all the departments of the public service and in the House of Commons and, if so, when?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am taking note of the question, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

EXPO '67

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING MONTREAL SHARE OF DEFICIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. What negotiations or discussions have taken place with city of Montreal officials with respect to that city's outstanding debt of $36 million concerning Expo financial arrangements?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Expo corporation is under the purview of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. May I take this question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTIVITY REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. Considering the critical situation of the Canadian groundfish industry can the minister advise the house when the Winspear productivity report may be expected. Will this report be tabled in the house?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): May I take this question as notice? I shall answer the hon. member as soon as I can.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the seriousness of this situation I should like to ask the minister whether plans are contemplated for interim arrangements to relieve the hardship faced by the Atlantic fishermen while the long term plans are awaited.

Mr. Davis: As the hon. member knows, there is a deficiency payment program under way at the present time; it is currently under review to determine the extent to which it will be continued through the fall months.

Mr. Lundrigan: Is the minister able to tell us when we shall be given some indication of the long term plans contemplated by the government?

Mr. Davis: Shortly, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTED PRESENCE OF RUSSIAN VESSELS OFF B.C. COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Richard J. J. Durante (Comox-Alberni): I wish to direct this question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister received reports during the current fishing season of Russian trawlers fishing off the west coast of British Columbia within the established 12 mile limit?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to remind the hon. member that it is not in order to ask simply whether a report or correspondence has been received by a minister or a department.

AIR CANADA

WINNIPEG—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING USE OF OVERHAUL BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): May I address a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him whether discussions are being held at the present time between his department and the government of Manitoba with respect to the continued use of the overhaul base of Air Canada at Winnipeg, so the bulk of the employees there can be assured of continued work in Winnipeg.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The committee which was established some years ago is actively studying the alternatives which have been proposed or which are available to us, and I hope its deliberations can be concluded quite soon. A number of proposals are before the committee, and I hope it will not be too long before some conclusions are reached.

Mr. Orlikow: The minister says he hopes the study will be completely shortly. Will the result of the study be made public, and is Air Canada being consulted so there will not be a continued difference of opinion between the government and that organization as there seems to have been up to now?

Mr. Hellyer: Air Canada have been directly involved in this study, particularly in recent months, and I am sure they will be completely in accord with the solution reached, when we can get a solution which is acceptable to all the parties involved.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR DIRECT LOANS FOR CONDOMINIUM HOUSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as minister in charge of housing. In view of the reluctance and even refusal of financial institutions such as insurance companies, trust companies and banks to invest money in mortgages for condominium housing, would the minister consider making available direct mortgage loans to builders of such homes in order to help solve the housing crisis?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): If my memory serves me correctly some loans have been made to condominiums by private lenders, and I hope there will be more made available in the future. Many people feel that the condominium type of housing accommodation is one of the ways of achieving lower cost housing and every effort will be made to persuade private lenders to put some of their funds into this particular type of housing. I can assure the hon. member of this.

If we are unsuccessful, and if at anytime in the future there is money available for direct loans, we would naturally wish to assist this field of the market as well as the others.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED MISAPPLICATION OF HOUSING FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The minister responsible for Indian affairs looks rather comfortable this morning. May I ask whether he is in a position to reply to the question I asked him a couple of days ago regarding the situation at the Eskasoni Indian reserve, a question which I thought was a proper one to direct to a privy councillor.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have already considered this problem. The problem of housing for Indians is very complex and as far as the Eskasoni Indian reserve is concerned, we are now trying to relocate all the houses in one spot where we will be able to set up an adequate sewage system. We are giving priority to this project.

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall recognize the hon. member in a moment.

[English]

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not immediately identify the question to which the hon. member referred. I had the impression that it was not in order. In any event it has been answered, but there should not be a supplementary with regard to it.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): On a point of order, this was taken by some to be a facetious and amusing question, but it should be regarded seriously. Let us see some action, not just lip service to the Indian people on the part of the government.

Mr. Speaker: I realized that the question was of a serious nature, but I had the impression it was the type of question which should normally be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): There is urgency.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

REPRESENTATION TO U.S. RESPECTING ANTI-DUMPING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Finance is prompted only by his projected absence for two weeks. Could he tell the house, in the remote possibility that we will be considering the white paper he tabled this morning, whether the Canadian government has made representations to the administration in the United States concerning the implications of the Senate action with regard to the anti-dumping convention?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I will have to take this question as notice. Since I shall not be here next week I will have my parliamentary secretary answer it.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO TAX BENEFITS TO NEW FIRMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but since I see he is not here I shall address it to his parliamentary secretary. Is it correct that the Canadian government provides special tax benefits to new firms in the defence production industry and, if so, are these benefits greater than those to firms engaged in other types of production?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the order paper.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO USE OF HOVERCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has his department or the government reached a decision concerning whether hovercraft should be used to solve some of our transportation problems not only in Atlantic Canada but in other parts of Canada as well?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member would not agree that this is a question concerning general policy the answer to which should be sought by a question on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—U.S. KNOWLEDGE OF CANADIAN POSITION ON BOMBING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Prime Minister in view of his repeated statements to the effect that the bombing of North Viet Nam must cease immediately and totally during the Paris peace talks. Is this government policy on this matter?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The government's policy on this matter has been stated repeatedly by my predecessor. It is that the bombing should cease once the peace talks would begin in Paris. The government hesitates to tell any one side what it should do. We hope the parties are negotiating in good faith and will achieve results. It should be wrong to intervene in these peace talks to tell one side what it should do.

Mr. Harding: Has this policy been conveyed officially to the government of the United States?

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, September 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Eymard Corbin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Prime Minister is leaving the chamber, I sent a message to his office this morning asking whether he would be good enough to remain in the chamber because I intend to refer to him a number of times in my speech, and I believe it is always fair to let a member know about this in advance. I have done so. However, if the Prime Minister decides that he is not able to remain in the chamber, that of course is his business.

During the election campaign and since we have heard a great deal about the just society. The Canadian people are now interested in knowing what steps the government intends to take so that Canada will become a more just society than it is today. I believe we in this chamber should ask ourselves what conditions should be corrected so that in Canada we may have a more just society than we have ever had before. I think all members of this house and all Canadians would agree that poverty is something which cannot be tolerated in any society which calls itself just. I believe the Prime Minister and all members of the Government would agree that a society that did not do its utmost to remove poverty from within its midst could not deem itself to be a just society.

In recent weeks, through reading the report of the Economic Council of Canada, we have learned a good deal about the question of poverty. The chapter devoted to this contains 37 pages. The question of poverty was dealt with in great detail. The report describes poverty in Canada today as a national disgrace. I was very interested to hear the Prime Minister agree with this opinion. He has said he agrees that poverty in Canada today is a national disgrace.

From this report we have learned a number of important things. We have learned first of all that there are 4,200,000 Canadians living in poverty in Canada at this very time. The report describes the conditions in which these 4,200,000 people are living in the following terms: the sour atmosphere of poor health, bad housing, accumulated defeat, alienation and despair, a sense of helplessness and entrapment. It says this is often disguised because it does not invariably go in rags and can pass unnoticed.

Second, the report tells us about the incomes received by the people of Canada who are living in conditions of poverty. It refers to single people earning less than $1,500 a year, married people with two children earning less than $2,500 a year, married people with three children earning less than $3,000 a year, married people with four children earning less than $3,500 a year and married people with five children earning less than $4,000 a year.

Third, we are told that poverty is not usually to be found only in those locations which we have learned to consider as depressed areas. It tells us that poverty is spread fairly evenly across this country. A great deal of it is found in the large metropolitan centres of the country which usually are considered to be affluent areas.

Fourth, we are told that the majority of the people who live in conditions of poverty today are not unemployed but are employed for the most part in the following industries: laundries, tanneries, lumber mills, clothing factories, hotels, restaurants, taverns, dry cleaning establishments, the retail trade, the shoe industry, the box factories and woollen mills.

Fifth, we are told that most of these people who are suffering from poverty today are working for the minimum wages that are established by the federal government and the provincial governments for the industries which come under their jurisdiction. Those who have read the report are left with no doubt that the people who are suffering from poverty today will be raised from that condition only if these minimum wages are increased, and increased adequately now.

• (12 noon)

I should like to give hon. members an example of why these minimum wages should be increased at the present time. The minimum wage in respect of industry under federal jurisdiction was last raised on July 1, 1965 to $1.25 per hour. Since this increase the cost of living has risen by 12 per cent. I was not a member of the house when the last increase in the minimum wage in industries under federal jurisdiction came into effect but I assume that the members of the house who discussed this matter then satisfied themselves that a wage of $1.25 per hour was adequate to lift the people who receive such a wage out of the realm of poverty and above the poverty line. As the cost of living has increased by 12 per cent since that wage increase went into effect it is obvious that these wages are at least 12 per cent too low today. The same applies to wages which fall within provincial jurisdiction. These minimum wages vary across the country between $1 and $1.25 per hour and are as low as 80 cents an hour for women.

As we all know, those employees in Canada who come under union agreements have their wage agreements examined and negotiated with their employers usually every two years. These negotiations always result in substantial increases and increased fringe benefits, so those people who work in these industries are provided for adequately. That is the way it should be.

On the other hand, one-fifth of the workers across this country work for minimum wages and they do not have anyone to bargain for them. They have no one to go to their employers and demand an increase in wages to compensate for any increase in the cost of living. They have no one to negotiate the same type of health insurance plans and retirement plans that organized workers receive as a result of negotiations by their union representatives. This one-fifth of the working population is weak and unorganized and they are forced to work for these minimum wages because of health problems, lack of education or lack of skills.

The only way that such workers can have their needs adequately taken care of when from time to time the cost of living goes up, as has been the case during the past five years since this government came into office—18 per cent in five years, the greatest increase in any five-year period in Canada's history—is by the senior government in the land giving this matter serious consideration year by year. When the time arrives, as it does each two years in the case of organized workers, the government should increase the minimum wages paid to employees in industries that come under federal jurisdiction. This increase should be related to the negotiated increase on behalf of union employees in unionized industries across Canada.

The way to bring about a satisfactory wage increase for those who work for minimum wages across this country is for the federal government to decide what kind of an increase should be paid and then bring to this house a recommendation for an increase in the minimum wage. I am sure such a measure would be quickly passed by the members of this house.

Once this has been accomplished the Prime Minister should call together the provincial premiers, outline what the federal government has done and urge as strongly as possible that the provincial governments should follow suit. This is the only way that the weak and unorganized workers of this country can receive an adequate wage so as not to fall within the realm of poverty, the position in which one-fifth of the workers in this country find themselves at the present time.

We in this house have never shown any reluctance to increase our own wages. A few years ago we in fact doubled our wages. We increased our wages from $8,000 and $2,000 expenses per year to $12,000 and $6,000 expenses per year. This in fact doubled the wage we received at that time. There was no reluctance on the part of any member of this house or on the part of any government member in suggesting that these wages should be increased. Let me add that there is apparently no reluctance on the part of the government, when Liberal members are defeated, immediately to give them good jobs in various parts of the country so that they will not suffer.

It is incumbent upon us at this time to look very carefully at the needs of those in this country who look to us for help, particularly when one-fifth of our working population is living in conditions of poverty. It would not cost the taxpayers of the federal or provincial governments one cent to increase these minimum wages. Such action would simply require the employers who pay minimum wages to pay those who work for them a living wage. There may be some who will say that if we do that we will automatically cause an increase in the cost of goods and services provided by those industries which employ people at minimum wages. I am sure that every member of this house will agree that no Canadian has the right to receive cheap goods or cheap services as a result of paying inadequate wages to that one-fifth of our working population who must then live in poverty.

The Prime Minister has agreed with the report of the Economic Council of Canada and its statement that poverty in this country is a national disgrace. The Prime Minister had this to say about poverty as recorded on page 68 of Hansard:

> —we must define, with as much clarity as possible, the essential components of a minimum standard for satisfactory living—not a subsistence standard but one which allows for dignity and decency.

• (12:10 p.m.)

The Prime Minister also said at another point that they did not need the report of the Economic Council to make them aware of the poverty because they had known about it for a long time. In other words the knowledge about poverty which the Economic Council of Canada made available to Canadians was in the hands of the government and the Prime Minister a long time ago. I am sure, judging by his remarks in this regard, that he knew all about this situation when he became the leader of the government five months ago. Therefore he had adequate opportunity to prepare a practical program for combatting poverty in this country.

With this background I had great hopes that the Prime Minister would tell us what steps he intended to take immediately to make it possible to eradicate poverty in Canada. It was with this hope that I asked him the following question in the House of Commons on Friday last. The question is recorded in Hansard at page 16 and reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Since the Prime Minister has stated that he agrees with the finding of the Economic Council of Canada that poverty in Canada is a national disgrace, and since the commission has reported that a great deal of this poverty occurs because people who are working are not receiving sufficient wages to enable them to bring up their families in decency and reasonable comfort, do the Prime Minister and the government intend in the very near future to increase the minimum wage as it applies to industries under federal jurisdiction, particularly as this would be an incentive or an example to the provincial governments?

This question came as quite a surprise to the Prime Minister, judging by his answer, because he obviously had not given any thought to such a suggestion and passed the buck to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). The Minister of Labour, as could be seen by his hesitation in answering the question, was equally taken aback and answered as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour is always conscious—

Then there was a long pause.

> —of the needs of the working man in this country, and will give consideration to the suggestion of the hon. member.

Members of this house know perfectly well that when a minister of this government tells you a matter is under consideration it means it is something he has not thought about. He feels it would not be wise to refuse to do it but he really has no intention of ever doing anything about it. I tell the 106 new members of the house never to become carried away when a minister tells them he will give their suggestions consideration, because it means that as far as the minister is concerned the suggestion is dead.

I think the Minister of Labour did mean what he said. I believe he would like to do this because he is a humane man who has had great experience with the working people of this country and realizes the need for increasing minimum wages at this time to make it possible for the 4,200,000 people living in poverty to rise above the poverty line. I believe he would like to raise the minimum wage paid to workers in industries under federal jurisdiction. But he will not be allowed to do so because, in his next answer to me, the Prime Minister laid down the party line for action in this regard. Mr. Speaker, you and I know that the members of this cabinet not only are not allowed to speak outside cabinet but I am told they are not even allowed to speak inside cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: There is only one speaker in cabinet, the Prime Minister, and the 27 little helpers he has for window-dressing are becoming known as the silent 27. Therefore the idea of raising the minimum wage paid to workers in industries under federal jurisdiction will not be considered by this government. I then asked the Prime Minister this supplementary question:

Does the Prime Minister in the very near future intend to call a conference with the provincial premiers to discuss this very vital problem?

His answer was:

The question asked by the hon. member is one relating to wages, costs, prices and incomes.

Now here comes the party line. This is the policy of the Liberal government for combatting inflation. I remind hon. members that this is the government that pledged itself to instituting the just society. The Prime Minister continued his answer in this way:

Our attack seeks to ensure that inflation will be curtailed in Canada. We believe this will be the best attack on the problem.

There it is. It is very easy to understand; there are no complications. That is the plan laid down by no less a person than the Prime Minister. I have no objection and nobody in Canada, of course, could have any objection to the Prime Minister saying that the government is going to take steps to curtail inflation. Heaven knows, inflation needs to be curtailed by the government because they are responsible for the greatest inflation this country has ever known.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: This government increased expenditures in five years from the $6.5 billion that we were spending when we went out of office to $10.5 billion today. They have increased the cost of living by their spending, their policy with regard to wages and a great many other things which I have described in this house before and will take great pleasure describing again in the near future.

This government is responsible for increasing inflation by no less than 18 per cent in five years, slightly more than an average of 3½ per cent a year. Inflation of this size must be curtailed. We have been urging the government for the past three years to take specific steps to curtail inflation and, as everybody knows, they have done nothing. It is interesting to hear the Prime Minister now take a new interest in the matter—several years too late.

Let us examine the Prime Minister's solution to the problem of poverty in this country, and specifically curtailing inflation as a means of banishing poverty. He said that was what he was going to do. Nothing more, nothing less; that was it. Let us examine how effective he will be. The Prime Minister is a student of economics. He knows perfectly well that in the 54 years since the Dominion Bureau of Statistics first kept track of the yearly increases in inflation, in 1913, inflation has increased every year with the exception of the ten years of the great depression. Normally inflation increases year by year.

The average yearly increase over those 54 years has been very close to 2 per cent. At the present time it is increasing at nearly double that rate, 3½ per cent a year. If the Prime Minister can reduce the rate of increase of inflation from the present 3½ per cent a year to the 54-year average of 2 per cent a year, then poverty in this country will increase by only 2 per cent a year. The Prime Minister's plan for fighting inflation simply means that poverty will not only remain in this country but will increase by somewhere between the 2 per cent a year, which has been the average increase every year for 54 years, and 3½ per cent a year.

Let us for a moment look at the government's attitude in those cases where people working for a living have been strongly organized and represented by those who could put economic pressure on the government. Let us go back two years and consider the case of the Montreal dock workers' strike, the threatened C.B.C. strike, and the situation of the St. Lawrence seaway workers. What did the government do at that time? Did they say to those people: No, we are not going to authorize any increase in wages? They certainly did not say that. These people were strong; they were in a position to tie up the industry of the country. They had the government where they wanted them. The government had allowed themselves to be put in that position.

So the government said they would settle those labour disputes by giving the workers not 10 or 15 per cent but 30 per cent. The seaway workers and the C.B.C employees got 30 per cent without going on strike. The C.N.R. employees settled a little later for about 24 per cent, and although at the present time the government is not settling strikes for 30 per cent it is doing so at very close to 20 per cent increases. Those who are well organized and strong get just about anything they want because of the fact they are organized and strong, and those who are weak and are forced to work for minimum wages in unorganized industries in various parts of this country, those who cannot bring economic pressure to bear on the government, are told that even though there has been a 12 per cent increase in the cost of living since they last received a raise in 1965, the government will not give them an increase now and will not even give them any indication that they will ever get one at any time in the future. Because these people are weak and cannot bring force to bear on the government, they will get nothing.

I asked the Prime Minister whether he would consider raising the minimum wage and he said no. He said, "our approach, which we think is a far better one, will be to curtail inflation". Therefore he will try to allow inflation to increase at somewhere between 2 and 3½ per cent per year.

We have now seen what this government's attitude is toward the weak. This is the attitude of the Prime Minister who said he will bring in a just society. It has been made very clear that this government's compassion toward its fellow Canadians is in direct proportion to their strength. If you are strong you get plenty of action from this government, but if you are weak you get absolutely nothing. That is what the Prime Minister said in effect when he laid down his policy for dealing with poverty in this country. The Prime Minister said he is not willing to take the necessary steps to eradicate poverty in our midst. He said he is willing to try to stop it from increasing at too fast a rate, and what he will do is to make sure inflation increases no more than between 2 and 3½ per cent a year.

It is clear that the just society about which the Prime Minister spoke all across Canada, at shopping plazas and on television and radio, will have a built-in poverty which will increase year by year. Not only will it not disappear but it will not decrease; in fact it will increase. This is the kind of just society about which the Prime Minister has been talking for the last six months. This is the kind of plan he is putting forward. This is his idea of compassion for those who are weak. He says in effect that if you are strong you get what you want because you are strong, but if you are weak, you get nothing. That is this man's idea of compassion, decency and consideration for his fellow human beings, for the 4,200,000 who are living in a state of poverty at the present time. It is very clear that the just society about which the Prime Minister spoke is nothing more than a slogan to win elections.

We all heard him talk about the just society all across the country and we could feel his heart bleeding for those poor people who are subjugated to a state of poverty. We could just see the blood that poured out of his heart running all over the place. This is the man who says he will give Canadians a better deal, a more humane deal, the man who claims he is compassionate toward those who cannot look after themselves. Perhaps this man will bring in some constitutional reforms, which are sorely needed, but I can tell you that those 4,200,000 people—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but it appears his time has expired, unless he has the unanimous agreement of the house to continue.

Mr. Hees: Will you allow me one more minute, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Dinsdale: This is a good speech. Please continue.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Hees: We have seen, in all its threadbare reality and all its nakedness, exactly what this just society will be. I say to the house and to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the policy of the government and of the Prime Minister for dealing with poverty, as I have described it and as the Prime Minister described it in his answer to me a week ago, is a sample of the government's approach to a problem which the Prime Minister himself agrees is a national disgrace, if it is a sample of the Prime Minister's compassion for those in this country who are weak and cannot look after themselves, if it is a sample of his integrity toward those people who voted for him in the last election because they believed that in reality he was going to produce a just society, then God help this country.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to join in the unanimous chorus of congratulations to you, sir, on your re-election to your high and important office and also couple with that my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply. As you know, at the opening of the last session I was given the honour of moving the address in reply, and I can appreciate fully what an important milestone it is in the life of any new parliamentarian.

I have been impressed by the vigour and the degree of participation in this debate, by the vigour more this morning than on previous occasions, and I must say that I find myself on all fours with the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the comments he made the other day on his birthday. Since I entered this house I have been constantly aware of the peculiar kind of kinship that exists among all of us who have chosen this road of public service and which prevails even despite our party loyalties and our sometimes strongly held partisan feelings. I believe that the level of activity in this debate is a good omen, and I hope that on all important matters hon. members, regardless of where they happen to sit in this house, will exercise their best and most objective judgment.

I want to say a word about the speeches made by the leaders of the three parties in this house on the opposite side. I was most impressed with the contribution of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). As I listened to him and noted the barbs being flung in our direction I felt somewhat like the missionary who, describing an occasion when he was nailed to a tree by the spears of savage natives, was asked if it hurt and replied, "only when I laughed."

• (12:30 p.m.)

In the case of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), the impression is growing on me that the most appropriate title for this worthy gentleman, and I am sure he will not mind my saying so, is that he has become the smiling cobra of the commons. He has a benign, quiet and friendly approach right up to the very instant before he strikes. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that he has long been, as he well knows, one of my favourite debaters. I am pleased to say, too, that he is one of my close friends. When I refer to his contribution to the debate I can do so best by paraphrasing the familiar expression that, where he is concerned, when attack is inevitable I am quite content to relax and enjoy it.

In so far as the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) is concerned, he must surely be a most unusual member of this house. I noted during his contribution to the debate that there were a great many English speaking members of the house who appeared to be understanding everything he was saying without the aid of translation. I feel that he is demonstrating more and more that an understanding of the language is not always necessary for effective communication. If he would not mind, I would even suggest that perhaps he would be a worthy subject for study by the commission on bilingualism and biculturalism because in his person we may have a solution to many of the serious problems of communication.

Having made these quite sincere statements to the gentlemen opposite, I find it a little bit difficult now to make any criticisms.

Mr. Lewis: Now, how do you insult?

Mr. Jamieson: Exactly; I do not propose to spend too much time in any essentially negative approach. These three gentlemen, having criticized the Speech from the Throne for its lack of newness and imagination, themselves trotted out all the standard clichés. I suppose if one went back over the last several sessions of this house one could find some similarity in the rebuttals of the opposition leaders. One could really say, therefore, there is nothing of any significance or what I might describe as constructive criticism in what has been said. It may be argued that this is not the role of the opposition.

I should like to turn for a moment to the problems of Newfoundland, but I shall not deal with them in any narrow perspective. I would have to say that those members from my own province who have spoken have adopted much the same approach. I give them the fullest possible marks for sincerity and for being deeply conscientious about the problems of the Atlantic region. They are, like me, first and foremost Newfoundlanders. In dealing with some of the comments that have been made about our approach to the question of regional disparity, I hope I can do so in a constructive manner, without being overly critical or generating what I regard as the useless antagonisms that have on many occasions in the past made it difficult to achieve any meaningful advances.

Let me emphasize once again that I think the immediate importance of the problems of regional disparity are not exclusively those of Newfoundland. However, I believe that by examining what has been happening in that island province, where we have made mistakes and where some of the programs that have been implemented over the years have been failures, it should be possible, as the Speech from the Throne suggests and as some hon. members on the opposite side have suggested, for us to take a hard look at the whole picture. We should be examining the possibility of integrating all the different schemes that have been devised on an ad hoc basis over the years. We should be bringing these programs into some kind of focus which will result in permanent advancement and improvement.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has said that the government, and I presume he was going back to 1949, has been guilty of shameful neglect of the problems of Newfoundland and the Atlantic region. Let me emphasize that I am not going to argue his statement of conditions that exist. I do suggest, however, that the charge of shameful neglect is not one that can stand on all fours with the facts of the case. I doubt very much that he can argue too strongly against my proposition because he was a supporter of a government which did a great deal, I am ready to concede, for the Atlantic region. Since that time other programs have been implemented and have been added to those which were introduced in those years and previously. I believe, therefore, that the sum total of aid that has been advanced to the Atlantic region, in the case of Newfoundland since 1949, is really quite impressive.

One has only to look, for example, at the numerous benefits to our province that have resulted from the completion of the trans-Canada highway at a very great cost. One has only to total all the contributions that have been made over the years, one way and another, to bolster and support the fishing industry. There have been any number of other projects, some of general application to all Canadians all over this nation, and others that have applied to the Atlantic area alone or even to Newfoundland expressly. The truth of the matter is that in the case of Newfoundland, since 1949 right through until now, nearly 20 years, the real indictment of these programs, the real indictment of administrations at the federal level whatever their party colouration, is that they have not succeeded, despite these fantastic expenditures relatively speaking, in curing the essential and basic problems.

A case in point is one which my hon. friends opposite have talked about in this house and outside on a number of occasions. It is something which will be almost totally foreign, I believe, to other parts of the nation except Newfoundland and the Atlantic region. I refer to the salt subsidy program. I should like to dwell on this for a moment because it is illustrative, it seems to me, of the kind of thing that we ought not to be doing and perhaps ought not to have been doing over the past number of years. This salt subsidy program is a federal contribution to a particular provincial problem, a regional problem. The program was introduced for one year 15 years ago to deal with a specific and unique development within the fishing industry. It was clearly stated at that time, and everyone understood, that it was not to be an ongoing program. Yet 15 years later, the program is still in existence because when we arrived at each new fall season and made an assessment of the fishing season someone said that was not the year to cancel it. The program was designed for a very special purpose and in fact it was really disguised welfare. It has been larded on year after year for a period of 15 years.

We have expended, I suppose, in excess of $10 million on this program in a period of 15 years. I do not know the exact figure without looking up the records but it must be in that neighbourhood. This amount has been paid out in dribs and drabs over the years, so that after 15 years we find hon. gentlemen opposite able to claim that the cancellation of the program amounts to a near death blow to Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces' fishing industry. Even conceding the seriousness of the withdrawal for a moment, the really significant point is that the amount involved here, if my hon. friends are right and it makes the difference between security and the lack of it for the Newfoundland fisherman, is not much more than $350,000.

An hon. Member: That is a great deal of money.

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. member for St. John's East stated that there were about 150,000 people engaged in the Newfoundland fishing industry. I suggest that may be something of an exaggeration, but that is beside the point. If $350,000 spread over a group of 150,000 people, either directly or indirectly, is going to have such an effect, it is clearly indicative of the fact the program has failed. I say, therefore, we must look quickly at the alternative. I quite agree it is not enough simply to carve off programs that are demonstrably inefficient. You have to provide alternatives. I do say to those gentlemen, and to members in this house in general, that it serves no useful purpose to continue with this kind of dribs and drabs contribution when after 15 years we find the program is not really making a significant contribution to the protection or improvement of the fishing industry.

There are two other aspects of the program that are wrong that I should like to mention. I merely use this example to illustrate once again why it is so important that we have, as the throne speech suggests, a detailed re-examination of a great many programs. One of the difficulties or shortcomings of the salt rebate program is that the more fish a man catches the more salt he is going to use. The more salt he uses, the greater the rebate he is going to receive. The conclusion is surely obvious, therefore, that the man who needs it least gets the largest rebate in a great many cases because he does have a substantial catch to sell.

The second point is that because of the structure of the program, which was set up on an interim one year basis, no one has really had the courage to say, surely we should halt this subsidy. The third point is that a very substantial part of the moneys given under this program, the withdrawal of which hon. gentlemen call a death blow, goes to the business community. While I am not suggesting for one moment that the fishing trade or business community is not entitled to consideration, let me assure you, gentlemen, that my heart is not bleeding for those people. If $500,000 or $600,000 or $700,000 is going to be given to the Newfoundland fisheries, then let it go to the primary producers, particularly in this case and indeed in many other cases as well.

I have taken a fair amount of time to discuss this matter, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is typical of the sort of band-aid solutions, as I have called them, applied by successive governments. If hon. gentlemen opposite are being critical of this administration, then let us have the same kind of criticism made of those who were in office up until 1963.

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, and in fact a little puzzled, by the extent to which my hon. friends opposite from Newfoundland made the welkin ring over the cancellation of the winter works program. Here again is another of those examples of why we need to rethink these schemes. If these hon. gentlemen opposite had bothered to look at the details and the facts that are readily available to them, they would have discovered that in the last year of this program, that is, the 1967-68 season, out of an amount in excess of $20 million provided from federal funds for this program the absolute maximum total of funds spent in Newfoundland was $135,000. This, Mr. Speaker, out of more than $20 million.

Furthermore, if they observe how the rest of the money was spent they might also discover that the largest proportion of it went into the large metropolitan areas. I am prepared to concede that the big cities do have a different kind of problem, and my argument, therefore, at this point is not whether the winter works program was a good idea. But in the case of Newfoundland it is clearly evident that it was not worth the powder to blow it to Hades—$135,000 expended, spread over a period of five or six months. For the most part the municipalities merely shifted necessary works from one month to another, thus in totality generating no new employment at all.

Another defect in the program, if one takes a look at it as a regional development concept, is that the smaller the municipality, the less the funds for it to meet its share of the over-all expenditure. If hon. members would like to look at the figures they would find that in one place after another in Newfoundland amounts of $1,000 or $500 were spent, all small amounts with the possible exception of the city of St. John's. But essentially the weakness of the program was our inability to take advantage of it because of the failure on the part of the municipalities to find their share of the money.

It seems to me that when we talk of Newfoundland and of Atlantic Canada it is simple, easy and routine to get up and ask why we do not put more money into a project here or a project there, or to damn and criticize the government when it withdraws programs such as those I have mentioned. For Newfoundland and I suspect for all of Atlantic Canada—and it may be equally true in other non-urban regions of the country—the real necessity now is to examine all of the things that are being done, because in total they are most impressive.

As the throne speech suggests, Mr. Speaker, we must make some hard decisions both at this level and at the provincial level. We must examine the priorities that are available to us. Here again there is no better example of this than another of those emotion charged issues in which Newfoundlanders appear to delight. I refer to the decision to withdraw the Canadian National Railways passenger service in Newfoundland. I have to emphasize, as I have emphasized to some hon. gentlemen opposite, the necessity for me to avoid any flat-out or positive stand on this question, pending an appeal which may be made to the governor in council and in which I may have to participate. But that does not prohibit me from dealing with the matter in a general way and from making certain observations.

As a Newfoundlander there is nothing I should like better than to see this passenger train retained, though not because it is of any particular use to me. I do not travel on the Newfoundland railway very often, no more, I suspect, than most hon. gentlemen opposite who make the welkin ring with their protests.

This is something that we in Newfoundland must face, Mr. Speaker, and I think this provides a good example. In fact, we must come to it in all Atlantic Canada, in all of the so-called have-not and depressed areas of this country. We must ask ourselves this question with regard to the railways. The subsidy for the railway passenger service at the moment is in the region of many hundreds of thousands of dollars annually. There is no question, even in the minds of those who wish to see the railway retained, that this subsidy or operating loss will go even higher. Therefore we have to ask ourselves whether, if this subsidy is going to be employed, is this the best way in which to spend it? Or, in light of current technological development and improvements in other modes of transport, is the railway an anachronism that we can no longer afford when our other requirements are taken into account?

In all of this, Mr. Speaker, I am qualifying what I say by emphasizing my own contention, which is well known to gentlemen opposite, that should it become a question of abandonment the personnel involved must be completely and totally protected. We should not permit them to become the victims of some technological change. But stated baldly, if it did come to a choice—and these choices are going to come to us more and more in the years ahead, and for a number of reasons—between seeing a federal expenditure of $1 million or more pumped annually into keeping the train going or taking that $1 million and using it perhaps somewhere within the jurisdiction of St. John's East for a good regional development program, then what would be the choice? That is the sort of question we have to decide.

This summer, Mr. Speaker, I travelled throughout part of my own riding on a coastal boat. We steamed 20 miles in one direction and 20 miles back in a fairly large coastal vessel to deliver one package to an isolated community.

Mr. McGrath: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Jamieson: My hon. friend applauds that. This is precisely what I mean and it is precisely why he has not seen this question in the right perspective. I say that because the several million dollars that annually go into the subsidization of coastal boats is money which might very well be better spent on the provision of more trunk roads, on the provision of more access routes to the trans-Canada highway, on opening up and providing our people with more mobility in isolated regions.

Hon. gentlemen who take this view will probably continue to argue against the abandonment of anything, adopting a kind of What we have we hold attitude whether it is good, bad or indifferent. But as long as that attitude persists and as long as we reject alternatives which can achieve the same purpose—better purposes, in fact—then we will not hear anything constructive from those who represent this province on the opposite side of the house. So as I say, Mr. Speaker, we have these choices to make.

Instead of having coastal boats of this sort and various heavily subsidized means of transportation, there is no doubt in my mind that we must look much harder than we have up to now, not only in Newfoundland but in many other places, at the process of centralization. It is very easy on a warm summer's afternoon to become ecstatic about the tranquil beauty of some isolated community and the rustic charm of some settlement which can be reached only by a pleasant ocean voyage over a calm sea. I am guilty of this kind of romanticizing myself, and indeed from time to time have been regretful of the pressures of modern society which appear, at least, to make this kind of livelihood no longer viable. However, it would be, and is in the case of some hon. members and others, the most shameful form of exploitation to suggest to residents of many of these isolated communities that in some way or other through government aid, and if we were big-hearted enough, we might provide them with the same level of amenities that society is now able to offer larger and more accessible areas. It simply cannot be done, Mr. Speaker.

When talking about Newfoundland we must abandon some popular notions. We must abandon the approach of going to 25, 30 or 40 families and saying to them, "You stay here; this is where you belong." Instead it might be well to remember an expression that is now widely acceptable, that is, that we "tell it like it is." The fact of the matter is that the people in these Atlantic communities who supposedly are leading a tranquil existence, a pleasant life, and who are being uprooted and driven off into the industrial world have, or the great majority of them have, a sordid 100-year or more history of sadness, privation and even death which has resulted from their isolation.

Those who are against the present trend and who criticize government activity in this field are oblivious of the real facts. Within a matter of time the majority of these isolated communities will phase out of their own accord. When 7,000, 8,000 or 9,000 young people every year attend university, high school, vocational school or other centres of higher learning and when in Newfoundland, as in other parts of Canada, educational opportunities have become so greatly improved, one cannot blame our young people for not going back to the settlements from which they originated. It is only a matter of time before our communities phase themselves out. Even if we say to these people, "Stay, we will do all we can for you", and even if we encourage them to stay by providing what limited improvements are possible in the kinds of geographically isolated regions they live in, even then the drift toward centralization is irresistible. Instead of adopting this reactionary approach, Mr. Speaker, is it not more responsible to do everything possible to help our young people establish themselves and to bring them out of this isolation in a way that will ensure, at least, that they have a reasonable chance?

Where there have been failures—and I readily concede that there have been failures in some aspects of the centralization program —they have arisen because there has not been enough integration of the plan. Too vividly have we seen one side of the equation, the necessity to get them out, and we have not been sufficiently concerned with the sociological problems which have arisen. It is not enough to give a man a home or a few thousand dollars in order to move him to a more productive area. There are many other human problems of one kind or another which must be considered. In this regard I admit there have been difficulties.

On balance, the great majority of those who have moved under the centralization program are glad they did. I should like to take some of my colleagues on the opposition side who have different views and in their company talk to some of these people and ask them, "Do you want to go back?". I am reasonably certain that in the majority of cases the answer would be "No."

I realize that my time is coming to an end but I must say a word or two about a key element in any centralization program, the Newfoundland fishery. Once again, the charge of gross neglect in this field is not supported by the facts. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, the problem may arise from the fact that there has not been a sufficiently practical focus on the kind of assistance that has been given. Let me illustrate my remarks by saying something about what has taken place within the last year or two.

For example, at the present time some $4 million is being spent, during the present season alone, to ensure that the price paid to fresh-water fishermen is maintained at close to the average of the last three years. Another $2.2 million or $2.3 million has been spent by the fishery price support board to take off the market a surplus of 1967 salt cod in order to pave the way for this year's production.

I believe the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) during the question period this morning mentioned the Winspear report on productivity. That study is being undertaken by the fisheries department of the federal government. A substantial marketing survey is under way in the United States; it was asked for by the trade, supported by the government and participated in by the trade, and its purpose is to see what can be done to increase the consumption of fish in the United States. Under the aegis of the Atlantic Development Board various plants have been provided with fresh and salt water systems at very substantial cost. I saw one last week which cost in excess of $500,000. Since 1949 governments, regardless of the party in power, have contributed to similar developments in all parts of Canada. The total amount spent over a period of years is most impressive.

Mr. Lundrigan: Since it is almost one o'clock will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, of course.

Mr. Lundrigan: The minister is tremendously eloquent. Regardless of partisan politics, would it not have been logical for any government to rethink its planning in the field of moving people? Would it not have been better to prepare new programs before abandoning old ones? That is the essence of my thinking.

Mr. Jamieson: I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. Because certain solutions appear to be at hand immediately and could be extended for another year, I think the necessity for recognizing existing problems would not be so great. Our attention would be distracted. That is one of the real difficulties we have encountered. For instance, we could always say, "Why worry—why not give them some more under the salt subsidy? Why not feed them with more pap?"

There is only one way to recognize our problems of regional disparity and that is to take off the band-aids, to reveal the naked wound and show the real nature of the disease. I will not agree with any member on the opposition side who says that we should abandon all our programs without providing substitutes. I think we must take action to substitute existing programs.

The tendency has been for us to continue doing as we have done in the past, and nothing illustrates my point more than a consideration of the salt subsidy over the last 15 years.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Jamieson: I shall only talk for another minute or two. I believe we are on the right track in modernizing the Newfoundland fishery and instigating programs which are long range in their effects. That is the objective I have set for myself, and in that I am sure I have the enthusiastic support of this government.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to standing order 6(2) I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to thank you and to congratulate you on your appointment as Speaker of this house. You were chosen by the members unanimously because of your personal qualities which so well qualified you for such an important and difficult office.

This is the first time, Mr. Speaker, that I have the honour of sitting in this house, and I am therefore not familiar with the rules. However, I shall try to learn them and if I happen to break any of them by mistake, I beg you to excuse me and to show indulgence. I should also like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for his kind words of welcome to the new members, as I am one of them. I should like also to pay my respects to my devoted and dynamic leader, the worthy member for Temiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) whom I would call, like so many others, a great Canadian. He is a French Canadian who has not been afraid to firmly insist on the rights of the French element across Canada without interfering with the rights of others or destroying them.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I consider it a pleasure and an honour to belong to a Canadian political party whose leader is such a highly devoted man and who has the courage to foster the economic security of all through freedom.

I would also like to congratulate all the other members who have been re-elected or elected for the first time. However, I would be unfair to myself if I did not entertain a very special feeling for my colleagues of the Ralliement Créditiste who so valiantly deserved the trust of their fellow-citizens.

At the same time, I would like to congratulate and thank those entrusted with the legislative and parliamentary function who have achieved the present degree of parliamentary organization and efficiency. Even though perfection has not been attained and some may not be satisfied, there is an impression that, at least, we are not starting from zero. Already we are facing something that exists, that moves, that is organized and is improving and that is continually being completed, without ever reaching its final stage.

You will agree, Mr. Speaker, that beginning at the very early age of 16, as in my case, to farm the land and also becoming an orphan at the age of 11 and starting from nothing in almost all my undertakings, I have a very clear impression, on my election to the House of Commons, that truly something has been accomplished. I feel contented and happy, and I congratulate those who were here before.

But I do not come here without anything to my credit; something has happened in the past 40 years. I have always tried to understand why the people I came into contact with acted as they did. I learned first to get along pretty well with the members of my family and now, for a long time, I have cultivated my land as well as my family and social relations. For 25 years, I have been the secretary of a municipality created with the help of my fellow-citizens, because the municipality I am talking about is relatively young, since it goes back only to the thirties. That municipality, which today is the pride of the riding of Lotbinière, is well organized, because the hard-working people who live there have cleared the land and settled on farms. I would say therefore that I have some experience of public life.

For the last 30 years or so, I have been taking part in all the activities of farm associations. I have followed with a great deal of regularity, in the public gallery, the proceedings of the legislature in my province. Therefore, I do not feel completely as a novice in the social and public life when coming here to Ottawa. I am happy to feel at home, to have a part to play and not to feel as if I had stolen somebody else's place when taking my seat as a member. I feel that I am here really as the choice of most of the voters in my riding who honoured me by selecting me over my opponents, and whom I would not want to disappoint during the term of my mandate in the Ottawa parliament.

I am here, Mr. Speaker because I have something to say, a representation to make, and maybe also something to defend. I do not want to be too severe but I do want to be explicit, frank and honest in asserting the rights of all the citizens of my riding, of my province, of other provinces, in a word, of Canada as a whole. In my opinion, it is life that counts the most in the "qualification" of persons with whom I am in contact. To live on a farm and having chosen to do so, one must love life.

Since redistribution, the new riding of Bellechasse includes, besides the provincial county of Bellechasse, a large part of Montmagny and the major part of Dorchester. It is a large riding where the people, who used to live exclusively of agriculture and lumbering, now earn their living, partly, by working for industries which have settled there.

The agricultural production of the riding of Bellechasse, which formerly was quite considerable, has also decreased, as everywhere else throughout the province of Quebec and Canada, precisely because agriculture is not profitable.

As far as existing industries are concerned —there are large ones, and small ones—the larger ones could still expand, and the Industrial Development Bank Act should of necessity be amended to allow loans to those industries, at lower interest rates, so that they might achieve their goal and expand for the benefit of the people who live in my area.

There are also smaller enterprises which have hired help. These are family undertakings, which can also develop but which, as it is, hire a certain number of workers who, for the better part, are farmers who work there to increase their income because their own farms do not bring in enough revenue.

There is talk, generally, and there has been for a long time, of industrial decentralization but not much is being done to achieve that objective. I feel that in order to achieve that industrial decentralization, interest must be developed at every government level, municipal, provincial and federal, amongst, the go-betweens, and also the people who live in that sector of society, in order to promote the development of the municipalities and to enable them to provide the services essential to the establishment and expansion of new industries.

It should also be realized that if we want to maintain a decent level of population in our rural areas, new industries will have to offer employment to the local manpower, in addition to farm labour. If this objective could be achieved, we could hope to see an interesting level of population, the construction of new family dwellings, on condition, obviously that it be found possible to offer rural areas the advantage of a housing loan policy that would encourage the construction of real family dwellings, buildings in which not only modern machines could be housed, but also little Canadians, so that those spouses who still want children are enabled to house them properly.

Mr. Speaker, we also have in our areas, in my riding, as in other ridings in Quebec, many abandoned farms.

The farmers had to abandon them because their income did not allow them to live there. If you go through those parishes, you see many farms which used to be the pride of our people, of our province. However, today, when you see them, you wonder what happened to bring about such a situation in such a great and beautiful country where there is still so much to do.

Mr. Speaker, those people who, for the most part, cannot offer their services to industry because they are not qualified have become social welfare recipients. It is not good for our country when too many able-bodied people cannot do their share to build our country and to increase productivity in order to wage an effective war on poverty about which so much is said in the Speech from the Throne.

We will also have to work seriously to give our children, who will soon leave schools with a vocational or industrial training, a job enabling them to put into practice the science which they strived to acquire during all those years we kept them in school. People complain that education is expensive but, if so, it is one more reason why we should do something without delay so that these youngsters whom we are preparing for the future will not be discouraged, after having left school, when applying for a job. The first question put to a student seeking a job is: Have you a diploma? When he answers, yes, I have; here it is, he is asked a supplementary question: Have you any experience? But as he had always gone to school in order to get his diploma, he was not able to work and get experience, of necessity he had to answer no. And when he said: No, I have no experience, he was told: It is just too bad, but I cannot hire you because you have no experience.

Mr. Speaker, I mention those cases because they have occurred frequently in the last few months. Indeed, I have witnessed such dramatic situations and our children find them discouraging, because they are led to believe that a diploma some training or other, would enable them to earn a living and get ahead as easily as one drives a car on the highway.

Mr. Speaker, attempts were made, perhaps involuntarily, to lead all our young people to believe that diplomas would be sufficient to earn a living and to make their way up into society but, then our children discover that this is not enough, and they blame the adults for not telling them the whole truth.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is quickly running out. There are so many things to explain so that the house may improve the economic situation of the eastern part of our province. I am not the only one to have witnessed that situation and to have seen such things as I described to you.

During the conference of premiers which I followed on television—I heard one of the premiers of the eastern provinces say at one time: Yes, it is true that there is a constitutional problem in our country, but there is an even more serious problem, the economic problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): He then described our country. When we speak of a united Canada, united culturally and in our common efforts to develop and expand the country, I am entirely in agreement. But the provincial premier said that Canada is divided into two sectors, one rich and the other economically weak.

Mr. Speaker, I belong to the latter. I happen to represent a part of this economically weak sector, and I would like to make my contribution and to co-operate, working hand in hand with my colleagues. By co-operating with the government, we will find effective solutions which will give results. The people will then no longer think that we only come here to pass the time, without any intention of producing results.

Mr. Speaker, there is an exceedingly serious problem in the field of agriculture which is in urgent need of a solution, or else it will play us a nasty trick.

There is now some talk of importing certain products which people need to feed themselves. Unfortunately, in my opinion, if we keep on the course that we already have taken, it will not be long before we shall have to import more of those products.

When a country has to turn to others for its own subsistence, then it loses its freedom.

Farmers in the province of Quebec are said to be inefficient, unable to plan their production, unable to set the course of their business. Those same charges were made from 1930 to 1939, when the prices of farm products were at their lowest. Farmers indeed were being discouraged because they were unable to earn adequate revenues.

Of course, production dwindled, and that was normal. When a businessman, or a manufacturer is not in a position to make some profit, he becomes disheartened and is compelled to give up.

However, Mr. Speaker, this was not the truth. What was true is this: in 1939, when war broke out, we called on our farmers to do their war effort. Intensive production committees were set up in every community. I was the chairman of one of those committees, and I used to hold informal meetings with local farmers to incite them to produce more butter, cheese, eggs and various meats. We succeeded in increasing the production of those goods by offering the farmers higher prices, as well as the possibility, the hope of at least earning their livelihood.

One or two sons were taken away from them, Mr. Speaker, for military training.

Eastern Canadian farmers, Quebec farmers, proved their efficiency, since they answered the call of their government, of their country, and generously made their war effort.

Mr. Speaker, this prosperous situation enjoyed by the farmers in the post-war years continued until about the 50's when the marketing of our products was adequate enough. However, since 1951, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the farming conditions of Quebec farmers have deteriorated from year to year. They did to such an extent that, in 1968, according to some D.B.S. figures published in La Terre de Chez Nous, a weekly publication of the province of Quebec, it is shown that the net income of Quebec farmers, calculated on constant dollars, has decreased since 1951 in spite of a remarkable increase in productivity. In fact it has almost tripled. Therefore, the net farm income per unit which amounted to $1940 in 1951 had decreased in 1967 to $1684 constant dollars.

Note that these figures include the farmer's remuneration for his work, his administration, as well as for his net investment in his farm, that is more than $2,500 in 1967. This net property, capitalized at 5 per cent, would alone absorb more than $1,250 per year, which leaves barely $434 per farm in Quebec as working and management income.

Mr. Speaker, the disastrous situation of the farmer in eastern Quebec, stems from something, and one of the main causes lies in that the products used by farmers have increased, by 60 per cent from 1951 to 1967 while the price of agricultural produce has increased by only 17 per cent.

What is worse is that, in the meantime, the cost of living in eastern Canada kept going up to such an extent that at the end of 1967, it was one third higher than in 1957.

Mr. Speaker, some people complain sometimes because the farmers want more for their products, and when they make representations to get higher prices, some uninformed people might think that they are going too far.

So that producers and consumers can agree once and for all, they should stop accusing each other and quarrelling and try to rectify the situation.

I have here a small half pint container of cream, with 18 per cent fat, which I bought in Ottawa this week. I paid 34 cents for it and the producer—and I am happy to say publicly to that I am one—gets only a small fraction of that amount. On the other hand, the manufacturer of the container, the printer, and the selling companies get more for the container and its handling than the value of the contents paid to producers, but the consumer is unaware of that. We do not have the support of the consumer when we want to assert, in an honest way, the legitimate rights of the farmer or the producer.

The situation is the same for soft drinks. Mr. Speaker, has it ever occurred to people that 40 ounces sell for 50 cents, if we consider that an 8 ounce bottle costs 10 cents. At the present price of milk, farmers and producers of manufacturing milk, receive approximately $4.80 a hundredweight which represents 12 cents a quart. Imagine; 12 cents for 40 ounces of milk. However, one must pay 50 cents for 40 ounces of soft drinks.

I am interested in the consumer because I have children, I am myself a consumer. I tell you that we must do something for him in a common effort to establish a just society.

I am referring again to the establishment of a just society, of the just society, just for everyone including the small wage-earner. Mr. Speaker, I live among the poor people, I have always lived among those who have to work, on account of their circumstances. Therefore, I can tell you this: Today, I know all those problems, I am here the spokesman of the poor people, but I do not know what it is to work with you all, so that in the light of the requirements of each and everyone, we could do something.

Mr. Speaker, has the farmer any rights or has he only obligations in Canada? What are the obligations of the farmers, what are the obligations of the agricultural class? They are to cut down the trees in the forest, in an effort to make a farm out of it. This has always been done in Canada: My forefathers and yours did it. Before the building in which we are gathered was erected, there were but trees on this site. They are men like the one who is speaking to you, as many others in Canada, who have worked manually to fell forests and tried to make the Canadian soil fertile in order to feed mankind. Such is the nature of the obligation, such is our duty, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that we have rather creditably discharged it. Even when it is not profitable, cows are milked, crops are reaped and stored in order to keep them and make them available to Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, this is our responsibility. Those are our obligations to the community, but I consider that there is never any obligation and responsibility without corresponding rights. And the right for the farming class is that of a vital minimum; it is the right of a farmer to have an income enabling him to earn honourably his family's living. The farmer has a right to have enough revenue to pay for public services, like everyone else. They ask no special favours. If, two weeks from now, it should cost 6 cents to mail a letter, the farmer will pay 6 cents. If it costs $3 to get a tooth fixed, the farmer will pay $3. We are glad to pay the price, but in order to be able to meet the prices asked left and right, we have to have enough money. The farmer has a right to it, and that is why I am asking today whether something could be done about this. I am expressing myself as best I can, with the vocabulary at my disposal—for society did not give me much, and I do not have much of a university education, but at least I tried to get an understanding of the French language and arithmetic. If something could be done about this problem, it would help my fellow-citizens and perhaps my own family.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for the support of all parties in this house to try to get some justice, not ten or twenty years from now, but as soon as possible, within a few months, so that the dairy farmers, the producers of manufacturing milk, may get at least a guaranteed price of $5.50 a hundredweight. That is not going to ruin anybody. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Since we live in a just society, I think it would be unfair towards this house if I did not tell the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. Unless he obtains the unanimous consent of the house, I cannot allow him to continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent, I must recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you for giving me this opportunity of speaking to this first session of the twenty eighth parliament as the representative for Hamilton West. To me this is a privilege and an honour which I shall long remember because it is at this time that I feel a sense of involvement and belonging.

I begin by congratulating you, sir, on your election as Speaker and informing you that there can be no doubt in my mind, after listening to the many plaudits extended to you, that we shall continue to be directed by your excellent guidance and leadership. My congratulations are also extended to the Deputy Speaker, whose ability has been recognized. I, as well as many others, particularly those sitting in this house for the first time, have been very impressed with the way you have been discharging your responsibilities, being knowledgeable, impartial and giving evidence of your wit.

My sincerest congratulations are extended to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), both of whom, because of their seriousness of thought and ability to communicate, have gained the respect and admiration of this entire house.

I would also like to bring to your attention, sir, that at this moment I am very conscious of a meeting that I had in Toronto some time in 1964 with the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It was there and then that he, in his wisdom and experience, believed that I should be engaged in politics as a candidate because, as he stated, he had faith and confidence in my ability and believed that I could and would make a contribution toward the ultimate destiny of Canada. For this I am extremely grateful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alexander: I am also pleased to say that fortunately the electorate of Hamilton West were of the same opinion, and because of this faith and confidence, as expressed in many ways prior to the last general election, I now speak as the hon. member for Hamilton West. My gratitude is also extended to a former hon. member, Mr. Joseph Macaluso, who in his wisdom has helped me tremendously to be here this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, there are no words that can adequately express my thanks and those of my family for this great honour. Therefore I can only say with deep sincerity and conviction that I am profoundly grateful for this unprecedented honour and I shall do my utmost to become a worthy member of parliament under the leadership of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who has continually encouraged and counselled me, and the guidance of many hon. members on both sides of this house who have expressed an interest in my political career, sanctioned, I fervently pray, by Him without whom all goals are unattainable.

I am privileged to say that I was born in Ontario, the province of opportunity, the province to which many people in Canada look for leadership because it has progressed so dynamically, welcoming all peoples, regardless of race, creed or colour, desirous of contributing to its phenomenal growth and sharing its wealth and the good life. Within that province is the city in which I live, the city that has adopted me and propelled me with jet-like propulsion to the House of Commons.

In view of the time allotted to me, and because I would like to make some observations on other matters, I cannot recite a complete and adequate picture of the city of Hamilton, or in fact my riding of Hamilton West, one of four in the city that escaped Trudeaumania, much to the disbelief and bewilderment of the Grits. In any event, I find it necessary to speak about some of the important points of Hamilton because, as I understand it, a member is likely not to have another opportunity.

I would like to commence by pointing out to you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members that Hamilton had another first in the person of Hon. Ellen Fairclough, Canada's first woman cabinet member, who no doubt is warmly remembered by many hon. members because of her outstanding contribution to this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alexander: To her I owe much, and I shall continue to rely on her wisdom and experience.

This city of almost 300,000 in population is the steel centre of Canada, producing more than one half of Canada's steel. It is interesting to note that iron and steel industry sales all across Canada make up approximately 2.7 per cent of the gross national product, therefore being even greater than wheat which is 1.7 per cent.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Because of the importance of this industry to our economy, Canada's principal basic steel producers, among which the Hamilton steel industry plays an important role, are of course very interested in the new anti-dumping code agreed to by Canada in the recent General Agreement of Tariffs and Trade. Mr. Speaker, you will recall that something was said on this subject this morning. Industry regards dumping as a serious problem and is justifiably concerned about the potential loss of domestic markets to foreign competition at dump prices arising from Canada's acceptance of article VI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Industry recognizes that competition on a fair trade basis is customary and of course challenging. However, competition at less than fair market value is disturbing and cannot be considered fair. In fact it may result in irreparable damage to the domestic industry and to the economy. It is suggested that the onus of preventing undue disruption from dumping into the domestic market rests completely on the importing country. Therefore I strongly urge that the government be very aware of the dangers of dumping, and in enacting any laws to bring the anti-dumping agreement into effect deep consideration and attention should be given to the scope of the legislation and the form of administration of the law because Hamilton, and indeed Canada, neither want nor can afford harmful effects on the economy.

Although steel plays a great role in the life of Hamilton, the manufacturing of machinery, electrical goods, rubber, chemicals and textiles also mean a livelihood for many Hamiltonians. Hamilton can further boast of the port of Hamilton which has a 10-mile waterfront providing three miles of berthing space. It is a port of call for 50 shipping lines and it has agencies with services to and from 100 world ports. Present trends suggest that the port will become an increasingly important seaport gateway through which an ever-growing volume of exports and imports will be shipped, thereby allowing it to continue to break records in terms of tonnage moved. In this connection may I remind the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) that notwithstanding the fact that in a democracy one can expect strikes, Hamilton would take issue with him in the event there was a prolonged strike in this area.

One cannot speak of Hamilton without reference to McMaster University, my alma mater, which has attracted and continues to attract students from all over the world who seek excellence in graduate and post-graduate studies. It is worth while mentioning that Hamilton's rock garden because of its floral display has received international acclaim. May I also point out, if anyone is in doubt, that Hamilton still has faith in the Hamilton Tiger Cats football team.

The city of Hamilton is progressing with an urban renewal program including a civic square, and Hamiltonians continue to expect, and in fact deserve, immediate, decisive and continued government leadership in that regard.

Of some concern to Hamilton at the present time are its plans for a cultural centre—the Hamilton theatre auditorium. Toward this end may I say that the people of Hamilton have made and met their financial commitments; the province of Ontario has made and is prepared to honour its commitment, and we now look to this government to become involved pursuant to the many requests made upon it so that a firm and early commitment may be expected. It is hoped that the government is as enthusiastic about receiving briefs and submissions on this project as are the Hamiltonians in presenting them.

Hamilton is no different from any other large city. Of course it has its urban problems. Hamiltonians also are very concerned about housing, unemployment, inflation, air and water pollution, lack of mortgage moneys, high interest rates, and lack of serviced land. These are the areas to which priority should be directed.

Hamiltonians, and indeed all Canadians, believed that the Speech from the Throne would indicate solutions to these problems with greater clarity as related to the just society, a phrase without definition and an election slogan that has frustrated and confused many. Canadians want solutions to the many social and economic problems which burden this nation. They want them now, and they will not be satisfied with tokenism and expression of intentions for the future.

It is not unreasonable to conclude that because the Prime Minister spoke of the just society on the hustings and said, "follow me, give me a majority", Canadians had the right to expect and believe that this government would present to them a dynamic, inspiring and moving political manifesto in the speech from the throne. I can remember the arrival of the Prime Minister in Hamilton and I can remember reading about him and his smile when he said "follow me" and they walked. Then he became famous for that which many of us younger ones would want to be famous and for which we feel some jealousy. The women said, "where do we go?" He said, "follow me", and they walked.

Now it is implied that the government did not have to give this country leadership or direction in the speech from the throne. Apparently, in the mind of the government, this conclusion was unreasonable on the part of the people and reached without justification, much to the dismay and disappointment of many Canadians. I too am disappointed and in total disagreement with the utterances of many political experts who believe that it is inevitable that the speech from the throne should be dull, uninspiring and empty. Such speeches are not and never will be accepted. This is 1968, the jet propelled age and not the days of the horse and buggy.

As a result of their disappointment, Canadians have changed. I say that sincerely. They are no longer uninformed, naïve and gullible. At this time an expression comes to my mind which was continually referred to by the late Dr. Martin Luther King in speeches in which he quoted the ungrammatical truths of an old preacher among which was the following; "We ain't what we oughta be, we ain't what we could be, we ain't what we should be, but thank God we ain't what we was." I say to the government: take heed and wake up before it is too late.

Mr. Speaker, since coming to this house I have become more and more aware of the tremendous responsibilities of a member of parliament. He must grapple conscientiously and diligently with the many problems which face this nation. He must find with expediency the solutions to them. He must be concerned about the quality of life being experienced by all Canadians. He must create with enthusiasm and confidence a climate of proper direction to ensure the realization of our ultimate goal, that of a greater Canada in which we can all pray, live, work and play harmoniously while enjoying the fruits of full economic development. To these ends I dedicate my strength and my abilities and in this dedication my thoughts are directed toward many people in Canada about whom I and my constituents in Hamilton West are concerned.

We are concerned about the fact that four million people live in poverty. We are concerned about the fact that the dream of owning one's home has apparently become an impossible dream under this administration. We are concerned about the fact that unemployment is at the unwarranted high level of more than 400,000. We are concerned about the reliance on welfare by many. We are concerned about the fact that because of inflation the pensioners, the aged, the disabled and those on fixed incomes have very little purchasing power.

Does this government have the solutions to these basic problems that face this nation? If they have let them kindly advise the country, because the country is waiting for the answers. I say to this government, this is the time to show greater evidence of its concern. This is unquestionably a time for reassessment, a time for awakening. This is a time for reflection on the past only to better enable us to determine the guide lines and direction that positive action for the immediate future must take, particularly in relation to economic development, research and technology. We would then be in a more favourable position to solve these problems.

It seems to me that in a just society it should be the continuing responsibility of this government to be constantly aware of and concerned about the degree of the quality of life that each and every Canadian is experiencing. If there is any disparity, no matter how little, then the government should immediately set itself to reducing it, thereby assuring that each and every individual can live a full productive life and become in fact an essential part of the mainstream of Canadian life for the betterment of all Canadians.

I should like to move now, Mr. Speaker, to another topic. I am the first black man elected to the House of Commons. This results from the fact that many Hamiltonians have accepted as a way of life a simple truism expressed by Adele Florence Corey long ago. She said that men should be judged not by the colour of their skin nor by the way they fight, love or sin, nor by the gods they serve or vintage they drink, but by the quality of thoughts they think. How simple that statement is, but how unacceptable to many. Yet, if this way of life is not accepted, speak not to me of the Bill of Rights; speak not to me of democracy; speak not to me of the brotherhood of man or the fatherhood of God, because this then becomes hypocrisy. The black man also desires a place in the mainstream of life and because of this we read of his struggle, and struggle he must.

Listen to what Frederick Douglas, that great abolitionist, said back in 1857 about struggle. He said:

> The whole history of the progress of human liberty shows that all concessions yet made to her august claims have been born of earnest struggle. If there is no struggle, there is no progress. Those who profess freedom yet deprecate struggle are men who want crops without ploughing up the ground; they want rain without thunder and lightning. Power concedes nothing without a demand.

I look at the government.

> It never did and it never will. Men may not get all they pay for in this world, but they must certainly pay for all they get.

The negro has to struggle. Some say I have it made. Let me, standing here, be no indication that all negroes in Canada have it made. Let me say this: the negro has awakened with a new soul. He knows he is somebody. He is Thurgoode Marshall, Supreme Court Justice; he is Dr. Ralph Bunche, diplomat extraordinaire. He is Carl Stokes, mayor of Cleveland. He is Dr. Martin Luther King, whose passive resistance movement has changed the nature of the thinking of the whole free world. He is Leonard Braithwaite who, even though a Liberal, sits at Queens Park in Toronto. He is the high commissioners and ambassadors we see here in Ottawa.

This is an impressive list, I know, but I wonder how many men of such calibre we have lost because of the deliberate rejection of people because of colour? I am not the spokesman for the negro; that honour has not been given to me. Do not let me ever give anyone that impression. However, I want the record to show that I accept the responsibility for speaking for him and all others in this great nation who feel that they are the subjects of discrimination because of race, creed or colour.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say that our role in the building of the "just society", if it is to become a reality, is that we as parliamentarians must be involved with the hopes, the fears, the disappointments, legitimate aspirations and despair of each and every Canadian, ever mindful that involvement demands commitment in terms of actions and deeds, rather than words only.

[Translation]

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne of the first session of this parliament, I am eager to congratulate you on your re-election as Speaker of the house and to wish you every success in the performance of your heavy duties.

I also wish to congratulate the Deputy Speaker and the Deputy Chairman of committees (Messrs. Faulkner and Béchard) on their appointment.

I wish to add as well my congratulations to those that have already been made to the hon.

member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), who has been chosen to move the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The depth of his thoughts and the enthusiasm with which he expressed them assure us that he will bring a worthy contribution to the house proceedings.

I also want to congratulate the member for Kamloops-Caribou (Mr. Marchand), the first member of Indian origin to sit in this house and the mover of the address in reply. I salute his arrival in the house, as I salute that of the member who has just finished his speech. His presence in this house, as well as his special knowledge, will no doubt help us to better understand the problems of the minorities of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in joining my colleagues and my electors in congratulating the right honourable Prime Minister on his victory and that of the Liberal party in the general election of June 25. His wish for a just society, as well as the devotion and the courage with which he pursues that goal, is welcomed with great satisfaction and enthusiasm by my electors and, doubtless by all the citizens of Canada. I am particularly pleased to hear his statements and especially to read in the Speech from the Throne that constitutional reforms are the best guarantee of Canadian unity.

Our most important duty during this parliament is to strengthen national unity. Moreover, the Canadian charter of human rights must ensure to all our citizens the protection of fundamental liberties.

