In the past, working together, Canadians have explored and settled half a continent, created a nation from the Atlantic to the Pacific to the Arctic Oceans; built a transcontinental transportation and communications system and developed the seventh strongest economy, the second highest standard of living and a social safety network which is the envy of the world.

If we are to stay united in the future, Canadians need a new national agenda to work for, an agenda which includes a clean environment, a just resolution of aboriginal concerns and the elimination of illiteracy, hunger, homelessness and violence.

But whatever our new national agenda may be, it should certainly be more than just a desire to repeal the Official Languages Act.

UN HUMAN DEVELOPMENT REPORT

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the UN has just released its 1991 Human Development Report. This report shows that the gap between rich and poor countries continues to grow.

What is the Mulroney government doing about this deteriorating global situation? It is reneging on Canada's long held commitment to international development.

In the past three years alone, the government has cut billions of dollars from our international development funding commitments.

CIDA, along with hundreds of development NGOs and hundreds of thousands of Canadian volunteers, through their very hard work over the years, have given Canada a solid reputation as a world leader in the field of development assistance. Now this government wants to dismantle CIDA and undermine the work of our development NGOs.

The government should be working with development NGOs to increase the amount of Canadian aid going to those people who need it most and who need it urgently.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, as a result of my Point of Order yesterday, several comments were made in the House that private members on the government side should be restricted from asking questions.

In fact, we represent more Canadians than any other group in the House and in many cases Question Period is the only tool we have to get the attention to issues affecting our constituents. Often we will disagree with the position of the government or a minister, or a minister may not understand the urgency of a problem in a region like Atlantic Canada. Question Period is the most effective place to get our point across.

• (1410)

On the other hand, government members should not use Question Period for planted questions, and oppositions should stop using it for speech-making and grandstanding.

If we all are a little more responsible, we can have a lot more questions and a whole lot more answers. Instead of trying to gain points for our own benefit, maybe we should try to do more for the people who sent us here.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I bring to the attention of this House a serious problem both within my constituency, the federal constituency of St. Boniface, and throughout Canada; the teaching of English or French as a second language to new Canadians.

This is particularly important in view of the increased number of immigrants because of this government's decision.

In early March, 1991 I received a petition from over 225 constituents, mostly volunteers who were working with these people to help them learn the language and to integrate into society. They requested support for language instruction.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand petitions signed by more than 225 constituents asking me to:

> —support their request that courses in English as a second language be given in St. Boniface for adult refugees who do not speak English, upon their arrival.

[English]

My constituents want these new Canadians to learn English now so they can integrate fully into Canadian society, find jobs and become active participants as soon as possible.

I wrote to the appropriate minister on March 11 and again on April 12. Why have my constituents not received an answer?

Are they not important enough? Surely the question requires an immediate answer.

FITWEEK

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, May 24 is Sneaker Day, the day when all Canadians, including members of the House, are invited and encouraged to wear their sneakers in support of healthy, active living.

Sneaker Day is the kick-off event for Canada's Fitweek, running from tomorrow until June 2. This country can take great pride in knowing that Canada's Fitweek is now recognized internationally as the largest celebration of physical activity in the world.

This year, more than eight million Canadians are expected to participate in over 14,000 events taking place across Canada. Canada's Fitweek is co-ordinated by the Government of Canada through fitness and amateur sport, the provincial and territorial governments and 16 national organizations. At the community level, hundreds of thousands of volunteers contribute their time and energy to this annual celebration. The growth of Fitweek can only be described as phenomenal.

Canada's Fitweek is an excellent example of government and the corporate sector working together to promote the message of active living to Canadians and to maintain the momentum of the fitness movement.

During the next 10 days, I invite all members to join Canadians from coast to coast in promoting and participating in the many events planned in their own constituencies as part of Canada's Fit Week.

VIDEO GAMES

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, is the Solicitor General aware that video games, which puts the player in the role of concentration camp manager and which dehumanizes Jews and Turks, have been available in Germany and Austria for over a year. According to some news reports, it is possible that these racist video games, which amount to hate propaganda, originate in Canada.

Does the minister intend to investigate the possibility that these games originate here and take action to limit their distribution.

[Translation]

The German police has said that the demand for, and availability of, these racist games has increased over the past year. Does the minister intend to take action to ensure that these games are not distributed in Canada?

CYSTIC FIBROSIS

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation is completing its thirtieth year of service. Cystic fibrosis is a genetic disease affecting the lungs and digestive system of children and young adults.

Following the very recent discovery of the gene that causes cystic fibrosis, the Foundation is asking for everyone's help more than ever. Their theme this year, their thirtieth anniversary, is: "Thirty years of caring—Proof of the power of dreams".

I wish to thank the Foundation, the thousands of volunteers working with it and those who contributed the $6 million collected this year for research, services and public education. Congratulations and best wishes for success to the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, a survey on personal safety in Ottawa was published today. While the results may be a surprise to some, for women it was a frightening reality. One-third of women feel unsafe in their own neighbourhoods. Almost 90 per cent of women feel they must limit their own activities. They believe they are at greater risk simply because they are female. I am not surprised by these statistics for they do reflect the views of the lives of women across Canada.

Women are also at risk in their own homes. The assaults and murders of women by their partners shows this reality. Because that danger is also outside the home, women have developed methods of coping with this danger and fear. We walk home only in well-lit areas. We park our cars near the few lights in parking lots. We stay out of parks at night. We try to ignore the rude comments of strangers.

We need more than a blue ribbon panel on violence against women. We need programs and action. We need action from this government now to end violence against women.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I was horrified to learn recently that a wonderful and committed participant from Guatemala to the United Nations Conference in Geneva, Mr. Miguel Sucuqui, has had to go into hiding because of his work there.

On May 6, 1991, a government backed paramilitary group came to his home to arrest him. When they could not find him, they threatened the lives of his wife and family.

This is not the only incident of violence by Guatemalan authorities against participants at the Geneva meeting. Mr. Camilo Ajqui Jimon was assassinated on April 14. At least one other has suffered an attempted kidnapping.

There are others who are now living in mortal fear because of their work at the United Nations and for human rights generally.

Today, I am writing to the Guatemalan government to express my concern regarding these particular incidents. I call upon the government to do the same immediately.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The verdict on the GST is in. In the first three months, Canadian retailers have suffered the worst sales record since the history of record keeping. We find again today that sales are down. In Kingston alone in a survey by a national accounting firm, Ernst and Young, one in two Kingston families do their shopping south of the border.

Canadians are voting with their feet and they are voting by shopping south of the border. In that survey, Ernst and Young predicted that 500 jobs would be lost in Kingston alone as a result of that particular problem.

Given the failure of the GST to assist the Canadian economy, what is he going to do in the short term to provide relief to the thousands of retailers and wholesalers who are going bankrupt?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, statistics prove that the cross-border shopping phenomenon began well before the GST came into effect. In fact, if one compares the statistics from January, cross-border shopping in 1990, 1989 or prior to that, the increases were considerably higher than the increases in January of 1991 after the GST took effect.

However, we do admit as a government that there is a very serious problem with cross-border shopping which spans the responsibility of all three levels of government, the private sector, labour, consumers, as well as the Retail Council of Canada and retail organizations. It is why we have taken the leadership in beginning a nation-wide consultative process in dealing with the problem and trying to get it resolved in co-operation with the provinces, with the private sector and with labour. We are well on our way towards that objective and that goal.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance, because his GST policy is forcing Canadians to go to the United States to shop.

While retail sales in Canada are going down, American stores are booming. We know that clothing workers in Montreal, for example, are out of work because Canadians buy their clothes across the border. I therefore ask the Minister of Finance: When will he be ready to review his disastrous economic policies to give Canadians a chance to work here in our country?

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member was not listening to my answer when I pointed out what the statistics show very clearly. I will give her a specific. In January 1990 the increases of cross-border shopping was over 22 per cent.

The January increase of cross-border shopping in 1991 was only 15 per cent. That was the month after the GST came in.

I admit and repeat that there is a problem. There is a greater variety and selection of products in the United States. The volumes are greater, therefore the prices are lower. Labour costs are lower than in Canada. Transportation costs are lower in the United States than in Canada.

The bottom line is that Canadians, Canadian industry and governments have not allowed the Canadian economy to be as competitive as that of our counterparts in the United States. The Speech from the Throne addressed that problem and this government will be dealing with it.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Some salesperson for Canada, Mr. Speaker. This minister could not even convince his own brother to stay in the country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the exchange and I do not have to remind hon. members that one personal comment invites another. I know the hon. member would not want to do that again. The hon. member will put her question.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, to set the record straight, it is the business that did not stay in Canada, not any reflection on the individual.

My question is for the Minister of Finance, if he is prepared to do the job on a full-time basis. Given the devastating statistics of the first three months of the GST, the worst record of a retail sales drop in the history of record keeping for Canada, and given that the study released today by Ernst and Young shows that in Kingston alone, one city in Canada, 500 jobs are being lost to cross-border shopping, will the finance minister today introduce a new economic plan to help give some hope to Canadian businesses and Canadian workers who want to put jobs back in Canada not south of the border?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in so far as Canadian businesses are concerned, and more specifically that which is run by one of my brothers, that business has prospered and stayed in Canada. It is because of the policies of the government that that business was able to expand into the United States and stay in Canada, headquartered in Oakville, Ontario, and we are very proud of that.

Second, I have already pointed out that the bottom line problem with cross-border shopping is a lack of competitiveness by Canadians as opposed to our American counterparts.

One of the elements that this government has taken in moving toward providing greater competitive opportunities for Canadian businesses was tax reform, scrapping the federal sales tax which was an albatross around the necks of Canadian producers, manufacturers and exporters, replacing it with a value-added tax like the GST which makes Canadian businesses more competitive as opposed to less. We are continuing on that track.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who said during Question Period yesterday:

> It is going to take some time before all the benefits of the GST flow through ultimately to the consumer.

The Minister of Finance should know that the only benefit that his government ever promised to consumers from the GST was the elimination of the manufacturers' sales tax and that this should have occurred as early as January and February of this year. Given what the minister said in the House yesterday, is he now saying that the MST has not been removed from the price of products? Or is he admitting that the government was wrong in its projections that prices would fall?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that in many cases the movement to the GST and the scrapping of the federal sales tax does in fact reduce the cost of doing business. In most cases it reduces the cost of capital. The hon. member knows that. It takes some time for those benefits to flow through to benefit the consumer.

We are looking at a transitional period. We are looking at a start-up and it is very difficult to discern, with any degree of accuracy in a span of three months or less, the over-all impact.

What is important is that again today interest rates in this country have come down by eight basis points. Statistics Canada today says: "The worst of the recession is probably over and there is some clear evidence that the worst of the recession may be passed", indicating that more people are working in April. There are more housing starts and automobile sales are rebounding. That should be good news for the hon. member. It is for us.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, indeed, while this government is in office we will take good news wherever we can find it.

Although a United Nations report ranks Canada as the second best place to live in the world, the report also indicates that Canada has one of the widest gaps between rich and poor in the industrialized world.

Since the government has aggravated this problem by introducing the GST, cutting tax rates for the rich and triggering a made-in-Canada recession, what is the government going to do to narrow the gap between rich and poor?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member raised the very important study conducted by the United Nations, where Canada ranked second among 160 nations as the best place in the world to live.

As Carol Goar reports in The Toronto Star: "Too often we forget how lucky we are. Canada ranked second of the 160 nations studied. By global standards we live in paradise".

Will the hon. member not join the chorus and praise what Canada stands for, rather than looking for all the negatives?

TRADE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of International Trade. The decision to fast track the trilateral trade agreement will be made this afternoon.

Carl Beigie, the former head of the C.D. Howe Institute said yesterday: "Canada just seems to be following the U.S. lead into continental discussions."

What I object to as a Canadian is that our trade policy is being dictated to us by Washington. The debate today will outline very specific trade and economic objectives of the United States. I cite the resolution by Gephardt and Rostenkowski. Will Canada and Canadians in the House of Commons have the same opportunity to debate their concerns?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons will have an opportunity to debate it. As I indicated yesterday, I expected this would be a subject of some consideration by the external affairs committee.

If the hon. member would like to put the views of the New Democratic Party forward, there are many opportunities with an Opposition Day motion.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, we will afford ourselves of that opportunity, but we realize that the government will not listen.

A supplemental to the same minister. Should the fast track negotiations result in the reopening of the present free trade agreement, with the U.S. desire to extract even more concessions from Canada, like the cultural industry, the auto pact and subsidy definition, will the minister, for once, stand up for Canadians and walk away from the table.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think it goes without saying that if we had not done as good a job negotiating the free trade agreement, we would not be hearing these statements from the Americans in the lead up to the North American free trade agreement.

• (1430)

We have indicated and were prepared, as many members of this House know, to walk away from the free trade agreement in 1987 if we did not get the conditions in that agreement that we felt were appropriate for Canada.

We got those conditions. It is a good deal for Canada and I am convinced that the North American free trade agreement will also be a good deal for Canada.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, what scares me is I believe that he believes what he is saying.

I will go to the Minister of the Environment. Yesterday, the minister committed his government to subject the trilateral trade agreement to an environmental assessment.

Given this fact, will the minister table these guidelines before negotiations begin? Should these guidelines not be met in the agreement, will he recommend to cabinet and to this House that negotiations be suspended?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can repeat for the benefit of the member and the House in what manner environmental concerns will be dealt with in the context of these negotiations.

First, trade related matters will be dealt with in the context of the agreement. Environmental concerns will be dealt with in the context of the agreement. Non-trade related matters should be dealt with in a parallel negotiation.

Third, as the member refers to, consistent with government policy, the agreement should be the subject of an environmental evaluation by the cabinet committee system.

We are in the process of working out the methodologies through these evaluations through different departments. I want to bring to the member's attention that this is new. To our knowledge, this is not done in many places in the world, if at all in the world. For that reason, we are working on the methodologies and I assure the hon. member that we will deal with them as rapidly as possible.

Finally, I think we can add to that, as my colleague from industry, science and technology has said, the committee system is there as a recourse for members of this House if they want to deal with the environmental concerns also.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

We learned this morning that the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. de Montigny Marchand, has been suddenly called back from a trip where he has been accompanying the Prime Minister in Asia. He will arrive back in Ottawa this weekend for meetings.

Considering that Mr. Marchand was one of the two signatories on the government's report on the Al-Mashat case, my question to the minister is this.

Was Mr. Marchand called back in relation to the government's mishandling of the Al-Mashat case? Is the government planning any further disclosures of information on this case in the very near future?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question of the hon. member concerning—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: I may be expected to answer for external affairs, but I am not there yet.

I can say to the hon. member that any information concerning this case will be looked at by the standing committee, as has been proposed.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): The Minister of Employment and Immigration does not know.

When is this going to stop?

Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister.

Does the minister now maintain that every single word of the report that he and the Secretary of State for External Affairs published on the Al-Mashat case is true? Is he prepared to maintain that this report is complete, accurate and reflects the whole truth? Furthermore, does he intend to release all the documents relating to this case as promised by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and will he do so for the committee meets?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and all other members of this House will have a chance in the standing committee to respond to all the issues that were raised. We have already said that we prepared a report, and that report has been released.

If there are additional matters on which further details are requested, it will be the committee's job to take care of that and I trust it will.

[English]

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, a member of the government caucus published a column which shed some light on the case of Mr. Al-Mashat. The member for Hamilton—Wentworth writes that it is very likely that the hotline burned from the White House to the Prime Minister's office. He suggests that the bureaucrats were overruled by either the CIA, George Bush, or even the Prime Minister.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister why his own caucus members, who best know his ministers, do not believe their story on how Al-Mashat rode the Tory express into Canada?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as was indicated last week, we are anxious that this matter be taken to committee and all of the facts be elucidated as soon as possible. That remains our position and that will happen just as soon as the committee can be brought together.

I believe Beauschene's will show that questions about comments of an ordinary member are out of order for Question Period.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have to wonder if Al-Mashat was all that the Americans gave us in the free trade deal.

I have a supplementary for the Deputy Prime Minister. Mohamed Al-Mashat tells us he was not a defector, nor has he ever betrayed Saddam Hussein.

If Canadians were to accept this government's explanation of how a high-profile, enemy spokesman accidentally retired in Canada during a war, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister to explain simply why this government's war cabinet was not at the helm of Canada's intelligence network at a time of international crisis. Who was in command?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the question is probably based upon fiction and does not rate an answer.

ARMS TRADE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister for International Trade.

Canadians were waiting for a gun control bill and instead we got a gun export bill today. This government never ceases to amaze me.

I want to ask the minister if he agrees with this statement that was made by the former Secretary of State for External Affairs in January. The statement is: "If there is one priority, one lesson which the world must learn from this war, it is that an unrestricted arms trade in this region, the Middle East, is no longer acceptable and constitutes a threat to the security of all members of the United Nations." Does the minister agree with that statement and, if he does, why is he making it easier for Canadian arms manufacturers to sell arms to the Middle East?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do agree with that statement. I draw my colleague's attention to the use of the word that he quoted there, "unrestricted". What this legislation will do is it will provide very tight restrictions on the export of armaments from Canada. There will be tight constraints and strict criteria under this legislation as to what type of countries we would export any sorts of armaments. We would require a bilateral arrangement with the country involved so that we would know what those armaments are going to be used for.

For that reason, what this legislation does is tighten up a previous regime which was much looser.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not fooling anybody. This is about an $800 million contract for light-armoured vehicles to Saudi Arabia. He should not try and tell the House otherwise. It is about some tough choices; either you are in favour of arms control or you are not. It is a real tough choice.

I want to ask the minister—

My supplementary is directed to the same minister. The purpose of this bill is to increase arms exports from Canada. The government wants to expedite this bill. My question is this: Will the government take the time to consult parliamentarians and Canadians before the bill is passed?

• (1440)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to put tighter controls on the exports of armaments from this country. That is the precise objective as set out in the legislation.

I want to draw the attention of my friend to the specific types of armaments that he is trying to work into the consideration of this question. Weapons of mass destruction were the weapons that were the subject of the comments of the Prime Minister and the previous Secretary of State for External Affairs. That type of weapon involves rockets, bombs, grenades, ammunition, chemical weapons, weapons that are considered to be weapons of mass destruction. That will not be the subject of this legislation. That type of export will be restricted.

The purpose of this bill is to put very tight restrictions on the type of armaments that will be restricted. The hon. member has referred to a couple of those in his question.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of employment. In the throne speech, this government told Canadians that the most fundamental building block of our society was the family. However, under Bill C–21, leave for adoptive parents has been reduced from 15 weeks to 10 weeks, while at the same time, leave for biological parents has been increased to 25 weeks. Clearly, this is discrimination against adoptive parents.

Given this government's noble commitment to the family, I would like to ask the minister why he would not treat adoptive parents in the same way as biological parents are treated.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised when Bill C–21 was discussed in this House. It has been discussed in committee. The situation is, simply, that the reasons for treating the biological parents in a different manner are clear to the hon. member. This bill, C–21 is not about trying to discriminate against any people. This bill, which you held up for a year, is trying to help people.

Do not try today to tell us that Bill C–21 was about discrimination when in fact it barred discrimination against women in this country. That is what Bill C–21 did.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, that is a disappointing answer that contradicts totally the spirit of the Speech from the Throne on the family. Is this government saying that an adoptive mother is less of a mother because she is an adoptive mother, or that a child is less of a child because he is an adopted child?

In the interests of fairness, equity and justice, is this minister prepared to tell the House that he will amend this law and eliminate this glaring and obvious discrimination against adoptive parents?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not consider this provision as being discriminatory and I do not intend to amend Bill C–21.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, truckers left Parliament Hill empty-handed, and today Canadians discovered that while there was no help for the trucking industry, the National Transportation Agency of Canada, headed by one Honourable E. Nielsen, has been renting luxury apartments a block away from the Montreal Forum because it was "more convenient" than hotel rooms.

I want to ask the government why there is no help for truckers and lots of dough for Erik Nielsen's transportation agency to rent fancy digs across the street from the Forum.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the truckers left the Hill yesterday knowing that this government was working with a task force to come up with answers to their problems. What they brought forward to us were problems that were identified last year when we originally started to meet with all the stakeholders in the area. They know we will have answers to that shortly.

As far as the NTA in Montreal is concerned, as soon as I read the article which was brought to my attention, I immediately called the officials and asked them to contact the agency to ensure that they review this practise immediately as to the value of having this type of accommodation in Montreal.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Well, I am glad to know that there is a housing policy for someone in this country.

[Translation]

I have a supplementary for the Deputy Prime Minister. There is no money for the poor. There is none for the truckers. There is none for the unemployed and there is none for the homeless in the latest Speech from the Throne. How can the government let Mr. Nielsen and his friends rent apartments in Montreal across from the Forum, while hundreds of thousands of Canadians don't even have a roof over their heads?

[English]

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, as I brought to the attention of the member in my answer previous to this, we have asked the agency to review this policy. When they did it in 1989 and rented the apartment, they did a study at that time and felt that that was the most economical way of doing it. I am not sure it still is and I have asked them to prove it.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health. The Canadian tobacco industry, headed by William Neville, the former chief of staff to the Prime Minister, has launched a $2 million mail-back campaign that includes preprinted messages to the Prime Minister in cigarette packages. This is a direct violation of section 9 of the Tobacco Control Act.

The act states that "no distributor shall sell a tobacco product if the package in which it is contained displays any writing other than the name, the brand name, the trade mark and health warning messages".

Will the minister take whatever legal action that is necessary, including obtaining a court injunction, to stop the tobacco industry from launching this campaign and contravening section 9 of the Tobacco Control Act?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member ought to know what I told the press yesterday about the campaign launched by the Tobacco Growers Association. I utterly deplore the attitude of the companies, considering that any measure taken by the Department of Health and Welfare is taken to protect the health of Canadians, and I repeat, our sole objective is to pursue those policies. However, the hon. member tells us something is illegal. I have asked the department's legal advisers to give me a sound legal opinion, and if the law has been violated, the hon. member may rest assured that I will immediately take appropriate action.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. The tobacco industry lobbyists appear to have delayed regulations aimed at requiring bold lettering for health warnings on tobacco products.

Will the minister assure this House that these regulations are immediately implemented so that the bold lettering for health warnings is required on June 1, which was the original scheduled date before their lobbyists got involved?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My friend should know that the court is not a lobbyist. He should know, too, that the regulations are challenged by the association and they are before the court. As long as the Federal Court in Quebec has not made a decision, he will understand that I cannot apply the regulation.

I will agree with him on something. I find it strange that those companies that consider it impossible to put an insert in the packages because it is too expensive can do that for their own purpose. In that perspective I agree with him and I will do my best to see that the regulation is applied when the court makes its decision.

CONTAINER TRAFFIC

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport concerning the Port of Halifax and the potential loss of container shipping from Halifax.

I want to point out that the potential loss of container traffic from Halifax will also result in a dramatic loss in rail traffic from the Atlantic region, which again will jeopardize the viability of the entire rail system in Atlantic Canada.

I want to know from the minister if the federal government is playing an active key role in resolving this issue. Also, can the department empower the National Transportation Agency to intervene and insist that CN meet its obligations?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his continued interest in the Port of Halifax. Indeed, he showed his interest when he brought members of the port to meet with me last week here in Ottawa.

Certainly the Port of Halifax, as ports on the west coast of this country as well, and all the transportation industry is having to come to grips with the global competitiveness that we have today.

I can assure the member that CN, the port authorities, both the federal and the provincial governments, are following this with a great deal of interest. There is work going on. I will certainly take into consideration the point that he made today and see what can be done on it.

CANADA POST

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post. Retail postal outlets, RPOs, supposedly offer equal or better service to the public. However, when an RPO cannot be found, many rural communities like Avonmore, Ontario, will not receive equal or better service. The people of Avonmore are fighting to keep their post office. There has been a post office in Avonmore since the birth of Canada. The people in Avonmore who are in Ottawa today want an answer.

Will the minister instruct Canada Post to back off, to reverse its decision and allow Avonmore to keep its post office?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, when Canada Post was made a Crown corporation by actions of the previous Liberal government, it was for the purpose of restricting and eliminating possible political interference with the management of the post office. We have been adhering to that principle which we thought was quite properly elucidated by the Liberal government of the day.

In terms of the policy of having counter operations located in retail outlets rather than being run by the post office, since 1988 the post office has had independent surveyors survey the people affected where changes have been made. They found that the people affected approve of the changes to the extent of 90 per cent. In advance, people are afraid of change. After change there is 90 per cent approval.

I wonder if the hon. member thinks it is appropriate to change a policy which is approved of by 90 per cent of the people affected.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. Avonmore joins more than 200 communities across Canada which have recently received their postal death sentences. One of these communities is Mabou in my riding where the Canada Post building with the flag and the cenotaph in front has been the one tangible symbol of the federal presence in this community.

Since the minister's government approved the corporate plan which is leading to the closure of all these post offices, will he at least instruct Canada Post to place a moratorium on these closures and to begin the process of reversing this wrong-headed policy?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have to say that the hon. member's predecessor was successful in getting post offices built everywhere in that riding. That of course is the reason why, when we assumed office, the post office was running a $400 million deficit and our children were paying for that.

Since then the post office, by practising good management practices, by introducing changes which have improved service, which the people affected have approved of, has in fact gone into a profit situation. Instead of borrowing money which our children have to repay to look after the post office today, it is actually paying back dividends.

The hon. member should join all Canadians in applauding Canada Post for the spectacular job it has done.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last year some 36,000 refugees came to Canada; 20,000 came to the province of Ontario alone.

Because of a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Government of Ontario has now decided to admit refugees to public housing in the province of Ontario, public housing that is 50 per cent funded by the federal government.

How does the minister propose to house refugees in this country, bearing in mind the fact that some 17,000 Canadian citizens and landed immigrants are now on waiting lists for public housing in Toronto alone, bearing in mind that the federal housing agency, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has no funding for this, and bearing in mind as well that the minister is responsible for refugees? Does he intend to preempt constitutional negotiations and transfer all these things to the provincial governments?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if I might answer my colleague, the distinguished former minister of housing. Although he was very young at the time, I remind him that back in 1979, under the leadership of my distinguished colleague who was then Prime Minister, CMHC was very helpful in assisting the Vietnamese boat people and taking quite extraordinary steps at that time.

We commend Ontario or any province that wishes to declare these people eligible for assisted housing programs and will be glad to meet with them and explore any possibilities that exist.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds who knows about the concerns for the future of the Canadian Wheat Board. Some time ago this government removed oats from the jurisdiction of the wheat board. Now U.S. wheat is allowed into Canada. This is going to create tension between the wheat board and some Canadian farmers who live along the U.S. border who want to sell wheat directly into the U.S. market.

Will the minister reaffirm his commitment to the wheat board today and will he initiate a review of additional grains that could be sold by the wheat board?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the producers who live along the border will always want to have direct access to the U.S. market. That is nothing new with the free trade agreement. The answer to that question is that we reaffirm our commitment. It is a Canadian decision as to how we are going to market our grain in this country and if producers choose to use the Canadian Wheat Board, that is their decision.

As far as other grains under the Canadian Wheat Board, we have just commissioned a major study on the canola industry. The report has been out about three weeks. There has been some discussion on that. People have approached me in the last six months asking for rye to be put under the Canadian Wheat Board. In all cases we have suggested that it is a producer decision and if producers so decide then the government will be perfectly willing to respond.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I was looking for a commitment from this minister for a comprehensive review. The minister well knows that the prairie pools have proposed a process by which the wheat board may add, not take away, further grains to its jurisdiction. Given the view of prairie farmers, why will the minister not agree to that review today, right now?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure it is the view of producers on the prairies. If the member wants to talk to farmers in his own province, he will find that producers are very much of two minds when it comes to marketing canola. They are very much of two minds when it comes to marketing oats. The next time he drives through Portage la Prairie, he will see the new facility going up there which has three-quarters of its production going to the U.S. The people building that plant will tell him one of the reasons they are building in Portage la Prairie, in his own province, is to have access with our high-quality product to the American market. One of the reasons they are there is they do not have to go through the Canadian Wheat Board to buy their oats.

The member should be very careful when he uses generalizations to talk about how farmers want to market their product in western Canada.

FINANCE

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, there is one region in Canada that has been singled out for special treatment by the chartered banks. From 1982 to 1990 total loans by the banks to businesses in the west dropped by 38 per cent, more than $12 billion. At the same time, bank business loans for the rest of Canada rose by more than 68 per cent.

My question is for the Minister of Finance, a western member. Will the government use its regulatory authority under section 315 of the Bank Act to compel the chartered banks to treat western businesses fairly, and not like a bunch of Third World pariahs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows it is very difficult to make such comparisons. He is essentially singling out the banks as lending institutions and overlooking the fact that after 1982 there was a downturn in the oil sector. I know that his party has not been supportive of the diversification efforts in the province of Alberta, particularly in the pulp and paper industry. I want to tell the hon. member that mortgages and other loans under the other financial institutions have in fact increased by 78 per cent since 1982. It is very difficult to single out and make the comparison just using chartered banks.

If the hon. member is suggesting that we should, as a federal government, institute a quota allocation or regulations with respect to financial institutions in this country, I can tell the hon. member that we are not prepared to do that. We are prepared to remove barriers and regulations so that the financial institutions can indeed be more competitive across the country.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the removal of barriers and the removal of regulations has resulted in the removal of $11 billion in business loans from Alberta, the removal of $1 billion in business loans from B.C., the removal of $252 million in business loans from Saskatchewan, and the removal of $48 million in business loans from Manitoba. Every western province has seen its business loan portfolio with the chartered banks reduced.

Will the minister talk to his government's buddies among the chartered banks and do something? I do not care what the minister does, work it out with them as best as he can, but he must do something to get the chartered banks to treat western businesses fairly.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is because the business groups in Alberta find it more appropriate to deal with other financial institutions. Loans and mortgages with those institutions have gone up by 78 per cent.

I am not sure whether he is suggesting that I should start a campaign out in Alberta to encourage more businesses to borrow money from the banks. That is not the role of the Minister of Finance. It may be his role, but it certainly is not mine.

BUREAU OF COMPETITION

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Recently, considerations expressed by the Bureau of Competition Policy have made it practically impossible to integrate Canada Packers and John Labatt. This integration would have been a significant and desirable example of vertical integration in the agri-food industry. I think the criteria of the Bureau of Competition Policy contradict the intent of the Free Trade Agreement, and I want to ask the minister whether it would not be appropriate to suggest that the Bureau should adjust its criteria to the global village context?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the Bureau of Competition Policy and the Competition Act are responsible for ensuring that prices on our national markets are as competitive as possible, for the greater benefit of the consumer. I may add that in the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister made very clear that our businesses must be more competitive, both nationally and internationally. I believe that this is a challenge all of us must meet in this country, and in the months to come, we will have to ensure that being competitive means prosperity, and that prosperity will also mean lower prices for consumers. It is a challenge we must all meet together, and I am sure that we will be able to do so within our present structure and with the help of the Competition Act, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the government House leader. It is the traditional question on Business of the House.

Could he inform the House of the business for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday and the remaining part of next week?

An hon. member: And the end of June.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): End of June. The member just got back and he is anxious to leave already. Today we will continue third reading debate on Bill C-8, the bill respecting Crown corporation dissolution. I would like to designate tomorrow an allotted day for Supply.

Monday will be the final day of debate on the throne speech. As for Tuesday, at this point in time I am not certain as to the business. However, there is a possibility—and hon. critics in the opposition parties might consider this—of calling Bill C-6, an act respecting exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or dealing with certain weapons.

As for Wednesday and beyond, I would like to discuss with opposition House leaders an appropriate calendar so we can deal with the business of the House in an efficient and effective manner to enable not only the member for Saint-Denis, but all of us, to enjoy summer.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader.

The government has been promising a bill on gun control in Canada. He has designated next Tuesday as a day to discuss the bill for the exportation of guns. When are we going to get a day and a bill to deal with gun control in Canada?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member raised that question.

As he knows, in the previous session a bill was brought forward and its subject matter went to a committee of this House. It was dealt with extensively and recommendations were brought forward.

The Minister of Justice, who unfortunately is not here this week, has incorporated those recommendations into the redrafting of the bill. I am informed that the redrafting is nearly complete.

I would hope that, as a result of that pre-study, we will be able to deal with this matter expeditiously. Just as soon as it is available, I would hope to bring it in. I hope that this House can deal with it very rapidly, indeed.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to correct what might possibly have been an error in the course of Question Period.

In response to a question on defining what we consider to be weapons of mass destruction, I believe I included some of the wrong weapons in that category.

They would include neutron bombs, nuclear bombs, other nuclear weapons, chemical and biological weapons and things of that order. They would not include, as I believe I said, weapons that would involve ammunition and hand grenades.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order, or is he just rising?

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I was not quite sure what the minister's point of order was. I did not know whether he was withdrawing his other statement or adding to it.

I always thought that when someone was killed, it did not matter whether they were killed by a bullet or a nuclear—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister was doing what many members sometimes have to do, that is, make sure that the record correctly shows what was intended. That is what the minister rose to do.

If the hon. member wishes to raise the matter further, he will have to do it during Question Period or at another time.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION OR TRANSFER AUTHORIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C-8, an act to provide for dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River has 19 minutes remaining in his speech.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, before the break in the House just prior to Question Period and the lunch break, I was very close to wrapping up my remarks relating to the bill that would dispose of and sell Harbourfront land assets in the city of Toronto.

Of course, that is not the only asset involved in this bill but it is the major one. By rough calculations, the amount of money we are talking about regarding this particular Crown asset is estimated in one volume at approximately $400 million.

Lest anyone think this is a simple disposition, there are reports and reports, studies, appraisals, evaluations and commentary feet thick. That is because the interests involved are multi-jurisdictional and the assets involve many millions of dollars.

As I was completing my remarks, I was dealing with the issue of a confidentiality issue which had been imposed on aspects of the public discussions dealing with the disposition of these assets.

It is my view that the success or failure of such a disposition, when aspects of the process are not specifically detailed by legislation and when there is confidentiality involved, rests on the good faith, the honesty and the expertise of the individuals involved.

• (1510)

In this case they are individuals who are not government employees. They are not necessarily part of the federal infrastructure that we oversee here in this House.

I do not have to reiterate the many instances we have seen in the past of public maladministration. The taxpayer has suffered some very serious losses because of the lack of precision on the part of the government, corruption, dishonesty or a simple lack of expertise.

With respect to this bill, I want to state on behalf of my colleagues here and on behalf of the taxpayer that confidentiality should bear the scrutiny and oversight of Parliament. I believe that scrutiny and oversight will keep the system honest, effective, and will achieve the goals that we have put forward in this particular legislation.

Having said that, I will leave other issues to my colleagues in the House so that they may discuss these in debate in further detail.

On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor, I believe it is the wish of the two colleagues who will speak following me to split a 20-minute period. If that is acceptable to you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, we could proceed on that basis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Davenport, followed by the hon. member for Scarborough West on two 10-minute speeches.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, on the point just made by my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River, it is important to put on record the fact that what is happening here on Toronto's waterfront is a wholesale withdrawal of responsibility on the part of the federal government. This involves not only Toronto but other cities of Canada where there is a federal presence in the form of publicly owned lands.

What we see here today is the continuation of a Tory agenda whereby there is retreat from government. There is a belief that the public interest is better served by not providing certain services and by abandoning, in the case of Harbourfront, a very important investment made on behalf of the Canadian people 20 years ago in favour of some kind of sale of land, the outcome of which is still uncertain.

I refer to the plan whereby an endowment would be set up by way of the sale of Crown owned assets at Harbourfront. We do not know what the revenue will be from the sale. I can tell you that this fact alone casts a very large shadow on the credibility of the measure being proposed in this bill by the government.

We are told that what is required is an endowment of roughly $193 million that would permit the continuation of public programs, a variety of activities that take place at Harbourfront in Toronto. This city is represented by many colleagues of mine on this side of the House. The $193 million amount is not at all secure in the estimates being carried out by the city and metro. We understand the amount of the endowment that can be calculated at this stage and relied upon is roughly $80 million. In other words, what is required is 2.5 times the amount that seems to be predictable as the size of the endowment itself. Instead of $193 million, we are told we can count on an endowment resulting from the sale of these lands of some $80 million, which will result in a yearly deficit after revenue of some $8 million to $9 million.

It does not take a great accountant to realize what is happening here. Considerable cuts will have to be made to public programs which so far Torontonians have enjoyed year after year on their waterfront, at Harbourfront. The Tory government has decided they should be considerably reduced.

What is happening here in essence is that the federal government is threatening to walk away from Harbourfront. It is proposing with this bill an initiative that will leave the Harbourfront administration or its successor in a situation whereby it will not be able to support the present activities. The public will therefore suffer the consequences.

I cannot understand for the life of me why the minister in charge of this bill did not take the trouble today to put before us in the opposition and the public, through the media, the exact situation that has evolved over time. In other words, we are debating in a cloud of uncertainty. We do not know what are the exact figures. We can only make certain conclusions based on assumptions made by the city of Toronto property department and in a study that was prepared for metro some time ago.

I ask whether this is the way to run a government. Is this the way to manage the public interest? Is this the way to plan future recreational activities of a population of some 3.5 million people in the metro area? People of all ages and backgrounds of the entire metro region flock to Harbourfront on weekends in particular and during the week in order to enjoy the variety of programs.

This is politically an irresponsible way to proceed. I submit that this government is proceeding in a manner that will be remembered by the voters at the next election. Unless our assumptions are completely wrong—and this is why I am objecting strenuously to the fact that the minister did not take the trouble to put forward and define the situation—this will result, in the very near future, in a reduction of existing program activities and recreation at Harbourfront.

We have on this side of the House systematically said that these lands ought not to be sold, that these lands were bought for the public, and that they should remain in public ownership. They represent the only real estate or property that allows the citizens of metro Toronto direct access to their greatest and best ecological asset, namely their lake. As a result of this bill, this is no longer going to be the case for certain lands at Harbourfront.

We have here two losses. The first is the loss on the investment made. As I said, it was the result of a decision made in 1972 by a forward looking government. The second is the loss of a variety of culturally rich and much appreciated recreational programs on the waterfront which have attracted tens of thousands of people.