I wish also to thank the right hon. Prime Minister for the honour he extended to me by calling me to the office of Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). I shall endeavour to fulfil my duties to the best of my abilities and I may add that I am very pleased to try and help the ministers, all the members and the Canadian people at this critical hour.

With the experience he has, the minister quite obviously understands the daily problems of Canadians and judging by the manner I have seen this department work since it has been his responsibility, I am convinced that the Canadian consumers are already being helped and will be helped further in the future.

Mr. Speaker, in the discharge of my duties, I want also to express my gratitude to the electors of Parkdale for having elected me as their representative in this house. I hope that I will, at all times, serve loyally and devotedly my constituents and my fellow-citizens.

Parkdale constituency, which is situated in the southwest area of Toronto, is almost a miniature replica of a cosmopolitan centre. Besides the Anglo-Saxon and French-Canadian groups, almost all other ethnic groups live there. As was the case for many of our ancestors, many of my constituents immigrated here to start a new life. Some came with a spirit of adventure; others were in quest of freedom. Coming to Canada in large numbers, thanks to a judicious immigration policy of the Liberal party, they have found freedom and a better life in this country. They are proud of the traditions of our country and anxious to participate in its development. A great many of them have contributed to a large extent to our economy as labourers, teachers, doctors, lawyers, engineers, missionaries, artists, etc.

During May last, the right honourable Prime Minister honoured us by presiding at a ceremony and unveiling a monument, in Toronto, commemorating Sir Casimir Stanislas Gzowski, one of the first Polish immigrants that settled in Toronto. On account of his services to Canada as an engineer and a statesman, he was knighted by Queen Victoria, in 1890.

Mr. Speaker, the immigrants constitute an invaluable asset for the future of Canada. The great amount of respect shown by my constituents toward our free and democratic way of life is very enlightening. They are firmly decided not to lose the freedom they have found in this country. Hence, they have an uncompromising desire to help those nations that have lost their freedom.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

Among my constituents who, especially at this time, have demonstrated, and rightly so, a grave concern for freedom and basic human rights, a concern shared, I hope, by all Canadians, are those of Czech and Slovak origins. The aborting of the long awaited liberalization process in Czechoslovakia by the Soviet led invasion of that unfortunate country on August 20 shocked our citizens and indeed the people of the free world as well as many citizens in countries behind the iron curtain. This blow to freedom has marred the world's celebration of human rights year. The General Assembly of the United Nations declared 1968 human rights year to commemorate the 20th anniversary of the declaration of human rights. I am sure we would all like to express the hope, Mr. Speaker, that before the end of this unfortunate year basic freedoms and human rights will be returned to the people of Czechoslovakia.

While attending the international congress of gastroenterology held in Prague in mid-July of this year I had the opportunity of not only visiting and admiring the 1,000 year old historical evidence of Christianity and western civilization, but also the privilege of meeting and speaking with people from all walks of life in that geographically small but rich and beautiful country of Czechoslovakia.

It was evident that Czechs and Slovaks awaited with a curious and patient expectation the beginnings of basic freedoms and human rights, and yearned for an economic growth that would benefit the common working man. But their hopes were short lived. On August 20 the cold harshness of the imperialistic designs of a totalitarian state extinguished the fire of freedom in Czechoslovakia. I believe, however, that the intense desire of the defiant people of that country to be free to determine their own destiny will never be extinguished.

The Canadian government, both at home and abroad, protested against the invasion of Czechoslovakia. At the United Nations Security Council emergency session the distinguished and able Canadian representative immediately voiced Canada's protest by co-sponsoring a resolution condemning the Soviet intervention, and then initiated a second resolution which sought to ensure the release and safety of the leaders of Czechoslovakia. In Ottawa, following an emergency session of cabinet, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) stated unequivocally Canada's protest and voiced our indignation.

In Toronto at a public protest rally, I read on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs a special message which condemned the Soviet led invasion of Czechoslovakia. The message also stated that the Canadian government had unequivocally condemned this use of force and called for the immediate end of the Soviet occupation.

By its actions the U.S.S.R. had chosen brutally to ignore the most basic principle of international law and two of the cardinal principles of the United Nations charter; that of the sovereign equality of states, and the obligation that states must refrain in their international relations from the use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of another state. The Canadian government has been in the forefront of the efforts at the United Nations to aid the people of Czechoslovakia. Canada does not condone the occupation of Czechoslovakia nor the illegal and unjustified intervention of the U.S.S.R.

The special message of the Secretary of State for External Affairs also stated that an agreement reached under duress resulting from military occupation and this mode of resolving difficulties between states is completely repugnant to the Canadian government. In addition, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government showed its compassion in dealing with the consequences of the Czechoslovak tragedy. Already Canada has offered a new home and emergency financial assistance to the nearly 500 refugees from Czechoslovakia. This is an enviable record which I do not think has been surpassed to this date by any other government outside Vienna. It is to the credit of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen), with the co-operation of his cabinet colleagues and the efficient work of his officials, that Canada has provided such humanitarian treatment to these refugees.

May I encourage the minister to continue his efforts and also suggest to him that he add to the special Canadian team recently sent to Vienna more departmental officials and also representatives from Czech and Slovak national organizations in Canada. Such a move, I believe, is desirable in view of yesterday's Reuters press report from Munich that according to the international rescue committee there are more than 30,000 refugees from Czechoslovakia homeless in various parts of western Europe.

I believe many Canadians are impatiently awaiting the forthcoming session of the general assembly of the United Nations. Perhaps many people are hoping for too much, but, Mr. Speaker, despite its weaknesses, the United Nations is still the best instrument for peace and justice that the world today possesses. In the meantime, Canada should work toward the establishment of an impartial and effective international control agency. Such a body should be empowered to preserve peace and justice by controlling the proliferation of nuclear weapons, negotiating peaceful disputes, advancing human rights and supporting economic development.

As the representative of Parkdale I also have deep concern for my constituents who, at the same time, are citizens of the great municipality of metropolitan Toronto. This great city was the first community in the western hemisphere to give political recognition to the metropolitan form of government, which was created by the demands of modern, industrial society. Metropolitan Toronto was legally established in April, 1953, by an act of the Ontario Legislature.

Toronto plays an important role in the development of our entire country, and not just in the development of Ontario. This great municipality, with a population of 1,900,000 persons—the population increases by about 60,000 persons each year—soon will contain nearly 10 per cent of all Canada. A great industrial and educational centre, Toronto is also a major port in the St. Lawrence seaway system; through the port are forwarded domestic and foreign cargoes to almost all parts of the North American continent as well as to many overseas countries.

During this long, hot summer I, with several Liberal colleagues of this house, attended meetings of the city of Toronto redevelopment advisory council, as well as meetings of other public agencies and officials concerning the great redevelopment plan of Toronto's downtown core, the Toronto harbour and the new 50 mile long waterfront, including a new and bold concept for the Canadian National Exhibition grounds. On September 10 the Toronto planning board approved an official and complete 15 year development plan, during which time metropolitan Toronto's population is expected to grow to 3 million people.

Toronto's redevelopment plan includes matters under federal jurisdiction such as transportation, new airports, extended harbour facilities, a post office in central downtown, a radio and television broadcasting centre, a new waterfront and, as I mentioned before, large grounds for the Canadian National Exhibition.

I am happy to see the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) in his seat this afternoon, and I extend to him an invitation to visit Toronto as soon as possible, to see the operations of the central post office. He might also wish to learn of the plan the Toronto planning board has for the relocation of the central post office. At the same time I extend a similar invitation to all other cabinet ministers whose departments have a bearing on this redevelopment plan. It is definitely in the national interest to utilize all our technical know-how and financial resources in order to carry out these redevelopment plans. The people of Toronto need and demand swift action. Federal and provincial co-operation with Toronto officials on these matters will stimulate a great sector of the Canadian economy, provide thousands of new jobs and eventually increase our national revenue.

I submit that further provincial and federal initiatives are indispensible to the improvement of the quality of life in our sprawling urban centres. The problems of slums, poverty, disease, delinquency, crime, inadequate housing, air pollution, contaminated water and traffic congestion will choke our cities and paralyze the entire Canadian economy unless all levels of government plan and act more quickly. All our urban problems which have national implications must be examined thoroughly. The influence of modern environment on Canadian citizens is a major and urgent national issue. In order to cope with these and other environmental problems I suggest to the federal government that we establish a special department of urban and environmental affairs.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the government's legislative program has an underlying basic philosophy and an appreciation of the right priorities. It will satisfy many needs and provide better living conditions in our present, complex, modern society. I support and have confidence in this legislative program which, I submit, merits favourable consideration by members on both sides of the house.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to participate in this debate. My first words will be to congratulate you, sir, on your elevation to the position of Speaker of this house, a position which I know from experience you will fill with dignity and fairness to all members in all parts of this house. I also wish at this time to congratulate a fellow Nova Scotian on his promotion to the position of Clerk of the House. This is an important post and I hope that the trend in this house toward higher positions for Nova Scotians will continue in future.

Following a time honoured custom, I wish to congratulate the mover, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), and the seconder, the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They expressed their views with clarity and sincerity in a manner which honours the constituencies that elected them to this house.

Time will not permit me to extend individual congratulations to the Prime Minister, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees and all members of the new cabinet, among whom are some old friends. I wish them all good health in the carrying out of their important and heavy responsibilities to the Canadian people.

This morning I listened with interest to the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson). I regret that he cannot be in his seat this afternoon. In his remarks he did his best to explain away the removal of the salt fish subsidy to our fishing industry as well as the removal of the winter works program and other programs. In the minister's words, these were only "band aids" which were being removed to let the government take a closer look at the depth of the wound. Without being partisan or political, Mr. Speaker, I have a tendency to agree with the views expressed by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) who asked the minister this morning why these programs are being removed before something better is put in their place. To put the matter in the words of a member representing an Atlantic region, "We don't like to take away a man's lifebuoy before we have him safely in the lifeboat."

Though this is not the first time I have spoken in this chamber I feel honoured to speak as the first federal representative of the new federal constituency in Nova Scotia known as South Shore. It is a large riding which covers an area from West Dover in Halifax county, through Lunenburg, Queens and Shelburne counties to Clyde River. It contains such famous beauty spots as Peggy's Cove, St. Margaret's Bay, Chester and Mahone Bay—which is famous for the legend of the ghost ship Teaser and the island in which Captain Kidd reputedly put his buried treasure—the beautiful town of Lunenburg, home of the deep sea fishing fleet and of the Bluenose whose famous skipper, Captain Angus Walters, last month departed on his last voyage. Lunenburg also is the home of the replica of the Bounty, and contains the floating museum, the LaHave River which was first settled by the French, the beautiful town of Bridgewater, the privateer town of Liverpool which is the home of Thomas Raddall, the writer, the fishing towns of Lockeport and Shelburne, home of the Empire Loyalists, a section of Kejimkujik national park, and many picturesque fishing villages too numerous to mention. Truly, the South Shore is one of the most storied and picturesque ridings in all of Canada.

The people in the riding are strongly independent and derive their living from many sources. Some are engaged in the development of our primary industries such as fishing, farming and lumbering; others are employed in ancillary industries such as shipbuilding, ship repairing, foundries, the manufacture of fishing nets, fish processing plants, tree farming and the manufacture of hardboard and newsprint, to name but a few.

These industries are today, for the most part, facing the same problems as those which trouble other industries throughout Canada, namely, their costs of production are excessive and there are insufficient markets where their products can be sold at a profit. This applies to our newsprint industry, our agricultural industry and our fishing industry. As a result of our inability to compete in foreign markets we find unemployment levels increasing, and many of our people are gravely concerned about their future.

It was for these reasons that the people in my riding and throughout Nova Scotia looked forward to the reading of the speech from the throne, which they hoped would contain details of the promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he spoke in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. According to the headlines appearing in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of May 31 the right hon. gentleman, who is now Prime Minister, stated that a new multi-million dollar ferry service would be established across the bay of Fundy between Digby and Saint John. The new vessel is to cost $7 million, and docking and other facilities another $10 million; the new freight, auto and passenger service, he said, would handle all the freight demands of southwestern Nova Scotia and the Annapolis valley. Why was this promise not mentioned in the speech from the throne? When can we expect assistance toward the provision of a second ferry between Nova Scotia and New England to aid our tourist industry?

On the same occasion, in Yarmouth, the Prime Minister spoke of economic disparities, describing them as a greater danger to Canadian unity than cultural or linguistic differences; it was too much to expect Canadians to be united unless they all got a just share. Speaking in Halifax, the right hon. gentleman said the threat to Canada's national unity did not arise so much from French-English problems as from economic disparity, and in view of this he intended to give regional development top priority.

With these statements I agree, and I was amazed therefore to read in the speech from the throne that the government regarded its first responsibility, and the first responsibility of this parliament, that of clearing away the accumulation of essential legislative adjustments left over from the last parliament. Unless these were cleared up promptly, we were told, efficient public administration and the effective operation of the Canadian economy would be hampered. What arrogance; what gall! When we on this side asked the government to make arrangements for parliament to sit as soon as possible after the results of the election were known, we were told this was not necessary and that some time in the fall, some time in September, would do. Now the election is over, what does the government list as business of the highest priority? Not regional development as stated by the Prime Minister in Halifax, but parliamentary reform.

And when this is out of the way, what is parliament to consider? Are we to deal with economic disparities, which the Prime Minister described in Yarmouth as presenting a greater danger to Canadian unity than cultural or linguistic differences? Oh, no; according to the speech from the throne we shall next be asked to enact a totally new official languages act based on a recommendation of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism.

Mr. Speaker, I do not question the importance of these matters, but there are serious doubts in my mind about the government's sense of priorities. Many Canadians are living in poverty; they are calling out for assistance. They have not yet won their war on poverty, as have the defeated Liberal candidates. They are in the position of a drowing man who needs help immediately. But what are the members of this government doing? They are ignoring the drowning man's call. They say: We will help you, but first we must swab the deck, pump out the bilge and clean up the mess in the galley left by the former captain and crew; later on we will think about throwing you a lifeline. Mr. Speaker, by that time it will be too late.

[Mr. Crouse.]

I realize that the fo'c's'le and the captain's cabin of our ship of state must be in a terrible condition after the departure of the former captain and the exodus of his sloppy officers and crew. The present Prime Minister might simply have said in the speech from the throne that the ship of state needed to undergo a refit. In fairness to the right hon. gentleman the mess is not entirely of his making, since he has only been a Liberal since 1965. But he had lots of help from Judy and Jack, Gordon and Winters, as well as Robichaud and Martin, who fouled up our international fishing nets in a 12 mile limit and a fisheries policy which defied implementation or explanation by either one of them, a fact which may account for their departure to the other place.

If members of the government would take time to read the fifth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada I feel certain they would have a better idea of some of the problems facing Canadians. Reading this review it is evident that those of us who live in the Atlantic provinces have no priority when it comes to poverty in this nation. But we in the Atlantic provinces are especially concerned about statistics which show that our per capita incomes are as much as one-third lower than those enjoyed by the rest of the nation while our unemployment rate is double the national average, resulting in poorer standards of living and substandard housing. The council's report adds up to an admission of a continuing economic crisis in the Atlantic provinces, a crisis which Ottawa has not faced. The Atlantic provinces need a development policy geared to the needs of the region—a policy which will provide for the massive investment of federal and private funds which would enable us to process our plentiful raw materials within our own area.

Take shipyards, for example. The Liberal government's present policy of curtailing and reducing subsidies for ship construction has brought about a situation in which shipyard workers in my constituency face massive unemployment. Yesterday the leaders of the industry met with representatives of the government and I am sure they underlined the serious situation which exists within the industry. To the best of my knowledge, none of the shipyards in Mahone Bay, Lunenburg, Dayspring, Liverpool or Shelburne have any ships to build; the shutting down of these plants affects not only direct employment in the yards, but has a disastrous effect upon employment in our foundries and machine shops. I noted with interest during the election campaign that the shortage of work in Quebec shipyards was a matter of concern to the then minister responsible for manpower and immigration, now Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Marchand), who is reported in the Halifax Herald of June 17 as saying in Quebec that Canada made a mistake in selling its merchant marine after the second world war and that he would do everything in his power to restore it.

The speech from the throne is strangely silent about the major problems of our shipyards and of the deep sea fishing industry which is so closely allied with shipbuilding, but with the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development supporting my plea, I trust that our now silent shipyards will be reactivated. I realize, to use a popular phrase, that the bloom may be off the rose and that a large number of ships may not be required in the next few years. But some ships will be needed. In the fishing industry, Europeans are rapidly replacing their fishing fleets with new, modern, efficient vessels. In this they are encouraged by liberal loans, investment allowances, subsidies and special depreciation provisions. These large factory ships are producing frozen and packaged fish and unfortunately some of the fish they catch are marketed on this side of the ocean, creating problems for our Canadian fishing industry. As a matter of fact, the Canadian government reduced the subsidies on steel hulled vessels from 50 to 35 per cent at a time when we must compete with countries whose shipbuilding and fishing industries are state supported, and with whom expense is therefore no object.

Incidentally, no subsidies have been paid at the present rate in Nova Scotia since last November and when the hon. member from South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) yesterday when we could hope to see the restoration of those subsidies the answer he received was a model of brevity; it was simply a flat no.

One aspect of ship construction assistance has always puzzled me. I have in mind the reasoning behind the government's action in making subsidies for steel ships under the statute, while the subsidies for wooden ships come under the estimates. Why does the government not put steel and wooden shipbuilding on the same footing and in the same amount? Since the present government apparently does not approve of ship subsidies and since its lack of action has brought shipbuilding to a halt, I would propose that the government give consideration to implementing a system of investment allowances as a form of tax remission which would benefit the Canadian shipbuilding industry, the fishing industry and commercial shipping.

The Prime Minister often speaks of total involvement by Canadians. I believe investment allowances would bring about better involvement of Canadians in the building of ships. The investment allowances principle is not new. It has been used in the United Kingdom. I should like briefly to illustrate the principle of this system. If a ship cost $100 built in Canada it would be set up on the books as $175 for depreciation purposes. This additional amount would compensate for the difference in cost between construction in Canada and European countries. Under the investment allowance system the entire amount could be written off in a four year period if company earnings warranted this. The figure I have used is an arbitrary one. When the costs are compared with the costs of European builders it may be necessary to increase this amount. However, I wish to give the government something to think about.

I would also suggest that these allowances be extended to existing vessels, especially existing fishing boats, provided the allowance is used for the construction of new ships. I say this because the accumulated depreciation on existing vessels is only a fraction of what a new ship would cost and, consequently, such ships are difficult to finance. Under this system the builders of ships would be obliged to use their own profits, but I believe investment allowances would be a double barrelled approach to our shipyard and ship construction problems. In addition this would encourage thrift, reward ambition, promote enterprise and create employment which is seriously needed in many parts of Canada.

At the present time the fishing industry is facing many serious problems brought about by ever changing social and economic conditions which are prevalent throughout the world. In order for the fishing industry to expand into the key role of feeding countless millions, for which it has the potential, it must solve the problem of recruiting and training young men for the industry and must develop better deep sea trawlers with modern detecting, handling and processing aids. Fishing must be made acceptable as a vocation for our young men. We should no longer look upon the fishing industry as a second class industry or look upon fishermen as second class citizens.

On October 24 and 25, 1967, a conference on fish protein concentrate was held in Ottawa. I attended that conference, and I was impressed with the possibilities of fish protein concentrate. I believe measures must be taken to curb the tremendous waste of unwanted species of fish now taken by our trawlers which, it used and turned into fish protein concentrate, could further stabilize the economy of the fishing industry and supply an additional quantity of food to the starving masses of humanity.

I would also suggest to our new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) that Canada, as one of the world's great fishing nations, should take the lead in fostering international co-operation for the conservation and use of available stocks in the world fisheries. One of the major difficulties at present affecting the industry is the depressed prices in our markets arising from increased groundfish production in Britain, Norway, Iceland and Denmark, plus the effects of the devalued pound. This overproduction, coupled with a market softness brought about by one of the rulings of the Pope—there were two—which relaxed the laws of the church concerning fish, has seriously lowered the consumption of groundfish.

Some progress was made in the Kennedy round talks, which is beneficial to our fish exports. But we still have a trade imbalance with the United States. It is evident that we need greater access to United States markets under more favourable tariffs, not in 1971 or 1972 but now. In the Kennedy round the United States made no change in the access for groundfish cooked fillets which are still subject to tariff quota revisions. Any change along this line would be most helpful to our fish processing and cooked fish industry.

Some species, however, are still in great demand. Here I refer to the lobster which is now live frozen and shipped to markets in the United States, Britain and France. Although the demand for lobsters is increasing the supply is diminishing. Landings at 35 million pounds in the Atlantic provinces were down about 6 per cent last year. This has resulted in new measures for registering lobster fishing boats and a trap limit in all provinces on the east coast, except Newfoundland.

These measures have been taken in an effort to control the industry so that our inshore fishermen may have a chance for economic survival. With the decline in lobster catches in some areas, some fishermen have found it necessary to go on the larger trawlers or seek employment elsewhere. Many of our fishermen, however, are too old to engage in offshore fishing or to be retrained. They are looking hopefully to the government's conservation measures as protection for their industry.

In view of the importance of the lobster industry, which was worth some $23½ million to our inshore fishermen last year, I would suggest a change in the lobster pound regulations. At the present time the holder of a $1,000 lobster pound licence is permitted to scrub female lobsters that have become berried—that is, that have acquired eggs after impoundment—and put them on the market.

The law does not prohibit fishermen from taking female lobsters. Only female lobsters carrying eggs on their tail may not be retained. It is impossible for a fisherman to ascertain whether or not a female lobster is carrying spawn until the condition develops. This usually occurs during the period when the female lobster is impounded. I believe, in the interests of conservation, that it would be a better practice for fishing inspectors to be empowered to act for the government by buying back seed carrying female lobsters and returning them to the sea, rather than have the eggs destroyed. In this way, the natural reproduction of the species would assist in maintaining the various stocks which at the present time are seriously depleted in some areas. When we hear that a one pound lobster is capable of carrying 20 thousand to 35 thousand seeds on its tail and that if these could be returned to the ocean the chance of survival runs anywhere from 3 to 5 per cent of the 25,000 or 35,000 eggs—and, in addition, last year one pound is reported to have scrubbed something like 1,500 lobsters—we get some idea of what the conservation measure would mean to our economy.

This type of policy, if put into effect over the next five years, should go a long way toward rebuilding our inshore fishery resources. The cost of this conservation program would not be excessive. If the government cannot find the money for this project I suggest that it cut down upon the expenditures of the Company of Young Canadians, the royal commission on the status of women, or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which last year cost the Canadian taxpayers something like $145 million.

I should like to turn for a few moments briefly to the subject of external affairs and the somewhat pathetic action of the government in respect of the Territorial Seas and Fishing Zones Act of 1964. In its brief to the Canadian government on Monday, January 28, 1963, the Fisheries Council of Canada, which represents some 400 fishing companies which process 90 per cent of Canadian fishing products, outlined the fishermen's proposals in these words.

Spokesmen for the fishing industry today urged the federal government to declare a 12-mile fishing limit, shielding Canada's coastal fisheries from damaging exploitation by foreign fleets. They said the need is urgent.

Executives of the Fisheries Council of Canada met with a cabinet committee to present a 2,500 word brief which warned that unless such action is taken important fish stocks will become depleted.

Foreign fishing fleets now may operate to within three miles of the shore.

The brief proposed unilateral adoption of a plan which Canada and the United States jointly sponsored at the second United Nations conference on the law of the sea, held in 1960. This called for a six mile territorial sea and an additional six mile exclusive fishing zone. It was supported by 54 nations but fell one vote short of approval.

"The rapid increase in world fishing effort and efficiency has focused attention on the fact that, unless adequate safeguards are taken, the marine resources that have played such a vital role in the development of the Canadian economy will be harvested by foreign fishing fleets," the brief said.

It cited the recent expansion of Russian and Japanese activity.

Calling for adoption of the twelve mile limit, the brief declares that "unilateral declaration of the government's policy must be followed immediately by active enforcement ... and the policing of foreign fishing fleets."

"In the council's opinion, enforcement is absolutely essential if Canada is to maintain her position in world fisheries."

... Its brief suggested that declaration of the new zone take into special consideration the historic rights of France and the U.S. in Canadian national waters. As a first step, negotiations should begin with those two nations to reach a mutual understanding about their rights in an enlarged zone.

In keeping with the terms of the 1960 proposal, any nation whose vessels had made a practice of fishing in the outer six miles of the proposed twelve mile zone for at least five years would have the right to continue fishing that area for another ten years.

But, apart from those special circumstances, foreign fleets would be barred from the exclusive zone. This would permit for the first time an effective program of fisheries management and conservation to preserve the Canadian fishing industry.

An act was passed in 1964 embodying some of the council's proposals, but since that date successive fisheries council presidents have only been able to deplore the lack of action on this important matter by our government.

That council met on December 5, 1968 and Mrs. Marie S. Penny of Newfoundland had this to say about the government:

We are not happy about progress on implementing straight base lines, and defining certain bodies of water as Canadian waters or, at the very least, exclusive Canadian fishing zones. We know there are difficulties—but if action is not forthcoming fast many nations which up to now have not had historic rights in many of our waters will have acquired such rights. There is, also, the inevitable danger of this foreign fishing seriously depleting our fish stocks. We need a stiffer government attitude on this question—and we need it now!

Nothing could be clearer than this, Mr. Speaker. In all fairness to this government I must say they made a start in 1967 on geographic co-ordinates and base lines which were drawn from Cape Chidley, Labrador to Cape Ray, and here they stopped. No action has been taken to seal off the gulf of St. Lawrence or the bay of Fundy, two areas where conservation measures could be carried out which would be extremely beneficial to our east cost fishing industry, whose stocks are rapidly being depleted.

I cannot urge too strongly upon the government the necessity of facing up to its responsibilities in this matter, and if this is to be a housekeeping session let us see some action from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis). This is a very thorny problem. Let us not only get the broom out, let us get the vacuum cleaner out as well. Let us sweep the cobwebs from this department and get to work in an attempt to establish geographic co-ordinates and base lines. Let us set up areas where conservation measures can be carried out which will be helpful to our Canadian fishing industry.

Finally, if I have a little time left I should like to refer briefly to the speech from the throne and to the Prime Minister's statement regarding NATO and the action he proposes to take.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this might be a convenient time to interrupt the hon. member and to say that his time has just about expired, unless he has the agreement of the house to continue. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crouse: I would like to say to the Prime Minister, and to the government that I noted from the speech from the throne that they contemplate a review of NATO. I believe a review may be necessary, but I hope this will not result in any change of policy. NATO has not only provided us with protection on this side of the water, but it has served as a co-operative defence measure which has stilled the rising forces of the nationals within Germany itself. It is something that I believe we as a nation should continue to subscribe to and support at all times.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROVISIONAL RULE CHANGES FOR LIMITED PERIOD

Hon. D. S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask for general consent to revert to motions to make a statement in respect of procedure.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you are aware that conversations have taken place in recent weeks in respect of our procedures and rule changes. As a result I am today giving notice of two motions which will be placed on the notice paper. The first will be for the appointment of a special committee to consider fundamental changes to our rules and procedures. That committee will be instructed by the house, in the terms of the motion, to complete its work and report by December 1, 1968.

The second motion is for the appointment of a special committee for the purpose of considering whether this house should make arrangements for the better oversight of instruments made under the authority of statutes of this parliament. I am assuming that when these motions are called, hon. members will want to debate them, and it is the government's hope that very early in the proceedings of the house, after the completion of the throne speech debate, we will be able to deal with these matters.

In the conversations which have taken place an agreement has been reached about provisional arrangements for the first part of this session, until the house rises for the Christmas recess. The suggestion is as follows, if I may summarize it; that with the exceptions or modifications I will note, the provisional rules that were in effect last April are to be in effect between now and the time the house meets again after Christmas; that Standing Order 15A is not to be in effect; that for the business of supply for 1968-69 a total of 19 days are to be used, and that the standing committee system set out in standing order 65 is to be revised for the remainder of this session.

I have had a motion drawn along these lines. It is very long and somewhat complicated, but I believe it has been examined by the house leaders of the three parties and I understand there is no objection to having this motion made an order of the house at this time.

Perhaps I should add that discussions will take place among the house leaders of all parties as to which of the 1968-69 estimates should go to the standing committees, and in respect of the order in which the estimates will be called in the committee of supply. If the house is in agreement perhaps the motion I made could be made an order of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed, and is it also agreed that the motion which the hon. President of the Privy Council has now referred to be printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It should be printed in both Hansard and Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, it is understood that the government house leader has accurately condensed the arrangements by which the interim arrangements will be carried on until Christmas.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I need only a few seconds to confirm that the document to which the President of the Privy Council would like the house to agree does represent the agreement of the house leaders of all the parties. Speaking for my colleagues, let me say that we are glad that we have been able to reach this agreement. We hope that still further improvements in our rules will be made in the not too distant future.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, I wish to re-affirm our consent as to the document tabled in this house by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), concerning our agreement on the procedure to be followed in this house. I have nothing else to say, except that I should like to congratulate all the house leaders for their excellent work and co-operation up to now.

[English]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members.

[Editor's note: The motion referred to above is as follows:]

That the rules and procedures in effect immediately prior to the dissolution of Parliament on April 23, 1968, shall be in effect during the present session until the sittings of the House are resumed after the Christmas adjournment, except that

(a) provisional Standing Order 15-A shall not be in effect,

(b) in relation to the business of supply for the fiscal year 1968-69 the resolution adopted on April 26, 1967, relating to Standing Orders 56 and 57, is hereby modified so that (i) the estimates of all departments shall be deemed to have been first taken up and entered for consideration upon the reference of the same to the Committee of Supply, (ii) an order for supply shall be called on one occasion only for the purpose of moving "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair", and two sitting days shall be allotted for that purpose, (iii) there shall be an overall limitation of seventeen sitting days allotted to the said business of supply, including interim supply, main estimates, and supplementary estimates, and proceedings on any bill or bills based thereon, but excluding the final supplementary estimates, and (iv) at the ordinary time of adjournment on the seventeenth allotted day, as specified above, the Chairman or Mr. Speaker, as the case may be, shall interrupt proceedings and forthwith put successively, without further amendment or debate every question necessary to dispose of all proceedings necessary for the purposes of this order,

(c) for the duration of the current session Standing Order 65 shall be amended to read as follows:

65. (1) At the commencement of each session, a special committee, consisting of seven members, shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the following standing committees of the House:

a. Agriculture, to consist of not more than 30 members;

b. Broadcasting, Films, and Assistance to the Arts, to consist of not more than 20 members;

c. External Affairs and National Defence, to consist of not more than 30 members;

d. Finance, Trade, and Economic Affairs, to consist of not more than 20 members;

e. Fisheries and Forestry, to consist of not more than 20 members;

f. Health, Welfare, and Social Affairs, to consist of not more than 20 members;

g. Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to consist of not more than 20 members;

h. National Resources and Public Works, to consist of not more than 20 members;

i. Justice and Legal Affairs, to consist of not more than 20 members;

j. Labour, Manpower, and Immigration, to consist of not more than 20 members;

k. Regional Development, to consist of not more than 20 members;

l. Transport and Communications, to consist of not more than 20 members;

m. Veterans Affairs, to consist of not more than 20 members;

n. Miscellaneous Estimates, to consist of not more than 20 members;

o. Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, to consist of not more than 20 members;

p. Privileges and Elections, to consist of not more than 20 members; and

q. Public Accounts, to consist of not more than 20 members.

(2) The special committee shall also prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the following standing joint committees:

On Printing, to act as members on the part of this House on the Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the printing of Parliament, to consist of 23 members;

On the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of the Joint Committee of both Houses, to consist of 21 members;

Provided that a sufficient number of members of joint committees shall be appointed so as to keep the same proportion in such committees as between the memberships of the House of Commons and Senate.

(3) A majority of the members of each standing committee shall constitute a quorum unless the House otherwise orders;

Provided that, in the case of a joint committee, the number of members constituting a quorum shall be such as the House of Commons acting in consultation with the Senate may determine.

(4) The standing committees shall be severally empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; to send for persons, papers and records; and to print, from day to day, such papers and evidence as may be ordered by them, and in relation thereto Standing Order 66 shall not apply.

(5) Any member of the House who is not a member of a standing committee, may, unless the House or the standing committee otherwise orders, take part in the public proceedings of the standing committee, but he may not vote or move any motion, nor shall he be part of any quorum; provided that a Minister who is piloting estimates or a bill through a standing committee may participate in the deliberations of any such committee as if he were a member, but he may not vote or move any motion, nor shall he be part of any quorum.

(6) A seconder shall not be required for any motion in any standing committee of this House.

(d) for the purposes of proceedings on private bills and in order to conform with the provisional Standing Order 65, for the duration of the current session, the words "Committee on Standing Orders" in Standing Orders 98, 100(2) and (3), 102, 103(1) and 108 shall be amended to read, "Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders", and the words "Miscellaneous Private Bills" in Standing Order 105 shall be amended to read "Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders".

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Eymard Corbin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to have an opportunity to speak in the throne speech debate. For this privilege I thank my constituents in the Algoma riding and for the confidence they placed in me last June 25. No new member can come to this chamber without being a little awestruck by its history and traditions.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have to congratulate you on your appointment as Speaker of this house. I have already done that, as have many other hon. gentlemen. I must, however, thank you for the personal interest you showed in me when I first arrived on Parliament Hill. I am sure all new members received the same kind welcome and personal interest.

I would like to pay tribute, as did the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to my predecessor, Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, who for the past 19 years represented the former Algoma East riding in this house. Mr. Pearson represented the riding with distinction and with a great deal of concern for and interest in the people of that constituency.

This man has an international reputation as a Nobel Peace Prizewinner, as former secretary of state for external affairs, as former president of the United Nations, and as prime minister of our country; and the latest honour bestowed upon him: to lead a commission and prepare a report for the World Bank on the future course that should be taken by the developed countries of the world in providing aid and assistance to the developing countries. However, this was not the man the people of Algoma knew as their member of parliament. He was known as a common man, a man the people could meet and talk to on the streets of Espanola, Blind River, Elliot Lake or Manitoulin island, a man who was interested in the little people of this world, who was concerned with human problems. I believe it is a measure of the man that he who had walked and worked with the kings and state leaders of the world could find himself at home with the people of Algoma East and their problems of everyday life. Therefore I wish to pay tribute to the job that he did, not only as prime minister of this great country but as member of parliament for Algoma East, now the Algoma federal riding.

The new Algoma riding also takes in much of the former Algoma West riding which was so capably represented for 28 years by Mr. George Nixon. Mr. Nixon, like Mr. Pearson, was a man concerned with the everyday problems of ordinary people. I wish him well in his retirement after serving the area of Algoma West for so many years.

I congratulate all members on their election and the positions they hold in this house. We are indeed a fortunate group to have the responsibility to govern a country such as ours, only 101 years young. As well, I congratulate my friend, the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), on his election and on the speech he made. The hon. member is well respected in my riding, where we have some 15 Indian reserves, for the work he did as executive assistant to the minister of Indian affairs. In many ways, the hon. member typifies the over 100 new members in this house, young men who are aggressive, concerned and dedicated to the well-being of their country, Canada.

Mr. Speaker, these young men who were elected on June 25 to this twenty eighth parliament of Canada come here with high hopes that were inspired by our new Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the election campaign, inspired to believe that this parliament of Canada can become a more effective agent for dealing with the problems of this great country. They believe that if the old wrangling and bitterness which has beset this house in the immediate past years can be put away, if men of good faith can come to work together for a common good, a new page may be written in the history of Canada, a page of progressive and constructive government.

I believe we are concerned because of the recent problems that seem to be developing relating to rule changes for this house. These rule changes must recognize the traditions of the past, the traditional safeguards which the British parliamentary system has always afforded its people, and yet we must change so that the mountain of work which awaits hon. members here assembled can be dealt with in a careful but reasonably rapid manner. I believe that the Canadian people demand this of us, and indeed require that a more progressive, businesslike approach be adopted in the handling of the nation's business.

Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a place in our rules for a more definite method of handling the nation's business so that the member of parliament can better plan the use of his time. I believe this can best be done by the use of a parliamentary calendar which would provide at least one week every two or three months when the member of parliament would be free to return to his constituency and on a personal basis look after the problems of his people.

The riding of Algoma has within its boundaries some of the greatest natural resources of Canada. This area of northern Ontario has often been described as the treasure chest of Canada because of the minerals which are found within its boundaries. These minerals include iron, gold, copper, and uranium. Indeed, the largest deposits of uranium known to man are to be found in the area of Elliot Lake. I believe it is safe to say that at some time in the future more power will be produced from uranium, and the energy locked within it, than from any other source of power in Canada.

During the past year we have seen a renewed economic health in the uranium mining industry in Elliot Lake. This is very encouraging. Only a year or 18 months ago dozens, indeed hundreds of homes were empty and boarded up in Elliot Lake. Today nearly all these homes are being used, and we are told that within a year there may actually be a housing shortage in that area. So we never really get rid of problems; rather, we exchange one problem for another. Certainly, I would gladly exchange the problems of a depressed economy, such as we had a year ago, for the problems that result from a prosperous, booming economy such as we will be seeing within the next few years.

I believe that the government of Canada and this parliament should have policies which will expand the peaceful uses of atomic energy. Surely there can be no better way for Canada than giving leadership in the uses of uranium. Our country, which is so rich in this metal, should be a world leader in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. The world would benefit and we would benefit from it.

I believe that one of the most important pieces of legislation forecast in the speech from the throne is the creation of a department of regional development. This new department will be expected to do great things for the Algoma riding, because in this riding we have many areas of slow economic growth. In particular, in the town of Blind River we have a very serious problem confronting us. The McFadden Lumber Company, a division of Domtar, which has provided a livelihood and the mainstream of income to that town for many years, will be closing down its mill. This mill, which at one time employed well over 300 men, will be closing its doors at the end of 1969.

The proposed department of regional development will, we hope, be able to encourage new companies and industries to establish in the town and assist hundreds of people who will be left without work when the mill closes. There is a need in this town to develop a new forest industry based on some type of composition board using wood other than the white pine which has previously been harvested from the forests of the Mississagi river valley.

There is also within this area the potential for a future pulp and paper mill. However, the markets for pulp and paper in Canada are presently in a depressed state, and it does not seem feasible that a new company can be attracted to this area to produce pulp and paper at this time.

The forest industry has always been very important to the Algoma riding. Logging and pulp and paper have an important bearing on the economic well-being of the area. The town of Espanola has enjoyed prosperity over the past several years, due to a large paper mill located there. The government must implement policies which will increase the export market for paper so that the prosperity which this industry has brought to many areas in this country can continue.

There is also a need in my riding of Algoma for an expanded and improved means of transportation. You name the type of improved transportation, and we need it. Whether it be improved highways, air service, rail service or water service, transportation is one of the biggest problems in the Algoma riding.

The Algoma riding has never had any airports with a regularly scheduled air service. This situation will be remedied in the near future when Georgian Bay Airways will start a regular air service to Elliot Lake next Monday, September 23.

Over the years the passenger train service which has been serving the Algoma riding has progressively deteriorated in the type of service rendered to the people. Previously, there was a regular train service offering sleeper car accommodation and operating at reasonable hours. However, recently this service has been removed and only a Budd car service travels through the riding from Sudbury to Sault Ste. Marie, one departure being at 3 a.m. in the morning. We hear that this service is to be discontinued in the near future. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Algoma will not allow this to happen without a great deal of resistance, and I will be there to assist in that resistance.

With the decrease of train service throughout the riding, the highways have become more heavily congested due to the heavy flow of trans-Canada traffic, both cars and freight trucks. There is a need for a further development of highway 17, the trans-Canada route, with the provision of passing lanes on hills so that slow-moving trucks will not cause undue congestion, and a four lane highway in the heavily travelled areas.

It has been proposed that a new road be built from Blind River to Elliot Lake, the Granary Lake road. This road would provide a logical access road to enable people to live in Blind River and commute to work at Elliot Lake. The development of this road is a necessity for the people of Blind River who, within the next year, will be losing their chief source of income, the Domtar mill. At the same time, it will provide for the Elliot Lake market a close source of manpower. This road, I believe, should be developed jointly by the federal and provincial governments as a spur of the trans-Canada highway.

With regard to water transportation, we have a serious problem developing on Manitoulin island. This island has traditionally been served by a regular ferry service between the Bruce peninsula and Manitoulin island.

For the past five years we have also had a ferry service between Meldrum Bay and Blind River at the west end of Manitoulin island. I understand it is proposed to terminate this service at the end of this shipping season. I do not have to tell the house what a catastrophe this would be, both for Blind River and Meldrum Bay. Both of these areas depend on this ferry to help stimulate and continue the tourist industry. The tourist industry is most important to the west end of Manitoulin island, and is indeed the main industry there. I cannot emphasize too much the importance of the continuation of the federal subsidy to provide this ferry service. This subsidy of some $50,000 a year would be eaten up in no time with the welfare payments which would become necessary without a flourishing tourist industry.

On the other side of the coin, the same situation exists. If this ferry service were discontinued, Blind River would also suffer from the serious economic situation which is developing in that town, of which I have already spoken. It goes without saying that it would be a catastrophe for both ends of this service if it were to be discontinued.

Likewise, the ferry service at the eastern end of Manitoulin island, between Bruce peninsula in southern Ontario and Manitoulin island in northern Ontario, has problems. This ferry service has operated for many years, and over the years the number of tourists wishing to travel from southern Ontario to the beauties of northern Ontario has increased. It has become a problem because the ferry service that is available is no longer adequate. Often we have people who have to wait 12 to 15 hours in order to get a ferry across Georgian bay to Manitoulin island. It goes without saying that if we are to stimulate the economy of this area, this service has to be improved very soon.

The other main industry on Manitoulin island is agriculture, and we certainly have some problems in agriculture in Canada today. I am aware of many of these problems in this field, because of my profession. As a veterinarian I have intimate contact with many of the problems of the farmers in northern Ontario, and especially in the Algoma and Manitoulin districts. I believe that new approaches and new solutions must be found to the old age problem of low income for farmers.

I realize that the trend today is toward larger, more economic units in farming. Our main concern must be the welfare of these large units for the production of food. However, I believe that the government must have a small farms policy which will allow small operators who are in their declining years of farming, due to their age, to continue on the farm and still maintain a reasonable income on which to live.

I cannot emphasize enough the serious situation which has developed in northern Ontario in farming. The number of farmers is literally dropping off day by day and week by week. More and more are finding that they can no longer maintain a decent livelihood on the land and are turning to other fields of endeavour. This is especially true in the beef producing areas of the Manitoulin and Algoma districts.

The large dairy farm seems to be able to survive in the north but is also having a very difficult time in trying to make ends meet. I think it is up to this government and this parliament to adopt policies which will improve the lot of the farmer. In this day of affluence in our country, it is a national disgrace that we are unable to provide a better return for the farmer who has a tremendous capital investment, often up to $100,000, and still has a net return equal only to the wages of a clerk in the city.

The manpower department is planning to establish a school of agriculture for the winter months. I applaud this approach to upgrading and training. There is no profession or job in Canada that does not require retraining and upgrading in this day and age, and I believe this applies to farming as well as to any other business.

I would be remiss, in speaking in this throne speech debate, if I neglected to mention the thousands of people, native people of Canada, who live in the 15 Indian reserves in my constituency. These people have shown in the past few years that they can make progress on their reserves which is second to none in Canada. Recently, the former prime minister, Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, attended and officially opened a new development in the West Bay Indian reserve on Manitoulin island. This development, known as the Lakeview development, involved the expenditure of over half a million dollars by the federal government. It consisted of an elementary school, six senior citizen housing units, housing units for the teaching staff, and 28 serviced lots for a future subdivision development. This school was contracted by the Indians themselves and the work was done by the Indian people. Throughout the Algoma riding the Indian people have been constructing homes on their reserves, and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development provided a basic grant for each unit. However, in spite of these achievements we are not complacent or satisfied with the development which has taken place and we are not content to rest on our laurels. There is a need for improvement on the reserves in Algoma in the areas of housing, education, job retraining and upgrading. We also need diversification for our primary industries and the introduction of small industries into the area. I hope the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the new department of regional development, working in conjunction with all levels of government, will be able to create new job opportunities throughout the riding.

I would not want to sit down, Mr. Speaker, without saying a word of congratulation to our new Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). People in northern Ontario often refer to it as "new Ontario". It was for this reason northern Ontario quickly responded to the Prime Minister during the recent federal election campaign. The people in northern Ontario, or new Ontario as it is often called, are quick to adapt to new solutions, good solutions—they must be good—to old problems, and the Prime Minister offered these new solutions during the election campaign. He did not speak in the tired old clichés so familiar to politicians but exhibited a new attitude, a new approach to the problems of Canada. It is obvious this approach was well accepted in northern Ontario because 11 out of the 12 seats in that area returned the new Prime Minister's party to represent them in this house. This new Prime Minister offered a new era for Canada and the people of northern Ontario decided to share in this new life he offered.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): I note that our Speaker of last year, who was appointed as Speaker this year, is not in the chair. However, I should like to say that anyone who has been Speaker, who performed his duties so well in the last parliament that he was again chosen by his peers to fill this high office, must be held in the highest regard by the members of this house. He simply has to have this regard because he is elected by his peers. I should like to say a word, too, to the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner), who was appointed Deputy Speaker. We hope he will have the wisdom of the ages in his youth.

To the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I should like to express my sincere congratulations upon accomplishing an overall majority with so little. To the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I should like to say that their speeches were well worth the time spent in listening to them. I think the speech from the throne exhibited little to support the rabble rousing Trudeaumania of the election days. The Prime Minister indicated that it would take some time to work out the just society, and that the economics of the nation will have to be put in order first. The government will have to straighten out its finances. This is an admission of the seriousness of the economic problems that have been pointed out over and over again.

If any proof of this fact were needed, all we would have to do would be to look at the savings bonds which will be put on the market shortly, carrying an interest rate of almost 7 per cent over the next 15 years. I am wondering if this is not a good time for this just society to take a look at the possibility of redeeming some of these perpetual bonds that were purchased in 1936-37 paying 3 per cent and upon the payment of which the Liberal government welched in 1965. These bonds are now worth 50 cents on the dollar. Even if the just society were to repay the bondholders 100 cents on the dollar, the resulting funds would purchase only about a quarter of what they would have purchased at the time the bonds were bought. I expect the Prime Minister to correct this injustice immediately. It is a blotch on our escutcheon. Those of us who were living and working then know how tough this problem was. If we fail to redeem those bonds, we are going to leave the parliament of Canada in a very unfavourable light in its handling of bonds.

I should like to deal now with a few problems that the just society might straighten out and which have shown up since the election. Several questions have been asked by members both on this side and on the government side of the house concerning the rural mail carriers. It is interesting to note that some of these rural mail carriers went about their duties during the period of the strike, and were paid. I put a question on the order paper inquiring as to how many were denied the opportunity to work, and how many were allowed to work and collect the money called for by their contract.

The question is, Mr. Speaker, why this discrimination? Some of these mail carriers were paid and some of them were not. Why were some of these rural mail carriers refused entrance to post offices during the strike, even though they were there and prepared to carry out their duties? In my opinion, this was rank discrimination. I do not believe there is anyone in this house who considers it just to deny some mail carriers the right to carry on their work while others are permitted to do so. I should like to know the answer to this question.

Some of these rural mail carriers commit themselves to monthly payments, probably for the vehicle they use to carry this mail. They are dependent upon that monthly cheque. I believe the situation created by the strike is covered by their contract, because clause (b) states:

> In the event of any conditions arising during the life of this contract which could not reasonably have been foreseen when the contract was made and which substantially alter the service and for which a pro rata adjustment based on distance or frequency is not equitable, the amount of adjustment in rate shall bear a fair relation to the amount payable under the contract and shall be fixed and finally declared by the Postmaster General.

All of us who were members in the last parliament recall that the postal workers did not have the right to strike until the legislation was passed during the last session. It is my contention, therefore, and I have received some legal opinion on this, that those rural mail carriers whose contracts were signed before that date have a right to collect. Certainly one would think that in a just society when a man is prepared to carry out his work, it would be only proper that he not be denied the payments called for by his contract.

While I am dealing with the Post Office Department, I should like to take a look at the policy of closing out small, rural post offices. The department makes no distinction whatever between summer post offices and post offices that should be operating in small hamlets the year round. I shall cite a specific case. Let us take the case of a post office which is established for the summer season in a grocery store. This service is usually provided for the cottagers, and terminates when they close their cottages. As a rule they open up their cottages the last week in June and close them on September 1. I have no quarrel with the closing of post offices in such areas as that, but I do quarrel with the closing of post offices in areas where several hotels and motels are open for business, areas such as Port Stanton. Many of the people who visit that area are tourists from the United States and the bookings are done by mail. These people are making the bookings almost a year in advance and are disturbed to find that the address on the letterhead is incorrect as a result of post office closing. In this particular case—and I am only citing one out of dozens—the post office is not Port Stanton anymore, but Severn Bridge. People living many miles away are thus confused.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, this particular area to which I refer is one where people live all year round. Operators of hotels and motels do not close up on September 1 or shortly thereafter but continue to remain open on a 12-month basis. They have people working for them the year round. Week end tourists are guests and they receive visitors during the skidoo season. Buildings are being repaired or constructed and rooms refurnished.

To cut these type of people off, Mr. Speaker, is sheer folly. We spend millions of dollars on advertising for tourists to come to this country, and then we destroy the very magnet that draws them. This is not common sense. I am sorry that the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) is not present to listen to me, because this is exactly what he is doing by these post office closures. The minister is drawing no line of distinction. Surely there is a very clear-cut line of distinction between these hotel and motel operators to which I have referred, and summer cottagers. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to take another look at this problem, because if he continues to lose tourist dollars in this way he will likely hear more about the matter from other sources.

In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, there is the question of notice. How much notice were these people given? As I understand it, they received ten days. They had to prepare bookings for the following year, forward literature with their address printed on it, and so on. Port Stanton post office has been in existence for 100 years. If this not folly of the worst sort, I do not know what is. I trust the minister, who I think and hope is a very sensible man, will get busy right away and correct this situation. Do not let us rob Peter to pay Paul, which is what happens when post offices such as this are closed. When post offices remain open all year round, money is coming in. One hotel operator told me that on average he receives 5,000 letters a month, and there are six or seven hotels or motels in that area.

I also want to draw attention, Mr. Speaker, to this just society. As I listened to the speech from the throne it became apparent that it would take time to find the problems that exist. However, Mr. Speaker, let me assure you that they do exist right now. A tremendous amount of work has to be done by the just society. For example, take the case of the old age pensioner. There are approximately one and a half million people in Canada 65 years of age or over. Most of them worked during the thirties for one quarter of what they could earn today; that is, if they were lucky enough to have found a job in those days.

The little they have saved has been eroded by inflation to the extent that it now buys less than half of what it bought originally. Succeeding governments have been eroding the value of the dollar, which has caused inflation. Priorities are not required to discover that; all we need do is look around us. Last year the dollar was eroded by almost 5 per cent. What we did was to give the pensioners a 2 per cent increase and take 5 per cent away from them. What a way to treat the senior citizens of this country! There is a commandment that says that you should "honour thy father and thy mother". Are we doing this when old age pensions are so scandalously low and housing is wholly inadequate?

I am sure that everyone in the house agrees that our employment policies are geared to youth. Ask a man 50 years of age, and unemployed, whether he can get a job. In addition, the leisure needs of the elderly people of this country are completely ignored. According to statistics, about 60 per cent of these people have little or no money and they qualify for the supplement. Many of the remaining 40 per cent have great difficulty making ends meet. When we talk of priorities, Mr. Speaker, this particular priority is there for everyone to see.

Another matter that bothers me, and I am sure many other members of the House of Commons who stop to think about it, is this: After we passed the legislation which gave the pensioners $75 a month, we waited a while before inserting an escalation clause increasing the amount, if necessary, by 2 per cent. In the meantime the cost of living increased almost 5 per cent. This is really treating people who cannot help themselves in a Scroogian way.

A just society, Mr. Speaker, would have tied the increase in remuneration to the cost of living. A just society would have given these pensioners $100 a month. Our party supported such a move, and it would have meant there would be no peeping Toms annoying and worrying our senior citizens in this land, as is the case now. Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we in this house will be the senior citizens, if we live that long.

The other day, Mr. Speaker, I saw a paper that listed a series of questions which had been sent to and answered by an old age pensioner. The form was inquiring into his financial status. This particular couple had no money of their own and were living in an old home ten miles out in the country. They could stay there no longer because they were unable to drive or to afford a car, and consequently had to come into town. They sold the farm on which was situated a little farm house for which the buyer was paying so much a month. When they moved into town they had to pay a little more for a two-room apartment than they received as rental for the farmhouse. Having filled out the form they were then asked to pay for OMSIP, for hospital insurance. Thus their guaranteed income supplement went out the window.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is this proper treatment to give these people? The Pharisees in the new Testament used to do this. They said they followed the letter of the law; but let us not follow their example in this parliament.

I am also disturbed about the bureaucracy that is besetting provincial and municipal governments. We are being mentally and physically cruel to people we are supposed to honour and love. We have built up such a jungle of bureaucracy in our welfare work that we are on the point of helplessness.

• (5:00 p.m.)

For example, a man who had been eight years in a mental institution came to me not long ago. I am speaking from memory, but I think he had undergone several operations, two of them to his feet. He had a heart condition. After eight years of custodial care, when he was 50 years old he was turned out into the world to earn his living. What happened was inevitable. He couldn't cope. He came to my attention and on his behalf I contacted welfare workers who, under their regional set-up had to drive 25 miles in order to see him. One worker came out but could not find the man in question, for whom some grocery money and room rent was left. Groceries were not the crux of the problem, because on the day following the ex-mental patient was without a room to sleep in. He could not cope with his new world.

We telephoned the regional welfare worker, told him the story, and he came out to look the situation over. He said, "Why, this man will have to go into a county home." After that papers were sent, and we filled them in. The papers were sent down to the committee where they were processed and he was not accepted. We became involved with bureaucracy and more bureaucracy. Finally the papers were returned with the notation, "Unsuitable for this type of man", or some similar notation. The man is still on the street; he still has the same problems and nobody will look after him. He ran afoul of bureaucracy.

We are in a jungle of red tape where nothing happens and where taxes are increased to pay for that red tape. Bureaucrats run backwards and forwards piling up expenses for which we have to pay. I never thought that I should advocate a negative income tax to pull us out of the hole we are in, but I am approaching the point where I would advocate such a tax.

I expect many hon. members have heard of cases where people on welfare are better off than those who work for their pay cheques. That situation should not be permitted to exist. This situation applies not only in Canada but in the United States also. For instance, I have heard of cases where people in New York state living on welfare are better off than people in other parts of that country who are working for their living. It seems that we are all becoming helplessly entangled in bureaucratic red tape. The answer to the problem is that we must stop spending our money foolishly on increased bureaucracy. We must stop putting up unnecessary buildings or equipping necessary buildings with unnecessarily costly equipment. I have seen many hospitals, the equipment of which has become obsolete within ten years. The buildings needed altering, yet they were built to last from 25 to 50 years. Sometimes after the buildings had stood for 20 years it was necessary to tear them down. I have seen such complexes being destroyed. Canada cannot afford that type of foolishness when our people are short of housing. Lots of work is waiting to be done in the just society, Mr. Speaker.

On July 1 the government brought in medicare, and I have often wondered how the plan will operate when one considers the scarcity of doctors. Saskatchewan is participating, as is British Columbia. I understand that Nova Scotia is to come in soon.

Mr. Crouse: Next year.

Mr. Rynard: And the government is going to blackmail every province into entering the plan, whether the province has the money for it or not.

An hon. Member: You are against medicare.

Mr. Rynard: I am not against medicare; I am all for it, but it must be on a sensible basis, where we have the doctors to do it.

What sort of medical care will our people obtain when one considers that in the emergency departments of many hospitals one has to wait several hours before being treated. That is the sort of thing I object to. We cannot have adequate medical services if the country has not enough doctors. At the present time in Canada there are approximately 2,000 people for every general practioner. Our doctors, apart from their duties in treating patients, are harried by forms they have to fill in, by bureaucracy and by all sorts of red tape.

I ask, what has the government done since 1963 to increase our supply of qualified doctors. Mr. T. C. Douglas, who is not here at the present time, supported me in a speech I made on this particular point. I urged the government to allow the medical schools to operate all year round and thus increase our supply of doctors. I believe six medical schools agreed to do so, provided the government came up with the necessary funds to help toward the professors' pay. This assistance was refused and today, when medicare is in operation, we have insufficient doctors for our needs. Consequently our medical services will be inadequate.

It is time that we took a serious look at the situation. The government ought to make available through the health resources fund money which will help to train additional doctors. I am sure that the majority of medical schools in Canada would be willing to operate all year round if given the chance and the money. They did so during the war, when doctors were turned out in four years. Dr. John Evan, the young and distinguished dean of the McMaster medical school in Hamilton said, "We could do it in three years if we have active support and the necessary funds."

The government turns a deaf ear to such pleas, at the same time shoving down our people's throats a form of medicare that will not work. I am greatly concerned about the quality of medical care that our people will obtain from doctors who are hopelessly harried and overworked by the demands of bureaucracy. I saw the work of medical practitioners deteriorating in England. There were so many forms to be filled in that patients after a very cursory inquiry were told that they had to come back next week and the week after that. In the end, when the doctor has little time to see the patient and only has time to guess at what is wrong with him, he says, "I have made a reservation for you to enter the hospital where the doctors will find out what is wrong with you."

When this happens your hospital operating expenses go up. All your health costs soar, simply because doctors have insufficient time to spend with each patient. We have one doctor for every 2,000 patients, and in that regard Russia is away ahead of us, with one doctor to about 500 people. Even the United States is better off than we are. Yet we are crowding medicare through in one of the most sparsely populated countries in the world. I say this in all sincerity; I do not say it offensively: While I have been critical, I hope some of the things I have said this afternoon will be noted by the government and by this house, and that action will be taken to see that the people of this country get proper medical care, and to see that the picture of the just society which has been built up across Canada gets going. This is not just a matter of priorities; it is so obvious it is staring them in the face.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to rise and make my first speech in the House of Commons. I must say I am particularly pleased to see such a crowded house at 5.15 p.m. on a Friday afternoon. Who would have thought that so many thousands would have turned out?

Before I get to the main body of my speech I should like to say a few words about my predecessor. Michael Starr represented what is still the core of my new riding, Oshawa-Whitby, formerly the Ontario riding, from 1952 until this year's general election. There can be no doubt that in terms of his services to the personal needs of his constituents Mr. Starr performed an outstanding job as a member of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Broadbent: This is widely recognized by his constituents, whether they were his political supporters or not, and it is widely recognized, I am finding, among all parties in the House of Commons. I am also learning that among members of this house in all parties he is regarded as a man of great integrity possessing all the qualities of a genuine gentleman. I should like to add that I am not saying any of these things because it is, supposedly, the conventional thing to do; it is something I genuinely believe, because I heard it expressed on countless occasions since I arrived in Ottawa and, prior to that, in my riding. I have rarely agreed with the policies of the party which Mr. Starr represented for many years, but I unhesitatingly salute Mr. Starr the man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Broadbent: Now, in my short but, I hope, not completely irrelevant speech I wish to address myself to the two issues raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In his speech on Monday of this week the right hon. gentleman suggested that in our discussions during the present debate we should concern ourselves with questions which relate to "the kind of country in which we want to be living and the directions in which we should be moving to build such a country."

Earlier this year the Prime Minister suggested, if I understood him correctly, that in Canada we had gone about as far as we could in our efforts to construct a welfare state. Once we have medicare established on a national basis, he implied, the structure would be almost complete.

As a member of the opposition, and more particularly perhaps, as a New Democrat, I am in the unfortunate position of having to agree with the Prime Minister on both issues. In short, it seems to me that the debate on the speech from the throne is an occasion when the social philosophical objectives of Canada should be discussed; and, second, it is true that we now have in Canada the basic structural components of a modern welfare state.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my contribution by saying something about the second issue. The 100 years since confederation can be divided roughly into two socio-economic periods. Up to the 1930's Canadians were concerned with laying the foundations of a viable capitalist democracy in which our two principal cultural groups could at least co-exist peacefully within the framework of a liberal constitution. The central components of a liberal democratic society were firmly established throughout the land: universal franchise; freedoms of speech, religion, press and assembly; competing political parties, and a national banking system.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Since the 1930's we have experienced important modifications of the classical liberal structure. The more important of these include: (1) the right of trade unions to exist and to strike; (2) the gradual implementation of old age pensions; (3) some form of progressive taxation; (4) comprehensive medical and health programs and (5) an unemployment insurance scheme.

No sensible Canadian would deny that these measures have made a very significant change in the kind of life the majority of our people can now experience. They have provided the quantitative basis for a qualitatively enriched life for millions of adults and children. These five changes have provided the structural core of our modern welfare state.

I emphasize the point that we have the core. It would, however, be both false and irresponsible for me to suggest that we have the whole apple. Previous speakers in this debate have ably indicated serious deficiencies which still remain and about which the government gives almost no indication of seriously concerning itself. The most glaring of these are: (1) the abysmal lack of adequate housing, (2) severe economic inequality between both individuals and regions, (3) the absence of a guaranteed annual income, and (4) an outmoded and inequitable system of taxation—a shock to the western world, I might add.

Mr. Speaker, these four areas of concern should not in any way be dismissed as being of minor significance. They are the major evils of the day. They can be and should be remedied. Previous speakers from the New Democratic party have indicated their existence and have suggested solutions in this house. Earlier in the year our leader—soon to be returned to this house—and candidates across the land discussed them directly with the Canadian people. There is little need for me, at least in this debate, to add to what has already been said.

Instead, what I wish to stress is that every one of these evils can be substantially dealt with within the existing socio-economic structure. We do have the core of the welfare state. We need only the will to complete it. Houses can be built, taxation can be improved, a guaranteed income can be introduced, and regional disparities can be significantly modified. All this can be done without making any further significant changes in the distribution of power within Canadian society.

It is in this sense that the Prime Minister is almost right when he suggests that in terms of welfare we have gone about as far as we can go. It is also his implied suggestion, that it is as far as we should go, that makes me believe that the Prime Minister is a profoundly conservative man. His vision extends to the welfare state, but not one step beyond. His vision of the just society is what we almost have. To defend what we have and to refuse to go beyond is to cease to lead. And to cease to lead beyond the welfare state is to leave Canadians with a kind of society which is inherently inegalitarian, inherently acquisitive, and inherently unjust.

Having indicated substantial agreement with the Prime Minister on the nature of the welfare state I want now to proceed to suggest why we New Democrats—unlike the Prime Minister and the Liberal party—cannot accept it as being an adequate kind of society. Perhaps the major objection to the welfare state is that for all its advantages it rests on a grossly inadequate understanding of democracy. In Canada today children are taught in schools throughout the land that our country is democratic primarily because there is more than one political party and because citizens have both the right to criticize and the right to change their rulers every few years. This view of democracy, Mr. Speaker, is a distinctly modern phenomenon and is in marked contrast with the understanding of democracy of both the early Greeks and 19th century Europeans. Prior to our century democracy was seen by its defenders and critics alike as a kind of society in which all adults played an active, participatory role not only in the formal institutions of government but also in all the institutions which crucially affected their daily lives. Similarly a democratic society had been seen previously as one in which all its members had an equal opportunity to develop their capacities and talents; it was not seen as one in which citizens had an equal opportunity to earn more money or advance up the class ladder.

It is this old view of democracy that we must once again take up. We must use its standards and apply them to Canadian society. We must once again talk about equality. We must see justice and equality as going together. Of course, Mr. Speaker, if we do this we know we will find our society grossly inadequate and significantly unjust. Every sociological study done in European and North American welfare states in recent years has revealed their inherently inegalitarian nature. One of the most important of these, Professor John Porter's "The Vertical Mosaic" documents in chapter after chapter the inequalities of Canada's social system. The recent report of the Economic Council of Canada provides additional concrete information on the existence of economic inequality.

It might well be granted that this is the case. But what, asks the defender of the status quo, can be done about it? The answer, Mr. Speaker, is a lot. We must begin by insisting that in a democratic society—in, if you would a just society—all adults should have equal rights in all those institutions which directly affect them. Where authority is delegated, then those to whom it is delegated must be responsible to those over whom they exercise their authority.