I have submitted these thoughts, Mr. Speaker, for your consideration in the hope that finally someone on behalf of the government will rise today and give a clear explanation of what exactly is going to be the situation in the city of Toronto and metro Toronto regarding the disposition of these lands, particularly in relation to the future of the programs at Harbourfront.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I wanted to do it before he got started. Mr. Speaker there have been discussions among the members and I believe that you will find there is unanimous consent to revert to presenting of committee reports.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–8, an act to provide for dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have a few moments to speak on Bill C–8. I want particularly to address my remarks to four short sections, namely sections 40 through 44, because they deal with Harbourfront, which is in the municipality of metropolitan Toronto.

I represent the riding of Scarborough West and there are many in Scarborough West, as there are many throughout the municipality of metropolitan Toronto, who take great pleasure particularly on a Sunday afternoon to go down to Harbourfront and enjoy the many activities available. These are family times. People can take their families there and have a wonderful time.

In addition, tourists go there by the thousands and this has been nothing but a benefit to the community of metropolitan Toronto.

How might that be affected by this bill? I think it could very well be and the answer is simple: the bill is almost naked insofar as its provisions to the Harbourfront Corporation are concerned.

In section 40 the bill authorizes the Minister of Public Works to procure the dissolution of Harbourfront Corporation, period. No guidance; simply go ahead and dissolve Harbourfront Corporation. One looks a little bit further to see what kind of guidance there should be and what sorts of criteria there should be; should there be a bottom–line sale price, whatever. The next section talks about the minister directing the corporation "to sell or otherwise dispose of any or all of its assets".

No direction whatsoever. No indication at all of what the corporation should be doing or how the corporation should be dissolving its assets.

We look further. We continue to look for guidance. We look to subsection 3 of section 41. The Minister of Public Works is authorized to do what with the money from the sale? I quote:

> —to pay all or any part of the proceeds of any disposition of its assets—to such person and on such terms and conditions as are approved by the Governor in Council.

Who is the Governor in Council? It certainly is not the people of Canada, it is not the people of metropolitan Toronto. It is, in effect, the cabinet. The cabinet can make whatever decision it wants. There is no guidance in the legislation as to what that decision should be, could be or might be. No guidance whatsoever. There is guidance for the directors of Harbourfront Corporation because they are told that once receiving a direction from the minister, they are authorized to sell or dispose of the assets in accordance with the direction without any personal liability to the directors whatsoever.

Why might that be a problem? For one thing, let us talk about the people of the city of Toronto, the people of the municipality of metropolitan Toronto. We know that this issue has been considered by the municipality in its metropolitan council. We also know that metropolitan council believes that the lands which are currently in public ownership should not be sold for development.

One might wonder why. What is wrong with that? They address that issue and they indicate in their conclusion on page 5, which they have drawn to the attention of this government: "That the waterfront, in general, and Harbourfront specifically, is a regional resource, attracting not only residents of all six area municipalities, but residents from throughout the greater Toronto area, as well as a significant tourist population. It is therefore critical that the metropolitan interests in enhancing access to and along the waterfront be addressed".

Is there anything at all in Bill C–8 that addresses those issues? The answer is no. I have read sections 40 and 42. The other three sections are in effect legislative housekeeping. That is all. There is no guidance whatsoever.

We do know that the government has what I will call good intentions about an endowment fund, about the opportunity to protect this area for the citizens of metro Toronto and the surrounding region. What in heaven's name does that mean? What are good intentions? We have heard the phrase "the road to hell is paved with good intentions". Good intentions without legislation are meaningless. The phrase used to be "good intentions and 25 cents will buy you a cup of coffee". I guess today you could say "good intentions and 75 cents will buy you a cup of coffee". Good intentions are still worth nothing.

It must be in the legislation and it is not in the legislation. If it is not in the legislation, there is no guarantee that the people of metropolitan Toronto will have that area protected for them.

What is the future to be? We have absolutely no idea what the future is going to be. Citizens of metropolitan Toronto are left to wonder, as everyone in this House is left to wonder, as to precisely what is going to occur when this government in effect privatizes Harbourfront and gets out of the business. This is after years and years of investing the taxpayers' money to build up Harbourfront. The taxpayers have put money into it. Now it is going to be dissolved. Are we going to get any money? We do not know. It depends on the real estate prices. Are the developers going to benefit? We do not know, but it looks like it.

We certainly do not know what the people of metropolitan Toronto are going to get out of it which will be beneficial. At this point I see nothing and guarantees of nothing.

I have to oppose Bill C–8 because of the lack of provisions dealing with Harbourfront.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to get on the record some concerns that I have about the process that is before us in the form of Bill C–8. It is difficult for the public to follow all of this.

This afternoon we are debating a federal bill which has to do with the disposition of lands in metropolitan Toronto. That sounds like a fairly straightforward piece of business. The truth is that it is not. Those of us who have followed this for some time know that Harbourfront has been the subject of a number of inquiries by four or five different levels of government.

This has gone on in a strange way. Most of us in this Chamber would advocate that the public's business ought to be transacted in public; that is, that the public has a right to see how the transaction is put together, who benefits and what the consequences of that are. This process has gone on for some time.

I recall when Harbourfront was first proposed the first things that went up were the billboards announcing Harbourfront. This went through I think about three or four federal elections. I could never find Harbourfront, only the billboards were there. Then eventually there was a place that one could identify as Harbourfront. As it grew it became a very vibrant part of the metropolitan Toronto and I dare say many people would argue that it is an international attraction at this time, that there are people from all over the world who are attracted to the Harbourfront in Toronto and to all of the activities that go on around that space.

It does seem strange then that this successful operation is now being marketed rather on the sly. There are different levels of government, including the province of Ontario, the city of Toronto, metropolitan Toronto and the federal government negotiating the disposition of these lands and the subsequent settlements about who will continue to run the programming on those lands.

I for one would argue that this is fine if that is what governments want to do, but at the very least the public has a right to know. All of us who sat on municipal councils, for example, would know that we would be in deep trouble at this stage if we tried to take an asset of any municipality in Canada, sell it off behind closed doors and do some kind of a deal that might continue the operation. Anybody who is on a council can try that tonight. Go home and tell your people you want to sell off the rink and do not worry about the operation of the arena in future years, we will work out some deal on the side. The rest of the council would have your scalp, and it ought to. That is not the way that the public's business ought to be dealt with.

The concerns I have centre around the way that the process has evolved. It is not that I have anything against David Crombie or Darcy McKeough, two very fine people who have worked very hard to try to put together something. There are a number of civil servants who have tried to deal with the problem of Harbourfront and how to go through a transitional period.

My concerns are pretty straightforward. At this point I do not know what will happen with those lands. I do know that the city, Metro, and the province of Ontario have all encountered great difficulty with developing plans for Harbourfront. They have had great difficulty dealing with the development around there now. If you wanted to see the Harbourfront parklands in Toronto you really have to get a boat and and see it from the lake. You cannot see it from the city of Toronto. You can get there. You can walk along there but you certainly would never know that it is there from most of downtown Toronto.

It is liked by the people, it is actually a success and has become kind of a focal point for a great many cultural festivals and for artists who work there. A great many ordinary people go there on a Sunday afternoon and wander around. It is clearly something that the people like and want. It is generally acknowledged as being a good thing. Now, behind closed doors, a deal is being put together to get rid of these assets.

I think you need to know a little history of Harbourfront to understand that this is a place where parkland appears suddenly in the water; one of the few modern miracles. It is true that developers who dedicate parkland as part of a development project have found a new technique for creating parkland. They dump fill into the lake and that is proposed parkland agreed upon by three or four different levels of government. That is a strange phenomenon.

Now we are supposed to take this bill and say that we acknowledge that the development of the Harbourfront project in metro Toronto did not go exactly as people thought it would. The concept originally was to set all of the development back from the waterfront so that the public would continue to have access to the water and the parkland that were there. Subsequently there might be some high-rise development around it but it surely would not be set in place to block the view from the city of Toronto. That is what happened. We regret that.

I hope this will not be taken as a model. I am aware, as I am sure all members are, that all across the north shore of Lake Ontario there are harbours that used to be industrial harbours and are now controlled by federal agencies called harbour commissions. There is ongoing warfare in each and every one of those communities because the shipping industry is not what it used to be. Others are moving in and saying they would like to build some nice high-rise apartments on the harbour and sell them off as harbourfront property, just like in Toronto. It is precisely this scheme that is being looked at all across the north shore of Lake Ontario from Hamilton in my area right out to the town of Newcastle. That includes projects already in the books, with plans proposed for places like Oshawa, Whitby, and Ajax.

The development industry is aware that this government is setting a pattern with this bill. I am concerned about that pattern. I would be much happier if we could follow the transactions which are taking place behind closed doors. I have a concern that the first phase of this project might look not too bad. It would not be hard for me to imagine that the Government of Canada would put together a deal with several private sector developers who provided a lot of money up front for the property.

The expectation is clear that the programming, the cultural activities, the access to the waterfront, and the use of the waterfront park will continue. It will not be interrupted. What is not clear is how that is going to be funded. Will the Government of Canada simply say as it has on a couple of other occasions: "Well, that's nice. We concluded our business. Somebody else pick it up and run with it from here"? I am sure that the city of Toronto is not quite prepared to accept this kind of international facility as being solely its responsibility, nor is metro, nor is the province of Ontario. I think the ongoing business dealings and the working out of details become more and more important as this bill nears the final stages. I think that part is important.

I want to sound, not a clarion call, but I want to sound a warning of danger here, as I see this as a model for harbourfront property all across Canada now in the possession of the federal government, if this process works at this one site in metropolitan Toronto. This is a government that has at least set its course fairly clearly. It loves to privatize things. The federal Government of Canada owns a lot of waterfront property all across this nation, at one time used very actively for harbour purposes, for ship-building purposes, but now not quite so active.

My concerns are very clear. If this turns out to be the way we do things in the future, if waterfront property owned by the federal government across Canada is dealt with in this way—that is to say a bill of this nature which says simply: "we want to privatize things, sell off some land", and then backroom deals on how the land is developed and how programming continues and what happens afterwards, and the rest is just left up in the air, if those deals are all private deals, struck with various civil servants or ministers of the Crown on what might happen, then I believe that the public has been gypped in this process.

The public initially paid a pretty hefty price for these lands. I think the public, as the property owners, have a right to know what the consequences of this bill and the subsequent transactions that are not a part of the bill will be, and what will happen in the future. They do not know that.

Any individual property owner who entered into this kind of negotiation would want to know all of the side bars. They would want to get their lawyers out and examine the fine print about what happens after the sale is concluded. People know that is important. The expectations of the public in Toronto, in metropolitan Toronto, in the province of Ontario, and indeed the taxpayers of Canada, who by and large funded this project initially, are to get something reasonable out of the sale.

Now there is no way for them to judge, because those negotiations are not a matter of public record yet, and probably will not be even after all the deals are concluded.

Those are my concerns. The initial problem of dealing with Harbourfront is hardly resolved by simply selling off the property. I do not think anybody would really advocate that.

However, there is a concern I have with the nature of going about that. Is it reasonable to say that all of the negotiations will be done virtually privately? That is quite wrong, it is a wrong way for a government to proceed. It is virtually immoral for any government to come forward with a bill of this nature which says, in very stark terms: "We want to privatize this particular harbourfront project", without full details accompanying it to explain to all of us just precisely how this thing is supposed to continue to operate. Is it the government's intent to turn it over to the private sector, lock, stock and barrel? That is, the physical assets of Harbourfront are sold now and somebody in the private sector is then supposed to arrange all of the cultural and artistic activities that will follow in years to come?

I understand that a developer would be very attracted to the notion of getting his or her hot little hands on this kind of prime waterfront property in downtown Toronto and operate some kind of programming on the side for a couple of years. I fail to see why they would have an interest in operating that for the next 20, 30, 40 or 50 years. The hard fact is that those developers, whatever their intentions might be today, are highly unlikely to be around and active in that project in 10 years. They will be long gone.

The nature of the development industry is to buy into a project like this, get something on the ground, get it sold, and get out of there. They do not see it as their responsibility—and I don't either—to run long-term cultural activities for metropolitan Toronto. I do not know of any developers around who have said: "It is our job as the private sector to run cultural activities for the next hundred years". I have never heard them say it and I doubt they would. I am sure many of them would say: "Well, if part of the condition of sale is that we do something for five years, we will be happy to do that because we can see where the end of that is".

I have many concerns about the specifics of this bill. I want to reiterate in closing my concerns about the pattern that is being set by this bill.

If this is the model that is to be used around Canada for disposing of waterfront property, this is the wrong model. I hope that it is not the model and that before this bill is concluded and dealt with by this House the minister would reply and give us the details of all the arrangements, all the little side bar agreements, concerning the continuing activities of Harbourfront.

I must admit that I know of a number of negotiations that are ongoing and of a number of people who have an interest. I do not know of any published accounts of the specifics of how it all will be handled, and I believe that to be crucial.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, we have some of the most magnificent land in North America, if not the world, in the harbourfront of Toronto. This is land which, through a public trust, has been developed into something which benefits not only the people of metropolitan Toronto, but Canadians as a whole. It has been converted to an asset the public can enjoy. It has enriched immeasurably our cultural life in Toronto through operations such as the artists' galleries, the theatres, the dance theatre, and events like the International Author's Festival, which has Harbourfront as its home and has put Canada on the map around the world as being a cultural centre, a country which nourishes its authors.

When we take the step of privatizing this land we must be assured that the public trust is looked after, that for the years to come the harbourfront will be a place for people, a place for enjoyment, a place for culture, not just a place for development. We have lots of places for development in this country. Does it have to be the choicest land in Toronto? Can we assure that, in perpetuity, the land will be devoted to these purposes? This is my question to the hon. member.

What assurance, with this bill before us, do we have that the activities commenced in such laudable fashion by Harbourfront will continue, that the people of Toronto and the people of Canada will continue to benefit in perpetuity the way they have in the past?

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the nature of my concern. There is absolutely no guarantee from anyone on record that I could find ensuring that those kinds of activities will continue for anything but a very short period of time. That is my concern. We have developed something which is, to be honest about it, one of the few internationally recognized places that Canada has for arts and cultural activities, it is marketed that way and it functions that way. It is a real success. The whole deal is being done behind closed doors and may be long gone before anybody has a chance to examine it. I do not agree that Harbourfront should be privatized in the first instance. That is the first problem I have.

Even if I agreed that it was the proper route to go, then at least the Government of Canada has an obligation to conduct its public business publicly. That is not happening. By the time all of this is concluded, it may be literally impossible for anyone to do anything about it. That is wrong.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the member for his comments today. I certainly appreciate his sincerity and his concern about negotiations that are going on behind closed doors.

One of the key participants in the negotiations is the provincial NDP government. I know my friend has influence at Queen's Park these days. His comments are a criticism of Bob Rae and the NDP government as he is accusing his cousins at Queen's Park of being surreptitious in dealing with public affairs and public matters behind closed doors.

It is so unlike the NDP to be doing what they are doing at Queen's Park. Is my friend at all pleased with the way the provincial NDP government is handling this particular issue? Will the hon. member use his influence and the influence of the federal New Democratic Party to convince Bob Rae and the NDP, who have ultimate control over land development in the province of Ontario, that there should be no other development at the waterfront, that the waterfront should remain a place for people and that the privatization should not continue. At the very least, can the hon. member influence Bob Rae to send out a very clear message that his government will not allow any further development at the waterfront.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is accusing me of criticizing Bob Rae, he is only about five years too late. I suppose that is consistent with him. If he is accusing me of saying that the Government of Ontario should not be the prime mover in all this, he is right. Unfortunately it is not. It is not setting the pattern for how this is handled. This is essentially being done by the federal government.

If he is accusing members of the province of Ontario of being supreme controllers of how this kind of land is developed in Ontario, he is wrong because they are not. I bet at this moment they wish they were.

I wish that the powers of the provincial government superseded the powers of the federal government. If that were the case then we could certainly put a stop to this. If we could get agreement here this afternoon to make that the case, if everybody in the House was quite happy to say "listen, the feds have botched this one up too; let us turn this over to the province of Ontario", I think we might actually get it all straightened out.

I would certainly use all the pitiful amount of influence I have with anybody to see that this process gets opened up just a bit more.

Just to conclude, one of the problems with this Harbourfront project and its history over the last little while is that no one level of government has clear responsibility over anything. I had a conversation with David Crombie, for example, on this matter. One of the things that he discovered is that there are some 50-odd agencies of different levels of government which have some measure of control over what happens in the Toronto harbour. That has been a major problem for everybody, because any time anyone wants to take some initiative, good or bad, the best that one can hope for is a stalemate, and that is wrong.

If the member wants to turn this over to the province of Ontario, I would be happy to do it. I am not sure the government would be prepared to do so, but, to tell you the truth, it would be a real good move on its part.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my friend makes a point about the different levels of government and different agencies having jurisdiction. We know now that the federal government owns land at Habourfront. We know as well that the province of Ontario has jurisdiction over planning, which is delegated to municipalities, in this case the city of Toronto.

The federal government has control because it does not have to sell the land. The provincial government can simply say: "Pursuant to the authority that we have vis-à-vis development and land use at this particular site, we are not going to allow any more development". Bob Rae does have the opportunity here. I accept my friend's point that he has been in some disagreement with the premier for some time. His criticism is well taken.

With regard to the federal government, it would be my view that this bill should not proceed, that we ought not to privatize Harbourfront. This entity provides the cultural activities which include an art gallery, the dance theatre, a children's summer camp, outdoor festivals, book readings and park and waterfront activities. We should not be privatizing Harbourfront. As well, the federal government should not be selling land to private interest, especially when that land happens to be parkland and when that land happens to be at the waterfront in metropolitan Toronto.

We know that the politicians and the bureaucrats have really goofed when it comes to metropolitan Toronto. I do not know when you last visited Toronto, Mr. Speaker, but you know that a number of very ugly buildings have been built over the last number of years at the water's edge in metropolitan Toronto. I do not know how the provincial government, the municipal government or the federal government allowed that to happen. The fact that it has happened leads us to question very seriously what is going on with this particular bill.

• (1550)

My friend raised the concern about private dealings behind closed doors. There is a lot of private dealing going on and this government should put a stop to it.

This bill does not clearly indicate what is to happen. It simply gives authority under section 40 to the minister:

> 40. (1) The Minister of Public Works is hereby authorized to procure, on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada, the dissolution of Harbourfront Corporation.
> (2) The Minister of Public Works may do all things and perform all acts necessary for or incidental to closing out the affairs of Harbourfront Corporation.

And section 41:

> 41. (1) Before Harbourfront Corporation is dissolved pursuant to section 40, the Minister of Public Works may direct the Corporation to sell or otherwise dispose of any or all of its assets, including shares of any other corporation—

One of the main assets that Harbourfront has is land. What is proposed—I cannot understand it for the life of me—is that public land owned by the Government of Canada is to be sold to private interests to put up expensive, luxury condominiums so developers can make a lot of money and so that rich people can have a coined with a balcony looking out over the beautiful water of Lake Ontario.

Mr. Langlois: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Nunziata: The Conservative member opposite says there is nothing wrong with the federal government selling public parkland in order to benefit the rich and wealthy.

There are a lot of poor people and not so poor people in metropolitan Toronto who cannot escape to Roscoe Lake on the hot summer weekends in order to boat at their cottages.

A lot of residents of metropolitan Toronto have the waterfront for their recreation during the summer months.

This government is proposing to sell that very valuable asset. Why? Not to reduce the deficit. We know that the government has gone to extremes in order to reduce the national deficit, but it says it wants to sell part of the land in order to create a trust fund so that Harbourfront can be financed in perpetuity.

In other words, sell public parkland to developers. Let them make hundreds of millions of dollars building luxury condominiums or luxury hotels on the waterfront. The revenue from the sale of this land will go into a little trust fund and the interest, whether 10, 11 or 12 per cent a year, will be used to carry on these very worth-while activities, including children's summer camp, summer festivals and book reading.

The responsibility to provide those programs is the responsibility of government, whether it is the federal government, the provincial government or the two municipal governments; the city of Toronto and metropolitan Toronto.

It is penny wise and pound foolish for the government to be selling assets in order to create trust funds in order to carry on certain activities.

If one were to advance this type of philosophy or logic on the part of the Government of Canada, then why does it not sell the House of Commons? Why does it not sell the lawn in front of the Peace Tower to private interests? One would have all kinds of private business interested in securing the rights to the lawn in front of the House of Commons.

We can still have the right to debate in the Chamber, but the money could be used in order to pay for MP's salaries or expenses. It is nonsense and it ought not to be done. We should not be selling public land or parkland in order to finance programs. I would hope that this government will realize the terrible mistake it is making. It may think that it has a short-term solution to the problems at Harbourfront. It does not want to continue funding the activities at Harbourfront.

Future generations, our children and our grandchildren, will look back to the decision of this particular Conservative government and say: "What absolute and utter nonsense, what stupidity for the government 20 or 30 years ago to sell public land on the waterfront in metropolitan Toronto to private interests". It just does not make any sense at all. That land should be developed as parkland. It should remain in public hands. The waterfront is for the people of metropolitan Toronto, the people of Ontario and the people of Canada and it should be developed as such.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, we rise today to talk about friends of the Conservative government at the trough. This has been done constantly since 1984. We remember what the Prime Minister said during the campaign of 1984: "No other appointments will be done until every breathing and living Tory has been appointed".

Who the Tories do not appoint through different agencies they tend to take care of themselves. We have clearly seen Huang Danczkay at the airport in Toronto. The name Huang Danczkay comes up again when we talk about the waterfront.

This government wants to do away with a beautiful small property that is left in downtown Toronto. It wants to sell it like it has sold other things to its rich friends, people who come to the trough. What are we going to see? We are going to see condominiums 20 and 30 storeys high blocking the view of the average person in Toronto going to the lake, even though it is polluted.

I notice that my friends from the NDP are not here to listen to this. During the provincial campaign all sorts of promises were made about how this was going to be taken care of. It has not happened.

I want to go back in history and talk about Route Canada. I notice that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship is here and he is taking a great interest and taking notes. I also will try to tell him that what this government has done is an injustice to the Canadian public. It is an injustice to all of us and to our children.

CN Express was sold for roughly $29 million in 1985–86. It was turned into Route Canada. The person who bought CN Express could not even get a credit card and yet we gave him part of Canada. He went running to the bank. He said: "Mr. friendly banker, I've got this white elephant that the government is giving me. How much money will you give me?" The bank looks at the deal and says: "Oh, it's a good deal. We're going to give you $50 million". He used that money. He bought Jaguars and he financed telephones and fax machines in its cars in the middle eighties. That was unheard of.

There was a deal struck between Route Canada buyers and the Canadian government which said that the employees of Route Canada should be kept on for three years. Eighteen months later that agreement was no longer valid. When the government was asked to open all the books and show what it has done, it found all kinds of excuses. One minister said: "I was not in power then. It was this minister". Like usual, we shuffle the deck, we have musical chairs of cabinet ministers and there is no responsibility as we clearly saw a couple of days ago in the Al-Mashat case.

Then came Air Canada. The Minister for International Trade said: "It's going to be a great deal to privatize this. It is going to be a great deal". The Canadian public was saying no. Did the government across the way listen? It was deaf. There was nothing there for it. It had ear plugs on and it was not even paying attention. The results: just a couple of months after this was taking place, 2,900 jobs were lost; VIA cutbacks and the list goes on and on and on. Now Harbourfront. Where will it end?

Some people say the Liberal Party is not for privatization. If it is a fair value market, if we are going to put what this land is worth on the table and if we are going to get a fair market value, then everybody in this House will support privatization. The government across the way is doing a gross injustice to the Canadian public. Time after time the Canadian public is raped, by either careless mistakes or intentional doings of this government.

I would not doubt for a single minute that we are going to have a fire sale in the next couple of months and this government is going to put right outside this House: "Fire sale. Our national parks are up for sale".

Do you know what is going to happen? When we go to visit our national parks there will be somebody at the toll booth and he is going to say: "It is $30 or $40 for you to get in. Canadian public, we are going to take you to the cleaners".

"People of Canada, we want to please our friends. We want to please the people who put us here. We want to please big businesses". It was those big businesses that during the elections bought the ads and in 1988 sank millions of dollars to turn the voting public. They sank millions of dollars to tell the Canadian people that free trade was going to be good for them. We have clearly seen that the free trade legislation, since its implementation has cost Ontario, my home province, 200,000 jobs. Where will it stop?

I want to return to the Harbourfront issue because it is very important for me, my children and the children of the three million Canadians who call the greater metropolitan Toronto area their home. Some of the members across the way might be from other parts, but when they have the opportunity to visit Toronto, one landmark they always come to see is Ontario Place, the Canadian National Exhibition, and then they see this beautiful park.

Mr. Weiner: In your riding?

Mr. Karygiannis: That is not my riding. The minister across the way says "in my riding". I welcome him any time to come to my riding, because the lesson that the Canadian people gave to the Conservative member of my riding before is the same lesson that this government will receive in 1992 or 1993. If it has the guts it will call an election today. I notice there are some ministers in this House today. Maybe they can take that message back to the Prime Minister. Maybe when he comes back from Hong Kong they can say: "Why don't you call an election?"

Mr. Speaker, I notice you are telling me to stay on the subject. It is a gross indecency when we say to the Canadian public that we are going to sell this small property, this stamp of a land, for $36 million, when we fully well know that it is worth ten times as much.

Petro-Canada, which the minister wants to put on the block, has a value figure of roughly $.8 billion. In my riding alone there are something like 15 Petro-Canada stations. They are located at the most prominent corners. Every corner is worth at least $2 million to $3 million; $45 million in one riding alone. What if you multiply that by 295 ridings across this country? How much is Petro-Canada worth? What is the real market value of everything that this governments wants to put on the block?

Just recently and today we have seen the minister rise up and say that the Canada Post Corporation is making money. It is only making money on paper. Why? I have a gut feeling that it is going to be next on the chopping block.

As we continue discussions, it turns my stomach upside down, on a daily basis, to listen to the average Canadians, to listen to the unemployed Canadians, to listen to Canadians who say enough with this country and move down south because of the carelessness of this government.

The Toronto harbourfront is verging on disaster. We cannot swim in the lakes any more. Don River is a disaster. Instead of using some of that money to clean these places up, we are going to sell them and give them to our rich friends.

When landing on Toronto island, coming across from Oshawa there are the Scarborough Bluffs. Thank God they are not owned by this government because it would probably put them on the block. Then there is downtown. The only thing to see is a wall of high-rises. There is a little stamp of land there called Harbourfront. We are going to see high-rises there very soon because this government will probably have its way. This government will probably turn around and rape the people of Canada in a gross indecency, but the people of Canada in 1992 will take care of this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—employment; the hon. member for Ottawa West—Public Service; the hon. member for Saint-Léonard—economy.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on May 14—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry. I would just like to remind the hon. member that we are under new rules of four minutes plus two minutes from the government.

Mr. Allmand: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I read the rules from cover to cover.

On May 14, I put a question to the Prime Minister regarding the unemployment situation in Montreal. I referred to a recent report indicating that 25 per cent of Montrealers were on unemployment insurance or welfare.

According to the recent statistics, Montreal has the highest urban unemployment rate in Canada and the highest urban poverty rate in Canada. Despite these shocking statistics, the government, in the Speech from the Throne, promised a number of new jobs by the year 2000.

If the government is really interested in the unemployment problem, why is it setting targets for the year 2000 when the needs are in 1991?

The question I put on May 14 was why do we not have a target, an agenda or a program for creating jobs this year, in 1991, to deal with the situation in Montreal and other places in Canada where there are high unemployment rates.

Well, the Prime Minister did not answer my question, and the minister who did answer my questions gave me no answer whatsoever. He referred to a few marginal programs that the government set up in Montreal and said they were working well. How can anyone believe that sort of bumph? He says they are working well, yet there is nearly a 25 per cent combined unemployment and welfare rate in Montreal. Montreal has the highest unemployment figures in Canada and the minister says they are working well.

Just three days later, three days after I asked that initial question, Pascal's, a business that has been a successful business in Montreal for 87 years, went bankrupt. Twenty-one stores closed and 1,600 employees lost their jobs.

This government is a government of rhetoric, of overstatement and of exaggeration. It makes such outlandish statements that nobody believes anything it says any more.

When the economy was improving in 1984, the government took full credit for all the jobs that were being created. If the government had the recipe for job creation in 1985 and 1986, if it had the formula to create jobs then, why is it not producing that recipe today?

Why is it not laying down targets and programs for job creation in 1991 when the unemployment rate is over 10 per cent in Canada and when there are more than 1 million Canadians without work? In Montreal, we have a disaster zone.

If the government was really responsible and if it really had the answers and formulas for job creation, it would carry them out. The government would put them forward.

I will repeat my question. It is a simple one. Instead of a timetable for jobs for the year 2000—and I am not opposed to a timetable for jobs for the year 2000—why does it not give us a timetable for jobs for the year 1991?

I do not want an answer to some question that I have not asked at all. I will warn the public observing this debate that I will probably get some parliamentary secretary giving me an answer that was prepared by some civil servant somewhere that will have nothing to do with my question, confirming my point that this is a government of nonsense.

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce said, he is indeed being answered by a parliamentary secretary, but I will try to give him as logical an answer as possible that will deal with his concerns.

Mr. Speaker, our government has set up and implemented many medium- and long-term strategies to stimulate Montreal's economy and thus the economy of Quebec. Further to the CRESSOM report, Employment and Immigration Canada will contribute $32.5 million over the next five years to help community groups and municipal bodies find long-term solutions for the problems of restructuring Montreal's disadvantaged neighbourhoods.

In the field of training, Mr. Speaker, Employment and Immigration Canada spent $2 million in November 1990 to set up a petrochemical training centre in eastern Montreal. We are answering the call of the petrochemical industry, which needs skilled workers.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that Montreal will receive its fair share of a new labour force development strategy that increases by $800 million the funds to train the unemployed, welfare recipients, older workers and young people. Furthermore, the jobs strategy programs help nearly 8,000 individuals. In 1990-91, $32 million was spent on training programs in Montreal.

I would also like to remind the hon. member that from September 1984 to April 1991, net employment increased by 96,000 in the Montreal area. Under the previous government, from 1980 to 1984, Montreal lost 4,000 jobs.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak further on the question I posed in the House yesterday concerning the unequal treatment of women in the Public Service of Canada.

I want to repeat the basic fact that nearly half the people working for the Public Service of Canada are women. In the management category of the Public Service of Canada, they number less than 16 per cent.

Clearly, consistent discrimination is at work to recognize people for promotion based not on what they can do but what the shape of their body is. The same barriers apply to people of visible minorities, aboriginal Canadians and people with disabilities.

I am not going to focus on them. I have spoken on them often in the House, and I will again. Today, I want to focus particularly on the status of women.

The Public Service Commission's annual report is merely the latest proof that simply setting targets to eliminate barriers to hiring advancement and promotion has failed to bring about real change.

The task force on barriers to women in the Public Service, which reported just a year ago last month, made it absolutely clear that the reason women do not advance in the Public Service of Canada is a cultural bias against women. It is not something that employers consciously do. It is just that, particularly at the senior levels, for all their working lives they have been surrounded by managers who happened to be male. Their whole image of successful managers is seen in male terms.

The government has talked about the few women it has appointed—and I am pleased to see the improvements—through Order in Council appointments, but these are small and insignificant measures. It is what happens to women in their everyday working lives for the Government of Canada that determines whether or not they are going to be able to support their families to the same measure, whether they are going to be able to progress and succeed, using the brains and talent they have in the best interests of their country.

Others have said it better than I, but a woman pays as much for a loaf of bread as a man does. A women pays as much for her children's shoes as a man does. She does not deserve to earn only 55 cents for every dollar a man does. It is not that women in the Public Service are less educated. They happen to be better educated than males in the Public Service.

The government talks about women in the management category. Some progress has been made. It went from a little over 14 per cent last year to a little over 15 per cent this year. Out of a management category of over 4,000 people, less than 1,000 are women. That is not right and that is not just. Examining who gets promoted, who gets hired, who gets appointed, who gets the opportunity for lateral transfers to broaden their experience, clearly explains why. Less than 25 per cent of promotions were women. Less than 25 per cent of appointments from outside into the management category were women. Barely over 20 per cent of appointments within the management category were women. Less than 20 per cent of lateral transfers, which are an opportunity to broaden experience, were women.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address briefly the question raised by the hon. member concerning the so-called barrier to women in the Public Service. She certainly realizes that great efforts and progress have been made in the last few years in that respect, especially by our government.

We too realize that much progress is yet to be made. The Prime Minister has repeatedly said in the House that this government will continue to make every effort possible in order to change and improve the situation.

I commend the hon. member for raising this matter again today. I would like to give my assurance that every effort will be made by the government to continue to improve that situation.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion that the House do now adjourn is deemed to have been adopted. Therefore this House now stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 4.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 24, 1991

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should take into full account the budgetary reality of the provinces and municipalities involved in Royal Canadian Mounted Police contract negotiations and therefore be prepared to negotiate a contract for RCMP services which does not unfairly transfer policing costs from the federal government to provincial and municipal governments.

He said: Madam Speaker, for the benefit of members and people watching this debate, we in the NDP are calling on the government to renegotiate in good faith fair policing contracts for those provinces which use the RCMP as their provincial and municipal police forces.

We believe this is an extremely urgent issue for Canadians because it touches on some of the most important issues that Canadians are debating today.

First and foremost is the national unity debate. As a result of Tory ideology, which has undermined or destroyed many of the national institutions and symbols that Canadians hold dear, such as the national passenger rail service, Canada Post, the privatization of Air Canada and Petro-Canada and the continuing attack on the CBC, many Canadians feel that the symbols and the structures underlying Canadian unity have been undermined almost to the point of destruction by implementation of Tory policy.

The Tories have justified their attack on Canadian institutions by saying that these institutions cost too much in this day and age. As many political observers have said, Tories seem to know the cost of everything and the value of nothing. As a result, this country is facing its worst and possibly its last unity crisis.

The second issue in terms of the debate on the RCMP police contracts is the way that the Tories have handled the crisis in budgets and programs of the federal government. The recent Tory budget has cut back on transfers to the provinces, transfers which support cost-shared programs such as hospitals, post-secondary education, social services and other programs in the provinces in order to maintain a decent and level standard of equality services all across this country. As a result of those federal cutbacks, Canadians in various parts of the country are going to be receiving different qualities of service based on the ability of the provinces to support.

The Tories have also cut back income support programs such as family allowance and old age pensions, which are also seen as the basis of national unity in this country and which give every Canadian in every part of this country a fair shake regardless of place of residence. The criterion for eligibility for these programs is simply being Canadian. Now the federal Tories, based on their ideology, have begun to tinker with these programs so that Canadians cannot access them equally, depending on where they live in the country, on income, and other things.

All of these national institutions, whether based on social programs or on national institutions and symbols such as the CBC, the communications system, the rail transportation system, or the Canada Post system, are being undermined. Canadians are losing a fundamental understanding of what really underlies this nation, something we have treasured over the last 125 years.

There is one national symbol of Canada that is recognized all across this country and all around the world. That symbol is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which was established as the North-West Mounted Police in the 1870s. That police force was a federal police force which was designed to bring law and order and orderly development to the west at a time when Canadians were viewing the chaos taking place in the United States. Canadians felt that a police force was necessary to bring good government, law and order, and good policing to western Canada. The North-West Mounted Police later became the national police of Canada and the police force in many of the provinces and municipalities of Canada; a great deal of respect has accrued to that police force both in the country and around the world.

It is very difficult to identify any other symbol which might be more representative of Canada than the red serge uniform of the RCMP. When somebody comes to the Canadian capital they have their picture taken with an RCMP officer in the dress uniform.

In provincial capitals they do the same thing. In citizenship court one of the symbols of Canada that is evident along with the flag and the coats of arms is the red serge uniform of the RCMP. It is seen as a symbol of Canada both nationally and internationally.

In renegotiating the terms of the contracts with the provinces which use the RCMP in their municipalities, the Solicitor General and the Government of Canada are taking an intransigent position in demanding that the municipalities and provinces pay a higher share of the cost. In doing so, the federal government is putting even the institution of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in jeopardy.

What it is telling the provinces and municipalities which contract for those RCMP services is that it is going to raise the price so high and make policing such a burden on the taxpayers that there is now an option. They can create their own municipal police force or provincial police force and the federal government will get out of that area of policing entirely.

There are going to be serious repercussions across Canada in terms of national unity and in terms of recognition of the symbols and institutions of this country if the government proceeds in its hard-nosed intransigent stance in dealing with the Canadian provinces and municipalities which contract for RCMP services.

One of the major contractors for the services of the RCMP is the province of British Columbia, the province from which I come. According to the Union of B.C. Municipalities, which has put together substantial research on this issue, 27 per cent of the RCMP force in Canada is in B.C.; out of 15,000 RCMP members 4,000 are posted to British Columbia.

The province of British Columbia is also a major contractor for Royal Canadian Mounted Police services. Out of 8,000 contracting RCMP members, 3,100 of those are posted in British Columbia. Thirty-nine per cent of all the contracted provincial police services through the RCMP are contracted within that province. That same thing applies to members of the RCMP who are contracted at the provincial level.

This is a very important issue for municipalities within the province of British Columbia because they employ 1,900 out of the 3,000 RCMP members contracted to municipalities across Canada. That is, 63 per cent of all the members of the force who are contracted to municipalities work in the municipalities of British Columbia, serving close to a million and a half British Columbians.

This is a very important issue in British Columbia. I do not want to understate how important it is in western Canada as well. The RCMP has been the traditional police force in western Canada since the North-West Mounted Police originated in the 1870s.

We are concerned about the effect on British Columbia. Municipalities have advised us that if the federal government persists with its intransigent position in RCMP contract negotiations, it is going to cost the municipalities of that province an additional $12.5 million annually to support the RCMP. That translates over the 10-year term of the contract into an additional $125 million being bled out of those municipalities to support police services.

In the case of the government of the province of British Columbia which contracts to the RCMP for its provincial police, it means an additional $27 million a year to a government which has just budgeted a $395 million deficit.

We are talking about a province unable to pay those kinds of increases and municipalities within that province which are unable to pass on those kinds of increases to their taxpayers without creating a serious burden. It will be a burden on taxpayers which in addition to other federal taxes such as excise taxes, fuel taxes, goods and services taxes, increased income taxes, increased charges for all federal services, and another tax increase passed on to municipal property owners and residents as a result of the policing contracts with the federal government is going to be absolutely impossible to bear. These costs run so high for municipalities in British Columbia right now—some municipalities pay up to 37 per cent of their revenues for policing costs—that there may be no legal avenue for them to pass those costs on to property taxes.