In concrete examples, Mr. Speaker, this means that in our factories, in our offices, and in our large commercial and financial institutions, legal power must shift from the few on the top to the many below. We can of course have no illusions about completely dispensing with authority. In a complex industrial society, this is impossible. But we can democratize authority in our non-political institutions just as we have in the political. Management can and must be made responsible to the workers, just as we are responsible to our constituents.

More than this, however, is required. Not only must legal control pass from the few to the many, but also the many must be given the right to make more of the decisions themselves. Responsible university students around the world in recent months have initiated this process on their campuses.

I urge the Canadian government to promote this development, to lead the way, not only because such democratic institutions would be more just, but also because they would be infinitely more conducive to the development of responsible and creative men and women. Karl Marx and John Stuart Mill realized this one hundred years ago. Herbert Marcuse, Erich Fromm and many others have stressed the same truth in our own day. We as the political leaders of the country have a duty to initiate this battle for a truly democratic society. We have a duty, Mr. Speaker, not simply to praise our past and celebrate our present, but also to create the future. We must reject the sterile view of both the government and the official opposition. Both the Liberal and Conservative parties are bound not by bad intentions but by an outmoded and unjust ideology. They have their heads as well as their feet firmly imbedded in the ideas and practices of the past.

No amount of parliamentary reform, social razmataz, or fiscal responsibility can lead to a just society. At the very most they can remove little pockets of inefficiency. The basic unjust and unequal structure will remain. What Canadians require is a leadership deeply dedicated to the democratization of the whole of society and thoroughly committed to changing by means of law the existing power relations needed to bring this about. In recent decades we have built a welfare state. It is now time to go beyond it.

Mr. Speaker, in these brief remarks I have attempted to follow the Prime Minister's suggestion and discuss in a general way what I think the future of Canada should be. In so doing, I have also tried to indicate the inadequacies of the present. In addition, a serious approach to politics also requires proposals for specific legislation intended to bring about the desired future. In the past the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and the New Democratic party have accepted this important responsibility, and have led the way in providing ideas for the welfare state. In the days and months ahead we shall continue to provide programs intended to take us beyond the welfare state.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, according to the custom in the house I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), the mover of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) who seconded the address. Those two new members have already attracted attention in this house, because they spoke quite well and have shown their ability.

• (5:30 p.m.)

[English]

I understand there are some 100 new members in this House of Commons. To these I want to say a few particular words about the city in which they will be residing for a good part of the year, that is the city of Ottawa.

I can well remember in 1963, when I was first elected, the then member for Renfrew South in a brilliant and witty display of oratorical talent talked about the way he could feel the cold waters of the Ottawa river lapping at his back from the point at which he observed the proceedings of this house. He has since moved down to the front benches and perhaps he swims in warmer waters from time to time.

I would like to call to the attention of hon. members of this house those waters of the Ottawa river which raise an important question of policy, and which must concern us. In these beautiful days of early fall I hope that members will walk around the back of parliament hill and look down on the Ottawa river from the cliffs. I am sure every one of you will feel, as I do, the tremendous pride we as Canadians enjoy in this truly magnificient river. When I saw the rivers of other parts of the world that I have read about in history books, the Thames of London, the Tiber of Rome and, yes, even the Seine of Paris, none of these could equal the majestic river which is part of our heritage.

When Champlain came here 350 years ago he must have seen a truly inspiring sight. He must have looked at the junction of the Gatineau and Rideau rivers, naming the falls by the French word meaning curtain, and naming also the Chaudiere falls. He certainly could never have anticipated the degree of pollution of this stream that we have permitted right under our noses.

Look across to the pulp mill on the other side of the river and there you will see a symbol of the industry itself and its contribution to Canada. The pulp mill means investment, a high standard of living and many things to many Canadians. The industry is advantageous in many ways; but day after day you can observe in the Ottawa river that milky, contaminated layer of discharge of pollutants. Correction of this will be costly, but failure to correct it will probably be very much more costly in its ultimate consequences. Remember as well that the extent of sewage treatment on the far side of the river is almost negligible and the city of Ottawa itself provides only primary, coarse screening of its effluent from a metropolitan population of over 400,000.

I have placed a measure on the order paper that I hope will come up for debate before this house, which will create a national capital pollution control board, and I hope hon. members will join with me in calling this national disgrace to the attention of the people of Canada.

I hope also that hon. members will stroll down the beautiful Sparks street mall and then turn right down Elgin street. As you approach confederation square you will see before you the national centre for the performing arts which will cost, I understand, more than $45 million. From confederation square the outline of the centre has some interesting features and it is abundantly clear that the view from the side of the Rideau canal will be truly beautiful. But walk down to the Lord Elgin hotel on Elgin street and then turn back and look at it.

To the visitors on Elgin, Laurier, Albert and the mall it appears as a huge, dirty, brown wall of ugly, unrelieved cement which presents a façade that, for sheer ugliness, is almost impossible to surpass. I was one of those who looked forward with anticipation to the performing arts centre and believed, as I still believe, that it will make a tremendous contribution not only to the cultural life of Ottawa but to all Canadians.

Certainly the early models which were displayed on the Sparks street mall gave no sense of the ugliness that would be extruded from the western side of the building. Something will have to be done about this wall. In Mexico they would, no doubt, engage artists to create brilliant, ceramic tile concepts which would be striking and beautiful.

If we must have something more Canadian, I suggest we invite some of the Eskimos from Cape Dorset to come down and see what they could do to relieve a large panel of it. Possibly some of our Canadian Indians could develop some themes based on their culture, which would be distinctly Canadian. Failing this, if Treasury Board feels that they cannot afford such extra costs, and I can well sympathize with their sensitivity about the cost of this project, I suggest that they mark it out in little panels and issue spray paint cans to the citizens of Ottawa. Certainly the artarama project suggested that it was possible to do some interesting things to improve dull space of this nature. No matter what the results were, there would be a substantial improvement.

I did not mention the centre for the performing arts in an effort to be picayune or to be purely negative in criticizing the National Capital Commission, which has been responsible for advising the government on these matters and has done some tremendous things for Ottawa. It has created some parks and is building a parkways system of which we are all justly proud. But the National Capital Commission itself is in a process of transition and so, for that matter, is the future form of government for the nation's capital.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), speaking in this debate, indicated the scope of reforms which are going to be undertaken and the pragmatic way in which the government will approach these reforms. He indicated that conferences were planned at a technical level relating to the future of the Canadian constitution, and he hoped to have discussions in October or November of this year with provincial premiers.

On the subject of the national capital, there has been much speculation and a number of suggestions have been made that, in my opinion, will not stand close examination. Very few people indeed believe that the present form of municipal organization in the national capital region can survive without substantial changes in order to serve national purposes. I know that the Minister of regional development, who is responsible for the national capital is carefully studying the problem and all its ramifications.

There are those who believe we should simply create a federal district and make it a bilingual and bicultural show-piece for the rest of Canada. Indeed, the resolutions that have been passed at the conventions of all the major parties represented in this house at times came close to a simple declaration of this nature. In my opinion it might have been possible to create a federal district in Queen Victoria's day, but many things have happened since that time.

The first and foremost difficulty in creating a federal district, of course, is the matter of property and civil law within the federal district. Which law would be adopted, the common law of Ontario or the code law of Quebec? Would an attempt be made to create a district in which the two systems of law would co-exist side by side with equal rights? My legal friends tell me there are very great practical difficulties no matter what solution is chosen in this respect, although anything is possible if we are willing to put up with the annoyances involved and the possible substantial changes in property values and property rights which would ensue.

The second and equally grave difficulty, in my opinion, would relate to education. Would the new federal district adopt the educational system of the province of Ontario, or would it adopt the educational system of the province of Quebec? Perhaps it would feel obliged to create still another educational jurisdiction in this confused land of ours—a jurisdiction in addition to that of the ten provinces, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Speak to the families of bank managers, of servicemen, of employees of corporations whose livelihoods require them to be transferred from one part of Canada to another, and you will receive in an overwhelming majority of cases an eloquent plea for a reduction in the number of educational jurisdictions, not a proliferation of them. In any case, the proposed new federal district would have to break entirely new ground in the field of education. This might be desirable but it does raise grave difficulties.

Lastly, the creation of a federal district raises a fundamental problem of provincial sovereignty. It is expecting a great deal to ask the province of Quebec to yield sovereignty over a large region which is included, by the statute of the federal authority, within an area known as the national capital region.

Has there been any indication that the province of Ontario is any more willing to concede its sovereignty over an even larger area, with more people? Elected representatives who sit in the houses at Toronto and Quebec city can hardly be expected to view with equanimity legislation which would eliminate their constituencies.

In my view the solution will have to be resolved along different lines. Frankly, I prefer the twin city national capital concept. I believe that the future capital of Canada will consist of two regional municipalities. One will substantially follow the borders of the recently created regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton in the province of Ontario. The second, in my opinion, will include a similarly constituted regional municipality within the province of Quebec on the other side of the Ottawa river.

If we do follow this development of a twin city national capital, and this is the most workable and possible solution that I can envisage, there will then be the difficulty of relating the national capital commission, as the federal arm, to the regional municipalities in Ontario and Quebec. The measures which I am proposing and have placed on the order paper are designed to assist in tying together these components into what will be a functional national capital.

I have already mentioned the national capital region pollution control board to deal with both air and water pollution. I believe it will also be necessary to create a national capital commission transit authority charged with the responsibility of integrating the bus lines and an underground rail rapid transit system with north-south and east-west routes.

Frankly, I would place the rail rapid transit system as a high priority in this national capital. Indeed, a bridge for rail rapid transit, in my opinion, should have a higher priority than any future automobile bridges across the Ottawa river. This will require negotiations between the federal authority and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Only joint action involving the three government authorities can solve the confused tangle of jurisdictions, intermittent services and costly rivalries that now plague public transit in the national capital region.

I believe, also, that there should be created some form of advisory national capital region planning authority. This is difficult, because of the primary constitutional role of the provincial authorities in property and civil rights. But somewhere, at some time, representatives of the area municipalities, of the provincial authorities and the federal government, represented by the national capital commission, must sit down at the same table and agree on long term plans of the land use, traffic patterns, future building sites and the like. Lastly, I believe that an official languages board, following the general recommendations of the bilingualism and biculturalism commission, should be created for the national capital region.

Mr. Speaker, I would not like to close without some reference to the special task force on housing which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) has so ably undertaken at this time. I have had discussions with the minister and am very much impressed with the drive and integrity he is employing to resolve our national housing crisis. If one man in Canada is equipped for the task, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is so equipped.

In the national capital region the federal government has destroyed more housing than in any other part of Canada. This has been a by-product of the elimination of some bad eyesores in LeBreton Flats, Sussex Drive, and many other places. The sites that have been taken for national purposes are part of the creation of the national capital for all Canadians.

In Ottawa there is a frightful housing shortage, as the new members coming to this city will have discovered. I do not believe there are any apartment dwellers in my constituency who have faced increases of less than $20 per month in the last year. The remedy for a shortage in housing is not controls over rents, as some have urged, but creation of more housing. I hope the Minister of Transport, who has spoken so eloquently and well of the need for new Canadian cities and satellites, will choose Ottawa as the initial point for a demonstration project of what a future new satellite city should be.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is the question of the future form of the city itself. The national capital commission regards itself as the planning arm of the federal government and attempts to exercise an over-all responsibility for such things as height control, general zoning problems, the aesthetic appeal of new buildings and the like.

There has arisen a major conflict between the municipal authority of the city of Ottawa and the national capital commission on building heights. Yesterday, for example, the national capital commission called a Professor Wilbur R. Thompson from Wayne State University at Detroit to present testimony before the Ontario municipal board regarding Ottawa's skyline.

Some of Prof. Thompson's remarks, as reproduced in the Ottawa papers yesterday, gave me the greatest concern, and I question what purpose is served by the national capital commission bringing a two-day wonder of this nature to testify on such controversial matters in such unqualified fashion. For example, Prof. Thompson is quoted as follows:

> Planning concepts in Ottawa should focus around aesthetics and economic factors were in no way significant and possibly even trivial.

That is a good quote. He is further quoted as saying that Ottawa does not need large buildings. The Ottawa Citizen quotes him in this way:

> It was quite all right and even desirable for Toronto and Vancouver to have 20th century skylines, but it was quite another matter for Ottawa to have the same.

Mr. Speaker, the national capital commission is not responsible for providing the health, welfare, recreation, traffic engineering, street maintenance and other services that the city of Ottawa provides. It does not have to levy a mill rate on the citizens and answer for gaps in service. The citizens of Ottawa do not call the national capital commission if their garbage collection is unsatisfactory, but they do call their aldermen, controllers and mayor, and the city council must have the resources to do the things that the citizens require. It is a cavalier thing for a spokesman of the national capital commission to say that economic factors are not important, but members of this house know that very few of us in this life are privileged to set our rules of conduct in such narrow limits.

Mr. Speaker, I invite hon. members of this house, especially the new members, to drive along the magnificent western parkway which has just been created by the national capital commission. Drive west along the parkway from its junction on Wellington street to its termination on Carling avenue, and then turn around and come back. It is a beautiful drive. As you approach Wellington street from the west, you will pass beside Nepean bay which has been substantially beautified by the national capital commission's efforts. Look ahead and you will see Ottawa's skyline. I hope you make the trip some time just at sunset, when the lights begin to glow, and see the skyline Ottawa has created.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Francis: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the hon. member join with me in the hope that this view will not be obstructed by the national defence tower, which is planned for this area?

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I have discovered in this world that some people start with the answers and if the facts obscure the answers with which they start, so much the worse for the facts. I have always been of the opinion that one should study and observe. My view of the skyline is not that everything must be thus and so, and everything else that is built must detract from it.

I invite the hon. member to look at that skyline from the western bridge. If he does, I think he will agree with me that it is a magnificent skyline in spite of the new buildings, hotels and all the other things that have come to this city. This is good for the city of Ottawa. There is a view held by a number of people engaged in the national capital commission which runs something like this, that on Parliament Hill we have a Gothic jewel in this house, the east and west blocks, and that this view must be preserved for all time. It is believed by these people that we must create a cocoon around Parliament Hill and must desist from building other structures which might detract from this main jewel.

We have heard a professor from the United States saying that Ottawa does not need large buildings and should grow horizontally, not vertically. However, he does not have to answer for the tax base, and so on, in this city. He is putting forward purely aesthetic principles. If one is talking about the rear of the national centre for the performing arts, that is one thing; but I believe Ottawa must have a skyline. I believe there is no purpose in having federally appointed members of a public body if they do not have to answer for these things.

I read in the newspaper that an architect yesterday said that the extension of Place de Ville was not acceptable to the federal government. If Place de Ville is not acceptable to the federal government, there is a very simple remedy; the Department of Public Works could simply refuse to lease space in this building and it will not be built. On the one hand we have the federal government stating that they wish to have office space within the city in order to provide those services which the federal government must provide, and on the other we have the group concerned with aesthetics, who say that such construction is neither necessary nor desirable.

It is quite understandable in my opinion that when members of the council of the city of Ottawa and other municipalities read such testimony given by the N.C.C. and see the actions of those responsible for leases in other government departments, they think that one government department is contradicting another, and they may feel that the time has come for a major reconstruction of the N.C.C. itself.

In this brief outline I have tried to suggest to members of the house the kind of problems about which we are going to have to think in the development of our national capital. Hon. members have already had an opportunity to observe such problems in dealing with air and water pollution as the conflict of jurisdiction, the lack of adequate definition of municipal authorities on the Ottawa and the Hull side of the river, and the lack of proper liaison between these authorities and the planning arm which the government has created. One government department enunciates one type of policy while another department appears to create another type of policy.

These are the kind of problems which I am sure are being carefully studied and are the subject of a good deal of discussion behind the scenes which must continue to take place. I invite hon. members of this house to continue to take an interest in the structure of the national capital, the form of government, and the instruments which must be created so that it will be a symbol of unity and pride for all Canadians.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, befare the house rises and in order that the hon. member for Pembina may continue on Monday I should like to annonce that the business of the house on Monday starting at 11 a.m. will be the continuation of the address debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being six o'clock the house will now rise until 11 a.m. on Monday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 23, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

PATENT ACT—TRADE MARKS ACT

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO GRANT LICENCES

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-102, to amend the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act and the Food and Drugs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—PROCEDURES RESPECTING INSTRUMENTS IN VIRTUE OF STATUTES

On the order: Government notices of motions:

That a special committee of 12 members, to be named at a later date, be appointed to consider and, from time to time, to report on procedures for the review by this house of instruments made in virtue of any statute of the Parliament of Canada.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROCEDURAL CHANGES

On the order: Government notices of motions:

That a special Committee of twelve members, to be named at a later date, be appointed to consider and, from time to time, to report upon the advisability of making changes in the orders concerning the business of supply, the business of ways and means, the stages of the legislative process, and the operation of the standing committees of this House; upon the advisability of making permanent, with or without amendment, any or all the several changes in the procedures of this house that were in effect prior to the dissolution of Parliament on April 23, 1968; and upon the advisability of such other changes as the committee may deem suitable to promote the more expeditious dispatch of the business of the House; and

That this special committee is hereby instructed to make its reports to the house prior to December 1, 1968, and to include in its reports drafts of proposed standing orders drawn to give effect, if adopted by the house, to any change or changes that may be proposed by the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21, these notices of motions are transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

RESEARCH

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CANCELLATION OF GOVERNMENT PROJECTS—SATELLITE COMMUNICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement made outside the house on Friday regarding the cancellation of the ING project, and the climate of uncertainty surrounding Canada's scientific policy and the widespread concern that Canada is losing any scientific initiative, does the government intend to make a positive announcement shortly on alternative science projects and on the future role of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the science policy of the government is being studied in a continuing way by the government. These cuts came in areas where they were needed for economic reasons, and they do not detract from our intention to have in Canada a science policy that is forward looking.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that this is the third Canadian scientific project from which government support has been suddenly abandoned—the others being the HARP project and the Queen Elizabeth observatory—will the Prime Minister undertake to table the scientific reports upon which these decisions were based? Also, will the Prime Minister, with a view to reassuring the country that scientific projects will not be the scapegoat of spending in other fields, make a clear statement at an early date as to what is Canada's science policy?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the decisions to stop these projects were of course partly scientific in origin but also largely economic. Earlier on, the minister stated in the house that we will consider whether the report on the telescope will be tabled, and I hope it will be tabled as soon as all the other matters dealt with in this report have been made the objects of government policy.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SATELLITE COMMUNICATIONS PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the house expect shortly a statement on the satellite communications project, which was generally considered the alternative expenditure of funds?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this satellite project has been the subject of a report by a task force and it is being considered by the Postmaster General. It will be a matter of policy taken up in the new department under his authority.

[Later:]

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. Could the minister indicate whether it is the intention of the government to introduce at this session of parliament legislation to establish a Canadian space communications satellite corporation?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, we have every intention of introducing legislation during this session establishing a satellite corporation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAUZON, QUE.—CLOSING OF SHIPBUILDING PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development and ask him whether he has received a letter from a committee in Lauzon regarding the situation of the 800 or so unemployed as a result of the closing of the shipbuilding plant there, and if so what steps he is taking to ensure employment for most of the 800 who are still without work.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I read in the newspapers about that letter having been sent to me. Unfortunately, I have not seen it and I do not know if it has been received. I will check this morning, and as soon as I have read the letter, I will be able to tell the hon. member for York South what steps we intend to take.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

[English]

Mr. Lewis: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can he tell us whether, as a result of the continuing unemployment of approximately 780 men out of the 800, he has recently taken any steps to deal with the situation there, or is the old organizational work just being continued?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the services of the Canada manpower centres are available in these circumstances as are the other services of the department. I should not like to associate myself with the hon. member's description of these as being old programs. In fact they are relatively new, and proving effective.

Mr. Lewis: I have a further supplementary question. In view of the fact that to date the availability of manpower services has not been sufficient to find work for the 800 men affected, is the minister giving thought to any new approach or any new program to deal with this particular situation?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Can the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development tell us whether the courses—

[Later:]

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to the fact that the minister wishes to answer my question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I did not realize the minister was rising for the purpose of replying to the supplementary question.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure my hon. friend that we have different approaches under consideration at all times.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry I drew your attention, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

DAVIE SHIPBUILDING—OFFER OF RETRAINING COURSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Can he assure us that retraining courses were offered to all the former employees of Davie Shipbuilding?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, retraining courses were offered to all the employees. Some of them did not show up to meet the representatives of the Department of Immigration.

On the other hand, when the figure 800 is used in the house, it had better be checked. There were never 800 permanent employees at Lauzon. The average was 500 employees and most of them were not permanent.

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to put to the minister. How many temporary employees worked in the shipyards at Levis?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member is asking information much too detailed in nature for the question to be allowed now.

[English]

REQUEST FOR PLANS TO STIMULATE INDUSTRIAL ACTIVITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): My question is addressed to the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics on Friday that 72,000 more people are unemployed in Canada today than were unemployed one year ago, is it the intention of the government to announce in the very near future plans to stimulate industrial activity in the country as a means of countering the growing tendency toward increasing unemployment?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all our fiscal and monetary policies are aimed at reducing unemployment. As to the figures, I understand that unemployment has fallen by one tenth of 1 per cent in one month, which is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not concede that the kind of statement he has just made is identical to the kinds of statements his colleagues have made during the past two years during which time this country saw unemployment growing steadily?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING REPUBLICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister in connection with the coming constitutional conference. Has the federal government received from the Quebec government or indeed from any other provincial government a suggested formula for the setting up of a republican system of government?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the continuing committee of officials which has met already twice and which will be meeting again later this week has received from various governments in Canada briefs stating their position. I have said before that these briefs were submitted by the various governments in confidence to this committee of officials to be the basis of discussion. I do not know of any government which has released any brief such as that referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the Prime Minister at this stage state whether he and his government would entertain any formula along the lines of a republican system of government as suggested by some members of his party.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, when I refer to the subject of republican government as it appeared in the press this morning and referred to by the hon. member, I do not wish to talk of any position of a specific government. I know of course of the briefs which have been submitted by the various governments to us and the positions they take. These positions are for discussion by governments, and these discussions at this stage are still private.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that parts of the subject matter under discussion seem to be leaking out and in view of the danger that the Canadian people might perhaps get a garbled and distorted view of the proceedings, despite the best efforts of the press, would the Prime Minister reconsider his refusal to give a progress report on what is going on and seek the permission of the respective provincial governments to make such a report to this house.

Mr. Trudeau: At the meeting of the continuing committee this week we intend to raise with the officials the question of publicity to be given to the debate which will be taking place we hope late in November or early December between the heads of governments. But the position taken by the officials themselves on instructions from their governments was that the continuing committee was not to be the subject of any publicity. We have no reason to believe that any of the governments wish to change their position on that.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in connection with this matter of republicanism, in the light of the view expressed by the Prime Minister on the very fine show the other night, and when the Liberal convention was before the people, when he was asked about the Queen and stated, as I recall it, that he does not give a damn about the Queen, and in view of the fact that the Secretary of State voted for the abolition of the Queen in a motion before the Liberal association of Quebec, would the Prime Minister tell us what the attitude of the government of Canada is on the preservation of the monarchy.

Mr. Trudeau: I would be very happy to make a statement on this subject. I must preface it by saying that the memory of the right hon. gentleman is incorrect when he says that I said I did not give a damn about the monarchy. My position...

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the right hon. gentleman say?

Mr. Trudeau: The other night on television—if this is your request, sir—I said we were not the kind of government that found it necessary to make a parade of its loyalty every once in a while. My position, sir, as I stated during the election campaign and many times before, and which I have even put in writing, is that I do not believe in attacking the symbols which are important to other people. I believe the monarchy in Canada is an important symbol to many people. I think more energy would be lost in Canada by debating this subject than would be gained by our institutions. This is my position, Mr. Speaker. I can say that our government has never considered this a subject for debate. Therefore, we will continue to respect the institutions that we have until such time as the people of Canada wish to change them.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, particularly in relation to what my leader said. Admitting the need for governments to consult and experts to consider the details, does not the Prime Minister feel that it is now time to drag this matter out of the secret corners where it has been hidden, and to consider establishing a parliamentary committee so that the nation and parliament will have some say in connection with this very important issue?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, more than a year ago I said that there would be some disadvantage in having a parliamentary committee debate this question, until the opposition parties had made up their minds whether they were for one form of federalism or another. I think that as a result of the election we were not able to see very clearly what was the position of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. The chair has recognized the hon. member for Churchill.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INDIANS AND ESKIMOS—FEDERAL PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the statement made by the minister of health of the province of Ontario, as reported in the Globe and Mail this morning, to the effect that the federal government is trying to unload its traditional responsibility for health care of Indians and Eskimos on to the provinces without discussion or consultation, can the minister say whether there has been consultation between the federal government and the provincial health ministers in regard to this matter?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been consultation. Having also looked into this matter as a result of the publicity given it this morning, the hon. member will understand that I would prefer to make a fuller statement later on.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the directive sent out by his department last April indicating that traditional health services to our Indian citizens were being cut back or discontinued as part of the government's austerity program has been rescinded, and replaced by a more positive statement on this matter, as promised by the then minister?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, we are going to maintain our present level of services, but again I should like to take this aspect into account as well in the statement that I am going to make with regard to the whole matter later on this week.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the minister to make his statement in the house, in view of the tendency of ministers to make statements outside the house where they cannot be discussed or debated.

Mr. Dinsdale: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate whether the original order has been replaced, as promised last April, by a more positive statement on this matter? I am referring to the order that went out to all Indian chiefs across the country.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that my predecessor did indicate to the house that this matter was being reviewed and that the present level of medical health services to the Indians would be maintained. So to that extent, the answer is yes, it has been rescinded.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In his reply to my question the minister said that there had been consultations. Can he now say with whom those consultations were held, whether they were held with the health ministers or with the Indian people themselves?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that there has been continual discussion between officials of my department and officials of the respective health departments in the provinces. As to the number and type of such meetings and consultations that have been held, I intend to deal with that matter in a statement which, I assure the hon. member, I shall be prepared to give the house later in the week.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INCREASED PURCHASING AND PRODUCTION IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): My question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Considering the minister's previous answers regarding Canada's share of north American auto production in the 1969 model year, and considering that no special undertakings have been given by the three major auto producers as to the extent of any production increase, will the minister insist that the industry give undertakings similar to those given in 1965 to increase its purchasing and production in Canada by a specific dollar amount?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that is a long question and I hope I shall be given the opportunity to make an equally long answer. I have already reported at length on the negotiations I have had with the automobile producers. I have also referred to letters from the industry in which they show themselves to be not only totally in agreement with the pact but willing as well to continue and improve on it. I have also referred to reports that the companies have made available to the government, under regulations in the agreement, in which they have indicated their plans for the coming year. I have also indicated that I shall be in touch with the companies in January in order to discover their further plans for the next years.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We have heard all that before. Will the minister say whether he will insist on an increase of a specific dollar amount?

Mr. Pepin: No, Mr. Speaker. I understand that this is not wise and that it puts the companies into the kind of strait-jacket that is not in the best interest of the development of the agreement, of the Canadian consumer or of the production side of this industry.

An hon. Member: Some people don't think so.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. Considering the controversy which has arisen as the result of the sky line of our national capital being threatened by private building schemes, I wonder whether the minister could take steps to expedite the establishment of the parliamentary committee on the national capital, the setting up of which was approved in the previous parliament?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered this question on Friday when I said I would look into this matter quickly. I hope this week to be in a position to make a report to the house.

TRADE

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EXPORT SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): My question is addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his capacity as reporting to the house for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the extremely low grain delivery quotas prevalent in western Canada at the present time and the resulting economic hardship facing farmers, can the minister advise the house if any major export wheat sales are in sight that might help to alleviate this serious situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that negotiations will be held before long with the Russian and Chinese governments and that extreme efforts are being made to develop markets all over the world, as well as to avail ourselves fully of access to existing markets.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Has the minister received a report from his officials who attended last week's meeting of the major wheat exporters in Canberra, Australia, and if so would he indicate to the house the nature of this report?

Mr. Pepin: On Thursday afternoon at the end of the question period I received a telegram containing a communiqué issued at the end of that meeting and I read part of it in the house. I will send the full communiqué to the hon. gentleman if he so wishes.

[Mr. Mather.]

DUMPING—REFERENCE OF WHITE PAPER TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I wish to put a question to the acting minister or to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last Friday a white paper on anti-dumping was given out to us. As it seems that a deadline has been set for the passing of the anti-dumping legislation, I should like to ask the minister when the bill will be introduced in the house and when it will be referred to a committee of the house for consideration?

[English]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Perhaps I might reply to that question. It is the intention of the government at an early date to refer the white paper to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, and, when the committee has reported its conclusions on the white paper, to submit a bill to the house based on those conclusions.

HOUSING

AVAILABILITY OF MORTGAGE FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I intended to put a question to the Minister of Transport but, in his absence, I should like to direct it to the Minister without Portfolio who is responsible for transport.

As a partial solution to the housing crisis and particularly to the lack of mortgage funds, could the hon. minister ask Canadian union leaders to grant mortgage loans to their members instead of sending money to the United States, as they are doing now?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will surely understand that his question is too general and should not be asked at this time.

FINANCE

FOREIGN INVESTMENTS BY CANADIAN CORPORATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

I wonder if the hon. minister could table in the house a copy of the so-called guide lines issued on three successive occasions, May 3, July 24 and last week, to Canadian corporations with regard to their investments abroad?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I shall be pleased to table them tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN MINISTERIAL DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he is prepared to take the house into its confidence with regard to the general tenor of the talks between himself and some of his colleagues and Mr. Brosio, Secretary General of NATO, particularly with regard to Canada's participation in a forthcoming discussion at the ministerial level concerning NATO problems?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I must thank the hon. member for his question because it gives me the occasion to say that the distinguished Secretary General of NATO is present in the gallery this morning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Brosio has himself described this meeting as routine; it is his policy to visit member states every so often, especially to make contacts with members of a new government. Several ministers and I will be meeting Mr. Brosio later today.

Mr. MacLean: Is the government yet in a position to make any statement on its policy having to do with reassessment of Canada's role in NATO?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, certainly not before our meeting this afternoon.

NATO—PROTESTS AGAINST REDUCTION IN STRENGTH OF FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In connection with the belief in many circles that the government of Canada has in mind cutting down its forces in NATO, would the Prime Minister advise us whether there is any basis in fact for the statement made by Mr. Mackie of the Winnipeg Free Press—a very reputable writer—

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I am glad to see the approval over there—that strong notes of protest have been received from the British government and from the United States government against any proposal to reduce the strength of NATO forces at this time? What has been the reply of the Canadian government?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I might mention that it is not in accordance with the rules of the house to ask that a minister confirm or deny statements appearing in the press. However, the Prime Minister may wish to make his response without reference to this aspect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought the name Mackie might strike a warming note over there.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would have thought that after all his years in the house the right hon. gentleman could frame his question with greater ingenuity.

Since the Soviet military intervention in Czechoslovakia, we have been in consultation with our NATO partners both bilaterally and in NATO context. In the course of these consultations the view has been expressed by the British, among others, that there should be no reduction in NATO's forces in the present situation. This is clearly reflected in the NATO communiqué of September 4, whereby NATO members—> —affirmed the necessity of maintaining NATO's military capability and of taking into account the implications of recent developments in eastern Europe in the planning of their national forces. The over-all capability of NATO's forces, including their structure and levels, will be kept under constant review in the light of changing political and military circumstances and will be re-examined at the next ministerial meeting.

So we have received representations about the general level of NATO forces but they have not been directed specifically to Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, would the minister answer the question: Did the British government send to the Canadian government since September 4, the date of the communiqué, a note of strong protest against any suggestion that Canada might consider a reduction in its NATO contingent, in the light of the uncertainty of the statement made by the minister?

Mr. Sharp: The answer is, no, Mr. Speaker.

BIAFRA—SALE OF ARMS BY GREAT BRITAIN TO NIGERIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of massive slaughters going on in Biafra, could the Prime Minister assure the house that he made strong representations to Great Britain in order to have stopped the sale of arms by that country to Nigerian federal troops?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will only say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already answered that question.

BIAFRA—POSSIBILITY OF SUSPENSION OF DISCUSSIONS—TABLING OF LETTER TO SECRETARY GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can assure the house that he will not suspend discussions with other nations as to a possible initiative regarding Nigeria-Biafra until he receives an answer to his somewhat extraordinary letter to U Thant?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that we are continuing our discussions in the United Nations looking for some way that would assist in dealing with the humanitarian aspects of this terrible tragedy.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the house would permit me to suggest that we should revert to motions so that I could table copies of the letter I wrote to the Secretary General of the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the document in question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister not agree that in the case of the Biafran question the objective of placing it on the agenda of the United Nations should not be primarily to demonstrate support for Canada's views but to force other nations to take a stand on this question?

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons I felt it desirable to address a question to the Secretary General of the United Nations was to try to find some way of bringing this matter before the United Nations that would not result in a sterile debate on the future government of Nigeria and would concentrate instead on the humanitarian aspects of this tragedy.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell the house whether in the various consultations he has had he has discussed this matter with the Scandinavian countries and the government of Zambia, all of which have shown a tremendous interest in practical humanitarian solutions to the problem?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it was largely as a result of our consultations with like minded countries, such as the Scandinavian countries, that we decided to send this letter to the Secretary General of the United Nations.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA—ASSISTANCE TO CANADIAN NATIONALS FOLLOWING RUSSIAN MILITARY ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has his department received any requests for assistance from Canadian nationals who were visiting Czechoslovakia during the recent Russian invasion and, if so, have all requests for assistance been taken care of?

[Later:]

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, the earpiece must not have been working for the minister so I should like to repeat my question. Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate whether his department has received any requests for assistance from Canadian nationals who were visiting Czechoslovakia during the recent Russian invasion and, if so, have all those requests for assistance been processed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take that question as notice in order that I may make a full and accurate reply.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—PRESENCE OF SOVIET SHIPS AT NAVAL EXERCISES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister any statement to make on the presence of Soviet ships along with our ships at the present NATO exercise in the north Atlantic?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): The only report I can make is that we know the ships are there and following us. I think they know that we know that they know.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: Perhaps we could have joint exercises! Have we ever shadowed Soviet ships on their exercises?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I hope they do not know, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SASKATCHEWAN—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING RESERVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the hon. gentleman advise the house whether, when he met with the Premier of Saskatchewan on his recent trip, there was any discussion regarding outstanding land commitments to the Saskatchewan Indians under treaty, and if so what were the results?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I met the Premier of Saskatchewan last Friday morning and I am happy to inform the house that he has assured me that he intends to respect all the Indians' treaty rights.

[English]

ESTABLISHMENT OF LAND CLAIMS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): In the light of the minister's statements at the Indian-Eskimo Association meeting over the week end in London, Ontario, can the hon. gentleman indicate when the Indian land claims commission is to be set up?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we intend to table the bill in the House of Commons in the weeks to come.

[English]

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development if he is now in a position to make a statement with regard to the disposition of the outstanding Indian claims for reserve land in the province of Saskatchewan?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, that is a question that will be discussed during consideration of a bill to set up an Indian claims commission.

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUESTED INCREASED PENSIONS FOR AMPUTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact that there are only three or four veterans in Canada who are triple or quadruple amputees, and in view of the fact that the Woods committee has recommended that such disabled veterans be granted substantially more than the 100 per cent pension, will the minister look into this matter in the hope that action can be taken on this recommendation at an early date?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—MEASURES TO PREVENT COLLISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport, and may I say we are sorry that the minister is again away from his important portfolio today. In view of the recent unexpected Exchequer Court decision which holds the federal government wholly liable in the St. Lawrence river collision between a West German ship and a Dutch ship on April 10, 1965, what immediate precautions is the government taking to prevent a recurrence?

Mr. Speaker: This question is very general in nature. If the hon. member knows of some urgency that is not clear to me, he now has a right to have this matter debated and considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Bell: I refer it to the late show on the first day the minister is in the house.

HARBOURS

ROBERTS BANK, B.C.—CONSTITUTIONAL JURISDICTION RESPECTING RAILWAY LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the situation of continuing conflict concerning British Columbia Hydro's rail route to Roberts Bank, and in view of the fact that the provincial government controls a sole and vital link between two federal facilities, the port and the national railway system, what action does the federal government intend to take in regard to the problem of constitutional jurisdiction that is involved?

Mr. Speaker: This question should be placed on the order paper but again, if it is a question of urgency, the hon. member may give notice for debate at a later hour.

RESEARCH

ABANDONMENT OF INTENSE NEUTRON GENERATOR PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, which relates to the announcement of the abandonment of the intense neutron generator program. Would the minister advise the house why this very important announcement, which was made on Friday while the house was sitting, was made by means of a press release rather than by a statement in the house?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative. I suggest to the hon. member that his question, to my way of thinking, is not in order.

Mr. Aiken: Then, Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order. It relates to the practice of making these statements by press releases, when in fact they are very important government policy statements. I think it has always been admitted that statements of this type ought to be made in the house when the house is sitting. Certainly if the house is not sitting press releases are the obvious answer, but in this particular case the house was sitting on Friday afternoon when this statement was made, and the minister chose not to follow the usual practice.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his protest but I still suggest to him that it is not a regular point of order.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Is it the intention of the minister to answer this question by press release?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO NATIVE PEOPLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether he is now prepared to give the house an answer to the question I directed to him on Friday when I asked whether the federal government had any plans to confer with the provinces with a view to setting up joint financial assistance in the field of Métis housing, a question which the Prime Minister did not answer at that time?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If it is a question of housing, sir, I probably did not answer because I feel it would be best answered by the Minister of Transport, who is also responsible for housing. I will ask him to consider giving an answer.

Mr. Simpson: Where is he?

AIR CANADA

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the office of president of Air Canada has been vacant for several months, and in view of the fact that the former president has made a very strong recommendation for a replacement in that post from within the ranks of Air Canada, could the Prime Minister advise the house when we may expect an announcement regarding the new president of Air Canada?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question could be answered in this way, that there is a minister who is making a recommendation to the government after having studied this question very deeply and I hope that very soon—the eternal "soon"—we will be able to name this gentleman.

Mr. Hees: As a supplementary question, in view of the fact that this matter is being considered would the Prime Minister assure the house that the decision will be made on the basis of the man's qualifications, rather than political patronage?

Mr. Speaker: That question is argumentative.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): As a further supplementary question, would the Prime Minister give a firm assurance that there will not be a division of the responsibilities formerly carried out by the president of Air Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. It is possible that we will want to consider the matter of restructuring the line of authority in Air Canada.

Mr. Bell: Is the Prime Minister suggesting he is considering a two president policy, something like the two flag policy of the Liberal government?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson). Will the new government take up with the Canadian National Railways the question of increasing the pensions of retired employees of the C.N.R.? I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South would like to reply to this question.

Mr. Speaker: I assume the hon. member is directing his question to the minister, not to the hon. member for Winnipeg South.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is right. I was just identifying which minister I meant. If the Minister without Portfolio does not wish to reply now, perhaps he would be ready to answer my question at ten o'clock.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

DANGER ARISING FROM DISPOSABLE BOTTLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the resolution of the city of Kitchener which points out the danger to the public arising from disposable bottles? If this serious matter has been drawn to his attention I would like to know whether he intends to conduct an investigation?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member's very interesting question ought to be placed on the order paper.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Since the Toronto Star is acting like the Pravda at the present time, can the Prime Minister assure the house that there will be no leak of highly confidential information from the R.C.M.P.?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dumont: Could the Prime Minister not order the R.C.M.P. to keep silent as he does his ministers?

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, September 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Eymard Corbin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

The Address—Mr. Bigg

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my first words during this debate on behalf of the people of the district of Pembina must be of congratulation to yourself on your re-election to your high office. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) and welcome him to this house. On the last occasion I spoke in the house I said I hoped very shortly that we would have a man here representing those people of the great Indian nations in Canada. From the contribution he has already made I know that we can look to him to be the champion of these first citizens of Canada.

The problems facing the Indian people are many and the hon. member's task will not be an easy one. For hundreds of years his people have been the neglected and forgotten people of Canada. The hon. member's chore for many years in this house will be that of bringing forward their problems. I assure him there are many of us in the house who will wait for his contribution and will be only too pleased and ready to give him all the assistance we can.

Let me also congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), who made such a statesmanlike speech on behalf of his people in this chamber. He was positive, confident, balanced and optimistic. We are fortunate to have a man of this calibre representing his people. This is a man who not only has a different colored skin, he is a man who is already a great Canadian and we welcome him to this chamber.

I wish I could continue in this vein, Mr. Speaker, and spend the next few minutes in congratulating others, but what I have to say now touches on a note of sadness. We have as Prime Minister in Canada today a completely bilingual young man who came from favoured circumstances. He is a man who never experienced personal poverty and has had the advantages of higher education. As a result I expected that this speech from the throne would be a notable one in Canadian history. I thought that perhaps by putting aside any political feeling in these matters we might have with us again a new Laurier.

This speech from the throne is more notable for those things which were left unsaid than as a blueprint of a new, dynamic program for Canada. It appears to me to be a good example of the difference between a great deal of knowledge and little wisdom. The speech has been widely publicized and, unless I am mistaken, there has been a great deal of disappointment expressed even by those members of the press who were ready to give this man great kudos. This disappointment has been expressed by those who expected a change comparable to the conversion of Saint Paul.

I have heard from the Prime Minister's own mouth, and have read from what has been written by his own pen, certain things I never expected to hear or to see printed in Canada. There has been a direct attempt to create a division between the two great cultural peoples of Canada. He has not fooled anybody when at times he has slapped the face of his own people in order to get support from those he thought were not ready to support him.

There is hardly a member of this house who is not ready to follow a positive, loyal and dynamic approach to Canadian affairs. It is not good enough to say that we take for granted those ancient loyalties. It would be easy to say, about a man like the late General Vanier, that his past record of service to this nation left nothing to be desired. We do not have to look at or question his loyalty. However, when there is and has been a long period of doubt as to where one stands, it is necessary to make positive statements and to take a positive approach and stand in respect of loyalty to our Queen. Nothing less can be expected in this country of ours.

We have the right of free speech, even to the point of revolutionary free speech; I would not deny this to any man. When the Prime Minister of Canada speaks, whether he likes it or not he speaks for me and for my constituents. When he expresses loyalty to this nation, he must speak for all those with whom he does not agree politically.

Having regard to that part of the speech from the throne which has relation to international affairs, it is very important to me and to every other Canadian to know exactly where we stand on international affairs. It is not good enough to say, "Oh, we meet in conclave. I discuss with my ministers where we stand in NATO, where we stand with reference to Red China and the Soviet union." The predicament of Czechoslovakia, the situation in Rhodesia and Biafra and any other matter which impinges upon the rights and liberty of Canadians should be made clear to our citizens. We have a right to know. We are going back some 250 years, in the history of the British people at least, if Star Chamber tactics are resorted to. When Prince Henry IV kept company with such men as Falstaff and spent his life in pubs and in riotous living he had an excuse. He said: "Some day I will come out from behind the clouds and shine in regal splendour."

I want to know when the clouds are going to disappear and when we will see the real leadership which we have a right to expect. I am tired of guessing and waiting. Obviously the people of Pembina constituency are too because there can be no doubt that they sent me here with a mandate to ask such questions as: Where do we stand today with reference to these matters? Where do we stand with regard to our loyalties? Where are we going, and how are we going to get there?

I hold in my hand a small pamphlet put out by the national Catholic weekly newspapers, a respectable organization. They want to know whether our broadminded attitude in international affairs may not be asking of the people of Canada too high a price. What did Czechoslovakia mean to us in 1938? A great many people said, "Nothing".

I do not speak for the prime minister of 1938. I was ready to do something about it when the great French culture was tottering to its ruin and the great de Gaulle was without a home, a country and an army. I think I have a right to speak. I was within 30 miles of Paris defending that great culture, and I defend that culture in Canada also. Don't think for a minute that the defence of a bilingual culture in Canada is the prerogative of any one party or person. We are all for it. When the tumult and shouting dies down, will there be anything positive in that wonderful dream, the new hope, the just society?

I spoke intentionally of our native Indian people. We cannot start to have a just society in Canada until we begin to deal with this question. I have in my hand a letter dated September 17, 1968, from the Saddle Lake band of the Cree Indians in northeastern Alberta. To make a long story short, they want to know whether the people of this country are going to live up to their treaty obligations. The Indian people of Canada have lived up to theirs. I do not believe this is any time for us to become legalistic regardless of whether we have been to Harvard and are able to interpret treaty No. 6 which gives these Indians their rights and makes it abundantly clear that we intended to give them medical treatment equal to that received by the white man.

We took away their Indian ways. We took away their medicine man and offered them equality with us in the white man's terms. To my mind, with my limited legal knowledge, this means we intended to give them the same kind of treatment as that given to our own people. There is a paragraph in the new directive which says that the doctors will decide whether or not Indian people are indigent. I presume that if they are not indigent they will not receive anything. The figure is set at $2,000 a year. The just society, in my opinion, means something more than merely attacking poverty at the lowest level. Let us start right here. To provide only $2,000 a year to any family in Canada is maintaining them at the poverty level.

We must provide medical attention if these people need it. It is being provided for the rest of the people of Canada—in fact we are forcing it upon the provinces—and surely to goodness we can give medicare to the Indians, that group of people in our country which can least afford to pay for such treatment. Is this what is called the white man's square deal? We talk about international affairs. Let us start our square deal at home.

We worry about the Biafrans as much as anybody else. I worry about these people. I am told we cannot get to the Biafrans in order to help them. There is nothing to stop us carrying out an airlift to Saddle Lake. There is a great deal of room for the Red Cross to touch down there and at the 31 Indian reserves in the district I used to represent, namely, Athabasca. Let us start at home.

Are we going to recognize Red China? That is a good question. Are we going to recognize Red China before Red China wants to recognize herself, according to the charter of the United Nations? Red China has made it abundantly clear that she does not want to sit in the United Nations until we banish nationalist China. We speak about countries that have a de facto government. There is a de facto government in Rhodesia and we did not hesitate to impose sanctions upon that country. Some of the more militant in this country suggested the imposing of military sanctions against Mr. Smith's government. His is also a de facto government. Let us be consistent. Is it possible that we were thinking about tobacco?

There is a de facto government in Czechoslovakia. I used to think there was a Czechoslovakian government but the friends of Red China—and they are not all in the Soviet union or Albania—seem to think the de facto government of Czechoslovakia does not mean a thing. If we live up to our obligations under NATO, we will be forced sooner or later to take the same stand as we did in 1939. I believe that if we are firm now we could save perhaps millions of lives.

• (12:10 p.m.)

If we stood beside our allies in West Germany, the United States and Britain and showed there was no doubt whatsoever where we stood in NATO everybody would know where we stood. I am begging for consistency all the way through from the treatment accorded the Saddle Lake Indian reserve, to the United Nations and NATO. I want clearcut policies. I do not suggest that they should be decided in public but I believe the public has a right to know where we are going.

On June 25 we signed a huge, blank cheque which would appear to be valid for perhaps four years. What is the government going to do? I expected the Speech from the Throne to tell me some of these things. I know what the attitudes are. I have heard all the clichés. The just society is nothing new; Plato spoke about it 3,000 years ago. There are many members in this chamber who have read Greek authors. We know the old story, a square deal for everybody, but what are we going to do about it? We have the power to do something. I suggest that our plans for the immediate future—never mind 15 years from now—are picayune. Instead of trying to clean up poverty we should be seeking an affluent society for every Canadian. It will be difficult enough, with this type of program, to attack poverty. It will be a great deal more difficult, challenging and satisfactory to bring to Canada an affluent society. If we did this on a solid basis, and I think it could be done, we could be so strong at home that we could afford to be generous abroad. We could raise the standard of life in Canada to the highest in the world, because we have the resources both natural and human to do so. We have in this country people willing to work in order to achieve this goal.

To talk about supplying aid to other societies to the extent of a decimal point is not good enough. We can be of much more assistance to the rest of the world. If we doubled our own capacity for the good life we could give 10 per cent of the increase and never miss it. Instead seeking a 20-hour week under which we would share greater and greater poverty among more and more people, why not make our 40-hour week work? Why do we not challenge the people who are asking for consideration from those who are making money to help us earn it? I think they will want to do it. They do not do so because they lack leadership. If leadership is wanting because of a lack of personal experience, let me say there are 265 members in this house who are ready, willing and able to co-operate. I suggest that so far as we are concerned this parliament is not going to be a negative one.

Having pointed out the weaknesses in the Speech from the Throne I say that during the next four years we are going to press ahead and tell the people of Canada what this party stands for in the way of positive steps to bring about the affluent society. Let us stop concentrating on the negative, on poverty, and on those who do not think they fit into the Canadian society. Instead, let us give them good reasons and good opportunities to fit in. This will need the co-operation of both the young and the old.

While I am on this subject let me say that a great deal has yet to be done to repay our old people for the contribution they have made. When we ask the young people to make their contribution, let us remind them of their duty to the old and of their duty to the old standards. We can give them an education, but it will not be free; education is never free. If it is free, then it has to be made up for in effort. Young people in Canada today have never had such an opportunity. This house, the provincial legislatures and the municipalities are digging deep into the taxpayers' pockets to pay for education. I think it is high time that we, both in and out of the house, stopped telling the young people how badly they are using this money and instead tell them that we are willing to go hand in hand with them in helping them build an affluent society.

I am disappointed in the throne speech because it contains very little, if any, mention of the deplorable lack of housing and says little, if anything, about the high cost of mortgages. It says very little about the difficulties of transportation and the complete lack of transportation in the great northern and hinterland districts of Canada. It seems to me that it concentrates mostly on philosophical problems which, like poverty, will be with us always. I think we can take great steps forward in developing the natural resources of Canada with the roads to resources program.

We can do a great deal in housing if we make funds available to the right people. Of the hundreds of millions of dollars which parliament has voted for better housing in Canada, how much has gone into high-rise apartments, how much has been concentrated in the hands of the already affluent, and how little has been given to those people who need housing the most, those in the low income groups and those living in rural districts? Housing is just as important to a person living on a farm or in a village as it is to those living in penthouses. Unless my information is wrong, most of the money has been going into mortgages for the building of high-rise apartments where money was not required in the first place. The affluent have always been able to build themselves penthouses and villas on the edge of great cities. It is to the medium and low income groups that this money should go.

Not only is money needed but much can be done in setting down regulations to stop the explosion in the price of land. We should have looked into the question of the sudden increase in the price of land long ago and should have prevented this disgraceful gambling with people's lives by way of mortgage money. When I lived in Ottawa 20 years ago many a lot could have been bought for $200. Today similar lots are selling for $7,000 or $7,500. This kind of money is not available to people with small incomes, to people living on civil service pensions, nor to our old people generally.

If we believe in a just society, this would be a good place to start. Let us stop worrying about whether or not Quebec will turn into a ghetto. I cannot control this. But I do stand here and beg the government to do something about housing, about mortgage money, and about transportation to and from our resources areas. Let us take a proper stand in NATO and in the United Nations to defend, support and protect the kind of just society which I was raised to respect and admire.

I remind the government that they received only 43 per cent of the total vote in the election.

Mr. Woolliams: It is a minority government.

Mr. Bigg: In the minds of the people of Canada, this government does not have a working majority. It is a minority government and the leadership of the Liberal party is a minority leadership.

I warn the Liberal party that it will take much statesmanship to hold that party together and for it to receive the co-operation it needs. We have all been lectured on our delinquency in this regard, and there is some reason for it. But let me say that a minority leader of a minority party should give heed to the finer instincts of the Canadian people because the same press which worships him today may not do so tomorrow. The press is alive and alert and wants to keep in touch with the Canadian people up to a point. But when the government and its leader go beyond a certain point let me assure them that the gentlemen of the press will continue to be the greatest security of the Canadian people. The fourth estate is not there by chance and when the breakdown occurs its members will be ready to interpret to the 43 per cent what the 57 per cent think. The 57 per cent are not thinking right now the way they did on June 25. They are looking for action and, as I said, they are not looking for this unknown object to appear from behind the clouds and indicate exactly what coloured light he will flash on the Canadian scene. It will not be good enough just to say:

I know you all, and will awhile uphold the unyoked humour of your idleness:

We can all quote Shakespeare if we want to, if we want to know how Prince Hal became Henry V and stood in the breach himself. Never mind telling me what my duty is to the crown. I want to know what kind of leadership the leader of the Liberal party will give to the country. Let him tell his party of their duty to the crown. Today the crown does not mean some obsolete institution across the ocean. Queen Elizabeth is the Queen of Canada by our choice, and at least 57 per cent of Canadians still feel that way about her. Make no mistake about that. It seems to me also that a great many in the ranks opposite feel exactly the way I do, and silence is not enough to convince me otherwise. We do not want silence. We want a clearcut stand on this matter. I do not think it is too late for the Prime Minister himself to take a clear stand, not in the offhand way he is so used to adopting as if he did not think it mattered much. I am telling him it matters a great deal.

I would be very pleased if he would add a postcript to the Speech from the Throne and send it to Her Majesty the Queen telling her that his loyalty, the loyalty of his party and the loyalty of the whole country are so immense as to be lost in blindness of devotion. I would be more than pleased to sign that document. Then I would go on into the next four years assured that one of the anchors of our very freedom would be upheld by a man worthy to be the successor of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), leaders of the opposition parties, and hon. members on both sides of the house: May I join with previous speakers in offering my congratulations to the Speaker of this House of Commons on his unique election to this high and distinguished office. I should also like to congratulate the Deputy Speaker, who happens to come from my area. I affirm that the people of that area are justly proud of his achievement in being appointed Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. May I also congratulate the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), who moved the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and the seconder, the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand).

I wish also to take this opportunity to congratulate the Prime Minister upon his electoral success which enabled him to form the first majority government since the election of 1958. This accomplishment, which has eluded so many since that time, is a certain indication that the people of Canada expect great things from our new Prime Minister. It has been said that the people of a country receive the government they deserve. I think the people of Canada deserve the very best and I believe they have it.

It is with a deep sense of pride and honour that I address myself to the House of Commons today in the throne speech debate. At the outset I wish to express my sincere gratitude to the people of Ontario riding who have given me the privilege of being a member of this twenty-eighth parliament. I wish also to assure them publicly that I shall do everything in my power to be worthy of the confidence they have placed in me.

In this debate all three opposition parties have moved non-confidence in the government. As a direct result they have tied up this house for seven days in what I consider to be a ceremonial debate which in my view does not further the cause of parliament or of the Canadian people whom we are here to serve. I realize it is traditional to go through this ritual, but if it were dispensed with perhaps parliament would be held in much higher regard by the Canadian people.

I feel that we would perhaps behave a little differently if in the galleries of this house all the Canadian people could be present and see us acting on their behalf and doing the job for which we are being paid. I do not believe that by going through this debate we are serving any useful purpose. I wonder whether the opposition in moving its want of confidence motion really wished to defeat the government which the Canadian people elected on June 25. I do not believe they did. I really do not think they are willing to go back to the people at this moment of time to seek a mandate for themselves. I believe that the whole debate and their approach to it are an indication of their lack of regard and respect for the decision the Canadian people made on that date.

It is interesting to note that these seven days, by my calculation, have probably cost the government and hence the Canadian people approximately $1 million. What have we done? The opposition parties say that we must get to work. They say that the throne speech was a disappointment. They say that we have unemployment and a housing crisis. All these things are true. If we are genuinely concerned about serving the people we should dispense with this debate and get on with the business at hand so that we can deal with the problems which everyone on this side of the house wishes to deal with effectively.

If I might turn for a moment to the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), he included in his remarks a statement that the government of this country is unworthy of the great confidence the Canadian people have placed in it. Personally I would rather rely on the collective wisdom of the Canadian people, as exercised at the ballot box, than I would on the judgment of the Leader of the Opposition who has a vested interest in being critical for criticism's sake.

Second, for some unknown reason which I do not understand he related this government to that of the beloved John F. Kennedy and found it to be lacking in comparison. We all loved Kennedy, I believe, but I do not think the leader of the Liberal party and Prime Minister of this country needs to take a second seat to any man, including that man whom we loved so much.

The Leader of the Opposition went on to point out that during the last election his party did not traffic in simple solutions. I do not know what justification there was for that statement, but there must have been some psychological reason for his using the word "traffic" in the first place. Perhaps it was because he was envious of the crowds and the traffic that surrounded the Prime Minister during that campaign. The Leader of the Opposition speaks of the just society as merely an empty slogan and then goes on to use it as a meaningful one. I do not think it is an empty one. It is an ideal of the highest priority which I do not think can be overemphasized. I believe every member on this side of the house genuinely wishes to achieve this goal.

I believe that the just society means protection of individual rights, sharing of individual responsibilities, equality for everyone and privilege for none. I believe we can strive for this ideal but that we can never attain it. If this house sat from now until doomsday I believe that on that last day we would still be justified in seeking a just society because if one were achieved at this moment we would, since we live in a rapidly changing society, be causing injustices accidentally in various spheres. So there is always room to move forward toward the achievement of this objective.

The Leader of the Opposition said that the Canadian people and he personally have lost faith in our Prime Minister. Frankly I never knew he had any faith in him. I think it would be a good idea if he were to be fired with the kind of enthusiasm that we have for the future of this country and got away from the negative approach he seems to have employed.

During the last election campaign the Prime Minister of Canada was attacked by the Conservatives for being a radical socialist and accused by the New Democratic party of being a reactionary Conservative. This brings to mind a statement by G. K. Chesterton when at one time he spoke of the ideal man and said that the ideal man would appear too tall a man to a man who is too short, too short to a man who is too tall, too fat to a man who is too thin and too thin to a man who is too fat. The fact is he was just right. I think that is the problem the Prime Minister of Canada has; he is just right for this country.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Far to the right.

Mr. Cafik: May I comment now on what the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) had to say. I am glad the members of his party feel the way they do but what they say is not quite true. They seem to feel they have the exclusive right to represent the working man, the common man, but they do not have any such exclusive right. They have never governed this nation. This nation has been governed since Confederation by the two major parties. We have done a great deal for the common man of this country and plan to continue to do so. I do not think it is fair, right or just to be critical of the two major parties at one stroke, as if we all suffered from the same sickness and none of us really cared for the ordinary man of this country. We do care and care deeply, and this is why we want a just society and are willing to work in order to achieve it.

• (12:30 p.m.)

The hon. member for York South spoke of the need today for a diverse system of education in order to enable people to find work in the rapidly changing society in which we live. I think the hon. member is right. However, perhaps he should listen to his own words, move on to the second stage of his education and get rid of some of the old 19th century concepts of economics which are completely outmoded today.

The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), whose colourful remarks I enjoyed very much, mentioned four principles of Social Credit. I agree with the first three but with regard to the fourth, which we would all love to have, may I say we are not living in the world of Dr. Pangloss where all things are as they ought to be and if a thing is physically possible it is financially possible. It would be wonderful if that were so, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I could bring to the hon. member's attention a statement quoted some time ago in respect of money and its use, that if one's outgoing is greater than one's income, then one's upkeep will be one's downfall. This is one aspect that has not been recognized, that we just cannot create money out of the air. We have to work for it. We have to produce it before we can put it to work.

I should like for a moment to take note of some of the problems that I feel are of greatest concern to me as the member of parliament for Ontario riding and representative of the people of this area. I do not want to pretend in any way that these problems are confined to my area alone because many are national in scope. However, the people of the area in which I live, which suffers to some extent from being outside metro Toronto yet is a bedroom for it, have some very unique problems, and something must be done about them. Unfortunately, all of our problems cannot be settled at the federal level, but surely there is some way whereby, with co-operation and good will from those at the provincial level, something can be done to alleviate the hardships of the people of my area.

First of all, there is the problem of housing. We have all heard a great deal about the housing situation today. Most of the members on the other side have indicated that we have not recognized the problem and are not moving on it. One of the problems for some of my constituents is that we are moving too fast. The task force on housing which has been set up is meeting in the Toronto area on the last day of this month and the first two days of the following month. Some people would like more time to prepare their briefs to this task force, but they do not have the time. Surely the reason for this is that we are so anxious to solve the problem that we cannot give them sufficient time. Housing is a great problem in our area. People desperately need homes, but those in the lower income brackets cannot afford them because of high land cost. Many of the people in my area cannot even afford to pay the property tax on their present homes.

I should like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that land taxes in southern Pickering township per $5,000 assessment are roughly $75 a year more than anywhere else in Canada. This is a burden that cannot be tolerated and must be overcome in some co-operative way. In addition, the present high interest rate on mortgages is a depressive factor. However, the government is doing something about this and interest rates have begun to fall. I hope that we can do more.

Many ordinary working men and women in my area are concerned about income taxes and particularly that such taxes be more equitably applied than is the case today. The Carter report has suggested some ideas that we could use in order to correct some of the injustices of the present tax system. I believe it would be in the interest of the nation thoroughly to study the Carter report and to implement as many recommendations as we can to equalize the tax burden on all the people of this country, so that none are privileged and none are taken advantage of.

Since half of my riding is an agricultural area, I should like to say that I believe much more can be done as well in this field. I should like to relate, if I may have your indulgence, a story about two farmers in order to illustrate the plight of the farmer today. These two farmers had bought sweepstake tickets. One farmer said to the other: "If you win the $100,000, what are you going to do with the money?" The other farmer gave the usual answer, which was that he was going to buy himself a boat and a cottage and might even tour the world. When he had concluded he turned to the farmer who had asked him the question and asked him what he would do with the $100,000. The first farmer replied: "Oh, I think I would just keep on farming till it had all gone". This, Mr. Speaker, illustrates the plight of many farmers, and something must be done to assist them.

I think something should also be done for the elderly people in my riding, as well as all across this great country, to offset the effects of inflation on those such as the retired who have to live on fixed incomes. They are caught in a cost-price squeeze that they really cannot get out of. An injustice is, I think, being inflicted upon these people about which something must be done.

I should also like to say a few words in connection with labour. This summer we have seen many strikes, though God knows I defend the right of labour to strike. Certainly I would do nothing to try to upset the balance of power, as it were, that exists today. But I think that with proper study we should be able to come to a solution which would settle labour problems in the interests of both sides and thus avoid any suffering by the Canadian people as has been the case in recent years.

I have the privilege of having two Indian reserves in my riding and I wish to add my comments and convictions to those of the previous speaker who so eloquently spoke on behalf of Indians and the need for justice to be done.

On the national scene I believe there are some basic and important issues, one of which is parliamentary reform. I think we must do something to give this parliament a system that will meet the needs of the 20th century. I do not think we can live with the rules of 1962. I believe that the Canadian people expect parliament to be able to respond quickly and energetically to meet their problems. I earnestly ask that all members of this house bring to bear what pressure they can on their leaders to bring about the achievement of workable rules for this house, rules that will allow us to move quickly in the interests of the Canadian people.

The primary challenge, in my opinion, is to feed the hungry of the world. This is the most important international issue. If we are to have peace we must eradicate the causes of unrest. I think the chief causes of unrest are lack of education, lack of food and lack of development. Since we are an agricultural nation with so much food that we cannot use, I hope we will be able to find some way of using these resources to the benefit of people throughout the world who are starving.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say I believe that the twenty eighth parliament will truly meet the high expectations of the people of this country. I sincerely hope and pray that God will guide us in our deliberations so that we too will learn as a nation to give to others as God has so generously given to us.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, as a new member participating in the proceedings of this house I am deeply impressed by the high regard in which Your Honour is held by members on both sides of the house and by the genuine pleasure with which Your Honour's re-election as Speaker was welcomed. I add my congratulations to those already extended to Your Honour. I also congratulate the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of committees and all those who have been appointed to discharge heavy burdens of responsibility as ministers of the crown or parliamentary secretaries.

May I also congratulate the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) on his appointment as Minister of Agriculture. I feel he is well qualified for his post and I hope in the future to work with him in order to solve some of our problems to our common advantage.

My constituency, Battle River, is primarily devoted to Agriculture and its related industries, and I know that when one rides over the prairies, watches the snow drift like sand and listens to the coyotes howling at night it is possible to divorce oneself from the reality of the times. I think it is also possible to divorce oneself from reality in this House of Commons by reason of the clash of conflicting personalities or some members' search for personal acclaim. In our questions and debates we must remember, surely, that the four parties represented in this house are striving for the same end, the betterment of the life of all the people of this nation. We differ only in the means to that end.