What we are talking about here is another element of Conservative policy that is involved in this debate: the aspect of constantly increasing taxes on the lower and middle classes in this country which are being expected to support these kinds of services when the federal government is fully capable of providing services at the current cost-sharing level.

I just wanted to mention some of the impacts on municipalities within my riding, and I will quote from some of the mayors in the riding of Comox—Alberni. For example, Mayor Ron Webber of Courtenay, British Columbia, has said that over the past years the presence of the RCMP has provided a cost effective and efficient method of providing total policing for federal and municipal responsibilities.

It is also an important factor in maintaining a federal presence in our community and contributes greatly to preserving a sense of national identity in these threatened times.

The increase proposed by the federal government represents a 17.35 per cent increase in a single year and would result in a 5.4 per cent increase in municipal property tax rates.

It should also be pointed out that this analysis is based on the city's fiscal year, which is the calendar year, and that the impact of the federal proposal for a full fiscal year at the new tax rates would result in a 25 per cent increase in the cost of policing services for that small municipality and a 7.8 per cent increase in tax rates.

For communities like Courtenay, British Columbia, a 25 per cent increase in policing costs and a 7.8 per cent increase in taxing based on those costs and on the federal contract proposal are simply far too much for those municipalities and those taxpayers to bear.

As a result, they are going to be forced into a position either of cutting back on police services at a time when we are reading in The Ottawa Citizen that women in communities such as Ottawa are fearful of going out at night in their own neighbourhoods because of danger to their physical well-being.

Now is not the time to start cutting back on RCMP services or on the fairness of cost distribution among the federal government, the provinces and the municipalities.

Now is the time for the federal, provincial, and municipal governments to be maintaining and improving services. It is time for the federal government to accept its share of the responsibility so that men and women in our communities across Canada can feel safe going out at night in their neighbourhoods.

Now is not the time to start pushing this kind of contract proposal on to the provinces and municipalities in western Canada. Now is the time when they can least afford to bear it.

I would also like to quote the mayor of Port Alberni, the city where I live. He says: "A prime example of the federal benefit of municipal policing is their front line enforcement against drug offences. This is an area of federal policing responsibility which is handled on a more cost effective basis by contract police forces. If it were not for municipal contracts, the cost to the federal government would most assuredly be increased".

The mayor of Port Alberni and I do not always agree, but in this case we are absolutely in agreement.

If the federal government persists in its intransigent position with respect to increasing costs to the province and the municipalities within the province of British Columbia, it is going to persuade some of those municipalities to go to municipal police forces.

It may persuade the province to go to a provincial police force, and we are going to end up with the kind of balkanized police jurisdiction where the transfer of information either slows down or does not exist.

We are going to have a situation similar to that in the United States where they have local police, county police, state police and the national police force, the FBI. Information transfer between those police agencies is often extremely difficult, if it exists at all.

There is often a confusion over jurisdiction on issues which are seen to be federal, state, local or county. As a result, police services in the United States often break down and do not perform as effectively as they should.

I do not think that there is anyone in Canada or around the world who is not aware of the effectiveness of the RCMP as a national police force, a provincial police force, and as a municipal police force.

Part of the reason for the effectiveness of that force is that it is able to integrate its services at all three levels of government. Its communications systems operate between the three levels of government and for that reason it is far more effective.

I hope that members in this House will support the resolution that I have put forward, will do their best to persuade the Solicitor General and the Government of Canada that the cost base of the RCMP contract in western Canada is appropriate, that we should not be trying to force increases in the provincial or the municipalities' share, and that the federal government should be accepting its full responsibility. If not, the result, as I have pointed out, is to jeopardize national unity. The result will further increase the tax burden on the provinces and the municipalities, while at the same time reduce the effectiveness of policing at the very time in Canada when we would like to increase the security and the safety of our citizens, at the very time in Canada when people are beginning to be afraid to go out in their own neighbourhoods.

I urge members to support this resolution. I also urge the Solicitor General to support this resolution and get down to the business of negotiating, in good faith, with the western provinces and the municipalities that contract with the federal government for RCMP services.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I am absolutely astounded that the member from lotus land wants other Canadian taxpayers to subsidize policing services in British Columbia.

British Columbia has an economy that is doing better than any other province in the country. Right now, for example, in Ontario we are having a very difficult time. I find it very odd that the member should be demanding that we pay for his province's policing services.

The RCMP can certainly stay there, but British Columbia should pay the cost of its own policing. Local control means that we have local funding for the level of policing that we want in our community. That should not be paid for by other Canadian taxpayers.

Certainly national unity is not dependent on subsidies.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I think if the member had any understanding or experience of British Columbia at all, instead of insulting it by calling it lotus land, she would know that in communities like mine we have just lost over 400 jobs in the plywood industry. There is some question as to whether some of those communities in western Canada are going to survive. Much of the losses are a result of Tory trade policy.

Perhaps the hon. member should spend a little more time in British Columbia to learn exactly how much British Columbia contributes, not simply to its own economy, but to the economy of Canada as a whole.

We are very proud, as British Columbians, that we have never stinted in providing the revenue from our resources and the income taxes and other taxes that hard-working British Columbians pay. We pay our share, and more.

What we are asking in terms of police services is that we get a little bit of that back. We are not asking for the whole amount back. We are asking that we get a little bit of the revenues that we pay to the federal government back in order to provide a decent standard of police services in the province of British Columbia.

I can tell the hon. member that British Columbians are not going to receive very well the insult of that Tory member calling British Columbia lotus land.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I could hardly believe my ears when I heard the member for Don Valley North insult the three million Canadians who live in British Columbia by calling it lotus land. The member should visit the province.

• (1030)

I finally discovered this morning what those opposite are trying to do. The Prime Minister is trying to get the Republican nomination for vice-president in the next election. How is he trying to do it? He is trying to turn Toronto, Vancouver, Ottawa and every city within driving distance of the border into shopping suburbs of New York, Buffalo and places like that. In the case of the member's constituency, he is trying to turn Toronto into a shopping suburb of Buffalo.

Where has the hon. member been. Does she not realize that 400,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost in Ontario in the last 18 months? Where has she been for the last 18 months?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is an experienced member and he knows that his comments should be addressed to the hon. member for Comox—Alberni's speech and not from a comment from another member.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I was about to get to the question for the member from British Columbia.

How many young British Columbians joined the RCMP? Is it not one of the few federal agencies with which they have a chance to take positions and have careers? Does he have the figures on that, and perhaps for western Canada as a whole?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his questions. I also thank him for his comments on the previous questioner. I feel that they should not have gone without a response because they were so far off the mark.

No, unfortunately I do not have the numbers of British Columbians joining the RCMP and so I cannot provide that information.

As aboriginal affairs critic for the New Democratic Party in the House of Commons I am concerned, for example, about the number of aboriginal people who enter the RCMP. The department of indian affairs pays a substantial amount to the RCMP for native auxiliary RCMP. The RCMP does not even meet the quota that the department of indian affairs funds. The RCMP is subsidized by the department of indian affairs but does not deliver the number of aboriginal police officers they should be delivering.

I cannot provide the hon. member with the number of British Columbians who join the RCMP on an annual basis, but I will definitely look it up. There are some problems with recruitment which have been identified in a number of the justice studies across Canada.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I do have one quick question for the member from Vancouver Island.

In my area the proposed cutbacks in RCMP funding by the federal government have resulted in what can charitably be described as ill will toward the current government from people across Alberta. This is a major factor contributing to the growing unlikelihood of the re-election of Conservative members in Alberta. I was wondering if the same holds true in British Columbia.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, the likelihood of a Conservative member being elected in British Columbia is very remote at this point. It is about as remote as the possibility of a federal election. In fact, I am told that 14 per cent of the population believe that the Conservative government is doing a good job and 15 per cent believe they saw Elvis Presley in the 7-Eleven last week. What is really scary is that some of those are the same people.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Royal Canadian Mounted Police celebrated its birthday. In 1873, the North-West Mounted Police was founded. It was later to become known as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The RCMP, as was indicated, is an important national symbol for Canadians. It is one of the most important national symbols that we have in Canada.

People world wide know about the RCMP. In fact, they make movies in Hollywood about the RCMP and the work of the RCMP. It is well known that the RCMP always gets their person.

The federal government is now bent on wiping out the RCMP in western Canada and in Atlantic Canada. At present, the RCMP acts as the provincial police force in eight of the 10 provinces and in the two territories. The federal government also contracts the RCMP to municipalities in those eight provinces.

In the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, there are provincial police forces. In the province of Ontario we have the OPP and in Quebec the Sûreté du Québec. Those of us who reside and have our constituencies in Ontario and Quebec do not realize how important the RCMP is to western Canada and to western Canadians.

Over the last number of months, in fact over the last year, the government has been negotiating a new contract, and has acted in bad faith. The old contract expired on March 31 of this year. The present Solicitor General is sitting in the House today. He is responsible for negotiating this new contract with the provinces to ensure that the RCMP continue to provide the important and essential services it provides in western and Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Kilgour: He is also an Ontario member.

Mr. Nunziata: That previous contract expired and the government, in advance of the expiration of that previous contract, said it was not prepared to bend at all regarding the proposal it had put forward to renegotiate the contract. This is a new 10-year contract that will see the relationship continue from this year until the year 2001.

The contract expired and the contract services continue, but under no contract. The government has been totally intransigent in terms of negotiating in good faith.

At present the federal government pays 30 per cent of the cost of those services in western Canada. The member for North York should know that the provinces and municipalities in western Canada pay the lion's share, 70 per cent, of the cost of RCMP services in western Canada and in Atlantic Canada.

The government is proposing to cut the federal share to 25 per cent. As well, the Government of Canada, through the Solicitor General, wants to impose additional administrative costs on the municipalities and the provincial governments. That will mean an additional cut of $79 million from the federal government. At present the federal government's share is some $251 million.

It is my view that these cuts are part of a systematic and deliberate program to dismember and destroy our country and the national symbols that exist in Canada that promote national identity and Canadianism. In seven short years—long years to a lot of us on this side of the House—this government has systematically cut institutions right across the board. It started by dismantling FIRA, the Foreign Investment Review Agency. It is privatizing Petro-Canada. It has privatized Air Canada. It is in the process of privatizing Harbourfront in metropolitan Toronto. It has cut the CBC. It is cutting Canada Post. It has destroyed VIA Rail and now is bent on destroying the RCMP in western Canada.

What is the agenda? I believe that is a fair question to ask.

Mr. Kilgour: Brian wants to run as vice-president in the U.S.

Mr. Nunziata: My friend from Alberta says that the Prime Minister wants to run for vice-president of the United States.

• (1040)

The cynics among us would tend to agree that the government's agenda includes the gradual disintegration of our country and integration into the United States.

Municipalities will be hard hit by these proposals of the federal government. In effect, what the federal government is trying to do is reduce the deficit on the backs of municipalities in western Canada and in Atlantic Canada. They are trying to off-load expenses, in this case $79 million this year.

When you consider the importance and the benefit of the RCMP in western Canada, it really makes you wonder about the government's priorities. It seems to be able to find money, left and right, to accommodate the friends of the Tory government, friends of the Prime Minister, and friends of cabinet ministers, giving them all kinds of untendered contracts. The government is paying legal fees for Sinclair Stevens, $500,000, and $5 million to conduct a royal commission of inquiry into the conduct of a former Conservative cabinet minister who was found to be in breach 17 or 18 times over of the conflict of interest guidelines.

The government seems to be able to find money when it comes to accommodating its own interests. But when it comes to dealing with some important matters that face Canadians, it does not seem to be able to find the necessary resources. Is it any wonder that western Canadians sense this growing alienation when people from central Canada, the Conservative Party, and Conservative members like the hon. member for North York speak the way they do, showing a total lack of understanding and a total ignorance of what is happening in western Canada?

Here we have the Solicitor General from Ontario, Orillia of all places, acting in bad faith in negotiating this new contract. What will the federal cuts actually mean to the various provinces that are affected? In the province of British Columbia the extra cost will be $120 million over the 10-year period of this contract. In the province of Alberta the extra cost will be $15 million. In fact, municipalities within the province of Alberta are considering establishing their own police forces. In the city of Red Deer, for example, the additional cost has led municipal leaders there to seriously consider establishing their own police force, thereby eliminating the presence of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In the province of Saskatchewan, in the town of Rosthern, they are considering establishing their own police force in view of the proposals of the federal government.

In the province of Manitoba the federal proposal will mean an additional $90 million over the life of the contract.

In Nova Scotia the federal proposal will mean that the municipalities in the province will have to pay 23 per cent more in the first year of the new contract, $9 million more annually.

The province of New Brunswick, which became fed up with federal irresponsibility in this area some time ago, established its own highway patrol, thereby taking that responsibility away from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There, too, the province suffered substantially.

It has gone back to the RCMP because it believes the force provides an excellent service. The RCMP is highly respected right across the country. It is one of the most respected police forces anywhere in the world and, if this government has its way, it will systematically slash and cut and destroy the RCMP in western Canada.

We know that this arrangement, negotiated by the previous government, in which the RCMP contracts its services to the provinces in western Canada and to municipalities, results in a significant cost saving for taxpayers. For example, in the province of Quebec the per capita cost for policing is $170. In Ontario that cost is $155. That includes, of course, all the various police forces that exist in the two provinces. In the municipality that I represent we have the Metropolitan Toronto Police, the Ontario Provincial Police and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, all providing police services.

The cost in B.C. to provide police services is $127 per capita. From $170 in Quebec, $155 in Ontario, to $127 in British Columbia, you can see, Madam Speaker, the significant cost saving for this arrangement.

The member for North York would have people believe, or is suggesting that the benefit is only to the provinces in question, that the provinces and municipalities which contract for these services are benefiting, and that the fat cats in Ontario and Quebec are in effect footing the bill or paying the cost of policing in those particular provinces and municipalities.

The member forgets that there is significant benefit to the federal government and to the federal taxpayer with this particular arrangement, remembering of course that the federal government is only paying 30 per cent of the cost and that there are federal taxpayers in the western provinces who pay their taxes to Ottawa every April and from every pay.

What are the benefits to the federal government, to the national government? We have spoken about the visible national symbol. We cannot attach a price tag to that in terms of the benefit to Canadians. We have a national police force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The men and women who serve Canada well are seen as an international symbol.

When you are in western Canada and you see the RCMP, you see Canada. You see security. You see a highly respected police officer who works hard and diligently on the part of Canadians. Wherever you travel in western Canada, you see that national presence.

The RCMP is one of the few institutions in Canada that provides that national presence. We have Petro-Canada stations across the country. We have Air Canada across the country. But the RCMP comes into contact day in and day out with people, providing that service.

If the federal government had its way, as you travelled through western Canada you would see a separate police force in Calgary, a separate police force in Lethbridge, a separate police force in Red Deer, a separate police force in Vancouver and another police force in North Vancouver. There would be all kinds of separate police forces in the municipalities, separate provincial police forces in the four western provinces and the provinces in Atlantic Canada, the Northwest Territories and Yukon.

An hon. member: That is nation building.

Mr. Nunziata: My friend and colleague says "nation building". He is absolutely right, because from 1873 to the present moment the RCMP and its predecessor, the North-West Mounted Police, helped build this nation, helped provide the symbols of importance to our country.

That is a significant benefit to the federal government. For a mere $270-odd million a year the cost is well worth it. As well, there is one single police structure in western Canada as opposed to having a separate RCMP detachment, a separate OPP detachment, and a separate office for the Metropolitan Toronto Police for example. There is one single structure that allows the government to save significantly in terms of its responsibilities in enforcing federal laws. The RCMP, the federal police, whether or not we like it, will still have a role to play if the provinces in western Canada provincialize their police forces and the municipalities go with their own police forces. We still need the RCMP to enforce federal drug laws, for example.

If we have that duplication of service, we will not have the uniformed RCMP any longer. We will have the undercover RCMP officers as we have in Quebec and Ontario investigating drug deals and drug trafficking, for example.

There are significant savings to the federal taxpayers when we have a single policing structure. Let us make sure that the wrong impression is not left with Canadians that somehow central Canadians are paying for policing in western Canada and are not receiving any benefit in return.

Western Canadians are Canadians. They are federal taxpayers and they are contributing to the federal coffers distributed from here. You do not see western Canadians or Atlantic Canadians complaining when federal funds are used for massive expenditures in the province of Ontario or in the province of Quebec.

It really surprises me that a Conservative member would begrudge giving western Canadians the moneys necessary to ensure the continuation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in western Canada.

It is clear that this government simply does not care about the continuation of the RCMP. It is attempting to shift the tax burden in an irresponsible fashion on to the municipalities.

We know that the federal government is seriously affecting the universality of health care throughout the country by trying to off-load some of the federal costs on to the provinces. In effect, health services are already suffering because of the massive cutbacks of this government.

In education as well, the government has severely cut back in terms of federal transfer payments to the municipalities. Education is suffering and now policing will suffer in a very significant way.

What is encouraging is that the eight provinces and the territories which are affected are standing together shoulder to shoulder and they are fighting this. They are fed up with it and they are not going to put up with it. They are not prepared to bend over and die as the federal Solicitor General hopes they will. They are adamant that they will not be forced into paying the substantial additional costs.

The provincial solicitors general have met over the last number of months and their position remains firm. They will not send the additional moneys to the federal government. The ball will then be in the federal court.

Will the Solicitor General, perhaps when he gets up in a few minutes, indicate his intentions in so far as this particular matter is concerned? Does he intend to unilaterally pull the RCMP from western Canada or Atlantic Canada? Is he prepared to negotiate in good faith?

The deal that was struck 10 years ago was a good deal. It was a fair deal. Why then would the government now want to change that relationship which has worked so well over the last 10 years and in the many years before that?

One can understand that both levels of government will have to pay the additional cost in terms of inflation and other associated costs of providing policing, but why, pray tell, does the federal government want to off-load or renegotiate this particular agreement in such an unfair fashion?

The provincial governments are sticking together. They do not appreciate the federal government's take-it-or-leave-it attitude. They are prepared to call the Solicitor General's bluff and say: "We will continue to pay our fair share when we write the check every month or every two months. We will write a check according to the old formula".

Then it will be up to the federal government and the Solicitor General to decide what the next step is in terms of trying to further their unfair proposal. I have indicated in my submissions the reasons why I believe the federal government should continue to pay its fair share.

Has my time expired, Madam Speaker?

Madam Deputy Speaker: It has expired.

Mr. Nunziata: My time has expired.

In closing, let me say that the Liberal opposition endorses fully the positions taken by the provincial governments other than Quebec and Ontario.

The Liberal Party fully, completely and unequivocally supports the continuation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in western Canada, in Atlantic Canada and in the territories. When we get on the other side of the House we will ensure the presence of the RCMP in western Canada.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): First of all I want to thank my colleague for his comprehensive analysis of this particular problem. I particularly appreciated the comments with respect to our proud force, the RCMP, in its efficiency as a policing unit and its importance as a national symbol, particularly for western and northern Canadians.

There are two questions which I would like to raise. I want to make certain that all members recognize that when we say this is another attack on a bond, a national symbol that contributes to the unification of Canada, it is understood that this is not only being said by Liberals and other members on this side of the House. I have a quote here from Minister McCrae from the province of Manitoba who is a member of the Conservative government there: "At a time of great stress on our country it would be a tragedy if short-sighted federal fiscal policies snapped another bond that unifies this country".

Does my colleague know of any other individuals who have made similar observations?

The other question is with respect to the cost that would be off-loaded to provinces. He did mention those. I think they are particularly important and assuming that he can reach them without a whole lot of difficulty I would like to have those repeated for Canadians who are listening because they do represent an additional major burden on provinces and municipalities. That is one of the ways the federal government is able to say it is controlling its expenditures at 3.7 per cent. Obviously it is. It is dumping it on to the provinces and the municipalities.

Mr. Nunziata: At present the federal government's share of RCMP contract policing is $251.7 million. The proposal put forward by the federal government would see that particular share cut by $79 million.

You simply cannot cut $79 million and hope that the cost disappears somehow. That cost will have to be borne by provinces and municipalities. Municipal taxpayers will bear the brunt of this increase. That is a significant amount of money for municipalities when you break it down on a city-by-city, town-by-town basis across western and northern Canada and in Atlantic Canada.

As far as the question relating to the other people who have commented about the disintegration of Canada and the destruction of national symbols, particularly the destruction and dismembering of the RCMP, many Canadians right across Canada revere and highly respect the RCMP and have been shocked to learn of the hidden agenda of this government: to destroy the RCMP throughout Canada.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): I find it extremely interesting that the member for York South—Weston is suggesting that his taxpayers, who are paying not just the $155 Ontario average cost for policing but a substantially higher figure because it is metropolitan Toronto, should in fact be subsidizing communities in provinces such as British Columbia which have policing costs of $127 per capita, on which they are getting a further subsidy of 30 per cent. It seems to me that they are paying in some areas of British Columbia around $89 for policing.

In metropolitan Toronto many people have great difficulty paying their very high property taxes and living in one of the most expensive cities in North America. It seems to me that while hon. members are trying to turn this into an issue by suggesting that the RCMP should disappear, it really is an issue of fiscal fairness. Nobody is suggesting the RCMP disappear. We are suggesting that communities pay their own costs of policing and determine the level of policing services they require.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, the removal of interprovincial trade barriers as a means to stimulate economic growth from within Canada was one of the central themes in the government's Speech from the Throne.

New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island moved one step closer to that goal yesterday when the Council of Maritime Premiers released their discussion paper calling for the removal of a number of interprovincial trade barriers over the next 18 months. Citing the fact that the three provinces are too small to put up walls, the premiers outline a number of areas in which economic integration can begin, including the free movement between provinces for professionals and trades people and the elimination of costly bidding wars used to attract businesses into a particular province.

It is high time the rest of the country took the lead from the three maritime premiers and began working to remove the over 500 interprovincial trade barriers that are currently choking economic growth in Canada.

CANADA FITNESS WEEK

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, today, on Sneaker Day, all Canadians are invited and urged to wear their running shoes and show their support for a healthy and active life style. Sneaker Day kicks off Canada Fitness Week which starts today and will continue until June 2. Canada Fitness Week has now been recognized internationally as the biggest celebration of physical fitness in the world. This year, more than 8 million Canadians are expected to take part in some 14,000 activities that will take place across this country. In our communities, hundred of thousands of volunteers will donate their time and energy to this annual celebration.

During the next nine days, I invite all members to join Canadians from coast to coast in promoting and taking part in the many activities scheduled during Canada Fitness Week.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, the Self-Employment Incentive Program of Canada Employment and Immigration has proven to be the best economic development tool available in my area.

Under SEI, unemployed people are provided incentives to start their own small businesses and get off unemployment insurance benefits. To date there are over 150 participants who are operating their own small businesses and in some cases already employing others.

Not only is SEI successful in helping people get off UIC, but it is providing a foundation of new business experience and fostering a new entrepreneurial spirit.

Cumberland county enjoys perhaps the very best success rate in Canada under the SEI program. It is so successful, in fact, that funding for 1991 is now exhausted. If Cumberland county is to continue their success rate, we need the budget to continue this program. I know of no other government program which provides better value and I strongly urge the minister to reassess this situation and provide the additional funding required.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, last week the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced $7 million in funding for small craft harbours. I stand in this House today and ask that some of that money be spent in the Cardigan riding.

Since the 1988 election I have written countless letters asking that repairs be done to the wharfs in eastern Prince Edward Island. I know of two wharfs in eastern Prince Edward Island that needed approximately $50,000 in repairs last spring. Because these repairs were not done, the cost to the taxpayer today is about $1.5 million.

However, the government commitment is only to minor harbour maintenance. Cardigan riding could probably use the $7 million itself, because the government did not perform the minor harbour maintenance in the past.

The minister should act today and help the fishermen of Cardigan riding.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, six months ago I wrote the then Minister of Employment and Immigration about discriminatory hiring practices on the international bridge between Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, and Michigan. This bridge is a jointly owned and operated bridge with supposed equal interest between the United States and Canada.

A 30–year old agreement between the two countries designating a 50–50 worker ratio is being denied by the American government. Presently 25 Americans and 18 Canadians are working at various tasks on the bridge. Why the discrepancy you ask? Why, after six months, is there no answer? Why is the prepared answer being reconsidered by the new minister?

It would appear that not only the playing field is tilted in favour of the Americans, but also the working field.

I have not received a written response to my letter, but I have been told that once again the infamous FTA, free trade agreement, has struck down Canadian workers. Chapter 15, which appears totally irrelevant, impedes Canadians from an equal employment opportunity on this bridge.

We are meeting this summer to resolve this inequity. Let us hope this government will be strong in its resolve to correct this obvious inequity.

MULTICULTURALISM

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms enshrines in our Constitution the principle of multiculturalism which promotes respect for cultural and linguistic origins of all Canadians, encourages Canadians to get to know and understand each other, and ensures that all Canadians of whatever origin can and must participate equally and fully in the wider Canadian society.

Multiculturalism has come under fire from two different sources. The Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future says that many Canadians reject government funding for multicultural programs and believe that new Canadians should embrace our symbols, our culture, and our definition of what it means to be a Canadian.

On the other hand, the Quebec Bélanger–Campeau report says that multiculturalism implies the equality of all cultures and cultural origins in Canada and thus conflicts with the concept of two founding nations.

Surely we can find a way to reconcile all of these views and principles without disregarding any of them. In the past, we have emphasized our differences. Now it is time to emphasize the things that make us all Canadians. Certainly we have more—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the hon. member's time has expired.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, the news media report that IVACO of Marieville, Quebec, which operates steel mills in several Canadian towns and cities, including L'Orignal, Ontario, in my riding, is preparing to relocate part of its operations to the United States.

Why? Because, according to IVACO's president, Paul Ivanier, the Canadian dollar is now artificially high. Mr. Ivanier says that he thinks the Canadian dollar should be worth 80 cents U.S.

Madam Speaker, we in the Liberal Party have told the government for a long time that its monetary and fiscal policies were driving away investors and encouraging business operators to transfer jobs to the United States.

The Hon. Leader of the Opposition has asked the Canadian government several times to lower the value of our dollar so that we can keep our jobs in Canada. Why does the government opposite refuse to act? Why does it refuse to protect these jobs?

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, the Reform Party uses the words "phased reduction and elimination of all agricultural subsidies and support programs".

There are no countries in the western democratic world which do not support its agricultural producers. The farmers of Canada have contributed to the growth and prosperity of this great land. The minimum support which our government has contributed during drought, flood, and low world prices has kept in excess of 100,000 farmers from abandoning their livelihood, production, and contribution to Canada.

This Conservative government will continue support programs to ensure the survival of farmers, while the Reform Party will eliminate programs and farmers. Preston Manning is now saying that by eliminating farm program assistance and elimination of the Crow benefit, the government can reduce the national debt.

This Conservative government has no intention of reducing the national debt on the back of farmers. That hare-brained idea we will leave to the Reform Party and Preston Manning.

GUN CONTROL

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the RCMP recently reported that there are almost one million restricted weapons in Canada. Last year, more than 45,000 new restricted weapons were registered. Only four were refused. We have no idea how many guns there are in Canada because non-restricted weapons, such as the semi-automatic that killed 14 young women in Montreal, are not registered anywhere. Children have shot each other and themselves with legal weapons. In my community of Burnaby we have seen the horror of a random, drive-by shooting.

I have called on this government to bring in effective gun control legislation. They have ignored this and with Bill C-6 they have gone right off the deep end. It encourages the manufacture and export of automatic weapons.

The empty rhetoric of this government in damning the gun trade during the Persian Gulf crisis rings very hollow. When it delayed gun control legislation before, Canadians thought it was weak-kneed and ignorant of the issue. Now the government has proved it.

EMERGENCY RESPONSE SYSTEM

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, I rise today in support of the creation of a computerized national emergency response information system which will enable firefighters and other authorities to obtain accurate instant information at the scene of a hazardous materials incident.

Technologically advanced systems are available which not only aid in identifying what hazardous materials are present but offer detailed information on appropriate emergency response techniques.

I join the International Association of Firefighters and urge this government to consider seriously the implementation of such a national emergency system.

OPTIMIST INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, more than 50 years ago, a group of men and women in the Montreal area founded the first Optimist Club of Quebec. Today, with more than 40,000 members organized in 760 clubs, Quebec has the highest concentration of Optimists in North America. This enthusiasm is even more remarkable when we consider that the sole purpose of the world's 4,000 Optimist Clubs is community service.

Last year, 4 million young people were able to take advantage of programs offered by Optimist International. The wide range of programs offered by the Optimists includes drug awareness programs for young people and programs designed to help children who are disadvantaged or disabled. This kind of involvement in our communities, Madam Speaker, is essential to our well-being, and I urge all Canadians to support the efforts of Optimist International.

Madam Speaker, in concluding I want to congratulate the Chairman of Optimist International, Dr. Tate Thigpen of Jackson, Mississipi, and his colleagues, all of whom are here today, as they are having their annual meeting here in Ottawa.

BANGLADESH

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, the people of Bangladesh continue to suffer from the devastating effects of a cyclone that has ravaged their country. Already there are over 125,000 confirmed deaths and estimates that the number may increase to as many as 500,000.

As is too often the case, the poorest portion of the population is suffering the most. The Canadian government, through its development agency, has contributed emergency aid to help relieve this suffering and it is undoubtedly helping in the short term.

My concern lies in what happens in the long term. Lack of equitable land distribution in a country dependent on agriculture is the root cause of the increasing poverty level in Bangladesh. It is this problem which is forcing people to migrate to the coastal areas, the first and most severely affected regions when the cyclone winds start to blow.

In a country where 10 per cent of the population owns 50 per cent of the land, the poorest farmers are left with little choice and less opportunity. They can either rent land from absentee landlords or they can move to the coastal areas where they might have a chance to own land. It is these coastal areas which become danger zones when the winds arrive. It is these poor migrant farmers who—

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I rise to urge this government to stop the post office closures that are occurring all over Canada, including in my riding of Chambly. To date over 950 federally owned and operated post offices have been closed or privatized. By July over 150 more post offices are scheduled to be closed.

How can this government justify taking away reliable postal services from Canadians? The government takes great pride in offering a Decima poll which says 91 per cent of the people who have privatized service are satisfied.

If this is such a reliable poll, why will the corporation not allow the municipalities to decide if their post offices should be closed. The hundreds of letters I have from residents of Mabou, Nova Scotia, the rally staged by residents of Avonmore, Ontario, yesterday on the steps of Parliament, and the court challenge launched against Canada Post by Réjean Lémare of La Rédemption, Quebec, on Wednesday do not suggest a 91 per cent approval rating.

I urge this government to stop talking down to Canadians. This government must stop—

CENTRE D'INITIATIVE D'EMPLOI DE LOTBINIÈRE–OUEST

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, I would like to talk about an organization in my riding called the Centre d'initiative d'emploi de Lotbinière–Ouest (CIEL), which was created in 1985 further to a job development program for ten municipalities in the riding that have a total population of about 15,000.

This organization makes up for the deficiencies in the banking system and reaches those who are often unreached. It is non–profit and depends on its 270 member subscribers who deposit from $30 to $2,000 in a fund. In addition, the local Caisses Populaires contribute substantially to this fund.

Since it was founded, the organization has helped more than 31 local businesses with interest–free loans totaling some $46,325 and has managed to maintain and often to create jobs.

Madam Speaker, that is an example of people who have taken charge of their affairs and have confidence in one another.

I congratulate Rolland Paradis and his team on having set up such an organization for the greater good of our community.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance or the Acting Minister of Finance.

Yesterday in the House the minister admitted that the economy had hit rock bottom. Today numbers released by the government confirm that for many people there is no hope for an early recovery because they have gone bankrupt. Over–all bankruptcies are up by 77 per cent.

When will the government admit that the policies of the previous Minister of Finance are bankrupt. And when will the new Minister of Finance take his responsibility and introduce the new budget, something that Canada needs very badly at this time.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think all Canadians know that Canada has been going through a recession.

I would like to remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that in our 1989 and 1990 budgets, we warned Canadians that demand was far too high, that they were overspending and putting themselves at risk. We are now in the midst of a recession, but fortunately—these are numbers from last month—there are many signs that we are beginning to extricate ourselves from this. One of them is the bank rate which went down again yesterday.

Interest rates have gone down 5 per cent in a few months. This is quite an achievement compared to the Liberal record of high interest rates in the 1980s.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this government jacked up the interest rates four or five points above the Americans; now, rates go down a bit, and it takes credit. If it had not made mistakes some years ago it would not be able to take credit for anything at this moment. The results are there. This budget was the wrong budget at the wrong time. I can see the former Minister of Finance regretting now what he has done. What are the results today?

The results are that in Ontario, personal bankruptcies have risen 123 per cent; in British Columbia, 109 per cent; in Alberta, the present finance minister's province, 96 per cent.

So when will the government realize that its economic policies have been tragic for very many Canadians and when will it act to stimulate the economy and not impose policies that just slow down the economy and create more bankruptcies every day?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition just said that we had forced interest rates up artificially, according to him.

I would say to him that interest rates were so high because of the disastrous debt that the Liberal administration left us. When we showed in our budget that we were determined to solve the government's financial problem, interest rates started to go down. It is precisely by creating such conditions without backing away or letting interest rates rise to 22 per cent, as the Liberals did, that we are bringing them down to their lowest level in three years.

Everywhere we see signs of the new R-word, "recovery"; we see indications that at last Canada is getting ready to enjoy several years of great prosperity, as we did before under this Conservative government.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, in this morning's papers, the president of IVACO said that what was hurting the economy was the fact that interest rates were higher than in the United States and that the government maintained the dollar at artificially high levels which made it hard for Canadian products to be competitive. When will the government realize its mistakes, ensure interest rates are more competitive than they have been during the past four years, and bring the Canadian dollar back to levels that will help our exports since our economy depends to a very considerable extent on exports? Why not let the dollar go down so that manufacturers can stay in business and not go bankrupt?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I hope God will protect us from Liberal solutions which have proved extremely costly for Canada. We cannot run away from our problems. Canada must meet these problems head on. And that is what we are doing. If we consider one particular sector or group that has been severely affected, the manufacturing sector for instance—I suggest we listen to what was said by the chairman of this group yesterday in committee in response to the Liberal industrial critic, Mr. Peterson, the hon. member for Willowdale. Mr. Thibault said the following and I will quote him in English:

[English]

"Many of the policies touted by Peterson would force the federal government to increase its spending and that would only make the current economic mess worse. The result would be higher taxes, a larger deficit, and higher taxes".

Madam Speaker, I must say that the only proposal we have had from the other side of the House regarding every single policy we have adopted is this: spend more. That is not the answer, Madam Speaker.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Finance). What will the minister do to help Canadian retailers who are threatened with bankruptcy as a result of losing $100 million annually to American stores across the border?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, as I pointed out yesterday, we have embarked on a nation-wide consultative process with the hope of taking some immediate steps to alleviate this very complex problem which spans all three levels of government and includes problems associated with the private sector, labour, as well as consumer organizations. We are well on our way to making some definitive suggestions to what all of these stakeholders together should and must take.

As far as the customs operations are concerned, we have begun to put into place more efficient and effective ways of collecting applicable duties and taxes. Although border crossings have increased by some 20 per cent, 23 per cent last month for example, our customs collections have increased by well over 150 per cent. Action is being taken at the border, but this is a much broader problem which comes down to the fact that Canadians are not as competitive as their American counterparts.

I think that the Speech from the Throne addressed that in a very positive manner. This government has taken and will continue to take action to make it possible for Canadian businesses to become more competitive.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue who clearly has not implemented any new policies.

Thirty-three tax increases in seven years have driven Canadians south to shop. Mobs of Canadians at our customs offices have slowed the entry of American residents to this country to a trickle.

Will the minister take immediate steps to designate a special line for Americans at our border crossings so that Canadians can profit from American visits to Canada to help offset the government's persistent inaction and blundering?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is totally misinformed when he says that we have not taken any action at the border. Through our Customs 2000 program we have initiated a variety of proposals too numerous to mention today: automated cash registers and use of new technology including electronic data interchange and pre-clearance of commercial traffic, more efficient use of staff, special express lanes, PACE project and so on.

At customs operations, we have to perform a fine balancing act from, on the one side, collecting duties and taxes more effectively and efficiently while at the same time relieving congestion at the border which would allow tourism and commercial traffic to come in. We are trying to perform that balancing act.

I have made a commitment to each community that we will develop tailor-made projects for those communities, which we have put in in many places. We are willing and anxious to co-operate with each community and we are meeting with the mayors in the communities involved.

I know where this government is going and what this government is doing. I would like to know if the Liberal Party wants the borders to be wide open or wants the borders to be totally closed? Let us know where the Liberal Party stands because we know where we stand.

BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is on the record increase in bankruptcies which has hit this country.

Yesterday, there was brave talk from the government about the fact that we were into a recovery. Today the harsh reality is there of this 77 per cent increase in bankruptcies.

There were nearly 7,000 bankruptcies in April, 77 per cent more than last April. Will the minister keep pretending that all is well? Or is this government finally prepared to do something for Canadians and take steps to end this recession?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member may wish to check what he said. In quoting a figure he referred to millions which is not correct. It was probably an oversight.

That being said, I do not deny we have been through difficult times. However, we are talking about figures that are now behind us and we have good reason to look to the future.

The hon. member asked when we would start doing something for Canadians. There are several ways of doing things for people. We can intervene artificially—and I would say this was more or less the approach taken by the government of Ontario—by borrowing and passing the bill on to our children, meanwhile giving the impression that we did something. The important thing is to provide a climate in which Canadians can take care of their own development under the best possible conditions.

That is what we have done since 1984, and we were very successful if you consider the 1.5 million jobs that were created. After this recession we intend to let Canada launch its recovery on a solid basis.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, there are often victims of bankruptcy who do not appear even in these numbers; those are the workers in these companies.

Other countries have political disappearances, we have economic disappearances. For instance, Brant Castings in Windsor went bankrupt a year ago and 100 workers have still not received any severance pay. The company failed to pay its pension contributions and half the workers are still unemployed.