The people of my constituency are perhaps not overly concerned about the political stripe of their federal representative in Ottawa. On the other hand, they are very much concerned about their livelihood, about the mortgages on their farms and about their mounting debts, as well as about the diminishing net return they obtain for their produce.

For years governments and economists have told farmers to become more efficient, and the farmers have answered this call. In 1949 the cost of the wheat in a loaf of bread was slightly over 3 cents; in 1967 that cost was a shade over 3 cents, and in 1968 it may be even less. How many in Ottawa today realize that if the farmer gave his wheat away a loaf of bread would still cost 26 cents?

The productivity of the worker in agriculture is far higher than the productivity of the worker in any other segment of our economy, with the result that the percentage of our net income which goes to feed us is today smaller than it has been at any time in our history. Canadian farmers have continued to sell their wheat at agreed world market prices at a time when almost all other wheat exporting countries have paid their wheat producers a support price.

When it comes to the manufactured goods that we sorely need and must buy if we are to become more efficient, we buy those goods at extremely high prices, in part brought about by the organizational strength of big business and labour. Tariffs protect industry, and we bear the expense; labour unions increase their demands and are given what they ask, largely at our expense. When we complain we are told to become more efficient. I ask the Prime Minister, where is our place in the just society?

When we examine figures that are available and look at the capitalization of the average farm, it appears that farmers as a class are fairly wealthy. I say that it is little consolation to live your life in poverty and die in affluence. Farmers are showing an increase in net worth only because land values have gone up, partly because of inflation and partly because more people are on this planet.

Many believe that the answers to problems facing farmers and businessmen are to be found by making money available cheaply by way of farm improvement loans, cash advances through the Farm Credit Corporation, and so on. Some ask, does that sort of thing not prolong the agony? For the good, efficient operators, yes, cheap money may be the answer. But it can also be a trap for the unwary and those unskilled in the use of capital. I ask, is there any point in forcing all but the exceptionally efficient operators off the farm? Men must live somewhere, and a problem farmer may well become a problem city dweller.

What our farmers need is a greater return in terms of real, net income for their produce, no matter where that increase comes from. The voices of agriculture—the people who represent farming, are not now and are not likely to be again a major political force in Canada simply because there are not many farmers. Nevertheless, may I remind the house that the agricultural segment of our population, small though it may be, is the leading purchaser of manufactured goods in Canada. If the purchasing power of our agricultural community is curtailed we shall be faced with the greatest depression in the history of our nation. With the productivity of workers being what it is in this country, the bulk of our industry is unable to compete in world markets. Our industrial complex needs the captive market that it has in the agricultural community. My greatest fear is that if the farmer, and particularly the western farmer, does not achieve his rightful place in the just society, separatist movements will arise in parts of the country other than Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): Mr. Speaker, as a new member of the house I feel singularly fortunate to have been given the opportunity of making my maiden speech so early in the session. May I add my congratulations on your re-election to the office of Speaker. I do not think any finer tribute can be paid to a man than his election to a position of responsibility by his peers. I take it to be the consensus in this house that the time has come for the appointment of a permanent Speaker, and I can think of no man more appropriate to fill this post than Your Honour.

• (12:50 p.m.)

I also wish to express my congratulations to the Deputy Speaker. I know this appointment was warranted. I must say I watched this appointment with more than a casual interest because as a result of the hon. gentleman's elevation I too was elevated, from the second floor to a much larger office on the fourth floor.

I wish to pay tribute to the mover (Mr. Corbin) and the seconder (Mr. Marchand) of the motion for the address in reply. As teammates of Bobby Hull and Stan Mikita must have said in the past, I am happy they are on my team.

I represent the riding of Sarnia, before redistribution the historic riding of Lambton West. In addition to the City of Sarnia, the heart of the chemical valley, located on the southernmost tip of lake Huron and along the beautiful St. Clair river, dominated by the international Blue Water bridge, my riding also includes the townships of Moore, Sarnia Plympton, plus that proud-as-punch village of Point Edward, and lastly—and I place it last only because I wish to give it special emphasis—the Sarnia Indian reserve which lies wholly within the limits of the city of Sarnia. Members of the Chippewa nation reside on this reserve and I am proud to count myself an honorary member of the tribe. My Chippewa name is Pa-Mi-Noh-Ding. When given this name I was told of the reason and of the history of the name, and I must say it was most flattering, but when I tell you its translation I am certain that members of the house, more particularly those seated opposite, will be able to devise a more appropriate reason for my being given this name which means, "Travelling with the Winds".

New members sit here feeling humble but not too humble because we represent 60,000 to 70,000 people, in some areas more than this, and we have an obligation to speak, be it to make a maiden speech or to speak up in caucus, and when new members, without betraying the secrets of caucus meetings, speak in the house I trust that they are heard and listened to.

I read with considerable interest and delight Mr. George Bain's column in the Globe and Mail of June 28 headed, "Advice to the New Boys". Well, Mr. Bain, we were under no illusions that if elected we would end up immediately as members of the cabinet but I would have preferred, and I am sure other new members would have also, if the title of your excellent column had been "Advice to the New Boy's Constituents". Incidentally, two people in Canada were convinced that I had become a member of the cabinet. I was sorry to have to inform these two hopefuls that it was Bud Olson and not Bud Cullen who had become the Minister of Agriculture.

Listening to some of the addresses over the past few days it has occurred to me, as it may occur to other hon. members after hearing my address, that we could dispense with a great number of these speeches and get down to business sooner, and this would be my recommendation for rule change No. 1. Second, if I am to take up the time of this house I feel it is incumbent upon me to make a few suggestions or to express a few ideas in the hope that one or more may be taken up.

The other day I heard a comment from an hon. member which indicated that the Liberals had placed no questions on the order paper. May I say, to him, Mr. Speaker, that this member and others have posed several questions directly to the ministers or to the departments involved. For example, I have directed to one of the ministers the question: how much revenue would the government lose if we were to increase the basic exemption for income tax for a married man from $2,000 to $4,000? That is, can we afford it?

I want to know if retired civil servants will receive an increase in their pensions. If so when, and if not, why not? I am not asking this question in the belligerent manner of the opposition but my question and my concern are no less sincere.

The Department of Public Works in a news release at the end of August, 1968, indicated that soil erosion tests had been taken with respect to the banks lying along the shores of the St. Lawrence and the St. Clair rivers and suggesting that some of this erosion might have been caused by heavily laden lake boats. I was interested because of soil erosion on Indian lands fronting on the St. Clair river. The news release indicated that subsidies would be available if erosion had been caused, to some extent, by these heavily laden lake ships. I toured in the R.C.M.P. boat and walked the full distance personally to observe the damage in this area. I then met with the Indian council and the Sarnia city council at a general meeting to hear their views. Following this I contacted the local inspector for the Department of Public Works, Mr. Dunphy, in London.

I wrote a letter to him and sent a copy to the Department of Public Works. I wrote directly to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing). I spoke directly to the Minister of Public Works outside caucus and explained the problem to him so that he would be fully informed when the soil boring tests have been completed. Soil boring tests are a must, of course. I am happy to say that the Indian council has given permission to the city of Sarnia to conduct soil boring tests, that the city commissioner in Sarnia will make a report and a recommendation as to the type of construction of seawall which will be required to save the Indian lands in this area, which will then be submitted through appropriate channels for a decision. So questions are being asked and action is being taken.

As to my approach to questions affecting veterans, I would only say that I was 18 when the war ended but my father served in both world conflicts, in the Royal Naval Air Service in world war I and in the R.C.A.F. as a Squadron Leader in world war II. He then served as district administrator for the Department of Veterans Affairs in North Bay until his retirement. I know the plight of the veterans. In me they will find a sympathetic ear. I wrote to the president of the Royal Canadian Legion to let him know this—and when a lawyer and politician puts something in writing, you know he means it!

Prior to and after my election I had many discussions with Chief Fred Plain of the Sarnia Indian reserve. I had heard about consultation meetings to be held in Toronto and at my own expense and in my own time I attended the three-day session held there. I followed this up with discussions with the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras) and subsequently directed questions to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals may not have put their questions on the order paper and may not get the credit that such public notice often gives, but I would have you know that we are busy asking many questions, getting answers and, more important, getting action.

I indicated earlier that prior to redistribution the Sarnia riding was the historic riding of Lambton West. Canada's first Liberal prime minister, Right Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, came from my historic riding. Shortly—I believe on October 15—a memorial is to be unveiled in his honour in the city of Sarnia. I am also proud to report that my former associate, Mr. Ross W. Gray, Q.C. served in this house as a Liberal member from 1930 to 1945. For a considerable number of years he served the Liberal party as whip. Afterwards the area was represented by Mr. J. W. Murphy, a Conservative. I must say that notwithstanding our differing political views Mr. Murphy was good enough to contact me and give me some direction with respect to practice and procedure in the House of Commons. In 1962 Mr. Walter Foy was elected and thereafter contested three elections successfully. He retired because of ill health and is now enjoying his retirement in Florida.

I mentioned earlier that the Sarnia riding was known as the chemical valley. Rightly so, because situated along the St. Clair river are such industries as Imperial Oil, Polymer Corporation, Dow, Dupont, Canadian Industries Limited, Ethyl Corporation and many other large oil and chemical industries. But the economic strength of the community does not rest solely on the base provided by heavy industry. Credit must also go to the farmer and to the small businessman who unfortunately receive little, if any, credit in an address such as this.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Cullen: This morning during my opening comments, Mr. Speaker, I was unfortunately interrupted by the clock. I note there are some clock watchers on the other side of the house. However, I now wish to continue my remarks. I had mentioned that Sarnia riding is famous for its oil and chemical industries but I would also like to say that the economic strength of the community does not rest solely on the base provided by heavy industry.

In my area credit must also go to the farmer and to the small businessman who, unfortunately, receive little if any credit in an address such as this. It is easy to cite the larger and more well known industries and ignore the small businessman. Under the liberty provided by a maiden speech I would like to commend Manley's Bookstore; Keelan's, Phippins, Kirks, Lampel and Zierler furniture stores; Pauls T.V.; McKellar Flowers, Doug Keddy Shoes and Walker Brothers stores. In a list of established small businesses in our community it is impossible to name all the thriving small businesses, but by naming just a few I hope to honour them all.

A Liberal member is, of course, concerned with heavy industry and small business alike, and with the conditions of employment and the improvement of same. I submit that this is also the joint responsibility of the employer and the employee. It is the obligation of the numerous unions in our area to see to it that not only are these conditions set but that they are maintained through proper grievance procedures. I believe that working conditions in our area are second to none but I would hope that the labour unions and larger industries would work toward their improvement. As a touring campaigner, and prior to that as an ordinary citizen of the community, I have looked into many of the industries and I recognize that there is definitely room for improvement.

I think it is unfortunate that the man in the street all too often takes exception to the chip on the shoulder attitude of labour unions and as a result much of the good work of a labour union is lost because of poor public relations. I am pleased to state that in my area this image is improving steadily. Recently at a Labour day parade a member of the provincial parliament and myself, both of us having been members of labour unions in their early days, expressed the opinion that a Labour day parade should contain not only members of unions but should be a tribute to labour and should be a parade of employer and employee.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, as a new member I wish to make two comments. I think that most new members were caught up in the recent election with a sense of responsibility for our communities and the people who live in them. This is applicable as much to other parties as to mine. I should like the Canadian people to know that we are not down here in Ottawa as retired businessmen. We are down here as working men prepared to do a job. We are also intelligent enough to realize that our contribution must be small at the beginning. But we would hope that by doing a small job well we will be given an opportunity to perform larger tasks at a later date.

Second, and on a more partisan basis, as a member of the Liberal party I am convinced that the government of this country is in capable hands under outstanding leadership. There are too many people today who would say that the Liberal party with its great majority should take the bit in its teeth and press on, but I would remind these people that a horse that takes the bit in its teeth soon loses all sense of responsiblity and direction.

We have an obligation to lead. We will lead. We will put our legislation on the order paper and that legislation will be debated as it should be debated. Changes will be made where they should be made, and it will ultimately become the law of the land. It will then be for the people of Canada to speak out in four or five years time and they can be the ultimate judges of whether the legislation has been good or bad for the country. I am proud to have been given an opportunity to play a small part.

I wish to make one apology to mes amis Canadiens qui parlent français: je ne parle pas français. When I lived in Northern Ontario and worked in construction and underground, I had many supervisors who spoke only French. I spoke only English, yet we were able to communicate one with another and get on with the job. Most of the French directed at me was of a dialect type, and many times I heard the expression "hurry up—dépêche-toi." I say to both sides of the house that with respect to the business of government all Canada is saying, "hurry up—dépêche-toi."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be those traditional ones, not in any way perfunctorily conveyed, of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply. I congratulate them on the manner of their delivery. If I at any time question the content of their remarks they will realize I have no personal motivation at all.

• (2:40 p.m.)

I am so happy, Mr. Speaker, that we in this parliament have achieved the enviable situation whereby we have a continuing Speaker presiding over our deliberations. I was never one of those who had any sympathy for the artificially contrived suggestions as to how we should arrive at a permanent Speakership. I have always believed that the Speaker should be one of the members and that when a given member received the accolade of trust and confidence of his fellows then in fact we would be dealing with this situation as it should be dealt with. I am quite happy this time has come.

There is much that one could say about the throne speech. It is an old canard, of course, that the opposition maintains there is nothing in it but finds opportunity to discuss it for a good many days. I would like to support what my colleagues from the Atlantic provinces have said so far. They have mentioned the burning question of regional economic disparity. Let me say that some of us from that region did not need the words from the Economic Council of Canada to know that disparity existed, that poverty was prevalent and that there were many areas of need. I do say that the whole question has been brought to a new and high level by the immense fairness and, indeed, the brilliance of the discussion which the Economic Council has produced. I hope that the government, which I trust will be more sensitive than I feared, will listen, heed and follow the advice and the suggestions of such an eminent and important body.

I suppose in a way we are all new members here in that the process of the changes in representation has caused nearly everyone to represent a new constituency. I should like to say a word of gratitude to those people in the constituency of Hillsborough who have entrusted their affairs in this sphere to me. I am in one of the unique situations in that my colleague and I from a former dual riding find ourselves representing neighbouring ridings. I now try to represent alone the people whom the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) and I represented together for 11 years. I want to say here in this arena how much I appreciated the opportunity of serving jointly with him in one of the last two remaining dual ridings in this country, and how as a neighbour now I wish him well as he represents with distinction the riding of Malpeque in this assembly.

I have been concerned since I came to this house, Mr. Speaker, with the role that this country plays and should be playing in the outside world. As one goes back over the debates of the Canadian House of Commons he sees a gradually increasing degree of interest and a broadening involvement in the question of Canada's international personality. I have always regarded this question as one which should be as devoid of partisanship as any issue of public policy could possibly be. We have not had many ministers of foreign affairs, and none of them in the discharge of this portfolio has been the kind of person who has evoked extreme partisanship. Indeed, it was said here to be almost a miracle that the preceding minister was capable of appearing to have dropped a quarter of a century or so of partisanship. None of the remarks that I now make on some of the burning questions in respect of external affairs are motivated by intense partisan feelings. In fact, I am often accused of being not sufficiently partisan in this grown-up league of politicians.

I have watched with concern in recent weeks the discharge of our international obligations and the exercise of our leadership on the world scene. I have watched in particular what has happened since the present minister assumed this most important portfolio. I have watched for leadership in many areas of potential possibility for Canadian leadership. I still look for some fulfilment of our role in the West Indies, one of the few areas where we need not be troubled and traumatized by our relationship with big powers but where we can move effectively and efficiently to accomplish something in the range of our own power which will be meaningful to many people.

I look too for something more in our hemispheric relationships. I also look for a rationalization and reorganization of our external aid program. I cannot believe that a country like Canada can mount a meaningful program of external aid to 64 countries scattered all over the world. The more I look at what has happened through our external aid program the more convinced I am of the correctness of that appraisal.

I now come to one subject, and because I refer to it primarily I do not want to imply that I think it is the only area of anxiety and concern to our external approach. For a long time we have been watching developments in that great Commonwealth state, if I may use that phrase now, Nigeria. Month after bloody month we have seen a shocking increase in the number of deaths, an appalling spread of suffering and a widening of devastation, something which should touch the hearts of the least sensitive people in any civilized community.

The trouble in Nigeria is not new. Open conflict itself is months and months old. The records of this house indicate that the house had its attention drawn to this question on more than one occasion. In March of last year the then Prime Minister indicated to me that continuous communication was going on with the Secretary General of the Commonwealth organization. In the same month he indicated that this was one of the important subjects for discussion when Prime Minister Wilson was to come to Ottawa the following week. A discussion about Britain supplying arms was also entered into in this house in the very same month.

At the last meeting of the standing committee on external affairs we were privileged to hear perhaps the outstanding Canadian expert on this question, Dr. E. H. Johnson. He is a man whom I call very carefully an outstanding ecclesiastic statesman, indeed a man who has been received by both sides and whose intimate knowledge and profound concern should have guaranteed an immense and immediate response to his message. I was sad at the time and I am even more sad in retrospect when I think how little was the ripple which his poignant and pointed story aroused, and how few from the external affairs department, from the press and from the public heard his words or were stirred by them.

Now we are at a stage where the suffering of the Biafrans has become hot news. There can be no moralizing on this aspect. I am happy that finally we are stirred, rather than filled with recrimination by the fact that it took so long. I believe we are at a stage where our government reflects not the concern of the people. Surely, Mr. Speaker, in a matter of such vital importance, if the government cannot lead its people it should at least reflect the views of the Canadian citizen.

I say that the Canadian people are deeply disturbed by the suffering in Biafra. They are questioning what this country is, and is not, doing. I think perhaps I reflect the attitude a little better than the minister when I say frankly that I am ashamed, I am embarrassed, I am disappointed and I am dejected by the reaction which this government has shown to one of the most shocking crises in humanity that has faced us.

We know that thousands are dying weekly. There has been eminent testimony to the sad truth of these statistics. We know how widespread is the suffering; yet we have a great country like our own seemingly tied up in diplomatic niceties and able to do nothing more than write the kind of letter which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) wrote to the Secretary General of the United Nations under date of September 21, calling for suggestions.

Canada, a charter member of the United Nations, the senior member of the commonwealth, a country which produced a former and distinguished president of the United Nations general assembly, having, according to the government's own statement, studied the matter for month after month, now writes the kind of communication which was addressed—God help us—in our name, the name of the people of Canada, to the Secretary General of the United Nations. One expression in this letter makes my usual ruddy complexion a little redder. I quote as follows:

> I realize that to raise the situation in Nigeria in general terms before the general assembly could be divisive.

I repeat, "Could be divisive." It would be a shocking thing to have division while thousands die! This is the kind of utterance which would make Neville Chamberlain appear as one of the most vigorous and aggressive men of all times. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is perhaps the most mealy-mouthed and pusillanimous document that students of international affairs will ever be able to lay their hands upon.

What in the world was the United Nations created for? Was it created to avoid division, to avoid debate, or to assist humanity? If ever there was a clearcut case where action is called for and aid must be rendered, it is now. I do not like to criticize even people whom I oppose, let alone people whom in a personal way I like very much, such as the present minister. But I am wondering how he can justify his correctitude in all the niceties of diplomatic parlance, which is an evasion of the humanitarian challenge. It was popular in this house to jest with the former secretary of state for external affairs, now Senator Martin. But I wonder whether his circumlocution, about which we made a bit of fun on occasion, has been substituted by that clearcut, precise evasion that leaves the question undealt with.

Nor is it only this minister. Government policy, of course, must be accepted by all ministers as well as the Prime Minister. I think we should recall one of the first applications of the brilliant mind of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to this question. I quote from an article which I commend to all hon. members. This article appeared in the Montreal Star of September 16, written by perhaps the finest scholar in the country on international relations, Mr. Eayrs. He writes that on July 10, at a press conference, the question was put this way to the Prime Minister:

> "There's (criticism of) the government for not sending aid to Biafra. What is the government doing here, and what should the government be doing?" To which the Prime Minister replied: "You have the funniest questions". Pressed for an answer, Mr. Trudeau remarked: "I think we should send aid to all needy people, but we can't send it to everyone, and I'd have to see what priorities are prior to the Biafra people".

I would suggest that perhaps anyone with a modicum of sympathy and a grain of intellectual acumen might suggest that life would be at least the first priority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macquarrie: I think hon. members are aware of the details of discussions. We know that the Organization of African Unity has had a part suggested for it. We know what has happened. We know what the international committee of the Red Cross has been doing. We know what certain religious groups in small countries of Europe have been able to do. We know that the suffering is there. We know that foodstuffs have been made available, and we know it is not terribly far from Sao Tome and Fernando Po to Biafra. And we know there is danger. But are we in this new generation of such little faith that we as a nation and as a people are afraid of division and afraid of danger?

• (3:00 p.m.)

Where are the Canadian aircraft which could carry the food to the suffering and dying Biafrans? Have they been offered? Has it been said to the Red Cross, "take these aircraft? We will be proud to have them fly with Red Cross markings to aid the suffering in an area of the world where the suffering should cry out in eloquent terms which need not be documented in letters to the UN authority." I think the people of Canada would like that to be done. I do not think we want to stand on the niceties of correctitude, protocol and propriety. I think we want to aid suffering humanity where we see it at its worst, and where would that be but in Biafra? We have put up over a million dollars, and that is fine. We are trying to play our part in this organization and in that one according to this letter, but as day follows day the number of deaths of Biafrans mounts, the area left to them diminishes, and I am afraid that the day may not be far away, alas when the subject will become academic.

I appeal for action. I do not think the government is aware of the degree of commitment and compassion which the people of this country have. I say, forsake your fears, discard your technical niceties, throw off your protective coloration of protocol, and assist the people in Biafra whose suffering is indescribable, although a few brave people have gone in and tried to describe it. I think the government will have the support not only of political parties but of people all over this country. We do not want to stand shamefaced. We as a great country do not want to be doing less than a few churches in West Germany and in Scandinavia. When I think of a few Christian people being able to find an aeroplane while we with our integrated and updated craft cannot get them moving, I say, shame. Let us move on this issue. There will be no just society without compassion.

I make no apology for devoting my time and hopefully directing the thoughts of all to this matter rather than to appeals on behalf of my constituency and my region—and goodness knows there are many that I could make—but speaking on an issue of conscience surely we do not ever wish to lose our ability to react as a humanitarian nation. We do not want to have another 1935 when for a moment Canada gave leadership at the League of Nations and then, for small, petty, partisan reasons, that leadership was self-repudiated. Let us not be afraid to follow the dictates of the hearts of our people. History shows that this is not only a matter of compassion. If you turn your back upon your obligations in any part of the world, if you forget at any time that the questions which face mankind are directed to you, you will suffer thereafter. I appeal very simply for an end to equivocation, an end to evasion, and an end to passing not even resolutions this time but responsibility.

Let us give the Canadian people a little leadership in this matter. Let us find one avenue of action which will not divide our people and not be subject to partisan bickering, an avenue of action in which Canadians as humane and decent people can say that they, being led by their government, are doing something which in modesty and in justice they say is good for us to have done.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I had intended in this speech to direct my remarks to a discussion of a problem which is very acute in my own constituency and in many others throughout Canada, namely, the question of housing, and then to take advantage of the wide scope of the rules to discuss international affairs generally. But I want to follow the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and discuss the situation which exists in Biafra at the present time.

I wish to give priority to this subject because it is an urgent problem at the present moment. I want to speak first about the threat of starvation to many hundreds and thousands of civilians in Biafra. It is a matter in which the hearts, minds and consciences of all the members of this house are engaged. It is a tragic situation and it is certainly not one in which any of us wish to speak with a partisan note. I do not propose to criticize the government but I want to appeal to them to look again at this matter and see whether even now more could not be done and greater risks taken in the interests of humanity.

The risks of action are not overwhelming. I think the threatened and the present tragedy today are overwhelming. I understand that a group of churches in four Scandinavian countries known as the Nor Church Aid Group, whose headquarters are in Copenhagen, was able in the first three days of last week to get into Biafra 31 flights of transport planes with a capacity of 10 tons each. I understand that the capacity of our own Canadian Hercules is 20 tons, which suggests to me that perhaps the Canadian planes, if they had been available, would have been able to double the relief supplies and double the number of people saved from starvation. It appears to me, as the hon. member for Hillsborough has stated, that if these Scandinavian churches can successfully surmount the difficulties, surely the Canadian government can also overcome them and take some of the risks involved. There is an old saying that where there is a will, there is a way.

It is sometimes said that the last push to end of the war in Biafra is on the way. It has been on the way for many months. It is said that when that happens, it may be possible to relieve starvation with the aid and co-operation of the federal authorities. If that happens I hope it will be so. However, that is not what I understand is likely to be the situation. I believe that this is an idle hope. The federal government may capture the cities but the war in the rest of the country will go on and on, and for what purpose? Because the Biafrans believe, rightly or wrongly, that they will not survive if they surrender. They believe in fact that they are likely to be the victims of genocide.

All of us in this house, even the youngest, will remember the last occasion of genocide when it occurred in Europe, and we will remember it with troubled consciences. I am not accusing the Nigerian authorities of planning genocide. I am firmly convinced, however, that this is what the Biafrans believe is planned and that they will fight it to the bitter end if there is no international intervention. They have reason to fear that situation.

I should like to read to the house two excerpts from newspapers. One is from the Telegram of the Netherlands. It is a dispatch of August 17. It quotes an interview by Randolph Braumann, who I understand is a correspondent for that well known Netherlands paper, with Colonel Adekunle, a Nigerian army officer. This is the quotation which is attributed to the Nigerian army officer:

> In this sector of the front which I command—and that is the whole south from Lagos to the Cameroun border, I will not let in any Red Cross, Caritas, World Council of Churches, missionaries, or UNO.

Then he was asked:

> Does that mean that the food stored in Lagos will never reach the refugee camps in your sector?

He replied: "You are correct. That is exactly my meaning."

This is confirmed by another passage. The excerpt I have is, I believe, from the London Observer of August 31, 1968. Certainly it is from an English paper. If anyone is interested I will check to determine which paper it is. The excerpt is as follows:

> Col. Adekunle, commander of the 3rd division with HQ in Port Harcourt, has now returned there after sick leave in Lagos. He was in Lagos for about two weeks. The West German Foreign Ministry has expressed "dismay" to the Nigerian Embassy in Bonn over remarks made by Col. Adekunle to a German weekly, Der Stern. The Colonel said that in the sector he commanded "I don't want to see any Red Cross, any Caritas, any World Council of Churches, any Pope, any mission or any United Nations delegation."

He was quoted further as saying:

> I want to stop even a single Ibo being fed as long as these people refuse to capitulate. I did not want this war. But I want to win this war. That is why I must kill the Ibos. Sorry.

Perhaps a statement of that type in the midst of a hot war by a military officer is not so extraordinary but when these statements are made to international newspapermen to be circulated throughout the world people cannot say that they have not received notice of a determined effort to starve people into submission and death. It seems to me that the international community must take responsibility in this matter if it is not to be on our consciences. I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is seeking the support of other countries in an effort to bring this matter before the United Nations. I hope he will receive that support. I happen to believe he will have no difficulty in obtaining support from the Scandinavian countries. I hope the government not only carry the matter to the United Nations, where resolutions are perhaps what are usually produced, but will take the risks that the Scandinavian churches have been willing to take to make sure that the supplies reach the part of the country which is blockaded at the present time.

I had not intended to open my remarks by dealing with this subject but because of its urgency it seemed proper to do so. I now wish to do what is much more conventional. I wish to join with my colleagues in all parts of the house to congratulate Your Honour as warmly and sincerely as I can on your re-election as Speaker. I should also like to join in the congratulations to the mover and seconder of the motion before the house. They, together with quite a number of other new members who have spoken in this debate, have made a very successful and promising début in this house.

I propose to devote most of my time in this debate to a more general discussion of what I think Canada could and should do in the field of international affairs and international order, because I think it should be clear to all of us that there is no tolerable or just society, indeed no society at all, which can be built and maintained in Canada in this modern world of the 20th century except in the framework of international order. I think that was recognized in the Speech from the Throne.

Before I go into that matter, however, I should like to deal for a few moments with a domestic matter which in some parts of Canada, and I believe in my constituency, has reached crisis proportions. I refer to the question of housing. Although this matter was mentioned it received scant attention in the Speech from the Throne. I do not propose to give a long description of my constituency although I believe that also is traditional in this debate. But I might say that my constituency is a residential area within a vast metropolis, no doubt similar to many other constituencies in Canada. It is a good place in which to live. It is well supplied with schools and other services. The people are white collar and industrial workers of modest means. The average income would be somewhere around $5,000 a year. The houses are mostly 50 to 60 years old. It is emphatically not a slum area. It does not require to be torn down and redeveloped, but there is a serious housing crisis because of the slow decay and the serious shortage of housing.

In my constituency the cost of buying a new or indeed an older house is outside the range of possibility for all but a very small proportion of the people. The uncontrolled and sudden increases in rents have placed a burden of deep anxiety on very many people. It is not a problem of the very poor, the down and outer or the chronic slum dweller. It is an urgent problem for such groups of people as young couples needing a place of their own. It is a problem of increasing and sometimes tragic urgency for many families who have more than two or three children. It is a very serious problem for pensioners who have to divert the money required for food and other necessities to pay the increased rentals.

I know that in our province—and I hope this is so in other provinces—the Ontario Housing Corporation, with assistance from the federal government, has made some public housing available. I say, more credit to them. But it is not nearly enough. The Ontario Housing Corporation is swamped with long waiting lists. They have been forced to establish stringent priorities. In some cases they cannot act until the sheriff is at the door ready to throw a family and its belongings out on the street. Families are breaking up and nerves are breaking down.

Someone may ask how I know this. I know it because in my riding the provincial member and myself maintain what we call a service centre. Day after day desperate people come to see us. They ask for help in getting high priority on the Ontario Housing Corporation list. There are excellent senior citizens public apartments where an old age pensioner pays $65 a month for congenial and attractive public housing. But another old age pensioner, not fortunate enough to obtain this type of accommodation, will be lucky if he can find similar accommodation for $135 a month.

When pensions are as low as they are one can imagine how difficult the situation is. When applications are submitted these people sometimes have to wait seven years before they can obtain accommodation. The need for shelter is basic. The failure of our technically competent civilization to provide it has created an emergency which requires vigorous and early action by governments at all levels.

It seems to me that the Speech from the Throne evaded this issue. There was a reference in the speech to keeping within constitutional limits. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether that is an indirect way of saying that the provinces and not the federal government must tackle the housing crisis.

• (3:20 p.m.)

It is true, of course, that the provinces have a great share of the responsibility for housing. But if there is any field in which joint action and partnership are required, it is certainly the housing field. The federal government has for many years accepted responsibility for using its financial powers to stimulate housing. It is obviously not in this time of urgent crisis that this responsibility should be abandoned.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, in our view federal intervention has often been misguided. Since the war the federal government has provided vast sums by direct loans or guarantees to encourage construction of housing for the well to do under what is known, I think, as the "trickle down" theory. This theory has not worked. There is no effective demand on the market for housing that is within the reach of 75 per cent of Canadian families. I suggest that the federal effort must be redirected, in partnership with the provinces, to the provision of public and rental housing, housing within the capacity to pay of the average wage earner.

This can only be done, Mr. Speaker, by federal control over investment or through tax incentives to channel Canadian savings to meet this basic need. The first priority in housing is for the federal and provincial governments together to assume a comprehensive commitment to assess the needs for housing in the whole of Canada, to establish priorities and to take action to meet these needs. What we need is not so much a study or studies by peripatetic task forces but the calling together of federal and provincial representatives with regional and municipal representatives in order to work out plans for action.

I want to make one more point, Mr. Speaker. We must pay more attention to maintaining the existing stock of housing. Home owners of moderate means are having to pay increasing municipal taxes. They cannot afford home improvement loans. They cannot afford to pay for the repairs and renewals which are necessary to maintain and improve their houses. They need incentives by way of income tax exemptions and direct low interest loans in order to enable them to maintain the present stock of housing.

I want now, Mr. Speaker, to turn to international affairs and defence, which are rightly linked together. I welcome the fact that in the Speech from the Throne there was the promise of a review of our policies and commitments in both of these fields, though I did note that the proposal was extremely vague. I plead with the government for a thoroughgoing and radical look at our present policies in this field. As they now stand they are quite inadequate for our times.

We all know that there is student unrest throughout the world. I do not wish to identify myself with all its manifestations, but I do suggest that the younger people in the world are right in their rejection of the direction of and the priorities in our conduct of international affairs. In a world that has been made small by technology, a world which is urgently crying out for international planning and order, we are rushing toward chaos.

I read the other day a little book published by the Institute of International Affairs that referred to 270, I think it was, though I may not have the right figure, conflicts that had arisen during the last 70 years, a great many during the last few years of this century. The gap between the two-thirds of the world's population that is in abject poverty and the affluence of the western world is growing and not diminishing. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is reckoned that the western world is spending $120 billion a year on the weapons of war. A very small fraction of this figure is being spent on the constructive building of a newer and juster international order.

I say that the young people are right to criticize our sense of values and direction when in almost every country of the western world this state of affairs is allowed to continue. In a nuclear world we see the great powers pursuing by military means their own ideas of security, piling up fantastic weapons of mutual destruction. For example, we now hear talk of anti-ballistic missile defence systems and that these are going to be countered by decoys, multiple re-entry vehicles, larger and more accurately delivered payloads, as the jargon goes, all producing not more security but requiring vastly increased expenditures and less security in the long run.

We pay very scant regard to the United Nations. We do not furnish it with the forces necessary for it to act. We do not give it the means necessary to plan internationally. In other words, we do not allow it to work. Even within such an organization as NATO, which is designed, according to its authors, to defend democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law, we find nations such as Portugal, and Greece maintaining military dictatorships and preserving their régimes by wholesale suppression of human rights and the rule of law. Throughout the whole world racism sows the seed for continuing conflicts.

What, then can Canada do to reverse the direction of events? Our policies, of course, Mr. Speaker, must be based on a modest and reasonable assessment of our potentialities and our influence, a recognition of the facts of geography and history. Our policies, of course, must be rooted in reality. But reality in the second half of the 20th century is itself rooted in the necessity for strengthening international institutions such as the UN, and a rigid rejection of directing nearly all of our resources into wasteful expenditures on so-called security which is no security at all.

What I propose first and foremost to the government is a reallocation of our expenditures as between what is sometimes called external aid or international development and what is strictly military expenditure. At the present time, as the members of the house well know, we are spending roughly $1.6 billion a year on defence expenditure. At a generous estimate we are spending about $400 million on international aid and development. Accepting for one minute that this is the limit of our resources that we can direct to these purposes, and accepting that we can justify the directing of $2 billion of the Canadian taxpayers' moneys to these purposes, I propose that there should be a rough parity of expenditure between moneys used strictly for defence purposes and moneys used for international development.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we cut our defence spending to $1 billion. I say that we can do this without adversely affecting our contribution to security. This can be done by cutting out some of the roles that we perform and which at the present time are obsolete. At the same time, we should step up our contributions to external aid to $1 billion annually. If the other western nations were to do the same, and if they used United Nations agencies such as the World Bank as the instrument of their international planning, then a very real impact could be made on the immense problem of human poverty throughout the world. I think we would be proud if Canada were the first country in the western world to give at least equal priority to the construction of a just world society as against the maintenance of a purely military means of seeking security.

The question may be asked, Mr. Speaker, whether we can do this without endangering important contributions to security. I say the answer is yes. Some of our present contributions are hardly worth the money spent on them; indeed, they are a waste. I want to give an illustration by referring to our contribution to the system of defence against manned bombers, through NORAD. The Canadian government talks of Canadian sovereignty and Canadian independence. It talks of expanding the role of parliament and of involving people in the process of moulding their own destiny. Nevertheless, since the former parliament was dissolved the government has renewed the NORAD agreement without referring the matter to parliament and without public discussion.

I ask, what are the terms of the renewal? What is the purpose of the renewal? Against what real threat is the defence system to be maintained? Who recommended this step other than those in the Pentagon? The people of Canada have not been told about this and neither has their parliament. We have not had a white paper on defence, something which every modern country in the world puts out regularly each year in order to set out its strategic concepts. Yet a commitment has been put before us without it having been discussed in this house.

I have tried to study this problem, Mr. Speaker. I have inquired diligently to see whether the threat to the United States from manned bombers is a real threat. Are manned bombers a real threat to the North American continent? In this age of missiles, when the Russians have at their disposal possibly 1,000 intercontinental ballistic missiles, attacking this continent with manned bombers would be insanity, especially when one considers that the Russians themselves are the potential targets of an even greater number of United States missiles—Minutemen in concrete bunkers, Polaris missiles with nuclear warheads which can be fired from submarines lurking in the oceans of the world. In these circumstances the Russians would be crazy to launch a manned bomber attack on North America, and I have no reason to believe they are crazy. For one thing, manned bombers telegraph their punch in advance. It would take them between two to three hours to arrive here and warning would be given long before they reached their targets. Yet suppose, in the face of all these arguments, the Russians launched themselves into such a suicidal policy. Would it not be possible for a few of their rockets to take out the static defences which we have established to stop manned bombers?

In 1963 when the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), who then was minister of national defence, produced the last white paper the government produced on defence, he clearly envisaged the obsolescence of our present system of defence and made vague promises to phase it out. The former Secretary of Defence of the United States, Mr. McNamara, has not concealed his conclusion that the system is obsolete.

We in the New Democratic party do not object to our planning the defence of our air space in conjunction with the United States. Nevertheless, I implore the government to take a long, hard look at the entire question and see whether it is any longer sensible to pay a substantial premium to defend ourselves against a risk that is no longer real. I urge the government to produce a white paper on the strategic consequences of various forms of action.

I have little time left in which to speak. Before finishing I must say something about our position in international affairs. Notwithstanding what has happened in Czechoslovakia, I think we must take a long hard look at the question not of whether we ought to be in NATO but of the role we ought to play in NATO at the present time. The use by the U.S.S.R. of military force in Czechoslovakia clearly indicates the willingness of that country to use force, where its leaders think they can get away with it. I think that this is no time to break up the unity of NATO. I happen to believe that in the confrontation between the massive material might of the Kremlin and the passive, nonviolent unity of the Czechoslovak people, the ultimate victory will go to the Czechoslovak people.

By the same token I think we ought to evaluate our present role in NATO. Suppose that to help Czechoslovakia we had used the air division we have established in Europe. What would have been the result? Europe, including Czechoslovakia very probably, would have been wiped out and a nuclear holocaust provoked.

I conclude by hoping that in matters of foreign policy the government will look at fundamentals. I hope it will not be content with accepting conventional wisdom. I hope it will look beyond departments of government and make use of the knowledge and experience of the students and scholars of our country. Also, I hope the government will permit the committee on international affairs to be active and to look into the matters I have raised. We are entitled to expect from this government a totally new approach to the entire field of international affairs.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimault-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you on your election to your office. Because of your past experience as well as the qualities you have displayed so far during this debate, I am certain that all members will be well satisfied you have been elected.

In common with many of my predecessors in this debate I shall begin by saying that I shall be brief, but unlike most other members I shall restrict myself to one subject and, I hope, avoid talking of the glories of my riding and other irrelevant subjects which have consumed so much time in the speeches of previous members.

In this throne speech debate I submit we have perhaps spent too much time on general debate, which will not leave us enough time in this session to talk on specific legislation, in particular, private members' bills and motions. I therefore take my cue from the previous speaker, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), who said that it is right for young people to question the values of our society. I, as a new and young member, would like to question the value of our devoting eight days of valuable time to debating matters that, in my opinion, are largely irrelevant.

The election campaign ended on June 25, and I think we have now more valuable matters to attend to. I submit we have no need to hear any more warmed-up election speeches, given, perhaps, to entertain visitors in the gallery who may happen to be from our ridings. We should remember that we have been elected to this house on the understanding that reforms will be brought about, and this is particularly true of the younger members of the house. We have not been sent here to spend four years learning how the house operates; we have not been sent here to acquire the traditions of the house. We have been sent here to carry out the program of the government and, equally important, to put forward our own views in private members' bills and motions. It is important for this house to realize that we, the younger and newer members, have not been satisfied with the performance in this chamber which we have witnessed during the throne speech debate.

If a throne speech debate is considered necessary, and I concede that it is, let us devote only four days of our time to such a debate. It is quite unnecessary to carry on as we have been carrying on. We all know how little time is at our disposal for private members' business. There is insufficient time to discuss fully all private members' bill or motions. This stems, it seems to me, from a deliberate policy on the part of older members of the house, including the government house leader and the house leaders of other parties, who encourage backbenchers to speak in this debate as they know that no vote will be taken on any specific matter. Later on, I expect we will be told we "had our chance" during the throne speech debate. This is not good enough.

• (3:40 p.m.)

I feel they should be aware that we shall not continue to tolerate this tokenism which allows us to speak but does not allow decisions to be made on the basis of what we have said. It is a system which does not permit us to contribute materially to legislation.

Mr. Aiken: More brave words.

Mr. Anderson: I hope I have not been too blunt in my remarks. I realize that the traditions of this house are important but I feel it is equally important to serve notice on the government and the leaders of the opposition parties that we, the junior members, have no intention of continuing with rules and formulae which, although perhaps applicable in the past, are not applicable today. We feel we have been sent here to discuss specific legislation, to put forward our ideas and to contribute toward a better Canada. We trust this is the case. It is for these reasons that our electors sent us here: it is on this basis that we have come.

I hope, therefore, that all members of this house will pay attention to these remarks which I am presenting not only on my own behalf but also on behalf of many other younger members on both sides of this chamber. I trust that in future, when legislation and changes in rules are under consideration, it will be remembered that we are not satisfied with what we have seen here during the past ten days. We feel we have not been sent here simply to carry on as was done in the past, and thus I hope that soon in the future we shall hear of changes in the proceedings of this house which will make it more satisfactory.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this first opportunity to congratulate you on the appointment which this great house conferred upon you at the beginning of the session. Indeed, the honour fell to you by right for you fully deserved it. I had the opportunity of getting to know you in 1963, 1964 and 1965, and I am sure that the judgment and impartiality you showed in the past caused my colleagues and myself to choose you unanimously.

I should also like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand) for the way in which they performed their task.

At this time, I would like to congratulate in particular the honourable members who are now sitting for the first time in this house. Their talents and perhaps also their initiative will be an asset to the country and the people as parliament is looking forward to benefitting from their ideas.

Personally, my re-election to this house reminds me of the events of the years 1962 to 1965. It was through some unforeseen circumstances that I was defeated in the 1965 election. Most of the members will remember that during that election, Shefford constituency experienced a closely fought contest when, among the three candidates, two of whom represented the two old parties—I may be forgiven for using this suitable description of them—the overall difference in the number of votes amounted to 47. That experience taught me something that I was not aware of at the time and that I have learned about since: the legislation governing the military vote.

This year, the voting in Sherbrooke afforded me the opportunity to see and compare a situation which prevailed in Shefford in 1965. I say that the military vote is actually helping the Liberal party at election time when it so happens that results are doubtful in two or three constituencies, and that party does not want to amend the related legislation.

In 1965, the Shefford constituency recorded 60 military ballots bearing the same signature. Had the name of the Liberal candidate been typed on the ballot, the result would have been the same. No difference was recorded in the handwriting when the military vote was accounted for.

The same thing happened this year in Sherbrooke as 169 votes went to the Liberals, and out of this total, 160 votes were written out in an identical manner. After trying to make a check, after asking the judge who was presiding over the judicial recount to give us the list of the servicemen who were eligible voters in the ridings of Sherbrooke in 1968 and Shefford in 1965, judge Evender Veilleux, a man I respect because I made two judicial recounts with him, was refused the list of the servicemen who would have had the right to vote in Sherbrooke in 1968. After we had conceded the election, we were told that we could have obtained the list of the servicemen who had voted in Sherbrooke before conceding the election, but that it was impossible to get it afterwards. I was on the phone with judge Veilleux when he was refused access to the lists of servicemen before conceding the election in Sherbrooke in 1968 and I say that the hon. member for Sherbrooke who now sits in this house does not represent at all the majority vote of the people in his riding.

I know servicemen in the riding of Shefford who enrolled at the Sherbrooke regional office in 1939 and whose names were still on the lists of servicemen for my riding in 1968. These soldiers had moved to Ville-d'Anjou, Ville-Saint-Michel and Montreal more than twenty years ago, and yet they can still vote in the riding of Shefford. Under the automobile registration act, one is liable to a fine or some other penalty if one neglects to inform authorities of any change of address. It seems to me that a soldier should lose his right to vote if he does not have his address changed and, the more so, if his name still appears on the list of servicemen for Sherbrooke, Shefford or other ridings or if he is no longer in the service.

I have been able to ascertain those things in 1968 and in 1965, and I challenge anyone in this house to prove that there are actually in Sherbrooke, 250 servicemen whose names appear on the electoral lists of Sherbrooke riding who are now on the pay roll of the Army, the Air Force or the Navy and who are residents of Sherbrooke riding. The same thing happened in Shefford county. It is also impossible that there should be 150 men whose names appear on the electoral list of Shefford riding.

Mr. Speaker, this brings me to say that during the electoral campaign that ended on June 25, we have seen one Santa Claus at work and we will see another on December 25, 1968.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Kisses were distributed from one side of the country to the other. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to visit my constituency, he distributed hundreds of kisses to young girls of 9, 10 or 12 years of age. We also learned that the Prime Minister knew how to dance, that he knew old, modern and go-go dances. This is why he reminded us of Santa Claus. Indeed, he brought a bag full of kisses, he had to dance and he arrived in the various cities by helicopter, landing in a supermarket center, where he was always sure to meet a great number of people; it was just like Santa Claus around December 15 when he lands down in a supermarket and distributes kisses galore.

But the time of kisses, of go-go dances, of landing in supermarkets is over. It is now time for the members of this house to act, and if we consider the Speech from the Throne, we note two things:

First, our government set itself the goal of a just society and of a just government. Secondly, it realized that war had to be waged against poverty. However, I remember that in 1962, 1963, 1965 and 1968—history is repeating itself—the objective of the governments of the time was also to fight poverty.

In the 1968 Speech from the Throne, I believe it is stated that we must fight poverty. This to me is the very acknowledgement of the fact that both parties have failed to reach their goal for the last 100 years, since if we have needy people in Canada it is obviously through no fault of the members of the N.D.P. or of the Créditistes party.

Administration has not been rejuvenated in the last 100 years and it is the two old parties which are responsible for our present predicament. It is the two old parties which have allowed poverty to take root in Canada and I do not believe for a minute that they will be able to eradicate it nor to find better solutions, though they claim to be a just government.

I think that within two years, and maybe even before then, the Canadian people will realize that we do not have a just government, but a government just for fun. Why? Because the poor have multiplied, they have been forced into debt, they have been mass-produced.

We have only to look at our economic situation to realize it. We have only to consider educational, municipal and provincial debts, for example the debt of the little province of Prince Edward Island. I was there during the election campaign, when the Prime Minister said that it was impossible to sell provincial bonds because the public had lost confidence in those of Prince Edward Island.

Let us take time to consider the provincial, municipal and school debts, our federal debts, the loans and also the interest rate on the bonds which the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has just set for a period of 14 years, when he will pay 250 per cent in interest.

I have here an article from the newspaper La Presse, issue of September 18, 1968, which states, and I quote:

> The Minister of Finance sees life through rose-coloured glasses—

He too takes the liberty of dreaming in colour. "To see life through rose-coloured glasses" with 250 per cent in interest after 14 years. In 14 years, our children will have to pay over four times the amount of the debt for bonds which are issued now.

We did not see anything in the Speech from the Throne on family allowances. They were not even mentioned.

Nor was any legislation mentioned to stem strikes in Canada, or at least strikes which concern the federal government; nor any measure to prevent unemployment which is a constant problem since automation, equipment and science have come within our daily reach; the Speech from the Throne proposed no solution. Nothing was foreseen to encourage the spread of automation or to allow people to live with it.

Moreover, there was absolutely nothing in the Speech from the Throne concerning bankruptcies in Canada. The present Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) said, in 1965 when he was Minister of Revenue in the Quebec provincial government, that bankruptcies in Canada, that is fraudulent bankruptcies, in 1968 represented losses of $73 million for the government.

In 1963, those figures had tripled compared with 1958. Losses in 1963, as a result of fraudulent bankruptcies, reached $195 million. This was under the administration of the hon. Davie Fulton, Minister of Justice for the Conservative government, and of the hon. Guy Favreau, then Assistant-Minister of National Revenue and later on Minister of Justice for the Liberal government.

With regard to bankruptcies in 1961, the index was 100 per cent. In 1963, the same index had risen to 163.4 per cent. Over that same period, the G.N.P. had increased by 40 per cent, while bankruptcies had multiplied three times as much and increased by 120 per cent. There's a "fun government" for you!

All those figures were published in the report of the present Postmaster General which was submitted by the commissioner of the inquiry, Mr. Lucien Mercier. In addition, those figures rose steadily under the administration of Mr. Guy Favreau, and reached $500 million in losses for Canada in 1965. Those figures include the famous bankruptcies of Atlantic Finance and Prudential Insurance Company as well as those of their subsidiaries.

In 1965, the present Postmaster General denounced these facts publicly but, immediately afterwards, he was transferred to the Department of Revenue, and the situation has remained unchanged. Since that time, what promises the federal government, and the Minister of Justice had made concerning revision of the bankruptcy act have remained a dead letter.

In 1966, the hon. Pennell, then Solicitor General of Canada, stated before the bank committee for the Senate that, within eight months, that is some time early in March 1967, a new bankruptcy bill would be tabled in the house and that it would alter beyond recognition the old act. Where is that bill.

In the last two years, we have not seen anything. There was no mention in the Speech from the Throne of the bankruptcy problem which, at the present time, costs Canadian citizens over $500 million a year.

Nor is there anything in the Speech from the Throne about a method of financing our public funds. Whereas today our investment capital amounts to billions of dollars per year, the Minister of Industry of the province of Quebec announced yesterday expenditures of $5 million in Farnham for the construction of access roads to the projected airport. I think it will be decided to build the international airport in Farnham. An investment of $5 million. Yet the federal government must allow the provinces to have a source of capital, a source of investment funds to enable them to build bridges, roads, to provide for the operation of their school system and their sewer facilities.

In Granby, for instance, we have a water problem. It would cost approximately $3 million to get water a few miles from Granby and to store it, but that is out of the question for the time being because the city has reached its maximum borrowing capacity. However, thousands of families have to fetch their water in a jug, in the middle of the twentieth century, in 1968, when there is drinking water at a few miles from there. But the water available to our town is not fit to drink at the present time. We are unable to carry out these projects because the city's finances make it impossible for the municipal council to borrow $3 million refundable in forty or fifty years, which would amount to an expenditure of $7 to $8 million for taxpayers. Therefore things have to remain as they were in the past, and people have to fetch their water in a jug. Right in the middle of the twentieth century.

What is lacking in this contry? Is there a shortage of manpower? Is there a lack of materials? Is there not enough wealth in Canada? There is no such shortage. What is missing is a financial system, and this august house never did tackle that problem. All the other problems are reviewed except the one relating to finance. Whether it is a financial problem concerning municipalities, schools, the federal or the provincial governments, it is not discussed. Although the Speech from the Throne mentions a just government, it does not deal with a financial system that would be instrumental in bringing about this just government. That is why we say it is a government "just for fun".

On reviewing the agricultural situation, it is noted that eggs were selling 52.3 cents a dozen in 1951 and 33.8 cents in 1961. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, they were selling at 32.2 cents a dozen in 1965 and 30 cents in 1968. Broiler fowls were selling 35½ cents a pound in 1951, 20½ in 1961, 19 cents in 1967 and 19 cents in 1968. The same goes for young turkeys, chicken, pork and dairy products.

Agricultural products have increased by 17 per cent since 1951 whereas production costs for farmers have increased by 60 per cent since 1951.

In 1951, the price of a tractor and plough was $2,000 whereas nowadays it is selling for $5,000. Eggs were then selling 52 cents a dozen, whereas they sell 30 cents in 1968. And the Liberals are trying to convince us that we live in a just society. I say to you that we live in a society "just for fun". We have a government "just for fun". Why? Because the Speech from the Throne does not point out solutions that would enable the Canadian people to solve their financial problems and the farmers to enjoy a decent standard of living.

Within the next few days, there will be a statement by the Postmaster General regarding an increase in postal rates for the working class. We will have to pay more again. In what way can we reconcile the principle of a just society with increases in taxation and indebtedness at all levels?

There is also a housing problem in Canada. In the Speech from the Throne, there is no indication of a solution. An investigation is taking place at the present time. The hon.

Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) who is responsible to the house for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is going now to listen to the complaints of the tenants and landlords all across the country, in an attempt to understand the problem. But the housing problem has been brought about by the government itself, by the Liberals themselves, when for instance, they put a 12 per cent sales tax on building materials. And that is why the best way, in my opinion, to go back to better times, from the housing viewpoint, is to remove from our legislation everything which adversely affects housing, and in particular the 12 per cent sales tax. There was no mention thereof in the Speech from the Throne. However, there is reference to a just society. At the present time, some dwellings are rented for $150 a month while ten years ago, the rent was $60. Landlords make less money today than they did then. Why? Because the difference is included in and absorbed by the tax rates at every level.

If this government was really keen, it would abolish at once the 12 per cent tax on building materials which was the main cause of the present housing crisis. A 12 per cent tax on building materials had been forced on us and those who were in this house when legislation was passed, know that a $500 bonus was promised, and was indeed given for a couple of years for houses built during the winter. Then, we had to fight officials and to battle through all the technicalities of the law before being entitled to this bonus. Most of the time, we were not entitled to it. Anyway, we had to pay the 12 per cent tax.

After the Speech from the Throne, and even before, we were also told that the winter program was to be abolished. And now we are beginning to feel—having heard this and that minister—that social welfare is to be dispensed with too. Everything is cut down, but no proposition is made. Mention is made of a just society, but the government is still going on just for fun. This is why on June 25, to the general surprise, many citizens, especially in the province of Quebec, voted for the Créditistes. Why? Because they asked themselves the following question: Where are we going with our governments? What solution do they suggest? The right hon. Prime Minister himself did not have any to offer.

I have here a newspaper clipping from an elector who stated why he voted for the Créditistes.

In the first place, Trudeau, the Liberal, made no promise, except to repair holes in the roof, to strengthen it where it was too thin, to level out poverty and mediocrity; on the constitutional level, he poured scorn on our yearnings by putting us all in the same melting-pot; monetary field, nothing new, no reform; he merely asked us to be happy with shackles around our ankles in a just society (for fun).

Conservative Stanfield was not much better, except that he achieved the same results by going about it differently.

As for the N.D.P., they wanted to nationalize everything except the most important thing, banks.

There remained the Créditistes. Caouette was not perfect either, but it must be said to his everlasting credit: he struck at the root of the evil. Being more sincere and less quackish than the other candidates, he extolled an irrefutable monetary policy which, at the same time, brought to light the monumental fraud of the present monetary system which the old parties have always clung to: a basically corrupt system which allows a small privileged group of eight chartered banks to provide the credit for the nation in a ratio of 92 per cent of the money supply against 8 per cent for the government represented by the Bank of Canada. Eight per cent can never buy off 92 per cent; it is impossible; it is what might be called retrograde progress.

—A state within a State, gangsterism on a national scale, which easily explains our ever growing debt, our continuous loans to pay interest to bankers; an upside-down, dishonest system, which clean sweeps our country, shackles progress, warps our mentality and allows us to live only by getting into debt.

We now have banking social credit at the banks' disposal. The big shots belong to it. They share handsomely in the profits of the nation by accumulating secret reserves which income tax does not touch. Why should the same credit not be good if it were granted by the Bank of Canada for the benefit of the government?

—Then, money would cost nothing to the State, which would be normal and logical. Interest-free loans to the provinces and municipalities would be possible, as well as dividends, seeing the company would be wholly-owned. It is not a question of getting rid of banks, but let them do what credit unions do: let them merely deal in money and not create it; that is the difference.

That is what every Créditiste knows and why he votes as he does; not so much for the man as for the policy, contrary to the old-line parties who seek the best man to defend a bad cause.

This, to my mind, is what constitutes a logical vote, which aims at the cause of evil. As for the rest, those who proclaim that this policy cannot be implemented, that it is utopian, they completely deny logic in economy. It would be better for them to study it, without prejudice, before condemning it, and parroting the world of finance. It is useless to attempt to understand the present system; we have had enough of living under it; it was born of injustice and error, and will return to its abject condition.

This article is signed by one of the most important real estate agents in the eastern townships and the town of Sherbrooke.

Following the Speech from the Throne, we received the report of the Economic Council of Canada, in which it is said that in order to solve our problems, we must increase our productivity, as if we suffered from a lack of commodities in Canada. True, there is a lack of commodities, but not because we are incapable of producing them. Rather, it is because producers do not have a guaranteed income. That is the reason why our production rate per capita is decreasing.

Increase productivity. That makes me think of the gardener who grew cabbages and would go to market to sell them. At first, he only had a small garden, and could take his cabbages to market in the basket on his bicycle.

Having bought another piece of land, he increased his cabbage production but still went to market on bicycle, carrying his cabbages in a basket. A time came when he was travelling all day long from home to market to deliver his cabbage.

But the day came when he had no time to sell his cabbages because of an inadequate transportation system. He put his problem in the hands of experts who told him to increase his productivity. Confident in the experts' advice, he bought another farm, doubled his cabbage production, but kept on going to market by bicycle to deliver his cabbages. As a result, one day, his crop rotted in the ground and he went bankrupt.

Later on, a Social Crediter bought his farm, and instead of increasing his productivity, he exchanged his bicycle for a large truck and, from them on, he had no trouble taking his cabbages to market or distributing.

In Canada, the situation is the same.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Unless the hon. member for Shefford has the unanimous consent of the house to carry on, I shall have to recognize another hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. members of this house.

To conclude, I say that today it is not our production system that is at fault, it is our distribution system.

I am still thinking of this poor gardener who was keeping his old bicycle to take his cabbages to the market.

In Canada, our production is not at fault, but our distribution system is bad. That is why the Ralliement créditiste advocates that our means of distribution and financing be adopted in order to distribute on a wide scale the resources of our country and what our Canadians are able to produce.

[English]

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, as a newcomer to this house but no stranger to Your Honour's great reputation, may I add my congratulations on your re-election as Speaker. I would like also to add my congratulations to the newly elected Deputy Speaker and to the mover (Mr. Corbin) and seconder (Mr. Marchand) of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In the case of the mover and seconder I must mingle my congratulations on their efforts with commiseration for the problem they faced in trying to be enthusiastic about such a shoddy and empty thing as the Speech from the Throne. Previous speakers on this side of the house have already dealt with its shortcomings. I do not wish to be repetitive. I would simply say of this speech that it missed a golden opportunity to excite the imagination of the Canadian people; it failed in perception of the real problems facing this country; it was vague, windy and depressing.

We from the Atlantic region had looked forward to the Speech from the Throne in view of the promises made in our area by government spokesmen during the recent election campaign. We had been led to believe that we stood on the verge of a great new era of development and progress. Today we feel let down. There is nothing in the government's outline of legislative intention to indicate that there is any awareness of the basic problems, the real needs of the Atlantic region. We have again been bypassed, as we have been ever since 1963.

This may be not so strange, however, when one considers the results of the election in the Atlantic provinces. It may be, as one western member has already suggested, that Liberal concern and Liberal action will be confined to those areas which returned a larger percentage of Liberal members. On the basis of the evidence so far it seems that the just society, as another distinguished colleague so aptly put it, is just for Grits.

I am not alone among residents of the Atlantic region in being suspicious of many of the instant schemes put forward. We have suffered too long from a proliferation of boards, commissions and departmental agencies set up to solve various regional problems. This is an approach that experience has shown to be wasteful and ineffective, a shotgun approach. As the second annual report of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, just released, puts it:

> The response on Ottawa's part has been inadequate, unimaginative and lacking in a real understanding of the nature of Canadian society.

Among the consequences, out-migration at a rate incompatible with the closing of the income gap between the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada has not been slowed, and APEC proposed development goals of a year ago are far short of fruition. What we need first is a sober reassessment of our basic problem, a lack of job opportunities for our people, and a real determination to do something about it. This must be followed by a common sense approach to solving the problem, utilizing the simplest possible organization. We need co-ordination of effort, not centralization of control.

Many of us have been alarmed and disillusioned by the emphasis given by this government to that hoary old solution for all our problems, the department of regional development. Let me call as witness on this point someone whom the government must consider impeccable because he is a former Liberal member of parliament from Nova Scotia, a former parliamentary secretary and at present a key official in the office of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). I refer to Dr. J. B. Stewart.

In this house on April 13, 1965, he made some very astute observations on this very point. They may be found at page 342 of Hansard for that date. I will not quote him extensively but he said in part:

> —I am glad that the government has resisted the temptation, an almost inevitable temptation, I suppose, to set up a ministry for regional development. That would have been a mistake. What is needed is the ordinary departmental approach to this problem, co-ordinated by the minister whose job it is to co-ordinate the works of the several departments, namely the Prime Minister.

I echo those sentiments, Mr. Speaker. Proper and adequate bodies already exist to do the things that are necessary for the betterment of the Atlantic region. The last thing we need is a rash of new ones. One of the principal, and perhaps the most valuable, of the existing bodies is the Atlantic Development Board. If only it were allowed to do what it was set up to do, free of hobbles, interference and red tape, we might expect progress. My great fear is that in the enthusiasm to paint over old problems with new names, the Atlantic Development Board may be rendered useless, lost in the shuffle.

In this, my maiden speech, I want to avoid appearing too local or parochial. This should not be too difficult because the matters with which I as the member for Moncton am concerned are common to the entire Atlantic region, such as antiquated and inadequate transportation facilities, lack of job opportunities, high cost of living, lack of adequate housing, chronic unemployment, running in our area often at twice the rate of the national figure, lack of a practical system for welfare and social assistance, underemployment, industrial starvation—the list is endless. The main reason I speak of my home riding of Moncton is that the city of Moncton, because of its location, is a natural and inescapable hub for the Atlantic region in such matters as transportation and hence industrial development.

Moncton has been cast in the role of the transportation and distribution centre of the maritime area. Changes in the economic picture of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia or much of New Brunswick are inevitably reflected in the economy of the Moncton area. So you will understand, Mr. Speaker, that if now or in the future I plead the cause of Moncton I am in effect pleading the cause of the Atlantic region as a whole, and vice-versa.

I was more than a little perturbed to hear the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) mention his views on the corridor road proposed to link Quebec with the province of New Brunswick through the state of Maine. He dismissed it as unlikely to be of much economic benefit to his particular area because its proposed junction with the Canadian section would lie in southern New Brunswick. This, I suggest, is a narrow, shortsighted view. It reflects the type of thinking that makes attainment of true regional, social and economic parity so difficult of achievement in this country.

Such projects cannot be looked at simply in terms of the interest of one municipality, one small section of one province. It is generally conceded in the Atlantic region that such a corridor road would bring economic benefits and hence social benefits not only to southern New Brunswick or the province of New Brunswick but to the entire area of Canada's Atlantic territories. I am sure the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria would be among the first to admit this, were he to give the matter honest consideration beyond the restrictions imposed by purely local thinking.

There are many things that could be done to help the Atlantic region, such as new national park development served by good modern highways to stimulate and increase tourism, the bettering of existing and very popular tourist facilities, the provision of a better road, rail and air network generally, not forgetting, of course, such vital links as the Prince Edward Island causeway. But at the heart of the matter lies the problem of producing within the four provinces of the east coast a sound industrial base, capable of regular and natural growth, free, when possible, of subsidy or other public assistance and able to hold its own in the markets of central Canada, North America and the world.

Only by creating such a base can we begin to solve the pressing social problems such as poverty, unemployment, poor health, inadequate educational facilities and a gradually wasting population. In this we must think nationally in terms of turning areas of national liability into sources of national asset. One of the first steps that must be taken in establishing a healthy industrial climate in the Atlantic region, I believe, is to tackle and solve the problem of excessive transportation costs. It would be idle for us to talk of just societies, regional equality and a united nation if this question is not solved. The ruinous cost of transportation is the single greatest cause of Atlantic region backwardness today.

We do not want handouts. We do not want to live on the dole. We want help to be able to help ourselves. All we ask of the rest of Canada is an understanding that our problems are not ours alone but the nation's and that the sooner we can look after ourselves the sooner will all Canadians benefit.

As things now stand, federal government assistance puts a premium on destitution. Their measures, however well-intentioned, have erected unemployment into a way of life for many. No able-bodied person can qualify for relief unless totally unemployed. This leaves a great segment of our population underemployed, working, but earning below a human subsistence level, and completely unassisted. They should be helped. They must be helped. But such help as social welfare in the form of relief payments must be strictly a stopgap emergency measure. What we want is a plan to provide the work that the people of the Atlantic region are willing, able and eager to do. Let me paraphrase the late Sir Winston Churchill by saying "give us the jobs and we'll turn out the tools", and by tools I mean the goods, the services, the abilities and the brains which the Atlantic region is capable of producing in abundance for their own advancement and the advancement of the whole nation.

However, Mr. Speaker, I must come back to what I said before, namely that in our region the key to everything is transportation, complete, efficient, fast and economical transportation by road, by rail, by water and by air. This means only one thing—a new, comprehensive transportation policy.

I was startled the other day in the house to hear the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), in answer to a question from the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), avoid the problem of formulating an adequate transportation policy by saying he was hoping to receive some useful suggestions from the premiers of the Atlantic provinces. Surely the minister has been long enough in office to know that there are more than 80 extensive and thoughtful briefs on file from various municipalities, provinces and other bodies setting out practical suggestions in great detail.

Of course, these briefs were filed last session with the standing committee on transportation and communications. Unfortunately the committee never got around to hearing these briefs on their home ground because they were impeded by the notoriously bad transportation bottlenecks in the Atlantic provinces, stuck in the ice of the Northumberland strait, snowbound on Prince Edward Island, where there is still no all-weather transportation route, and subsequently recalled to Ottawa by the party whips.

I should like to suggest to the minister that this standing committee be immediately reconstituted, that it meet as soon as possible and set up a series of meetings and public hearings on the ground where the chief transportation problems exist, namely, the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): May I quote the following from the Moncton Times-Transcript in connection with this suggestion:

> It is clear to Atlantic residents—having suffered from transportation shortcomings for years—that there is little hope of any constructive action coming from Ottawa as long as those whose task it is to make the required changes try to do so from the comfort of the Commons chamber.

I agree wholeheartedly with this observation. I believe that what is required is on the spot investigation of transportation conditions by members of the committee in person and in the locality.

The same editorial goes on to speak of the blow to maritime industry struck by changes in the freight rates. This is a complex subject and one on which I will not attempt to elaborate at this time, but it is one to which I will return at a later date. Suffice it to say that this is one of the aspects of a poor transportation picture which grows worse daily and is continually militating against efforts at industrial development.

Then, too, there is the newest concept in transportation, which is actually a revival of the old idea of North America acting as a land bridge between Europe and Asia. Changes in transportation technology indicate that goods can be shipped between Asia and Europe more cheaply and faster over a North American land route than through the Panama Canal. The freight is trans-shipped in standard sized containers on special trains that are never uncoupled and are used only for this purpose.

But we must move quickly to provide a deep-water superport on the east coast, capable of handling these huge new supercarriers. The United States is all too aware of the potential involved and is already negotiating with the land carriers to use United States ports. The maritimes area has several possible sites, any of which can be developed, and such development should be an integral part of the over-all transportation scheme.

In my initial address in this house I have tried simply to highlight some of the problems that face the people of my own constituency, and the Atlantic region as a whole. There is a great deal more to be said on all these subjects, but I believe individual topics can be dealt with more appropriately when various special pieces of legislation come before the house.

If nothing else, I would like to feel that members, government members in particular, have caught something of the urgency of the situation in the Atlantic region and that they now more fully appreciate that this is not merely a regional problem but a national one. I trust, too, that they are not under the impression that we of the Atlantic provinces are seeking more hand-outs, more money or begging in any sense. We are not. We are seeking more effective forms of assistance in order that we may become self sufficient and play our proper and full role, as Canadians, in making our country prosper and grow.

One tangible way in which the government could show that they appreciate the urgency of our position would be by activating the transportation and communications committee and having it visit the area of greatest concern. We from the Atlantic region came to Ottawa expecting much, Mr. Speaker. We were promised much, if not by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on his fleeting election campaign visits, then certainly by his spokesmen. So far, we have been disappointed. The Prime Minister frequently takes public pride in not having made any election promises. He may not have made many explicit promises, but he made one gigantic implicit promise. His whole election pitch was one great promise to the Canadian people that, under him, things would be changed; things would be done; things would be different. He was elected to head a majority government. He is now Prime Minister of Canada. Let him now redeem the promise that brought him to office. Thank you.

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to join the other hon. members of this house in congratulating you on your election as Speaker of the house? We wish you full success in the discharge of your duties.

[English]

It is a great honour for me to join in the deliberations of this chamber, an institution which, in the tradition of the mother parliament, has fought for and created popular political democracy. It is a forum in which is presented the government's policies for Canada and a forum for exposé, criticism, and the presentation of the policies of the opposition. The many voices of the people of Canada echo in this chamber. These historic walls remind one of the long history of meaningful controversies which have been fought in Canadian parliament: our Confederation; the opening of the west and our transportation policies; free trade and tariff protection; war, peace and conscription; the opening of the north. Canadian identity and nationality have been forged in large measure within these walls.

I regret to say that this rich and meaningful tradition of the best in parliament stands in marked contrast to the aimless debates of the past days. I do not mean to be critical of those hon. members whose eloquence has been no less than that of other days. On the contrary, we have been doing honour and lip service to a tradition of debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. This is a tradition which is as much a part of our proceedings as is the high tradition of sharp debate, of meaningful exposé and of controversy to which I have just referred.

Let me for a moment examine our traditions in the spirit that the best be preserved and enlarged and that the worst, in which I include the very one which I have risen to celebrate, be abandoned. My theme comes from the answer of the right hon. Prime Minister to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) when he observed that the Speech from the Throne has always been criticized in identical terms and would be so criticized even if it were written by the Holy Ghost. In this reply the Prime Minister revealed a state secret little known throughout the country because many Canadians believed in fact that this time the Speech from the Throne would be written by the Holy Ghost. It is exposed to us, therefore, as the handiwork, of mortal man.

In a similar vein we can expect that the government's legislative program, which will soon be introduced, will be the work of mortals. As such, the government's detailed proposals when presented will bear due praise and some valid criticism. No doubt much of both will be forthcoming. However, I suggest that the criticism and praise which have been offered during the past few days are premature. As in the case of every Speech from the Throne, irrespective of the political party which inspires it, there is not yet enough material for debate. The government's programs are not yet sufficiently before us. They are not before us because we are celebrating, indeed we are revelling in, a tradition which I hope will die with this parliament.

I have the honour to represent a new and great riding in Toronto. It is a riding which greatly admires the Prime Minister. It is also a riding with great expectations of this government. In fact, I am here in place of a distinguished Canadian, Mr. Dalton Camp, who would have been an ornament across the aisle, one of the few. My constituents supported the Liberals because they believed that a fresh approach and a critical review to rationalize all our institutions would be of benefit to this country. As the hon. Prime Minister observed on leaders' day, our responsibilities here increase while our time for deliberation remains constant. Every hour, indeed every minute, of the time of this house is precious. After nearly two weeks of debate we have not yet begun our significant business, and tradition precludes the commencement of government business until Wednesday.

If government business is to be postponed for a given number of days from the beginning of each session, let these days serve some useful purpose. I agree with the observations of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson); that is, there are over 100 private members' resolutions and bills before us and we might have tackled these. We might have approached this formidable list. Surely, all of us are sorry that we did not.

Our great democracy finds its shield within these walls; but what would the people of Canada think of parliament if they knew what has been going on here lately?

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to join with previous speakers in extending to you my sincere congratulations on your election to the high office of Speaker of this house. I should like also to extend congratulations to the mover (Mr. Corbin), and seconder (Mr. Marchand), of the address in reply. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, both men did an excellent job, one which should make their constituents very proud of them.

I know that my constituents would want me to extend to His Excellency the Governor General and Mrs. Michener a sincere expression of our love, loyalty and respect and our heartfelt thanks for according us the honour and pleasure of visiting our province a few months ago. I can tell all hon. members that Her Majesty's representatives were warmly received by the people of Newfoundland and they left behind them a renewed sense of loyalty to the crown as well as a genuine feeling of pride in belonging to this great Canadian nation of ours.

It goes without saying, sir, that I am deeply honoured to have been elected by the people of St. John's West to represent them in this parliament. It is an honour that comes to few men in their lifetime, and needless to say it is one that I shall treat with respect and dedication during my term of office.

My province, sir, having as it does a centuries old tradition of loyalty to the crown, also has a deep and lasting loyalty to Canada. Although we have been a province for less than 20 years, I can tell this honourable house that all but a very few of my fellow Newfoundlanders are extremely proud to be part of this great Canada of ours. The people of my province are desperately anxious to make their contribution and to play their part in the building of a strong and prosperous nation. I repeat, sir, that my fellow Newfoundlanders are anxious to play their part in the building of a strong Canada and to contribute to this union of ours which took place in 1949.

I make that point because I suspect that as a result of the utterances of certain Newfoundland politicians the average Canadian citizen may very well have the impression that Newfoundland is getting the best of the bargain, that our union is a one-sided effort. This, Mr. Speaker, is not true.

In 1949 when my people elected to become part of Canada I was too young to vote. I did, however, favour Newfoundland's confederation with Canada while at the same time entertaining certain doubts as to the method by which it was brought about. Like all of my fellow countrymen I was extremely proud of my heritage and of our centuries old tradition of independence. But yet—and again like the majority of my fellow Newfoundlanders—I knew that we could not continue to pay the price we were paying for our independence. I also, knew, sir, that the only hope for Newfoundland was to throw in its lot with our Canadian neighbours.

I am happy, Mr. Speaker, that the people of my province took that bold step in 1949, and it was a bold step, and became part of this great nation. I am proud to be a Canadian. My fellow Newfoundlanders, with very few exceptions, sir, are also proud to be Canadians.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I have a confession to make to my fellow members and to the Canadian people. I must confess that in 1949 I was conceited. I was a young fellow 20 years old and could not see past this Newfoundland of ours where we would stand to attention and sing the "Ode to Newfoundland". I was conceited enough to think that Canada was getting the best of the bargain. I have another confession to make, sir. I think that in this respect my opinions have not changed.

For our part, Mr. Speaker, in terms of national resources we brought to this great nation one of the most wealthy land masses in North America. We conveyed, as it were, to this Canadian nation North America's last great frontier, Labrador. In terms of human resources, which I think all hon. members will agree is the greatest of all resources, we brought to this nation of Canada more than a quarter of a million industrial, Godfearing, hard working people of good British, Scottish and Irish ancestry. Do you blame me, Mr. Speaker, for getting the impression or for becoming conceited enough to think that Canada got the best of the bargain in 1949? And do you blame me for maintaining those views?

Newfoundland, as I have pointed out, is part of this great nation of Canada, and I repeat that we are very proud of it. Our province, sir, is separated from the mainland of Canada by approximately 90 miles of water. This is the distance between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. Those 90 nautical miles have a profound effect upon the economy of our island province.

The sea, which is the source of Newfoundland's prosperity, is also a kind of extra tariff that has been imposed upon the people of Newfoundland, I suppose as the price that we must pay for living in the best province of Canada. The price that we are paying results from this very expensive 90 miles of water that separates North Sydney from Port aux Basques. This tariff, that is imposed is in the form of transportation costs on all products that we must import from the Canadian mainland. It applies, of course, to machinery, equipment, building materials, eggs, produce of all kinds, milk and many of the things that the average Canadian citizen takes for granted in almost every other place in Canada.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, in many respects the province of Newfoundland is a province of extremes. We have the highest, I repeat the highest, cost of living in Canada. Our average per capita income is the lowest. We have the highest rate of unemployment in Canada and we have the highest building costs. Newfoundland's per capita debt is soaring to a dangerously high level. Keeping pace with our rising capital debt is the tax burden that is being imposed upon our people. Therefore, putting all these factors together, I am sure all hon. members will agree with me when I say that we have our problems in Newfoundland.

Another very important fact that we must not froget, and of which Newfoundlanders are proud, is that for some strange reason that I cannot explain Newfoundland has the highest birth rate in Canada and the lowest death rate. So, throwing all these considerations together, Mr. Speaker, what do we have? We have in Newfoundland today a very serious economic situation, one which we are desperately trying to solve and are looking to the Canadian government for help in solving.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The fact that, historically, Newfoundlanders have turned their eyes to the sea rather than on land resources may explain the imbalance of our trade. From the bountiful depths of the sea surrounding our province the major part of our subsistence is derived, and therein lies one of our major problems. At best it is a subsistence and no more.

We have a college of fisheries in Newfoundland, and I ask the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) to consider my request to provide a deep sea dragger for our fishing college. In this way our Newfoundlanders who are learning to become expert fishermen will have a chance to gain some actual experience in their trade. I am calling this matter to the government's attention and, especially, to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries who, I am sure, will appreciate the need for such a dragger. I repeat, I ask the government to provide a deep sea dragger for this fisheries college in Newfoundland. I have no hesitation in bringing forward my recommendation since I am aware that $100 million a year is being spent on external aid. I would consider the government's action, if it should equip our fisheries college with a dragger, as a little bit of internal aid which is as important to this nation, and to Newfoundland, as external aid is to other nations.

I take issue with the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), Newfoundland's cabinet representative, for remarks he made in the house on Friday last concerning the federal government's decision to discontinue the salt rebate. We are aware of the hon. member's delicate position as the member for Burin-Burgeo and as a minister of the crown. Since he was talking about matters pertaining to our province, I should have expected him at least to take a position sympathetic to the needs of our province.

Mr. Stanfield: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: I am sure the minister didn't intend to mislead this house deliberately. Nevertheless, in his usually eloquent way, he succeeded in misrepresenting completely the views of hon. members representing Newfoundland who sit on this side of the house.

At no time did we take the position that the salt rebate ought to continue. What we did say, and I repeat this, is that the salt rebate should be allowed to continue until the government is in a position to decide upon a substitute program. We find it difficult to understand why the government would discontinue the salt rebate, which is of vital importance to Newfoundland fishermen, in the middle of the fishing season when the salt fishermen were in the process of prosecuting the Labrador fishery. At this crucial moment the government, with my hon. friend's consent, decided to discontinue this important salt rebate program. That is shameful, and I am disappointed in my friend and colleague from Newfoundland for taking the position he took in this house on Friday in defending the government's position.

God knows, Mr. Speaker, the life of a fisherman is hard. It is a life demanding the utmost of those who engage in it. Newfoundlanders and their counterparts in other Atlantic provinces are not afraid of hardship. Our people have suffered hardships and borne the fury of wind and weather for generations. We are bred to it and we have not changed. Our Atlantic coast fishermen, including our Newfoundland fishermen, are accustomed to hard times, to hardships and to braving the elements. Our people have not changed, and I suspect they will never change. Our fishermen, not unlike their counterparts in other industries, want to be employed, want to fish. At the same time they want to be assured of a market for their fish, as well as a decent price for their fish.

Today our fisheries are in deep trouble, Mr. Speaker. This is another area where the government announces paper programs which do not go into effect or, if they do, make the situation worse than it was before. The fishing industry is basic to the economy of the Atlantic provinces. I might ask, what has happened to our fishing industry? I think most hon. members know the answer.

Prices have dropped and foreign competition is eating into our traditional markets for salt and frozen fish. As a result of technological advances, eastern European countries have placed in our waters floating fish factories with which our fishermen are expected to compete on equal terms. Surely, if the government means business, it is time for it to take action on a massive scale to maintain the competitive capacity of the Canadian fishing industry in the catching, processing and marketing of fish.

The fishing industry will not cure itself of its ills. Our fishermen are competing against foreign interests supported and subsidized by foreign governments. In order for the Canadian fisherman and the industry in general, to compete on equal terms with others in our waters, it is vitally necessary that we have the full support of the federal government and the benefit of all its services. I am referring now to something more than the kind of lip service we have had.

Fish products ought to play a greater part in external aid shipments. This would be one way of maintaining our traditional markets. Also, we must have more research in the uses of fish. We must have more modern, up to date equipment and the assurance of being able to fish in our own waters unmolested within the 12 mile limit. That may be impossible, but let us try to impose that limit. If the limit cannot be imposed, the government ought to inform the fishermen of that fact. It ought to be honest with them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: I am sorry the Minister of Fisheries is not here. I say it is time this government stopped pussyfooting around with the 12 mile limit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: Under the policies of successive Liberal governments, we have watched the encroachment upon our industry by United States interests. We are watching the encroachment of foreign shipping on our fishing resources on a scale that will deplete these resources in a short time. Also, we are watching our markets dwindle away.

I say to the government, if it has a policy let us hear about it. If it has no policy let us not go through the farce—I repeat—the farce of having a Department of Fisheries that is unable, apparently, to suggest or produce a policy.

The marketing of fish constitutes a major problem, and in order to save the Atlantic fishermen there may be no course open except the establishment of a federal fish commodity marketing board which would operate very much in the same way the grain marketing board operates.

The Canadian Wheat Board imparted stability to the economy of western Canada. Perhaps a fish commodity marketing board, under federal government auspices, could provide a measure of stability to the economy of the Atlantic provinces.

• (5:00 p.m.)

I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this question, Mr. Speaker: where is the just society when a man with a family fishes all the summer and is forced to endure hardships almost beyond human endurance and as a result of a disorganized fishery policy which means that the rock bottom prices he receives barely provides enough to keep body and soul together? Is this the just society? I do not think so and I wonder whether the Prime Minister is naïve enough to believe that the lonely, forgotten Newfoundland fishermen of Cape St. Mary's will be fooled by his promise of a just society? Our fishermen well remember other slogans, other promises which have been offered them in place of action. They will remember the war on poverty, the Company of Young Canadians—meaningless words manufactured by some coin-operated word factory in the back rooms of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: Low incomes, high costs, exploitation and hard work; that is the story of Canada's Atlantic coast fishermen. It is the story of our Newfoundland fishermen. In my riding, which contains a large number of fishermen, it is almost embarrassing to see what is happening—to see men who struggle, who work hard, who face the perils of the north Atlantic, come in with a look of desperation on their faces. These are the men who are suffering as a result of low incomes and high costs, men who have been exploited for centuries. It is a situation which should make a lot of people ashamed to look their fellow men in the face. The exploitation which is imposed on the average Newfoundland fisherman is incredible; words cannot explain the situation which has resulted from this exploitation of his hard work. This is the story of the Atlantic coast fishermen and the story of the Newfoundland fishermen.

I said that in Newfoundland we face high living costs and high costs of building. The birth rate is high and the death rate is low. Taxation is high, and so on. All these things are related to the desperate housing situation which exists in my province today. I regret the roving Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) is not here to hear me say that the provisions of the National Housing Act are totally unrealistic in relation to conditions in Newfoundland. This is why large numbers of our people are forced to live in houses which are substantially below standard. A vast number of my people—and I suspect this applies generally in the Atlantic provinces—are unable to meet the income provisions enabling them to qualify for an N.H.A. loan. Let me remind hon. members that more than 85 per cent of the people of the St. John's district which I have the honour to represent earn less than $6,000 a year. What comfort do they get from this government's housing policy under which a person must earn a minimum of $8,000 a year to qualify for an N.H.A. mortgage of $18,000? Is it any wonder that the people of my riding, and, I suspect, the people of Canada generally, look upon this promise of a just society as the paradox of the century. I say this because the very people who have created the terrible injustices in our society today, such as the high cost of living, the high taxes and a high unemployment rate, are those who are now preaching the just society and who based their whole campaign on that concept only a few short months ago.

Consider the justice of our society under the present government in Newfoundland and, particularly, in St. John's West. We are living in a society which was designed, in my opinion, to handicap a certain class of people, those in the middle and low income groups. These are the people who make up more than 85 per cent of the population of my riding. It is they who are being handicapped and who are suffering economic hardship. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the reactions of our people, living as they do under the gun of hard times, when the government which is responsible talks piously about a just society? It is the paradox of the century. The people who concern me are those in the middle and low income brackets, those who earn less than $6,000 a year, and in my province, in my city, they are by far in the majority. These are the people who are caught in the economic squeeze inasmuch as they do not earn sufficient money to enable them to qualify for an N.H.A. mortgage with which to buy or build a new home.

On the other hand, because their incomes exceed a certain figure—I believe it is $3,000 or $4,000 a year—they are unable to qualify for housing under the municipal-provincial-federal housing plan. These are the very people who cannot afford to pay the high rents which have been brought about in our inflated economy. This is the group which includes tradesmen, labourers, fishermen, office workers, farmers and our longshoremen. This is the group which is being caught in this ungodly, unfair and unjust economic squeeze. These are the people who make this country tick; they are the backbone of Canada, yet they are required to bear the burden of all the ills and mistakes of the Liberal government.

It is the old story of the government calling the tune but it is the average Joe, the average citizen, who pays the piper. I ask hon. members of this house is that the just society? I suggest, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. Unless unanimous consent is given to the hon. member to continue, I will recognize another hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Carter: I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and other hon. members for allowing me to carry on.

I would be a traitor to Newfoundland and afraid to go back to Newfoundland if I ended my speech without making reference to the great train robbery now taking place in Newfoundland. In my opinion, the people who schemed the great train robbery in Great Britain a few years ago were a bunch of kindergarten kids compared with the people who have schemed the great train robbery in Newfoundland where rail passenger service is being replaced by buses.

I could scarcely believe my ears on Friday last when I heard the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Jamieson), the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, advance his weak argument supporting the decision of the Canadian National and the Canadian Transportation Commission to abandon rail passenger service in Newfoundland. He confirmed what we in Newfoundland have known for a long time, or at least what we have suspected, that there has been a deal made between the Liberal government in Ottawa and the Liberal provincial government in Newfoundland to cancel this important service in return for the fulfilment of a political promise. I refer to the federal government's decision to pay 90 per cent of the cost of completing the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland.

I am sure hon. members know there is not a rail passenger service in Canada, at least I do not know of one, that is paying its way. So, Mr. Speaker, why pick on Newfoundland where there is a greater need for transportation than in any other province in Canada? Why pick on us? Why not do this in the other provinces? I am sure there is no rail passenger service in other provinces that is making money.

I serve notice on the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), I serve notice on the government of Canada, and I serve notice on the people of Canada that the people of Newfoundland are not going to sit by and see their "Newfoundland Bullet", if you want to call it that, taken away. We are going to fight this to the last man and I hope we will have the support of this house, and of the Canadian people, in our efforts to retain that which is rightfully ours, an adequate rail passenger service across the province of Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: We Newfoundlanders want to be partners in this great and wonderful confederation. We are not asking for special status. But let me tell you, sir, and let the word go out today to all of Canada, that we will not accept anything less than equal status. We are not asking for special status but we will insist on equal status.

My fellow Newfoundlanders share my vision of a great and glorious Canada. They share my vision of a Canada where our children will stand tall and walk straight, where they will weep with pride as they sing "O Canada, our home our native land," as did their forefathers when they sang their national anthem:

> When sun rays crown thy pine clad hills
> And summer spreads her hand,
> When silvern voices tune thy rills,
> God guard thee Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, even though I have been sitting in this house for the last three years I feel like taking the floor this afternoon to make my maiden speech. As you know, during those three years I was relegated to the other end of the chamber and did not have the opportunity I have now to work with a team, a strong team and a good team, one that impresses me a lot.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, from the beginning of this debate, flowers, I should say heaps of flowers, fragrant, bright and perfectly well-deserved have been showered upon the incumbent of this position and all those appointed to assist him in his functions. I would not want to repeat everything which was said, but like many of my colleagues, I join in the praises offered to the Speaker and to those appointed to assist him in his task.

Mr. Speaker, I would like also, while I pay you these compliments—

[English]

I would like to make special mention of the Assistant Clerk of the house, Mr. Dubroy, who presented us with a magnificent performance as a result of his facility in remembering the names of new members, whom he has probably never seen before, as well as the names of new ridings. I think he deserves the highest congratulations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Usually, Mr. Speaker, the mover and the seconder (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand) of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne perform their duties with great seriousness, that is sure, and spend a great deal of time preparing themselves. Usually, they make speeches which attract the attention of the whole house. But I think that this year, the mover and the seconder (Messrs. Corbin and Marchand) performed their task in a more brilliant way than those I had the opportunity to hear in the past, and I should like to congratulate them for it.

For those who, like me, start to grow old, it is comforting, Mr. Speaker, to see that such fine young people, bright, conscientious and quite well-informed, with a sense of responsibility will continue in the furrow which we ploughed for 20 or 25 years in various aspects of the public life. Therefore, I offer them my congratulations.

Of course, I should like also to congratulate the leaders of the parties, first for their re-election and then for the seriousness with which they carry out their duties.

It is comforting I think, Mr. Speaker, for a member interested in the welfare of his country, to realize to what degree of responsibility—I mention the opposition only because, I will refer to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) soon—the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) carries out his duty, which is to oppose, naturally. On the government side, of course, we think sometimes that he opposes a little too vehemently, but it is his job and that of his colleagues, and we can say that he does it very conscientiously and quite seriously.

The same is true of the leaders of the other opposition parties, the NDP and the Ralliement créditiste.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I would wish that the members of the Ralliement créditiste were as sincere and serious as their leader when speaking in the house. Although his humour and wit sometimes surprise some of the members of this house, his comments are always basically serious.

Mr. Speaker, the winners of the last election have been congratulated. But I have a complex. I am thinking of those members of all the parties who bit dust on election day. I realize that that happens in all elections, but I am thinking in particular of those who worked for years in Canadian politics and did their best and who were disappointed. I am also thinking of those who were running for the first time and who felt on that day rather like one feels the first time one is disappointed in love. I should like to offer my sympathy to those Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I had first risen on a question of privilege in order to vindicate someone who was a member of this house. A member of the opposition objected, though I knew I was interpreting rather loosely the Rules of the house. But I had risen on a question of privilege pertaining to a matter of humanity and Christian charity, and I had hoped that the house would let me get on with it. As the opposition objected I was unable to finish my statement. I would like to have a couple of minutes now, to conclude what I was saying the other day about the hon. Yvon Dupuis, who was wrongly accused and who lost the first law suit. Three learned judges of the appeal court, the honourable Montgomery, Owen and Taschereau granted him leave of appeal and unanimously agreed that he had not been given a fair trial. Therefore, he appealed and I shall now quote an excerpt from Le Devoir, dated April 19, 1968, reporting the conclusion that was reached on this unfortunate situation:

> Counsels Raymond D'aoust and Paul Martineau were acting on behalf of the accused, now exonerated after three years of legal proceedings. The second trial began on March 12th and lasted but six minutes as both parties were agreed to submit to Judge Marc-Henri Blain some 6,700 pages of evidence making up 33 volumes pertaining to the first trial and to the documents that were later transferred to the Appeal Court.
> In his judgement contained in about forty pages, Mr. Justice Blain asserts that in his opinion Mr. Dupuis had never received the $10,000 and that, consequently, he must be cleared of the accusation.

I felt it was important, Mr. Speaker, that this unfortunate and nauseating story which started in this very house, with the resignation of a most promising young man be recorded in Hansard so that at least his acquittal be given as much publicity as the country's newspapers gave to the false accusation which was such a terrible ordeal for his family during three whole years.

Mr. Speaker, I have noted everything that has been said by the opposition about the Speech from the Throne; I like to listen to all the speeches, though they are not all equally good. For instance, I have observed that many members of the opposition find that the Speech from the Throne is rather meaningless, because it leaves certain things unsaid. It outlines only those measures which were high on the priority list. Had the Prime Minister decided to insert in the Speech the full details of all his projects, we, the poor members of the House of Commons standing at the rear and sometimes unable even to hear His Excellency, would have been waiting there, I think, for fully 24 hours. One must be reasonable however and not demand such a feat. I think that the main points of this government's program are very clearly stated for anyone who can read between the lines.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said and repeated many times that people would like to know how the Prime Minister and his colleagues will create that just society. Of course, I understand the members of the opposition and I have much sympathy for them who are in the dark about so many things. In fact, I have so much sympathy for them that I feel like offering them my condolences for being on the wrong side of the house. But we, who are on this side, know where we stand. The Prime Minister and his colleagues have told us where they are going and we are very pleased to see that they know where they are going, that they have taken positive steps to bring about a just society and our minds are fully at rest on that point.

I will go further, Mr. Speaker, and I will say that the concern shown by the opposition from the very beginning of the debate, in saying over and over again: "How is it that we do not have this just society at once", is an indication that even the opposition has been deeply impressed by the Prime Minister, that it came out of this election as enraptured as the rest of the Canadian people and that it expected, right after the opening of parliament, that our extraordinary Prime Minister, with a magic wand, would have created the just society overnight.

We are more realistic than that on the government side. We know that it takes nine months for a child to be born; we know that a tree grows during a given number of years, and that reform of society like the one we want to set up in Canada will take some months at least. Furthermore, those in the opposition who were here under the former government know that there remains more than 47 or 48 bills to be dealt with, or else the opposition would say: Well, you are not going on with the business under way.

Since the opposition is so anxious to see a just society, I hope that it is not going to put a spoke in our wheel. We are going to expedite these 47 bills and tackle the most urgent phases of the reform of our society, in order to create a just society.

Mr. Speaker, the former government has been blamed. Of course, those who are observing the political scene know, because it is as clear as daylight, that we have a new Prime Minister, we have a new government. We have a large number of talented new members. We have a new Liberal party adapted to the 1968 circumstances. If we had to criticize all parties which have formed the government in the last 50 years, we would find many weaknesses. We would find some in the Conservative party but not in the New Democratic party. Of course, we would never find any in the Ralliement Créditiste, as they will never come to power. However, I think it would be more intelligent to proceed as the Prime Minister has just said: "Let bygones be bygones" and let us prepare the future. This is what is being done on the government side in a quite serious way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mongrain: While waiting for the applause on the other side, Mr. Speaker, I will take the liberty of making a quite unpretentious suggestion, especially for the information of the hon. members opposite. Instead of grouping the Liberals together on the other side of the house, it would perhaps be advisable to scatter them among the members of the Opposition so that they may inform those who are unaware of what is going on here.

Mr. Speaker, I heard this afternoon the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) but I regret that he is not here. He spoke about the kisses and the eagerness of the Canadian ladies for the right hon. Mr. Trudeau. There were also some references during the election campaign to trudeaumania and to the Trudeau myth.

One did not realize, Mr. Speaker, that the Trudeau myth, or Trudeaumania, that is the cult of the right hon. Prime Minister, is probably something which cannot be explained. It probably cannot be analysed as one would do of a mathematical problem. In my view, Mr. Speaker—and I have seen the phenomenon happen in several places, especially in my own riding—it is the people of Canada who have in a way created it. After ten years of uncertainty—because those who were responsible for the management of the country were in a difficult predicament—the people of Canada did not take any more interest in their governement. They seemed to think that nothing ever happened in their country. They did not believe any more that their country was capable of doing great things and suddenly the people of Canada realized that they had discovered a leader, perfectly prepared to fill that role exactly cut out for it, capable of shouldering the terrible responsibilities of our times. The Canadian people was enthralled, from Victoria to St. John; the phenomenon appeared spontaneously and not because the thing had been cooked up or reasoned. That is the way people respond when they discover a providential man. I have seen it in my constituency, Mr. Speaker. I have been in politics for almost 25 years. I have seen enthusiastic crowds of 30,000, 40,000 and 50,000 people and when I prepared the coming of the right honourable Prime Minister in my constituency, the members of the central organization were saying to me: Take all the precautions you can, because you will have trouble holding back the crowd. You will lose control. I said to them: Listen, I have seen some of that before.

Well, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, what happened at the air terminal where I had let in carefully selected people, staid, middle-age people, serious persons, dignitaries from associations of all kinds, from the municipal government or from the school board. As I was walking about and looking at that crowd, I was thinking that there would be no trouble whatsoever, that everything was going to run smoothly, and remain under control. Mr.

Speaker, I had the surprise of my life when the terminal door opened and the Prime Minister walked in. I was walking in front of him. The crowd exploded; there was a terrific burst and all these people surged toward us. I like to think that I am rather strong and well used to taking care of myself, but the crowd swept us over the Prime Minister and myself at least ten feet, inside the air terminal. It was the same thing during the whole trip, at Trois-Rivières-Ouest, at Trois-Rivières and at Cap-de-la-Madeleine.

During that whole evening, I dreaded accidents and I am still amazed that, miraculously, the Prime Minister's caravan did not run over some of the pedestrians surging in a crowd near the cars, throwing themselves in front of them.

I have seen something still more extraordinary—something I had never seen anywhere, Mr. Speaker. We had organized the beginning of a soft ball match at Cap-de-la-Madeleine and the right hon. Prime Minister was to be the batter; the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) acted as pitcher and I was the catcher. I had asked the police to let nobody come in on the field. A four-foot steel fence surrounds that field and the police had succeeded in keeping away the crowd that was spreading out in the adjoining streets, up to the moment when the Prime Minister struck the first ball, sending it into the field. Then I saw 10, 12, 13, 14, 15 and even 20 year old boys jump over the fence to shake hands with the Prime Minister.

I witnessed an even more extraordinary sight. I saw some respectable matrons of 40, 45 and 50 years of age—perhaps they were Ladies of St. Ann—leap over the fence just to shake hands with the Prime Minister.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that such a spontaneous, enthusiastic and genuine outburst, from Victoria to St. Johns, Newfoundland, is indeed a proof that Canadians, truly and sincerely feel that they found the leader they needed, and who will be able, together with his team to run the country in its best interests.

How will the just society come about? I will say it again to the gentlemen of the opposition: by and by, as circumstances permit and provided the opposition does not cause obstruction, legislation will be introduced by those entrusted with the task. However, co-operation will evidently be required from everybody and everyone will have to do his share.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

In my view, the idea being spread around that everything should come from the government is childish and is not serious. I have tried, Mr. Speaker, to make an analysis of some sort, to find out what it would cost the government if it granted everything that members of the opposition have requested since the beginning of the debate. The total I have come to is of the order of $2 billion and a half to $3 billion. I am sure that if the government were to grant all that, the members of the opposition would be the first ones to say: it does not make sense, taxes will rise. I understand that the opposition feels that such and such a thing should have priority over others, but priorities are not all alike. Apparently all requests claim first priority. Therefore, when there is no consensus, it is up to the government to make a choice, because it carries the responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, I would like this afternoon to touch on one or two subjects more specifically. We hear comments about a just society and the suggestion that one basic condition is necessary to achieve a just society: that is increased national productivity. What is the meaning of productivity? I will venture my own definition: it is the output of manual or intellectual effort by all Canadians who can and want to work. The sum total of all these efforts constitutes the national income with which people can live and pay taxes.

Now I would like to quote from a speech made in this house by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) the hon. member for Verdun. These very words are to be found on page 252 of Hansard:

> Both parties—
>
> That is management and labour.
> —must understand that the prosperity of this great country depends on the productivity of our secondary industries; and productivity, I repeat, depends on co-operation between management and labour, and a mutual respect for each other's particular problems.

I should like to emphasize this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, that our productivity has declined for all sorts of reasons. First of all, of course, there was the unemployment problem, which the government is now trying to solve by measures which seem to me quite realistic and which should give results sooner or later. Then there was also the great number of strikes which are being blamed on the government but which occurred in most cases without the government being able to intervene; it is precisely this point to which I should like to draw the attention of all my colleagues and of the whole Canadian people.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to repeat it even though I may seem to over-emphasize this point, that strikes, for the most part, represent an obsolete way of solving labour disputes and that in our modern society we should find quicker and less unpleasant ways for workers to manifest discontent than to go on strike.

On this subject, I always quote someone who is an expert in labour matters and certainly can not be accused of anti-unionism; I am referring to Mr. Walter Reuther, the American labour leader who has often said: "It is high time the unions stopped settling their problems at the expense of the community". He also said—and I think this concerns us directly—"It is time also for governments to give them such means of settling their problems which will allow them not to depend on strikes alone".

Just to show, Mr. Speaker, how much the strikes cost the country, I will give you the 1967 statistics. For example, I see that in 1962 Canada had 290 strikes; in 1963: 318; in 1964: 327; in 1965: 478; in 1966: 582; every year the number of strikes increases; in 1967: 958. It is a constant progression. Those 958 strikes in 1967 involved 419,942 workers which represented a loss of 4,044,660 workdays.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that every time a worker is on strike, two or three others will inevitably find themselves out of work. If a firm ceases its activity, carriers will lay off and merchants will feel the pinch. Therefore, to go on with my argument, I shall simply say that for each striker, there is another worker who finds himself idle. I shall not magnify facts and I shall try to be conservative, in the ordinary sense of the word not in the political sense. If 419,942 workers striked in 1967, it means that double that number, or 839,884 Canadians, have wasted time in 1967 because of strikes: 8,089,320 work-days would have been lost. Imagine the fantastic loss of 8 million days of work. Productivity would be affected. Workers would be deprived of part of their earnings, the Canadian economy would be short of that much money. If those workers earned $1.50 per hour—you will notice I am being reasonable because there are not very many workers in this country who still work for $1.50 per hour; some earn up to $4, $4.50 an hour but I do not want to look as if I am exaggerating—and if they worked an eight-hour day, that means that in 1967, Canadian workers were deprived of an income of $97,071,840; and the same goes for the Canadian economy. That certainly did not help productivity. Please note that I speak only of the strikers. I do not refer to the whole economy which suffered because certain sectors were brought to a standstill for one month, two months, six months. I only mention the strikers because otherwise the money the workers or the Canadian economy lost would amount to hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that I say this in a constructive way. I do not want my comments to be interpreted as a condemnation of the government. Far from it. I know the government is now taking steps to improve the worker's lot. I also hope that an agreement can be reached between the three parties, the worker, the employer and the governments and there can be some kind of a truce.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Here is where I would like to make a constructive suggestion. As I said earlier, since we have a new government, a new team, I could say that we have a new Liberal party with a new program. We are in a difficult position in international affairs. It is not only in our country that there should be, between the representatives of labour, management and the government some kind of tripartite agreement to declare a truce, for a period of at least one year, maybe two, to give the government time to put into force new measures which will give more justice to the workers.

If, each time the government is tripped up—to use an expression which is not out of Bossuet—by drawn out strikes which keep half, if not all, our ministers busy, they have no time left for the constructive policies we need in this country to create a just society.

It seems to me that that should interest all Canadians who concern themselves about the common weal, especially the lot of the wage-earner, the people with low incomes. Mind you, I do not necessarily blame trade unions as being responsible for the strikes. There is probably a responsibility at the three levels and that is precisely what leads me to say that there should be an agreement between all three with a view to a truce. And I think that the first to benefit from that would be the wage-earners and the workers precisely.

Mr. Speaker, evidently there will always be in our country people who take pleasure in making demagogic statements for all sorts of reasons: electoral perhaps, selfishness, promotion of certain unions. I would like to appeal to the conscience of Canadians and tell them that they do not serve their country in such circumstances. It is too easy to blame the government for the unrest in the country. But if we look at the situation in all the countries of the world, we realize that things are going even worse than here.

With no partisan afterthought whatsoever, I submit that everybody would be better off if we forgot these selfish, mean, often childish considerations, and say: Well, our main concern will be Canada's welfare, the welfare of all those people whom we pity because, precisely, they are among the very people we call the poor whom we want to help.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me to make another suggestion? I do not claim to be an authority in labour-management matters, but I think—and I intend to bring this up again in a more specific fashion in due course —we should study the advisability of setting up labour courts throughout the country. Some circles are frightened of this compulsory arbitration, as it is called. However, all democratic thinkers have always thought that the simplest and fairest way to settle disputes was to have recourse to competent courts of justice.

If labour courts were set up, composed of competent economists and sociologists and people who know the labour code, 90 per cent of our strikes could probably be prevented.

This privilege could be left to workers in some sectors, but I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the great majority of workers, even organized workers, are absolutely fed up with these unending strikes. They would be only too happy to find ways of settling their disputes without having to be unemployed and getting into debt for weeks and months on end, with the result that they are always the losers and that the general economy of the country is almost always being jeopardized.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insist again on my trust in the present government. This is for the guidance of the opposition which is worried and which betrays its concern. As for the opposition, it makes me think of the religious communities, Mr. Speaker. A member of the community goes to the front of the room while his colleagues at the back say of him: He is a liar, he walks badly, he has this or that fault; it is sometimes possible to find some. As for him, he has not even got the privilege of saying that it is not true.

On the government side, we can at least say to the opposition: You are wrong, you are deceiving yourselves, you exaggerate, you are going a little to far.

We have confidence in the legislation presented to us by the Prime Minister precisely because the Prime Minister is a perfectly competent man, whose studies were somewhat extraordinary. He has travelled all over the world. He is free from all personal considerations as to family or any other considerations. He has selected ministers known for their prestige and dynamism. He has chosen also some very good technocrats and I would add modestly, that he is surrounded by a good team of members, which reminds me of the following teaching of St. Paul who said: If I do not brag about myself, who will? Surely, the opposition is not going to brag about us, so we take the liberty of doing it ourselves.

In fact, I think the Prime Minister is setting up the necessary machinery that will enable him to realize the constructive program which will produce a society that is as just as possible. There is no use pretending that it will be paradise on earth, that poverty will disappear as well as our problems and that there will not be any more sickness or death or defeat on election nights. No, there are more trials to come. I should add that one of the reassuring things is that we have a good opposition, and I say this without any reservation. We have a conscientious opposition which lost some good elements but which has also acquired good ones amongst the young. We, of this party, find their work edifying. Even when their duty as members of the opposition makes them exaggerate slightly, they perform their duties well and one of the conditions of the success of this government will be the constant watchfulness of a good opposition.

I would even add, for the interest and guidance of our friends opposite, that there are, on occasion, some small oppositions within the party. With all those constructive elements and those well-intentioned oppositions, all those who want to understand clearly can hope that, within a relatively short time during the term of office of four years this government will have, we will know what a just society is in Canada.

I reiterate my invitation to the representatives of labour and employers and I ask them to comply with the invitation of the government for the common good of this country and put an end to the strikes which threaten our economy.

[English]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in opening may I say that the official opposition has made many of the points which it intended to make in this debate. Some of the hon. members on the government side have been saying today that it is time we went on to something else. Perhaps that is a good indication that this debate has been worthwhile. We are prepared, if other parties wish it, to close off this debate tonight so that the government may proceed with its legislative program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Aiken: However, there are two qualifications; First, we do have members who are ready, anxious and willing to speak and if the debate does proceed we will be putting up speakers until it ends. Second, we do have a lot of points yet to raise against the government's handling of the affairs of the country and its legislative program as outlined. We will take up these items at some later opportunity.

The throne speech debate is one of the few opportunities left to the opposition to raise questions of policy on its own initiative. I want to take some time to discuss what is becoming an obvious failure of this government. I refer to its failure to tell the Canadian people what it is doing and what policies it is following, if indeed it knows itself. Efforts to use the question period have failed to obtain information on the government's policies on many matters, most particularly the government's policy on foreign affairs, whether it be NATO, Czechoslovakia or Biafra. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) have managed to bluff their way through the question period whenever these matters have been raised. They have brought down on their heads a good deal of criticism for failure to outline what lies behind the day to day decisions which the government is making. Nowhere is this lack of policy more evident than in the matter of a clear science policy for this country.

Last year the government withdrew financial support for HARP. Within recent weeks there has been the cancellation of the Queen Elizabeth observatory project on which four and a half million dollars had been spent. Over the weekend, and not in this house but by way of a press release, the government announced the ending of the intense neutron generator project which had been undertaken and was in an experimental stage for some time. We have not heard exactly how much money has been spent in the initial stages but we know it has been substantial. Now, Mr. Speaker, when mistakes are made or when projects are found to be unnecessary it is easy to understand that they should be abandoned. But in this particular instance we have not had any indication of what lies behind the decision to withdraw from the intense neutron generator project. It is very easy for us to say that the reason was financial, and this is the only one which the government has put forward, but this decision has caused uncertainty, confusion and a climate of pessimism in the scientific community of Canada.

The decisions in all these cases I have mentioned were made without any explanation except that other matters have a higher priority. Furthermore, these decisions were announced without any attempt to relate them to an over-all science policy for Canada. There was no effort whatever to reassure the country that the government does have a science policy or that its decisions on where to spend or where not to spend the money are made with the best scientific advice available. We have it on the word of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) that the decision to abandon the ING project was made because of its relationship on the priority scale to the very many other demands on the national treasury, and the necessity the government faced to curtail expenditures." This does not say anything. It is about time the house and the country were told frankly by the government what these so-called priorities are. If we are to have cancellations on the basis of some scale of priorities, let us know what these higher priorities are so that the house and the country shall be in a position to judge the effectiveness of the government's decisions and the validity of the government's judgment.

In addition, the minister must make a statement immediately to reassure Canadians generally, and the scientific community in particular, that the Science Council of Canada and the science secretariat have not been shunted into a back seat in their relationship to the apparatus of government. The minister will have seen the comment of a senior research scientist on the decision to cancel ING. Here again, I quote:

> Regardless of all this new policy-making machinery, it seems to be clear that decisions are being made by the Treasury Board as they always were.

The house and the country must have a statement immediately on the future of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. There is a feeling that the decision to cancel ING marks the end of our lead in pure research in the atomic energy field. There is the feeling among scientists, particularly in Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, that this project was one of those things which would maintain our impetus in the world of science and which would keep Atomic Energy of Canada Limited going forward.

There is the feeling that cancellation of this project has marked the beginning of the end for the effective work that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has been doing for so many years. There is this feeling, and I think the minister ought to immediately take the opportunity of assuring us and them that the government has other projects of a higher priority within the scientific field to take their place.

The decision to cancel the ING project seems to have been irrevocable. It is a decision requiring Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to discontinue its work on this project. The government should let the house and the country know what its policy is with regard to the satellite communications system. The caucus committee on energy, mines and resources of the Progressive Conservative party made a trip to Chalk River in March just before the house adjourned. The members of that committee went there to have a look at this ING project to see what its possibilities were, to find out as laymen at least what benefit it would be to the country and what the alternatives were.

We understood there were several projects in the wind and that the government intended shortly to make a decision with regard to the priorities involved. We also understood that the satellite communications program might take a priority over this ING project, but that it would not be abandoned.

We have heard nothing from the minister today or over the week end concerning the future of the other project. Is the government going ahead with the satellite communications program which seemed to be an alternative to Atomic Energy's ING project? I cannot emphasize too strongly the gravity of the situation. The feeling must not be allowed to catch on that the government regards scientific projects as scapegoats for overspending in other areas. To date, we have seen nothing but a negative attitude. We have the cancellation of programs already begun and no indication of what new projects are to be started.

I believe that the government is taking too lightly the corrosive effect of the decision on the scientific and university community, because there is this feeling—and once it starts to develop it will be difficult to stop—that the country is no longer interested in maintaining the advances it has held in the scientific field since the end of the second war.

Above all, the government must act at once with a clear statement of policy that will reassure the scientific community, the universities and industry, that scientific progress does indeed have the priority it deserves in the policy planning of the government. Surely, the minister and the government do not need to be convinced of the importance of such a statement.

I should like to refer the minister to the fifth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada under the title "Strengthening the Country's Indigenous Effort":

> Canada cannot rely entirely on imported technology; there must be a strengthening of the country's own capabilities. Without a strong and indigenous effort, a country cannot attract and hold the scientific and technical manpower which permits it to adapt and exploit technologies originating abroad, or which it needs to train its future supply of scientists and engineers.

Again, I quote:

> Canada must maintain a high potential for technological change by ensuring that there is an adequate supply of scientific and technical manpower to serve as a basic source of invention and innovation.

What all this means is that if the government and the parliament of Canada appear to be taking an indifferent attitude toward science, scientific research and progress in this country, we will lose our scientists and research will be retarded. We will jeopardize any hope for the development of a true Canadian technology.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is six o'clock. May I call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I will now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was berating the government for the secrecy with which it has shrouded many of its decisions, particularly the decisions in connection with the scientific policies which the government intends to adopt. The government must outline, not only to parliament but to the people and the scientific community of Canada, the direction it is going to take in the matter of scientific development. This is one area in which the government's inclination toward secrecy, its tendency to withhold information and its aversion to explaining anything to anybody will have terrible results for Canada.

Scientists, I think are no less realistic in this matter than anybody else. I am sure they are prepared to accept the fact that there is a limitation on the amount of money that a government can spend in any particular field, be it the scientific field or any other. They are prepared and must be prepared to accept the need for priorities, priorities in public spending and priorities in scientific development.

The scientists will understand and accept, as we will, Mr. Speaker, reasonable explanations of reasonable positions in these matters. But I believe that we have the right to insist that the government make such explanations. The scientific community wants to know, and parliament and the country are entitled to know, on what basis the recent decision to abandon support for three particular scientific projects was made. We think that the government should lay on the table the scientific reports on which its decisions were based, and it should relate in some detail reasons for its policy in each of these three matters.

As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, no one in the scientific community has ever said that the ING project was a bad one. In fact, there is unanimous agreement that it has great possibilities for Canada in the field of nuclear energy. The objections that have come from the scientific community have arisen from the knowledge that there is a limit to what the government can spend, and that the government does intend to cut back on its spending for scientific projects.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the question was one of priorities. There are dozens of excellent development projects on the drawing board vying for government support. Consequently, it was a very delicate operation to settle the priorities that the government intended to adopt and to maintain the balance of scientific progress. This operation called for a detailed and clear explanation of the factors involved in making the decision to drop the ING project, of the factors that might lead the government to adopt some other project and to proceed in some other field. The community should have been given some idea where the government was going.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, this was a delicate operation that should have been carefully explained by the government so that the whole scientific community would have had some indication that the government really did intend to proceed with scientific projects, perhaps in another field. The government's secret decision to drop this whole ING project was like dropping a rock into a basket of eggs. The attitude of the government was a negative one which demolished the project. I fear that unless the government makes some explanation very soon damage will have been done to our country.

Two or three ministers seem to have been involved in this matter, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) made the announcement because of his responsibility for atomic energy. But there are one or two other ministers who have some general responsibility for scientific matters, and it was for this reason that questions this morning were directed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Unfortunately, these questions brought forth no response and we are left without any knowledge of where the government intends to go.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that the government must not let another day go by without a full statement on its policy and intentions in the scientific field. The dark cloud that now hovers over scientific effort in Canada must be removed, and there must be a clear statement of our goals in this field. I urge the government to make a statement so that the house will know, first, why ING was dropped; second, what is intended to take its place; and third, into what other field of scientific endeavour the government intends to move. Finally, I ask the government to give some assurance that it will begin to explain what it is doing to the people of Canada.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on rising for the first time to take part in debate in this chamber, I am happy to join with other hon. members in extending congratulations to yourself, sir, on your re-election as Speaker. I also extend congratulations to the Deputy Speaker and to the mover (Mr. Corbin) and seconder (Mr. Marchand) of the address in reply. As the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) resumes his seat I want to compliment him on his speech, which I thought made a great deal of sense.

My election in the newly formed constituency of Regina East came after a hard fought campaign in which real issues were discussed—at least, they were discussed in the local campaign. My campaign was based largely on the New Democratic party policies with respect to medicare, Saskatchewan style; adequate housing; reasonable interest rates; the cost of living and the need for a prices review board; and a sound agricultural program. These are the things for which I intend to fight. Some of my colleagues have already discussed some of these subjects and I support their stand.

While I am still close to the subject of elections, I should like to urge the government to reconsider its position, as stated by the government house leader the other day, and suggest that consideration be given to up dating and improving the elections act at the earliest possible opportunity. Changes are required in the elections act and in order to produce the best possible changes, time will be required. Members now have before them the report of the representation commissioner in respect of a permanent voter's list and absentee voting. Members should be given the opportunity of studying in committee the recommendations of the commissioner, with the hope that such scrutiny will bring forward a plan that can form the basis for an improved act.

From my own experience in a number of campaigns, I feel that the elections act as it presently stands has not kept pace with the needs of the times and with the changing society in which we live. There are a considerable number of small and technical improvements that might be considered. I should like to draw to the attention of members three major areas in which I feel improvements are essential. First, there is the need for improved enumeration of voters. The present system is simply not good enough. Thousands of people have their names left off the list because of the present outdated enumeration machinery. In urban areas the usual result is that people left off the preliminary list are disenfranchised on election day. Second, there is the need to provide each voter with the greatest possible opportunity of exercising his franchise on or near election day. We live in a highly mobile society and the present election machinery simply has not been able to keep in step with the situations confronting people at election time. I have come in contact with many cases in which people have been disenfranchised through circumstances completely beyond their control.

Third, there is the need for greater uniformity between federal and provincial election acts. A great deal of confusion is caused by differences between the provincial and federal election acts in Saskatchewan and, I am sure, all across Canada. While it will not be possible to achieve complete uniformity, I think steps could be taken to avoid some of the needless confusion which occurs at present as a result of mechanical differences in the operation of provincial and federal election acts, as well as differences in poll boundaries.

Regina East is now a constituency of over 90,000 people. It comprises all of the city of Regina east of Albert street, extends east of Regina for some 50 miles to the vicinity of Fort Qu'Appelle and north for well over 100 miles to the vicinity of Wynyard and the Quill Lakes. Over 70 per cent of the people in the riding live in the city of Regina.

Regina, for a considerable number of years, has been one of the fastest growing cities of Canada. It now has a population of near 140,000 and it is certainly destined to continue as one of the major cities of Canada. Its distinctive characteristics and history make it one of Canada's great cities. A great deal of the rural area of the constituency is a mixed farming region. While there are some areas where the growing of wheat predominates, through much of the constituency mixed farming involving joint grain and livestock operations prevails. Near the city of Regina there, of course, is considerable concentration on dairy production. The historic Qu'Appelle river valley also runs through the rural area of the constituency and provides a considerable potential for irrigation, recreation and other development.

The east half of the city of Regina, which is in my constituency, is populated by people with a wide range of ethnic backgrounds. People from almost every European ethnic group, as well as some people with an Asian ethnic background, are living in this part of Regina. Many of these groups have made a significant and distinct contribution to the cultural and social life of Regina. Many people have moved into Regina from the surrounding rural areas. Similarly, the people in the rural area of Regina East are capable, industrious and diverse in their backgrounds.

It is a great honour for me to have the privilege of having in my constituency eight Indian reserves with a resident population of some 3,000 people. In addition, there are also several Métis communities and there are a significant number of Indian and Métis people living in the city of Regina.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words with respect to the problems faced by Indian and Métis people and our responsibilities as legislators in dealing with these problems. I have had a good deal of contact with some of these problems over the past few years and it is my conviction that we need to approach them with a sense of urgency and a sensitivity for their basic nature.

I have visited a great many of the homes on the Indian reserves in my constituency and, as many other members have also experienced, have been appalled by some of the living conditions encountered. I have also been disturbed on many occasions by the attitude and response of people in the rest of the community. References have often been made, Mr. Speaker, to the need for greater education of Indian and Métis people. I think we also need to be reminded of the very great need for educating the non-Indian community to the nature of the situation.

I have seen many examples of Indian and Métis people who have made an outstanding success of their lives, by any standard. On the other hand, I have also seen many cases where these people have experienced a great deal of difficulty in coping with present day problems under the circumstances which have prevailed.

Many of the people in the Indian and Métis communities in the rural areas of Saskatchewan have joined the rural-urban trek and have taken up residence in the city of Regina or other large urban centres in our province. Some of these people have coped quite successfully with the transition from rural to urban living. Others, however, have faced very serious problems. They have come into a city such as Regina with very little resources, limited education and have had to face a community attitude which still results in many subtle forms of discrimination in spite of progress made in legal safeguards of rights. Consequently, many of these people have been shunted from pillar to post and have found a great deal of difficulty in achieving any sort of a stable life in an urban setting. A potential problem exists in that these people will naturally tend to look to each other for companionship and security in the face of community attitudes. They will tend to congregate together in the same houses and apartment blocks. This, Mr. Speaker, I am sure will be recognized as the beginning of a ghetto. This is the type of thing we must avoid if we are to prevent some of the problems which have been faced in other places.

It is good to know that the present Indian Act is under review and I hope that some useful results will be achieved from this review. However, I hope that what is achieved is something more than just an ironing out of some of the present administrative red tape or the removing of some of the legal disabilities under which Indian people presently live or the making of some improvements in social and economic opportunities. I say this, Mr. Speaker, because I feel that what is needed is a fundamentally new approach to this problem. All of us in Canada have to face up to the responsibility that Indian people are a group of people who were essentially dispossessed of the land they once knew as their own. They have been regarded as second class citizens in our society for many years.

If we are to achieve any sort of fundamental change in the situation, we must clearly establish some of the principles that will apply to future policies.

First, it must be recognized that Indian people have the right of self-determination. The implications of this principle are that not only does it give Indian people the full right of integration into the community and society as we know it, but also that it gives them the right to live their own existence as they wish to live it. The right to make their own decisions must be recognized. Second, we must recognize commitments made by Canada as a nation to Indian people. This involves full recognition of commitments regarding land, health, and other services. These rights need to be honoured as long as the Indian people collectively and individually wish to retain them. Third, we need to get away from the centralized control and administration which has for too long featured our Indian affairs programs. Many hon. members will be aware of some of the incredible stories involved in the centralized control and bureaucracy which Indian people encounter at every turn and in almost every day of their life. It is certainly no wonder that the ambition and incentive of some Indian people to progress with the times has all too often been stifled by the smothering paternalism of Indian affairs administration over the years. I fully recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there are dedicated people in the Indian affairs branch who are working hard to do a job as best they can, and I also recognize that the branch has in theory produced many plans which were very laudable and commendable in their concepts and objectives. However, it seems that many of these plans and ideas have been stifled in implementation.

Transportation problems and policies have been a matter of concern for legislators and governments throughout Canada's history. The people of Regina East are concerned as well with many aspects of transportation policy. A major concern of my constituents and of all Canadians must be to keep abreast of changing and advancing transportation technology. New developments are taking place in transportation technology today which have the potential of outdating accepted forms of transportation within a very short period of time. One of the most exciting prospects at the present time from a long run point of view is the possibility of new developments in pipe line transport.

At the same time, comparative costs, total cost factors and investment in transportation facilities are also critical. The lack of planning in the development of transportation facilities in Canada in the past has imposed a severe burden upon our economy. Surely, we can now learn from the lessons of the past and decide that transportation is to be dealt with in a sensible and planned fashion. This must involve the co-ordination and integration of all means of transport and decisions must be made with respect to the most economic means of transport in both specific and total situations.

One example where planning is needed at the present time is with respect to the transport of potash to markets, as was brought out in this debate by my colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). Over the past several years rail facilities have been developed to handle the transport of potash from Saskatchewan mines to the west coast for trans-shipment and also transport to United States markets. This has involved a large investment in facilities by the railways and in addition it has meant a considerable investment in both financial and human terms by the people involved in the movement of potash. Specifically, I refer to railway employees at a point like Melville where I lived for several years. Railway employees there, on the basis of the facilities developed, have invested in homes and sunk their family roots in this community. It would appear that the railways are now attempting to exploit their monopoly situation and exact the greatest possible revenue from the movement of potash. On the other hand, it could be that the potash companies might attempt to play two forms of transport off against each other. While there are some people who feel this is the way the economy should be operated, there are many others who feel this is a senseless and wasteful way in which to deal with our economic problems.

Both federal and provincial governments are going to be involved in this situation sooner or later. I would urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) to acquaint himself with this situation and to take action to ensure that the policy being followed by the railways is in the public interest. On the other hand, I think that the provincial government in Saskatchewan will have to take a close look at the question of truck transport, since the provision of roads and some part of road transport falls under their jurisdiction. This situation is a test which could indicate whether the government really intends to take a new approach in dealing with economic problems.

The city of Regina also has some transportation problems which I would like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Transport. Air travel connections from Regina to eastern Canada leave a great deal to be desired. Some trips to eastern Canadian points involve a travel time of nine to ten hours of which only some four hours are spent in the air. I would like to urge the Minister of Transport to take action to ensure that Air Canada provides direct flights between Regina and an eastern Canadian point and if possible link such a flight with a direct flight to Canada's west coast.

The main line of the C.P.R. passes through the city of Regina. However, it is a matter of regret that the only passenger service made available to the people of Regina by the C.P.R. involves train stops in the early morning hours. Several years ago, strong representations were made by many people in Regina, including myself, to the Board of Transport Commissioners to ensure that there was a daylight passenger train service on the C.P.R. main line. However, the C.P.R. point of view prevailed and the existing daylight passenger service was cancelled. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have almost given up hope of any improvement by the C.P.R. in dealing with people and passenger traffic as long as this huge corporation is in the hands of owners who place the profit motive above all other considerations. Fortunately for Regina, the C.N.R. does have a railiner connection with Saskatoon where passengers may transfer to the C.N.R. main line. This, however, involves considerable extra travel to and from eastern points. I would urge the C.N.R. to overcome this problem by giving consideration to the establishment of a railiner service to Melville on the C.N.R. main line and other eastern Saskatchewan points. In addition to serving local traffic needs, such a service could be tied in with the transcontinental passenger train service. It should be possible to provide a sleeping car service originating at Melville which would enable passengers from Regina and eastern Saskatchewan points to entrain at Melville with comfort and convenience.

The absence of a C.B.C. television station in Saskatchewan is regretted by many people in our province. Saskatchewan people see only those programs which can be arranged through affiliated stations. I believe Saskatchewan is the only province without a CBC-TV outlet. A comparison of programs shows that Saskatchewan people cannot see many programs viewed in other parts of Canada. In spite of this, C.B.C. programming is rated very high among many Saskatchewan people. The C.B.C. is now preparing to instal television facilities in some remote areas of Canada. To this I have no objection. All I ask is that Saskatchewan have one C.B.C. station.

There are, of course, some items in the Speech from the Throne which I welcome. The long awaited federal co-operatives act will be welcomed by most people in Regina East. This act, which has been just around the corner for so many years, will enable co-operatives to play a more adequate role in the national economy. I trust that the promise of such legislation in this session will not meet the same fate as similar promises for such an act on numerous occasions in the past.

Similarly, I welcome the proposal to increase the cash advances available to grain farmers. The amendments proposed to the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Farm Credit Act will at least make this legislation operative again after the Liberal government allowed it to fall into disuse earlier this year. Judging from the wording of the resolutions now on the order paper, I may, however, have some reservations about the specific terms of the amendments.

Other than the cash advance proposal there was nothing in the Speech from the Throne to indicate that the government intended to act with respect to the serious problems facing the wheat economy. This is very disappointing to those people affected.

The executive of the Saskatchewan New Democratic party wired the Prime Minister urging that the agriculture committee of the House of Commons hold hearings on the prairies immediately in order to obtain a full picture of the present situation. The executive also urged the formation of a special sales commission with wheat board officials plus farm representatives to promote sales. I certainly commend this proposal for consideration and would urge that it be followed by action very soon.

Furthermore, it is to be regretted that the Speech from the Throne suggested no approach to the broader and long run problems facing people engaged in agriculture. It was my concern in this regard which prompted me to inquire a few days ago about the report of the special task force on agricultural policy. Certainly, it is to be hoped that the task force will set out adequate guide lines and that the government will act on its recommendations promptly. True, the Prime Minister made some reference to agriculture in his address which at least recognized the seriousness of problems facing prairie agriculture. However, if the only proposal the Prime Minister can make to deal with longer range problems is the national grains council, with all the questions this raises, then I am afraid we are not making much progress.

• (8:30 p.m.)

My colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), has already outlined the situation facing farmers in western Canada much better than I can, and I join with him in his plea for sound agricultural policies. In my view, several factors demand the urgent attention of the federal government.

First, there is the difficult marketing situation, especially with respect to export markets. These problems demand government action to ensure stability, especially price stability. For wheat, in particular, adequate government price guarantees are required. Only in this way can those agencies responsible have adequate power to deal with those factors in the world market situation beyond Canada's immediate control.

Second, there is the lack of bargaining power possessed by agriculture. In an economy where power in most sectors is controlled on a block or corporate basis, the farmer is in a hopeless position when he has to continue operation as a small entrepreneur in the classical market situation. The cost-price squeeze is a reality for the farmer.