What does this government have to say to Russ Jackson, Jim Leblanc and the other workers of Brant Castings? Why is there not a bankruptcy law reform in front of this House as was promised by the minister responsible many months ago?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that he has a very good question about the bankruptcy law. I can tell him that he will soon have news from my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The hon. member says that our policies are causing economic disappearance. I have views from people here who are business people and manufacturing people. They say that the NDP is killing factories and that their policies add to business costs. There is no easy way out of a recession. You can buy your way out once.

I would like to remind the House that when we came in, the government was spending $1.33 for every dollar it was bringing in. This makes people happy for a little while, but eventually it catches up with us. It has now, and we are getting Canada out of this mess.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, such hypocrisy from a government which spends 34 cents of every dollar which it receives—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member will want to put his question. There have been long preambles to both previous questions.

Mr. Langdon: Let me repeat for the Speaker the key point I want to put across.

The yearly Carleton University study, How Canada Spends, is coming out this week. It concludes that this government has no positive economic strategy.

I want to ask the minister if he will recognize that these growing bankruptcies call for a change in strategy. Will he recognize that he cannot talk about economic recovery in the face of these kinds of bankruptcies taking place?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Whenever one particular manufacturer closes it is always very sad and it has, in some instances, a very dramatic impact, and I recognize that.

The hon. gentlemen, like most members from his party, thinks that he has a monopoly on caring. I can tell him that coming from a family of 21 children—and I am the 18th of the 21 children—from northwestern Quebec, born in 1929, raised during the depression, I do not need lessons from him.

There are right ways of solving problems and there are wrong ways. His way has been tried in eastern Europe and it has proven a failure.

ARMS TRADE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

During the Iraq war, the Prime Minister condemned the international arms trade which helped Saddam Hussein build his aggressive military force and said Canada would not take part in this trade.

On February 20 the former Secretary of State said, and I quote: "It is imperative that the world declare that there be no Middle East arms bazaar; 95 per cent of the weapons in the hands of Saddam Hussein came from the five permanent members of the Security Council".

In light of these statements, how does the government justify Bill C-6?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, Bill C-6 is designed to tighten up the restrictions on export of arms. We are providing for transparency. There will be a report to this Parliament on all the exports of arms made. There will be consultation with countries to which we propose to make arms sales. There will also be a need for Canada to have an arrangement with countries with which we have arms sales.

I want to stress to my hon. friend that what Bill C-6 does is provide additional controls on the sale of automatic weapons in excess of the existing controls that are there for higher powered weapons. So we are increasing the controls, not decreasing the controls.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, for many years it has been Canada's policy not to sell arms to areas of conflict. The Middle East has had 26 wars since 1945, more than any other region, and except for Egypt there are no peace agreements between Israel and the Arab countries.

Why then is the government facilitating sales to this region? Who will be on the list of eligible countries for arms sales under the bill, and what controls will there be to prevent another aggression, such as we saw last summer?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, under this legislation each export permit will be decided on a case-by-case basis. There will be decisions taken that will judge whether the export will destabilize the region. If there has been an excessive buildup in arms in the region that will be taken into account in any decision as to whether or not a permit should be provided. I repeat, there will have to be an intergovernmental arrangement on defence, research and development production of any use of arms. That is the protection that we are providing to Canadians.

I would stress to my hon. friend that there will be additional controls on the export of automatic weapons as provided for under this Bill C-6 legislation. There will be additional controls over and above what is now provided for other exports of arms. This is a tightening up and an additional set of controls over and above what we have today.

SMALL BUSINESS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is for the acting minister responsible for small business.

The government's high interest rate policy, its increased unemployment insurance premiums, its GST, have all diminished the ability of small business to lead the badly needed economic recovery in Canada and get us out of this recession.

I want to ask the minister when this government will provide relief to small business from the damage inflicted by this government's policies.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): In the last eleven and a half months there has been a drop of about five percentage points in interest rates and that translates directly into relief for small businesses. I would say that is probably the greatest area of relief that we can provide.

I also point out to my hon. friend that there are many small businesses that are involved in the construction industry and, if she noticed, in the month of April there was a significant increase in housing starts. That is supported by the drop in interest rates. It is also supported by the increase in the number of housing sales which is a reinforcement to the increase in housing starts.

One final point: My hon. friend mentioned the goods and services tax. We agree that the goods and services tax, when it is applied alongside the provincial sales tax, is an extra burden. We are working with the provinces and we encourage the provinces to harmonize their provincial sales taxes with the goods and services tax and in that way make a major contribution to lessening the burden of taxation on small businesses.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): My supplementary is for the same minister.

Is the minister not aware that retail sales declined 3 per cent in the first four months of this year? That is the largest decline since the Diefenbaker government. It is the biggest drop in 30 years.

If the minister believes that this is grounds for optimism, that his government's policies are working, then this minister is badly out of touch with the needs of small business.

Will the minister admit that his government's policies have harmed the small business sector of this country and thus put at risk our ability to recover quickly from this recession?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): I am sorry, I missed the final part of the question. Would the hon. member just repeat the last part of the question?

Ms. Callbeck: I will repeat the question, Madam Speaker.

Will the minister admit that the government policies have harmed the small business sector in this country and thus put at risk our ability to recover quickly from this recession?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, one of the concerns that small businesses have expressed to me is that the levels of debt they have incurred in recent years have become quite large. One of the policies that we have followed in recent years was to discourage the increase in debt by keeping interest rates high during the period when that debt was growing very quickly, 15 to 20 per cent per annum.

If we had followed the policies that my hon. friend would have us follow of keeping those interest rates down, debt would have been just that much higher and the burden on small businesses today would have been just that much higher.

Madam Speaker, the only thing that I conclude here is that the Liberals have no understanding, no alternative policies, no idea whatsoever as to how they would manage economic affairs in this country.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. CIDA's secret and internal corporate review is causing alarm and confusion within CIDA and within the international development community in general. By awarding the lucrative management contract to a friend of the Prime Minister and the minister responsible for CIDA, the government has created a controversy which swirls about it.

To help clear up the confusion caused by the conflicting statements made by the Minister for External Relations on the one hand and her senior officials on the other, will the government today table the terms of reference of the CIDA strategic management review, as well as other reviews of the patronage award to Secor Incorporated?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, this is just another one of those examples where the New Democratic Party desires to draw things through the mud. Secor is one of the top consulting firms in the country. Secor was offered this business because of the quality of its work, its understanding of CIDA, its understanding its of the international development process, and its capability of helping CIDA go through the strategic review process. It is on that basis that Secor has received that bid.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My friend over there is making some other scurrilous remarks about the award. He is the expert in slime.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Given the government's sorry record in patronage, we understand its sensitivity in that area. These things tend to happen when the Prime Minister is in the Orient.

Since the Canadian Council of International Cooperation and other development organizations are asking for a review of sharing our future, the policy under which we are supposed to be operating in CIDA, will the Acting Prime Minister undertake to refer the report of CIDA's strategic management review to the standing committee on external affairs in September when it is completed?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I would imagine that that is a matter for the business of that committee. If it requests ministers to appear before that committee to provide information on this strategic review that is certainly a power that is quite in keeping with what the committee is capable of doing.

I want to remind my hon. friend that before he draws conclusions he should also reflect on the fact that other experts have been hired by this government, including Peter O'Malley, the former press secretary of Ed Broadbent, the former leader of the party. Why have we not had a question on that? Why have we not had a question on the capabilities of Mr. O'Malley? Why is it just these other people?

CANADA POST

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post. The corporation has just rented a box at Toronto SkyDome, not a mail box, but a corporate box, a penthouse box for its corporate friends.

The question is simply this: At a time of recession and restraint, how can it possibly justify renting a corporate box, a suite at the SkyDome?

Also, Madam Speaker, I want to know this: Why does the minister not instruct Canada Post to take its financial resources and use them to reduce postal rates? I do not think the Canadian people will stand for the rental of a suite at the SkyDome.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Clearly a set-up question.

Madam Speaker, in 1981 when Canada Post was made a Crown corporation, it was on the basis there would be no political interference. I am sure the hon. member would not want me to interfere politically.

May I also say that 80 per cent of Canada Post's revenues come from business, and 45 per cent or thereabouts of its total business is fully competitive. Like everybody else in business, it has means for promoting the corporate image and entertaining business clients and so on.

Canada Post does a lot of promotion. For example, it participates in events like Winterlude in Ottawa, the Quebec Winter Carnival, the 1988 Olympics, the Games for the Disabled, the Canada Winter Games in Prince Edward Island, Literacy Organization, the Terry Fox Run for Charity and a lot of others.

I think it is a tremendous corporate citizen and should be applauded.

SECOR

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Deputy Prime Minister who, of course, is responsible for the conflict of interest code.

It is in relation to the issue that was asked about a moment ago on the contract given to Secor Company after Mr. Marcel Coté was working for the government. Of course, Mr. Coté went back to work for Secor with his interest immediately upon terminating employment.

Has the Acting Deputy Prime Minister sought the advice of the Assistant Deputy Registrar General who is responsible for the administration of the code? What advice did the ADRG give him? If he has not done that, why not?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the question was asked to me as acting for the Deputy Prime Minister.

I am not the Deputy Prime Minister. I will ask him the question that my hon. friend has just put.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my questions to the government are very specific.

I would like to ask a supplementary question. Surely someone opposite is in charge. Someone must be the Acting Prime Minister today.

An hon. member: No one!

Mr. Boudria: Not getting an answer is unsatisfactory. I want to know from the government opposite what advice this government received from the Assitant Deputy Registrar General concerning this contract. Is the government assured that the conflict of interest guidelines were not violated? Yes or no.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has enough experience here in the House to know that the questions he just asked will be answered. The minister who is responsible under the law is not here today. He is here most of the time. He is not here today. The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade, on an important but technical question, told the hon. member and the House that he would take note of this question and give an answer as soon as possible. That is quite normal. It has been the parliamentary practice for decades.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, the government has waxed eloquent in its Speech from the Throne. However, its pretty words do not camouflage its lack of an action plan.

If this government is serious about cutting illiteracy by the year 2000 and if it is serious about cutting down the very high school drop-out rate, will it take its first step in a plan of action and withdraw that insensitive and stupid tax on books, magazines, and newspapers?

Will it do that today?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, time and time again in this House I have explained to the hon. member the intent of the GST.

I would like to remind her that the difficulty of that particular industry, together with a lot of other industries, is not necessarily or at all linked to the GST.

We are in a period of recession. We are slowly coming out of it, and I suppose that that industry feels the pain.

The government has said that if, over a period of time, there is some evidence that the GST has some impact, the proper departments in due time will look at ways of helping them along.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I find that answer perfectly unbelievable.

If you need proof, just read both the English and the French press today. Go and listen to the coalition that has a problem.

[Translation]

The government cannot both tax books and reduce illiteracy. While a third of the bookstores in Quebec are closing and book sales have dropped 35 per cent in Quebec, how can the Minister still justify the GST on books? Why does the Minister not avoid disaster by immediately eliminating this absolutely unacceptable and disastrous tax? Why not?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, I have the feeling that the members opposite forgot to do their homework on the GST. On the one hand, it is very easy. Parts of this tax reform give Canadians who may be less able to afford books more income than they had before the reform. Therefore, I would say that they could use it to buy books.

Madam Speaker, I just said that the present recession and business slowdown affects all industries. I do not see in what way that industry would be particularly hurt. However, I also said, as the government has said before, that if as time goes by we see that this industry, the Canadian book industry—and we should clearly define what we mean by that—was adversely affected, we would try to find ways to help that industry. It is very dangerous to think of removing a very broadly based tax that applies to all goods and starting to make exceptions, because on the other hand, we would have to raise the rates on the rest, so that the taxpayer would end up with the same amount in his pocket.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and concerns a different but equally and perhaps even more serious form of cross-border shopping. It has to do with the fact that the CPR is now shopping for different rail lines in the United States.

Is the Minister of Transport aware that CP has requested the federal regulatory agency in the United States to provide a waiver of compliance which would enable it to move unit trains of coal and potash from North Portal, Saskatchewan, to Thunder Bay through the United States instead of through Canada. This move, if successful, would result in the elimination of at least 200 trains a year going through Manitoba and have a serious economic impact on such places as Brandon and Winnipeg.

Is the government aware of this and if it is, what is it going to do about it? If it is not aware of it, will it please look into it and do something about the effect of deregulation, something we predicted a long time ago.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, CPR as a private business has to compete in the world as far as transportation of goods is concerned. The decisions that the hon. member speaks about are ones I am not aware of because it is not up to the government to make business decisions. It it up to business to make business decisions. If this decision is being made to try to make it more competitive in the world in the shipping of goods, then this is its right as a business to make that decision.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I would have thought it would be the business of the government to know the effect of its own regulations. The effect of its own regulations, which is to say its own deregulation, is to have this precedent being set for the diversion of rail traffic through the United States that would otherwise have gone through western Canada.

Will the minister make it her business to be concerned about the future of Winnipeg, Brandon, and a lot of other communities that depend on rail traffic for their subsistence? Will the government finally start to listen to those of us who have analysed the effects of these things?

The free trade agreement with Mexico is about to be fast-tracked through negotiations and the government is not going to listen. It was not willing to listen before and now some of the horrible predictions—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has put his question. The hon. minister.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, the government listened before. It is listening now. It listens to the shippers in this country and to the businesses. In order to keep the jobs in western Canada in the potash industry for instance, they have to be able to ship their goods economically. The reason for deregulation was—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Martin (Lincoln): Madam Speaker, our concern is to make Canada competitive. We are working at that as a government. Companies are working at that and working people are working at making us competitive. They are attacking it where it needs to be done, and that is making Canada competitive around the world in all areas and not just standing in this House and blaring out as the opposition did.

WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications.

Four weekly newspapers in my riding are facing dramatic postal increases as of June 1. For months and months they have been demanding an extension to the deadline just to survive. June is now upon us. Will there be relief for these weekly newspapers or not?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, like many members of Parliament in this House, I come from a rural community and I am very much aware of the fact that rural community newspapers are part of the very heart of rural communities.

As a consequence, in response to representations from community newspapers and rural MPs across Canada, I am pleased to be able to tell the hon. member and the House that the government has agreed to extend until next March 1 current rates for rate code 2 newspapers in order to enable them to make the transition.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I wrote to the minister of employment last week and, indeed, I sent a notice today of my question regarding the severe ice conditions that currently prevail around the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador, specifically the northeast coast and the northwest coast of the province.

The minister knows that fishermen's benefits ceased on May 15, that fishermen and their families have had no incomes since that time, and he knows that because of the severe ice conditions fishermen and their families have no means now of acquiring an income.

I want to ask the minister of employment who, indeed, as a former minister of fisheries, is aware of the severity of this problem, whether or not the government is going to extend unemployment insurance benefits for people who, through no fault of their own, have no income at this time of the year.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I can inform the hon. member and the House that my colleague, the minister of fisheries, and I are monitoring the situation closely. We are surveying these ice conditions on a daily basis along the west coast and the northeast coast of Newfoundland-Labrador, and we will establish how ice conditions may be preventing fishermen from starting their regular season. We know that they have not started yet, as the member rightly points out.

The member also knows full well that this government has not hesitated in the past to meet and to assist the fishermen who are affected by severe ice conditions. We are monitoring the situation and we will respond accordingly.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. Unfortunately, in past years, and this is not to look for an argument, the monitoring process has sometimes gone on so long that the suffering that results from a lack of income has been severe.

What fishermen and their families want, and I hope what the minister will give the House and through the House, fishermen and their families today, is an assurance of quick action. If it becomes clear, as it appears to be the case, that these are the worst ice conditions in some regions since 1974, that the minister will, as he is able to do, move quickly to restore those unemployment insurance benefits.

We are simply talking here of a case of fishermen and their families needing the dollars to prepare for the spring season to gear up for the fishery and, indeed, to keep their families and their children in clothing with bread and butter on the table.

Will the minister give us an assurance of quick action? We would appreciate that if he could.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I want to make it absolutely clear that there has never been an extension of UI benefits in Newfoundland-Labrador for fishermen. We cannot go into the UI fund to extend benefits because we would have to do that throughout the country.

We have DFO and the ACOA and my department is, as I stated, closely monitoring this. We are on the case and I can give assurance to the hon. member that we will be attempting to move as quickly as we can when these benefits expire around June 2 or 3.

We are standing ready. The last payments were May 15. They go for two weeks. We are monitoring the situation and hopefully will be able to act as quickly as possible.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, yesterday I sent the minister an urgent letter out of concern over the plan of the Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers' Council to launch its campaign against tobacco taxes using tax protest forms which will soon appear on the side of cigarette packages.

Point of Order

Yesterday the minister said in this House that he has asked his department's legal advisers for some legal opinion on this campaign, announced four days ago, and which likely will start Monday. Has the minister received the legal opinion and if not, why does it take so long to obtain such an opinion?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I do not know why it takes so long for the lawyers to provide an opinion, but I believe many people in this House have faced the problem many, many times.

Actually, I have not yet received the advice. It should be received today. I hope it will be this afternoon. As soon as I have the information from the department, I will act on the recommendation.

I repeat what I said yesterday: I fully share the concern of my colleague about this campaign. I repeat that what we do at the Department of National Health and Welfare is advise Canadians of the fact that smoking is unhealthy. Every time we increase taxes by 10 cents, some 14 per cent of young Canadians do not start smoking because of that increase. That is why we support the policy. If there is any way that we can prevent the campaign, we will do that.

My friend will understand that I have to act within the advice I receive today from the advisers.

QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I wish to bring to your attention that I was on the list for questions today. My constituents sent me here to Parliament to speak for them and to represent their concerns, and I am trying my best to do that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his words. I think the hon. member knows as well that the Speaker has given the House his opinion on this type of point of order and remarks. I do share Speaker Fraser's opinion on the subject.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, following my question to the minister responsible for Canada Post, I wanted to ask a supplementary, but we on this side of the House very seldom get a supplementary on a hard hitting question. I wanted a further explanation from the minister and no supplementary—

Point of Order

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened carefully to the hon. member's question. What could have been a supplementary was also added to his original question, which is why no supplementary was allowed.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker.

I am on the same point of order because I see a trend. This week and last week government members have been rising in this place, coming to the Chair and pleading about the fact that they are not getting questions during Question Period.

If there is going to be a continued harassment of the Chair on this question, I think the whole matter must be referred to a committee. We must get our act together. There is no way the government members can continue to harass some of us on this side by maintaining that they cannot ask questions of the government. If they cannot ask the question, they should write to their minister about the darned thing and get their answer like we do.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think it is totally out of order for the hon. member to accuse members on the government side of harassing the Speaker. What hon. members are doing is standing up for their legitimate rights as members of this House who are not members of the executive and not members of the government but members who happen to be supporters of the government. They should have the same rights and privileges as any backbench member in this House of Commons.

Mr. Gauthier Madam Speaker, I object strongly to the government representative, the parliamentary secretary to the House leader, coming up here and preaching, being so sanctimonious about this whole thing. He knows and I know how we operate around this place. He knows darned right that there is absolutely no fact to what he is saying. It is an organized, orchestrated fact that the government members want to make the front bench of their group, the ministers, understand there is division on that side. They even want to take our places. We will give them up in the next election and they can sit here and get in all the questions they can once in a while, but ask their ministers and get the answers from them. Do not come to me and complain.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): On this point, I would just suggest that the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may, just one moment. I will not be shouted at by members screaming "point of order". The hon. member will sit down when the speaker is standing, please. The Chair cannot give the floor to more than one person at a time. I will listen, but not that much longer.

The subject was discussed earlier this week when Speaker Fraser was in the chair. He gave the House his opinion on the subject. He gave what I think was very wise advice to all members of this House and I do not think that using a Friday when the Deputy Speaker is in the chair to start again will get anybody any further and I want the House to know this.

I have listened to some comments from the government side. I have listened to some comments from the Official Opposition. I will listen to one member from the New Democratic Party and the hon. member for Edmonton East had sought the floor and had been recognized.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, there is nothing I could add to those wise remarks.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see the hon. parliamentary secretary seeking the floor. Is this on the same point of order again?

An hon. member: He wants to pursue it.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think it is important both in terms of tone and in terms of any reflection that may have been cast upon the chair. I want to express to the chair very clearly that members on this side did not particularly pick a Friday to raise this question. They did not pick it because of the occupant of the chair.

I think the reason for the interventions today is that there was a question put that was obviously not a set up question to the government. The member wanted to raise the question of supplements. It has nothing to do with the fact that it is Friday but everything to do with the fact that it is current.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for his remarks.

I think we may conclude this in saying that the Standing Committee on House Management has the mandate to look at such matters. I think that hon. members who are on this committee should get together on this. That is the right place to have such discussions. A report from this committee would be quite useful to the Chair and I think would avoid these types of discussions, which do no good for this institution and for its members.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni) (p. 499)

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House proceeded with Statements by Members and Question Period, the hon. member for Don Valley North was concluding her comments. Had she concluded?

Ms. Greene: Yes.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, the Conservative member for North York, in her question, suggested that the taxpayers of her municipality, her constituency, the taxpayers of Ontario, were subsidizing western Canadians for RCMP services in western Canada.

The hon. member, in putting her question, is reflecting her total misunderstanding of the issue. It does not appear that the member knows anything at all about the role of the RCMP in western Canada. In fact, the provincial governments in western Canada are now paying 70 per cent of the cost of providing RCMP services there under a contract that expired at the beginning of April.

As I indicated in my submissions, the Government of Canada is bent on destroying the RCMP in western Canada and, in fact, in Atlantic Canada and in the north. The RCMP is an important and essential national institution and the Conservative member for North York, speaking on behalf of the government, is saying to the people of western Canada, Atlantic Canada and the north that the federal government wants to get out of the business of providing RCMP services.

As I indicated in my comments, yesterday was the 118th birthday of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It was founded in 1873 as the North-West Mounted Police and it is a shame, a tragedy, that this government is now bent on destroying the RCMP by withdrawing its fair share of funding. The RCMP provides an essential service to communities in the western Canadian provinces.

If the RCMP were withdrawn, it would be a serious blow to national unity. As I indicated earlier, the RCMP is a highly respected police force. It is one of the finest police forces anywhere in the world. Indeed, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is recognized world-wide for its thoroughness and its efficiency. Indeed, the motto of the RCMP is that it always gets its person.

On behalf of the Official Opposition, we would like to send a very definite and clear message to the Solicitor General who is here in the House today. That message is to negotiate in good faith. The provinces that contract for RCMP services, the provinces that do not have their own provincial police forces, are not asking for anything more. All they are asking is that the federal government negotiate in good faith to continue paying its share, that is 30 per cent of police services in western Canada and in Atlantic Canada. They want to continue the contract that expired on April 1. They believe it was a good contract.

Unfortunately, the government has not been acting in good faith. Hopefully, as a result of the debate here today, the Solicitor General, who I note is listening very attentively, will instruct his officials immediately to consummate and negotiate a new contract on the basis of fairness and equity.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I would just like to ask if the hon. member concurs with the following evaluation that I made of his speech.

The first point is the government's determination to cut the budget for policing in western Canada. This is having a really devastating affect on policing services in many of the smaller communities. There are communities in my riding that are discussing putting together ad hoc police forces and doing vigilante work. As a result of the recession and some of the cutbacks, crime is rampant in those communities. At the same time, we have cutbacks to the police force.

There was a woman in the emergency ward of the Sechelt Hospital who phoned for police and could not get a police officer. She had to phone Vancouver. There is one police officer on the peninsula. There are 1,600 individuals working on a mine construction project and another 200 people working on a pulp mill project in an area of 15,000 population and only one police officer, no additional funding, and the potential for chaos.

One of those communities is talking about private police forces and vigilantes. In another community there is a group meeting to do this as well. As a result of this ad hoc police work, somebody is going to get hurt and people are going to get killed.

The second point is the Prime Minister's appeal for national unity. On northern Vancouver Island the government has cut out the fishing, the unemployment insurance, the police force and recently cut the number of ports where people could land fish which harmed processors there. The government shut down coast guard radio stations. Everything in those communities costs more and is far more limited. The Prime Minister now increases the cost of policing 10 per cent to 30 per cent in those communities.

The Prime Minister is saying: "Hey, we have got a commitment to this country. We want to get national unity rolling." It is not working. Those folks are saying that what we can expect from Ottawa and from this government is nothing better than a poke in the eye with a sharp stick. They are asking: "What do we get?" The answer is absolutely nothing but more hardship and more heartache.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is from British Columbia and he knows that B.C. will be the hardest hit province as a result of the cutbacks. It will cost British Columbia residents $120 million over the life of the new contract. He points out that his province and the province of Manitoba are considering their own provincial police forces, that communities like Red Deer in Alberta and a number of other small communities right across the west are considering establishing their own police forces which will mean the removal of the RCMP. It is all because of the federal government's irresponsibility.

The federal government is shirking its responsibility to provide the necessary funding to ensure that the RCMP continues to provide the very excellent service it is providing to Canadians from one end of the country to the other.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend's motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take into full account the budgetary reality of the provinces and municipalities involved in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police contract negotiations and therefore be prepared to negotiate a contract for RCMP services which does not unfairly transfer policing costs from the federal government to provincial and municipal governments.

This motion could not have been presented at a more opportune time. I was appointed Solicitor General just over a month ago. I have had an opportunity to brief myself on the RCMP contract file. I took the occasion to fly to Vancouver and meet with my colleagues, the solicitor general of British Columbia and the attorney General of Manitoba. In fact, I discussed this file with the solicitor general of British Columbia as recently as this week. The file is very current.

In the short time that I have been the Solicitor General, I have also had an opportunity to discuss this file with my cabinet colleagues, particularly those who serve as members of the Treasury Board.

I met the Treasury Board ministers concerning this issue at nine o'clock this morning.

I am grateful to the hon. member for Comox—Alberni for the timeliness of his motion and the way in which it is worded. The motion is not derogatory, it is not inflammatory, and it allows us to have a fair and frank exposure of the issue without a great deal of political posturing.

I am also very grateful for the opportunity that this motion presents me, as the Solicitor General of Canada and as the minister responsible for the RCMP contract negotiations, to share with the House and with the public the federal government's position in these negotiations.

At the outset there should be an appreciation of the scale of the contract policing program. There are approximately 10,000 RCMP officers, almost one-half of the entire force, engaged in contract policing. The RCMP are providing the policing services under contract to all provinces, except Ontario and Quebec, and to the two territories and some 191 municipalities within the provinces and territories. The federal government shares the cost of providing RCMP policing services with the provinces, territories, and municipalities that use the RCMP, on terms that were last negotiated in 1981.

It is also important at the outset that there be an appreciation that the federal government remains committed to the RCMP and the RCMP policing program. There has been no suggestion in these negotiations that it has been any part of the federal government's agenda to remove the RCMP from its contract policing responsibilities. Notwithstanding the expiration of the present contract on March 31, 1991, the RCMP has remained on site and remained on duty providing the same high level of policing duties after March 31 that it was providing before March 31, 1991.

As all members of the House will know, the 1981 agreements expired on March 31, 1991. The negotiations for a new contract have been stalled for some time as a result of a disagreement over the allocation of costs, particularly over the question of the proposed increase from 70 to 75 per cent of the provincial share of the cost of provincial policing services.

The federal government has been seeking in these negotiations to achieve a more appropriate apportionment of the costs of provincial, territorial and municipal policing. For their part the contract jurisdictions have acknowledged, without specifically committing themselves, that the cost base should be adjusted to ensure that it more fairly and fully reflects the costs of delivering RCMP policing service to the provinces, the territories, and the municipalities that are receiving that service.

I want to digress for just a minute, if I may, to emphasize that we are not talking about the costs associated with the federal law enforcement responsibilities of the RCMP. In addition to its contract responsibilities, the RCMP also has significant federal law enforcement responsibilities. I am referring here to the RCMP's responsibilities for the enforcement of federal legislation relating to drugs, customs, immigration and the like, as well as to its responsibilities for protective policing and the enforcement of executive orders.

Those responsibilities are exclusively federal responsibilities and the costs associated with those responsibilities are therefore borne exclusively by the federal government. The costs of federal law enforcement therefore are not an issue in these negotiations.

What is at issue in these negotiations is the share of the provincial, territorial and municipal policing costs that should be borne by the contract jurisdictions. The provinces, and this is fair, are questioning the federal government's proposal that a more appropriate sharing of the costs would be 75 per cent provincial, 25 per cent federal. Their suggestion is that the 1981 agreement was definitive and permanent in establishing a 70–30 split of costs.

I want to make two points that I think are relevant to that. First of all, I would point out to the House that the provincial share of costs has been moving up over the years as the provinces grew in size and became more capable of paying for the service.

The provincial share in 1928 was 40 per cent. In 1971 it was increased to 56 per cent, and between 1981 and 1991 the provincial share went from 56 per cent to 70 per cent.

I imagine that the 70–30 compromise was taken with the realization that the increase was substantial and therefore should be tempered.

However, the historical trend is clear. I think it is really a question of the provinces assuming a greater portion of their financial responsibility consistent with their constitutional responsibility for the administration of justice, including provincial and municipal policing.

Second, by contrast with the 1981 agreements, I think it is fair to say the present federal offer is a very modest one. Apart from some adjustments to the base to ensure that the costs of delivering the service are more fairly reflected, we are only asking that the provinces pay an additional 5 per cent of the costs of RCMP provincial policing, an increase that we are prepared to phase in over time.

What we have here, then, is a gradual movement toward a more accurate matching of costs and benefits. In fact, we believe that we are suggesting a fairer rather than an unfair treatment of policing costs.

We acknowledge that there is a federal benefit in RCMP contract policing. It has been suggested that the 1985 Neilsen report established the federal benefit at 30 per cent.

I understand that the 1985 Neilsen report concluded that it was impossible to quantify the federal benefit with any precision. It went on to suggest that the real provincial and municipal burdens were lighter than the cost share ratios would indicate since the cost base only partly reflected the cost of delivering the service.

I suggest that the cost share ratios established in 1981 represented an incremental assumption by the contract provinces of a greater measure of their financial responsibility consistent, as I say once again, with their constitutional responsibility for the administration of justice, including provincial and municipal policing.

It would be consistent with the entire history of the RCMP contract policing which has been characterized by graduated increases in the provincial shares of the costs of the policing service.

It also has to be appreciated that over the last 10 years the cost share ratios have been applied to a negotiated cost base. For example, for some reason the cost base excludes the employer's contribution to unemployment insurance premiums. The Auditor General of Canada has noted this anomaly several times, specifically in his audit of Saskatchewan, and said that that should be included.

Second, only a portion of the employer's contribution to RCMP pensions is included in the cost base.

Third, concerning accommodation charges, when the federal government rents to the provinces it is one-third of comparable market rates. We find that when the provinces rent to us, however, we are paying market rates. There has to be an adjustment there.

In my preliminary discussions with Ivan Messmer of British Columbia and Jim McCrae of Manitoba, I sensed that there was a willingness to reach a fair cost base structure, and I am sure we can make progress on that particular issue.

What is at issue is the value to the provinces and contracting municipalities that they receive from contract policing. Speaking as a chartered accountant, I would suggest that this is not quantifiable in terms of dollars and cents as we can quantify some of the things in the cost base.

I think one has to look at what it would cost the province or municipality if it were doing it on its own. Rather than pontificating on this from a lofty federal viewpoint, I want to refer the House to an opinion recently expressed by Dennis Moffatt, an alderman from Red Deer, Alberta, the same municipality which was referred to by my hon. friend opposite in his remarks. This exchange took place on Alberta News Hour on April 26, 1991.

The reporter says:

> Dennis Moffatt sat on the local council for 15 years and has heard the complaint before, that the RCMP are too expensive. He says: "Even if the city has to pay 100 per cent of the bill, it is still a good buy".

Mr. Moffatt:

> When we buy a constable, he comes equipped with uniform, training out of Regina and Ottawa, a car, radio back-up, access to laboratories right across the country, access to Interpol, the FBI, the CIA, the MI-5 right across the board. We would have to pay for that at the municipalities if we did it by ourselves.

What Mr. Moffatt was talking about were the benefits of the economies of scale that the provinces and the municipalities receive from the RCMP contract policing. Duplication is eliminated in areas such as communications, computer systems, management structure, recruiting, training, personnel services and in a number of operational support areas, including fingerprint identification services, dog services and air and marine services.

When I was in B.C. I had occasion to discuss this matter with some officers out there. It occurred to me as a layman that there are some benefits I have not mentioned.

If the RCMP has a constable who has reached his or her level of excellence in one province and is looking for a greater challenge, an opportunity to further his or her career and if there is a need in a larger province or another opportunity for that particular individual, then there is so much more flexibility in the RCMP and the provinces, be they large or small, to get a better constable. That is another benefit which I would say accrues to the provinces.

It may be difficult to assign dollar values to these benefits, but I believe they represent significant benefits to the contract provinces and the territories.

I mention these benefits because I am concerned that they are not always given the prominence I think they deserve.

In addition to the direct benefits that I have described above, there are also a number of significant indirect and intangible benefits which are enjoyed by the provinces, the territories and the municipalities that contract for RCMP policing services. Some of these are as follows.

First, law enforcement services: These include the Canadian Police Information Centre, a large computer centre that police can use via terminals to check on stolen vehicles, criminal records and missing persons, the Canadian Police College and the forensic lab. These services are available to the entire Canadian police community at no charge. Again it is the federal government that covers these costs.

Second, non-police duties: The RCMP, particularly in remote regions, performs a number of duties that are strictly speaking not police duties. I am talking about issuing lottery licences, inspecting vehicles on behalf of the Registrar of Motor Vehicles, et cetera. There have been some recent RCMP estimates that the RCMP dedicates as much as 30 person-years to serving as prosecutors on behalf of the Attorney General of Newfoundland. It is the federal government that covers these costs on behalf of the provinces and the territories.

Third, the Corps of Commissionaires at division and subdivision levels: Although the facilities at the division and subdivision levels are often being used by three levels of government, all security costs are charged to the federal government.

Fourth, divisional staff relations representatives program and labour challenges through the Federal Court: All of the labour related costs of the RCMP, from association to litigation, are carried by the federal government. The contract jurisdictions are receiving their policing free of the labour related charges. Put more directly, the contract divisions are receiving a strike free policing service and again the federal government covers the cost of this benefit.

Five, civil actions, compensation claims and ex gratia payments: The contract jurisdictions are receiving their policing free of all the legal liabilities that ordinarily are attached to a police force. The federal government pays 100 per cent of these costs.

Six, centralized audit and program evaluation: There are a number of smaller items, which are impossible to quantify with any precision, which come into this. I am speaking of centralized audit programs, bulk buying, et cetera. The federal government carries the entire burden of these costs.

Most important perhaps, the federal government makes a considerable contribution over and above the contracts to building and maintaining high national policing standards and the contract jurisdictions get the benefit of that contribution at no additional cost.

In the short time that I have had the privilege to serve as Solicitor General I have developed a very real concern that perhaps the contract jurisdictions do not fully appreciate the cost advantages of the RCMP on the street, as it were. As a recent report of the British Columbia police services branch acknowledged, the RCMP provides what is probably the most frugal policing service in the country.

This conclusion is borne out by data produced by the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, a division of Statistics Canada. These data tell us that on a per capita basis, that is per capita of provincial residents, each resident of Ontario is paying $245.14 for the provincial policing service. Similarly, each resident of Quebec is paying $247.04 for the provincial policing service.

By contrast, each resident of British Columbia is paying $136.26 for the provincial policing service. That is quite a saving compared to Ontario and Quebec. In Nova Scotia each provincial resident is paying only $80.68 for the RCMP provincial policing service.

Put another way, using Ontario and Quebec as reference points, policing services would cost the contract provinces on average more than twice as much as they are now paying if they were to establish their own police forces. The cost sharing formula in the RCMP contract policing is in need of review in order that—to paraphrase the words of my hon. colleague, the member for Comox—Alberni—the policing costs fairly reflect the RCMP services which the provinces and the municipalities receive.

In conclusion I say we, the federal government, seek a fair apportionment of the policing costs in the provinces and the municipalities in which the RCMP provides services. We are conscious of their fiscal realities. We are sure that they are conscious of ours.

We are both conscious of the fact that the RCMP, through its national service, serves as an effective national operation which benefits federal, provincial and municipal jurisdictions.

We do not seek to put at risk this national institution because of a need to budget. Effectiveness and essentials can often transcend dollars and cents. That is what we seek to do. I am confident that we can do it.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, in response to the Solicitor General, I find him very interesting. Having dealt with the Solicitor General in the past, I feel that the new contract arrangements will be fair. I trust also that the Solicitor General would know though that when we hear "fairness" from the other side, it is a strange word when we see what has happened in the past dealing with the economy and dealing with other social programs.

I think we have to give the benefit of the doubt to the Solicitor General. I am very hopeful that he will carry out these contracts in a very fair way.

As a Quebecer, and we have our own police force, I would be willing to bet that most Quebecers would say that we have with the national police force, the RCMP, a very fine force. If we are talking about one of the threads that unify this country, we are looking at the RCMP as most definitely one of those.

I have come here to not only praise the RCMP but also to criticize it as a Quebecer. No matter which contract is agreed upon with the provinces, I would like to request a response from the Solicitor General that his attention be paid to the most recent tendency of politicians to put their cotton picking hands into the RCMP's business.

As a Quebecer I can speak to you about barn burning, I can speak to you about raids on political parties' membership lists and, most recently, I can speak to you from my own riding about a former member of Parliament. While he was under investigation the search warrant being carried out was delayed deliberately. It was a political decision because that former member of Parliament was a candidate in that election. I was a candidate at the same time in the same riding. Only after that member of Parliament won was a search warrant carried out.

What happens to the RCMP is that when we get it politically involved, it loses its fine reputation temporarily, but it takes a chink out of the armour. I would request that the gentleman on the other side, the Solicitor General, be very, very careful that does not occur again.

There is just one more recent case which has always been bothering me since I have been here in this House. It deals with a political decision with the RCMP on bilingual bonuses. Bilingual bonuses are approximately in the amount of $800. They were supposed to be paid since 1976 to RCMP members. They have not been paid. There was a judgment of the Federal Court of Canada in March, 1990, which said that the $800 bilingual bonuses should be paid. In the same judgment, Gingras v. Her Majesty the Queen, Judge Dubé said: "The question, therefore, is whether the board enjoys a discretion"—I am talking about the Treasury Board which has refused to pay these bilingual bonuses—"and it can, with impunity, ignore its own policies and impose an unofficial exclusion which was never stated in the policy". In other words, the Treasury Board abused its powers and therefore acted illegally.