Third, there is the technological revolution. New technology and developments have profoundly affected agriculture. Science has literally made possible two or more blades of grass where only one grew before. At the same time, new machinery and techniques now enable one man to do what it once took many to do. These changes have already drastically altered the organization of agriculture and have resulted in an upheaval for many people. Still more changes appear to be in the offing. At the same time, the demands for skills required in agriculture are increasing, making adequate education as much of a must for the farmer of the future as for anybody else.

Fourth, there is lagging productivity. The economic council underlined the fact that Canada is not keeping pace in agricultural productivity compared with other countries, largely due to deficiencies in research programs. In addition, I must note that the absence of programs and the misdirection of programs have prevented farmers from obtaining the tools necessary to increase productivity.

The government's reference in the Speech from the Throne to clearing up the backlog of legislation is welcome. Many of these items have long been awaited. No one will quarrel with the particular value of many of the items. But the fact that reference had to be made to these items is surely a severe slap to the previous Liberal government. While the importance of much of this legislation is not questioned, the logic in giving it top billing is curious in view of the references to new priorities. It is like saying that we'll sweep the house before starting the renovations.

Much has been said in this debate about disappointment in the Speech from the Throne, disappointment in the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) elaboration, and indeed in recent days disappointment about the lack of vitality in this debate. It is disappointing that to date only three ministers, other than the Prime Minister, have participated in this debate.

All of this is a direct consequence of a basic mistake by the government. The government, as it has stated, raised the expectations of Canadian people. But then, as was evident in the Speech from the Throne and in statements by the Prime Minister in recent weeks, the government lost its cool. It realized that it did not have the plans and programs necessary to make these expectations a reality. Thus, it had to undertake a crash effort to produce acceptable programs. But somehow it had to fill the gap. What better solution than to occupy parliament with unfinished business? This may be smart tactics but it is not good government.

I say this for two reasons. The first is that the type of programs required today need time for implementation. If they are not given first priority now, they will not be developed in time to do the job. The people of Canada will judge the government harshly on this score.

The second reason is that by choosing this course of action the government has irretrievably lost much of the momentum generated in Canadian affairs by the raising of expectations. This has happened because when the moment of truth came the government chose the old, traditional style of politics rather than the new politics of action and dynamic leadership.

We are living in a dynamic society and age. The pace of change and the demand for change accelerate. New knowledge, and new awareness that is universal in its impact, act as a catalyst. People want changes now. They are not prepared to tolerate unsatisfactory situations as was once the case. They know, as a result of new knowledge and awareness, that they do not have to put up with unsatisfactory conditions. The growth in communications is bringing the world closer together. Injustice near at hand is not tolerated in the same way as injustice far away. All the world is now near at hand.

New technology and new knowledge can quickly make a shambles of existing institutions and of the existing economic and social order. People have now experienced the benefits of technology. At the same time, the unrest and disquiet in the world are obvious. People are questioning values. Many, especially the young, see through the shallowness and hypocrisy of what they see about them. They are searching for values that will give some meaning to the material side of life. They are looking for quality in life.

Governments, churches, all institutions, must take full cognizance of what is happening. This means not only recognizing the existence of these forces but also acting positively to deal with them. I am certain that the government and its advisers are fully aware of the forces present in society today, but it is clear that this recognition has not been translated into programs and action.

As I stated previously, injustice will no longer be tolerated. Inequalities in society represent a large segment of what might be termed injustice. Inequality in Canada will not be eliminated just by tinkering with the existing order. Surely, the economic council finding that regional disparity has not lessened over decades in spite of significant public efforts demonstrates this fact.

The elimination of inequality in Canada will require a major overhaul of the Canadian economy. The task involved is compounded by the impact of technological change. The degree of economic control now in the hands of the corporate sector, both domestic and foreign, contains the germ of much of our present inequality. The task is unfinished until the economic power held in this private sector is wrested away and restructured to enable people not only to enjoy the good life but also to participate fully in deciding on the good life. The accomplishment of this task involves a host of actions including overhaul of the tax system, action to ensure economic independence, reorganization of many aspects of the economy, adequate housing and a well thought out regional development program. It is because the government's approach is tinkering and timid rather than profound and courageous that I cannot support the motion before the house.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, as one of the many new members of the House of Commons in this first session of the twenty eighth parliament I am very pleased to have the opportunity of taking part in this debate.

I, too, would like to congratulate you on your election to the office of Speaker of the House of Commons. I am sure that the many favourable comments that were made at the time of your election on September 12 were well deserved, and I look forward to working under your direction for what I hope will be a long time to come. I promise that you will have my complete co-operation in complying with the rules of the house. I also wish to extend the same sentiments to the Deputy Speaker.

Permit me also to compliment the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), on their excellent presentations in moving and seconding the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

My constituency of Assiniboia is the centre one of the three southern ridings in Saskatchewan. It is 200 miles long and up to 90 miles wide, being one of the largest constituencies in the settled parts of Canada. It is mainly an agricultural area, producing some of the highest quality wheat in the west. We also produce other grains, oil seeds, cattle, hogs, and many other farm products, but on the whole our average rainfall is such that wheat is our best crop.

In the Assiniboia constituency we have some very important oil fields, some sodium sulphate mines, and some small but thriving manufacturing plants. We have a population of about 70,000 people of divers backgrounds, including several communities that are predominantly French speaking. I am indeed grateful for the honour of representing such fine people and such a great area here in the House of Commons. I am also proud to share with the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) the honour of representing the province of Saskatchewan on the government side of the house.

I believe that this is the first time since 1930 that the Assiniboia constituency, which now includes the former Weyburn constituency, has sent a representative to sit on the Speaker's right. This is a tremendous responsibility, especially in view of the fact that I am one of the few members of this house who is a practicing, active farmer, and one of the even smaller number of such on this side. I serve notice here and now that I intend to bring the problems and needs of my constituents and my part of Canada to the attention of this house, and to the attention of the government, at every opportunity.

I was born and have lived practically all my life in the Assiniboia constituency. I have been farming on my own for 38 years and I think I know the viewpoint of the residents of my area. I have seen bad times and good times. The worst times were back in the dirty thirties, and the best times were probably during the four years from 1963-64 to 1966-67. In those four years the value of wheat exports averaged well over $1 billion a year. We farmers were shocked at the drastic reduction in markets and sales in the 1967-68 crop year when the value of our wheat exports dropped less than $700 million, and the same experts who predicted an almost unlimited demand for wheat a few years ago are now far from optimistic about the market outlook.

The farmers of this country, and especially the wheat producers, are worried about the future and with good reason. For several years we were told by agricultural authorities, both Canadian and international, that there would be such a big demand for wheat that it was doubtful if we could produce enough to meet requirements. On the strength of this forecast many farmers borrowed money to expand their operations and produce more efficiently. We bought larger machinery and made heavy investments in fertilizer, expensive farm chemicals, and the equipment to apply them.

As a result our yields and our total production have risen tremendously. Let me illustrate by saying that 1967 was a very dry year. It was even dryer in Saskatchewan than it was in 1937. The average wheat yield in 1937 was between two and three bushels per acre in Saskatchewan, whereas in 1967 it was well over 15 bushels per acre. This dramatic increase was mostly due to improved efficiency and better farming methods, which included many expensive items such as fertilizer and weed chemicals. Better machinery has been an important factor in rising yields and production, but machinery costs are high and represent a heavy annual charge against our cash income.

The point is that western farmers, or a large majority of them, have geared their operations and their financial commitments to an expanding market for farm products. We are told that the recent downturn in effective demand for wheat and other grains is of a temporary nature, but many of us are not so sure that we can depend on this. It is somewhat reassuring, however, to hear that the wheat board is redoubling its efforts to sell wheat, and apparently with some results. In the first five weeks of this crop year our wheat exports were 32.6 million bushels, which is up substantially from the 27.5 million bushels exported in the same five weeks one year ago.

[Mr. Douglas.]

It is in the interest of all Canada, and all Canadians, that the agricultural industry be maintained in a healthy and thriving condition. It is one of the most important segments of the national economy and has usually made an enormous contribution to our export trade and toward keeping a balance between exports and imports. A depression in agriculture would be magnified many times throughout the economy, and would set off a serious recession, the effects of which would be felt in every part of the country.

I should like now to outline some of the steps I think are required to restore the confidence of our farmers and to avert the dire effects of a lagging farm economy. First and foremost, an expansion of our markets is required. The wheat board and the government must be very aggressive in searching out, developing, and maintaining reliable outlets for our products. The United States has shown us the value of aggressive salesmanship in the past year or two. It is imperative that we do the best possible job of advertising and selling our produce. Unusually high world wheat production during the past two years has made it necessary to adopt new sales methods and I feel confident this can and will be done. Grain prices have gone down somewhat in the past year. The best hope we have for improved prices is to increase the effective demand. In recent years we have learned that when the demand for our grain equals or exceeds our supply, the prices will improve. So, developing markets will have the twofold benefit of allowing us to sell more bushels, and at better prices.

I note references in the Speech from the Throne to a federal co-operatives act and to an export development act. I trust that both of these measures will contribute to more effective marketing of wheat and other farm products. I was also happy to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say that the government and the wheat board are determined to sell at least 1.3 billion bushels of wheat in the next three years. Farmers will not be satisfied with anything less. Of interest too were the Prime Minister's remarks about a high level of wheat and flour content in our international development program. I am sure that Canadians are fully in favour of a maximum effort to ship our surplus food to the unfortunate peoples of the world, who need it, but do not have the funds to buy it. It seems to me that this is one of the better ways in which Canada can serve the interests of peace and world brotherhood.

Another urgent need in agriculture is more and better research. We need more research in many fields in respect of such things as higher yielding crop varieties, better livestock, better handling, storage and marketing methods, and greater knowledge of consumer requirements. There are tremendous possibilities in all these areas and it is urgent that they be fully explored.

Credit facilities for agriculture need attention. I welcome the references in the Speech from the Throne to a new Farm Improvement Loans Act as well as amendments to the Farm Credit Act and the Farm Machinery Syndicates Credit Act. The previous Farm Improvement Loans Act expired last June, but few loans were made under that act in the latter months it was in force. As most hon. members will know, the interest rate was fixed at 5 per cent, and the rising interest rates of the last year or so made that rate so unattractive to the lending institutions that they had practically stopped making loans under the act. In spite of the fact that interest rates have dropped, the 5 per cent rate is still not a realistic one.

I agree with the proposition that the cabinet should be given the power to set a rate which may be varied from time to time as changing interest rates may dictate. I suggest that the rate set can and should be considerably less than bank loan rates, because of the additional protection the lenders will get as a result of the government guarantee. I was pleased to see that the new act will allow credit unions and many other institutions to be authorized lenders under the act, in addition to the banks. Many communities in Saskatchewan are served by credit unions only. The town of Assiniboia has one of the largest rural credit unions in the world.

With regard to the Farm Credit Act, I am glad to hear that it is planned to increase the capital of the Farm Credit Corporation and to broaden its use. I am somewhat disturbed, however, by the announced intention of applying what can be termed a "floating interest rate" to these loans. This is quite a different situation from the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

I believe that the Farm Credit Corporation was set up to provide an opportunity for farmers to attain economic units, and it is restricted to those who actually need the help and can qualify. Once a farmer has reached a certain size of operation he can no longer qualify for a loan. Those who do qualify at present do not necessarily get the full loan required at 5 per cent. In many cases the first $20,000 required and approved is at 5 per cent, and the balance will be at very close to commercial rates. I hope the interest rates under this act will remain undisturbed to encourage the creation of economic farm units, and to encourage young men to stay in farming by making it a little less difficult for them to get started. The act has been very successful in doing this in the past, and I would not want to see anything done to reduce its effectiveness.

I will include the subject of cash advances in the category of farm credit. In the light of the lower delivery opportunities in the last year, farmers are more short of cash than usual at this time of year. I am quite sure that more use than ever before will be made this fall of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. The Speech from the Throne indicated that there would be amendments to that act. Farmers will welcome the announcement that the proposed amendments will double the rates and the limits of interest free cash advances on farm stored grain.

I wish to point out, however, that these cash advances will not help those farmers who have no grain to sell. There are areas in the Assiniboia constituency, and in other parts of the prairies, where the crop was poor last year and there has been no carryover from the 1967 crop. Many of these areas have been hit hard by a variety of natural calamities this year including drought, hail, frost and, more recently, excessive rainfall that is playing havoc with the harvest, which in some cases might otherwise not have been too bad. I urge this government and the provincial governments to watch these disaster and potential disaster areas, and to be prepared to render whatever special assistance may be required.

Another step that I think is needed to stabilize the farm industry is an improved system of all risk crop insurance, which would be available to farmers at rates that would make it possible for all to participate. The federal and provincial governments have recognized the benefits of a crop insurance program and I believe it is operating in most provinces. The federal and provincial governments' share the operating costs, and the federal government contributes 25 per cent of the premium. The cost to the farmer is still so high that only a fraction of those eligible for insurance actually participate in the plans.

I think it will be necessary for governments to increase their rate of support for crop insurance so that these plans will be universally accepted. If that happens, farmers will be more adequately protected against the many hazards we face every year, and which have been especially prevalent this season. The benefits of such a widespread crop insurance program would be great indeed, and I am convinced that its sustaining and steadying influence on the national economy, would far more than compensate for the cost. There are various proposals for bringing about these changes in the application of crop insurance, but I will not attempt to go into them at this time.

The Speech from the Throne referred to a national grains council. I believe this is a most welcome proposal. At the present time we have many different organizations purporting to speak for the farmers. For example, I am a member of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and also the Saskatchewan Farmers Union. Both these organizations make statements from time to time, and sometimes they disagree. I hope a national grains council will have representation from producers, farm organizations and all interests involved in the production, handling and marketing of our grain. Such a council should be able to arrive at solutions for the very serious problems facing farmers at this time, solutions that would find ready acceptance by the federal government because they would represent the combined thinking of all groups concerned.

I hope the national grains council, or the government, will examine the merits of what has come to be known as the two-price system for wheat. This system would raise the price of wheat used for domestic consumption by perhaps $1 a bushel above the export price which is chronically depressed by world trading conditions. This domestic price increase would be financed, not by government subsidy, but by increasing the price of bread by approximately two cents a loaf. The price of bread has gone up a great deal in the past 20 years, but the value of its wheat content has changed very little. It seems to me it is only fair that farmers should receive an increase in respect of the basic ingredient of bakery products, when all others concerned in the business have received more for their efforts. The price of everything used by farmers in the production of grain has risen by leaps and bounds, and there should be some way to relate the price of wheat used in Canada to the general price levels of other goods and services. I am told that Canada is the only major wheat producing country which does not give its farmers the advantage of a better price for wheat used at home. I urge early action to investigate these proposals. I know there are difficulties involved, but I am sure they are not insurmountable.

I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that I intended to bring the needs of my area to the attention of the house. I hope I have made a start on that project in the past few minutes. I want to say also that I am interested in the problems of every part of Canada, and I have listened with interest to the speeches of others participating in this debate. However, like many other members, I am dubious about the wisdom of using so much valuable time in discussing the Speech from the Throne, when there is urgent legislation waiting to be considered. I believe that Canadian people are watching very critically to see if this new parliament can change its old fashioned ways and become an efficient and dignified institution which can deal effectively and quickly with the nation's business.

The Speech from the Throne forecast reforms in parliamentary procedure. It is quite apparent to most Canadians that very drastic reforms are required. I hope that we will get on with this job as quickly as possible. Undue delay will not be tolerated by our constituents, who must have their confidence in our parliamentary institutions restored. I will do everything in my power to help bring our procedures up-to-date.

There is another subject on which I would like to comment briefly, Mr. Speaker. It is the subject of labour-management disputes. Several disputes in recent months have been of great concern to western Canada. It was reassuring to hear from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) that the strike of the lakehead grain handlers has not, in his opinion, caused any loss of grain sales or markets. Might I add that his efforts and the efforts of his department, which finally resulted in a settlement of that strike, are very much appreciated by most western people, even though we farmers know we will eventually have to pay the shot.

It does seem to me, however, that strikes such as the ones we have endured this summer should not be such a constant threat. Surely, in this day and age some method can be found to settle labour-management disputes before they reach the strike or lock-out stage. Reference was made by the Minister of Labour to the desirability of improving communication and co-operation so as to facilitate the peaceful settlement of these matters. In this regard I anticipate concrete action during this session.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to express my general satisfaction with the Speech from the Throne. I look forward to the early implementation of the many progressive programs it forecasts, not only for agriculture but for all this great Canada of ours.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, as a newcomer to this house I have listened over the past few days to the various views expressed by hon. members on a wide variety of subjects. I find that while I am not entirely in agreement with much that has been said, I can subscribe wholeheartedly to one sentiment that appears to be universally shared, namely, the pride and pleasure of this house in the re-election of Your Honour as Speaker. I would like to add my congratulations to you, to your new deputy and to all those who have been appointed to various tasks in this new parliament as well as to the mover (Mr. Corbin) and the seconder (Mr. Marchand) of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I congratulate the mover and the seconder, but at the same time I feel sorry that they had to work so valiantly in support of such a poor thing as this Speech from the Throne.

If it truly represents the legislative plans of this government, then I can only describe it as disappointing and disillusioning. It will be particularly so to the people of my riding of Dauphin where agriculture is such a vital factor. As the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir) pointed out in the house the other day, 60 per cent of prairie residents are directly or indirectly dependent upon the grain industry.

The Speech from the Throne, as a reflection of government plans, was woefully deficient in the area of agriculture. At a time when there are great and urgent problems in agriculture, particularly in the wheat sector, this government appears to be blissfully unaware of them: Merely adjusting farm credit upward or tinkering with existing programs falls far short of what is needed at this time.

While our attitude to the whole agricultural industry in Canada needs complete rethinking and a radical and entirely new approach, the truly pressing problem lies in the area of wheat production. Canada's wheat channels today are choked with a tremendous carry-over. Piling up behind this is another bumper crop. By the time the current harvest is completed, this country will be faced with a disposable amount of wheat totaling well in excess of one billion bushels—some estimates place this figure at one and a quarter billion bushels.

What are the prospects of disposing of this huge amount of wheat? From the best available reports, the prospects are dim. Canada is caught between the inexorable pressure of wheat production and the increasing constriction imposed by dwindling foreign sales. When we consider that only about 10 per cent of our wheat production is absorbed by the domestic market, it can easily be seen what even the smallest dwindling of sales abroad can mean.

It is true that the wheat picture has been complicated by the crippling two-months strike of the grain handlers at lakehead ports, by unnaturally wet weather in the west, particularly in Manitoba, and by frost and other factors. These things will increasingly in the months ahead make much more difficult the movement of wheat from the farms to the elevators, to the terminals and to the final shipping ports. But these are temporary difficulties that have been experienced and overcome in the past.

What is much more serious and what is much more difficult to solve is the problem of maintaining the flow of wheat through sales to foreign customers. The whole wheat marketing picture has changed and is changing. The international wheat picture is chaotic. If we cannot adjust to changing circumstances, Canada is going to be left with her wheat with disastrous results, not only to the wheat producing areas but to the Canadian economy as a whole.

Right now Canada's traditional wheat export channel is like a garden hose in which the water has been fully turned on but on which the nozzle has been turned until the jet has been reduced to a fine spray. The restriction in this case is our inability to sell.

What is the situation in the world market place? For almost all of last year the uncontrolled buying and selling of wheat which followed the lapsing of the old international wheat agreement and the regulations imposed by the new international cereals agreement brought wide scale price cutting, cutthroat competition and the necessity of imposing emergency measures to maintain a fair price for the Canadian producer.

This chaotic state of the market was supposed to be ended by the implementation of the provisions of the international cereals agreement last July. Canadian wheat producers were led to expect that things would return to normal, with Canada automatically picking up her old markets and customers at the new minimum price of $1.95½ per bushel, a figure 21 cents above the old price of two years ago.

What Canadian wheat farmers and the officials of the Canadian wheat board who are responsible for marketing our wheat found out, however, was that there was no easy way back to the old conditions. In the year of freely changing prices and lack of international agreement, conditions have changed greatly. The new world wheat agreement came into effect, but it failed to work either smoothly or effectively. In fact, things have now reached such a pass that many experts are predicting a total collapse.

In the past two years, Canada has grimly attempted to maintain a decent minimum price for wheat in the face of unrestricted dumping and price cutting, even by such ethical exporters as the United States. Since last July when the new world agreement came into effect, she has valiantly attempted to maintain the new world minimum of $1.95½, but apparently with little success. We have the satisfaction of sticking to our international bargain, but we are not selling wheat.

We are in great danger of being isolated. Our customers are changing, our competitors are changing, and only we remain the same. Can we survive by clinging stubbornly to traditional patterns in a world of such swift change? Under the old international wheat agreements, the international market was fairly orderly. The subscribing nations, both the importing and the exporting nations, abided by the terms and conditions laid down. Today, barely three months since the new type of international agreement came into force, there is widespread bickering and increasingly bad blood between countries. France and Australia have been accused of price cutting. The United States has so far abided by the agreement, and so has this country. However, she has sworn to move 750 million bushels of wheat abroad this year, and if her competitors have found a way around the international minimum price, we can be very sure the United States will also.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Now, let us look at our customers, the traditional markets abroad for our wheat. India aims to be self-sufficient and to cease importing wheat within three years. Pakistan is striving toward the same goal. The Japanese market has been largely lost to France, mainly on the basis of a price which we disdained to meet or were too proud to try to meet. In Great Britain, Holland, Belgium, and also Italy to a certain extent, changing tastes have dictated changes in the types and grades of grain that will be purchased. The high quality wheat for which Canada is so justly famous, and which forms a large part of our exports, is in less demand. Then, too, the importing nations are attempting by every possible means, and very successfully in some cases, to improve their own agriculture in order to provide their own needs and conserve foreign exchange.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the ominous picture we must face now and in the foreseeable future. I do not think we can face up to it successfully if we only do those inconsequential things suggested in the speech from the throne. We expend far too little in the way of research money and effort in support of our grain industry. When we consider the vital role the grain industry plays in our national economy, the amount of money expended is trifling. So far as I can determine, and judging from recent discussions among western agricultural representatives, we have done nothing at all in the field of marketing research. In any other industry, particularly an export industry, a very large proportion of the annual budget goes to supporting marketing and market research. In the wheat industry, the individual producer is not in a position economically or technologically to undertake this tremendous task. It must be done by the federal or the provincial governments, together and singly.

I should like to see our new Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) bring in a measure to ensure such vital basic support to the industry. I hope he will not procrastinate and put off doing anything on the excuse that he is waiting for a recommendation from the new national grains council yet to be set up. These are remedies that are needed quickly. If he waits for an as yet unestablished body to be set up, to consider the problem, make studies and finally come up with recommendations, he will find that Canada has ceased to be an exporter of wheat and has become an importer instead.

I believe that at this critical period in our agricultural development we must be prepared to act swiftly and boldly and we must not allow ourselves to be bound by past practice or traditional methods. I believe we must be prepared to be bold, radical innovators, to scrap the old grain legislation if necessary and start from scratch with new ideas and new techniques to meet new conditions.

Views on a two price system for wheat vary. Much can be said both for and against it. But, since this government has promised it to the wheat producers during the past three general elections, I think it only fair they bring it forward for our consideration. If it did nothing else, such a close scrutiny of wheat producing, shipping and marketing problems would undoubtedly produce a great deal of useful information.

As I see the situation, we need to work on two levels: One is immediate, emergency type legislation to tide our agricultural industry over a difficult period, and the other is to provide a long term solution to the basic difficulties and provide a policy base for future expansion and development.

Before leaving the subject of agriculture entirely, I should like to say a word about the great difficulty which faces the young man who wants to farm but finds today's conditions all but prohibit him from following his chosen calling.

I feel that one of the greatest hurdles to a young farmer in attempting to establish himself is the tremendous difficulty of acquiring and carrying the capital required under modern conditions. The accumulation of adequate farm capital is a very great problem in all parts of Canada. Even if a government or governments jointly provide part or all of the initial investment necessary to establish a modern, mechanized farming operation, the young farmer is handicapped by the heavy annual costs involved and by the uncertainty of returns. He must service his debt, pay income tax, meet the steady rise in the cost of living, and make provision for emergency and necessary annual improvements. In addition, he faces fluctuating prices and uncertain markets. He is at a grave disadvantage in comparison to his counterpart in the urban areas. A young man, in an urban area, must face taxes, the cost of living and other expenses that are perhaps a little higher. But, in most cases, he is drawing his living from a plant, the capital cost of which, and the annual cost of servicing that capital cost, is borne by someone else. The result is that at year's end the urban young man will be better off by several thousand dollars compared to his rural counterpart.

I think that much closer study must be given to ways of ensuring that those who wish to farm and are capable of adding to Canada's economic development through competent farming, are able to establish themselves in conditions of fairness and justice. Let us not be hasty in writing off agriculture. In Canada, it remains a large and important part of our national economic life and will do so throughout the foreseeable future. I apologize if I appear to have laboured the point of agriculture's problems. But, together with many other Canadians, I am genuinely alarmed and concerned at the lack of appreciation of agriculture's importance to the whole nation and the dangers of not taking immediate action to assist this basic industry. I would urge my colleagues, whose primary concern is with the problems of urban, industrial areas or with other aspects of Canadian life, to give close consideration to the interdependency of all sectors of the economy and of all regions of the country. I urge them to look at agriculture as a major factor affecting all those problems with which they are chiefly concerned.

I would have liked to deal with many other topics today, such as the proposed legislation on prescription drugs, the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code, and many other things. I would have liked also to have said something about the implications inherent in branding any society "just" or any other vote getting catch-word, a practice that in my estimation amounts to the equivalent of false advertising. I believe that such sloganeering is misleading and that it does a disservice to Canadians. The men who coin and use such catchy phrases know as well as anyone else that no society yet known to history has been capable of being perfected suddenly and dramatically. Society, and man himself, are not susceptible of overnight change. Yet such a phrase as the just society subtly implies that in the twinkling of an eye everything is to be made the best in the best of all possible worlds. Many people, too many people, can be convinced against their better judgment by such methods. Faced with national conditions as they are, with the fact of human nature, with limited national resources and circumscribed by time, no government can produce instant miracles, no government can recreate the world. To suggest that it can, even by the subtlest inference, is misleading and unjust.

Honesty dictates that any government study the needs of its people, assess the urgency of each and then ascribe to each a place in the order of priority. Tax dollars are limited. They should be put to use on the basis of greatest good for the greatest number. It is not a question of what we would like to have but of what we can sensibly do. I think the priorities approach is long overdue in facing up to Canada's national problems.

There are many other points, particularly in the field of health and welfare, upon which I would like to have touched. But no doubt there will be ample opportunity for me to speak of them in greater detail at a more appropriate time. In the meantime, I do hope that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), and the cabinet as a whole, will give the most urgent consideration to dealing with the rapidly deteriorating situation in regard to wheat handling and marketing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion (Mr. Corbin) agreed to.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, at this point it has been traditional to move a resolution asking that the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the hon. Privy Council. It is the thought this year that that procedure should be changed so that the motion would ask Mr. Speaker to present the address to His Excellency. The address is, after all, not a communication coming from the government or from a privy councillor. It is a communication from the house. It is therefore appropriate that you, as spokesman for the house, should present the motion.

I, therefore, move:

That the said Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

WAYS AND MEANS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That this house will, at its next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That this house will, at its next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the hour is advancing, perhaps at this point the house might be agreeable to calling it ten o'clock.

I should like to suggest for the business of the house tomorrow that, after completion of the routine proceedings, the government order to be called be the second of the two resolutions standing in my name under government notices of motions on the order paper which were transferred today; that is to say, the resolution in respect of the twelve member committee to study the procedures of the house.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, the procedure outlined by the President of the Privy Council is quite satisfactory. We are also quite agreeable that ten o'clock be called, in view of the fact that the government on our initiative very wisely co-operated in bringing this debate to an end.

Possibly the government house leader, at this stage, might be prepared to go a little further and clarify the answer he gave the other night concerning what the business of this house would be in relation to government orders after we have dealt with the question to which he referred on Thursday. Is he able to be of any greater assistance now in outlining what business there could be, and will be, after the three measures, which I think are numbers 5, 6 and 7 on the order paper under government orders have been dealt with?

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It would depend on whether the house, before Thursday, has dealt with the resolution to which I have referred and also the companion resolution with regard to a committee on delegated legislation. If after the completion of the application for interim supply on Thursday next, or so soon thereafter as it may be passed, the two resolutions standing in my name on the order paper have not been passed, then it would be the intention to call them. First, I would call the resolution to establish the procedure committee and then the resolution to establish the committee on delegated legislation.

The government's intention after that would be to call the three resolutions which are Nos. 6 and 7 standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture, and No. 5 standing in the name of the Minister of Finance, the latter with respect to the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Baldwin: Can you go beyond that?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I regret, Mr. Speaker, that at the moment I cannot go beyond that. However, it will be my intention to inaugurate the practice on Thursday next, and on every Thursday thereafter throughout the session, of making an announcement at the time of questions preceding the orders of the day, of the government's intentions with respect to the forthcoming week, and then responding to questions from hon. members.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River has asked my question, but I wonder whether the answer could be put a little simpler. Do I understand that we shall be on the procedure committee resolution tomorrow, then on the one about delegated legislation, to be followed by interim supply and then the farm legislation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the house has not dealt with the procedure resolution and the committee on delegated legislation resolution by Thursday next, that debate will be interrupted to take the application for interim supply. Then, the other debate will be taken up again until it is completed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister moving the adjournment of the house?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would so move, Mr. Speaker.

On the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale), the house adjourned at 9.24 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRADE

TABLING OF DEPARTMENTAL COMMUNICATIONS AND DOCUMENTS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the hon. members for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) and Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and with the leave of the house, I would like to table, in English and in French, copies of the press release of September 19, 1968, prepared following the wheat exporters meeting at Canberra, the Trade and Commerce press release of September 19, 1968 on guide lines concerning overseas investments of non-financial companies, the Department of Finance press release of May 3, 1968 concerning guide lines with respect to operations by chartered banks, and the press release of July 24, 1968 on guidelines for other financial institutions.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DISCOVERY BY R.C.M.P. OF ATTEMPTED SALE OF MILITARY SECRETS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he say whether there is any basis in fact to the report that a public servant formerly employed in the directorate of intelligence and security of the armed forces was discovered by the R.C.M.P. eight months ago attempting to sell military secrets to a foreign power. Will the Prime Minister, who was minister of justice at that time, undertake to give a full report to the house?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have asked the Minister of Justice to look into that matter. Perhaps he has some answers.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the Leader of the Opposition I might say that investigations into suspected unlawful activity are continuously being carried on by the R.C.M.P. and by other investigatory bodies, but in the absence of charges being preferred it would not be proper nor would it be in the public interest to make the results of such investigations a matter of public record. I believe that this is particularly applicable to investigations which may involve the national security.

Under the circumstances, and with the greatest respect, I must decline to enter into a discussion of the allegation referred to.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question. Will the Minister of Justice say whether in fact the case was—to use the words of the public report—"hushed up" by the federal Department of Justice and the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If my advice is correct, the case was thoroughly investigated by the R.C.M.P. It was referred to the law officers of the crown and the Department of Justice. It was the opinion of the law officers of the crown, concurred in by the senior officers of the R.C.M.P., that it would not be in the public interest to prosecute.

Mr. Stanfield: I have another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Justice be prepared to tell the house the basis on which it was decided not to bring this man to trial?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No sir, I am not.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a further supplementary question. Will the Minister of Justice say whether it is a fact that the individual in question continued in his job in the public service after the police report was made, and for how long he continued in the employ of the government after this report was made? Would the Minister of Justice also say whether the individual in question was allowed to resign quietly and waive his right to appeal?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, these questions are beyond the responsibility of my particular department.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister confirm that the individual concerned has now disappeared and that the R.C.M.P. have no trace of his present whereabouts?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the information on which to answer that question.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister or his department carried on an investigation into this case in addition to the investigation carried out by the R.C.M.P.? Did this investigation disclose any other members in the department who might have been connected with this particular individual?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my information is that this individual is not an employee of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. If no charges have been laid against this individual, on what basis was he either dismissed from the public service or asked to resign?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have no direct information on that particular subject, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would you like this minister to defend you?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this question, the obvious lack of information and the obscurity which has been created, will the Prime Minister make a statement to the house?

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether this case is still under investigation, in spite of the fact that he seems to be operating in a vacuum of secrecy.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Following what I have just said, Mr. Speaker, let me state that after the review by R.C.M. police and law officers of the crown the matter was closed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question in connection with this matter, realizing that security of the nation rests on the shoulders of the Prime Minister. Indeed this fact is essential to his office.

[Mr. Turner.]

Without going into the question of whether this information should be revealed in the house, may I ask him if the course sometimes followed in the United Kingdom would be acceptable? I refer to a course whereby security would not be endangered, but at the same time would avoid any suggestion of secrecy or covering up. Would the Prime Minister be prepared to allow members of Her Majesty's privy council in the opposition to see the record?

Mr. Trudeau: With the question stated in this way, Mr. Speaker, I think I should say that the government over a year ago appointed a commission to investigate the whole question of security. I said in the house the other day that this report would be in our hands very soon. I expect that that type of question will be dealt with and will give us some basis on which to act. When I have received and read that report I will be glad to make the house acquainted with any procedure of that kind which might be suggested by these gentlemen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Without waiting for that report, Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister feel that in the interests of the public as a whole, regardless of the circumstances of this case, privy council members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition should not be denied this information? They are sworn to secrecy. Will the Prime Minister not allow them to look at this record in his presence, so that any suggestion of cover up will be denied if the circumstances so establish?

Mr. Trudeau: I think the suggestion would be valid, sir, if we had to wait for any length of time for the report. However, I spoke to a member of the commission yesterday and asked about the state of this report. It was indicated that it will be a matter of a very short time before the report will be in my hands. If this particular aspect of the situation is not covered—and that is something I do not know as yet—I will be glad to discuss this suggestion with the Leader of the Opposition.

UNITED NATIONS

VIET NAM—DE-ESCALATION OF MILITARY ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the opposition of the last government to the bombing in North Viet Nam, and in view of the statement made by the Secretary General of the United Nations as reported in this morning's press, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government considering taking the initiative in proposing to the General Assembly the kind of resolution the Secretary General has suggested?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have read, and so have the government, the statement by the Secretary General of the United Nations in favour of stopping the bombing in Viet Nam and also his opinion that there may well exist a majority in the assembly for this view.

We ourselves, as the government has expressed on a number of occasions, consider a halt to the bombing as one of the essential first steps which will have to be taken by both sides to the conflict. In our view, a balance would have to be kept in such appeal if it were to be made. A resolution calling only for a halt in the bombing without stressing the obligation on the other side to contribute significantly to military de-escalation would not seem to reflect what has to be done by both sides if peace is to be restored.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the position of the Secretary General, which has been repeated many times, and in view of the position taken by the former prime minister which he stated once or twice—I am speaking from memory but I am sure I am not misrepresenting him—is the Secretary of State for External Affairs now saying to the house that he is opposed to a resolution such as that suggested by U Thant, and that he will take no steps to deal with it at the general assembly?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the position of the Canadian government would, I think, depend on whether this sort of action would contribute to the end of the war in Viet Nam. The Secretary General has expressed his view and it is one that we would certainly look at seriously. We would want to be satisfied, however, that it would help to facilitate the peace negotiations that we hope are underway now.

Mr. Lewis: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would one be justified in thinking that because the ambassador of the United States at the United Nations has expressed opposition to the Secretary General's suggestion the Department of External Affairs in Canada is not willing to support it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is patently out of order.

HIGHWAYS

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO PROTECT TRUCK TRANSPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence, I will put it to the Minister without Portfolio.

Can the minister tell us whether representatives of the Quebec government had recent discussions with him or members of his staff with a view to elaboration of federal legislation prohibiting road transportation for the railways, and does the minister intend to move the adoption of that legislation during this session?

[English]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, representatives of the Quebec government have not had discussions with me on that subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, could the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport assure us today that the town of Farnham has been officially chosen by his department, in view of the fact that the provincial government has already made known its development project of a road system—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): A supplementary question which I will direct to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Can he tell us when we may expect the presence in this house of the Minister of Transport, and how many days he has been in the house since this session started?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not in order.

EXTERNAL AID

BIAFRA—TRANSMISSION OF CANADIAN RELIEF SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and in posing it I hope I pronounce the gentleman's name correctly. In light of statements by Benjamin Adekunle, the Nigerian military commander, expressing hostility to relief activities from any source, statements which were brought to the attention of the house yesterday, would the minister explain how Canadian relief supplies have reached the war area which is under that officer's control?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this statement. I shall look it up now that the matter has been brought to my attention, but in any relations that we have had with the Nigerian government, they have welcomed relief.

HOUSING

TASK FORCE—PARTICIPATION BY PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which, in his absence, I shall direct to the acting minister who is, I believe, the hon. member for Winnipeg South. In view of the important role that other levels of government must play in any discussion of the housing problem, will the minister indicate whether provincial and municipal officials have been specifically contacted and invited by him to testify before the task force on housing?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take notice of that question.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister also ascertain why, in a non-partisan investigation such as the one being conducted, seven Liberal members of parliament were invited to take part actively in the conference.

An hon. Member: What are the facts?

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Acting Minister of Transport took notice of my first question I wonder whether he would take notice also of my supplementary question. In view of the complexity of the issue can the minister assure the house that those officials who are being asked to testify are being notified well in advance of the scheduled visit of the task force to their respective cities? I ask this question, Your Honour, because it is my information that the city of Toronto has objected to the short notice given for the presentation of briefs.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

TASK FORCE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF SCHEDULE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport. Is he in a position to tell the house whether the finalized schedule of the task force hearings on housing is available so that ample notice may be given to the various interested municipalities and provincial governments and, if so, would the minister table the schedule of hearings?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for the task force on housing and who is chairing the task force, is very anxious that his study proceed with all dispatch. I know too that he will be very pleased to table the schedule of hearings, if he has not already done so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—DISCUSSIONS WITH SECRETARY GENERAL RESPECTING CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Recently the Secretary General of NATO visited Canada and, according to my understanding, paid a brief visit to our Minister of National Defence. In the light of these facts is it possible for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to advise this house of the purport of any discussions that he or his departmental officials had with the Secretary General on the subject of Canada's continuing role as a NATO member. If that is not possible at this time will the minister be able to advise us at an early date of the discussions that were held with the Secretary General of NATO on the subject of Canada's relations with the NATO alliance?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to make such a statement at this time. I should be happy to do so, perhaps, when the estimates of my department are called, which I hope will be at an early date.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The matter is of such importance, especially in the light of the visit by the Secretary General, that I submit it would be appropriate for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make an announcement about any discussions held with the NATO representative.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In his conversations yesterday did the Secretary General strongly urge the Canadian government to leave its forces in Europe intact, at the present time? If so, what was the reply of our government?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary General made it quite clear in his press conference before he left yesterday that he was speaking personally when he expressed the view that any reduction in NATO forces at this time would be detrimental to the alliance. The Secretary General is aware that discussions are now going on in the NATO council on this important question.

Mr. Hees: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the Secretary General not ask for an assurance that Canada would keep her forces intact in Europe?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether any of our other NATO allies in addition to Britain have made representations to Canada concerning the postponement of any possible reduction in our contribution to NATO military strength under the present circumstances?

Mr. Sharp: As I said in reply to similar questions, Mr. Speaker, we have had representations from a number of countries, not directed specifically at Canada but at the NATO powers generally, to the effect that there should not be reductions. It was out of that sort of consideration in the council meeting that the communiqué issued. A number of countries are, of course, very concerned, including Germany, for example, which now sees the presence of Soviet troops on her border and is anxious that NATO should make a firm response, and has made representations to all NATO powers, including Canada.

Mr. MacLean: Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether a place and a date have now been set for a meeting of the NATO ministers and whether this meeting will take place in New York early in October?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as has apparently been made known to the press by a spokesman fo rthe United States government, consideration has been given to arrangements for a meeting between some or all of the NATO ministers in New York at the time of the general assembly. There has also been consideration of the date of the meeting which was to be held in December. But no decision has been made definitely on either of these questions, although I think it is fairly clear that there will be an informal meeting in New York.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF NOTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, will the secretary of State for External Affairs indicate whether he will table or otherwise make public the contents of the notes received by Canada, as a member state of NATO, from the U.S.S.R. subsequent to the invasion of Czechoslovakia?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his question. One reason I hesitate to answer his question is that I cannot recollect whether the statements were made to me orally by the Soviet ambassador, or whether he actually presented a note at that time. May I add this, that the communication was not addressed to a member state of NATO but simply to Canada.

Mr. Schreyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the event that the communiqué was in written form, will the minister consider making it public or tabling it in this house?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I shall give consideration to that.

NIGERIA—ACCEPTANCE OF INVITATION TO SEND OBSERVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Some 10 days ago he informed the house of the appointment of Major General W. A. Milroy as Canadian observer attached to the Nigerian federal forces. As I understand it his task is to observe and report on the conduct of the federal Nigerian forces. What steps have been taken to provide General Milroy with the staff he will obviously need to carry out his task?

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

VALIDITY OF ORDER IN COUNCIL REDUCING CUSTOMS DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on September 17 the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me whether all aspects of an order in council which he later identified to me as P.C. 1968-816 were checked by the Department of Justice before approval was given to it. A direct answer to that question, sir, is, yes.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this order in council was a questionable use of delegated authority, may I ask the minister to discuss it when we are considering the motion later today to set up a committee on this very subject?

GRAIN

MOVEMENT FROM LAKEHEAD FOLLOWING STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): May I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the lakehead grain handlers strike has been over for almost two weeks, can the minister inform the house whether or not grain is now moving from the lakehead ports at a satisfactory rate?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, since the end of the strike, 23.5 million bushels of wheat were forwarded from the storage facilities at the lakehead during the first week, and right now 12 ships are waiting to be loaded. Of the 11,863 covered wagons immobilized by the strike, 3,362 have now been unloaded at the warehouses. It is probably a record for Canada, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

WHEAT—PRICE SITUATION FOLLOWING CANBERRA MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Since we are dealing with the subject of wheat and wheat movement, will the minister also assure the house that satisfactory arrangements arose out of the Canberra meetings last week, and that we can now realize a satisfactory and stable price for our wheat?

[Mr. Anderson.]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): "Satisfactory arrangements" is a relative concept, Mr. Speaker. We were very cheered, if I might put it that way, by the fact that all the exporters rallied round the price and the system established by the international grain arrangements.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I should like to ask the minister whether we shall be getting these reports weekly, or every second day from now on. What is the situation?

Mr. Pepin: I would be delighted to make them daily.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

TRADE

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EXPORT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has had a chance to look at the question I directed to him, as recorded at page 267 of Hansard for Friday last, and the undertaking given by the Minister of Agriculture that his colleague would make a statement, in brief, on exports to date and future commitments of grain, together with a reference to the Canberra talks? I understood the minister was going to make a full statement on motions. Is it his intention to make that statement in the very near future?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I will see about that, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MARIJUANA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of one asked last Thursday by the hon. member for Perth of the Prime Minister concerning a speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on the penalties for possession and use of marijuana. While the house may agree that it is useful for the minister to open this subject for discussion, will the Prime Minister state whether the particular point of view made by the minister in that speech does in fact represent government policy?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I answered that the other day, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. Has the Commissioner of the R.C.M.P. given his views to the Solicitor General on the suggestions made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is not in order.

IMMIGRATION

EFFORTS TO BRING DANIEL COHN-BENDIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can he inform the house whether the department of immigration is aware of any effort by a Committee for Revolution at the University of Montreal to bring Daniel Cohn-Bendit, better known as Danny the Red, to Canada?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have no evidence that this gentleman has come to Canada.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGES RESULTING FROM REORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the consultations presently in progress across Canada with representatives of Indian bands respecting proposed changes in the Indian Act, and in view of the announced intention of consulting Indian people on major changes in government policy of concern to them, is the minister prepared to delay implementing the current major reorganization of his department until its purposes and implications are made clear to the Indian citizens it serves?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the reorganization referred to by the hon. member is not at all related to the consultations we are now having with Indians with regard to the revision of the Indian Act. However, I can assure the hon. member that when major changes are made in my department, I will take the necessary steps to inform the main parties concerned, who are always people of Indian origin.

[English]

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CARR COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the completed Carr commission study been received by his department, and, if so, will it be tabled in this house? Further, while the minister is answering that will he say when he will be tabling his white paper on governmental reform in the Yukon?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there are two different questions. With regard to the Carr report, the department received it a few days ago and it is being studied at the present time. When the document has been translated into the two languages, we can table it in the house.

[English]

As concerns the white paper on the constitutional evolution of the Northwest Territories, I am now studying the problem. I shall soon hold consultations with the elected representative of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories before making a statement on the point of view of the government in this regard.

ARMSTRONG, ONT.—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO RELIEVE POVERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the desperate social conditions and shocking poverty which exist among the Indian people of Armstrong, Ontario, a situation which has recently been brought to the attention of the nation and which has resulted in the exclusion of Indian children from public school education in Armstrong, what immediate action does the government intend to take in order to remedy or alleviate the problem?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that this very important and urgent question might be debated by the hon. member at the time of adjournment.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

QUEBEC—TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a supplementary question.

With regard to the transfer of jurisdiction between the federal government and the province of Quebec in the fields of education and health and in others, were the Indians and the Eskimos in that part of New Quebec consulted before that arrangement was agreed upon?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I could not reply to that question immediately, but I will inquire and give an answer to the hon. member tomorrow.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice regarding the theft of stocks and bonds in Montreal over the week end. Is there any indication of an inside job?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Transport. In view of the awkward financial position of many Canadian shipyards, would the government consider subsidizing a boat suitable for racing for the America Cup.

NATIONAL PARKS

QUEBEC—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

[Mr. Speaker.]

According to his statement recorded on page 23 of Hansard, has he met with the Minister of Tourism for Quebec in order to discuss the non-existence of national parks in the province of Quebec, and what agreement has been reached?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In fact, Mr. Speaker, I met the Minister of Tourism of Quebec on Wednesday last, here in Ottawa. We had a very fruitful exchange of views. Our officials are studying this problem and I hope to be able to issue a statement on this subject in perhaps a month.

MANPOWER

PROTESTS RESPECTING OMISSIONS FROM OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING PROVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration regarding the Adult Occupational Training Act. Has his department received any protests from the provinces regarding the omission of students who have left the school system but who have not yet been 12 months on the labour market?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in the proper form and has to be ruled out of order.

TRANSPORT

POTASH—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO FREIGHT RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport but in his absence will direct it to the acting minister. In view of the serious consequences to railway services and employees in Saskatchewan from the proposed changes in transportation of potash by I.M.C. of Esterhazy, is it the intention of the minister to call for an inquiry into the freight rate structure for the transportation of potash to the United States and overseas markets?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether this question should be asked at this particular time. If the hon. member knows of urgency in connection with it that is not apparent to the Chair, it might be discussed at the time of adjournment.

STATEMENT ON JURISDICTION RESPECTING SAFETY OF RAILWAY WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, on September 19 the Minister of Transport took notice of a question directed to him by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. The minister's reply, which he has asked me to make on his behalf, is that the railway transport committee has held hearings but has not yet made a decision on the matter raised in the hon. member's question. A judgment will be made shortly by the transport committee and will be announced.

AGRICULTURE

CORN—REPRESENTATIONS AS TO PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the corn harvest has already started, and yesterday there was a further six cents per bushel drop in the price, can the minister state whether the government has reached any decision regarding representations made on this matter last week by the O.F.U. and the C.F.A.?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, these were two very useful meetings, with an exchange on the problems, both mechanical and physical, involved in the solutions suggested by the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and the Ontario Farmers Union. I think it was made fairly clear to both organizations what these problems were, but there were one or two other things that seemed to be somewhat easier of implementation that are under active consideration, and I hope we can have an answer to this within a day or two.

CHEESE—DUMPING OF EUROPEAN PRODUCT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement in Vancouver yesterday by the president of the National Dairy Council to the effect that European cheese is being dumped in Canada, is the minister aware of this and, if so, what is the government doing or proposing to do to stop it?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have that article here. I believe the one the hon. gentleman is referring to is the article which appeared in this morning's Montreal Gazette. It is rather brief and not too informative. Certainly if cheese is being dumped into Canada appropriate steps will be taken to prevent such action. An investigation is under way. However, certainly more information is needed than was contained in the press article.

In general, imports of cheese into Canada are limited to relatively high priced specialty types of cheese which are not produced in Canada. I would have to look into the matter further before accepting the suggestion that cheese is being dumped.

Mr. Hees: The Canadian Press dispatch states definitely that cheese is being dumped and that the president of the National Dairy Council is very worried about it. In view of this would the minister contact the president of that organization and find out what is going on?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making a submission now which is noted by the minister.

APPLICATION OF P.F.A.A. FOLLOWING DETERIORATION OF CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the frozen and deteriorated state of crops in many parts of the west, will the minister be introducing an amendment to the P.F.A. administration?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No amendments to the P.F.A. administration are anticipated for this season's operations.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

AUTOMOBILES—INCREASED PRICES OF VEHICLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he given consideration to his government taking action against car manufacturers who have increased the price of their products to the Department of Defence Production, which will later become a department of services and supplies, in view of the fact that the second of the big three manufacturers has now announced a big price increase?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will discuss this with the minister concerned.

EXPO '67

STATEMENT RESPECTING MONTREAL SHARE OF DEFICIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville on Friday asked what talks have taken place with the city of Montreal in respect of the city's share of the deficit arising out of the operation of the corporation for the 1967 world exhibition.

My predecessor on behalf of the government of Canada, as the major source of funding for the corporation, proposed terms to the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal for repayment of their respective shares of the cost of Expo' over four and eight year periods respectively, commencing on July 1, 1968. The government of the province of Quebec responded to this suggestion and repayment commenced in July as proposed. Montreal has not yet responded to the proposal.

The government is aiming at winding up Expo' by March 31, 1969. Final calculation of the total cost is, of course, not possible until all outstanding business of the corporation is completed.

It is anticipated that appropriate arrangements will be made among the participants for the final distribution of the corporation's assets and liabilities by that date.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER, B.C.—PROVISION FOR DREDGING OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, since following redistribution two thirds of the south side of the inner harbour of Vancouver now is in my riding, I am sure you will understand the importance of my question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that the government's decisions on estimates are already in and must be contemplated for the fiscal year starting April 1 of next year, may I ask the minister, who is in charge of the dredging for the Harbours Board, if he is giving major consideration to completing the dredging of Vancouver harbour in these estimates in one year and not in the long term plan of the previous administration.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): All aspects of the harbour of Vancouver are taken into consideration by my department.

Mr. Winch: I have a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: When questions are felt to be important by hon. members perhaps I should allow them to ask their questions and permit the answer, even though the time for questions has expired. However, if we are to operate properly and effectively by the rules I think we should make an effort to have shorter questions and shorter answers, so that all hon. members will be given an opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROCEDURAL CHANGES

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale), seconded by Mr. Pelletier, moves—

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I suggest that a motion like this might be seconded by a member of the opposition. Why not the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin)?

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale), seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre)—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: —moves:

the business of supply, the business of ways and means, the stages of the legislative process, and the operation of the standing committees of this house; upon the advisability of making permanent, with or without amendment, any or all the several changes in the procedures of this house that were in effect prior to the dissolution of parliament on April 23, 1968; and upon the advisability of such other changes as the committee may deem suitable to promote the more expeditious dispatch of the business of the house; and

That this special committee is hereby instructed to make its reports to the house prior to December 1, 1968, and to include in its reports drafts of proposed standing orders drawn to give effect, if adopted by the house, to any change or changes that may be proposed by the committee.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in my first words may I express my thanks to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his support in this regard. I should like to reiterate that I do not at this time intend to set before the house the detailed changes the government will be proposing. I wish to take the occasion of the introduction of this motion to give the house some idea of the underlying propositions which the government is considering in connection with the change in the standing orders of the house and give some indication of the various areas of the standing orders which we would like to be changed for the purpose of better facilitating the house business.

I believe it has become a truism that in recent years parliament, not only in Canada but in Great Britain, has been doing badly, it has been the subject of a great deal of criticism. When analysed, the reasons for that criticism appear to be threefold: First, the demeanour with which we carry on our parliamentary business; second, the delays created in turning legislative intention into law and, third, the failure on the part of members to examine in depth the proposals which come before us.

With regard to the first of these criticisms, the question of demeanour or the manner in which we carry out the functions of the house, I do not believe that even the most Draconian of rules or the greatest martinet of a speaker could possibly bring about any change or improvement. It remains an individual responsibility of the members as to the manner in which they approach their conduct in the chamber. But with respect to the second and third of these criticisms, the fact that we take too much time and that we do not go deeply enough into the business of the house, these seem to me to be areas in which we can take collective responsibility, and indeed those are the two areas in which as an underlying theme the government feels changes should be made to the rules of the house.

I think the first thing to be said about those two criticisms is that, at least to a degree they are contradictory. If we are to put more business through the house in a shorter period of time, obviously it will be impossible to go more deeply into each individual item. It was really to overcome this contradiction that the government proposed to put more work, and therefore more responsibility, into the standing committees system of the house.

If all business must at all times pass through a single pipe line—that is to say, this chamber—it is obvious that slowing down the flow in that pipe line by examining with greater scrutiny the individual details will impair the ability to get more tasks done. But if, as the government will propose to the special committee, we put the most detailed aspects of our work—for example, the detailed scrutiny of the estimates or the clause by clause examination of legislation—into the functional standing committees, then the flow will have been broken up into three, four or more pipe lines and a stoppage in one will not necessarily be a stoppage in all.

The dissatisfaction of the public with the manner in which we have conducted our business in the past was reflected in the past two parliaments in efforts made to bring about changes in our procedures. We in this parliament are the beneficiaries of the work of earlier parliamentary committees and also of the accumulated experience of this house in working with the provisonal rules which have been in effect in recent years and which have been carried on until the start of the session after Christmas.

By the committee which this resolution proposes, therefore, we have the opportunity and indeed the responsibility to bring to completion the changes which were proposed in those previous sessions and some of the changes which were carried out provisionally. From these general propositions I would like to move to a more specific consideration of the responsibilities of the house.

The fundamental duties of the house can be stated to be at least three. First, to authorize the imposition of taxation or, to put it in the jargon of parliamentary language, the business of ways and means.

Mr. Stanfield: Is this the order of importance?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I point out to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that I do not know whether it is a principle his party would follow, but it is one that this party will follow, that on the whole we should not spend the money before we have it. Second, to authorize the expenditure of revenues so obtained by taxation—that is called the business of supply, the appropriation out of the public funds of moneys for government purposes—and third, to enact changes in our general public law, that is, those parts of our general public law other than those two financial aspects, which for the purposes of my remarks I would like to refer to as the ordinary legislative business.

The remarks with which I should like to begin in more detail relate to the business of supply, because essentially it is the question of supply which provides the anatomy of the parliamentary year. It is the bringing down of the estimates, dealing with the estimates and their subsequent voting, which to a very great degree determines the character the session will take. At the present time the items of expenditures proposed by the ministry—that is to say, the estimates—are examined by a committee of the whole house known as the committee of supply.

To provide those generally opposed to the ministry with opportunities to attack the ministry and to criticize its policies, the motion that the Speaker leave the chair to go into committee of supply has been made debatable on a fixed number of occasions. Each of these debates is limited to two days, always a Monday and the following Tuesday, and the provisional rules which hitherto were followed permitted a debate on four such occasions, making a total of eight days.

This meant that during each normal session the opposition could raise, by means of an amendment, four specific subjects on which it wanted a debate and a decision, entailling either an expression of confidence or non-confidence by the house. Once a group of estimates has been given to the committee of supply they are gone over, item by item, by the entire membership of the house. Under the 1962 version of the standing orders there was no time limit stipulated for this item by item consideration. Under the provisional version the time limit of 30 days was prescribed for all the business of supply except the final supplementary estimates.

The importance of the business of supply is clear. First, it is one of the ways in which the house can assert the constitutional principle that a ministry is responsible to the house both in relation to its general conduct and the detail of its administrative work. Second, the business of supply, particularly the debates on supply motions, provides the opposition with an opportunity to bring before the house matters which may be of importance but which may not for the moment have been included in the government's program. Third, the business of supply provides members with an opportunity to examine, to comprehend and to influence the executive work of the various departments and agencies.

There has been criticism of the practices we have followed in dealing with supply. The criticism of the present practices seems to centre around three major points. First, it is said that the committee of supply is too cumbersome for the intensive study of the items in the estimates. Members are inclined to give speeches rather than to examine. Ministers often, rather than dealing with the questions as they are put, wait until the end and give a long reply which in itself becomes a long speech, which in turn may not be satisfactory to the questioners. Some items, not necessarily the most important or controversial, monopolize the time and energy of members, while others are marched through in the dying hours of a session.

The second criticism is that the four supply motion debates, based as they are on the needs of an era when the house met only three or four months each year during the winter and spring, do not meet modern requirements. Ordinarily these debates are bunched together into the spring, perhaps in successive weeks, so that the opposition must expend its ammunition whether or not it has at the moment a good target. No notice of the amendment is given, so that the real issue on the matter can only be joined on the Monday evening of the debate.

The third and final criticism is that it is said the serious study of the estimates is not promoted when as much as a half or three quarters of the total proposed expenditure already has been approved through votes by way of granting interim supply. It was probably these considerations which entered into the thinking of the special committee on procedure in 1967 and 1968 when it included the following in the report tabled in the house on March 13, 1968; the passage to which I am referring may be found in Votes and Proceedings for that year, at page 764:

> Your committee believes that we should scrutinize carefully the possibility of bringing together the best in the Canadian and British practice relating to the business of supply in order to decide if the result would be more satisfactory than the system which now prevails in either country. On the one hand, we are not prepared to abandon the examination of the estimates before the money is voted; indeed we believe that a major defect of present Canadian practice in this regard is that we deal with expenditure items ex post facto. If this practice is continued we probably should simply convert the consideration of the estimates into the examination of general and continuing programs. On the other hand we do not think that the use of weeks of supply days as presently carried on exerts much control over ministers and departments or is of any genuine value to the opposition. The British practice, while it avoids discussion of the estimates items, has the great value that it permits the opposition to explore whatever shortcomings, either small or great, it detects in the policies and conduct of the ministry before supply is voted.

The committee's observations, I would submit, Mr. Speaker, lead to two general conclusions: First, that the study of estimates should take place in the standing committees around April 1 of each year, that is to say, the date on which the fiscal year of the government commences; and second, that a specified number of days in each annual session should be made available to the opposition for debates on opposition motions, that is to say, on subject matters which are the specific choice of the opposition.

In its fifth report the committee proposed that the main estimates be referred to the standing committees as soon as they are tabled, that is to say, some time fairly early in February, if the house was not to find itself dealing with the estimates in the following autumn. It should therefore conclude its work on those estimates before the summer. Consequently, it seems reasonable to suggest that the standing committees should conclude their work before June 1.

In the United Kingdom, the days available to the opposition for its own motions are sometimes called supply days and they really parallel our supply motion days. Often, to avoid any suggestion that the supply days are confined either to the estimates as a whole or to specific items of expenditure, these days are referred to as allotted days or opposition days. Therefore, when I use that term that is the practice I will be referring to, namely, the days on which the opposition picks a subject matter, the subject matter not being confined to any specific item in the estimates.

Consideration of Procedural Changes

The special committee of this house which sat early this year and last year envisaged the annual sessions as beginning in the autumn. This would mean that some time before or after the Christmas recess, but not too soon after the votes on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne which we just concluded, there should be a number of supply or opposition days so that the opposition could have the opportunity of stating its views on public questions of its choice.

On the other hand, the ministry is in need of getting interim supply before the start of each fiscal year. Therefore the opposition should have an additional number of days before the end of March. The number should take into consideration the fact that the debate and votes on the budget normally come in April, and therefore in the spring period there would be other opportunities to make this type of general observation.

Since the supply sought in the main estimates should be granted or denied before too great a part of the fiscal year has passed, that is to say, before the summer break, another set of opposition days should be planned for the months of April, May and June, and especially for late May and June, because of the absence from that period of other opportunities, such as the debate on the address and the budget, for the opposition to take the initiative on this type of matter. Moreover, because the reports prepared by the standing committees on estimates would be ready by June, it is conceivable that the opposition would select one or more of its opposition days specifically for the purpose of debating a report from a special standing committee on estimates which may be of particular interest.

One of the critical questions is how many supply or opposition days should be allotted to this purpose, and this is a question which is not easy to answer. I would suggest there is no particular number of any magical significance. For example, under the provisional rules there were eight supply motion days, but there were also under those rules 30 additional days for the examination of the estimates in committee of supply. On the other hand, at Westminster there is a total of 29 days, but there the current year's estimates are not studied intensively, as would be possible here in Canada.

It may be contended, of course, that there should be no time limits whatsoever, that is to say, that the debate on supply should continue until each and every member has been fully and finally satisfied with regard to his questions on the estimates. However, the constitutional requirement is that the House of Commons be satisfied, and the House of Commons makes its decisions by majority votes. In other words, the standing orders should give the majority of the house opportunities to decide whether or not it supports the ministry. Here again the special committee, this time in its fifth report which was tabled on March 29, 1968, made this general observation with respect to the question of supply:

> —the house should decide whether or not to grant supply at regular intervals so that (a) the opposition's opportunities to criticize are not concentrated in any one part of the year and (b) the ministry is not distracted by constant uncertainty about supply.

I would submit that the opposition should have as many supply days as it needs, but it should not have the embarrassment—and I am taking advice in this regard from certain distinguished members on the occasion of their visit to Westminster—of having to use more days than it feels justified in using. The problem in stipulating this number of days in the rules, as I had the opportunity of stating in the throne speech debate, is that the maximum inclines to become the minimum. For example, an extra five or ten days, perhaps running on into July, are not particularly crucial for the government. Finding the best number of days really matters more to the opposition. They should have as many supply days as they need, but they should not have the embarrassment of having to use more days than they would feel justified in using. If that proposition is questioned, I would refer to some of the observations of the group which visited Westminster.

Another difficult problem concerns the significance of supply day motions from the standpoint of revealing whether or not the ministry continues to have the confidence of the house. If the question of confidence were clearly entailed in every vote on a supply day, the opposition might be made to appear overly zealous to bring on an election, and this might be politically embarrassing. Moreover, if the question of confidence were clearly entailed in every vote on a supply day, a minority government probably would be far less able to survive than under the present arrangements.

Mr. Woolliams: Under Pearson's rules you would have no trouble.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We will have no trouble anyway, my friend, because that unhappy condition no longer exists.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Baldwin: Wait until Mike hears about that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Probably four or six occasions—I see I have cut my friends to the quick—using the example of the number of supply motions under the old standing orders, would be sufficient to make the ministry responsible without promoting instability.

The next of the three main subject matters I will refer to is the question of the business of ways and means. The committee of supply approves the appropriation of money for specific purposes but the money has to be found, and this is the business of the ways and means. There are some respects in which the procedure with respect to the committee on ways and means, specifically in relation to its connection with the committee of supply, appears to many hon. members as a pure anachronism in that it really adds nothing to the procedure of the house, and therefore could quite acceptably be abolished. Perhaps the greatest significance of the committee of ways and means is in relation to taxation where the committee in some ways appears to have become redundant. Let us review the process which is commonly followed when the government puts forward its taxation measures. The process begins when the Minister of Finance moves that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into the committee of ways and means. It is on this motion that the minister delivers his budget speech. That motion is ordinarily debated for a period of six days, and once the new budget motion is carried the various resolutions put forward by the minister are debated in the committee of ways and means. If each resolution is passed, a bill is then founded on it, and each of these bills goes through all the normal stages of the legislative process.

The minister's tax proposals and the formal resolutions are then discussed to some extent, perhaps quite fully, during the budget debate. They are discussed again in the committee of ways and means in the form of resolutions. They are discussed again during the enactment of each of the tax bills. I would suggest that it is really questionable if the house needs all those opportunities to re-examine each of the proposals. Would it not perhaps be better, for example, to give up the committee of ways and means stage and use that time for a fuller discussion at the second reading or even third reading stage when the members will have the taxation bills in detail before them?

Sometimes it is said that the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means were originated so that members might have detailed discussions of proposals. But to say that is to confuse the origin of these two committees with the origin of the committee stage in the legislative process. I think this provides a good example of the manner in which our parliamentary procedure has evolved.

The committees of ways and means and of supply began as devices by which the commons could evade the watchful eye of Mr. Speaker, who at that stage was the King's reporter. The members refused to discuss the King's requests for supply until they had had an opportunity to consider them in private, that is, in the absence of Mr. Speaker. In the old days they would go into special committee by themselves and examine both the purpose for which the King proposed to spend the money and the ways and means of raising the money demanded by him. I think it is now reasonable to ask, given the origin of these two practices, whether the committee of supply really gives the house adequate insight into the estimates of the departments, and whether the committee of ways and means adds much to the very full study of the government taxation proposals which would be available to it under the ordinary legislative process.

The third topic which I mentioned at the beginning is what I refer to as the ordinary legislative process. I mean by that the process by which motions are made for three readings and for a committee stage of each bill. I might add that in case of certain bills involving the expenditure of public money there is in addition to the three readings and the committee stage a fifth stage, that is to say, the resolution stage preceding a money bill. I think there may be some measure of support in all parts of the house for the suggestion that the resolution stage on a money bill has also become redundant under our current parliamentary procedure. I assume that most members have no complaints about the first reading stage at which the bill is printed. The criticisms appear to be centred around, first, the second reading stage and, second, that stage when the committee of the whole considers the bill.

The idea prevails at this time, and it seems to me it has prevailed as long as I have been in the house, that once a bill has achieved second reading it has passed its main hurdle in the house. It is said that the house has accepted the principle of the bill and therefore all else is mere detail. The view prevails that a member who voted for second reading would display inconsistency if he failed to support the bill on the motion for third reading. I am wondering whether this conception of the legislative process is conducive to the best use of the time of the house or really conducive under the circumstances of the 20th century. I think this attitude toward second reading encourages long debate before members have had an adequate opportunity to see the bill, and in particular it encourages, at that earlier stage of the bill, acceptance of a final decision in respect of the bill rather than postponing it until after the house has had an opportunity to study the bill in committee of the whole or a standing committee.

Perhaps our legislative process would be better if we regarded the second reading vote in a rather narrow scope, first, as deciding what the general principle of the bill should be so that we would then have a basis for deciding what amendments might be relevant, in other words, deciding whether it was a bill in respect of oranges and that amendments relating to apples or pears would not be relevant, and, second, as allowing a decision on whether the house was prepared to take time for a detailed further study of the bill and amendments. Perhaps something would be gained, not only in terms of time but in the value of our parliamentary process, if we could take less time at the second reading stage and more time at subsequent stages.

It is obvious, I suggest, that if a bill is examined by a standing committee it should not be necessary to examine it again subsequently on a clause by clause basis in the committee of the whole. My inclination would be and I would recommend that heavy emphasis should be laid on the report back from the standing committee after a clause by clause study. Emphasis should also be laid on third reading at the time when the house and those particular members of the house who have been following the legislation closely—

[And there being a temporary lighting failure in the chamber:]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Some government!

An hon. Member: Now we are all in the dark.

[And the lighting failure having been corrected:]

Mr. Baldwin: It is because we have a good opposition that the lights are now on again.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have always regarded hon. members as having the faculty of carrying on in the dark, but I am glad to have not only the physical but the intellectual opportunity of enlightening hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Baldwin: I am waiting for you to start.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In addition to questions of procedure, the committee is also being asked to review the operations of the standing committees of the house. There will be a number of additional matters to be considered, for example, the question of emergency motions filed by the government and by the opposition, the procedure to be followed in respect of statements on motions, and other matters in respect of which it would be useful to have the judgment of the committee on changes to our standing orders. I am sure that representatives of other groups in the house will in turn have proposals for changes in our procedures.

It might be appropriate at this time to indicate that in addition to changes to the standing orders of the house the government will put before the house from time to time certain additional changes in its own procedures which it believes will facilitate the public business. These would be changes which do not in themselves require changes in the standing orders. I had the opportunity last night to refer to one of these proposals, that is, in respect of establishing the practice of making periodic weekly statements, on my own part, with questions by opposition house leaders, as to the house business for a week.

It will also be the intention of the government to work out a roster of attendance in the house for ministers of departments during the question period so that it would not be necessary for all ministers at all times to be present in the house. It might then be predictable when certain questions should be asked. I should emphasize at this particular point it is not intended to follow the practice in the British house of giving advance written notice but rather to follow the practice in this house of having spontaneous topical questions asked. This practice would be preserved, although such questions might not necessarily elicit a response on that particular day. Hon. members may possibly say there is some unlikelihood of ever obtaining an answer.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the minister to make it clear that in respect of the question period the decision would be made unilaterally by the government rather than being referred to the committee being established today?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is correct in respect of the attendance of ministers. The proposal is that this would be decided within the framework of ministerial attendance at cabinet committees and the performance of other duties, so that on a periodic basis the attendance of ministers in the house would be assured. It is my understanding that this would require no change in the standing orders.

In the same way there will be certain proposals which the government will be putting forward by way of legislation as opposed to changes in standing orders. These will have an effect on the business of the house.

There has been some criticism in recent years about the manner in which we have handled private bills. My colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), will likely have the opportunity later this session, or perhaps at the next session, of bringing forward a measure to provide for the incorporation of certain of these private companies by letters patent as opposed to private acts as is now the case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question at this stage? If the plan the minister has in mind is brought into being, certain ministers would be present in the house only on such days as they would apparently deign to come. Would there then be a minister acting on those occasions on behalf of those absent ministers to answer, using the expression of the minister, topical questions as they arise?

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that is a question to be considered. It seems to me a more logical organization of the time of the house, if a minister is not present one day but is very likely to be present the next, that the question might be answered the following day. As to the advisability of having acting ministers, that is another possibility to be considered.

On behalf of the government may I say that we welcome from all hon. members, apart altogether from the proposals that they will be making to the house regarding changes in standing orders, further suggestions which would improve the manner in which the house goes about its business and with which the government can co-operate.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we have inherited in our parliamentary system of government an exceptional institution. It is exceptional by that ultimate standard, that it has been successful in providing effective government, at the same time providing protection of the rights of individuals. But even a casual examination of the history of the British system of parliamentary government reveals that its essential genius lies, it seems to me, not in the fact that one final set of proposals have been set down and followed thereafter but in its adaptability. Because procedures could be varied and have been varied from time to time, the institution is able to change with changing circumstances.

In this respect, Mr. Speaker, parliament may be likened to a living being, not a dead and ossified set of procedures established for all time but an evolving institution capable of growing and altering to meet the new demands of our changing society.

In this committee, therefore, we are establishing for this house and for our parliamentary institution another means of such growth, a source of adaptation of procedures that we have inherited to the demands of our new and increasingly complex age. It presents for us in the house both an opportunity and a challenge to make certain that we have tended carefully our great inheritance in our time.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we in this party welcome this opportunity to discuss in this chamber as it should be discussed the question of the procedures under which this house carries on its business and maintains the great and noble character of the institution it has become and which I fervently pray it will continue to be. It is true, sir, that there is need for change, that there are, as the minister has said, certain obsolescences which have crept into our procedures. The characteristic of longevity is not to suggest that some of the principles, not so much the reflection of those principles but the principles themselves, should be eternal and with us forever. I might say that certain habits of the human race have continued. Adam and Eve started one which has continued quite acceptably up till the present time, so far as I am aware.

In connection with these proposals, Mr. Speaker, I am quite convinced from my discussions at various times in and out of the house, both with members of my party and with members of other parties, that there are changes which will undoubtedly be acceptable to all. On the other hand, I am convinced from what I have seen and heard that there are changes that the government is going to propose which will not be acceptable. This is where we will part company from the government. This must necessarily be so, Mr. Speaker. The government and the opposition must, for the good of the country, approach the issue of the transaction of business in this house from a completely different viewpoint.

Take legislation, sir. Legislation is enacted on the advice and assent of the Senate and the House of Commons. Many governments, particularly this government, I feel, barely tolerate assent and are very unhappy about advice. This is one of the areas we must now approach in order to see to what extent the practices of this house can be enlarged to permit a greater measure of advice, change and adaptation by the house as a whole of government proposals.

Not for one minute would I ever suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the initiative must not at all times flow from the government. The purpose of government is to govern. In the kind of society in which we now live, and having in mind the responsibilities of members of this house on both sides—I speak now for those private members who sit behind the minister and on this side as well as for members of opposition parties—there is ample opportunity for members to participate to some extent in the legislative process once bills and other measures have been brought into the house. The proposals that we will make will have some connection with this idea.

When the government sees fit to introduce a measure and brings it to the stage of second reading, obviously it is a measure that has worked its way up from the bowels of the civil service, has received final approval so far as the government is concerned, and probably has political sex appeal. Once the bill comes to second reading it is a beloved child of the government. The government, as is the custom of all parents, will not tolerate any suggestion that there is any hint of imperfection or deformity in this child.

I think this has been one of the great difficulties in the legislative process. Too many times have too many statutes gone through this house without the government receiving those proposals that private members are well able to make and are probably better qualified to submit than the civil service. Who better than the private member in close touch and communication with his constituents, the people of Canada, can consider and survey the impact of a legislative proposal, how that piece of legislation affects the people he represents, and how will it affect all the people of Canada? I think there is an opportunity in the legislative process, without to any extent at all impairing the initiative, prerogative and responsibility of the government, to permit this to be done.

During the last four years 210 statutes have been passed. Of these, if one excludes appropriation bills and new bills originally passed, 93 measures were in fact amending statutes. As I said the other day, no government, no group of people, can possibly cast their minds far enough ahead to prepare for all of the contingencies and eventualities which human life and its vicissitudes may bring about. However, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you, not only as a member of the house but as one who, together with a great number of my colleagues, has spent years practising before the courts, that there are innumerable cases of statutes coming out of this parliament and out of provincial legislatures which are half-baked, ill-conceived, ill-prepared and which do not attain the object for which they are designed. This situation can be cured by giving the members of this house through various media which I hope will be suggested to this standing committee, an opportunity to put in a more concrete and eloquent way, a way which will receive some attention from the government, proposals which will better the legislation enacted by this parliament.

I suspect we all remember the story of the Procrustean bed and of the robber who placed his victims on it. If they were too long when he placed them on it he cut their feet off; if they were too short he had them stretched. That is often the type of legislation to come out of legislative bodies. It is much simpler to change the size of the bed. If we do that we shall obtain better legislation.

More consideration must be given to the views of individual members of this house. We must not permit the unique and difficult circumstances at present facing us to hasten our decision. I repeat and emphasize what I said earlier during the throne speech debate: we must not permit the government or any of its members to hasten us into a decision with regard to rule changes which will be designed primarily to fit the unusual circumstances existing at the present time.

Since last December, when the then prime minister, Mr. Pearson, indicated his intention of resigning his position, we have had no effective government. Some measures were passed, there was some attention to business, but we have had no real government. Much of the legislative backlog and consideration of estimates which awaits us derives from this fact. Because of the action or lack of action of the government of that time we went from crisis to crisis up to the end of last March. Under normal circumstances we should have returned after the Easter recess prepared to deal with the estimates and other legislative proposals then on the order paper. That did not happen, for obvious reasons.

Today we recognize the difficulties of the government. Because of a political decision made by the present Prime Minister and his supporters we find that we are now faced with an overloaded legislative program, many parts of which we recognize as being essential for the people of this country. That being so, we shall continue to give, as we have given, our utmost measure of co-operation despite the fact that the entire fault for our present circumstances lies on the shoulders of those who are on the government side of the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: A similar situation prevailed in the longest session this parliament has ever known, the session of 1966-67, during which the house sat for almost 250 days and passed, I believe, 83 bills. A survey of them can be a very interesting exercise. Seventy eight of those 83 measures were each passed in one day. It took one day each for those measures to pass all stages, and in parliamentary terms one day is roughly equivalent to between four and four and a half hours. Five bills of that session took 80 days to pass. Those five bills included the decennial revision of the Bank Act, then two or three years overdue, the unification of the armed forces bill, the old age security legislation, medicare and the transportation bill, each being lengthy and extremely controversial. Their passage involved significant and substantial legislative changes. As I say, they were long, difficult and complex bills and, if I am not mistaken, three or possibly four of them were never sent to a committee. The transport bill went to a committee, and though it took many days to pass throuh the house it would have taken much longer if it had not first gone to a committee where amendments were proposed and accepted. While in its final form that bill was not the best that could have been produced by the house, its consideration in committee cut down the time of passage through the house.

The estimates went through in the time then allotted under the provisional standing orders. I think the government of that day must take the responsibility for the length of the session and for the fact that five measures, which were of great complexity and difficulty, took the time they did to pass through the house.

The same remark might well apply to our present situation. We shall be asked to deal with measures such as the omnibus amendments to the Criminal Code involving five isolated and difficult problems, any one of which ought to be the subject of a separate measure and every one of which involves the conscience and serious consideration of members of this house. Each of those amendments, as I say, ought to be included in a separate measure.

The minister talks about the reform of the legislative process, and I agree with him. There is a lot of room for improvement. But, I ask, in the name of heaven how can the minister and the government expect members of the house to consider briefly the second reading stage of a bill such as the omnibus amendments to the Criminal Code involving five important, difficult and controversial subjects, to say nothing of the 200 or 300 sections, which in a substantive or procedural way may deeply affect, if adopted, the lives and liberties of the people of Canada. That is the position. I do not know what the government will do. I do not know what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) will propose. Is the matter to go to a committee and will witnesses be called? That is the sort of thing the select committee on procedure will need to look at earnestly and seriously.

I repeat the proposition I made. It is not good enough for members of this house, when approaching a study of the reform of the rules and regulations which govern our conduct in this house, to consider reforms with minds oriented only toward a consideration of the difficulties which face us at present. I hope the minister and the government agree with me. We must take the long view.

What will be the situation two years from now or three years from now? The Prime Minister called an election and we are now faced with a tremendous backlog of legislative and other parliamentary business. We cannot tailor our rules simply to expedite the passage of this business or to cover this situation. If we do, we shall be very sorry indeed.

Those are the general comments I wish to make. There are some particular areas I wish to cover. Other members of our party may have other comments to make. I wish to deal with the question of committees. I agree that there is a place for committees in this house. More use might be made of them, though not to the extent that use is made of them in the United States.

In my hand I have reports of two United States committees, the very prestigious foreign affairs committee of the Senate and the joint economic committee of Congress which has members from the House of Representatives and the Senate. The latter committee comes up with proposals which are issued in a statement similar to or the equivalent of a white paper tabled by the Minister of Finance in parliament. It is probably given even greater consideration than the report of the economic consultative committee established by the President. I do not think it is part of our parliamentary tradition that this should be done. However, I believe we could go a lot farther than we do today.

Committees must not be frustrated by a refusal on the part of chairmen to bring committee reports into the house. Committees must not be frustrated by the refusal of the government to call them together and set them in motion so as to carry out the terms of reference assigned to them. In this connection I need only refer to the public accounts committee which is faced with the formidable task of dealing with three annual reports by the Auditor General before the session is over.

Again, a committee having made a report and it having been brought before the house, there should be reasonable opportunity given for the report to be debated. The government is not obliged to accept it, of course, but if a committee has struggled with the problem placed before it and brought a report forward there should certainly be an opportunity, within reasonable limits, of debating it. These things, plus the establishment of reasonable budgets for committee activities, are essential if committees are to do part of the work of the house within the terms proposed by the minister.

I agree we have now reached a stage where certain aspects of our legislative program are not dealt with most effectively and efficiently in the house. Committees can play a considerable role. The committee on estimates is an apt illustration. But not for one moment do I entertain the idea that this house should at any time or under any circumstances delegate to a committee of the house the decision-making power which can only reside here in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: Similarly, when a committee has made its report it is the house which must decide. Again, responsibility cannot be abdicated. I agree that there is an inquisitorial and investigative process which can best be discharged through the medium of the committee system. I agree that by using the committee system hon. members can add to their knowledge, provided, of course, that other facilities are made available to them. A while ago the minister said we should not spend our money before we get it. I can assure him we shall not engage any research staffs until we have seen the estimates.

Hon. members undoubtedly have an opportunity to become more knowledgeable when they can sit across the table from a minister and direct questions to him, provided, of course, that the minister is a little more informative than he is in the house, and when they have the opportunity to examine expert witnesses. I am confident that in these circumstances members come back to this house better prepared for a crisper, more intelligent and, I would venture to suggest, shorter debate directed to the principles, and it is to the principles that this house should always be directing its attention. We ought surely to make use of the committee system but we must stop short of giving to committees rights which only this house can exercise.

I still entertain the utmost hope of achieving a measure of reform along the lines I have suggested. I must admit, though, that I am a lot more careful now in this regard than I was a year ago. The authoritarian trend which this government has indicated, its almost grotesque obsession with secrecy, must place a responsibility on all members of the opposition parties to be most careful when it comes to giving up rights which are essential for the preservation of this institution and for the protection of the rights of the Canadian people.

We talk about the question period. On that score I would say to the hon. gentleman: we all accept the fact that ministers of the crown have multifarious duties and that it may be necessary for them on occasions to be elsewhere employed in the business of the country. The government has the right to say that certain ministers will not be present on certain occasions. But we would strongly oppose any suggestion that, unilaterally, the government should decide that certain ministers would be absent on certain days. This could mean that if a crisis occurred on one of those days when a minister was not here the house would be obliged to wait until he returned.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Would the hon. member be agreeable to trying this out on an experimental basis to see whether the public interest would be served?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baldwin: I would be agreeable to the matter being discussed in the committee, where the whole subject of the question hour and the approach to be taken toward it could be studied. I think we ought to accept that under the federal system there is greater need for questions which are possibly more regional in character than they would be under other systems. We have superimposed parliamentary government and the party system upon our federal structure and I think the discipline of the party system sometimes inhibits the airing of problems which have a regional background. Though I believe the question period could be improved upon, an opportunity does exist through this medium for members from all parts of Canada to ventilate their grievances and attempt to secure remedies. Earlier today we were dealing with the security problem. Here is a situation where, if the security of the nation is threatened, the person involved would obviously be the subject of prosecution. But if the security of the nation is not involved, then, equally plainly, parliament and the country are entitled to a greater measure of information than was given today.

Mr. Stanfield: And every day.

Mr. Baldwin: My leader says "every day". I bring this matter up specifically as an indication of the failure, in part, of the question period and as an example of the necessity for making improvements to it in order to permit members of this house to discharge their responsibility to their constituents and to the people of Canada to scrutinize and bring into the searching spotlight of publicity the actions of this or of any government.

We observe with concern that government grows ever stronger and stronger—and government is more and more coming to mean the office of the prime minister. Add to this the implications of the discovery by creators of television public affairs programs that politics and politicians can be subjected to treatment in such a way as to project an element of entertainment and there is yet another reason for our concern. The image which appears on the television screen can be so manipulated and distorted that it is sometimes more art than nature.

More and more frequently this new toy will emphasize the emergence of personalities, the cult of the individual, and somehow we will have to learn to live with it. But it does violence to the basic principle of parliamentary democracy. We must then find ways and means to seek out and bring forward counterbalancing forces to check and control the startling expansion of the Prime Ministry, an institution occupied by an individual but rapidly becoming an office which no one person is capable of understanding or directing, no matter what his qualifications.

The United States wisely provided a system of checks and balances by keeping the executive separate from the legislative branch. We do not agree with their system but they have these checks and balances. They may have made too great a fetish of it, but certainly, Mr. Speaker, the checks and balances which the private members of the opposition parties must have, retain and expand in order to keep watch on this government must not be lost in the type of parliamentary reform which is considered in the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the motion that is now before the house and I did not mind the way in which Your Honour turned the tables on me and named me as the seconder of it.

I might say that not only do we agree with the motion but I agree with many things that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) said during the course of his speech. In fact I feel I must say to him that it is a better speech than it would have been if he had made it before we had several consultations among the house leaders. It struck me that he paid attention to some of the counter-proposals that were made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), and myself. He did not accept all of our suggestions. There was one in particular, related to the question period, on which he did not accept our position, but generally speaking I think the minister's speech has demonstrated already the value of consultation in this field.

I welcome also the portions of the speech of the hon. member for Peace River in which he emphasized the problem that faces us with respect to time and the necessity of our including, in any changes in the rules that we make, full protection for the rights of all members of the House of Commons.

It is often said, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think we can repeat it too often, that the rules of this house are parliament's business, not the government's. The government is recognizing that fact by placing this motion before the house and by asking an all-party committee to deal with the rules of the house. We in turn as members of the opposition have an obligation not only to criticize the proposals that may be made by the government but to make proposals ourselves and to accept the responsibility of working out jointly rules and procedures that will make for the best operation of the House of Commons.

In that vein, Mr. Speaker, there are some specific suggestions that I want to make in a few minutes. Some of them may not be popular in all quarters but I think we do have to get down to the serious business of dealing with our rules. However, before I do so there are a few conceptions or misconceptions about parliament that I think ought to be cleared up.

In the first place, I think it should be emphasized that bringing in new rules, no matter how good or how far reaching they may be, is no substitute for good legislation, and I say to the government that I have a little bit of concern—perhaps more than a little bit—that it is a technocratic kind of government. It is going to foster changes in the rules. It is going to reorganize the departments of government. It is going to come along with different ways of doing things, but good legislation of substance is down at the bottom of the list. That is not good enough. It is not good enough to try to substitute changes in the rules for good legislation.

The other side of the coin, Mr. Speaker, is equally valid. Making changes in the rules is no substitute for good performance on the part of members on both sides of the house. Just as we will not let the government use the rules as an excuse for not getting its business through, so we should not use the rules as an excuse for not being good members, for not attending to our business, for not being in our places, for not making proposals worthy of the consideration of parliament. Rules are important, but more important than rules are the legislation the government brings in and the performance of members on both sides of the house.

A second point I would like to make is one that arises out of a criticism that we often read in the press. It is a criticism that a number of members made during the course of the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. It has to do with the question of talk, of speech-making in parliament. There are times when our critics on the outside, and some on the inside, speak as though talking is a crime, as though making speeches is something that should not happen in parliament. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is such a thing as too much talk. There is such a thing as burying important business in a flood of words. I said to one interested person a day or two ago, when some comments were made about the length of the throne speech debate and that eight days were maybe longer than it needed to be, that when I first came here the throne speech took a full month. That was back in the early and middle 1940's. My friend, who had been an observer of the scene in those days, replied that Mackenzie King liked it that way, that by talking and talking in the throne speech debate members did not bother him about the business of the country.

I agree that there is such a thing as too much talk, but let us not allow the press, or anyone in this house, to get away with the thought that the main purpose of changing the rules is to cut down on or eliminate the right of free speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank God for free speech. It is the heart and the essence of democracy. Much as I am used to the formalities that we go through when we go over to the Senate to open a session of parliament, I always enjoy hearing Mr. Speaker claim from the representative of the crown the right of free speech for all members of parliament. It is when people do not have free speech, when matters cannot be discussed, that you lose democracy, that you have authoritarianism, that you have dictatorship. Free speech is something that we should have, and in any attempt to reform the rules of parliament let us not think that we are doing something valuable just because we cut down on the length of time we spend in this house.

[Mr. Knowles (Winniueg North Centre).]

I want to say also that the notion that using time is a crime or mistake does not always hold up. It is important that we use our time wisely; it is important that we use it well. But the implication I get from some criticism of parliament is that we should so organize our rules that we can do the year's work in two or three months and then go home, go about our other business or what-have-you. I think that is wrong and is not in keeping with the whole purpose of parliament. As a matter of fact, authoritative writers on the problems of parliament, its rules and procedures, over the decades have said that the important thing we must do when we talk about time is not simply to aim at saving time but to aim at making the best use of the time we have.

• (4:30 p.m.)

There is another misconception I would like to clear up, Mr. Speaker, and I hope I am demonstrating my impartiality in this field. Some of my hon. friends opposite may not believe it but I think it is no crime for the government to try to get its legislation through parliament. After all, that is what governments are elected for. They are elected because the people support their policies. The people expect them to come to parliament with legislation to implement those policies and to do their best to get that legislation through.

I think we who are members of the opposition should not completely prevent legislation getting through. On the other hand, it is no crime for an opposition to attempt to stop a government putting through something that it disagrees with or something which the opposition feels has been hastily conceived and is not really good for the country. In other words, I am perhaps spelling out in another way what I had in mind when I talked about the right of free speech, namely, that the essence, the genius, of this place is that it is a place where there is equality on both sides. It is a place where the cut and thrust of debate is the basic rule, because it is out of the cut and thrust of debate that the government tries to get its legislation through with the opposition having the right to check it as it goes through and to keep the government from doing things that are wrong for the country. That is the democratic process and through it we can achieve the best for our times.

I should like to go on to say a word about tradition in so far as it affects the rules of parliament. There are some respects in which the traditions that are behind us are extremely good and must be respected, I would go so far as to say, to the end of time. I have in mind traditions which have to do with the right of free speech, traditions which have to do with the equality of the members on the floor of the House of Commons, traditions which have to do with the right of opposition members to expect the cabinet ministers to be present to answer questions in respect of their policies and their administration.

I think of the traditions we have about debate which divide it into various stages of time. We know that a rule could be devised whereby a government proposal would be debated once and that would be it. But our tradition says no, that it is better to have a first look at it, that it is a good idea to decide on it in principle, that then it should be looked at in detail and that after all that there should be another look at it. I go along with the President of the Privy Council in respect of some of the changes he wishes to make in that regard, but I make the point that there are some traditions like those centred around the right of free speech and the general process for the passing of legislation which are mighty good.

I believe all of us in this chamber have the right to be very proud of being members of this kind of an institution. We do not need to enhance our own position by making comparisons with other types of legislative bodies. I think, however, that we have inherited from our political progenitors one of the best kinds of legislative bodies. I think the essence of it is sound. I believe we would be making a mistake if we tampered with that essence and that we would do well to retain the heart and core of it.

On the other hand, there are times when tradition can hamper us. I think there is one area in which this is the case. The President of the Privy Council alluded to it today. I refer in particular to the trappings we have built up around the voting of supply and around the question of ways and means. It is not necessary to indulge in a treatise on history to remind hon. members that the British parliamentary system originated in an era when the King was out to get all the money he could get out of the barons. The barons, who later had to delegate some of their authority, were trying to prevent the King getting the money he wanted. So parliament became largely involved in a test over this one question. Hence we had secretive types of supply and ways and means committees to discuss this kind of thing without the monarch looking on.

The result is that we have encrusted around our supply and ways and means machinery traditions which I do not think fit the 1960's or the 1970's. Even the committees that bear these names may be absolete. The struggle today is not a struggle between subjects and a king who is trying to obtain money for purposes they do not know very much about. The struggle today has shifted considerably. It is a struggle between the executive and parliament as a whole. It is also a struggle between points of view; it is a struggle among parties. I believe our own machinery should be adjusted to meet this situation. I shall come to that in a little more detail when I get down to the suggestion I intend to make.

I think it is becoming obvious that one of the areas where we must make the greatest reform is the way in which we handle the voting of supply and the providing of money. I accept the proposition, stated today so effectively by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), that we must keep control of the purse strings and that if we let go our control over the spending of money we let go our control over the government. But I shall still stand here and utter what to some people will appear to be heresy. I no longer think the voting of supply is the main business of parliament.

I have heard it uttered from this side of the house a good many times that supply is the main business of parliament, and I expect it will be uttered in the course of this debate. The business of supply is important just as the control of the purse strings is important, but today the whole field of legislation and policy, what we should do for our people from the cradle to the grave, what we should do about the problems, all the way from under the sea to outer space, which face us, calls for a consideration which surely anyone will admit is just as important as the voting of supply and I think even more important. I believe that the time has come when we must find a way by which the voting of supply, the voting of expenditures of which we must approve, can be handled a little more routinely so that we have more time to focus our attention on new policies for the new problems of our times.

There is nothing new about the suggestions I am making under the general heading of the word "tradition". There are some things about our traditions which I think are so eternally good that I hope we have them to the end of time. But because we value our free speech and the cut and thrust of debate, as well as all the other things that are part of democracy, does not mean that we must retain forever a system of voting money which came out of a time in history that has long since been left behind.

Having spent a little time in clearing away what I think are some of the misconceptions which I believe surround this house and its procedures I should like to come now to the specific matters to which I think our committee should address itself.

I agree, incidentally, with the hon. member for Peace River that we must not try to fashion rules for all time on the basis of the problem of this particular fall. I also hope, despite the fact that I support this motion and the requirement that there be a report by December 1, that if we find in the next few weeks we cannot do a final job by then we will have enough sense and responsibility to say to the house: The provisional rules had better be continued for another couple of months while we work a little further on this matter.

There will be a great many details to go into, the length of time spent on speeches, the length of various debates, the question of broadcasting our proceedings by radio and television, attendance in the house, the quorum, and so on. If this debate goes on, all kinds of questions will be raised. But I would like the committee to address itself to the main problem, on which I am sure we all agree, and the hon. member for Peace River confirmed this. That main problem is time.

I would be the last one to argue that dollars and cents are a satisfactory yardstick in this area, but at least it is a suggestion. I remind hon. members that in the first years of confederation the federal government's budget was of the order of $20 million. The annual budgets are now $10 billion. That is a multiplication of 50 times. I do not think I would be far wrong if I were—

Mr. Woolliams: It is 500.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friend the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) says it is 500. I said it was

50. Whichever it is and he may be right, it does not matter.

Mr. Baldwin: What's a million, anyway?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If it is 500, Mr. Speaker, rather than 50, perhaps my next sentence has to be qualified a little. But at least I feel it is safe to say that today in the House of Commons we have 50 times as much work to do in a year as the members of the first and second parliaments did back in the 1860's and 1870's. It might even be closer to 500 times. But we cannot find 50 times as many days in a year to do 50 times as much work as they had back in those first years of confederation. As a matter of fact, the sittings of parliament in those days ran about 60 or 65 days. Indeed, for a long time there was a section in the Senate and House of Commons Act that members received their full indemnity only if the session lasted for 65 days, so most sessions did last for 65 days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We do not have to have that kind of rule today. You cannot multiply 65 sitting days by 50 in a 365-day year. So the problem is there, the problem of time, and we have simply got to do something about it.

Another way to look at the problem is to think of the various departments and consider the government as it is today. In 1860 there were questions of railways, canals and telegraph lines, agriculture and colonization, the Post Office and things like that, but today the federal government touches every area of life.

I mentioned Mackenzie King's name a few minutes ago. I am sure that if he were to come back, or if he is looking at things through the spiritual telescope he is reported to have, he would be flabbergasted by the amount of work we have to do today. He would probably say, "You should keep the throne speech going for 30 days and let the government run the business." That is the situation today, and the amount of work we have to do will become even greater in the future. If this is the case, if our problem is time and to get done in 12 months the amount of work that faces us, what are we going to do about it? There are a great many little details we can go over, but I want to consider two general things and then reject one and accept the other. One general way to deal with a lot more business in the course of the same amount of time, in other words, to deal with 50 times as much business in the same 12 months, is to cut down the time spent on every item, to cut down speeches from 40 to 30 to 20 to 10 minutes, to cut down speeches in committee of the whole to 5 minutes. We could do all kinds of things. We could cut down the time spent dealing with bills to one or two days. We could cut down the question period. This is one way to do it, that is, cut down the amount of time spent on each item of business, each bill, each resolution, each matter parliament has to deal with. Obviously, I do not think that is the way to do it.

We have this explosion of business, and if we are aware of the fact that we have a great deal more to do now than members had 20 years ago, let alone 100 years ago, there are three other things we could do. I press these three things and, as is usual in my way of putting things, there may be some subheadings.

In the first place, I think we must learn to delegate a good deal of our work to committees of the house. We cannot go on forever dealing with 50 to 100 times as much work as we had and do it all on the floor of the house. I think we have to strengthen our committees in various ways which I want to suggest. We must delegate more work to our committees, and having given more work to them we must place some confidence, trust, and respect in them.

I know that one idea I have about committees has not yet commended itself to members generally, but I press it again. I believe that committees at certain times of the year should be given the centre of the stage and therefore parliament as a whole should adjourn for a week out of a month or for a couple of weeks every six weeks or so and let the committees meet and deal with the many problems referred to them. As I say, they should be given the centre of the stage. I think there are times when committees should be parliament.

I think also, Mr. Speaker, that when committees have dealt with matters, whether the estimates or detailed studies of bills, that work should not be duplicated on the floor of parliament. I accept the proposition of the hon. member for Peace River that in all cases the final decision should be made here, but as for this business of sending the estimates to committee, having them gone over in great detail and then having them come back to committee of supply and gone over again—well, we can do it if we want to, but I do not think it is a good use of time.

I think the same thing about bills. If a complicated bill like the broadcasting legislation, the armed forces unification bill or the Canada Pension Plan has gone to a committee and had a good, thorough going over by that committee, we should not repeat the same process here.

I like this suggestion made by the President of the Privy Council—I forget whether it was originally his or whether we worked it out in our sessions—that we should bring back to life what was once known as the report stage. If a matter goes to committee, be it the estimates or a bill, when it comes back it should not go before committee of the whole but with Mr. Speaker in the chair there should be a motion to adopt the report. If that report includes a reference to some things that were contentious, to some changes that were made, let the debate in the house be limited. Let it zero in on those particular points. In most cases the report stage would be passed without debate. The point of the hon. member for Peace River would be followed in that the decision would be made here. I think we would be using our time a lot better and strengthening the hand of committees if we did it this way.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question at this stage?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member has been here a number of years. Has it not been his experience—I refer to committees as they are set up at the moment—that the tendency is that the report of the committee is written and controlled somewhat by the majority of the committee members, who are controlled by the government? I am speaking of all governments, not just this government but all governments in the past. So the report may be coloured. In many ways, if certain facts come out of departments, all governments tend to cover their sins, or at least those people who are writing the report do. That has been my experience in some of the committees and it seems to me that is the danger in the hon. member's suggestion.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have no doubt some committees have operated that way. I have had the privilege of working on some committees where this was not the case, such as the old age security committee of 1950 and the Canada pension committee of a few years ago. I think hon. members who are here now and who were here then will realize that we did have a say in the making of that report. I recognize that this kind of thing can happen, but I think it happened because we have left the committees in a downgraded position. No matter what they do, it is done all over again back here. I think we should put them in the centre of the stage. We should not duplicate their work. We should give the members of those committees the research assistance which is being talked about so that they can do a good job. I also think—the hon. member for Peace River said this and I agree with him—that it should be clearly understood that the reports of committees will all be dealt with back on the floor of the house.

When a committee deals with bills or with estimates they come back and certainly they have to be dealt with here, but if it deals with a problem it has been investigating, such as birth control or breathalizers, the report may come back and there may be no further discussion on it. You do not strengthen committees by making them smaller, giving them new names, giving them research assistance and so on, if you still leave them in an inferior position. For all intents and purposes I think they have to become parliament at that particular point.

I am always happy to express my respect for what they do at Westminster. I confess that last year when I was over there with the committee, although I thought I knew all that was going on over there I was amazed at the degree to which they have got legislation off the floor of the house and into their committees upstairs. Their committees meet in rooms which are set up like the House of Commons itself and they do things in the same formal way that we do here, but it is actually possible at Westminster for legislation to go through all the stages without ever being discussed on the floor of the house itself. This is also what happens to estimates.

Let me say that there is a safeguard. If a certain number of members—I think it is ten—insist that a bill come back to the floor, this is done. I am not advocating we go that far, but I am saying that if we have 50 times as much work to do as did the members of the first parliament of Canada we have to do something about the problem of time. As I say, one of the ways is to upgrade the work of the committees, taking into consideration the various suggestions I have made.

The second suggestion that I make involves the use o a phrase which was always anathema to my good friend, the hon. Gordon Churchill, the former member for Winnipeg South Centre, namely, "allocation of time". I have a great deal of respect for the views about parliament of my former neighbour, and when one speaks of these things one feels he is still here. For all we know he may be in the gallery listening to the debate.

I support allocation of time, because I do not like closure. Closure is a bad word which we all dislike, but I know of no more effective form of closure than unlimited debate. When you spend all of the time or most of the time in a year on the question of a flag you cut off the possibility of discussing medicare in that session. That type of closure is just as effective as if the government brought in the use of the rule. I think it is not a denial of free speech, it is not a denial of the democratic process, for us to find a way whereby we can agree to the amount of time that will be given to one subject so we can go to another. There is just too much to do for us to spend all our time on one subject.

I am glad we left 15-A out of the provisional rules to which we have agreed for the balance of this year. In fact, perhaps I might be forgiven for telling the house that I proposed at a meeting of the house leaders that we leave out 15-A. I did so as a form of conciliation in which I was engaged at that time. I did so because I do not think it is a satisfactory rule for the allocation of time. I think it can be improved on. It has to be something that will be worked on in advance as an all-party proposition, in the context of a parliament which is going well because people feel they are getting their say in committees, are getting good legislation, and have a sufficient number of opportunities to speak on the floor. These are the kind of things, all wrapped together, which I think we have to do.

As I said, I had three things I wanted to give by way of suggestions about this time problem, but the time allocated to me is running out so I had better get on. I have already said I think we have to learn to delegate more of our work to committees. I want to add this postscript to what I said. If we do not delegate work to committees and if we do not allocate our time, what will happen is that we will in effect be delegating our work to the bureaucracy. We will delegate it right out of parliament. On another occasion I will quarrel over the answer which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) gave to me today about an order in council passed last April which put into effect certain customs duties—and the order in council actually says this—at the level at which they would have been had parliament passed a resolution which was on the order paper. When parliament did not deal with the matter, we forced the bureaucracy to find some way to act without us. I think this was an improper order in council.

However, the point I am making at the moment is that if we do not find ways and means of dealing with our problems by improving the committee structure and by allocating our time for the debate of various issues we can be sure that the public service—it is a tremendous service of which we are very proud but it is not elected; we are the elected people—will take over and will run the business of the country.

The other suggestion I make is—and here I will use a word which may not be in the dictionary—that we have to "calendarize" our parliamentary year. The committee on procedure of the last parliament suggested this, and the President of the Privy Council has already referred to it today. We proposed that a session should begin in the autumn and wind up in June or July, with certain deadlines along the way. I think this is all tied in with the business of delegating work to committees and of allocating our time, but I think it has to be done.

The trouble with our way of doing things for the last quarter of a century that I have been around here is that the only real deadlines we seem to have are Christmas, Easter, or some hoped for prorogation date. This does not make good sense. What happens is that a lot of legislation piles up, and then we push billions of dollars worth of estimates and all sorts of legislation through simply because it has to be done so we can get home for Christmas, Easter or a summer vacation. This is not rational. I think that surely we have the capacity, the wit and the ability to plan a year, even if it has to be within limits. I know there are emergencies for which the program must be changed.

I would put a firm limit on the time when the estimates have to be passed. They have done it in Britain and they have not denied free speech over there. We have to "calendarize" our year and we have to have certain periods when we will deal with legislation or estimates if we are to deal with them after they come back from the committees. We also have to have certain periods in which to deal with budgets. It would be good for the country and good for parliament if we worked on some kind of planned basis instead of these catch as catch can arrangements which we have at present.

As I said, I have avoided getting into a lot of details because I think the main problem is the question of time. I repeat, let us keep the traditions that we have and that are worth keeping. On the other hand, let us not be bogged down by traditions that have no relevance or meaning in our times. On this problem of time let there be other suggestions, but I challenge anyone to state the problem any more forcibly than I have, namely, that the problem is time. In fact, the other two speakers have agreed with me. If other people have other suggestions for coping with this main problem, that is fine, but if they do not have better suggestions I urge that we go in for a greater delegation of our work to committees, that we find a proper way to allocate our time so that all the business which needs to be done in a year is done, and that we arrange our year's calendar so that it makes some common sense.

• (5:00 p.m.)

I hope the committee will come back by December 1 with a report that has something of real value for this House of Commons. As I say, if we cannot complete the job by then I trust parliament will give us a little longer to deal with it. I also hope this will not be the last committee on rules and procedures. In fact, as I have said on previous occasions, the last rule of parliament will never be written. Democracy is not a dead thing, it is living, and it will go on being changed and improved as time goes on. Our job, however, is not to worry about the changes to be made in the year 2000. Let us address ourselves to the changes we can make during this session of parliament, that will make it a better one. Having made it better, I hope we will get and pass legislation worthy of this institution at its best.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, as for us, we welcome with satisfaction the statement of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) about the discussions which have already taken place with the various house leaders with regard to the reform of the parliamentary procedure.

I think the time is ill-chosen to criticize our procedure because the committee will see to that. It will also have to make suggestions which will enable us, after December 1, to find out about the new procedure which will make it possible for us to work more efficiently. The new procedure will have to strive—and that is what it must aim at—to increase the efficiency of the house, because often in the past the public and even the members of parliament have criticized the slowness, the inefficiency of the house or, often, the insufficient time available to deal with the business of the house.

At the same time—and that is the main point I want to raise today—this procedure should also enhance the prestige of members, in short emphasize their role as legislator and not as civil servant. I think that the former procedure considered the member mainly as a civil servant while he should normally be a legislator. I know it is difficult to develop and put forward a new procedure which will be faultless, but that is not a reason to attack the existing procedure, so as to enable parliament to do more in less time. That is why we are going to co-operate with the house leaders, to come to an agreement which will permit the development of a process enabling us to pass legislation faster and put forward more appropriate bills before the problems of our country get worse.

Thanks to our procedure, I noticed in the past—despite my little experience in this house—that parliament often found solutions to very serious problems, but because of the slowness of procedure, these solutions were so long delayed that the problems were getting worse and worse.

The President of the Privy Council mentioned that our present procedure took too much time. He also made another remark which seemed to contradict the first one, namely that the members did not have the time necessary to study the legislation in depth, that they took too long. That is true. He is right about those two points but, on the other hand, there are reasons for that. If the honourable members are unable to study the legislation in depth, there is an explanation.

First, the member has to perform his legislative duty and, unfortunately, to act as a civil servant. He has to make inquiries, study reports and look into all the royal commissions the government has set up. He must also, from time to time, participate to the various parliamentary associations and, therefore, he has to take different trips.

He also has to examine all the briefs submitted by various groups. Some of them originate from members of Chambers of Commerce or various groups in the country. He also has to meet people and ascertain the work which is done, at the provincial level, in the legislative field. He also has to do part of his research himself. He must be well informed in order to keep abreast of Canadian policy, and even the international policy. He must sit in the house and attend the various committee meetings. We say that if the new procedure is passed, committees will expand in future, they will become more important, more powerful and they will automatically require greater preparation on the part of the members.

This is my complaint. If we lack the time and if we devote too much time to routine procedure, we will not have any time left for consideration in depth. I will point out now what is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne with regard to the official opposition:

> —So that the Official Opposition, to which we, in Canada, give formal recognition as a vital part of our democratic process, as well as the other parties in opposition, may be in a position to cope more effectively with the heavy load of action and decision each session must face, you will be asked to make new provision for the Official Opposition and the other parties in their parliamentary role.

It is all well and good to talk about passing a new procedure—and we are all for it—in order to expedite the business of the house, but we cannot ask the members to do more just with the tools available to them at the present time.

For instance, I would point out that the United States, our neighbours to the south, have 435 members of Congress and 100 senators, that is a total of 535 elected representatives. Those elected representatives are assisted by 8,000 employees who represent an average of 15 officials appointed for research or committee work for each member of Congress or the Senate. This system is intended to facilitate the role of the elected representatives as legislators in order that they may devote their time to the welfare of the population. Mr. Speaker, this leads me to say that our present procedure is antiquated—and we all agree on that—because we have come to the point where we want it altered, improved and modernized. Besides, we have too many civil servants to enforce our legislation but we do not have assistants, the tools, the civil servants or the scientists to help us prepare our legislation.

A member of the house must do all his office work, do his part as a member of the house in his constituency, prepare and control legislation in its various stages and attend committee meetings. However, he does not have the tools permitting him to act as a true legislator, and that is why speeches in the house are often too long. I agree with the president of the Privy Council that the speeches are often too long, because they are badly prepared. We lack the necessary research personnel and we cannot do the work in depth, because we cannot do everything and still discharge our duties properly.

If we want the members of this house to act as legislators and statesmen, we must give them the necessary means. We have put particular emphasis on the passage in the Speech from the Throne which shows the intention of putting such means at the disposal of the opposition in order to allow its members to help the government when it presents good legislation, to help it in its legislative work and, at the same time, make constructive criticisms and express their own views.

My main point today is that our parliamentary procedure and rules will have to be amended in that direction. We will increasingly have to act as legislators instead of civil servants. Therefore, the new procedure will have to give all the members of this house, whether they sit on the left or on the right of the Speaker, the tools to act in their true legislative capacity.

• (5:10 p.m.)

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, there are a few matters to which I thought I might refer, some of which have not been dealt with. I crave the indulgence of the house to make observations regarding certain matters that I feel ought to be brought to its attention.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said that no longer is supply of first importance for parliament. That view is not consistent, I submit, with the general acceptance of the principle that parliament must keep a firm hold on the pursestrings of the nation. All of us want to make parliament more effective; that has been my objective through the years. I spoke on this subject in 1965; on May 20 I stated that I believed in reform to meet changing conditions without in any way destroying the mission of this house.

There have been improvements, Mr. Speaker. The designation of yourself, sir, as the Speaker of the House for a second parliament was one of the most forward steps that has been made to bring about in this institution the assurance that in debate decorum shall be maintained and, above all, that the rights of members of parliament wherever they sit shall not be denied.

It cannot be emphasized too much, Mr. Speaker, that every member in this house, whether recently elected or not, whether a member of the privy council or not, must have the opportunity of placing before the house his views on behalf not only of his constituency but of his country as well. There is no more important debate that can take place in this house than the strengthening of this institution, without which freedom cannot survive. I do not say this by way of criticism, Mr. Speaker, but this afternoon the number of members present, 40 or 50, does not indicate that there is very general recognition of the necessity for maintaining the greatness and supremacy of this institution, for bringing about needed reforms while at the same time assuring that the great traditions of the past that preserved our freedom in two world wars shall be upheld. It was this institution, Mr. Speaker, that between 1914 and 1918 gave the lead. It was this institution that between 1939 and 1945 gave to the people of this nation that determination which brought about, in alliance with those who were associated with us, the freedom that is ours.

I am not here to say that members should be in the house, Mr. Speaker. But one of the major criticisms of this institution is that members are not in the house. No one is guiltless in this regard. People come into the gallery and when they come out exclaim: "What an institution this is! There was scarcely anyone in the chamber". And so they join that galaxy of criticism that has become so popular in this country and in other countries.

Criticism is not new, Mr. Speaker; it has been said over and over again over the years. Some there are who believe that they are actually the discoverers of the shortcomings of this parliament. Those who have that view do not read history. One has only to go back to 1661 when Samuel Pepys stated:

> —how beastly things are carried on in parliament—they oppose all things that are moved by serious men. They are the most profane, swearing fellows that be heard in this life, which makes me think that they will spoil all and bring things ruinous about.

That was in the days of the Charleses. What about modern criticism, Mr. Speaker? I think of Charles Dickens. He sat in the gallery of the House of Commons for years and he wrote of parliament:

> This great dust heap of Westminster, laughing, coughing, oh-ing, groaning, a conglomeration of noise and confusion. No other place in existence is like it, excepting Smithfield on a market day, or a cockpit in all its glory!

The critics were about then, Mr. Speaker. I think of Robert Louis Stevenson, who said: "We all know about parliament and we are ashamed of it". We are now in the year 1968 and in Canada and in Great Britain the same criticisms are being made. Those who know not parliament feel the greater qualified to criticize the institution!

Major criticisms were mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and others who participated in the debate. For example, it is alleged that we waste time. One would think that this institution was a meandering one in which legislation is not passed expeditiously. The critics contend that we talk too much. To use the words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that is what parliament is for. We are not here for the purpose of turning out masses of legislation. We are here for the purpose of preserving the freedom of the average Canadian and for seeing to it that no man, however humble, is denied equal rights with others.

I speak as one, Mr. Speaker, who has been here for many years. I have been greatly impressed by the high quality of the members who have come to this their first parliament. It is always a matter of interest to listen to them as they make their maiden speeches, an experience that all of us who have been here in other parliaments have gone through. Nothing is more trying.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Over the years all our prime ministers have listened to new members and asked themselves, "Which one of these will ultimately become prime minister of the country?". I remember the man Mr. King designated. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier listened to Mr. Arthur Meighen speaking in 1908 he made the remark, "There's a future prime minister," and he was right. In 1912 Sir Robert Borden designated R. B. Bennett as a future prime minister, and so it has been all through the years. As young men come to this institution—I cannot say the same about women; we have only one woman member who is most distinguished—they give to this great body of the people hope for the future. They bring new ideas, new concepts and new determinations.

How is it that a few days after parliament begins its deliberations many members disappear after orders of the day and house attendance is eroded? In 1791-92, in the parliaments of Upper and Lower Canada, if one looks at the rule book then in effect, as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) has, one will find a rule saying that if a member is absent from the house and Mr. Speaker has noted the absence, the sheriff may be sent out to bring the delinquent before the bar of the house. When that was done once I am sure attendance thereafter was maintained.

This summer I was in the United Kingdom and visited the House of Commons at Westminster. I saw it first when I was on leave in November, 1916, when I heard the great Lloyd George make his first speech as prime minister of the United Kingdom. Then Britain was fearful and he raised up the nation. I saw that house during the days of Churchill. I saw Churchill in that chamber in November, 1916, following Gallipoli, when he was in disgrace. When I first met him I said to him, "I saw you first when you were in disgrace". His answer was, "Which time was that?". Later in 1940 he raised up the British people when they, and we, and other commonwealth countries were alone.

In the Canadian parliament I have heard since 1911 the greats throughout the years. Some will tell you that debating has disappeared in this chamber, that it is not what it was in the old days, and that is right. It is better. In my estimation the quality of debate, especially since the beginning years of the last war, has improved greatly in this house. I know that some say, "Let us cut down the time; let us pass our estimates and matters of controversy on to committees." I will go part way with that. The great danger of committees is this, sir. Many of those who give support to the principle in reality are comparing this institution with the congress of the United States, and it is different. There, in committee, all partisanship disappears. Their committees are all-powerful and you cannot get anywhere in those committees unless you have a great deal of seniority. Under that system a member who has been here for 28 years might head a committee. That seniority system is wrong because, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said, it would destroy the efficiency and effectiveness of parliament.

It has often been suggested that we should imitate the United States system of government. I can never accept the concept of the republicanism of the United States being made a principle or yardstick for a parliament in the British tradition. It cannot be done.

In "The Decline of Legislatures" Lord Bryce has written:

> Every traveller who, curious in political affairs, enquires in the countries which he visits how their legislative bodies are working, receives from the elder men the same discouraging answer. They tell him, in much the same terms everywhere, that there is less brilliant speaking than in the days of their own youth, that the tone of manners has declined,—

Today the President of the Privy Council mentioned the need to maintain a high degree of cultured demeanour and I interpolate to say that when I was in the British house recently there was a clash of opinion. They have no eggshell sentimentalities in that institution. The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition clash. Not long ago the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Heath, said in the British house, "I say to the Prime Minister, he cannot bully me," to which the Prime Minister replied, "the hon. member is in no danger, only a coward would do that," or words to that effect.

What would happen if those words were said in this institution? Why, I could just imagine the headlines all across this country.

Churchill's deputy prime minister of the war years, Attlee, formed a government which Churchill wanted to discredit. He said, looking at the front benches of the government, "It is a lousy government." Before the speaker could call him to order he went on to say, "I want to say that I was not using that term in an opprobrious way. It was purely a factual statement."

As I see it, with the exception of the prime minister, the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition—that is the correct designation, not the leader of the official opposition—and ministers making official statements, members should speak without a manuscript before them. Why waste the time of the house? If a speech is to be read, why do we not follow the United States system? If any here want to imitate the United States system why do they not adopt the procedure of the House of Representatives? There, when a member has a written out speech he says, "I should like to place my speech on the Congressional Record", and it is placed on the record. That saves time. If some hon. members here want this institution to be more efficient, there would be a move to consider. Nevertheless, adopting that system would deny the deliberative nature of this house.

I recall that in 1940 or 1941, when two members of Congress had the same ghost writer, one of them delivered his oration in the morning by filing it and the other, Fiorello la Guardia, that tribune of the people, rose that afternoon and delivered his in person. The next day they were both amazed to find they had used the same speech. Let us try to elevate this institution by debating, by expressing our views without the necessity of having everything written out, because if it is all written out, and all to be read, a lot of time could be saved.

Then again, we would have a far better attendance in this house if the institution were cut in two. This place is too large. Everybody has a seat. One of my deep regrets is that I did not secure the consent of the house—and I think it could have been obtained at the time—to remove these desks and reduce the size of the chamber so that there would only be seating for 200. In those circumstances hon. members would all be here. Whenever there is a matter of importance to be debated in Westminster, everybody gets there early. I am referring to the membership of the house.

The next thing I want to deal with is that too many members and too many people have the idea that in this institution we make decisions, that we have real powers of government. We have not. I do not go as far as the Prime Minister went in February last when the rules of parliament were thrown out of the window after the defeat of the government in the house. He was minister of justice then. The prime minister and he indicated then that the government was the master of the house. That is a very bad concept indeed. It is true the government has the responsibility of legislation. It must assume that responsibility. We have the right to examine. The great danger of some of the ideas advanced by powerful governments is that in the interest of so-called efficiency private members of the house will apply to themselves the throttle of secrecy which was recently applied by the Prime Minister to members of the government. They have been strong, silent men ever since. At least, they have been silent.

When the Prime Minister said he did not want "leaks," he was right. What takes place in cabinet should not become available to any of us outside that institution. But, sir, today ministers go around almost as though they had tape over their lips lest they speak. We had an example of this today.

Mr. Stanfield: Every day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A question was asked by the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition regarding something which happened a few months ago, in January. According to the press, some individual in the civil service had been engaged in one of the most dangerous activities that anyone can engage in as far as his own country is concerned—bartering information to a potential enemy. Maybe today the days of espionage are over. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) brought off a good quip on the subject yesterday. As a matter of fact, the days of espionage are pretty well over because the air is full of marching battalions of those things that move overhead. Now, everybody knows everything about everybody else. But this man would have belonged to that group of people who desire to maintain their anonymity, had it not been for the press.

I realize, as I said today in the course of my question, that on the shoulders of the Prime Minister rests the security of the nation. But parliament has the right, within the limitations imposed by the need for security, to know who this person is. The answer to that question was apparently that he was not as guilty as he thought he was. However, he was kept on for several months and now he belongs to the great unwashed outside the civil service. Who was this person? Is there any reason Canadians should not be told? Whatever he did was detrimental to the state or he would not have been put into general circulation outside the civil service.

This is what is happening today whenever we raise such questions. Those strong, silent men of the government are declining to furnish answers to members of this house. When questions are asked from this side we are given answers one would expect from quiz kids—smart, evasive, diffuse. Let us have the facts. But people over there are apparently not satisfied with the rules as they are today. They want, apparently, to apply to parliament generally the throttle of silence which denies members of the cabinet the right to express themselves except with permission.

Change the rules with changing conditions? I accept that. But what happened last February when the rules and the constitutional rights of our country were thrown overboard induces me, usually unsuspecting, to examine very closely what the President of the Privy Council has in mind.

They talk about examination of the estimates. I do not want to say that anything we do is a joke. The time was fixed for examination of estimates, so many days, 30 days. Liberal members spoke, as they had a right to do. Finally, in the last hours we passed over $1,300 million, just like that, because the time had been used up. Mr. Speaker, as the rules are today the government could put $40 million or $50 million in the estimates and get away with it by holding off discussion until the last hours of the last day. That is not conducive to the discharge of our responsibilities.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are putting an idea in their heads.

Mr. Woolliams: They have got the idea. You do not have to worry about that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They need no ideas when it comes to that. They need no suggestions, but it surprises them that these things are revealed of what they had in mind.

I like to hear the President of the Privy Council, in towering majesty, as he stands and speaks of parliament. As I understood him today, and I am only too glad to be corrected, he is concerned over the fact that we take too long to discuss things. Let us clear away that canard as against this parliament and several parliaments.

I am not going to read the record. I sent out for it, and for benefit of the members generally I suggest they should look at Hansard for May 25, 1965, where Hon. Gordon Churchill, who was referred to today by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, analysed this idea that we waste time.

I am not going to repeat the figures that he gave. They are to be found at page 1643. They have now been brought up to date and it is interesting to note the result for the session 1966-67, which commenced on January 18, 1966, and ended May 8, 1967, the longest session in Canadian history. Mention was made by the President of the Privy Council that the tendency today is to have long sessions. Well, until the session I have just referred to, the longest as I recall it was 1904.

The greatest number of bills in a session was passed in 1966-67. That session lasted for 250 sitting days, or almost a year and a half. Some 83 bills were enacted. Of that number 16 were passed with less than 30 minutes debate for each bill. Ten other bills were passed with debate on each one not exceeding one hour. Nine more required less than one and a half hours for consideration. Three others took less than two hours. In other words, of the 83 bills 38 were passed with less than two hours debate for each bill.

Who is there here who will say that record indicates an attitude on the part of the opposition, that they have been engaged in delaying? Eight other bills required over two hours but less than three. Five bills required over three hours but less than four hours for all stages. A total of 51 bills, or 60 per cent of the entire legislative program, were completed in a total of 66 hours, or an average of one hour and 18 minutes per bill. They say we hold them up? Are we to have applied to us that throttle of silence which the members of the administration have today? I thought, Mr. Speaker, that this should go on the record.

The remaining 32 bills took longer. There were two or three that challenged the concepts of the opposition, and we stood and debated them.

Mention was made today that with regard to this omnibus bill that has everything from homosexuality to free love and firearms in it, amendments to the Criminal Code all thrown together in a hodgepodge, this institution would be holding up debate if we were to stand against it because we are opposed to homosexuality, legalized abortion, and a few others of those fancy offences under the law. Let the government divide this bill. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) said only recently that he believed it should be divided. That was before.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Since then he has become uncertain. Mr. Speaker, they say it is the opposition. Let me mention an example. If, as a member of the bar, Your Honour were going to set up a judge would you appoint anyone to try a case who had already expressed his view on the justice or the efficacy of action?

Now it is no longer parliament; it is task forces. I have a tremendous regard for the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson), who has a great business record, a great record of public service. But he is on a task force appointed by the Prime Minister, he, a former director of the C.P.R., to bring in a recommendation as to whether or not Air Canada and C.P. Airlines are to be joined together in unholy matrimony. Sir, I admire his judicial temperament because on June 10, speaking in the city of Winnipeg he said this—I do not have the quote here but I know what he said. He said he was in favour of C.P. Airlines and Air Canada being joined together as a great corporation, with the Canadian people having the right to buy shares. Will he love them in October as he did in June?

Sir, to me it is ominous that out of the declarations of a task force, with a chairman who has already expressed what he thinks, there should come recommendations to parliament as to what it should do.

I do not want to speak beyond the dinner hour. I shall summarize. This house cannot be satisfied with the kind of dilly-dally answers that it is receiving from this governement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are playing with us. The Prime Minister shrugs and smiles. The ministers look on with silent interest, and the opposition gets no information except that which is vouchsafed. More than that, and this is what I am coming to, what they will not say in the House of Commons they say outside while parliament sits.

They are reforming the information services. That is one of the promises, and in their reforms they are making declarations outside the house which should be made here in this chamber on motions, so that members of this house who wish to challenge them may have the opportunity to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are playing with parliament. It is not your puppet, it is not your plaything. When that course is followed we have a situation where ministers—I imagine they obtain permission first—rush out when they know something cannot be debated in the house and tell the country what they are thinking and what courses ought to be followed. From now on I hope there will be a declaration on the part of the minister—he has not been an offender yet; he has not had a chance—that this type of thing will end.

There are one or two other matters which I wish to mention. What about sittings? We could sit longer hours. I believe we sit for a matter of 25½ hours a week. I do not believe in sitting between the hours of six and eight o'clock in the evening. However, while we sit for 25½ hours a week, in the British House of Commons they sit for 31 hours a week. There is no reason for our sittings not being extended.

Next, I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we should have periodic adjournments. It is wonderful to get away from Ottawa, to get away from this vacuum and go out among the people to find out what they are thinking. Those members who are from Ontario and Quebec can do this from Thursday to Tuesday. We who come from other parts of Canada cannot do it.

Mr. Speaker: I must bring to the attention of the right hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has leave to proceed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you. I shall not transgress for very long.

I should like to refer to you, sir. I endeavoured to bring about for this institution a Speaker removed from the controversies of public life. I realize there are two sides to this question but I believe the idea that you should have a constituency in Ottawa, attractive as this area is, where you would sit is contrary to the position you occupy. You are the first commoner; you must be a member of the House of Commons. You would not be if you were chosen as a kind of factotum, having once become Speaker from a constituency.

This will take a long while, I believe, even with the constitutional experts getting together to bring about the making of your position permanent, but I have a suggestion to make. You are impartial and I feel one of the first steps the house should take—I hope I am not contravening in any way the rules of the house—is to provide an additional salary for Mr. Speaker over and above that of today which would be, as in the United Kingdom, free from all deductions and taxes. As well, I believe there should be an official residence for the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada. In removing yourself from the forum of debate you make a tremendous sacrifice. Therefore I hope this is one step that will appeal to hon. members.

Although I have changed my view in this regard over the years, I think we ought to let the people know what we are doing. To that end the press often condemns us for dilatoriness, inattention, lack of diligence and the like. I think of these young members who come to the house to make their maiden speeches. I try to be here to listen to them. When a new member has something to say and has worked on a speech it is most discouraging when he finds there is no reference to his speech in the press the next day. It is more; it is discomfiting. In the United Kingdom the practice is followed whereby the press reports that "A.B." spoke, with the inclusion of a line or two, and that "B.C." spoke, with the inclusion of a line or two. The importance of members who are trying to find their legislative feet in this institution would be materially increased if the press would give them mention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to see television in this chamber. As I have said, I have changed my mind in this regard over the years. I think much can be done to bring parliament to the people. I believe arrangements could be made between the house leaders whereby, as a beginning, half an hour a day would be made available for this purpose. Someone might say that the people will not watch, that they are more interested in all the horrors and other things that are shown on television. However, they would learn something of this wonderful institution.

In my last words I should like to say that we get so close together that we know each other and we know each other's weaknesses. We also learn to admire those who sit opposite who stand sincerely for principle. I have not yet had the opportunity to pay my tribute to Right Hon. L. B. Pearson. We are often pictured as two great opponents. One would almost think that we were covered with the lather of personal antagonism. As a matter of fact most people do not realize the close relationship that prevails.

These are my ideas of parliament. I hope that this committee when it meets will be sure that it does not diminish the power, the responsibility and the authority of the backbencher. Changes can be made, but those changes should not have the effect of doing what so many powerful governments, whatever their political party, have tried to do to stifle the opposition. The rules must protect primarily the rights of the opposition and above all the rights of private members in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to rise on a point of order?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I wish to adjourn the debate.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment this evening are the following: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Canadian National Railways—request for increased pensions for retired employees; the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson)—External Affairs—Nigeria—acceptance of invitation to send observer; the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner)—Indian Affairs—Armstrong, Ontario—request for action to relieve poverty.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE BILL

LONDON AND MIDLAND GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. J. G. Lind (Middlesex) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-101, respecting London and Midland General Insurance Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-101 is a bill to change the name of London and Midland General Insurance Company to Avco General Insurance Company. The sole purpose of this bill is to change the name of the company. There are two reasons for the company requiring a change of name. The company is part of the Avco group of companies; the Avco Corporation is the parent company. Last year there was in the United Kingdom a company that used "London and Midland" as the main words in its name. That company went into bankruptcy, and questions have been asked as a result. The company named in this bill received several inquiries as to whether they had any connection with the United Kingdom, London and Midland company. There is no connection between them whatsoever. That, Mr. Speaker, is one reason for requesting a change of name to Avco General Insurance Company.

• (6:00 p.m.)

I should like to point out to hon. members that the parent company is Delta Acceptance Corporation, which is the wholly owned subsidiary of Avco Delta Corporation, Delaware, U.S.A. There is one other reason for this company requesting a change of name. I believe there are in Canada ten insurance companies which use the word "London" as part of their corporate name. In an effort to achieve some form of distinctiveness, the company wishes to change its name to Avco General Insurance Company.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of questions I should like to ask in connection with this bill. The first is, how did it become numbered 101? This is the first private members bill, and I would have thought it should have been numbered 1 rather than 101. This bill was before us on a previous occasion and there has been considerable discussion about the reasons for requesting the change of name. We are happy to have a report from the sponsor of the bill.