Judge Dubé said that the Treasury Board acted illegally and abused its powers.

I have a paper here from the RCMP Association. RCMP members are not allowed to have a union as such. They have a French and English association. They were talking about this court case as a possibility where they could obtain a bonus which was legitimately theirs since 1976, a bonus which generally reaffirms our commitment to two official languages. At the time of the writing of this internal document from the RCMP Association, there was great hope that they would be able to get the bilingual bonus because the case had just been won.

There was a political decision to be made. Do we appeal this decision or do we give these RCMP members their money?

According to this document, and I just want to quote it briefly and then I will listen to the Solicitor General's response, the members of the RCMP say:

[Translation]

"According to the uncontradicted testimony of Mr. Gaston Guénette, an official language policy officer at the Treasury Board Secretariat, no ministerial order has excluded non-civilian members of the RCMP from the bonus. The decision came from Cabinet and was communicated to the RCMP by the Board. The Board's decision was influenced by the opinions, fears and pressures of the RCMP Commissioner. Given Mr. Guénette's testimony, there is reason to fear that the Commissioner was certainly involved in the decision in question."

• (1250)

Finally, they add that this matter was brought up with one of the predecessors of the Solicitor General, the Hon. Pierre Blais, and they mentioned that he was in agreement that this bilingual bonus be paid and he was bringing that before Treasury Board.

Before concluding, I would like to add that this problem of a bilingualism bonus is presently having an incredible deteriorating effect on morale at the RCMP. It is becoming a language issue between English and French and it is not conducive to the proper, efficient functioning of the RCMP. I would like to ask the minister if he would look into this, as he has looked into other things which I have presented and has done a very good job, and get back to me on the possibility of doing something about this sore which is festering between English and French speaking officers in the RCMP.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his remarks. I think it is fair to say that there is appreciation on the part of all residents of Ontario and Quebec as to the value of the RCMP to the country and the contribution it makes to national unity. I have every confidence in the fairness of the RCMP and its ability to police in any province.

With respect to the suggestion of political interference, I can tell my hon. friend that I have no intention of interfering with the RCMP in the conduct of its duties. I am sure that no other Solicitor General would have done so either. To do so would have been to breach the oath of office and I do not think the RCMP would go for it.

Let me now turn my attention to the Gingras case. I would say that in my previous capacity as Attorney General for Canada that appeals are not taken on a political basis. In my experience as Attorney General there were some decisions of the Federal Court which were not appealed because we agreed with the decision. In other cases there were decisions of the Federal Court which we felt in order to get a definitive answer should be appealed to the Federal Court of Appeal and then move on that as a government having received the benefit of the wisdom of the Federal Court of Appeal as opposed to a single judge. It is not a question of political interference or will; it is a question of trying to get the best decision possible for the country.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, since we are dealing with the matter of RCMP policing, costs and procedures, I wonder if the Solicitor General might take a moment to tell this House whether he intends to present amendments to the RCMP act to deal with the RCMP public complaints procedure. It is an extremely fine service to the public in that grievances have been quickly resolved by this institution. There are about 40 amendments in this book that need some serious attention to make this police force better.

Mr. Lewis: I appreciate my hon. friend's comments. I have had a briefing on that particular institution. I want an opportunity to discuss this with the force and the ministry and I will come to my conclusions after I have had the benefit of that advice. It is not something I am ignoring. It is just in the flow of things I have to deal with and I have not had an opportunity to fully apprise myself of the facts.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of debate today.

It is very useful that there is an opportunity to debate the question of policing and the cost of policing in Canada. I am pleased that the Solicitor General, the minister responsible for the RCMP, is in the House to hear the concerns of members of the House.

The cost of policing and the level of policing is an extremely important issue today. The level of policing in the community of Campbell River, British Columbia has created concerns that more police officers are required. It is like many other communities.

We have a recession going on. During the recession crime has continued to rise pretty dramatically. The crime that is happening is unusual. There is the standard form of break and enter in which a professional individual breaks into an establishment.

It is hard to tell that the individual has entered. The most valuable material is removed. There is very little damage, and indeed, there is very little indication of the entry and theft.

Then there is the other kind of situation, of which there is apparently an enormous increase in communities, in which an individual breaks into a home, restaurant, or another operation and removes things like cigarettes, food, and small amounts of money. It is almost subsistence stealing. This is occurring during a period of recession and high unemployment.

The kind of action that will deter that type of activity is more attention by government to support of social services and, as well, more policing. This is absolutely not the time to create a situation where we are going to see a reduction in policing.

An increase of 27 to 30 per cent in the operating budget of a small community because of increased policing costs is certainly going to be a deterrent to any expansion in policing. Indeed, we are going to see cuts in policing.

At a time when crime is rising in many areas this is absolutely critical. This must be put on the back burner. The minister and the government should begin to negotiate and be willing to go to the table with the provinces involved and make some accommodation during this very difficult time.

In one area that I represent on the Sechelt peninsula there are two communities, the town of Gibsons and the district of Sechelt. They recently underwent an enormous expansion of population which is growing very rapidly. Unfortunately, there has been no expansion in police services in that community.

The other thing that happened in that community was a major expansion to the pulp mill. In my recollection, the pulp mill took on about 1,600 people, mainly single men who arrived in the community to work on the mill construction. They lived in bunk houses creating considerable stress in the community.

In addition, we had at one point 200 pipeline workers from the province of Alberta who arrived on the Sechelt peninsula to put in a gas pipeline. They were there for a few months, and then they were gone. Again, that created enormous stress.

On many occasions, there was a single police officer to deal with the entire area. Something on the order of 1,800 single men, or men who were by themselves, in the community created a substantial strain.

In one altercation in the emergency ward of the St. Mary's Hospital a nurse was unable to get police assistance. There just was not a police officer to be had. They wound up having to phone Vancouver to see if they could dispatch somebody.

News of the concern eventually reached my office and the local RCMP and the RCMP said: "Look, we are using all the people we have to the maximum extent they can be used". Ultimately the conclusions of the municipalities, the regional board, and everyone on that peninsula is that they needed more policing and that no consideration was being given to the natural growth of a community which is a bedroom community of Vancouver and is growing extremely rapidly.

There was no consideration given to the quick 1,600 or 1,800 increase in the population because of the pipeline and mill constructions. That cannot be allowed to continue in an area as it could create a very unsafe situation for people.

It is incumbent upon the Solicitor General and the Government of Canada to ensure they do not make these cuts in funding at this time and cut policing in the municipalities even further. The federal government has a responsibility to assist the provinces in providing adequate levels of policing in those communities and in determining how to solve those problems, rather than to create problems and make them more intense.

In the community of Sechelt there has been talk of hiring private police. Break and entry of businesses is rising at a rapid rate and business people in the community are now taking a look at how they might hire people to take on police and security work. There is talk of vigilantes. This, of course, is absolutely not an acceptable direction to go.

It is ironic that the scepticism expressed by many of the people is that this is what the federal government wants. It wants privatization of services. This is the direction it will move in. So the people will hire their own police force. That is the direction they see. There is a lack of care and concern on the part of the federal government.

I would suspect that there are groups meeting. There have been discussions in Campbell River on Vancouver Island. This is going to happen. There are very serious concerns about the number of break-ins of homes and businesses and the people are very, very concerned about the level of policing.

There are discussions now on how people in the business community and the core of the community can create their own private operations to try and give them a little more security and a little more safety. This has to happen.

The federal government has to fight the increase of police forces in the hands of a number of individuals and look at providing better levels of trained, professional peace officers in those communities. This is moving in a very dangerous direction. I see a population out there that is very sceptical about this government's concern for their well-being.

The costs that are going to fall on small communities of 5,000 or more people are enormous. Their operating budgets have been hammered very badly.

I would like to use the example of the community of Alert Bay on northern Vancouver Island. Alert Bay has had an interesting encounter with this federal government. It has a Coast Guard radio station which provides about 13 jobs for this very small community of about 1,000 and a native community of about 900 people. The Conservative government decided that it was time to remove those 13 jobs from a community that can ill afford to lose them. They were terminated in spite of some very constructive cost-saving proposals which were totally ignored. The government has now adopted the Prime Minister's slogan: "I do not care how unpopular it is. I know best". So it did not listen to Alert Bay. It did not listen to northern Vancouver Island and the people's suggestions on how it could be made more efficient and how some of the economic benefits could be retained. Out it went.

Seven federal government jobs in the RCMP marine division were moved out of Alert Bay. They are gone. Again the Prime Minister knows best and the community is damaged.

There are cuts to the postal service, and the Prime Minister knows best.

Johnstone Strait communities are based on fishing. It was decided to drastically cut the Johnstone Strait fisheries. This fishery is absolutely critical to Alert Bay. It provides seasonal jobs for the Indian community and the non-Indian community. No, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans knows best. It is going to cut down on fishing in Johnstone Strait and limit the ability of these people to earn an income.

They are up in arms over this. Ottawa does not care. It does not care about the jobs provided by the RCMP marine division. It does not care about the Coast Guard radio station. It does not care about the hundreds and hundreds of jobs related to the Johnstone Strait fisheries. It is going to get rid of them.

To add insult to injury it was decided to make it harder to get unemployment insurance. Now, these people cannot get work. They want to work in traditional jobs as they have always done but they cannot do it. They hope they can feed their families by qualifying for more than 10 weeks of unemployment insurance. But no, fisheries and oceans and the Government of Canada will not do it. Many of those people are now collecting welfare because of this federal government.

Another insult added to injury is that fisheries and oceans—again the Conservative government knows best—decided it was going to eliminate Alert Bay as a port of landing for halibut, for sable fish. Even though there are two producers in that community, they are gone.

Turning to policing costs, Alert Bay will get less policing out of the northern Vancouver Island thing because of what is going on with the federal government today. In the middle of a recession the community is being devastated by this government. Policing services, which are desperately needed there, are going to be cut back as well.

It is ironic that this is being done at a time when the Prime Minister of Canada is asking the people of Alert Bay to become concerned about national unity, to become concerned about all of us as Canadians with the federal government as a focal point. Those people are saying: "The best thing I can expect from the federal government is another poke in the eye with a sharp stick."

When we talk about national unity, there are still some very strong Canadians there who totally blame the Prime Minister and the government for the misfortune that has befallen them. Every individual, every business, every person in the fishing industry in that community cannot wait to vote against the government.

Just a stone's throw across the water from Alert Bay is the community of Port Hardy. Port Hardy has suffered under the lash of this uncaring government. Port Hardy is a community of close to 5,000 people. It was a growing, healthy and a vibrant place to be and in the 1981 census it went over 5,000. As a result of having a population over 5,000, they wound up having to pay policing costs which were a substantial part of their operating budget. All of a sudden, the recession came on the next year, in 1982, and their population base collapsed. It went down to 4,000. They should not have had to pay policing costs, but unfortunately there is no mechanism in the agreement to relieve them of the policing costs once they hit 4,000 or fewer.

Unfortunately there is Port Hardy, with barely 5,000 people, paying policing costs for almost 10 years. There is some real evidence that it should not have been doing that.

About one-third of the people in that community work in Island Copper Mine which used to belong to Utah. Now it belongs to Broken Hills of Australia. The jobs of those 650 people are projected to be gone by 1996. It should turn Port Hardy into an economic distress area of serious proportions. At the same time, the Government of Canada wants to load greater policing costs on them. This community needs those policing services.

Again, the federal government does not stop there. Port Hardy is also suffering because it is dependent on seasonal industries such as fishing and forestry. Unfortunately those industries suffer because of the federal government: the 15 per cent softwood lumber tax on lumber going into the United States; the cutbacks in Johnstone Strait fisheries; the eliminating of certain points for landing fish. Then the federal government decides to close the military base at Holberg. There was no money or real assistance for these people to try to find an alternate activity for that particular asset. The government by and large just said: "Close the operation, eliminate those jobs", putting more economic hardship on the community of Port Hardy which is adjacent to Holberg.

The government closed the military base. It cut back access to unemployment insurance. It cut back the Johnstone Strait fisheries, and Port Hardy is looking at the closure of a mine in 1996 that employs about one-third of its population. That mine is going on strike at eight o'clock or being locked out at eight o'clock tonight. In fact, the worst case scenario is if the company says: "We are going to close it earlier". There is a real fear that that is going to happen.

How do those people in Port Hardy see this federal government that will not even come and talk to them about the problems, that will not accept their suggestions for alternatives? They do not.

It is ironic that the problem is not just policing costs. It is the Conservative government saying to the people of Alert Bay: "I don't care"; saying to the people of Port Hardy: "I don't care"; and saying to the people of Gibsons and Sechelt: "I don't care about you". That is the message being communicated. Then we have the gall of the Prime Minister who turns around and says: "Be concerned about central Canada, be concerned about all of Canada. We are leading the charge for national unity". And they say: "Well, if you re leading this charge for national unity, we don't want anything to do with it. We want an election because we want to get rid of you".

If you go into that community and ask them about the GST and all the money that is going to Ottawa, about the trade agreement with the United States, about being involved in a trade agreement with Mexico, about whether we should have higher policing costs, they say: "You don't care about us. You are going to destroy the economy of our community. There is nothing there. We know that you think you know better".

One of the things that is absolutely painful is that that community is desperately trying to build up an economic sector around tourism. It needs a customs officer in order to make Port Hardy a point of landing in Canada.

For three years they tried an experiment. They put in a customs officer and at the end of that period they said: "We don't like the numbers that came up there; therefore we are pulling the customs officer out. Besides, we are kind of into privatizing our services so if you want one you should look at paying for one yourself".

The Mount Waddington Regional Board, under which Port Hardy finds itself, came up with a solution in which a customs enforcement officer would be paid a stipend of 20 hours a month and they would make up the difference. They would pay for four hours a day for a customs officer. They were prepared to go along with this user-pay, privatization of the services, and pay the federal government in order to pay the customs officer.

The customs people came back and said: "No, no, we don't want to do that. We don't want any part-time customs officers. We want a full-time customs officer in there at $27 an hour for 52 weeks of the year or you can't have it".

Unfortunately these people do not have the money. They are paying for policing costs and for a certain number of social service costs to their communities because of the economic hardship that is going on. These people are burdened to death with charges that have fallen on them because of the Conservative government. This is a devastating policy.

The Reform Party is growing like wildfire and it is growing at the expense of the Conservative Party. They cannot wait to get rid of this government. Their tongues are hanging out for an election.

I have never seen an organization like it. In 1984 they just swept the country and in every other area they were the second choice. They have absolutely devastated themselves. It will be a surprise to see the Conservatives get their deposits back in many of the ridings in British Columbia. I sat with a prominent member of your party who said they have not got a safe seat in the entire province. Does that not say that the Prime Minister really does not know what is going on, that he really does not know what is best? What about the chopping out of Johnstone Strait fisheries, getting rid of the customs officer, jacking up the price for the RCMP, cutting off people from unemployment insurance, cutting out ports of landing, closing the base at Holberg, getting rid of services that are absolutely critical such as harbour services for marine transport, fishing harbour services, aeronautical services in those areas, skyrocketing transportation costs? Does that not tell him that he is doing something wrong?

It is ironic. A comedian stood up in Victoria one day and said: "We have a government in this country that is proposing to change the Constitution, that is proposing to change the relationship between Canada and Mexico and the United States and create a situation where our economy is going to be devastated in transition and may never recover—we may be Puerto Rico—and the Prime Minister enjoys the confidence of 14 per cent of Canadians". Then he said: "To get that into perspective, 15 per cent of Canadians think Elvis Presley is still alive".

This government is so far out of touch with what Canadians need and want it is wrecking the country piece by piece. It is wrecking Port Hardy. It is wrecking Alert Bay. It is wrecking many, many other communities and regions in this country. This situation has got to be turned around.

What does this government want? Does it want to wreck this country?

As we approach 1993 the Prime Minister turns around and leaves office because he cannot be re-elected and the party cannot be re-elected with him as Prime Minister; he walks out and says: "I achieved everything I set out to do. I wrecked Canada".

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member and would like to comment.

Port Hardy is familiar to me because my daughter and son-in-law worked as physicians there, and I can confirm what he is saying. They said this community was devastated by the policies of this government. So I perfectly agree with what he was saying.

I would like to point out as well that the principle of the contract we are negotiating with the eight provinces and two territories was established in 1981. One of the principles was that 70 per cent of the services provided by the RCMP in those provinces and territories were under the Criminal Code and provincial statutes. This is why the provinces agreed to pay 70 per cent of the costs. Thirty per cent of the services were federal statutes and laws like immigration, drug enforcement, migratory birds, wildlife, and white collar crime.

Therefore, a principle was established that 30 per cent of the activities of the RCMP in a given province were of federal jurisdiction. Now the Solicitor General tells them: "We want to pay only 25 per cent, and you pay 75 per cent". Naturally, you are shifting the burden on the taxpayer of that province.

As far as the municipalities are concerned, they were paying 90 per cent for the services of the RCMP and the federal government only 10 per cent. This was logical; they accepted that.

Therefore, I think what the government does is put the burden on the taxpayers of that province. I listened before to another member here, I think she was a Conservative, who said: "But you know, Quebec and Ontario are subsidizing the RCMP to do the policing duties in the other provinces". I think one thing they forget is that the RCMP performs duties in the province of Quebec and Ontario. There are about 2,000 officers in those provinces that are being paid by the federal government. Quebec and Ontario do not contribute a cent to those services. Therefore it is a false argument.

Another principle that was established is that if you have a national police force like the RCMP it is an efficiency factor. It is better to have one police force than to have three or four. The cost is lower. This is what is happening in those provinces where the RCMP provides services. So it is extremely important that you maintain efficiency and cut the costs, and one of the ways of cutting costs is by having a national police force.

The third principle that was established in 1981 when those negotiations were taking place is that the RCMP was a symbol of national unity. This government talks continuously about national unity, of the symbolism of our institutions, but it is trying to destroy the most important symbol of Canada that everybody around the world knows, namely, the RCMP. Canadians all over the world are known as having a national police force that is extremely efficient.

Why does this Solicitor General, who has just recently been appointed, not follow the advice of the eight provinces and two territories and accept the principle that was so well established after so many negotiations in 1981? I hope that he listens to Canadians and he accepts the 30–70 ratio. I think this is the way to go. I hope he has the courage to override the decision of the former solicitor general who said: "Take it or leave it". At the present time there is no contract between the eight provinces and two territories and the federal Solicitor General's department.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he agrees with me that this government has not given due respect to the feelings of western Canadians as far as the RCMP is concerned?

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Calgary summarized, in a succinct, intelligent, clear-sighted way, the problems of the way a national symbol is being downgraded.

There is a commitment to federal policing responsibilities in areas with very high native or Indian population. The RCMP do an awful lot of work in those communities that relate to federal responsibilities. The hon. member was very clear and insightful. I would recommend that some of the members review his comments.

I do not know, in reality, the way the question sits, but I know how westerners respond to what is going on. Westerners believe that they have been slapped in the face by this government. When I went through Alert Bay and Port Hardy I witnessed the economic disasters one after another that they have experienced. The government will not even talk to them or even come to the Johnson Strait Fishing Community group. They could never get the minister in there. He said: "Oh sure, I will come along and do it", but he never did and he let those communities go down the drain. They are going down the drain even further on policing and the post office and everything else.

What the hon. member for Calgary says is not about whether the government has paid attention or contributed enough to the west, but maybe the government should ask if what it is doing is good for the people. The Prime Minister says he knows what is good for them. How do people interpret it, because the government sure does not interpret it that way.

I came to this House of Commons 12 years ago with the hon. member who is the new Solicitor General. I wish him well in a very difficult portfolio. I have nothing but respect for him. I have seen him work in this House for 12 years. I know he will do a good job. I know he is a committed, hard-working member of Parliament, beyond a shadow of a doubt, and so are many of the other people who sit on those benches. They are strong, well-intentioned Canadians, but something has gone amok. I do not know what it is. What they are doing is turning people against them in droves in this country and I have never seen or experienced that before. The only thing I can say is, for God's sake, not only are you wrong in what you are doing, but you are creating absolute havoc in the countryside.

I have three questions: Will the Solicitor General take a look at the recommendations of the RCMP Public Complaints Commission Annual Report? It is a chance to give people an opportunity to express their grievances and have them properly adjudicated. It is absolutely critical. It will make one of the best police forces in the world better by giving people more confidence in it.

Will the Solicitor General look, in these serious times, at the level of policing in the communities? Harmful reactions are occurring because of it. The confidence in the police force is eroding and we are moving toward private operations and private security.

The last thing is that the communities in the riding I represent cannot afford to pay these increases at these times. Please, go to the table and get some alternate arrangement.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I find it significant that the motion before this House today should encourage the government to conclude contract policing agreements which do not "unfairly transfer policing costs" to the contracting jurisdictions. The motion is, in my view, an indication of the general lack of understanding and appreciation which exists within the NDP for the size and importance of the role of the RCMP in providing federal, protective policing and law enforcement services to all Canadians.

In view of the present circumstances surrounding the ongoing contract negotiations, it is understandable that much of the public's attention has been focused on the contract policing role of the RCMP. While contract policing is a major part of the RCMP's function, it should be emphasized that a large percentage of RCMP personnel and resources are engaged in non-contract activities paid for in their entirety by the federal government. You would never know that after listening to the NDP here today.

These activities such as federal law enforcement, protective policing, and law enforcement services, provide substantial benefits to communities across Canada regardless of whether or not they are served by RCMP contract policing detachments.

It is important that during these ongoing federal-provincial negotiations for renewal of the policing contracts the parties directly involved and, indeed, all Canadians should remind themselves of the important services provided by the RCMP to all levels of government and to all citizens.

When considering the motion which is before the House it is important that hon. members be fully informed of the extent to which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police provides law enforcement and police services to all Canadians and of the extent to which those services are provided without cost to the provinces and municipalities.

Most Canadians, especially those outside Ontario and Quebec, are aware that the RCMP provides contract policing to a number of provincial and territorial jurisdictions. This fact is perhaps one of the most evident aspects of RCMP activities because it is probably the force's most visible program. The presence of the Mounties in eight of the 10 provinces, the two territories, and close to 200 municipalities in a contract policing role is as visible and apparent as that of city or provincial police in Ontario and Quebec. Citizens recognize the force and rightly so as a symbol of trust, authority, law and order. Members from both political parties referred to the RCMP as one of the best police forces in the world. I wish they could give me their list of who they think is better or who tops this list if the RCMP is only one of the best.

Notwithstanding the importance of this role, the RCMP performs a number of other vital functions to ensure the safety and security of all Canadians.

Members will appreciate that the RCMP maintains a federal policing complement in each of the 10 provinces and two territories. The RCMP federal policing complements attend to such federal responsibilities as policing at international and domestic airports, commercial crime investigations, protective policing of visiting dignitaries and other VIPs, as well as providing support to customs operations and drug law enforcement, something that is of particular importance coming as I do from the Niagara peninsula which is a border area.

Since federal policing units are dedicated solely to the enforcement of federal legislation and executive orders, the costs associated with these activities are paid for entirely by the federal government. You may have missed that if you followed, as I am sure you have, Madam Speaker, the debate here this morning. You would not be able to guess by listening to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that these services are paid for in total by the federal government—

An hon. member: He was referring to the NDP.

Mr. Nicholson: Oh, he was referring to the NDP. Then I withdraw that comment about him and direct it to where it should properly go which is of course the socialists at the end of the Chamber.

In addition to its specific federal law enforcement function, the RCMP provides law enforcement support services to all Canadian law enforcement agencies.

• (1330)

These services provide technical and operational support to provincial and municipal police forces and ensure that the latest police technology and techniques are available to provincial and municipal police forces across Canada.

Law enforcement services are provided to local police forces regardless of their size or ability to pay and help to assist in maintaining a high national standard of criminal investigations. These services are funded by the federal government in the interest of maintaining the safety and security of all Canadians.

The combination of federal law enforcement activities and the provision of law enforcement services to Canadian police forces constitutes an important part of RCMP program activities. They are important not only to the federal government and to the RCMP but of course to the communities and local police forces that benefit from these services.

Federal expenditures on RCMP activities constitute a significant portion of RCMP resource levels. Indeed, revenues from all services rendered, including contract policing services, amount to only 30 per cent of the cost of the RCMP's law enforcement program.

For instance, in the 1988–89 fiscal year, the RCMP spent over $400 million on the enforcement of federal statutes and executive orders and over $125 million on the provision of law enforcement services. Expenditures on these program activities have increased in the last two years, to a combined total of $546 million in 1989–90 and $639 million in 1990–91. These combined activities thus represent program expenditures which are over three–quarters of the size of contract policing expenditures over the same period.

I would like to take this opportunity to give hon. members a wider appreciation of the variety and quality of services which are provided to Canadians by the RCMP and which are funded by the federal government. I do that, of course, because as I indicated earlier we might wait a long time before we hear the NDP mention some of these things.

I am confident that once this information is before the House, members' concerns about the transfer of policing costs from the federal government to provincial and municipal governments will be allayed.

The RCMP acts within its mandate to prevent, detect and investigate offences against federal statutes and to provide investigational assistance and security advice to other federal departments and agencies as required.

This responsibility involves the force's participation in the enforcement of over 40 major federal statutes from the Aeronautics Act to the Young Offenders Act. The force's Customs and Excise Program investigates smuggling and offences involving the illicit manufacturing of spirits or tobacco products, offences under the Excise Act. It is also responsible for investigating illegal trans–border shipping of strategic goods, high technology and cultural property.

The Mounties also enforce Canada's fight against the problem of illegal trafficking in endangered wildlife species. The Immigration and Passport Program assists in the enforcement of the Immigration and Citizenship Acts as well as the investigations of Canadian passport regulations under the Criminal Code.

Special Services provides support to investigators in technical and physical surveillance, polygraph examination, audio and video analysis and personality profiles of violent criminals. The force also maintains a special emergency response team which is trained to resolve terrorist hostage–taking incidents and related crises which may be beyond the normal capabilities of regular RCMP personnel and other police forces.

The War Crimes Investigation Unit works to bring to justice persons suspected of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Two areas of federal enforcement, drug enforcement and economic crimes, are areas of particular emphasis by the RCMP. The relatively large number of resources assigned to these initiatives reflects their priority for the federal government.

Currently, over 1,000 persons and approximately $84 million are committed to the investigation of offences relating to the importation, exportation, trafficking and possession of narcotics and other prohibited drugs in Canada. Federal drug sections co–operate with local police in drug enforcement activities and the operation of drug prevention and awareness programs.

The RCMP federal drug sections in connection with the contracting policing resources provide street level drug enforcement services across Canada.

Approximately 600 persons and $41 million are devoted to the specialized investigation of economic crime. This includes the investigation of fraudulent bankruptcies, violations of the Income Tax Act and the UI Act, counterfeiting, computer crime, and other forms of business-oriented crime.

In 1989, the economic crime program provided assistance in over 4,000 investigations which resulted in recoveries of almost $42 million by affected parties.

In addition to federal law enforcement, the RCMP is also responsible for discharging the government's protective policing obligations and providing security services to a range of federal properties, office-holders, and dignitaries.

Security services are provided to the Governor General, the Prime Minister and their families, as well as to foreign missions and visiting dignitaries. Federal properties such as Parliament Hill, Government House and the Supreme Court are also provided with security arrangements by the RCMP.

I am certain that in the course of most members' travels to and from their constituencies they have had occasion to see a member of the RCMP patrolling Canada's airports. Their uniformed presence at these facilities is the most visible part of the force's airport protective policing program which provides security services at 10 international and eight major domestic airports. Specially trained and armed personnel patrol critical access points inside terminals and aircraft operating areas to prevent and detect security incidents.

Resources devoted to the airport policing program in the current year total 895 person-years and approximately $75 million.

The RCMP maintains a small core of personnel which provides advice and expertise to ensure that security procedures at special events are in place to ensure the safety of participants. In this way the force contributes invaluable security advice and guidance to the planning of major events across Canada.

In 1990 the Royal Canadian Mounted Police co-ordinated 28 special events and was consulted on preparations for a further 52. Depending on annual requirements these events can range from state visits to major economic summits and major sporting events such as the Winter Olympics held recently in Calgary.

Protective policing services are estimated to account for 12.8 per cent of total RCMP expenditures and 9.7 per cent of person-years for 1991-92.

The Law Enforcement Services Program provides specialized services to the RCMP as well as to other law enforcement agencies, corrections agencies, government departments, and criminal courts. These services support participating agencies in exercising their responsibilities for maintaining peace, order, and security.

The Canadian Police Information Centre provides and maintains an automated national information system for the storage, retrieval and exchange of operational police information on behalf of all accredited Canadian police agencies. This program, along with the management of information, resources, and services required to support other RCMP programs, will account for over 1,700 person-years and about $155 million in RCMP expenditures for the current fiscal year.

The $31 million Forensic Laboratory Service Program provides scientific and technical assistance for the benefit of the Canadian criminal justice system. The program provides analysis of physical evidence acquired during the course of investigations and expert opinions based on scientific examinations to aid investigations and for use as court evidence.

In addition to court and investigative assistance, forensic scientific support is provided to participating agencies in the areas of developmental and technical training. Consulting services and training assistance may also be provided to other government departments and foreign countries.

Roughly $59 million of the RCMP's current resource allocation is allocated to the provision of identification services. This program maintains a centralized criminal records function supported by fingerprints for use by police agencies and other aspects of the criminal justice system.

Identification Services provides photographic processing and printing services, maintains records of restricted firearms, and examines fraudulent cheques and hold-up notes for similarities with other documents on file.

This program is also responsible for maintaining the missing children's registry which holds records on children who have been reported missing across Canada. The registry shares information with other police agencies and the media to assist in locating these children.

The RCMP also operates the Canadian Police College program, which provides advanced police training in organizational and administrative personnel management and specialized investigative techniques to assist law enforcement agencies. The college operates on a budget of about $9 million and provides training to over 2,000 candidates annually.

Criminal Intelligence Services Canada is a national organization which is administered by the RCMP and which focuses on gathering and sharing information on organized crime and tactical intelligence. The service provides facilities for the collection, analysis, and dissemination of criminal intelligence and ensures that the relevant intelligence is submitted to provincial bureaus. In this way the flow of information between units provides all Canadian police agencies with access to organized crime intelligence.

As I indicated at the beginning of my remarks, I have attempted to provide a brief overview of the many and varied services which are provided by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the benefit of all Canadians.

In addition to the important and high profile contract policing services, the force devotes a sizeable portion of its resources to federal law enforcement, protective policing, and law enforcement services. In many cases these non-contract services provide considerable investigative and professional support, both directly and indirectly, to the contracting jurisdictions.

The government is pleased to reaffirm its continuing commitment and support for the RCMP's important national role in providing non-contract policing services, at federal expense, to all Canadian communities.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, it was interesting to listen to the hon. member give a dissertation on the contents of the budget of the RCMP.

I am hoping he did not miss the point. The point is that many communities which have RCMP policing are going to be severely handicapped by these increases at a time of rising crime and recession and they are having extreme problems. It is not just the increases which are causing them the problems. There are a whole host of activities the federal government has done.

We do not have to take a riding held by these evil folks, the socialists. Let us take one that is held by one of the Conservative members.

Mr. Nunziata: Temporarily.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Temporarily is an understatement. At Cariboo—Chilcotin and Williams Lake, the budget is estimated to go up 36 per cent. It is substantial. How do the people of Williams Lake feel about the Conservative member for Cariboo—Chilcotin on this matter? I can tell you how they feel about it. They are outraged. It is not the only problem.

We have a minister across the floor from Prince George—Peace River. His communities feel the same way. They do not want him to represent those communities any more and it is not going to happen. The people there feel they have been seriously aggrieved by this government.

I would ask again if we could maybe deal with three things. The member who just spoke would not agree that these three items are critically important for policing by the RCMP in the areas where it works. It is understaffed.

There is no question in this House about the kind of job that police force does, short of resources, short of a statute that needs to be brought up to date, and short of remuneration and working conditions that have to be considered. We need to support that organization, not abuse it. The level of policing has to be brought up in those communities. We do not need price increases right now for the existing services so we can reallocate the burden of taxes. We need an increase in the level of policing in those communities. The Solicitor General should be at the table now asking how the federal government can assist the provinces to provide safety for Canadian citizens.

The second thing that has to happen is that these price increases have got to be staved; the Solicitor General has got to go to the table with the provinces and work out an acceptable agreement now. We desperately need those services. They are good and we need them.

I would ask the member—I know his interests in the area of justice—whether he has made any representations on the question of the annual report of the RCMP public complaints commission. There are about 40 recommendations in there that are absolutely critical to upgrading public confidence in the RCMP. It is a good police force but there are some serious grievances that people have. There is an effective agency to hear those grievances and it is being hamstrung by the fact that the legislation is not up to date. There are many things that were not contemplated when that legislation was put on the books and that legislation needs to be revamped.

Is the hon. member prepared—I know he has considered it already—to go through it one more time and make some representations to the Solicitor General? The Solicitor General has got to bring forward proposals for adopting these recommendations put forward by the agency itself and upgrading that service. We need better levels of policing; we need some help with those communities, not in the form of enormous cost increases but in developing those policing services over a rough economic time; and we need to do something to improve the public's confidence in this agency by establishing the complaints procedure. There are one or two items that really do need to be brought forward and dealt with in a public and fair way.

Would the member be prepared to talk about those with the Solicitor General to see if this House can begin to deal with those recommendations?

Mr. Nicholson: Madam Speaker, I am always prepared to speak with the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General, I believe, indicated in his concluding remarks that he was prepared to look at the recommendations concerning the public complaints commission. All hon. members take him at his word that he is studying those very carefully and will certainly be making comments directly on that in the future.

If I understand the first two points that the hon. member made, he made a plea for increased services. There is no doubt that the federal, provincial, and municipal governments can provide increased services in policing services. There is probably no area of governmental endeavour in which I would not like to see in some way a change or an increase in services. In the second part of his appeal he said among other things that we do not need—and I guess he was referring to municipal and provincial levels of government—an increase in costs.

I listened to the hon. member's comments about his analysis of the political situation in Canada. I am glad that he in a sense captured the NDP philosophy about government and taxation. I do not want the House to misunderstand. I always agree. I always want to increase services and I certainly do not want increased costs. Just in a nugget, the NDP philosophy is that the federal government should increase services but not increase any of the costs at the same time.

One of the finest things about the NDP being elected in Ontario, perhaps the only thing, is that people will finally get a look at that sort of theory in practice, the idea that you can just have more of everything. I remember people during the past provincial election, now that the member has raised this question of costs and services, who said to me: "I am from this particular profession. I would like to have some more money. The NDP is going to give me more money. There is going to be more money for hospitals, teachers, roads, and more money for all provincial services. The wonderful thing about it is despite you bad guys who like to tax us, we are going to be taxed less in Ontario".

I said: "Well, jeepers, you might as well have the perfect people running Queen's Park down there. I mean, if they could do all those wonderful things, let the perfect people do them. You know the Tories and the Liberals have a difficult time in providing the high level of services we have in this province and other provinces, and God bless the NDP if all of a sudden it can do that and everybody is going to get a tax holiday".

When people advocate and demand more services but want it to cost less for the taxpayer, they get into the mess the NDP is getting into at Queen's Park. The NDP government turned a surplus—and I give credit to the Liberals in Ontario for that, they had a surplus 18 months ago—into a $10 billion mess because the NDP live in a dream world where it can go on borrowing money.

The biggest threat to services in this country—all services, everything from policing to social services—is the level of debt in the country. The NDP is going to find that out at Queen's Park. Pretty soon we will have no chance to make the kinds of decisions about where we want to spend our money. If we continue with the way we have been going in this country for many years, the direction in which the government is apparently going at Queen's Park, all the money will go to the banks that the hon. member does not like. We will be paying it in interest whether he believes me or not. That is where the money is going to go. He will find that out in the long run.

Sure, we could run up a $60 billion debt in Canada this year. Our good friends at Queen's Park are probably just getting going. Next year they will be telling us: "It better be a $15 billion deficit". We can do that for a couple of years, but eventually we have to come to the conclusion that it is all over. We cannot do it anymore. We cannot shuffle the books. We cannot hide from the fact that difficult decisions have to be made.

It is at that point that we have to say: "We cannot give the increased level of services that we want, and we sure cannot do it at the same time without having anybody else share the cost with us."

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to hear the hon. member speaking about the deficit. I wish he had done so in 1984. Perhaps then the national debt would not have doubled in the years that the government he supports has been in office.

I am also delighted with the positive comments about the Liberals. I had the pleasure of seeing the former premier of Ontario last night. I am certainly well aware of the very competent job he did, and I know my hon. friend agrees that it was probably the best government the province of Ontario has ever had. Things have certainly gone downhill since. I know my hon. friend will agree with that.

In his long recitation of fact and fiction about the RCMP and the things it does—and I on this side of the House acknowledge the good job the RCMP does in our country—I wondered if he was perhaps going on a bit harshly about the member of the New Democratic Party who spoke before.

It seems to me that perhaps what the hon. member has confused in his mind—and I do not mean the hon. member for Niagara Falls, I mean the member for North Island—Powell River—is that perhaps the province of British Columbia was being assessed unfairly for the contract services provided by the federal government through the RCMP. I wonder if, in calculating the amount of fee to be charged to the province, the federal government has been adding in as expenses some of the activities carried on by the RCMP in its national mandate, not on a contractual basis.

I live in a municipality which recently had to contract services from the Ontario Provincial Police. It cost us an arm and a leg. The hon. member for North Island—Powell River talks about an increase in taxes. It is nothing compared to what residents of the township of Kingston recently had to endure, but I am not going to go into that.

I wonder if, in calculating the costs, the additional costs of running the RCMP have been added to the mix and charged out to the provinces. If so, I submit that this is the part that is unfair. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could address that particular question more directly.

Mr. Nicholson: I am pleased to address that point. I wish I had time to address that first part about the debt, but we can save that for another day.

Something not mentioned in the debate is that the estimates and the basis upon which the contracts have been determined between British Columbia and other provinces actually underestimate the costs to the federal government.