There has also been discussion as to whether Avco now owns this company, which was originally under other ownership, and whether the whole Avco complex is part of the Delta Corporation. For this reason I believe the bill should be sent to committee where members will have an opportunity to ask questions of representatives of the company to ascertain whether or not the bill should be passed.

This bill, with a number of others, raises the fairly fundamental proposition of whether we are interested in the proliferation of insurance companies, and second whether this proliferation is in the interest of the shareholders or in the national interest in so far as the expenditure of assets in the mortgage and other lending fields is concerned.

We find in this company, as in many insurance companies which have appeared before us, a similarity in that they are concerned in exactly the same field, but with a slightly different name. Companies owned by a parent company in another country do not fall under the same restrictions as those that are Canadian owned, in that there is in effect no possibility of those Canadians who invest in the company having a say in how the corporation is run.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe an important question is whether it is to the advantage of Canada to incorporate companies such as this. The question of ownership in a foreign country, in a field as important as insurance in this country, will have to be examined. I also believe the superintendent of insurance should be questioned very carefully on his views respecting this matter.

It seems to me this is a matter in which the government should take some interest. I think it is time this whole question was decided. Bills in this form have been introduced in the past few years and we have dealt with 15 or 20 insurance companies that wished to become established, or 15 or 20 companies wanting a change of name or other changes through the parliamentary process. The government should study this question to see whether a proliferation of companies such as this is advantageous to, and in the interest of, the Canadian public.

The fact that these bills go before the private and miscellaneous bills committee does not in itself provide protection for the general public. I think the time has arrived when the government should consider this whole question. If the charges we have been making for the past four or five years with respect to the number of these companies are correct, something should be done about them. If they are incorrect, the committee will be able to ascertain the truth of the matter and arrive at a conclusion.

Many of the companies presenting bills to us in this form, requesting a simple change of name, are really seeking permission to transfer the assets of one corporation to those of another. In some cases these assets are transferred to a very large corporation that is a holding company. All this is outside the sphere of parliament.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the length of the bill and the limited amount of information contained in it are not reasons for hon. members passing the bill at this time. I, therefore, hope that the committee to which the bill is referred will consider the propositions put forward by members in the last four or five years with regard to private members' bills. I hope the committee will look carefully into an alternative method of allowing such companies to be incorporated, to change their names or to make changes in their structure. Such changes have been made through private members' bills.

[Mr. Peters.]

Hon. members may be aware that a year or two ago the committee did discuss the subject in a general way, and as a result most of those matters concerned with changes of name are no longer dealt with in the house. These changes were put into officialdom by letters patent. If the house leader is really interested in making a useful change, he should look into the question and decide how we should deal with private members' bills such as these. In my opinion some abuse has taken place in the house in the past when general changes were requested instead of the specific changes required. A much better method could be devised than the one in operation at the moment.

We know that committees will soon be set up. I hope this bill will soon be sent to the committee in order that it may examine the whole procedure of private members' bills. These bills are sponsored by private members who often have no knowledge of and no control over the matter. Private members have only the information supplied to them. They are Joe'd to do the job and often suffer abuse for no good reason. In many cases, the bill he introduces does not affect him or his riding. I believe this procedure leaves us open to abuse and a better system should be devised for handling these bills. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I hope the committee will consider this whole question in the time it has before other, similar bills appear on our order paper.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I agree wholeheartedly with the comments made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). On the face of it, this bill appears to be a change in name only, and the hon. member who introduced the bill gave valid reasons for wanting the change. However, in his remarks he noted that this company is part of a group owned by Avco, which is ultimately owned by the Delta insurance company, and this brings up the fundamental problem of the proliferation of insurance companies. I would hope that when this bill comes before the standing committee of finance, trade and economic affairs the representatives of this company will reveal to the committee members the corporate structure of Avco, will indicate its ownership, and also will indicate the investment policies of these different companies. We realize these days that one of the main problems with regard to housing is the investment policies of the insurance companies. Here we have a U.S. company which is 98 per cent controlled by U.S. residents. We would like to think they are good corporate citizens, but we would also like information from them with regard to their investment policies.

Therefore, when the bill comes before the committee, I hope that the representatives of this company will not only say they are asking for a change of name but will also reveal to us their corporate structure, their true ownership and their investment policies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in normal circumstances the next item to be discussed would be public bills. However, my understanding is that a vast majority of these bills have not yet been received from the printing bureau and may not be for a day or two. I should like to recommend that we adjourn this debate for the rest of the allotted time, on the distinct understanding that this day would not count as one of the 40 private members hours allowed.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): That is agreed, Mr. Speaker. I suppose the house would assume this to be an order to that effect.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I assume the understanding is that this hour not be counted as one of the 40 hours allotted to private members bills.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is so. If it is agreed, the sitting is suspended until 8 p.m.

At 6.15 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROCEDURAL CHANGES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale):

That a special committee of twelve members, to be named at a later date, be appointed to consider and, from time to time, to report upon the advisability of making changes in the orders concerning the business of supply, the business of ways and means, the stages of the legislative process, and the operation of the standing committees of this house; upon the advisability of making permanent, with or without amendment, any or all the several changes in the procedures of this house that were in effect prior to the dissolution of parliament on April 23, 1968; and upon the advisability of such other changes as the committee may deem suitable to promote the more expeditious dispatch of the business of the house; and

That this special committee is hereby instructed to make its reports to the house prior to December 1, 1968, and to include in its reports drafts of proposed standing orders drawn to give effect, if adopted by the house, to any change or changes that may be proposed by the committee.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I have the very great pleasure tonight of congratulating you on two counts. I congratulate you on your re-election to the office of Speaker of the House of Commons, which is a position you have earned as a result of your conduct during the last several sessions. I also congratulate you on the second count, one of which few may be aware, and certainly one that very few mention. It will be recalled that during the past six years I have made several comments about the situation in which the page boys find themselves. On occasion I have condemned this institution for assisting these young lads to become drop-outs from school. In the past I have made representations to at least three other Speakers, and finally to you, Mr. Speaker.

It is to your credit, sir, that you have taken cognizance of the situation, and I should like to point out to hon. members that there is a different arrangement now in respect of page boys. I understand they are over 16 years of age and are not drop-outs from school. It is to your credit, sir, that something has been done about this situation, and I should like to congratulate you on this action. It indicates a feeling on your part for even the smallest group, and I know that you will continue to show an interest in these young lads. This will result in their being able to go on to even greater things in the House of Commons.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) has placed several propositions before this house and I should first like to comment on the reforms as set out by him. The right hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), has reminded us that this house has no other purpose than to protect and preserve freedom. I agree that this is one of the main functions of this house. There is another function that the public expects us to perform, and that is to get things done.

The minister gave the members a brief history of parliament, but I suggest he did not go far enough. Parliament, in essence, originated as a group of commoners called together to express their grievances. Originally the Crown chose its ministers and its governors, and when taxes were required parliament was called. Each member came to express the grievances of the residents of particular parts of the United Kingdom. They would suggest that things were wrong in their constituencies or localities. One such gentleman probably suggested that the Sheriff of Nottingham was a very bad fellow.

After expressing their grievances these representatives voted the requested money and went home. To this day there has been little change, except the ministers are not appointed now by the Crown but by the Prime Minister. In fact, this house still has that main function of expressing grievances. There is little communication between the backbenchers on either side of the house with those who occupy the seats of the mighty. This is an acknowledged fact.

I have my doubts as to the mightiness of those who sit in these seats, except those who sit as politicians. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in a recent speech felt it necessary to warn his ministers that he expects them to set policy from now on rather than the administrators. Anything we can do to bring more power to the backbenchers on both sides of this house will be of benefit to parliament.

The right hon. gentleman cannot argue that originally there were two parties in the House of Commons. Originally, all the members of the commons opposed the Crown. It was not until recently that the party system evolved. The right hon. gentlemen opposite and backbenchers come here and have a field day and, with the exception of the odd individual on this side, there seems to be very little purpose in their being here.

An hon. Member: Do you want to leave and join us?

Mr. Otto: It is not surprising that Canadians as a whole have lost a great deal of respect for parliament and members of this house. We now have the opportunity of doing something about this. The parliamentary system is really not suited to an economy which changes as quickly as the Canadian economy has changed during the past 20 or 30 years. This is a wonderful institution which would probably work well in a static or agrarian economy. It has worked in the United Kingdom, but it is not even working very well there today. When you have an economy such as ours, which changes from a static position to a very fast-moving position, messages from constituents have to be conveyed to the government immediately. One cannot afford to wait very long for the administrators to decide that an idea proposed on behalf of a constituent is a good one. The people expect us to do things, yet we have to inform them that we have no power.

On several occasions the minister mentioned Westminster. I hope he was not suggesting that we should follow or ape the actions of those at Westminster. Many of the reforms in the House of Commons in England have been good, and I think we should consider them, but this is not England. We are faced with areas with problems that are vastly different from those in existence there. We have a different economy and different requirements. Indeed, I have no hesitation in saying that Canada is much more suited to a republican system than a parliamentary system. I hold no brief for the republican system, but elements of republicanism could be worked into a parliamentary system.

I think there is an advantage in not having as much control over the money as we have under our system. That is the case in a republican system.

Let me explain what I hope will happen to our committees as a result of the proposed changes. Specifically, let me refer to what the minister has said about the referral of estimates to these committees. Before I do so let me suggest that there is a presumption that all new members come here to learn a new trade or new profession. This is not to say, Mr. Speaker, that we were sent to parliament by our constituents because we were the most able people in the riding. The backbenchers were not sent here to learn some new business for their own self-aggrandizement or promotion.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: But if they pick up a little knowledge while they are here, no one will hold it against them.

Mr. Otto: I would say that most backbenchers have quite a bit of knowledge. Indeed, some of us who have been here for six years, all fired up with new ideas when we came, have lost sight of the trees because of the branches. After a while you get confused. In fact, Mr. Speaker, new members are told to settle down, that they will learn about parliament in five or six years. I say they are better members now than they will be six years from now.

Under the old committee system, Mr. Speaker, a member could work very hard. He could research and he could question. But by and large, committee reports came back to the house, were filed or tabled, and no one saw them again. After five or six years, sometimes sooner, members would wonder why they had done all that work. You might as well have been playing tic-tac-toe.

As the minister explained, the administration, through the minister, finds out how much money is needed for each department for the following year. These estimates then come to the house in the blue book, and during consideration of estimates you can argue about anything so long as it has some relationship to a particular item. I remember the former member for Port Arthur used to stand up and move the reduction of an item in the estimates from, say, $75 million or $100 million to $1, and this constituted a vote of confidence.

The administration in those days, Mr. Speaker, had an absolutely free hand. They were never questioned. Nobody ever wondered what item 7, say, was all about, or where some $47,000 was going, because he didn't have time. Besides, it did not matter because you either voted for $1 or for $75 million or $100 million.

If the minister said what I thought he said, Mr. Speaker, that from now on the estimates of each department will go to a parliamentary committee, then this means that we backbenchers will have a lot of time to examine and to question the administration. If backbenchers feel that something is not quite right with a certain department, then they can make things rather miserable for the administrator. Indeed, there will be nothing particularly wrong, if you feel sufficiently strongly about a matter, to move a reduction in the amount of the estimates.

This might be one of the recommendations in the report, and I am sure that the backbenchers who sit on my side of the house will find lots of help from hon. members opposite. If a member feels that his constituents want him to do so, in the report he can recommend a reduction in the amount of the estimates concerned and the minister will consequently be embarrassed. When the report is presented to the house the question can be raised again. There is at least some indication that there is objection to some aspect of the administration and that you have been able to voice that objection.

Believe me, Mr. Speaker, I feel that from now on the power of the backbencher and the power of this House of Commons is going to be greater, not less. I believe most members will act responsibly. I am sure there will come a time when members, even on the government side, will not agree with a particular item of the estimates of a department and they will have the right to make their objections known. This will not constitute a vote of confidence. Hon. members will not be expected to vote the government down, thereby throwing us into another election campaign.

What I have said, Mr. Speaker, may be regarded as what I call a caricature of government. I am sure the right hon. gentleman and other hon. members opposite, as well as those on this side who have been ministers will agree that it is a caricature. But by and large, Mr. Speaker, it is a fairly composite picture. Ideas and policy decisions do not necessarily stem from the ministers because they are busy politicians. However, as Professor Porter pointed out, we do have a very large establishment in Ottawa composed of people of great consequence, the elite with family histories going back two or three hundred years and who all belong to the right clubs.

Occasionally, these people get the message across that it would be a good idea if the government instituted a certain measure. The department and deputy minister concerned immediately think it is a wonderful idea. The next thing you know, a resolution appears, followed by a bill which is practically word for word what is wanted. The minister and cabinet go over it, but the first time we see the bill is when it appears on the order paper.

Then, consider the administrator or deputy minister who wants $600 million for his department. He says to himself that he may have an emergency during the coming year so had better put in for $670 million. However, treasury board will cut that by 15 per cent so he adds on 15 per cent, though I doubt whether in the end the money is reduced. If the department has not spent that money near the end of the fiscal year, then they had better spend it quickly or they will not get any more.

At what stage, Mr. Speaker, do we as parliamentarians enter the picture during the passage of a bill? I heartily endorse the minister's stand because I think it will give backbenchers and all members of parliament an opportunity to question, argue with and talk to the administration. The administration will listen to all your complaints and do things for you, which I think is all to the good. I know, and I am sure the Prime Minister knows, that each minister will trust that all of us on this side will support the government, unless there is some matter of serious consequence. In that case, the minister will realize that something does displease certain constituents and there will be quick communication.

The Prime Minister has said that there must be communication from all Canadians. At the moment it is a one-way street; the government can communicate with the public, but it is very difficult to get any communication from the public to the government. As a result, Mr. Speaker, we have task forces. The president of the Liberal federation comes up with a very good idea in an attempt to involve the people. There is no better way to involve the people than through members of parliament; after all, that is what we are here for. But there is no sense in being involved and making representations if one knows one will not be listened to or that no one will care. However, if you control the purse then people will care.

I am heartily in favour of amendment of the rules. I hope this resolution is approved by everyone in the house. I do not think it will diminish the power of the opposition, the power of the backbencher or even the power of the front bench. It will enhance our prestige, our power and make us aware of our responsibilities.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I had little difficulty in deciding to participate in this debate, because it is a well known fact that, besides being interested in the examination of the rules, I have followed their development very closely.

As I was, six years ago, discharging the duties that that you are now so honourably and brilliantly performing, and because of my experience as a member of several committees on house procedure, I would like at this time to record certain remarks in Hansard.

[English]

First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I say I listened with some degree of amusement yesterday to two rather—if the hon. gentlemen will forgive me for using the term—intemperate speeches wherein the house was castigated for having wasted time up to now. These members indicated that they thought the throne speech was irrelevant. Over the years, I have heard a few of those speeches and all I can say is that members who delivered that type of speech were distinguished by one characteristic; they were one timers who seemed to work their frustrations out to the point where they missed being elected the next time around. I think when some hon. members have a little more experience they will concede that some of their remarks were better left unsaid.

• (8:20 p.m.)

The question of the reform of parliament and the rules of parliament has been bothering people for some time. Their zeal for reform is like a spring cold that turns into year round sniffles. I suppose that when editorial writers are short of copy they can always write something about the reform of parliament. It seems to be a popular subject on the hustings during election campaigns. I heard some candidates who knew not where the front door of this place was say that parliament had to be reformed and that they would come down here, cut a wide swath through the thicket, and this house would soon be in order.

Well, it seems to me that the greatest noise about the reform of parliament and its procedures is made by those who have little or no knowledge of what happens here and how it happens. In any event, we have heard a great deal about the reform of parliament. Some changes have been made over the years. There has been an evolution.

May I point out to hon. members, and this has been pointed out by the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and others, that every time there has been a major change in the rules it has been at the expense of the membership of the house and in favour of the executive. This so called passion for efficiency has always been exercised at the expense of this institution. Parliament is not a board of directors. It is not an administrative body, nor is it merely a rubberstamp for the omniscience that has suddenly descended on 20 or 25 men who are aided by administrators.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): As the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) has indicated, regardless of the number of members supporting the administration the backbencher on the government side has about "zot" to say about policy and the formulation of statutes. He sees what is contained in a bill after the bill has been printed. That is how he learns what is in a government bill.

There has been agitation, and we hope it will meet with success for private members to become involved in legislation at an earlier stage than the stage of, shall we say, getting into the brambles and clearing out the brambles in the clause by clause study in the committee stage after second reading.

There are some comments I wish to make about the general subject of legislation. This afternoon I heard the views of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). I think, myself, that the provisional rule with regard to the resolution stage being limited to about a five hour debate is commendable. That rule has worked out reasonably well. It may need a somewhat longer trial, but I think it will work. With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I think we should be better off during any debate on any resolution stage if those who prepare the speeches or statements of the minister adhered to the rule of relevancy. For instance, if we are to deal with some measure of social significance we do not need to hear the record of the past generation regarding the performance of the administration in the field of social welfare. If that is put on the record everybody else is entitled to comment; the debate becomes wide open, and that is quite wrong. Our first reform might be to prevent discussion on a bill from becoming irrelevant. Mind you, where that has happened it has not necessarily been through any fault of the Chair.

If hon. members turn to page 562 of Hansard for 1962, they will see that on that occasion I spoke at some length about the question period and the role of the Speaker in the enforcement of rules in the house. One can see that the responsibility for upholding the rules rests as much on the members of the house as on the Chair. We may compare our rules to the rules governing any football or hockey game. Not only must the officials overseeing the game know and observe the rules, but the players must also know and observe the rules; otherwise, the game becomes a shambles. Similarly, the proceedings in this house could become a shambles.

With regard to first reading, there is a suggestion to send a bill, after we have first seen it, to a committee, unless the house decides otherwise. There are many minor bills which it would be nonsense to send to committee. In these instances, the house could agree not to send them to committee. We could then go from first reading or to second reading without sending the bill to committee.

It seems to me that in this matter we could adopt the practice, not of the British parliament, but of European parliaments where legislation after being printed goes to an appropriate committee. The committee could then work out any amendments it wished. Committee members are free to move amendments to legislation without being committed a fortiori by their vote. It is nonsense for government members to suggest a worthwhile amendment to a bill which is in some sense contrary to a proposal of the government if they are already committed by a vote on second reading in favour of the bill. In that case the government members would stand up and say, "Aye" all the way along.

I suggest, therefore, that it is of greater advantage to permit committee members to be free to make such amendments as they wish to make, with the proviso that when the bill is reported back the government has the right to accept or reject any amendments. If the bill has been thoroughly gutted in committee the government can say, "Vote on the report of the committee, and the vote shall be one of confidence." This is a point where I think the government ought to have an option of asking for confidence.

I put that suggestion forward for the consideration of hon. members. If it were adopted it seems to me that we should eliminate much repetitious debate on second reading, since the second reading debate would take place on the reporting back of the bill. The bill would be debated on principle of the acceptance of the report and the clauses to be considered in detail, and off it would go. It seems to me that that would give a much better chance for a working committee dealing with the legislative side to do its work.

I could not possibly cover all I want to say this evening. I could spend half an hour alone on the subject of the question period, which I will not leave entirely alone since I must say this: I have noticed that whenever a maximum time was fixed for any question period or period for debate in this house, that has immediately become a minimum time. In the past, with direction from the Chair and cooperation from members, the question period was often cut down to 10, 15 or 20 minutes. Perhaps with the shortening of questions and a greater use of the order paper the question period could again be shortened.

Hon. members who have been here for some time know that when I was speaker there was a concerted drive to put questions on the order paper, and it was relatively successful under the circumstances. We finished up with a question period lasting less than half an hour.

Mr. Peters: You became obnoxious as hell.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There was a job to be done. If the hon. member feels he can review the procedures of the house and bring them more in line with the needs of his digestion, that is his privilege. I was satisfied with the rules.

Mr. Peters: You made the rules.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): By agreement there has been a suspension of Standing Order 15A, one of the most pernicious rules we had. Thank goodness, it is in suspension. It actually was some sort of half-hearted borrowing of an idea from the business committee of the British parliament. If one wants to see the mess the British committee system is in and the sort of practice that became prevalent at Westminster, one need only read British Hansard for May 23, 1965, a celebrated occasion when Dame Irene Ward, a senior and delightful member of the British house, was suspended for five days because she protested so vehemently that Mr. Speaker had to eject her. Why? Because she objected to the finance bill which was the subject of an order by the business committee. The schedule set was a fantastic one. I can say from personal experience that back in 1948 when the House of Commons was considering the nationalization of steel, the nationalization of transport, the national health bill and a number of other major bills under the Labour government, scores and scores of important clauses were never touched under the rigid time-table set out by the business committee. This despite the fact that the government itself had amendments to introduce to a number of these clauses. Last May the same thing happened again in connection with the transport bill. The measures then have to go to the House of Lords; that body is overloaded with the amendments, some of which are accepted and others refused. Then the bill has to go back to the commons for consultation and the working out of an agreed version as between the two chambers. This is an unwieldy process, yet it is supposed to be the epitome of efficiency. Why? Because there is a time-table for the benefit of the cabinet. I have talked with any number of members on both sides who are beside themselves with sheer frustration at being unable to speak at any time on such important bills.

• (8:30 p.m.)

When, for instance, the British white paper on defence was up for discussion last year it was my recollection, subject to correction, that in the time allocated prior to the closing of the house at 10.30 fewer than 12 members out of 600 were able to speak on such an important subject as defence policy. Not only Conservative members but Labour members were indignant because they could not speak even for one minute. The minister of defence took an hour himself to open the discussion, and seized a good deal of time at the end to close the debate. I would therefore caution hon. members against the idea that our problems with the rules will be cured by the establishment of a business committee and the allocation of time through a cut and dried schedule. We are only heading for more trouble that way.

One of the things I might suggest is that speeches, apart from those made by a minister who is proposing legislation or by someone who is following a text closely for the purpose, say, of adducing statistics, should not be read. After all, members were elected to the House of Commons and they did not gain the backing of the voters by standing before them and reading a prepared text.

Mr. Baldwin: There was a fair amount of kissing.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Oh, they may have gained election by other means, I grant you, but as far as proceedings in this house are concerned I suggest that speeches would be shorter and certainly not quite as boring if they were not presented from the top of a pile of Hansards.

As far as committees are concerned, I do not think we ought to advocate a great proliferation of them. I am an ardent supporter of the idea that more work should be done by committees, but a word of caution has to be uttered. First, we must recognize that the work load imposed on the membership of committees is a very real one and, second, we must keep in mind the limitation of staff. Committees require trained staff on the stenographic side and the translation side, and until we recruit these people in greater numbers there is nothing we can do.

May I draw attention to an item which appeared in the Times of London in connection with the expulsion of Dame Irene Ward? This is an extract taken from the Canadian Bar Journal of August, 1968. I read as follows:

When Dame Irene Ward clashed with the Speaker and was suspended from the House, she dramatically brought to public attention the plight of members which had been expressed by the parliamentary correspondent of The Times thus:

"The Palace of Westminster was seething with unrest today, with M.P.'s chasing around like angry ants that have suddenly had their comfortable hill broken open and scattered. Anguish and frustration knew no bounds as 15 committees considering bills and other matters competed with the debate on the floor of the House on the transport bill, which began the second day of its three day marathon at 10 a.m.

Every time there was a division on the transport bill, proceedings in committees had to be halted so that members could rush to the division lobbies. M.P.'s ancient and modern were being hauled up and down stairs like a regiment of protesting yo-yos. Committee after committee fumed and fussed under the pressure."

Lord Dalkeith, (Conservative M.P., North Edinburgh) was caught on the timing of events when he discovered he could not cover 2 committees and his duties in the House and as a result missed a division on the Social Work (Scotland) bill. He had banged and thumped on the door to the committee room but it was locked for the discussion. His entry, after the vote was counted, was greeted by laughter and cheers but he was furious in his protests.

The whole House runs the risk of being worked to a breakdown as the machine tries to digest the number of bills being considered. One day there were three committees in the morning and five in the afternoon and the House in session. Dame Irene Ward (Conservative M.P., Tynemouth) wrote to The Times and warned that the sending of important legislation to committee and the chaotic conditions caused by so many committees was starting Britain "on the road to a Social dictatorship". She said in the letter: "The British public should examine with great care the parliamentary happenings of today".

Mr. Speaker, this, in essence, is the justification for the warning I give with regard to thinking that mere reform of rules in whatever fashion hon. members in their wisdom may see fit will necessarily be the cure-all for all that happens here.

There is another sector to which I wish to advert, and that is the private members' hour. I think this house owes a responsibility to proposers of this legislation, and somehow or other we must find a way by which legitimate debate can take place on the bills put forward. These bills should not be used as footballs. They should not be subjected to stalling tactics. This house collectively should not treat petitioners for very worthwhile incorporations rather contemptuously, as though what they were doing mattered naught to the house and that we could put them aside. Responsibility also lies on the government which all too often comes to this house and says, "Could we postpone private members' hour so that we can get on with government business?" If within our statutes and rules we provide for these private bills, then to my mind there is a responsibility for us to deal with them. I hope the committee will be able to come up with an answer that will meet a little better the objectives of both sides.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that there are other hon. members who want to make observations on this matter. I endorse a good deal of what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said in reply to the address by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). I hope that with some good will, and I trust patient understanding by those observers who seem to know the prescriptions for the ills of this house but who seldom face up to the responsibility of trying to become members of it, or essay out into the trials and tribulations of a political career, we will be able to get on with the business rather than spend all our time introspectively contemplating our navels.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the resolution, but since this is my first opportunity to speak on the floor of this house I would like at the outset to say a few words of tribute to my very distinguished predecessor. I have the honour to represent the new riding of Windsor-Walkerville, which is the successor riding of the old constituency of Essex East. That electoral district will be linked for all time with the name of the member who represented it from 1935 until April of this year. He was successively Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour, Secretary of State, Minister of Health and Welfare and, after a period in vigorous opposition, Secretary of State for External Affairs. He is now Government Leader in the other chamber. By common acknowledgement, he is one of the great parliamentarians in Canada's political history, and it is fitting that the name of the riding which he so magnificently represented for 33 years should be retired from this house with him. It is both a privilege and a challenge to succeed so great a Canadian, and it is a source of special satisfaction that he has assumed the designation in the other chamber of the Senator from Windsor-Walkerville.

On another occasion, Mr. Speaker, I hope to speak about my riding and its concerns, unemployment, insufficient housing, poverty and pollution. However, tonight I must confine myself to the resolution at hand. Legislatures, as institutions of representative government, are today confronted with the most serious intellectual challenge they have ever faced. The seriousness of the challenge results from the fact that it arises from within democratic theory rather than as previously from outside, from totalitarian or absolutist dogmas which of their very nature were challenges of force, not intellect. The internal challenge is that raised by the proponents of what is called participatory democracy.

There are many aspects of the movement of participatory democracy that we all applaud. To the extent that it means the active interest of all citizens in matters political and a very full participation by them in political parties and movements, with a corresponding openness of the political process to popular participation, it is only the perfection of the present system of representative government.

This may indeed be all that it means to many of its adherents. But to its theoreticians it means the abolition of representative government as insufficiently responsive to the needs of the people, especially to those of the dispossessed, and its replacement by a system of direct democracy in which every decision is made collectively by the whole population. Perhaps in a technologically more advanced age in which information and opinion on every issue could be conveyed directly and instantaneously to each citizen, with an equally direct and instantaneous return by the citizen to a central source, a non-representational democracy would be feasible. But in the meantime it would be tantamount either to mob rule or to an oligarchy.

Often, however, an evil is merely the exaggeration of a good, and the development of a fallacious theory may serve the purpose of calling our attention to inadequacies in our present practice. Hopefully, the movement toward participatory democracy will direct our minds towards the achievement of more democratic representational government, characterized by greater openness and by more opportunities for meaningful participation in decision making. In my opinion, such democratization is needed in our governmental operations and, I might add, in all our political parties.

I would therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the primary principle of parliamentary reform should be the principle of democracy, by which I mean in this context an opportunity for more meaningful and more widespread participation in law making. I believe that this principle would have as its consequence more adequate law making; I do not mean more efficient since efficiency could be taken to mean merely the quantity of achievement in a given time whereas what I have in mind is a more qualitative test of effective operation. More adequate law making means the creation of legislation which is more attuned to the social problems of the day, which will be better received by the public, and which will be of more lasting benefit to the country.

From this starting point, it would appear that the thrust of parliamentary reform should be directed in considerable part toward the creation of a system of permanent standing committees, with greatly expanded powers, as the most effective means of increasing participation in law making. At first glance the referring of legislation from the whole house to a committee of, say, 20 members may not appear to increase participation, at least quantitatively. But in truth it would not only expand participation qualitatively, by allowing for a much fuller participation in law making by the committee members than would be possible for any members of parliament in the committee of the whole, but it would achieve this gain without diminishing the rights of any other members of this house to participate in plenary session. Moreover, while the principal benefit with respect to the operation of any particular committee would be qualitative, the total picture of the operation of the committee system would show an immense overall quantitative gain by the collectivity of members in real law making.

I would therefore, Mr. Speaker, express the following hopes with respect to the committee's recommendations:

1. That it would recommend a system of permanent standing committees which would operate for the complete life of a parliament. Normally, the same members would be members of these committees from session to session, and the committees would have power to sit while parliament was not in session and, indeed, might use that time extensively.

2. That each standing committee would have a permanent jurisdiction over a particular class of legislation. All bills and resolutions would be referred to the standing committee having jurisdiction over the predominant subject matter. If the jurisdiction of the various committees were defined sufficiently precisely, the decision on allocation would normally be a routine one, although occasionally a jurisdictional decision might have to be made by the house.

3. That while a standing committee would remain a creature of the house and would be bound to deal with matters referred to it by the house, it would also have independent power to investigate matters falling within its jurisdiction, subject of course to approval by the house of its operating budget. I would be inclined to the view that every standing committee should have a minimum annual budget, with supplementary appropriations made at the house's discretion for special assignments.

4. That a permanent staff of experts, translators and secretaries would be assigned to each standing committee. On the premise of a stable division of legislative responsibility among committees, the staff could usefully operate on a year round basis.

5. That bills should be referred to standing committees after first reading in the house. This procedure would give the committees the maximum opportunity to participate collectively in law making, and at the same time would provide the government, which up to that time would have had the advice of only a small circle of experts, with the maximum advantages of committee scrutiny.

• (8:50 p.m.)

It will be obvious, Mr. Speaker, that what I am recommending for the consideration of the special committee is in large measure the structure of the United States congressional committee system. I would hasten to add, however, that we should avoid the great disadvantages of the United States system—the seniority rule for the selection of committee chairmen and members and the power of chairmen or committees to bottle up legislation which they do not like for indefinite periods of time. But I see no danger of such an undue emphasis on committee autonomy in our system. The danger I see is rather that insufficient use might be made of the great talents of the members of all parties in this house, talents which caused them to be selected by the voters of Canada to serve in this august assembly. To the exent that our Canadian democracy is inadequate, let us begin the process of perfecting it with parliamentary reform based on the principle of democracy.

A further advantage of the committee system I have recommended is that it could perform much of the work assigned in recent years to royal commissions, departmental committees and government task forces. Of course, a place will always remain for such ad hoc bodies to study highly technical matters or perhaps occasionally for matters of considerable political sensitivity. But much of the work that has been done by commissions could have been done just as well by legislative committees. Such a change would eliminate much of the action gap that has occurred between recommendation and legislation, both because the legislative proposals that would be forthcoming would be more politically realistic and because being already under parliamentary consideration they would be somewhat closer to realization. The result would be more adequate law making.

Perhaps as a newly elected member I ought not to have aired my views on parliamentary reform until I had acquired more seasoning in this house. But the times are urgent, and the necessity for parliamentary reform is more urgent still. I, therefore, have presumed to tread disrespectfully upon the hallowed ground of precedent in the cause of reform. I dare to hope that my impetuosity may be regarded in a spirit of charity, even though my proposals must be weighed on the scales of justice.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, because these are my first words of debate in this parliament I should like to incorporate all the nice words that have been said about you into my comments tonight. I know that in the future you will be just as fair and impartial as you have been in the past.

I shall not take very long tonight. However, I should like to speak in a practical vein. Through the medium of communications, newspapers, T.V. and radio, there has been a growing demand that parliament must be reformed. I do not think that any one of us would deny that there is some need for reform. We must remember, however, that the rules of parliament, the same as the rules in any other institution, are the tools with which we work. They are simple tools and I believe we must be careful that we do not allow ourselves to be worried too much when we are engaging in this kind of reform by the demands for reform by the press.

At the outset, I wish to say to the minister who moved the resolution that at least he has spelled out some of his thoughts. Politics today has generally caught the imagination. It has become the Madison Avenue instrument today. Men and parties are sold like packaged breakfast food and stainless steel blue blades. So, when we consider reform of the tools of this house we must analyse them very carefully to be sure that we are not brainwashed by the demand for reform in certain places. Otherwise, we might end up curing the evil with worse.

We must remember at the outset that the committee will be like all standing committees of the House of Commons. The committee will be controlled by a majority of government members. I should like to mention my experience so far as committee work of this parliament is concerned. Whether it is a Conservative government or a Liberal government, all committees are controlled by the government. With the exception of the public accounts committee the chairmen of committees generally are appointed from the government side. No doubt we will have the same situation in respect of this committee. The chairmen of the committees know full well what the government wants, and in this case the chairman will know the reforms for which the government is looking.

As one speaker said this afternoon, so far as these instruments and tools are concerned, although they may be of great advantage to the government majority they may be a disadvantage to the opposition. A committee is controlled by the government. The chairman is a member of the government. The government has a majority of the members on a committee. My experience is that witnesses appear before committees, are examined and then a report is prepared. Perhaps I am a little harsh in this regard, but my experience again is that because of the weight of the hon. members on the committee who are controlled by the government, whether it be a Conservative or a Liberal government, that report generally is shaped by the committee chairman and the majority on the committee according to government thinking. Therefore, I do not think we should attend this committee, where we will be outnumbered, in the belief that we will get our ideas across when we point out some of the disadvantages of the suggestions. It might well be that this committee will be operating somewhat in a vacuum.

I should like to use as an illustration the problems in respect of the national parks of Canada. Leases and lands were being expropriated from the citizens of Jasper and Banff without notice or compensation. So, after pressure from the opposition the government decided to send a committee to that area. I mention this in order to show the weakness of the committee system. If the minister in question or the government can show me how we can reform the committee system, then I will have more faith in it and will have more faith in the ability of the standing committees of the house to examine carefully and properly the estimates of the government. In respect of Banff and Jasper, the committee members went to these parks where briefs were presented. I was told by one of the officials when a certain question came up, that we should be careful of what we say because the government did not like this idea.

In short, the committee was a sham. I do not think any other committees are much better. The committees are no better than some of the administrative boards before which lawyers appear with clients, only to find that a decision has been made before the board is called to order. I want an impartial committee. I want an impartial chairman of the committee. Then, I will have faith that we can go to the committee meetings and come out with a reasonable report which, to some extent, will represent the opinion of the members of the House of Commons rather than merely the opinion of those on the government side of the house. This particular committee to which I refer which visited the national parks was just a kangaroo court, and it came up with a kangaroo decision. It did not solve the problem because the same problem exists today. The people are no more satisfied than they were before.

I think this is where we must start. There are two points. We must place the matter before a committee. Then, we must know whether that committee will be a responsible committee or whether the ideas of the government will be thrust upon it. If that is the case, then it is really going to be just a sham committee. If the estimates are to be more carefully considered by the various standing committees, I suggest that the committees themselves should be so constituted that they will express the viewpoint of the members of the House of Commons and not the viewpoint of one party which constitutes the majority on that committee.

• (9:00 p.m.)

That has been my experience in respect of committees, whether it was the committee on resources, the committee on national parks, the committee on legal affairs, or justice, or whatever committee it was. If we take away the right to debate the estimates, and set a time limit, let us put the estimates before an independent committee which can do the job as well as we would do it in this chamber.

There is a dangerous aspect to this proposal which I think the committee should consider. I believe everyone wants a time limit on debate and a time limit on our discussion of the estimates, but will this work when we have 29 departments and only 30 days in which to discuss the estimates? I would also point out that the government is very sensitive with regard to certain things. For example, last year our negotiating team in respect of the international wheat agreement failed to reach Geneva on time so they could set a floor price on wheat and guarantee markets to Canada, which markets had been lost because there was a surplus in the United States. We lost some of our traditional markets. We could not debate the question because the government held the matter over to the last hour of our sitting. They can do this so easily. All they have to do is call upon the backbenchers to do the talking on estimates which are not in issue, delay a matter until the last hour and then billions of dollars worth of estimates go through with no debate. This is what happens when the government finds itself in difficulty.

If this is the kind of reform the committee we are setting up tonight has in mind, and if that is the kind of reform the minister has in mind—

An hon. Member: He has.

Mr. Woolliams: —then I say to him, "You are curing the evil with something worse." This kind of reform will not improve the situation that exists today. It will feather the minister's bed for the moment, but tomorrow he may be in opposition and the rules and guillotine he is creating will be the things by which he has to live. When the executive are allowed to go around this country without being constructively criticized, you have a one-party state and you get dictatorship. That is the result of such a situation. That is why the committee must study this question very carefully. I am referring to the functioning of our standing committees and the time limitation on the discussion of estimates. These things may sound wonderful and idealistic, but in practice they may have the effect of gagging the opposition so they cannot perform the functions and responsibilities which this institution demands.

I believe this is the most important question facing our committees today. If the rule changes have the effect that I have described, there will be a fenestration of the wall of freedom. It is just like building a wall and then building a window so you can get through the wall. I would point out that this is all to be done under the guise of reform. It is to be done because this concept is popular today. As I have said, Madison Avenue sells the packaged foods; Madison Avenue sells the man, Madison Avenue sells the political image for parties and governments. Then, of course, Madison Avenue, through the advertisers, commentators and news media builds up public opinion, and public opinion in Canada says that parliament must be reformed. But if the public realizes and appreciates that the reform may in fact amount to gagging the opposition because of a limitation on the discussion of estimates, I say again that the minister will be trying to cure the evil with something worse.

As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said today, there seems to be growing in this new government a vacuum of secrecy. We asked two questions today with reference to the security of the state. We were told we could not be given the answers. But most of us have these facts. We know that when someone is fired from the civil service that person must be at least under a cloud of suspicion. If there is not a cloud of suspicion, he should get his job back. What would have been wrong in the government naming that person today? Why hide the facts?

I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) whether he and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) would make a statement with regard to the export of grain and future commitments in this respect. We asked that such a statement be made in order to give confidence to the grain trade and the country in general, because the grain trade is important to the whole economy of Canada. The other day the Minister of Agriculture said, "That is going to be done."

When I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce the question today, he said, "I do not know whether we can do that." There are two contradictions. If we are to have a proper parliament, the opposition must have the facts. Another illustration of this situation is the fact that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has received briefs from the attorneys general of the provinces with reference to the amendments to the Criminal Code. Surely, there is nothing wrong with tabling those briefs if you receive the consent of the attorneys general. They will certainly give that consent. This information is necessary so that the opposition is armed with the same facts and knowledge as the government. Only in this way can the opposition intelligently and responsibly debate this subject when it comes before the house. Provided these safeguards are made, and provided the committee is independent, I am all for reform.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion that has taken place today. The discussion appears not to be a continuation of what was said last year and perhaps even the year before, when we had a minority government and there was a great need for co-operation on both sides of the house. Rather, there has been a return to firm positions that were held somewhere around 1962 when the provisional rules were introduced and which have been in operation off and on ever since.

When the government house leader made his presentation today it was quite obvious that he had the details all worked out and was ready to put them into effect. The debate was a necessity, as many debates are, only because under today's rules we have this type of debate. But the details were already spelled out, and ready to be put into effect.

I have always been very impressed with the house leader of the official opposition, but today I found him not to be progressive in any way, shape or form in his approach to the rules. He has gone back to an ultra-Conservative view that he has not held for a considerable length of time. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what the exercise is really all about.

It is true that in the last election the general public had something to say about this matter. I was very interested in three of the statements the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made during the election campaign. All of them concerned problems that apparently could be solved almost with a sweep of the hand. One was that we recognize Red China; second that we get out of NATO; and, third that we reform parliament. I think most of the country agreed with these three proposals. I am sure the Prime Minister himself agreed with them and was not just talking through his hat. These were very sensible things to do, until he was in a position where he was able to do them. Then, it did not become so simple; other factors entered into the problem.

With regard to the recognition of Red China, I am sure there were people in other parts of the country who were not so sure this was a good idea. I think probably even Red China may not want to be recognized. When it came to withdrawing from NATO, a situation arose which was obviously not considered at the time the statement was made. However, it is difficult to foresee all the implications. I am sure that the same is true of the proposal to change the rules. It sounded a very easy thing to do during the election. I am sure that all the backbenchers in every part of the house agree with the Prime Minister that we should change the rules to make this a much better place in which to operate and in which to serve the needs of the people of Canada. The difficulty arises when it comes to actually getting down to changing these rules. It is not that we do not want to do something about changing them, but the difficulty is how to change them.

Obviously the rules of parliament were developed over many years by trial and error. This goes back further than my own knowledge of history. However, the development of procedures has taken place under the democratic system which has provided great freedom for the individual and at the same time provided some form of protection to society. I was intrigued by the argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he said that Mackenzie King, our former prime minister, had decided to allow the throne speech debate to run for 30 days or more during which time he could get on with the business of parliament. I am not sure that I would be opposed to that. I think that a certain number of points would be made by the backbenchers concerning their own constituencies which would give to everyone a better understanding of some of the problems of the day. The issues which were raised by the press could be repeated in the house, and this would be similar to a continuation of the question period conducted throughout the whole day.

However, if an emergency arose, the democratic process could take over and the machinery would still be available to take care of the emergency. I am dubious when we refer to the committee system in the United States which is often mentioned in the house by hon. members whose constituencies lie close to the United States border. There may be some arguments in favour of the system there, but it seems to me we must be very careful in following a system which would prevent us from dealing with emergencies as they arise. Lloyd George and Winston Churchill were mentioned today as statesmen whose contributions were not recognized until the need for them arose. The democratic process has allowed this, and in time of wars or calamities has provided the nation with leadership while preserving the rights of the individual.

I am not suggesting that the rules should not be changed, but I am still a backbencher at heart and will always remain one. Fundamentally, I believe that the rights of the individual are more important than some of our other collective rights. So, I think that if we eliminate the rules which allow the backbencher to have his say when he feels strongly enough on a subject, parliament will become poorer. This is what may happen if we structure the committee system in accordance with that followed by the United States congress. I do not believe this can happen in our parliamentary system. We would have to change to a republican form of government before being able to follow the congressional system. Perhaps there are some who might be prepared to support such a change, but at the moment the house is not faced with this proposition.

There are a number of things which the government should do if they really wish to reform parliament and about which they should inform the house, particularly the new members who are not really aware of what these changes may entail. I am sure many of us will be here for some time without really understanding all the rules. However, if the government is to be fair, it should not present parliament with a fait accompli and then say the majority would accomplish this anyway following a long debate. The government should be prepared to outline how far it intends to go in the changes which it proposes.

One of the things which has to be done I think is for the committee to consider the possibility of a four year term for the government. I have been here 11 years during which time we fought six elections. At least three of these elections were called because the Prime Minister decided it was to his personal advantage to call an election. In my opinion, in three of these instances he did not consider the interests of the country nor did he consider the members of his party or the opposition. He certainly did not consider the good of the country. I found during the last election that the people in the country were fed up with elections; they have had too many of them. They would like to see members get busy and at least do three years of work before contemplating another election. So, I believe that one of the changes will have to be a four year term for parliament. I suggest that this be done by statute and that the Prime Minister lose the prerogative of calling an election when it suits his fancy. At the same time, I believe we should consider the problems which this would entail in the case of a minority government. I say to the backbenchers on the government side that they should consider the possibility of a minority government being in office in the days to come. The rules should not only apply to the type of government which we have today, but should also be applicable in other cases.

I have a suggestion, therefore, which is contained in a bill, namely that when 15 members approach Mr. Speaker with a resolution to move the dissolution of parliament that motion should be put on the order paper and debated. When a majority of 75 per cent of the members approve this motion, an election be called. It is generally agreed that when members unanimously vote against the government and for a dissolution, the government has really reached the end of the road in any case. Parliament should have the right to make the decision on its dissolution. In any case, I believe this action should not be the prerogative of the Prime Minister. Such a change in the rules would create greater stability in parliament because, as hon. members who have been here in the last two or three parliaments will know, there has been a continuous election campaign during those periods of instability during which an election could have been called at any time, and very little work was done.

The government should also give some consideration to the cost of elections. If they are sincerely interested in reform, they will have to consider the provision of funds which they themselves will designate for the running of elections. In my opinion, this move would eliminate a great deal of competition and the scramble for money which goes on at that time. This will have quite an influence on the man who decides to run.

Consideration of Procedural Changes

• (9:20 p.m.)

Our Speaker has made a change possible by removing himself from political considerations and coming to this house as an independent. This may not be the answer to all our problems but I commend him for his initiative in this regard. He has come here without any obligation to any political party. Therefore, he may act in an impartial manner. This has been perhaps impossible for some of his predecessors.

The government house leader must give some consideration to this matter of attendance. I remember a former prime minister suggesting in the house that there were three legitimate roles of a member of parliament; his attendance here in Ottawa, his performance of government business and his performance of constituency business. That prime minister suggested that a member was legitimately in attendance when he was engaged in one of those three branches of his activities. It is very difficult to perform your role as a member of parliament here in Ottawa when you are participating in some function in your constituency.

I am actually ashamed and appalled by the requirement to sign that piece of paper covering our attendance in the house. Surely, a Philadelphia lawyer could not tell you what those ten or 15 words on that paper actually mean. They certainly do not convey what is intended. One would be lying if one answered yes or no. The question is similar to that well-known question; have you stopped beating your wife? I think this system is a farce and should be replaced by something which will require members of parliament to make a decision as to whether or not they were in attendance. This may involve the honour system, or a system similar to that used in the Senate. It may be all right to go to college during the four years you are a member, and that might be even better than staying away for other reasons, but I think the public expects members should be in attendance. If they are not in attendance, the public deserves to know why they are not.

The house leader did not mention today the role the government plays in getting things done. I have always been intrigued by the number of government orders which appear on the order paper and the manner in which the house leader changes the order of importance. Perhaps item number 5 will be of importance one day, followed by item number 7. Often, the house leader lists four or five items to be considered the next sitting day, to be followed by other items if the house sees fit to pass the items listed. There must be some reason for putting off important items, other than the absence of a particular minister. Surely, the government has a responsibility to bring forward important legislation. If the house is seized with unimportant matters, those are the only matters to be passed. The government cannot suggest that legislation is being held up if it is not being brought before the house, and the government alone can bring forward that business.

Reference has already been made to the question period. Let me tell the young members here that a former prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) got up in this house and chastised a young member who had asked what that right hon. gentleman thought was a foolish question. He said at the time that the question only embarrassed the individual who asked it. He informed the young member that in his opinion only questions that embarrassed the government should be asked in this house. I have always considered this to be a fairly good rule of thumb. Many of the questions we have heard in the last few days seemed to be more embarrassing to the individuals who asked them than to the government.

In theory, the question period could last indefinitely. The Speaker has a role to play in this regard. He should play that role in a different manner than it has been played by at least one previous speaker. That gentleman said he had been able to curtail the question period. If any young member would like to know how the Speaker should not involve himself in curtailing the question period, he should read some of the lectures given by that speaker. Surely, the Speaker must be above giving lectures in the House of Commons. I hasten to add that our present Speaker has never placed himself in that position.

It is my belief that those responsible in various parties should exercise some control in the handling of the question period. The question asked today concerning security was an important question and should not have been dodged. If such questions are put off by the ministers, there is really no point in asking them. There must be responsibility on both sides. If an important question is asked, an attempt should be made to answer it. When an insignificant question is asked, the minister does not help the situation very much by making an effort to answer it. There must be some equality during the question period, and the Speaker has a responsibility in this regard.

When the house leader asked for unanimous consent to reinstate the provisional rules, I considered the matter very seriously and was finally persuaded by some of my colleagues, after some coercion, to refrain from objecting. I wanted to refuse unanimous consent for several reasons. I do not think the new rules are any better than the old ones. I wanted the young members to realize that at one time we were civilized in this house and worked regular hours which permitted us to partake of the food in the dining room. After all, we did not always have to eat sandwiches behind the curtain. I wanted the young members to appreciate this so they would not think we were all on a continuous shift and had to bring our lunches.

I was also opposed to the provisional rule in respect of Speaker's rulings. As a member who challenged the Speaker's rulings more often than anyone else, I thought we had a good arrangement. I am sure the Speaker never considered that we were attacking him personally. He knew that we were using a gimmick to force a vote on something which had nothing to do with him. He was not offended, and I do not understand why anyone should think that such an appeal should be a calamity. This was a piece of parliamentary machinery that served my needs. I was not really opposed to this change, but I think some discretion could have been used.

In any event, the point I am trying to make is that the new rules are not much better than the old ones. They do take away some of the rights of members. Under certain circumstances, use is made of the guillotine provisions. I am opposed to them, and I think I always shall be. I do admit that certain circumstances are similar to those encountered by negotiators in strike settlements. The time finally arrives when a decision has to be made to settle a strike, but it is often very difficult to get the two sides together. There must be some ultimate method of ending a debate.

We face a danger in adopting changes of the type to which I have referred in that very often there is no balancing protection. I lay no blame at the door of the government house leader, because he has a job to do. He must work toward a position where the business of the government can be handled as quickly as possible and with as little debate as possible. In the extreme case there would be no debate, and I am sure the house leader would not want that. In that event, there would be no semblance of an opposition, without which democracy cannot work. His job is to see that we work in this direction, though his own backbenchers may object if they feel he goes too far. The official opposition would have to oppose it as much as possible, but in the matter of commitments I do think we are reaching common ground.

What is wrong with the committee structure is something very simple, I suggest. An hon. member can attend a committee for months and discuss detail as impartially as political animals can. The committee will make recommendations. These will be brought to the house and tabled, but that will be the end of them.

The committee system can be used, and I think it is safe to say was used in the last parliament, to such an extend that members find themselves running back and forth from one committee to another. I remember that I was never as tired as I was at the commencement of the last election. My colleagues tell me that this is a rat race, but let them wait until they have to attend four or five committees and find themselves running like rabbits from one warren to another.

I remember some hon. members used to carry their notes around in a large satchel. They would drop into a committee, get their name on the attendance roll, and then in a loud voice ask another member of the committee what was being discussed. They would attend one or two hearings of that committee in this way and accomplish little else than getting their name down. I suggest that the work itself is not important; it is whether some action is taken as a result of that work.

Under the present parliamentary structure committees can, without taking anything away from parliament, go into matters of detail and then report to the house. This report then becomes the subject of debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated that the government house leader had suggested we could use the report stage for debate rather than the committee stage, which I think is a sensible position to take. I have always wondered what the point was in getting involved in committees. If I want to louse up some matter when it comes back to the house, I can stand up and louse it up. I do not need to go to committee to do that, so why should I go?

Let me give an example, Mr. Speaker. Twice during the course of 10 years I was a member of a farm machinery inquiry committee. Both committees in my opinion did an excellent job. Let us say that they made 10 concrete proposals to the government. Out of these 10 the government agreed with four. However, I felt that having spent all that effort and time listening to farm machinery companies and everybody else concerned, the government damn well should have taken action on those four recommendations.

Let me give another example for the farmers present. We found that fittings that connected the hydraulic system of a machine to the tractor required five or six different types of connectors. This meant that when a farmer bought a new tractor he had to buy a whole new set of adaptors. The committee suggested that there should be a uniform type of connector which would allow easy interchange hydraulically between farm implements and tractors. We suggested that there should be standardization of nuts and bolts. This was not very revolutionary, Mr. Speaker. Everybody thought it was a good idea, but you would have to go to the library to read about it because the government took no action on it. I expect someone will come along to the agriculture committee and suggest they study farm machinery prices. Why? If the house leader is really serious about the use of committees, then he must give the backbenchers that he sends to these committees some assurance that something will be done when their report is made. It can be accepted or rejected, but I will be damned if the government has the right to ignore it. This is what has happened to every committee report that has been tabled in this house.

The committees will have to have a permanent secretariat. I get tired of listening to civil servants telling committees that they cannot do this or they cannot do that; that they cannot tell them how to run their administrations. I think training has to be provided. A permanent secretariat will have to supply translation facilities and legal and research facilities for committee members. When this is done, then I believe that the committee system under our parliamentary structure will perform a legitimate function and not take away anything from anybody. When a committee reports to the house, in my opinion, only the committee report should be discussed. If this is the case, some provision must be made for a minority report because there are two sides to some questions. Most committees I have attended have hammered out their report, rewritten and modified it to the point where it is acceptable to all, yet a majority report would have been very hard to come by. In some cases, there is a majority report. If these reports are decided upon in the house, then the committee will have served some function.

I think that having members spending eight or 10 hours a week in a committee is a good idea only if there is some end result. If committees are merely a vehicle for keeping backbenchers busy, then I am not going to attend any more committees. If members see no advantage in going to committees, we will never shorten debate in this house. Any time limit set by the government will prove to be a minimum time for debate and the parliamentary timetable will become very full.

Many times, Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of lousing up the government house leader on such questions as an Easter or Christmas recess and on July 1. I have done this not to be obnoxious but with a view to establishing permanent periods for getting things done. I have always felt that the government was being unfair to the opposition in holding a gun at our head and telling us that if we pass certain pieces of legislation we can have an Easter recess, but if we do not we are going to sit here. I remember one year when we even sat on Good Friday because I would not let the house adjourn. This has not happened since; we have always had an Easter recess and I presume that the present house leader wants to carry on that practice. However, Mr. Speaker, we should decide whether we are going to have a summer recess and when that recess should be. We should take into account the school year and other holidays, set the recesses forth in our four-year term, and we should be prepared to work within these periods.

I want now, Mr. Speaker, to say a word or two about estimates before leaving the committee structure. I have been impressed with the reports from the British House of Commons and from the Interparliamentary Union, which have defined the problem of estimates as one that exists in every parliamentary government in the world, including Russia. All have the same problem, a larger volume of business, a bigger gross national product. Every parliamentary government is unable to handle its estimates adequately. It appears the situation will not change and there is not a hope in Hades of examining estimates thoroughly. I am not sure whether we ought to bother with examination of estimates. In England they no longer bother. Sometimes, in this country, we examine estimates after nine tenths of the money has been spent, the idea being under our rules that we must see where the money has gone before we vote the other one tenth. I do not see that we should be any the worse off if we did not discuss all estimates. In England, they discuss the policy behind estimates and government policy surrounding the administration of estimates. They do not discuss the pounds, shillings and pence aspect of each department. Every so often they take one or two departments and examine them in detail, just as we examine some items of expenditure in the public accounts committee. Each department receives close scrutiny probably every seven or eight years.

In this country we want to make certain that when the public accounts committee reports something to the government, the government acts on the report. When a similar committee reports to the English government, that government must report on what it did with the committee's recommendation. The report must be given within one year. Here we often take no action on any suggestion in the auditor general's report. Sometimes the government acts, and sometimes it does not. The matter often has to be decided by the house.

We must face many problems. It is safe to say that the government may expect co-operation in the changing of our committee structure. Perhaps the government house leader would indicate what his intentions are in this regard. He might say a word on the subjects of committee reports and the role of committees in our scheme of things. He has been chairman of several committees and I have always found him to be fair and reasonable. The fact he is government house leader may change that, so far as the attitude of the opposition is concerned. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) has only recently been elevated, and I am sure that he has not forgotten the frustrations he experienced as chairman of any committee. He must remember that some committee reports evoked no comment from the government. That was not a satisfactory state of affairs.

The government must look at the entire picture, but it must be careful not to emasculate the role of the opposition, because if it does attempt to do so it will gain very little co-operation. Ultimately, the government will gain more by having the co-operation of all members than by trying to force its own way. More is to be gained by agreement between the house leaders of all parties than through the operation of the internal business committee, which really has not been used so far.

Most Canadians welcomed the Prime Minister's announcement that he would attempt to reform parliament. He will find, I think, that the public is not looking for picayune changes. It is looking for major changes, and in this case, as the lawyers say, it is important not only that justice be done, but that it appear to be done.

I wish to say a few words about the subject of televising the procedures of this house. I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will give consideration to the installation of permanent television cameras in this house. I hope that neither the C.B.C. nor any other network has control of those television cameras. They should be operated as the cameras in the United Nations are operated, and the film ought to be made available to the media at large. I submit that Mr. Speaker ought to be responsible for the administration of this televising in the same way that he is responsible for the verbatim reporting of the debates in this chamber. I suggest this because I have seen occasions in the past when crews of the various news media competed for space, not only in this chamber but in this building. I think newspapermen will agree with me that the television coverage of debates in this house may well modify their reports of those debates printed in newspapers, reports which so far have been exclusively furnished by newspapermen.

I hope you will give consideration to controlling this medium sir, and I hope that we may have an answer on this question from the appropriate authorities soon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Macdonald, Rosedale) agreed to.

Consideration of Procedural Changes

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—PROCEDURES RESPECTING INSTRUMENTS IN VIRTUE OF STATUTES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That a Special Committee of twelve Members, to be named at a later date, be appointed to consider and, from time to time, to report on procedures for the review by this House of instruments made in virtue of any statute of the Parliament of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could take the few minutes remaining this evening to explain the background of the resolution, for the benefit of hon. members who did not participate in the throne speech debate or who were not present last week.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has been a student of this question for some years, as have a number of other hon. members in the house including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). One of the arrangements made to deal procedurally with the problems coming before the house this coming autumn, and in any subsequent period, is the establishment of a committee for the purpose of studying procedures for the better review of statutory instruments, to use the technical term which they are given.

We spend a good deal of time in this house, and, quite properly, in examining details of legislation that is brought before the house, in debating the actual terms of the legislation and in amending legislation from time to time to bring it more closely in line with the aims which the government has in putting it forward or with any purpose which the house, generally, might find acceptable.

A great deal of the legislation which we have seen during our time in the house has contained a provision worded, one way or another, to the effect that for the further and better carrying out of the provisions of the legislation the governor in council is to be entitled to make regulations or orders, or is otherwise given authority to enact what is called delegated legislation, for the better carrying out of the statute.

We find ourselves in the position, therefore, that while a bill may receive intense scrutiny, the application of the bill is left to an administrative body. In fact, measures which may encroach most on the personal privacy, property and rights of the individual may actually be enacted by the administration without any opportunity being given for the elected representatives of the people to give them any direct review. This resolution does not propose to set up a standing committee on delegated legislation itself. What it does propose is that a special committee should be established for the purpose of examining our practice in Canada in this field of statutory instruments or delegated legislation to ascertain whether it would be advisable to set up some kind of procedure so that this house, more particularly through a committee, could make a better scrutiny of these subsidiary instruments by which rights are so much affected. I think there will probably be agreement in all parts of the house as to the acceptability of this motion. I confess that in putting the motion forward at this time we are scarcely engaging in a daring or pioneering step. I note that in 1932 the Senate of Australia set up a committee to review statutory instruments to see how they worked in that country and to study what the procedures were. In 1944, the House of Commons in Westminster set up a select committee on statutory rules and orders and since 1946 that committee, a standing committee known by the nickname of the scrutiny committee, has been charged with scrutinizing this kind of delegated legislation produced by the administration.

The increased use of orders and regulations has been a necessary consequence of the rapid extension not only in Canada but in all other western countries of government influence in broader areas of the economy and other areas of hitherto private endeavour, in line with the change in public philosophy to a more interventionist attitude. At the same time the standing procedures of the parliamentary system have not been extended to carry forward parliamentary control and our purpose in engaging in this proposed study is to see what might be done to provide continuing supervision of this kind of activity.

Perhaps I might refer to some related questions to make it clear that they are not being dealt with by this particular resolution. One of the means of controlling administrative action to prevent interference with the rights of the individual is of course by providing legal rights of recourse, either by appeal to the regular court system or by means of prerogative writs, where it is felt there has been a denial of what is described as natural law, or, to put it in non-technical terms, where there has been a violation of the ordinary rights of people.

This resolution and the committee to be set up will not deal with that subject matter. One of my responsibilities, as President of the Privy Council, will be to suggest further procedures which might be followed for the purpose of reviewing our system of administrative law and the system of appeals we have established. This is a responsibility I share with my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). If thought desirable, further means of enabling legal scrutiny of the administrative process will be suggested.

Another institution often discussed in this context is the Scandinavian system of ombudsman. Here again, this resolution does not directly at least involve the recommendation that we set up such an institution in Canada. I think it is fair to observe, however, that the British parliament has decided that a necessary corollary to its select committee on statutory instruments is the appointment of an ombudsman, or parliamentary commissioner as they call him, and they have recently established such a post.

The history of parliamentary consideration of this type of committee has been a long one in Canada. In 1943, the late Mr. Brooke Claxton, then a private member for St. Lawrence-St. George, commented—and I quote from Hansard for that year at page 296:

> The practice of tabling orders in council is, for all practical purposes, an empty form. I suggest that orders in council be referred to a committee for consideration—not all orders, but orders having the effect of legislation of a general nature.

Another notable Canadian who has shown an interest in this subject is the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who in 1945 advocated a Senate committee on orders in council to ascertain whether they impinge and infringe upon private rights. Again, in 1949 the right hon. member for Prince Albert advocated the appointment of a committee on ministerial powers to function in the same way as the scrutiny committee at Westminster. In short, what we want the committee to do, is to review what is done under delegated legislation and to recommend to the house the best means of carrying out the will of the people in such a way, as the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has just said, as to make sure that justice is not only done, but appears to be done.

Perhaps I could call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: While we are to have the new era beginning next Thursday, perhaps I might be permitted to ask the leader of the house what we shall be doing tomorrow and the following day? Perhaps he could take us beyond the farm finance bills this time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Tomorrow we hope to continue and perhaps dispose of the resolution which I have been introducing. Thereafter, we would call the resolution stage of the three farm financing bills Nos. 5, 6 and 7 on today's order paper. On Thursday, it is anticipated there will be an application for interim supply and if that is dealt with on Thursday or on Friday, we would return to the farm bills if they have not been completed.

On Monday next, or perhaps on Tuesday, depending on the action taken in the other place, it is anticipated that the bill to amend the Publication of Statutes Act will be reported to this house and it is the intention of the government to call that bill. It will be desirable to do so because we feel the house should determine whether or not the form of the acts should be changed before further legislation is passed. I hope that when the milennium arrives on Thursday I will be able to say what we will be going on with next week.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to welcome my fellow Winnipeger, the hon. member for Winnipeg South and Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Richardson), to the first late show of this first session of this new parliament. That, as he knows, is not the official name of this part of our proceedings but I think the fact that we have this popular nickname for it indicates that private members of parliament like the late show. It gives us an opportunity to expand on questions that may not have been given the attention we believe they deserve in the question period and, believe it or not, we sometimes get a better answer. I hope my hon. friend from Winnipeg will give evidence of that tonight.

The question I put to the minister on the orders of the day yesterday morning, which is found at page 327 of Hansard for September 23, was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson). Will the new government take up with the Canadian National Railways the question of increasing the pensions of retired employees of the C.N.R.? I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South would like to reply to this question.

For reasons that are perhaps understood the minister did not answer on that occasion, and that is why I posted it for the first opportunity on the motion to adjourn.

As I am sure the minister knows, representing as he does the constituency of Winnipeg South in which a great many of these people reside, there are many retired employees of the C.N.R. who feel that they are entitled to an escalation in their pensions.

The principle of escalating pensions that are already in pay is not a new one. The federal government has recognized it in an amendment to the Old Age Security Act and in a provision in the Canada Pension Plan. A number of other governmental jurisdictions have accepted the principle, and a number of private employers have also accepted it.

Since I have only seven minutes I do not intend to launch into one of my full dress speeches, but I think this is one of the most pressing problems of pensions with which we must yet deal, namely the fact that people who have retired have as much right as anyone else to share in the improvements that take place after their time of retirement.

I can tell the Minister without Portfolio that there are figures on the pages of Hansard, going back a number of years, indicating the number of retired C.N.R. employees who are on pensions of various amounts, and I have questions on the order paper which will bring this information up to date in the next few weeks.