However, certain things like pension and UIC benefits and indirect subsidies in terms of rental spaces in a number of western provinces, including British Columbia, actually underestimate the costs. Those costs are a contribution by the federal government to, what is in Quebec and Ontario, provincial policing services. They are an underestimation of the costs.

The Solicitor General, in the statistics he read to the House, actually pointed out that not only is there a contribution from the federal government to municipal and provincial services that does not take place in the two largest provinces, but, besides that, the cost is considerably less expensive.

Somebody referred to the RCMP as a frugal policing agency. It is frugal and effective. One of the things that can get lost in this debate is that the federal government has been very fair over the years in its negotiations. It obviously does not want something like this motion, which looks like an attempt to tie the hands of the government in its negotiations. The government just wants to have a reasonable agreement. That is all the federal government is looking for.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I want to ensure that I have the details of my sharing of time correct. I will be sharing my time with my colleague from Western Arctic. I assume I have 10 minutes and 5 minutes of questions and she will have the same.

I am pleased to be able to stand in the House today and address this particular motion, the essence of which is really the budgetary reality of the provinces and municipalities involved with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police contract negotiations. That is the very essence of it. What is the budgetary reality out there for all of the provinces and municipalities using this particular service at this time?

I have heard a number of colleagues mention——that we have a very proud and effective police force that is an extremely important symbol in the country and of course an extremely important symbol of national unity. I agree. This police force, the RCMP, is known throughout the world. I do not think we should underestimate the importance of this institution for Canada and for keeping Canada together.

[English]

As I indicated in previous remarks this morning, the attorney general of Manitoba, Mr. McCrae, made the point that the RCMP was a unifying force in Canada.

Let us not delude ourselves. We are talking about $79 million fewer that will have to be replaced by the provinces and municipalities. We are talking about roughly 10 million Canadians, western and northern Canadians and people from the Atlantic provinces. Approximately 80 per cent of those come from western and northern Canada. Therefore, roughly 80 per cent of that $79 million will be taken out of the pocketbooks of western and northern Canadians. We must not ever forget that.

This is another excellent example of off-loading which the government continues to do. It is not unlike me saying to my spouse: "I want to cut down on my expenditures. Of the $700 mortgage, I am only paying $500 now. You are spending $500 on food but I am only giving you $400 now". All of a sudden, I stand up and brag to everyone and say that I am controlling my expenditures. What nonsense. It is just totally illogical.

This is what is happening. This is a continuation of the withdrawal of the federal presence in certain parts of Canada. Of course, it fits the Conservative ideological framework—the trend to complete decentralization.

Here are the facts with respect to this particular issue. Not only will $79 million have to be found by the provinces and municipalities involved, but it is this continued attack on the Atlantic provinces and western and northern Canadians that is most unfortunate.

This agreement, as many members will know—

—expired at the end of March, 1991 and, if I understood correctly, the provinces were paying 70 per cent and the federal government 30 per cent, and in the case of the municipalities, they were paying 90 per cent and the federal government 10 per cent.

• (1400)

The government now wants a 5 per cent increase in the share paid by the provinces and the municipalities. This is a tremendous financial burden when we consider what has happened in these regions.

[English]

This is a good example of looking at a problem in isolation. By itself it is not particularly pleasant, having costs increase by 5 per cent. But if we look at the total situation, the economic reality out there, it is another blow to western and northern Canadians and to people from the Atlantic provinces.

That is in addition to everything else that has happened. What about Portage la Prairie? Do you remember that closing? Do you remember the base closing in Prince Edward Island? We are talking about others. We are talking about Shilo. We are talking about Chilliwack. Just imagine the number of jobs lost, the damage to the economy.

What about the reductions to the agricultural community, particularly in western Canada, my own province of Manitoba? That was devastated, particularly in Portage la Prairie. It was not only the base closing but the farm community around that base suffered as well.

What about the reductions to health and education? I have said it again and again: from 1986 to 1995, because of the cut of 2 per cent in 1986, another one in 1989–1990 and the freeze that has been extended, there will be $30 billion less for health and education being transferred to provinces. A lot of that, a little more than a quarter, will be to western and northern Canadians.

What about the cap on CAP? It will affect Ontario of course but also the western provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. Do you know that that will take from those three provinces about $865 million over two years? Because British Columbia and Alberta together have almost six million people as opposed to Ontario's ten million, a substantial amount of that $865 million will come from British Columbia and Alberta.

We have not talked about the closing of the rural post offices and the devastation that that has wreaked. In one of today's newspapers, another headline read: "Another series of closings of rural post offices". When will it ever stop? The people of western Canada are obviously being affected in a significant way.

What about the high interest rate—the high dollar policy that we have heard so much about? Most of us know that another point in interest rates costs Canadians roughly $2 billion. This has been going on and on. We tried to control inflation in this country by virtue of the economic activity that was happening in Ontario. We have applied a policy to cool it here that has affected a number of regions—western and northern Canada and the Atlantic provinces—in a very regressive kind of way.

We have not even talked about the losses that have been suffered by western Canadians in the Canada–U.S. trade agreement. I will not quibble about the figures because I know we all have our own figures, but we are talking about nearly 300,000 manufacturing jobs that have been lost. Have they all been lost as a result of that agreement? I do not know, but certainly many have and a large proportion, well over a quarter, have been lost to western and northern Canadians.

I have not talked about the devastation that was wreaked on western Canadians, and particularly Manitobans, because the CF–18 contract we had won fairly was taken away from us.

I have not talked about the cuts to the CBC in Calgary, Saskatoon, and the reductions in service in Winnipeg.

What about VIA Rail? Twenty-nine hundred Canadians lost their jobs, many of them in Manitoba, many of them in the other western provinces.

What about the closing of passenger lines—the line from Victoria to Courtenay, The Canadian? What about Montreal, Ottawa, Sudbury, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver? What about the line from Winnipeg to Capreol? What about the 85 closing, Calgary to South Edmonton?

The point that has to be made is that we cannot look at this in isolation. It is another attack on what has been happening to Canada generally and today, more specifically, to western and northern Canadians and Canadians from the Atlantic provinces.

Let us look at those particular regions. I am going to concentrate on western Canada and on the bankruptcies of farms, one of the basic elements in a number of those western provinces, from January 1, 1991, to March 31, three months.

For example, in Manitoba it has increased by 7 per cent. In Saskatchewan, it has increased by 68 per cent and in Alberta, by 19 per cent. In British Columbia, it has increased by 80 per cent. It is a massive increase in bankruptcies and in the destruction of one of our major basic principles.

What about bankruptcies year after year: Manitoba, 53 per cent; Saskatchewan, 42 per cent; Alberta, 40 per cent; and B.C., 55 per cent. Those are part of the reality of the economic situation of our western provinces.

If you check, unemployment in every single province has increased massively from a year ago. In fact, in Manitoba it used to be at 6.5 per cent. It is now at 8.9 per cent.

For example in Calgary we did not close Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation which was in fact an organization that was put into place for developing nations to reduce their dependence upon foreign oil.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I don't want to be nasty but it seems to me there is something rather contradictory in all this. I don't want to mention the word hypocrisy, but it's pretty close, when we see this persistent attack on the western provinces, the North, and the Atlantic provinces.

I would have a lot more to say, but I see my time has expired.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, today we are talking about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and I have a question for the hon. member. Could he tell me whether in his riding and, in fact, in his province, he hears the same kind of thing from his constituents as I do in connection with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which allows Canadians of Sikh origin to wear a turban in the RCMP? I would appreciate hearing how the hon. member's constituents reacted to this decision which was based on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I want to thank the hon. member for her question. I would also be interested to hear what yours said. As you know, a member on your side of the House sent the government a petition signed by several thousand constituents which, if I am not mistaken, indicated that they were against this decision.

In my own riding I got calls for and against the decision, and quite honestly I have to say the numbers were about equal. If I remember correctly—and I think I am pretty close to the exact figure—it was about a dozen for and against. I think that having someone who had just finished his training and had now graduated was helpful in toning down some of these strong reactions. However, I realize we have not seen the end of it. People often find it hard to accept radical change, especially in the case of long-held traditions such as the RCMP, the churches we go to, and other institutions.

[English]

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, the question of cuts to the federal contribution to existing services that are already inadequate is the issue.

This is placing the burden on an inappropriate tax area, the municipality, which is already hanging on by its fingernails. I would not want to leave the hon. member for Niagara with that open-ended situation. The federal government is proposing to load on enormous costs to already existing services that are inadequate. The point that was made—it was supported by the previous speaker—is that the level of service is inadequate. The federal government must assist.

If the costs for existing services are jacked up, the proposed amount is unfair to the taxing bodies that are going to have to pick up the cost. Again, more inadequate services.

I want to give one single example, and I hope you can respond to it. In Port Hardy, the customs officer was removed. It is no longer a port of entry. The municipality said: "We will pick it up. If you want to privatize, we will do it. We will put in $15,000 a year. We have a qualified, experienced customs officer who will do that job for $15,000 a year. He will work with you on it".

The government said: "No, no. You have to pay for a full-time one, $60,000-plus a year". The municipality said it did not have the tax base to do it. They said: "Tough. You are not a port of entry".

This is what the government is proposing for RCMP services because those communities have got to have some kind of security. I do not want to see somebody roaming around their community with a German shepherd or a Doberman, paid $4.50 an hour, without training, dealing with citizens and creating a dangerous situation. I see that as the end result. I want that customs officer back in that community and so does every other person. The feds have a responsibility to give them port of entry status. There is also a need to provide fair and safe levels of policing, not drive them out.

• (1410)

Mr. Duhamel: Thank you for the question. You actually raise a number of important issues.

Of course, one can remove any service and replace it with a more economical one, but one always has to ask, will the quality of the service be better. In many instances it is not. So it is a false saving. That is one issue.

Let us not delude ourselves. The service will be paid for by you and me and all other Canadians. The point I am making is that it is being transferred over. What offends me and what offends a lot of Canadians, is that in the action of transfer, the federal government is trying to claim that it is controlling expenditures in a responsible way.

I give an analogy. If I were to tell my spouse that the $700 mortgage to which I contribute $700, as an example, I now only contribute $500, I have reduced my expenditures. But is it fair? It is going to have to be picked up. That is the same kind of scenario that is happening here.

If there was not at the same time a claim that it is whiter than snow, in terms of controlling expenditures, I guess I could more easily forgive.

The issue you raise about the quality of services is a particularly important one which must never, ever be forgotten. We can always do things more cheaply, but will it be good enough. In many instances, it is not.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by expanding the motion from my NDP colleague to include the jurisdiction of the two territories in addition to the provinces, with respect to the transfer of police costs.

The government of the Northwest Territories is currently paying for 70 per cent of the cost of the RCMP in the north. The federal government expects, unrealistically, that the territorial government can now absorb 75 per cent of the cost. That is a big jump in the proportion contributed by the territorial government.

There are extraordinary needs in the north that cannot be equated with southern needs. One such is the fact that there is a heavy reliance on the RCMP in the north to travel to various communities because members are not stationed in each of the communities in the north.

There is a heavy reliance on capital refurbishment because of the use of ski-doos and trucks which do not have the luxury of travelling on paved highways, but gravel roads and winter roads where they are available. There is also the use of Twin Otters, one of which, unfortunately, crashed in a community. There was much debate as to whether that would be replaced. Much capital infrastructure is needed in the communities where they travel only by air and they do not have highways and roads.

The territorial government would rather invest its money in providing more and better service. For instance, the Yellowknife detachment of the RCMP is seriously understaffed. We have a high transient population and this is the feeder community for all of the outlying communities. We have a high incidence of people coming from out of town, a high transient population that needs to be served.

As well, there are communities that do not even have resident RCMP. Some communities in the Keewatin region are served only once a month. There are communities that should have full-time service and others that should have more frequent visits. The federal government cannot ignore the unique situation which the two territories present to the role of the RCMP.

The Yukon and Northwest Territories encompass an area of some 3.9 million square miles, covering 40 per cent of Canada, spanning more than 4,000 kilometres from west to east, and 3,500 kilometres from north to south. As I have said time and again in this House, the north is an immense region which is of strategic importance to all Canadians.

Let me explain what the challenges are in providing policing service in an area of this size. Although two-thirds of the Yukon's 25,800 live in and around Whitehorse, less than one-quarter of the Northwest Territories' population of 54,000 live in Yellowknife. The rest live in some 100 smaller communities scattered across the north. The federal government, rather than expecting the territorial governments to put up more money to cover the cost of policing, should be looking at how the north can receive support for better policing services for those residents living in northern communities.

As well, the government should be investing in methods for the RCMP to take steps to strengthen its relationship with the aboriginal people who are the majority in the north, as well as the other people who live in the remote regions. The government has to continue to develop community policing concepts and special recruitment drives for attracting aboriginal people into that particular profession.

On May 16 I met with the representatives from the Dakota Ojibway Tribal Council regarding the funding concerns for policing services. The DOTCPD receives joint funding from both the federal government and the province of Manitoba. Despite the fact that operating costs continue to increase, neither of these governments will increase or commit to long-term funding before the national native policing review has been submitted. Although the initial report for the national native policing review was completed in January last year, an additional round of consultations pushed the date of this review that would be submitted to the cabinet back to January of this year. It would not be submitted to Treasury Board until the spring.

The DOTCPD handles about 95 per cent of the workload in eight reservations in Manitoba and has received requests for services from non-native communities, thus reducing the workload for the RCMP in these areas.

Without adequate support, this police department cannot perform its duties as effectively as possible. Native policing is an important and valuable program. It is beneficial for native communities to work with a police force which can speak and understand their own aboriginal language and which possesses a cultural understanding of the residents.

The history of the RCMP in the north has been a long and honourable one. The relationships that have been forged over the years are ones that are based on mutual respect and concern for the people who have lived there.

What has happened over the years is that as we have had recruitment, which is basically federally driven, we are being asked to pay for services to the tune of 75 per cent. Yet the policies all come from a federally driven process.

If we are going to have accountability and credibility of the work that is undertaken by the members of the forces and if the moneys are going to be paid by the territorial government, clearly there should be a greater input by the Minister of Justice in this case, who has responsibility for policing matters in the Northwest Territories. Clearly there has to be more of an input in terms of policy and the kind of mandate that they have and the kind of relationships that they build.

Even with regard to recruitment there has to be a greater effort to promote the idea of having suitable individuals come into remote communities. There is no orientation or familiarization process that meets and accommodates the needs of these people who are expected to go into communities where they have never been outside of looking at pictures and doing their own particular inquiries.

It is rather difficult at this time to look at the long history of the RCMP in the north and the relationships they have built and to forfeit that because we have additional financial pressures put on the territorial government. Yet they are distanced from the policy mandate that is given to that particular force to carry out.

The relationship in the past has been one that is based on mutual respect. The RCMP in the old days travelled by dog team. Their first commitment upon coming to a community was to meet with the leaders of that community, to make contacts, and to have an established communication strategy in terms of who they communicate with and just exactly what the people could expect. The expectations were varied. In many cases the RCMP provided services that were not within their mandate. They were expected to be there when someone died; they were expected to be there when someone was born; they were expected to be there when there were emergencies; and to provide an extensive array of services.

These people cannot go unnoticed. I am proud to say that there is some progress. I am not one to sabotage the good work of the members who are there. What I would like to do is recognize that there are individuals who have come to the north and have contributed greatly. They have built very strong relationships with the people of the north and they should be recognized for that. In fact, it has been a great inspiration for many northerners to look at the whole profession of policing.

Just of late, we have sworn in a number of aboriginal people to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force. These young people look forward to a career they feel will be challenging and will contribute to the betterment of life in the north.

The long-standing relationship with the aboriginal people is one based on a lot of creativity and ingenuity. We have, with the RCMP in the north, something worth preserving. Members of the RCMP have endured a lot of things that other members in other places do not necessarily realize until they come to the remote regions of our country. These include the fact that they are there for long periods of isolation. There are many expectations. They are sometimes on call 24 hours a day when they are alone. They are expected to provide a whole array of services.

There must be a way, within the recruitment process, to outline the variety of different services. There is a great deal of counselling, for instance, that goes on with regard to RCMP work.

The RCMP is much admired and it is a noble profession in my part of the world. It is a relationship that has grown through adversity at times, and a relationship that is well worth preserving and working for. There does not need to be the additional pressure of additional costs to serving in the north in a number of capacities.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I would just like to ask the hon. member if she concurs with the concerns expressed by a number of her colleagues in this House?

The member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has expressed serious concerns about the added policing costs for the community of Penticton, Merritt, and the Grand Forks area. The member for Okanagan—Shuswap has expressed severe concerns about the increasing police costs and the level of policing in communities such as Vernon. The hon. member for Kamloops has expressed serious concerns about the impact on the quality of life in that community because of policing costs. Concerns were also raised by the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, the member for Skeena, the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, and it goes on and on and on.

In Williams Lake, for example, 37 per cent of the municipal budget will be for policing. In Abbotsford there is a $500,000 increase, a 10 per cent increase in taxes. In Prince George there is a $719,000 increase, in Richmond there was a 66 per cent increase in policing costs over the last five years. These costs are going to mean that other areas of life suffer. The services provided are going to be inadequate because of the growing population, the nature of the economy, and a growing crime rate. These are very important issues the member mentioned about policing and its impact in the north.

These cutbacks will devastate the north and cause serious problems in its communities. I am absolutely certain about this. Maybe the member could tell us more about it.

In addition to those serious cuts on policing, one of the things I would also like to ask concerns the RCMP public complaints commission annual report which outlines about 40 recommendations. Has the member had an opportunity to read those recommendations? Many of the complaints were from aboriginal people concerning participation in policing, consultation with policing, and a number of areas which this report contemplated to make recommendations that would be helpful in improving a good police force, making it better and more responsive. Is the hon. member in a position to take a look at the recommendations of this annual report and recommend them to the Solicitor General for inclusion in legislation in the House?

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his very thoughtful questions, very difficult ones at that.

I do not envy the Solicitor General in his endeavour. There have been a number of very formalized and informal reports that have been put forward. I had the opportunity during the Oka hearings to question the Solicitor General as well as the Commissioner of the RCMP on a number of areas.

I have to agree that communities south of the 60th parallel have their own unique problems regarding policing that we may not share in the north, but they are no less important. I agree that there is a greater degree of service required in the communities that my hon. colleague refers to.

I have just been notified of one particular report done with a retiring member of the RCMP, Bob Head, which made similar recommendations. He recommends better training for aboriginal constables, conversion of aboriginal constables from special status to regular status, more contact and communications between aboriginal chiefs, people, and police, more community involvement, more reaction to community concerns, and more cross-cultural awareness, especially for transfer members. He is recommending that RCMP special constables should achieve more credibility with regular training.

In relation to the report referred to by the Solicitor General, I strongly recommend that he also have a look at these particular reports. I would also recommend that the Solicitor General and the Commissioner of the RCMP come to these areas. I made reference to the Twin Otter that crashed. To my knowledge, it has not been replaced and the capital budget for equipment is not adequate. There are clearly problems all across the board.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I welcome the motion of the hon. member for Comox—Alberni and I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak to it.

The federal government has been and remains strongly committed to the RCMP and to the contract policing program. We made a reasonable offer to the provinces and territories on September 29, 1989, to renew the contracts. We are more than willing to do just that.

The federal government believes that everyone is well served by having the RCMP provide provincial, territorial, and municipal policing services under contract. These arrangements give Canadians the highest possible professional standards on a national scale. Canadians in the contract provinces are getting some of the best and most economical policing services in the world.

The RCMP is one of the largest and most sophisticated law enforcement agencies in the world. It has grown from a small group of people who many years ago marched 800 miles across the prairies, often short of water and provisions, to establish authority throughout the west.

It is important that we understand some of the history surrounding this uniquely Canadian institution. The idea of a mounted police force originated in response to a need to establish law and order in the northwest in advance of settlement. The solution of Sir John A. Macdonald was the creation of a paramilitary police trained for plains warfare but with primarily civil responsibilities. Its model was the Royal Irish Constabulary.

Accordingly, in 1873 the Dominion Parliament passed legislation for the establishment of a mounted police force for the Northwest Territories to be known as the North-West Mounted Police.

Three divisions of 50 men each were mobilized at Fort Garry, Manitoba where training and organization proceeded throughout the winter of 1873. Authority was subsequently granted to recruit up to the authorized strength of 300 members and another 150 men were recruited.

• (1430)

Once established in the northwest, demands on the force increased. Members supervised trading practices, provided some relief and medical services to Indians, and carried out patrols throughout the area.

In addition to having an economic effect, the arrival of the force and the collective social and cultural values of its members had an impact on the development of western Canada. On leaving the force, many members settled in the west and continued to have a permanent influence on their communities.

In 1883 the government increased the force's strength from 300 to 500 men in order to respond to growing responsibilities. Detachments and divisions were soon established in new urban centres and in railway settlements.

On account of the North-West Rebellion of 1885 the authorized strength of the force rose to 1,000. The Depot Division was created in November, 1885, to train recruits in Regina, which had become the headquarters of the force in 1882.

By the turn of the century new responsibilities had been assigned to the RCMP in the Canadian north. The gold rush in the Yukon became potentially troublesome as thousands upon thousands of prospectors came to the territory and converged on the tiny settlement of Dawson. The North-West Mounted Police was sent to impose order, and violence was kept to a minimum.

From the start, the mounted police carried out almost all the administrative functions of government. Its members acted as land agents, magistrates, police, mail carriers and so on. By 1899, after the peak of the rush had subsided, civil servants had relieved the force of many of its administrative duties.

Reports of abuse of natives and threats by European nations to Canadian sovereignty in the far north led to the opening of detachments in the eastern and western Arctic.

In 1904, in recognition of its many services to Canada, King Edward VII renamed the force The Royal North-West Mounted Police.

When the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were created in 1905 the first contracts were negotiated for the force to act under the direction of the provincial authorities to enforce criminal law and local statutes. The agreements required the dominion government to maintain and control 500 Royal North-West Mounted Police in the two provinces in return for annual payments of $75,000 each.

On all provincial matters of justice administration, the force was responsible, through the commissioner, to the provincial attorneys general. This arrangement gave the provinces a bargain as full police services to the new provinces had been costing two or three times as much as the amount set out in the agreement.

During the First World War the North-West Mounted Police was forced to withdraw policing services from Alberta and Saskatchewan, causing these provinces to organize their own police forces. After the armistice, however, the force absorbed the dominion police which had performed federal policing duties in eastern Canada and on February 1, 1920, became the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I have a very soft spot for the riding that the member represents. It is my former riding.

It seems to me the hon. member is simply reading a speech that is probably a copy of The Canadian Encyclopaedia. If he is going to read to us from the Encyclopaedia we can go out and read it ourselves.

For one thing, he is not permitted to read his speech.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will please resume his seat for a moment.

Mr. Nicholson: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order. As I understand it, the member was giving among other things some very interesting and pertinent points about—

Mr. Kilgour: You were not even here.

Mr. Nicholson: I can tell the hon. member and the hon. member will be aware that there are five television cameras right in behind—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nicholson: I believe I have the floor, Madam Speaker. I was watching and I was listening to what the hon. member had to say. He was talking about the development of the RCMP. I think that was interesting. I thought it was important to put that on the record. I think the member should be allowed to do so. He certainly is giving a better speech than I have heard from the hon. member in a long time.

Mr. Thorkelson: Madam Speaker, I have a well researched speech which outlines not only the history of the RCMP, but the contractual arrangements of the financing between the federal government, the provinces and municipalities. It is very much relevant to this debate. I am sorry if the member feels offended, but it is relevant and has a large bearing on the debate and I would like to continue, as I will.

For more than a decade after 1917 the RCMP policed only the Northwest and the Yukon Territories as well as being responsible for federal statutes. The matter of provincial policing was raised again in a letter dated November 20, 1926, from Saskatchewan Premier James Gardiner to federal Justice Minister Ernest Lapointe. It reads:

> The policing of this force is rapidly developing into a condition which is likely to bring the whole matter into the field of political controversy. The main reason for this, to my mind, is that we are very much over-policed. We have a condition which developed during the war, which leaves us with virtually three police forces: the RCMP, the provincial police and the municipal police. The result is that there is overlapping, local friction, disagreement between different organizations, the appearance of too many uniformed men at every public gathering, (giving the appearance of a military occupation), and cost which, if continued, will develop into a first-class political issue.

That was the federal justice minister, Ernest Lapointe.

By 1932 the RCMP had assumed contracts to provide a provincial police force to Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island. The provincial contracts all expired at the end of May, 1935, and by May, 1937, all had been renewed to a variety of expiry dates. Though contracts for the provincial policing of British Columbia and Newfoundland were both signed in 1950, the idea was considered much earlier in British Columbia.

In 1932, when many other provinces moved to RCMP policing because of financial pressures, a committee studying policing in B.C. concluded that so large a territory with so sparse a population—700,000 people at that time—should economize by having one police force instead of 39 separate ones at the various levels of government. The federal commission arrived at the same recommendation in 1939.

At the beginning of 1950 the attorney general of British Columbia introduced legislation to empower his government to conduct negotiations with the federal government to contract the RCMP. He estimated annual provincial savings of $1.5 million by using the RCMP, taking into account the pressure for improved services and capital costs of necessary equipment and buildings.

In August, 1950, British Columbia and the federal government signed an agreement for the provision of provincial policing services by the RCMP. This contract also had the effect of doubling the municipal responsibilities of the RCMP. The British Columbia provincial police had formerly conducted municipal policing under 46 contracts throughout the province. All of these were taken on by the RCMP.

The RCMP began policing Newfoundland as a result of the entry of that province into Canada in 1949. Although the Newfoundland Rangers and the Newfoundland constabulary also represented long, local tradition, it was recognized that the RCMP would offer superior effectiveness with financial savings over a combination of federal and provincial forces. In August, 1950, a contract was signed with Newfoundland for the provision of RCMP provincial policing for $196,000 a year in contrast with the previous annual cost to Newfoundland of $550,000 for the rangers and for the constabulary. The province arranged for the construction and location of new prefabricated housing and detachment buildings. The Royal Newfoundland Constabulary was to continue policing St. John's. Seventy-three rangers and 37 constabulary members joined the RCMP.

The RCMP became involved in municipal policing because municipalities in the depression years began applying for their services under contract. In January, 1932, the mayor of Calgary directed his city council to consider the merits of the RCMP policing that city. The suggestion did not go anywhere at that time. In any case, the RCMP Act of that time appeared to prohibit the enforcement of municipal by-laws.

Persistent requests culminated in an initial experiment in 1935 of a three-man municipal detachment at Flin Flon, Manitoba. In 1936 the RCMP Act was amended empowering the Governor General in Council to authorize the RCMP to enter into municipal contracts. The Flin Flon arrangement was confirmed retroactively in 1936.

Requests for RCMP participation in municipal policing continued to be numerous through the late 1930s. The federal policy was to entertain only those applications—

Mr. Kilgour: Scott, they are leaving.

Mr. Thorkelson: If you would listen you might learn something.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I do hope that the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast will be offered a better type of courtesy when he takes the floor. The hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona.

Mr. Thorkelson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The only town besides Flin Flon to receive RCMP policing by contract during this time was Melville, Saskatchewan. By the end of the decade it became clear that the two municipal contracts were appealing examples to an increasing number of applicants and procedures were generalized. In 1940 the commissioner of the RCMP was authorized to conclude municipal agreements on behalf of the federal government.

The third municipality to receive RCMP policing was Humboldt, Saskatchewan, and it was quickly followed by a succession of others. At first most of the communities were in Manitoba and Saskatchewan but the maritimes and Alberta soon had municipal contracts as well.

By March, 1946, 68 towns and cities in the contract provinces were being policed by the RCMP. Six were in the maritimes and the other 62 were in the prairies. By 1951 the addition of the British Columbia municipalities brought the number of RCMP municipal contracts to 119. Today the number stands at 191.

From early on the federal government recognized the limited federal benefit of municipal policing and in 1941 the commissioner of the day declared that the force was only interested in municipal policing where some locational or other advantage to the federal policing role could be achieved. Initially the cost sharing for municipal contracts was the same as that of the provincial contracts. Costs were rising and the force realized that municipal RCMP officers were devoting their full time to the towns while those doing provincial contract work usually carried out federal duties as well. The possibility of requiring municipalities to pay more than was demanded from the provinces was debated in the late 1940s.

As the latest contracts expired on March 31 of this year, provinces were paying 70 per cent and the federal government paid 30 per cent of the costs of municipal policing. The cost share with municipalities with a population under 15,000 people was 70 per cent municipal and 30 per cent federal. For municipalities with populations over 15,000, the split was 90 per cent municipal and 10 per cent federal.

The federal offer of renewal that is currently on the table proposes that within the next 10 years the provinces pay 75 per cent of the costs of policing their province. The offer proposes the costs to municipalities with a population of less than 5,000 increase from 70 per cent to 75 per cent. The cost to municipalities with a population between 5,000 and 15,000 increases from 70 per cent to 85 per cent.

Finally, the costs of policing services to municipalities with populations in excess of 15,000 increase from 90 per cent to 95 per cent.

An important fact to remember is that even at 100 per cent of the costs, the RCMP continues to present an economical and efficient police service. The RCMP has a clear cost advantage over independent police services.

In conclusion, the history of the RCMP is an integral part of the history of this country. I repeat what I said at the opening of my remarks: The federal government is strongly committed to the RCMP and to contract policing. We have made an offer and we look forward to the provinces coming to the table to negotiate an agreement acceptable to all parties in order that these contracts can be renewed.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is a supporter of a government that is extremely keen on privatization.

I wonder if he has discussed with the Solicitor General of Canada and with the Minister of State for Privatization, two of his caucus colleagues, any plans they might have to privatize the RCMP.

Mr. Thorkelson: In response to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, I have not discussed this matter and I would not discuss it because I do not think that police forces, as he would suggest, should be privatized in any respect.

Mr. Milliken: I did not suggest it. I was just asking. I was clarifying.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member if he could answer a couple of questions on affirmative action.

I know that there are under–represented groups that have to be accommodated in the recruitment of the force.

I would like to know his thoughts on the recruitment drives for women, specifically. They want to attract more women into the force and also to bring in aboriginal people and disabled people. I wonder if there are administrative capacities at which these people can operate at a higher level, the management level. What are his thoughts on that?

What are his thoughts on how to compel the forces that be or the government to refurbish, in fact, capital infrastructure that is depleted, such as the Twin Otter that crashed. That is the only means of travel for the force into some isolated areas. What are his thoughts on those two points?

Mr. Thorkelson: Madam Speaker, I certainly appreciate the question on affirmative action and what we are doing as a government to increase the number of aboriginal Canadians, females, and minorities, into the police force. We are doing the best we can. We have a long way to go. We have made strides. As you know, the first Sikh wearing a turban was inducted into the RCMP not too long ago.

Right now the number of women in the force stands at 8 per cent and the RCMP has a goal of increasing that to 21 per cent by the year 2001. I would hope that they will achieve that goal.

I am very much in favour of increasing the number of visible minorities, women and others, into the RCMP.

I believe the second point was capital acquisitions. Certainly the RCMP requires capital to pursue its mandate. If it does not have that capital, I certainly would support the acquisition of capital equipment in those cases.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman said he had not discussed the case of privatization with the Minister of State for Privatization and the Solicitor General. I can understand why he would be reluctant to raise it. I would be too, because I would be afraid they might say yes. We have noticed the government privatizing things like the post office and a whole list of Crown corporations. The CBC is being shut down and privatized. VIA Rail lines are being sold off, including the major line through the mountains in the province which the hon. member has the honour to represent in this House.

I was apprehensive in asking the question that the government in fact was going to start selling off the RCMP and perhaps turn it into a private protective agency, much like soldiers of fortune, as my hon. colleague suggests.

The parliamentary secretary in his remarks listed the long and distinguished career of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It was interesting to hear that recitation of historical fact. But I am concerned. Given the mind bent of the Minister of State for Privatization and the glee with which he latches on to Canadian government assets and sells them out, thinking he is doing a great service for our country when, in fact, he is dismantling the place, I would urge the hon. member to take this matter up with the Minister of State for Privatization and see if he could convince him that privatization is wrong.

Mr. Thorkelson: Madam Speaker, I would like to again thank the member for Kingston and the Islands for his question and comment. I think it is a silly comment to suggest that anyone would ever want to privatize a police force. He has raised it twice, which shows us how foolish he is.

On the question generally of privatization, as you know, the government is very much pursuing the issue of privatization when corporations and companies compete directly with the private sector. In those cases, such as Petro-Canada and Air Canada where they can be more efficiently and better run and are able to borrow on the capital markets to buy assets such as, in the case of Air Canada, the planes and so on, it is a good policy to privatize.

Once again, the question I would return to him is this. Does he really want the police force privatized? To me, that is a silly, foolish notion and I can only assume he raised it as a joke.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, the motion, as everybody knows, is basically to the effect that in negotiating contracts with the provinces, the federal government not unfairly transfer policing costs from the federal government to provincial and municipal governments.

I salute the member for Comox—Alberni for introducing it.

I was quite sincere when I said that I have a soft spot for Edmonton—Strathcona because, as you probably do not remember, I represented Edmonton—Strathcona for nine years, and it goes beyond that because I used to work at the Justice department. I cannot guarantee it, but I—

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Don Valley North.

Ms. Greene: Madam Speaker, you recognized the member and he was supposed to address the issue. Instead, he is giving us a diatribe about his previous experiences as a member of Parliament, and so on.

It seems to me that he should be speaking to the issue as the previous member did.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would imagine that on this beautiful Friday afternoon the hon. member will eventually get there.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I would like to put on the record that I have enormous respect for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice. There are few people in this House whom I have more respect for than that member. I do not mean to give him the kiss of death by saying that. I did not hear his speech, but I am quite sure that it was nothing like what we just heard. If I am wrong, and it was not cribbed from the Encyclopaedia Canadiana, I will be the first to apologize to the member. But, I am sure it was taken from the archives of the Solicitor General's Department or from the archives of the RCMP.

I know, having worked for the justice department, it actually has things like that in its archives. Nobody reads them except when they need a speech for a Friday afternoon. One of the best reasons for parliamentary reform is to prevent us from having to listen to speeches like that.

With great respect for the parliamentary secretary, they have to try to find some warm-blooded westerner who will get up and defend the government on the RCMP. Again, I am just surmising because I used to be a parliamentary secretary, but this poor gentleman across from us had to go and find a warm, live, breathing member from western Canada who would read the kind of drivel we just heard. Even the students who seemed to be from grade seven or under left.

What did he tell us, buried among the pearls in his speech? Did he tell us that we were overpoliced in Canada? Was that the point he was trying to make? He can ask another question afterward if I misunderstood him.

Let me try to get to the issues that are at stake here. I confess that for over 12 years I worked with the members of the RCMP in British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, and here in Ottawa to a degree, so I have une faiblesse pour la Gendarmerie royale du Canada. I have also worked with municipal police and city police.

One of the things that they do not understand on the other side of the House is that a village policeman in a small municipality in Manitoba has difficulty giving a ticket to the son or daughter of the mayor of the village. This is one of the reasons why western Canadians, all 7.5 million of us, and Atlantic Canadians I am sure, like members of the RCMP. It is because carry out their job without fear or favour. They do not care if they are giving a ticket to—at least this is what I believe—the mayor's daughter, the Speaker's daughter or son, or even the Prime Minister's daughter or son, no offence to the sons and daughters. That is why the RCMP has been respected in western Canada, in northern Canada, and in Atlantic Canada.

I hope the hon. parliamentary secretary will tell us, if he gets up after this talk, about this canard that westerners, northerners, and Atlantic Canadians are subsidizing the people in Ontario and Quebec. Who does the parliamentary secretary think pays for the members who are outside guarding this building? Who does he think is paying for, I gather, 2,000 members of the RCMP in Ontario and Quebec if it is not taxpayers in Atlantic Canada, northern Canada, and western Canada? Do not tell me, please, that the provincial budgets of Ontario or Quebec are paying for that, because they are not. I understand all Canadians are paying for the 2,000 men and women in the RCMP in Quebec and about the same number in Ontario.

I understand that back in 1981 it was agreed that the provinces would pay 70 per cent because about 70 per cent of the police work was Criminal Code and provincial statutes. As you know, the enforcement of the law of the Criminal Code across Canada is a provincial responsibility. The provinces agreed to pay 70 per cent. The federal government agreed to pay 30 per cent because about 30 per cent of RCMP work is federal statutes such as the Narcotic Control Act. In municipalities the formula was 90 per cent—10 per cent. The ratio was different in municipalities like Edmonton where the member who just spoke is from and therefore there was a 90 per cent—10 per cent formula.

The other reason they agreed on the 70–30 split was the efficiency argument. It was far better to have one police force, where it was acceptable, than to have two. The third reason they agreed on the 70–30 formula was because of national unity. The RCMP is a symbol of our country and is very important. When has it been more important to have a symbol of national unity, such as the RCMP, than right now?

The same government which gave a throne speech last week telling us that it is trying to do something about national unity will try this week, or the next time it gets contracts with the provinces, as the member for York South—Weston mentioned, to increase the burden on municipalities.

Why was it that two weeks ago there was a budget speech stressing national unity and the government now wants to hold a financial gun to the heads of the provinces and the municipalities in outer Canada, meaning every place but Montreal, Toronto, and Ottawa? It seems very odd to me.

The government has yet to give a substantive explanation for these contract demands, unless it thinks that what we heard today was a substantive explanation. Furthermore, due to the stalled federal transfer payments and limited taxation powers those two levels of government—

Ms. Greene: Are you reading your speech?

Mr. Kilgour: Just skimming. The member for Don Valley North asked if I was reading. I will try not to do more than glance at my notes.

The outer eight provinces can ill afford to reduce their law enforcement services because of the havoc wreaked upon Canadians all over the country, particularly in outer Canada, by the government's high interest rate and high dollar policies.

To build unity it seems to me—I notice that some of the children have come back from the—I wanted to be light hearted, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member, who has been here so long, I am sure knows that only the Speaker can talk about people in the gallery.

Mr. Kilgour: The federal government has to maintain a strong presence in all regions of Canada. The contract proposals seem to fly in the face of the government's rhetoric about national unity.

If I may say a word about Alberta. In my province 61 out of 291 municipalities contract services from the RCMP, and 44 per cent of Albertans, or about 1.1 million people, live under the jurisdiction of the RCMP detachments. The current cost-share ratio for contracted RCMP services was established in 1981. Both the municipalities and the federal government believed a 30 per cent federal share of RCMP cost was an adequate contribution.

The government is in effect saying to the municipalities across the country, outside of Ontario and Quebec, that they can either maintain existing RCMP services by cutting costs elsewhere or they can cut RCMP services at the risk of endangering public safety and emergency responsiveness. What the member for Western Arctic said about the north and the traditional role of the RCMP applies just as much in western Canada and, I am sure, in Atlantic Canada. The person people call on when they have virtually any kind of problem, including the birth of a child, is the RCMP officer who is there in two minutes. I do not know how many babies the RCMP has delivered, but I am sure it is a lot.

If the contracts are going to force municipalities and provinces to pay 16 per cent more for the RCMP in unincorporated areas, that will cause the public safety to suffer in those areas.

The Nielsen task force and the federal law enforcement review talk a lot about these issues. I do not believe anybody on the other side has mentioned them today but I have not been here for all the speeches.

Gary Browning, on behalf of the Alberta Urban Municipalities Association, has not received any satisfactory response to the association's inquiries.

The Federation of Canadian Municipalities has requested a meeting on this matter on behalf of its members from the eight contracting provinces, and it has yet to receive a response.

What kind of government would turn down—it may have given up on Alberta—the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, which represents three-quarters of the 26 million or 27 million of us in this country? What kind of government would turn down a meeting with that federation on a matter of such fundamental importance as this?

In closing, I would just like to stress some of the points that were made by the hon. member for York South—Weston. The government is talking about an amount of money. It always has money for its friends.

I do not know whether you read The Toronto Star today, Madam Speaker. The lead story in The Toronto Star is about a contract to a company for which a resigned Conservative member of Parliament from Quebec City, Michel Coté, works.

The government always has money for its friends. In Calgary the other day, I learned that the federal government has paid hundreds of thousands of dollars for public relations and for lawyers to deny the Lubicon people in northern Alberta what they have been struggling to get for 55 years.

Our tax dollars have been funding government lawyers, private lawyers and public relations consultants in an attempt to deny the Lubicon band in northern Alberta nothing more than simple justice.

The government has money. For example, there was $14 million in the last budget for businessmen to learn Pacific Rim languages. That same budget cut every penny out of the Secretary of State office for the funding of heritage languages across Canada.

I can only try to be funny. What our Prime Minister has decided and is really trying to do—all the evidence points this way—is to get the nomination for the Republican Party in 1992.

How else can we explain what he is doing to the RCMP, VIA Rail and the CBC? He has turned Montreal into a border town for Burlington and for other cities in New York.

He has turned Toronto into a border town for Buffalo. Maybe there is some arrangement that if he can get enough people from Toronto to desert their own local stores, their own markets and supermarkets and shop in Buffalo it will improve his chances of getting Mr. Bush to allow him to stand on a ticket in 1992.

Madam Speaker, please do not tell the Prime Minister that—if my law is correct—you have to be a native-born and not a Canadian-born American to stand on the ticket.

Maybe if we stress to the other side that he is not eligible to be the vice-presidential nominee for the Republicans—

Mr. Nunziata: They could annex Canada.

Mr. Kilgour: I never thought of that, but I'll bet you they did.

We can be frivolous about this, but the people in northern Alberta, the western Arctic or in Atlantic Canada are not joking about it. It is just one more example of how the government is weakening the fibre of a country we all love very much.

What more can I say, but to salute the member for the motion.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for making a presentation and giving us some information on the funding arrangement between the province and the federal government regarding the RCMP and the 70-30 split.

I would just like to refer to last summer. The hon. member referred to the credibility of the RCMP being above and beyond compromise in certain areas.

I would like to refer to the Oka incident. I very adamantly put to the Solicitor General at the time the idea of having a force, an alliance of police forces, or maybe a small coalition or group. It could possibly go into a crisis situation and be somehow beyond any kind of bias or compromise. It could be beyond the realm of the immediate crisis and not have any serious problems or doubts about its credibility in that jurisdiction. It could be accepted in a way that would be legitimized through an amendment to the RCMP Act.

I referred specifically to the RCMP, whether it could have a force or could have moneys allocated to put together a force that would be respected by all of the provinces and the territories come in at a time when there is no movement, at a time when the provincial police force or other levels of police forces would have been rendered ineffective by the crisis that was created and the immediacy of their being close to that problem or that particular group.

What are the hon. member's thoughts on perhaps having an allocation of money for such a force? It may be needed in the future as tensions rise over a number of issues across this country.

I could point to the logging issue in B.C. I could look at Lubicon, which was referred to, and at James Bay. A number of places need a force that is above compromise and is unbiased as such. Could moneys be allocated for that? Would we would need an amendment to the act to accommodate that and to complement provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I think that is a very interesting idea. The member has obviously thought about it at length.

All I can add to what she said, which I think was in support of the idea of a special unit, is that Colonel Macleod, the second commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police, later became a judge. The city of Fort Macleod was named after him. He had empathy, as I am sure the member knows, with Cree and Blackfoot people who came before him in court. Many people feel that he preserved the peace and minimized violence throughout the area of his jurisdiction. The RCMP has a long tradition of doing that.

The member might wish to consider the fact, if my memory is correct, that only 500 out of 14,000 members of the RCMP are aboriginals, visible minorities, or basically other than from the larger Canadian community. Perhaps the answer would be that a unit such as she is proposing should have members recruited from aboriginal peoples across Canada.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, is the hon. member who spoke previously familiar with the RCMP public complaints commission and its recent annual report in which it laid out about 40 provisions it would like to see as amendments to the RCMP Act?

They are sort of fair and balanced things such as: if the RCMP takes action on the basis of a complaint, the complainant should have access to it; if there are costs for the complainant, the complainant should be entitled to suitable costs under guidelines; and certain confusions between the Privacy Act and the RCMP Act should be straightened out.

Is the hon. member familiar with that annual report and its recommendations? Would he be in a position to peruse it and act with other members to see if the Solicitor General would consider bringing forward some amendments?

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, the member for Western Arctic has just handed me a copy of the report. It is 114 pages long. I am sorry to say I have not read it. I am sure, in light of what the member just said, that any Solicitor General on this side of the House—and I can assure him of that if it is the member for York South—Weston or, who knows, perhaps even myself in a future government—would give this every consideration. Perhaps it is going to be the member for Western Arctic since she has got the report and I do not.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker the NDP member is rather humorous this afternoon, suggesting for a moment that the NDP might occupy the seats across the way in few short years. One thing is certain: at the rate this particular government is going, the people of Canada have already decided what fate to bestow upon them.

I would like to compliment my friend and colleague from Edmonton Southeast on his comments with regard to this particular resolution. I am afraid that members from Quebec and Ontario really do not fully understand—and I am a member from Ontario—or comprehend the importance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to western Canada, to the north and to Atlantic Canada.

When we hear comments from Conservative backbenchers from Toronto about having western Canadians pay their own way in terms of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, it really makes us wonder at the mindset of the Solicitor General who comes from Orillia, Ontario. It really makes us wonder whether these backbenchers understand what Canada is all about. A very integral, central part of Canada and being Canadian is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We now have the government trying to gut the RCMP by slashing funding to provinces in Atlantic Canada.

I know the member for Edmonton Southeast has always been an outspoken advocate concerning the problem of western alienation and has in his time in the Liberal caucus certainly spoken out very vigorously and continuously for the Liberal Party and for the Government of Canada to understand and to speak out for western interests.

I would like the member to expand on the importance of the RCMP to western Canada for those of us who do not live in western Canada. Exactly what does the RCMP mean to a western Canadian?

Mr. Kilgour: I see the minister from the Carberry area is going to get up. Perhaps he will speak on the merits of this bill rather than give us a history lesson. I hope when he is giving his talk he will bear in mind the fact that Manitoba, according to the member for York South—Weston, is going to pay $90 million more over 10 years if the federal government has its way in terms of its contract with Manitoba.

On the question of the member, he might be interested that Colonel James Macleod went from Winnipeg to Alberta. He was a commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police. When he died as a judge in Alberta, or the Northwest Territories as it was then, there was not a single dime of a pension for his wife Mary. I think they had three or four children and she found it extremely difficult to get by in the years after that. Some ranchers from southern Alberta basically pitched in and helped her out.

Why do I cite that? It shows that things have not always been easy for the RCMP and that even some of the giants like Colonel Macleod, at least his wife and children afterwards, did not find it easy in the days before they had pensions for anybody in the RCMP.

It is a deeply ingrained part of our history. We take pride whether it is in southern Manitoba or northern Alberta or the western Arctic. The RCMP is a symbol of Canada and these morons on the opposite side are doing everything they can to try to make it more difficult to maintain that symbol. These days, symbols are extremely important to this country.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I wanted to make a comment and ask a short question of the member for Edmonton Southeast.

The member for Edmonton Southeast has railed against cuts in VIA Rail and against cuts to the CBC. Now he has risen today and talked about the adjustments we will be making in terms of contractual arrangements with the RCMP. On the other hand he is against the GST. He is also against an increase in the deficit.

I would like to ask the member how he would get this extra money. Would he raise taxes or would he reallocate it from other programs?

I do not want to hear his old standard answer that we are going to cut fat and waste in Ottawa because he knows, as his colleagues from the Ottawa area will attest, a lot of the fat and waste in the bureaucracy has been cut.

His other standard answer is: "Oh, we will remove some troops from Europe". Those are the only two answers I have ever heard the member from Edmonton Southeast give.

I would like to ask him: Where would he get the money and how would he get the money to pay for all of these services which he has railed against us cutting for the last few years?

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, the first place I would start would be by amputating half the members of the cabinet and half the parliamentary secretaries. India, with 850 million people in a parliamentary system, has a cabinet of 15.

Pick up the Order Paper and read the 18 motions I have on it and you will see a number of ways of cutting expenses.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member has answered part of the question. The time for question and comment is now expired. Debate.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, despite the pain that the government's proposal in the RCMP contract negotiations is giving to a number of Canadians, I still welcome the opportunity to be able to make a few comments on behalf of not only my own constituents but a number of my colleagues and their constituencies from around the country, particularly in the province of British Columbia.

I should begin by briefly reading the motion that my New Democratic Party colleague from Comox—Alberni presented to the House today. The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take into full account the budgetary reality of the provinces and municipalities involved in Royal Canadian Mounted Police contract negotiations and therefore be prepared to negotiate a contract for RCMP services which does not unfairly transfer policing costs from the federal government to provincial and municipal governments.

One of the members opposite noted earlier that we had phrased this motion in as civilized a way as possible in order to encourage the government to think again that when it is transferring burdens, as it seems to want to do time and time again, it seems to have a proclivity to transfer them to those Canadian taxpayers and those assemblies of Canadian taxpayers least able to pay. In this case, that is the smaller municipalities, the small villages and cities that spread right across this country, particularly Atlantic Canada, the west and the province of British Columbia.

The eight provinces unanimously rejected the federal proposition to raise the provincial share of Mountie policing costs by an additional $79 million. We have a lot of company in our protest.

Policing contracts between the RCMP and eight provinces expired at the beginning of April. The ten-year deal covers all provinces, except Quebec and Ontario, which have their own provincial police forces.

Under the proposed agreement the Mounties provide provincial policing and some municipal services in the eight provinces at a total annual cost of $761 million. The provinces pay 70 per cent and the federal government pays 30 per cent.

What Ottawa wants to do with the current proposal is change that formula to 75 per cent paid by the provinces and municipalities and 25 per cent by the federal government. That would cost an additional $79 million to those jurisdictions least able to pay.

At this point I would like to pay some tribute to a number of my colleagues who have fought very hard over the period of the last number of weeks to raise this issue with the government in as non-confrontational a way as possible, hoping that they would be able to appeal to the conscience of those on the other side of the House to recognize the severe difficulties which people in small town western Canada, in particular, are having.

The member for Okanagan—Shuswap, in particular, arranged a meeting two weeks ago, on May 8, in the city of Vernon, with all of my British Columbia New Democratic Party colleagues and a representative of the Union of B.C. Municipalities.

She did a tremendous job of outlining for us very clearly the issues that were at stake for them and the financial implications of this almost dogmatic pursuit of their unreasonable proposal by the federal government.

Others who have taken a major part in our campaign to get the government to change its mind have been the members for Kamloops, Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Kootenay East and Prince George—Bulkley Valley, as well as our party's federal critic, the member for Brant.

We have not met with any more success at this point than have the eight representatives of those provincial governments that are being seriously impacted by the government's very hard-nosed bargaining stance on this issue. One can hardly call it bargaining because while the federal government and the Solicitor General have been prepared to discuss estimates of the cost base, when it comes to cost share they said simply: "That is not negotiable; you have our position; take it or leave it; we will cancel the agreements."

At one point they were threatening that the police contracts would simply end at the beginning of April. Thankfully we have gone beyond that point and they have withdrawn to a more reasonable position. I would still hope that we can come up with some kind of interim agreement or at least a phasing-in proposal by the federal government. This has been suggested by a number of municipalities in order to provide some breathing space at least and as an indication of good faith to those municipalities and provincial governments, especially those smaller municipalities that need time if they are going to adjust to the kind of financial impacts the government's proposal will place on them if it does go ahead as it is proposing.

The proposal by the federal government of new contracts calls for municipalities to pay an extra 5 per cent to 27 per cent for policing costs. That is the impact. We say that move is an unfair burden on local ratepayers and particularly hard on very small communities. The cut amounts to an extra unfair tax for Canadians who choose to live in smaller towns.

Canadians in rural communities are already hurting from post office cuts, CBC cuts, and the downsizing of VIA Rail. They have the same right to police protection as do citizens in larger metropolitan areas.

We call on the government to negotiate a new contract which does not unfairly transfer policing costs from the federal level to provincial and municipal governments.

I would just like to mention a couple of examples. In my own constituency, the city of Castlegar will have to come up with about $25,000 more this year for policing services if Ottawa's proposal to decrease its share of RCMP costs goes through. The city paid $508,000 last year for 10 officers. Under the government's proposal, the city would pay $533,000 for nine officers. More money for less service.

The B.C. solicitor general, Mr. Ivan Mesmer, who has been negotiating this agreement with the federal government, has said quite clearly that these municipalities do not think it is fair. He explained that in communities such as Williams Lake, 40 per cent of the municipal budget will go toward policing if the municipality's share of policing costs is increased, as it will be if the federal government's proposal becomes fact.

This is very serious. In a letter which I received in late March from the city of Trail in my own constituency, the mayor, Sandor Santori, points out that the city's share of policing in the city of Trail in 1990 amounted to $705,000 from a total cost of $1,007,904. A 3 per cent increase to that cost base will bring the city's share to $726,699 from a total of $1,038,141.

With the proposal from the federal government to increase the cost base from 70 per cent to 85 per cent, the city's share of policing costs will increase by $176,888. This would represent a 5.25 per cent increase over the city's 1990 total taxation of $3.37 million to $3.543 million.

To the individual taxpayer, this represents an increase of $20 per residential property. In the case of the city's largest taxpayer, Cominco, it is an increase of $120,000.

I need hardly point out to cabinet ministers who come from western Canada, especially those who are somewhat familiar with the history of Cominco, that this is the time when it can ill afford any other large tax expenditure.

It has been hit very hard by astronomical increases in water charges from the province of British Columbia in the last few years, which have been totally unjustified. The federal government is a shareholder in Cominco's current modernization program. It should be aware as a shareholder that there are severe financial restrictions on that company at the moment.

Many people in the community of Trail and surrounding areas feel very threatened by a somewhat shaky future as a result of the difficulties they are having in adapting to the new technologies.

The past Solicitor General said in the House of Commons that there is one reality that has to be taken into consideration and that is the cost of the RCMP borne by the federal government.

He also stated in a press release that his offer of a 5 per cent increase was "designed to redistribute the net costs more fairly so that those who use the services assume an appropriate measure of the cost".

This is proof that in setting up his strategy, his office has completely disregarded the fiscal reality in which municipalities have been placed, thanks to a multitude of policies set up by his own government over the last six years.

This time, thanks to the structure of these agreements, the government has managed to download its responsibility on to the third level of government, especially small- and medium-sized municipalities.

We feel that this is one more indication—if we needed one—that this government and the Conservative Party are just totally out of touch. In its blind rush to deal with only the federal deficit, it has managed to undermine the very fabric of this country with cuts to VIA Rail, the CBC, the Forest Resource Development Agreement, postal services, and the sale of Petro-Canada.

This is now threatening the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and its presence at the community level in much of this country. At a time when Canada's future is on the line, this government cannot afford to play high roller with one of this country's most respected institutions.

It worries me when I ask myself the question: What is this government's bottom line? What is our bottom line? Our bottom line is Canada, and I hope it is theirs, too. I am sure, in their hearts, it is.

Judging by what the government does, more and more Canadians are having a difficult time believing that.

A few months ago, I had an opportunity to spend some time with a gentleman from the Golden Horseshoe in central Canada who was a major manufacturer of pollution control equipment. He is a major real estate developer. He has agricultural estates in Central America and he moves in a circle in which I do not normally move.

He is not a person who puts much credence in conspiracy theories or anything like it, but in trying to determine what the economic policy of the government and the rationale for it was, he said that he and his associates were saying that they could not understand what the reason for the government's approach was to the Canadian economy, unless it was to attempt to force Canadians into becoming Americans.

That is the only one that seemed to make any sense if you followed all the courses of action that this government is following. I do not believe that, and they do not believe it. Nobody wants to believe it.

You see the artificially high price of the Canadian dollar. There is the emasculation of one Canadian institution after another and you hear the Prime Minister coming up with words to the effect that Canada is more than a few Crown corporations and a few national programs.

Yet we begin to ask if we continue to destroy all those national programs, all those national institutions and all those national services, how long it will be before some Canadians begin to say: "If we have this huge bureaucracy and this expensive government and all we have got left is an anthem and a flag, maybe we ought to wonder what the hell we are doing as Canadians"?

That is what they are going to ask if we start removing all of the symbols and all of the services that we have so carefully and thoughtfully built up over decades and decades since those first Canadians, as an article of faith, said to themselves: "Even though this nation called Canada is not an economic unit, by a political act of will we want it to be a separate, identifiable nation and community".

This country was not created because it made a lot of economic sense. A small ribbon of population stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific and to the Arctic is not a natural economic unit. This country was built because people wanted something different and something distinctive and the government is wrecking it. I do not believe it is consciously doing it. However, if it wants to leave these decisions up to the glories of the marketplace in some kind of doctrinaire, dogmatic belief that what is good for General Motors is good for the country, what is good for whomever it happens to be—Richardson in Winnipeg or the Bronfmans or whomever—then we are in serious trouble in this country and we are not going to have a country left.

I just want to return briefly to the presentation that the Union of B.C. Municipalities made to us on May 8 in Vernon, B.C. The UBCM did an excellent job. I am sure many members of the government have read its submission, and I would ask them to look at it carefully again.

On the first page of that submission, the UBCM points out very clearly why those of us from British Columbia are perhaps more worked up and more concerned about the impact of this particular proposal than almost anyone else across the country. In fact, all three speakers from my party today in this debate have been from the province of British Columbia.

People from British Columbia, a province with only 10 per cent of the population, comprise 27 per cent of the RCMP force in Canada, 39 per cent of the RCMP contract force in Canada, and 63 per cent of the RCMP municipal contract force in Canada.

If members were wondering why we are acting and behaving as though this particular action of the federal government singles out British Columbia and its taxpayers and small and medium-sized communities for punishment, the reason is because 63 per cent of the RCMP municipal contract force in Canada comes from our province. I think we have a reason to be a little annoyed.

There are three issues to be resolved: the cost base, the cost shares, and accountability. The position of the UBCM, which is one that we share, is that on the cost base issue there is no disagreement that there are items which can be negotiated where there is a good business reason, for example UIC payments for federal civilian staff. With respect to cost shares, however, we remain firm in our view that there should be no increases.

Finally, there also must be improved accountability so that we are assured that we are getting the best value for the dollar spent.

Why should members on the government side support the position of B.C. municipalities on the cost issue?

First, the federal benefit has not diminished since the last contract. Second, federal costs would increase if the federal government did not enjoy the economies of scale of municipal policing. Third, federal costs to maintain a national force for internal and external emergencies would increase. Fourth, the contribution to national unity is beyond dollars and cents. We do not put a price on Canada.

Finally, what the UBCM and British Columbians from one end of the province to the other are asking for is initially an interim agreement.

B.C. has been without a policing contract since April 1. This situation cannot continue. We urge the government to immediately enter into an interim agreement with a retroactive provision as proposed by the province of British Columbia.

We support a new federal negotiating direction. We urge the government to support a resumption of negotiations in which federal negotiators have more latitude to negotiate cost-base issues, to approach phasing in a total cost framework, and to quantify the federal benefits that are reflected in the current cost shares.

In the 1984 election the Prime Minister defined Canada as a nation of small towns with big dreams. We hope that it is the intention of this government, as I am sure it is, and as it is of all of us, that small town Canadians should have more than dreams. They should have the right to the same standard of services as other Canadians whose circumstances have put in larger metropolitan areas and in the heartland of this continent.

We produce much of the wealth of this nation in small town Canada. As a result of that we often undergo much greater variations in our economies and much higher levels of unemployment more often than central Canada, even though central Canada is undergoing some tough times right now. We undergo really serious times every four or five years when 1,500 people are out of work in a town of only 6,000 people, sometimes permanently. We are used to that sort of thing. We in small town Canada in the west, in the east, and particularly in the province of British Columbia—because it is so seriously impacted by this government proposal—have a right to equality of treatment. We demand it. We ask the government to think again, to be more flexible in its approach and give us a deal that we can live with.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, the member just spoke about the importance of symbols to Canada. I would agree with him. Symbols are very important, and the RCMP is a symbol.

There are other symbols. I wonder if he could comment on the move of the NDP government in Ontario to not require police in Ontario to swear an oath of allegiance to the Queen, who is also a symbol of Canada. Is that not destruction of a symbol?

Would he also comment on the Liberals' move a few years ago to remove the coat of arms from the RCMP and to change its name. Is that not also destruction of a Canadian symbol?

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, I know these are issues that arouse a great deal of sensitivity among many Canadians. There are a number of us, perhaps myself included, who wish that people with important agendas would sometimes not tamper with things that really do not have to be tampered with, that unduly upset people, perhaps for no positive reason that can be seen.

Again, there is a strong perception in many parts of Canada that we are changing, that our international relationships have changed, that our broader loyalties, at least outside of Canada, have been changing. The Government of Ontario obviously believed, and there is considerable evidence to support that belief from polling throughout the province, that people at this time have different loyalties and want those reflected in their institutions and in the types of oaths that they swear.

I have my own druthers but I also have tremendous respect for the people involved in making that decision and it is probably the one that reflects majority opinion even if I might personally wish that it were opposite.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to the comments of the hon. member. I have a couple of questions and a couple of comments.

With the cabinet shuffle and the new Solicitor General, certainly it is my hope that negotiations between the provinces and the RCMP for RCMP services will take a much more constructive and realistic tack. I think it is very important that the contract be signed. That contract, though, has to be fair and reasonable. I feel that the cost-sharing agreement of 70–30 should remain as it is.

In my province of Prince Edward Island, municipalities are financially strapped. They really have not got any more money to pay for RCMP services. What we have here is simply another example of government members passing on their budgetary problems to other levels of government. They have already shirked their financial obligations in the area of health. They have discarded their responsibilities in the area of education, diminished their commitments in the area of social services, and now they are looking to partially abandon their commitment to policing, safety and security.

I have a couple of questions that I would like to ask the hon. member. I wonder if he would agree that the direction the government is taking to date is a further shirking of its responsibilities to communities across the country who require the service.

Would the member not admit that the diminishing of the federal government's commitment to funding RCMP services is another example of this government passing its financial problems on to other levels of government?

Mr. Kristiansen: The answer to what I will call question number one is yes. The answer to question number two is also yes. The member and I obviously share a common concern. Hopefully we will work together with a more reasonably minded minister. Hope springs eternal. Sometimes people who move into new positions are able, without losing face, to show a little more flexibility and in this case what I would call common sense.

Hopefully, by working together and with a bit of a new look, we will be able to come to some resolution of the difficulties that currently prevail in this contract dispute and come up with a package all of us can live with. For the sake of Canada I hope so.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Madam Speaker, I have been in the House all day and I have had a chance to listen to the debate. I have a couple of comments before I start to address the topic specifically.

I find it rather lamentable that when we get into this kind of a debate about a very important issue, not only because of what the RCMP does but because of the esteem in which the RCMP is held across the country, we have not had a chance to have more genuine discussion of the actual issue itself.

I am not so sure that it adds anything to the demeanour of the House to have the member for Edmonton Southeast get up and complain about the way a member was delivering his speech. Some of us deliver speeches in various ways. Some of us take a lot of time and put a lot of thought into preparing speeches and doing homework and, as a result, like to refer more than others to a prepared text. I think that is something that should be left to the individual. I know what the House rules are, but I am not so sure that to get up and simply complain about the way somebody is delivering a speech adds much to the tone and to the substance of the debate. I also do not think it does anything useful to call people names, which we witnessed this afternoon. We were called morons. I don't think that is very becoming as far as intelligent debate and discussion in this House.

We are talking about something that is very important. The RCMP, the policing of our country, and the way we govern the conduct between ourselves, is very fundamental to any country. I think it would help in terms of the way we think of ourselves and look at ourselves as a country if we could have more of the respect between people on either side of the aisle that we all hold for the RCMP. I find it unfortunate that we did not get a chance to discuss more of the issue.

I would like in the few minutes that are remaining to talk about the issue in some perspective. We are not, and there has never been any suggestion of, withdrawing services. This has been suggested by members and I do not know where it comes from. There has never been any suggestion by any member of the government that if there could not be a satisfactory conclusion to negotiation by a certain period of time there were going to be services withdrawn. That is simply not so. That is unacceptable I think to all sides of the House, unacceptable to Canadians generally, and something that this government has never ever talked about getting into.

Second, it has been suggested that what the Solicitor General is proposing is going to gut the RCMP by implication. Gut is a pretty strong word and it conjures up some pretty fatal images, if you will. We are not talking about that at all.

Let me give you some numbers, Madam Speaker, to back that up. If you use 1988–89 as the fiscal year just for comparison, the total cost of running the RCMP across the country was approximately $1.2 billion, a lot of money. Of that amount, approximately $500 million, and these are round numbers, was used for policing that was directly attributable to responsibilities that are solely that of the federal government. That leaves approximately $700 million that is work that is done on a cost shared arrangement with the provinces and with the municipalities. That number has not been used.

Let us talk about the $700 million which, and again these are round numbers, the provinces are being charged now at the rate of about 7 per cent, which in round numbers again is about $500 million. Let me talk a little bit about how that cost sharing is done.

There is no charge in that cost share for any of the capital improvements. Any of the barracks that are constructed, any of the buildings that are built, which amounts to approximately $35 million, are not charged to the provinces or the municipalities. That kind of funding is totally a federal expense.

In addition to that, when we sit down to work out a rental fee, a rental charge if you will for the use of those barracks, the rental charge that has been used has been $5 a square foot of which the provinces presently pay 70 per cent. That means that that is $3.50 a square foot that the provinces are being asked to pay.

If we compare what the provinces charge us when they rent us similar facilities in municipal situations for which the RCMP use, the provinces charge us $15 a square foot.

Let us talk about the over-all issue in terms of that kind of number. We again are not talking about withdrawing services. We are not talking about anything that is in any way going to destroy the RCMP. We are talking about what seems to me is something reasonable in terms of moving some of the costs from the federal government where we think it should be more appropriately and that is in the area of the provinces and the municipalities.

Additionally, there are many things that the federal government does with the RCMP that are totally a federal responsibility. That is not something that we are asking the provinces to cost share.

In many ways it is unfair to the RCMP, to the force itself, to have some of these suggestions that I have heard today put out. That is not in fact what the government is proposing to do.

I want to say a little bit about transfer payments. The hon. member from Strathcona who called us names and then left the House was asking if we were going to explain how Manitoba was going to find an additional $90 million over the next 10 years. I have checked with people in the Department of Solicitor General and they have no idea where this number came from. As far as I can see, it is a fictitious number.

First of all, we are not talking about a one-shot deal if we can conclude a successful negotiation, and I say if. Whatever cost increases there are, whatever is done, it is going to be phased in, likely over a considerable number of years, maybe five years, maybe even ten years. To suggest again that the province of Manitoba is going to be asked to find an additional $90 million over 10 years has no foundation in any of the numbers that I have been able to check out. I do not think it is possible, because negotiations are under way, to give a precise number, but if you are asking me what the number would be, my guess is it would be, at most, less than half of what the member was talking about.

The member from Prince Edward Island talked about reducing transfer payments. I want to give her some numbers. In 1984–85 when we came to government, the province of Prince Edward Island received from the federal government in transfer payments, $207.1 million. In 1990–91, the fiscal year just concluded, it received $313.9 million, an increase of over 50 per cent. It needs to be put in that kind of a context because to listen to the opposition today, you would think that all the federal government had been doing was reducing our responsibilities. That belies the numbers. As I stated earlier, there was a 50 per cent increase for the province of Prince Edward Island.

In my own province of Manitoba, the number has gone from approximately $1.2 billion of transfers to the province from the federal government in 1984–85, to about $1.9 billion in 1990–91, which is an increase of $700 million. Again, these are transfers of additional money to help the provinces meet their responsibilities in various areas of health care, social assistance, and those kinds of programs.

I see the member from Kootenay West is here. Let us talk a little bit about his province of British Columbia. When we came to government in 1984, the province of British Columbia received from the federal government about $2.26 billion. The previous fiscal year, the one just concluded, the province received a little over $3.1 billion, again a substantial increase of about $800 million since we have been the government.

With some of the increased costs that we are asking the provinces to pay, we have also been transferring to the provinces additional money to meet some of those responsibilities.

If you look at some of the benefits we have from having a national police force, the estimates that I have seen—and they have been done basically by an arm of Statistics Canada—indicate that the policing costs we charge to the provinces for the services rendered by the RCMP and the kind of quality of service they get, the continuity right across the country, the ability to enforce different acts federally and provincially, if each little municipality or each province was going to do it separately it would probably cost something like two and a half times as much as it does by having the national police force.

The member for Kootenay West who just spoke talked about economies of scale. He is absolutely right, but it works both ways. It is better for us to work together, which we are suggesting we do in this cost-sharing arrangement, again bearing in mind that we are not asking the provinces to cost-share the full amount of operating the RCMP, just the portion that is attributable to some of these joint arrangements between provinces and the municipalities. We are much better off to do this together, because there is a cost saving. It varies, I am told, from about two times as much in the west to as much as three times or three and a half times as much in the maritimes. And in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories it is even larger because of the sparse population. The member spoke on that, and she is absolutely right.

If we could have had that kind of a discussion, it seems to me it would have been of a lot more service to the force, which we all respect. Again I want to say we are not trying to gut the force. What we are simply trying to do is arrive at some fiscal arrangements that make more sense. After all, the provinces are sovereign within their own borders and when it comes to fiscal and taxation matters, they have full responsibility. I sometimes wonder, as a premier of a province and a leader of the province, what some of their responsibilities are, other than to complain about the federal government not doing enough for them.

Having said that, and just to conclude, and to set the member's mind at ease I hope, and I hope he would take me at face value, we are not talking about doing anything except what he suggested, and that is, phasing in over a period of time, adjustments if we can agree on them as to how these costs are going to be increased.

If we could have had some of that discussion today I think we could have done a better job of presenting the issue, having a rational discussion on where this federal government is going to find money to do all the things we are asked to do, to keep the deficit under control, to keep interest rates coming down, which they have been doing for the last period of time, and I think they are probably four or five percentage points less than they have been. That is all part of our fiscal management. If interest rates go up, the opposition screams at us because we are not doing things to get interest rates down. When we do what seems to me to be reasonable things, to ask people to share in a little more of the cost of doing some things that we all want to keep, then we are chastised for it.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order.

Mr. Cole: The time for the government allotted time for the next speaker will be divided by two members, one from Lotbiniére and one from St. Catharines.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short point of order before we get on to the last day of the throne speech debate.

This is the first opportunity I have had to raise this matter. It refers to a comment made by the government House leader in the last issue of the Hill Times. I know there has always been an anxious moment on all sides of the House during Question Period to enable more people to ask questions. The House leader for the government indicated that the opposition, apparently during some discussions, refused to extend Question Period each day.

I would just like to make this clear. We would like to suggest that we add 30 minutes each day for Question Period to allow additional members of Parliament an opportunity to ask questions of the ministers. I just wanted to make that point very clear. We are prepared to add 30 minutes to Question Period—

An hon. member: Do I hear 35?

Mr. Cooper: I appreciate the interest of the hon. House leader for the New Democratic Party in Question Period. I am also intrigued by his offer now, now that negotiations have been completed and the package has gone through the House.

We too are interested in reforming Question Period. We look forward to doing some further work on it and I am sure that the hon. member will have some representations that he can make at that time.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was not at the meeting at which the hon. member opposite apparently dismissed the suggestion of extending the length of Question Period. So that the record is very clear, there were really no negotiations whatsoever with regard to the reforms that took place in this House. Basically it was a take it or leave it package. Those of us on this side of the House opposed most of the reforms which were taken by the government. However, if the hon. member is now concurring with my colleague, the House leader for the New Democratic Party, and they are now prepared to extend Question Period, the question ought to be put forthwith so that we may have unanimous consent in order to extend the Question Period for the remainder of this session.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Perhaps the hon. House Leaders on both sides of the House would care to meet outside to continue their discussions. I don't think this is the appropriate place to discuss the matter this morning. If hon. members agree, I would prefer the House to revert immediately to debate on the Speech from the Throne.

The hon. member for Lotbinière, for ten minutes.

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this morning to speak to the motion of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice concerning an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne—although my speaking time has unfortunately been cut somewhat—because although a Throne Speech is not detailed in the same way that a Budget speech is, in this case, mentions, essentially, the major challenges facing us and proposes ways of meeting those challenges.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the Throne deals first of all with Canadian unity, and the challenge to Canadians to choose the kind of Canada we want. When we talk about unity, we cannot isolate unity from economic prosperity, and I will get back to this later on in my speech. And when we talk about prosperity, if we are at all serious about what we are saying, we must necessarily mention education, because here again, we have a major problem where the Goverment of Canada must show leadership in providing the necessary solutions. And speaking of challenges, when we think back to last summer's native crisis, I think that here again the Speech from the Throne provides some very concrete solutions. The same applies to our economic problems; to that cornerstone of our Canadian values, the family; and also to one particular group in our society where this government has provided a number of solutions to enable the disabled to play a more active role. The same applies when we talk about government responsiveness, about making members better able to represent their constituents, and about this government's commitment to cutting government spending and reducing the debt.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the first subject, Canadian unity. In the Speech from the Throne, we see that the government has promised to appoint a committee by next September that will consult with legislative assemblies, in other words with the various provincial members, and with Canadians in general. There is an important element here, the government will formulate proposals, to be referred to the committee. There has been a lot of criticism and there have been many suggestions about how to deal with this problem, how to meet this challenge and how to provide solutions, but the fact remains that this is not one more exercise in consultation. We must not forget that this committee will have concrete proposals to discuss, and in the present unity debate, we see that the Goverment of Quebec, for instance, has also appointed a committee that will apparently receive Ottawa's proposals.

Mr. Speaker, receiving the proposals is fine, but in the light of our past experience—and this is where Quebec adds an important dimension—proposals submitted by Canada should first be ratified by what is called English Canada. This is where the committee plays an extremely important role, because, once again, it will have concrete proposals from this government.

The committee will then consult English Canada in particular to be able to come to Quebec so that we can finally find a solution.

Mr. Speaker, I looked at the comments of the media and the general public on that aspect of the Speech from the Throne. One need only put forward a solution to hear all sorts of criticisms; everyone has his own solution. What I found unfortunate in all those criticisms is the negativism. For example, the Meech Lake Accord is always spoken of as a failure. If we want to be objective and see things differently, we could say that Meech Lake nearly succeeded.

Mr. Speaker, you know that in this wonderful country, Canada, it is not for nothing that the first ministers have spent a great deal of time discussing the amending formula at federal-provincial conferences since 1965. Everyone seemed to agree that unanimity was practically impossible; so much so, Mr. Speaker, that when the Constitution was repatriated in 1982, Mr. Trudeau, who was then Prime Minister of Canada, also tried to obtain the unanimity rule, but seeing how difficult it was, he forcibly repatriated the Constitution without Quebec's agreement. He understood so well that unanimity was impossible that he later inserted this famous unanimity rule at the time of repatriation so that when we had what is now called the Meech Lake Accord, Prime Minister Mulroney had to use the laws, regulation and rules imposed at repatriation, namely the three-year deadline for the various provincial legislatures to ratify the accord unanimously—that is, all ten provinces and the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, I said Meech Lake was practically a success because, as you will recall, within the process imposed by the previous government, this government was able to obtain the unanimous consent of the provinces on two occasions: the first time in 1987, at what I will call the beginning of this debate, when all First Ministers, including the Prime Minister of Canada, ratified the accord; and a second time on June 9, 1990, when the 11 First Ministers of this country again ratified the Meech Lake Accord.

So Meech Lake was not really a failure. It was almost a success. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that with this new experiment, this new committee and this new department, if each and everyone of us takes a positive and constructive attitude instead wanting to tear the country apart, I am sure we will meet the challenge that Canadian unity represents.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time has almost expired. I will therefore conclude my remarks on the economic aspects, and more specifically on education, a subject that has aroused some very fierce criticism in connection with provincial jurisdiction. In this country, from Vancouver to Halifax, we have an illiteracy rate of 30 per cent, which means people who do not know how to read or write. Forty per cent of our young people do not finish high school. I think someone has to take the lead, but I repeat, although the government announced that it would intervene in this field, it also said that it would do so without encroaching on provincial jurisdictions.

Mr. Speaker, when we talk about unity and the Constitution, we cannot overlook the aspect of our economy, and especially our young people who are the future of this country.

[English]

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne rightfully linked the two concepts of national unity and economic prosperity.

They certainly go hand in hand. In fact, they support each other. We all agree, as a country, that we must be competitive in order to maintain our standard of living.

We tend to forget what a large percentage of our Gross Domestic Product is dependent on foreign trade. This percentage is even more than that of the United States and Japan. We have to be cognizant of this fact when we consider economic policies for the country.

There has been a great deal of change and restructuring of our economy as we move to meet the goal of making our economy more competitive. We would all like this change to be calm and rational, however that is not always the case.

We cannot be reactionary and think that we are going to rely simply on a market of 26 million people for goods and services. That is unrealistic in the world today.

First, we must break down the trade barriers that exist within our own country between the provinces. We have to develop a free market within our own country. This is one of the goals of the throne speech that I certainly endorse.

In order for Canadians to be competitive we are going to need a great deal of co-operation among governments, business, labour and everyone else in the country. This is one aspect of the budget speech from the province of Ontario that I would certainly endorse, although I cannot support the large deficit financing associated with that budget.

That type of thinking in the past is one of the reasons that the federal government finds itself in its current position with very little room to manoeuvre.

The issue of competitiveness is one that is foremost in my community of St. Catharines at the present time. We see the spectre of cross-border shopping, which is affecting the retail industry as well as other areas of the local economy. People certainly have the right to get the best value for their money wherever they can, as long as they abide by the rules and pay the various duties and taxes on these goods.

The answer to this matter is not to close down the border, as some people have suggested, but to make sure that our industry is competitive. This requires all levels of government to review their taxation and regulation policies, and business to look at its own practices in order to ensure that it is competitive. Governments at the municipal, provincial and federal levels have to review their policies and do everything they can to ensure that our industries are competitive.

This is a complex matter. It is not a simple matter. People would say there is a simple solution to it, but as with most things these days, that is not the case. We all have to look at the problem, all deal with it, and all accept ownership of it.

The automobile parts industry is also important to my area. This is an industry that is also in a very tough, competitive position. Again, governments at all levels must review their policies to ensure they are not penalizing these industries. The industry has to review its practices in order to ensure that it is using technologically advanced processes and that it is creating high quality value added parts. It has to use new technologies in order to compete. Labour also has to do its part to ensure that these industries are competitive.

Economic prosperity will allow us to deal with the matter of national unity. I have had the opportunity, as a member of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, to travel across Canada listening to individual Canadians speak about the Constitution and the amending formula. The committee is currently considering the recommendations we received from across the country regarding the amending formula. Therefore, I will not comment on that particular aspect of the matter.

However, the committee heard many of the goals and aspirations of the various regions and groups in the country. I agree with those individuals who have stated that this round of constitutional negotiations must be the Canada round. It is going to take a great deal of compromise, tolerance and understanding. It is something that we have to begin.

The aboriginal people want the concept of self–government to be discussed constitutionally. There may be some difficulty because the definition they attach to that concept varies across the country. As we negotiate land claims that concept is included in some of the settlements. As I mentioned, it means different things to different bands in different parts of the country. That is going to create some difficulty in trying to entrench that concept constitutionally.

The aboriginal people also mentioned the concept of consent regarding any constitutional change affecting them. We will have to try and deal with this matter and realize that the concept of consent is very similar to the concept of veto. We have heard about this concept in other contexts in conjunction with the Constitution.

The various aboriginal groups feel they can define exactly what is meant by protecting their language and their culture. Although, as we have seen, it even affects our institutions and maybe affects the entire Constitution itself. We have to try and deal with this matter. Again, it is a complex matter, something that is not very simple.

We heard from the people of the north that they would like a return to the pre–1982 state of affairs regarding the creation of provinces, in which the individual territories negotiated with the federal government in creating new provinces. We also heard of the discontent of the people of the north with the current provision in the Constitution about the extension of current provinces into the territories and the method by which that could occur. They feel slighted by that. They want that matter addressed in the current round. That is something we will have to deal with as well.

We heard from minority language groups in the various regions of the country. They have expressed a strong desire for their language and rights to be protected. As always, we have to be cognizant of their interests as well. We have to realize that there are one million francophones outside Quebec, and the need for the rights of the anglophone minority in the province of Quebec to continue to be protected.

Quebec feels that the rules of the game have been changed on it in the last 30 years by various means. It has expressed this in the Belanger–Campeau report and the Allaire report. We want Quebec to be part of the constitutional process, and it is necessary that we deal with this matter. We cannot emasculate the federal government but we must give recognition to the need for Quebec to protect its language, culture and uniqueness within the Canadian mosaic. It was well set out within the throne speech and it is a matter that we are obviously going to have to deal with.

The people of the west and some in the Atlantic region desire an institutional means in order to recognize the regional diversity of the country. There has been a great deal of energy put into the concept of a Triple E Senate in order to recognize this diversity. I have some hesitancy in saying that this would actually solve all their concerns in this regard.

We heard an expert from Australia who mentioned the Australian Senate which was set up with equal numbers of senators from each of the states within the country of Australia in order to try and resolve these regional differences. It was found that party politics and party discipline took over and the original concept of the Senate in that regard has gone.

We also heard the concerns of multicultural groups and women who want to see their hopes and aspirations mirrored in the Constitution. It is not going to be an easy task to resolve these interests, but we certainly must make the attempt to accommodate these various groups.

I do not believe that we should shy away from our diversity. I think that is a central facet of the Canadian character. We have searched for an identity. We are not all the same. That is what makes us different from countries such as the United States. We do not look for a melting pot. We have to celebrate our diversity and realize that it exists. Overhanging it all is the concept of Canadian citizenship. We have a great deal to be proud of in this country. We have accomplished a great deal together. We certainly are a country of geography but more and more we are country of history. We share a common history and we have to be proud of our Canadianism, recognizing the diversity which exists below it.

I think that is the way we can go to make this country a great country.

I am also confident in the idea of giving more power to backbench members of Parliament. It is something that may do a lot with regard to the regional differences in this country.

I am confident that the three main themes outlined in the Speech from the Throne are matters in which this country has to progress. The challenges have been set out well in the Speech from the Throne. It is now left to us to shoulder our responsibilities and deal with these matters in order that we may go forward as a confident, vibrant country in the world.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to speak to the throne speech, especially since my constituency of Cariboo—Chilcotin is one of the farthest away from Ottawa. In the eyes of my constituents it is probably thousands of miles farther from Ottawa than it really is because not only in Cariboo—Chilcotin but in rural constituencies across Canada people tend to feel that the system is there for the major centres in the country and for central Canada, but it is not there when they need it for small town Canada.

When we get into a topic such as the throne speech we have people from the centre of Canada, especially from the media and the opposition, leading Canadians, talk about its relevance, whether it is hitting the target that it was supposed to and whether it is what Canada should be dealing with over the next year or two. Many of them have been very critical. Many of them have said that it does not do the task.

It made me settle back and do a bit of thinking as to whether it did address the issues that the people in my constituency and in many other rural constituencies feel are important. I was fortunate in that over the past few weeks I had the opportunity to actually spend time with my constituents. As a western member, it takes me 24 hours to go to my riding and back on a normal trip. It is very difficult for me to get intensive time with my constituents. Over the past few weeks I had that opportunity.

I can say that the people I met with and the issues they discussed turned out to be those things that are in the throne speech. The things that were critical to the people of Cariboo—Chilcotin are in fact what is considered by this government to be critical to the people right through Canada.

I had the opportunity to deal with people in the schools, the students and the teachers. I met with business people who were concerned with the economy and employment. I met with native leaders regarding the problems that we are encountering in our area as they pertain to their aspirations and how quickly we are able to deal with them. I was able to discuss with people topics of tolerance and understanding which are not unique to that area but are qualities which are going to be required across Canada in the resolution of the major problems that we are facing today.

What are the Speech from the Throne items critical not only to us here in Ottawa but to the people in the rural ridings and in particular Cariboo—Chilcotin? I will try to go through and itemize the key themes of the speech and explain why they are critical to smaller towns and communities.

Unity: people may question whether that is the principal issue in my area because we have, technically speaking, no communities of francophones in Cariboo—Chilcotin. The people of that area are critically aware of the issues involved in this. They recognize that the resolution of this long outstanding problem is one that is going to be very important not only to Canada but to them. We had the opportunity to address a number of groups over several days.

Something that the Speaker of this House, John Fraser, has been doing is something that I think is a real service to Canada. He has been trying, when he has time, to address groups. Some of the themes he covered in some of his addresses I would like to point out because they are the ones that some of the people in my area, especially the students and some of the business leaders, feel are critical to this debate.

The Speaker is very knowledgeable in the history of Canada and in the history of its traditions and was able to point out, like nobody else I had listened to, the bearing of history and the need for us to understand it and to know what it is telling us in trying to deal with the unity issue today. Most people, like me, when they think of Canada tend to go back to our Constitution of 1867 and deal with Canada since that time.

The Speaker in his discussion took us way back beyond that to the origins of Canada, indicating that it was the French-speaking communities with the English-speaking communities and the aboriginals who were here before us who formed the essence of what is now Canada. When the English-speaking people of Canada under the British defeated the French-speaking people of Canada on the Plains of Abraham, a remarkable thing happened. Unlike other parts of the world where vanquished and defeated people are treated like beaten people for some reason or other—I do not know the wisdom of this and some will criticize it but I will be maintaining it was a very wise move—they recognized that they did not want to treat the francophones of Canada as a beaten people.

They wanted recognition of who they were and their differences. In fact they were given four guarantees at that time: that they would be able to keep their language, religion and culture, and that they would be able to retain their legal system rather than that of the British.

Because of that decision, which many people may question, some significant things happened that in fact resulted in our ability to call ourselves Canadians today.

Shortly after that decision the American Revolution took place. At that time Canada remained strong with Britain. When I say Canada I am referring to Quebec as well.

The French speaking people of Canada honoured their alliance with the English speaking people of Canada. Because of that, history was probably changed. If the French speaking people of Quebec had sided with the American colonies, the Canada we know today would probably not have occurred.

Subsequently, in 1812 there was also the war between Canada and the United States. In fact, not too many people know that Canadians actually got as far as Washington. We were responsible for burning the White House. That is probably not something we want to brag about too much today.

In the War of 1812, because the French speaking people of Quebec had been treated with tolerance and understanding, they sided with the English speaking people of Canada. They were able to remain intact as a Canadian entity.

Since that time, we have gone through many points of history that I will not try to repeat here. The francophone communities in Quebec and in other parts of Canada, and the English speaking people in the rest of Canada, have been able to stay united and work together.

Because of the difference and the ability to work together, we have retained Canada as it is today, the Canada that we know. Because our ancestors were able to do that, that is the reason why we, not only in the House of Commons but right across the country, must and will ensure that Canada remains intact during our tenure here. That will probably be decided over the next few years.

The unity issue goes beyond just the Quebec fact. I think everybody has realized that. Whereas the Meech Lake discussion did deal and was trying to address the problem with the Quebec issue, we have gone way beyond that now.

In dealing with the fact of unity this year and next year, we must be concerned with dealing fairly and properly with the province of Quebec. It also entails being fair and equitable, and dealing with honour with all the other regions of Canada.

Today, nobody thinks we are going to be able to resolve the issue of Canada and its unity by dealing strictly with the issues in Quebec. In many people's minds, the issues pushing up in other parts of Canada, such as British Columbia and the western regions, are just as, if not more, critical. If we do not find solutions to these problems, the reasons for the feeling of alienation by the people in the west and other parts of Canada, we do not have a chance of finding unity for the rest of the country.

It is not just Quebec now. We are able to deal with the regions. Anybody in today's forum realizes that if we do not deal fairly and equitably with the natives, our aboriginal peoples, we will not be able to reach a consensus.

I will deal with the issue of government reform briefly. It is of interest to the people of small communities such as those in Cariboo—Chilcotin. To a great extent, their inability to relate to us here in Ottawa on how we operate is causing many of the problems throughout the country. They are sick and tired of the partisanship, not just from the opposition parties, but from all parties of this House. They want to know that the members who are sitting in this House are representing them in an honest, proper and respectful manner. Any of the steps that we take, as members of Parliament, to achieve greater respect for the people in this House by our constituents is very critical.

One of the members opposite is saying: "Talk to your side of the House". Yes, we will talk to our side of the House and I hope that he will talk to the people on his side of the House. It is all of us together that will be needed to make these changes, but it is the people of Canada that will be the great beneficiaries because they deserve a better system than they have now.

When it comes to the economic competitiveness that was highlighted in the Speech from the Throne, the people in my area of Cariboo—Chilcotin could write the book on this. They cannot survive unless they are economically competitive. In fact, the principal industry in Cariboo—Chilcotin is the principal industry of Canada. It is the forest industry.

In fact, we produce in Cariboo—Chilcotin 7 or 8 per cent of all of the softwood lumber that is produced in Canada. We cannot think of the economic situation without thinking about world markets, the Pacific Rim, the U.S. and the European markets. We cannot think about those unless we as a nation, and we as a people in our area are truly competitive. It has been in a world market situation for years and years. It is because of that that the industry in our area has responded.

I can remember during the 1981–82 recession the changes the forest industry in British Columbia went through. The changes that they had to make in the subsequent six and seven years to remain competitive on a world basis were substantial. They have totally transformed how they operate. In fact, they are a world class producer. They can compete with anyone on the world in their products. That of course is the ability that we require right across this great land of ours. All of our industries that can be competitive must be. That of course is the issue being addressed in the throne speech.

I could go on, but I would like to start to wrap up now with what I consider to be the most important message that we could bring to Canada during this throne speech; that is, how are we going to be able to achieve the resolution of the major problems that we are facing. I maintain that we have to find a way to change the national self-image.

I am a parent, I was an educator at one time. I think anyone who has been in either of those positions realizes that we cannot create strong children or strong students unless they have a positive self-image. They have to start believing in themselves and in their abilities.

As a nation we seem to have taken a totally opposite tack. Every time I look around I see people telling us why we as Canadians are failures, why we as Canadians cannot succeed. We are told through the media and by so many of our leaders that environmentally we are backward, environmentally we are offenders in the world environment. That is absolutely untrue. We are one of the most significant nations in the world in addressing the problems of the environment and succeeding in it. We have thousands of examples of where we are doing things that no other nation has been able to achieve. We very seldom talk about them.

When it comes to our attitude as a nation regarding our competitiveness, we are continually being told that we cannot compete, that we need to put up barriers to try to protect our industries and our people. That is implying that we do not have the ability to compete with nations around the world. That is absolutely not the case.

To return to my riding, I would like to close with two points. I travelled through my riding from the north end to the south. There are many communities but farther south they tend to have more and more extreme economic problems. I went to Litton, which is at the very southern end of the riding in the middle of the Fraser Canyon. It is a very small community. It has basically two industries: ginseng, which employs very few people, and a sawmill.

Just one week prior to my visit one of our national banks found it necessary to remove the sawmill's line of credit. Of course it had to shut down. It did not have the cash flow to continue. This mill employs in the neighbourhood of 100 people directly and half of those people are native Indians who are totally dependent on the income they receive from it.

When I arrived in that town I expected the attitude to be one of gloom and doom. I expected to be hit with all of the problems the town was facing and demands for me to come up with solutions that I would not be able to provide. It was exactly the opposite. I went to that town and met with the native leaders, the leaders of the town, and the people from the mill. I did hear briefly about some of their problems.

However, the people spent more time talking about some of the solutions to those problems. They spoke of how the community like it never had before, natives and non-natives alike, was pulling together to try to resolve the economic and social problems it faced. That is an example of one small town in Cariboo—Chilcotin that is a model for all of us in Canada to follow.

My last point is to indicate again how small town Canada can help to show us the way. We have heard much said about the intolerance of Canada, especially as it pertains to the new situation concerning the RCMP officer who recently graduated. That graduate is going to be serving his first duty in a town in my riding. It was with great pride that I read several articles in the paper, one editorial in particular, which indicated that in this small town of the Cariboo we were going to be able to show the public of Canada what real tolerance, tolerance at the street to street, block to block, neighbour to neighbour level really means. It is going to be happening in Quesnel, British Columbia.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for speaking up for rural Canada in this House and letting us know a little bit about the views and ideas of his constituents.

I have a similar rural riding to his. I too have been through my riding asking my people their views on Canada, the future of Canada, and where we are going as nation. Some of the issues they talk to me about, I am sure he also runs into in his riding.

I am wondering if we could exchange notes. Possibly we could share and talk about some of the solutions put forward by his constituents.

One of the important matters concerning rural Canadians in my riding is the economic situation of rural Canada and the effect that the high Canadian dollar and high interest rates have had on rural Canada, especially the agricultural industries. I also have some ginseng growers in my riding, as does the hon. member. My riding is mostly tobacco, ginseng, cash crops and supply managed crops. My agricultural constituents are really concerned about the effects the high dollar and interest rates are having on all their products and the uncertainty in the international community regarding the GATT negotiations.

Another of the areas that many of my entrepreneurs and small businesses talked about were the effects of the GST on them doing business. Even talking to students going through the schools, the first thing they brought up was the effect the GST was having on them buying certain materials they need not only for their schooling, but in their day-to-day lives.

The other thing that was talked about a lot in my riding was the closing of rural post offices, rural post offices being the significant spot in many of our rural communities where the federal government is represented. What rural Canadians were saying on the post office issue was that they wanted fair treatment with urban Canadians in terms of having a postal service in their communities.

These are some of the issues being brought up in my community, and I am sure the hon. member heard these same concerns in his riding.

In terms of native issues, I have a large native constituency in my riding: the Six Nations, the Mississaugas and the New Credit. They were really concerned that no action had been taken in some time regarding the issue of land claims and Indian self-government.

I want to have the member's comments on these areas. Maybe he could tell us some of the solutions he has come up with.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for the positive way in which he has actually brought his questions out.

It is interesting that we both represent rural communities but, in many ways, there are differences from one rural community to another. I will try to highlight some of them.

The impact of the U.S. dollar, the high value of the Canadian dollar versus the U.S. dollar, is of critical importance to the people of Cariboo-Chilcotin. Obviously most of our economy is based on the exporting of softwood lumber and it is based in U.S. dollars no matter where we sell it in the world. It has been a problem for some time. Of course the critical problem with the lumber industry is world trade and the world markets. They realize that. The demand has to be there. When you get into times like we are in now, that does have a critical impact.

I have explored for many years any ways in which we could, as a country, try to influence the dollar. I had an economist address it for me recently. I asked him specifically if there were more things we could do to reduce the dollar. The answer I got was: "You could do minor things, but basically the reason why we have a high dollar is because the people in this world have confidence in the Canadian dollar as an investment." It is foreigners investing in the Canadian dollar that is driving it up. I do not think that is something that you and I would really want to change overnight, even though the high dollar is critical to us.

I agree with your point on the high interest rate. The high interest rates there have been over the past year has affected the people in my area, not nearly as much as it did a few years ago when the interest rates went out of control, but they definitely have affected them. However, I really believe that we should not be talking about high interest rates right now. Our interest rates now are very reasonable. We have the lowest interest rates now that we have had for years and years. There is not an industry in the country that would say we cannot exist or compete with the interest rates we have now.

Our job in this House and as a government is try to ensure that we retain those low interest rates. To do that, we have to follow with the restraint program that we are following and, of course, take all of the steps that are possible and necessary to keep the inflationary heat out of our economy.

Another issue you hit on was the GST. It was brought up in my visits to my constituency. In the opinions I received, it was not critical to any of the industries in a negative sense. It was a frustration adapting to.

There are still many things that we have to do to make it work better.

Most of them, especially in the business communities, recognize the reasons for it. We are a province that has to export, and exporters realize that the manufacturers' sales tax did hurt us and that the goods and service tax, no matter how annoying it is, is there to make us more competitive, to help us in our world trading.

I have 60,000 square miles of rural Canada in my riding. Obviously, I have many, many post offices, some the normal variety of post offices run by Canada Post, but many have been modernized and turned over to free enterprise. In a few communities some people are terribly upset with the situation. Most have accepted it, and feel in many cases they are doing a better job.

Some communities resent terribly not so much what has happened but the way it has happened. They have not had a chance to have the input that they would like. But in most cases the post office, which is a critical element of every one of these small communities, is functioning well in my area. We had problems a year or so ago, but basically they seem to be not only happy with it but in many cases are indicating that some of the changes that have taken place have, in fact, made the service better, better in a way they had not realized before.

You closed on the issue as it pertains to the native Indians in your riding and in mine. Of course in British Columbia we have never had, except for a few isolated examples, any treaties. So within British Columbia the issue of Indian land claims, Indian title, Indian rights, is a critical issue today. I spent many hours last summer at blockades in various parts of my riding. They were not as large as the ones you encountered in Quebec and central Canada, but no less critical to us out there. The issue is one about which the native leaders that I met with are cautiously optimistic with respect to the role the federal government is playing now. They see the negotiation process taking place in British Columbia and they see that they have their involvement in it.

I would say that scepticism is still there, but they are cautiously optimistic that we are dealing with their issues in a proper manner now.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, today is the final day of the special debate on the throne speech which was presented on May 13, 1991. We have had six days of debate on the speech, but there has been nothing said so far by the Prime Minister or any of his ministers to try to explain or justify its contents that changes the essential reality. The Speech from the Throne is an admission by the government of just how precarious a situation we have in this country, a situation that has been created in large measure by this government.

The Prime Minister says the problem is that Canadians are lacking in patriotism and they should be more enthusiastic about their country. Well I say that Canadians are not lacking in patriotism or in enthusiasm for their country, they are lacking enthusiasm for this government and its policies, which are undoing the very fabric of our nation.

It is difficult for a lot of Canadians to have faith in the future of their country when they are uncertain about their own economic future.

In this throne speech, the government appears to have finally realized that there is an important link between the economy and national unity.

[Translation]

My party and myself have been saying for a long time that a strong economy gives a boost to national unity and that Canada can only achieve its maximum potential in an increasingly competitive global economy as a strong and unified nation.

• (1200)

Unfortunately, the government has not provided a clear and meaningful economic agenda in this throne speech. Three months ago, Canadians hoped this government would provide a new plan for economic recovery in its February 1991 budget. In fact, Liberals called for such a plan. It was nowhere to be found then and it is nowhere to be found now.

At the time of the February 1991 budget, just three months ago, the government said that inflation is economic enemy number one and must be kept in check with high interest rates. However, in the throne speech on May 13 we were told, and I quote: "economic recovery depends on reducing interest rates".

This latter day conversion may signal that the government is finally willing to recognize that economic damage is caused by fighting inflation solely with high interest rates and by making the fight against inflation a higher priority than job creation and economic growth. It may signal that the government is ready to consider other ways of dealing with inflation, ways that will not have the disastrous side effects of massive job losses and a shrinking economy produced by this government's present policies.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is not the only country to want a low and stable inflation rate but it is certainly the only one prepared to achieve this goal at any cost!

The Economic Council of Canada has been keeping a close eye on the experience of countries such as Austria, Norway, Sweden, West Germany and Japan which have managed to control inflationary pressures somewhat without a drastic increase in their level of unemployment.

[English]

The Economic Council of Canada, the government's own advisory body, identified in the other countries I have listed what it called a "social partnership" among business, labour and government. This social partnership, the council said: "seems to offer the key to controlling inflation without creating an unacceptable level of unemployment".

The partnership is based on compromise among the three players on a wide range of economic policy issues and, the council adds, it must begin with a political commitment on the part of the government to full employment. There has been no such commitment from this government, not in the budget and certainly not in this throne speech.

Without consultations on economic goals with all of Canada's economic stakeholders, we must fear that the Bank of Canada, with the support of the government, will continue to fight inflation principally with the blunt instrument of high interest rates and ignore the economic and human costs of lost jobs and lost business activity.

This means that the government would be relying on the very policies that got us into the recession to now get us out of it. That simply does not make much sense.

In the throne speech the government says it wants to create 2.5 million jobs by the year 2000, nine years from now. At first glance, that looks pretty good on paper. However, on closer examination it is clear that the government has set its sights extremely low. Even the finance minister's own department confirms that between 1970 and 1979, more than 10 years ago, the same number of jobs, 2.5 million, were created in a much smaller economy. In that nine year period, from 1970 to 1979, economic growth averaged 4.7 per cent, significantly more than the 4.0 per cent growth rate for the period up to 1995, as predicted in the budget of last February.

[Translation]

This government also failed, Mr. Speaker, to mention in the Speech from the Throne the other economic factors to be considered to get to this 2.5 million jobs figure. Without any indication of the projected population growth or labour force involvement, for instance, the job creation forecast by this governement in the Speech from the Throne is not of much value.

[English]

For example, Canada could create 2.5 million jobs by the year 2000, but still have double digit unemployment of more than 10 per cent. Would this percentage level be acceptable? The government's answer cannot be found clearly stated in the throne speech. However, by setting out these targets, it looks like a 10 per cent unemployment level would be acceptable to this government.

I am sure the answer of Canadians is that this level is simply not acceptable. They would not want this to be the target of the government. They would not want this goal to be in effect 10 or 20 years from now. The government should realize that simply setting as a goal something that could happen anyway is just not good enough. Canadians deserve better.

What about the nearly 1.5 million people who are looking for work and need a job right now? What about those people who have lost their jobs permanently through plant closings? What about the job requirements of a growing population? If the government had wanted to back up its words on job creation, we would have seen a commitment to full employment in the throne speech. The 1.5 million Canadians now looking for work deserve such a commitment. This government has an obligation to provide this commitment and to work at starting to carry it out right now.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, government policies must ensure coordination among the various factors which will put us in a competitive position—interest rates, tax system and other policies—if we want to achieve sustained economic growth.

[English]

The throne speech identifies the importance to Canadians of being able to compete effectively in international markets. Speaking of guaranteeing our economic future, the government says we should begin by "equipping ourselves to compete with the best."

These are beautiful words, but they ring hollow when they come from a government that has decreased its own spending on research and development as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product—the over-all size of the economy—every year since 1986, especially after the Prime Minister had promised to double the level of spending on research and development in this country.

The former Minister of Finance, now the Minister for International Trade, has admitted that: "Canada's investment in research and development has been low by the standards of the main industrialized countries". It was his own budgets that in effect cut spending on research and development and science and technology programs.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association says that Canada's ability to compete with its major trading partners is only 85 per cent of what it was in 1980, with most of the reduction occurring in the last half of that decade since this Conservative government came to power. Canada, which relies on exports for almost 30 per cent of its prosperity, has lost 20 per cent of its share of world markets in the last five years and its share of world export trade fell from 5 per cent to 4 per cent.

Fundamental to any country's ability to compete are its exchange rates and its interest rates. Business leaders in our export sector, one of the cornerstones of our economy, continue to identify the high Canadian dollar and high interest rates as key contributors to Canada's declining competitiveness. In addition to helping bring down the value of the Canadian dollar, lower interest rates would also make it easier for companies to make the capital investments necessary to bring about higher productivity and to become more competitive.

Other factors in becoming more competitive include a country's tax system and the quality of its human capital—its people. Government policy must ensure that the ingredients for becoming more competitive are co-ordinated with business and labour to help achieve long-run productivity growth.

The throne speech waxes eloquent about the need for Canada to invest in its people—its human capital. The government already had an opportunity to do something about it three months earlier in its February budget. What did we see? Not only no new programs to help Canadian workers gain the skills they would need to compete with skilled workers from other countries, but we saw that the government actually cut $100 million from its Canada Jobs Strategy. The throne speech did nothing at all to make up for that omission.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, even before we can become internationally competitive, we should take a close look at our national stakes. In the Speech from the Throne, the government was forced in fact to admit that "regulations [—]make it simpler for producers to ship their products abroad than to sell them in neighbouring provinces."

[English]

The throne speech calls for an end to interprovincial trade barriers by 1995. This is a worth-while objective but the government set out no clear plan of action on how to reach it.

In 1987, before the government concluded its free trade negotiations with the Americans, Liberals called for a reduction in interprovincial trade barriers within Canada. We believed then as we believe now that our first priority should be free trade here at home—right here in Canada. Why should we embark on discussions for a trade deal with Mexico before we have created conditions for free trade here in Canada?

The same high interest rate policy of this government which has helped undermine our ability to compete has also helped drive up the Canadian dollar to its highest level in years. This, in combination with the GST and other tax policies of the federal government—not to mention the higher gasoline and other taxes imposed by the new NDP government in Ontario—is helping to create an unprecedented exodus of Canadian shoppers to the United States.

It is estimated that in Ontario alone cross-border shopping will result in about $1 billion in lost retail sales this year, representing up to $80 million in lost provincial tax revenues and corresponding, or perhaps larger amounts in federal tax revenues.

I am told that in Kingston, Ontario, a community of about 100,000 people, a report for its Chamber of Commerce by the accounting firm, Ernst and Young, says that cross-border shopping will cost the area 500 jobs and cost local merchants $78 million in lost sales. Kingston is about one hour away from the nearest major American city.

Let us take a look at Windsor, Ontario, 10 minutes away from a major American city. A recent study by the University of Windsor suggests that Windsor and the surrounding Essex County could lose as many as 4,600 jobs and $281 million from their local economy this year alone, all due to the direct and indirect effects of cross-border shopping.

The number of Canadians making day trips to the United States increased 30 per cent in 1990 and is expected to increase even more this year.

In Windsor, this past March, more than 25,000 people paid duty at the bridge and at the tunnel. That is an increase of more than 500 per cent from April 1988 when just over 4,000 paid duty. In spite of this increase, the president of the Customs and Excise union local in Windsor says that at times the customs officers are so swamped that they just wave through passengers in cars who would otherwise have to stop and pay duty on their United States purchases. Sometimes as many as six in ten cars are waved through.

This government has not only created the cross-border shopping problem with its policies. It willingly allows thousands of dollars in duties and taxes to go uncollected every day. Canada Customs must be given the resources to properly staff border crossing points. The idea here is not to have some kind of border police force, but rather to make it smooth and efficient for those Canadians who shop in the United States to pay the duties and taxes they owe. It is only fair because these duties and taxes are in effect collected on the same kind of goods when they are sold right here in Canada.

The fact that the provincial sales tax is not collected upon entry into Canada also adds to the uneven playing field that presently exists.

The Minister of National Revenue tries to say that this cannot be done, that collecting two kinds of retail sales taxes on two different sets of items is too complex. He says he will collect the Ontario tax only if it is changed and harmonized with the federal GST, that is, if it is imposed on all the same items in the same way. This is nonsense.

All the minister has to do is go to any store in Ontario and he will find clerks with relatively little training and experience who are dealing with these same two taxes in their current form day in and day out, calculating them and applying them to the right products in the right way. If these retail clerks can do it so can our more highly trained Customs officers if our Minister of National Revenue will tell them to do it.

After all, our Customs officers are already collecting provincial taxes for the Ontario government on liquor brought in by individuals without any problem and without these taxes being first harmonized with federal taxes on liquor.

Why is the Minister of National Revenue hesitating? I think it is because he wants to use the issue of the provincial sales tax at the border as a form of political blackmail designed to get the Ontario government to bring in its own form of GST. That is wrong. The federal GST is already enough of a burden without the minister and this Conservative government trying to create more GST at the provincial level.

Furthermore, the federal government and the Government of Ontario should not be so quick to dismiss the idea put forward by border community mayors of differential gasoline taxes in areas close to the American border. After all, a system like that has been operating with provincial gasoline taxes in Quebec for many years. This would certainly go a long way toward making the playing field level for Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time to address the throne speech is over unless you obtain the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House agree?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude by saying that with respect to the current concern about negotiations with the United States on the matter of trade with the United States and with Mexico, we know that in order to get approval from the Congress for fast-track negotiations President Bush promised that before any deal with Mexico would be signed there would be adjustment programs for workers who would lose their jobs because of a new trilateral free trade deal involving Mexico. He promised that companies would not be able to use any trade deal with Mexico to get around tougher environmental and labour laws in the United States.

There have been no such commitments from our government and there should be. Adjustment programs were promised by the Prime Minister during the debate over the last trade deal, the one with the United States. After the deal was signed he backed down on that promise. We now see the resulting economic damage in terms of lost jobs and closed plants day after day.

No wonder we in the Official Opposition question why Canada should be at the table with Mexico and the United States at all unless and until these questions and uncertainties are clearly and positively dealt with.

I say by way of conclusion that it is not good enough for the government to talk in its throne speech about how great the economy will be eventually. This talk has to be backed up by policies that reinforce our national institutions and by policies that help create strong and swift economic growth.

In order for Canada to remain united it is important that Canadians have confidence in the economic future of their country. That is why we Liberals have been calling for policies that will help us restructure and modernize our firms and retrain our work force.

These steps are truly needed to increase our competitiveness so that we can have strong companies and strong growth in both jobs and output all on a long-term continuing basis.

There are some Canadians who say that at present we should focus only, or at least mainly, on the economy and on developing and implementing those government policies that would help get it moving again. However, Canadians cannot expect to get help from their national government unless we continue to have a country, one united country, from coast to coast to coast.

Therefore, along with giving priority to our economic problems, we must at the same time pay attention to concerns about national unity. Let us also recognize that we cannot have an effective united country without an effective national government.

By strengthening our economic base and our unity as a country, we will be making the best possible preparation for the challenges of the future.

This throne speech does not help us to make such preparations and, therefore, deserves to be rejected by this House and by the Canadian people.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I was most pleased to listen to my colleague from Windsor West stating the case for Windsor with respect to the question of cross-border shopping with emphasis on the number of Canadians who are shopping in Detroit which, if you time your entry into Detroit correctly, you can get there in five minutes rather than ten.

I wonder if my colleague would elaborate a bit not just on the issue of Canadians going into Detroit but on the effect of government policies on the movement of Americans into Windsor and the impact there is on the retail trade and recreational establishments in Windsor which a few years ago were doing quite well with tourism.

To pursue a quite separate and distinct issue with respect to the throne speech, I would be interested in hearing my colleague comment on an omission from the throne speech.

In spite of the suggestion of targets for education and training there was no mention whatever of research and development targets, in spite of the promise of the Prime Minister in 1983 that the percentage of the Gross Domestic Product expended in Canada on R and D must be doubled.

There is also the fact that in other contexts it is widely reported that the government has abandoned all targets whatever for R and D, so I would like to hear his comments on the impact of that significant policy omission and policy change with respect to economic development.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my colleague has raised an important point.

There is a very substantial hospitality industry in the Windsor and Essex County area catering to Americans who come over to shop, to dine in our restaurants and to spend a day touring our various places of interest. This industry has been severely damaged by the GST and earlier by the high dollar.

These additional costs have been discouraging Americans from coming over as they have been for years to dine in our restaurants, to shop in our stores, and to visit our tourist attractions. These are mainly day trips.

They are further discouraged by the high volume of traffic at the bridge and the tunnel which causes them to have to wait in line for several hours, sometimes, before they can get across.

This is another reason why we need more staff at these major border crossing points and why there have to be provisions, as we find in a number of international airports outside Canada, where people, like Americans coming to Windsor to shop or to dine who have nothing to declare should be dealt with separately and differently from people who are returning and have to be examined for purchases they made and for duties they owe.

This is an important aspect of the whole problem of cross-border shopping. The government needs to take action on this problem before more permanent damage is done to the economy, not just that of Windsor and Essex County but of all Canada. Most of our population lives within a short drive to the American border. The whole economy is affected by this problem being allowed to drag on without more effective action being taken.

Furthermore, if this government is interested in making Canada more competitive, then the throne speech should have set out some clear targets and objectives for improving the performance of the economy when it comes to research and development and science and technology. All we have so far are the cutbacks in recent budgets by this government of support for private sector and university initiatives in research and development and science and technology. This is not the way to make this country more competitive.

I regret that the throne speech has not corrected the errors of past budgets in this regard. I hope there will be action taken before long, because our country needs to work together, with business and labour supported by government, to improve the level of its competitiveness. That means new and improved government policies when it comes to research and development and science and technology.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour and a great privilege to rise today as a participant in this historic throne speech debate.

This debate is about the future of a great nation. This debate is about a vision of a stronger Canada for our children. This debate is about building a better Canada for all Canadians from sea to sea to shining sea.

The Speech from the Throne serves as a foundation and is a critical element in the success of our nation. It demonstrates the commitment of our government to Canadian unity, prosperity and responsiveness.

The issue of Canadian unity is an important one. Canadians are now at a turning point in their history. This country is a great nation. We have constructed a country with generations of men and women determined to make a home for themselves and a future for their children. Tolerance and fairness, courage and compassion, individual enterprise and neighbourly co-operation have always succeeded in overcoming obstacles and erasing doubt.

Now is the time for us to use these skills to strengthen Canada so that it can meet the challenges of the 21st century.

While we know that a country is more than just a constitution, we also know that a constitution should unite a nation. Canadians across this country should see themselves and their hopes and aspirations mirrored in their constitution. That is not the case today. Therefore, no other task is more crucial than making the constitution more relevant to the citizens, the peoples of the various regions of this country.

Many agree that the final constitutional product is vital for Canada's success. However, it is becoming increasingly more clear that what is also important is the constitutional process. All Canadians must have the opportunity to participate in this process. All Canadians need to get involved so that our way of life can be preserved and enhanced for future generations.

Federal, provincial and territorial governments are now engaged in consulting Canadians on different aspects of making changes to the Constitution. At the federal level, the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future was created to bring Canadians together to talk about the fundamental values and characteristics of Canada.

Parliamentary committees will continue to consult Canadians to find better ways of making constitutional changes. Through these mechanisms and processes Canadians are now developing a consensus about the basic values and aspirations that should underlie constitutional reform.

All of this contributes to an increased understanding among Canadians of how much we have in common as well as an awareness of what we stand to lose. Once we have heard an as broad as possible range of views, and only after receiving and considering the summations and reports of the public commissions and parliamentary committees, the government will propose a plan for a renewed Canada to the people of Canada.

Our government is committed to Canadian unity, but the job of attaining that worth-while goal is not a task for government alone. Canadian unity will be achieved only through a combined effort of all Canadians working together for a better future. Canadian unity will be realized when Canadians recognize and accommodate each other's differences while at the same time focusing and building on our similarities. Together we will build a better Canada.

Our government, in addition to being committed to Canadian unity, is also committed to securing Canada's prosperity.

Canada has one of the highest standards of living in the world and a quality of life second to none. There is no guarantee that such progress will continue. Simply relying on the things that have helped us succeed in the past will not be enough to improve further our material welfare and quality of life.

Restoring economic growth is essential. We must go beyond this to attain economic prosperity. Canadians must work more effectively together in a partnership for prosperity to meet Canada's competitive challenge. As the world economy becomes increasingly more competitive, Canada has been falling behind its trading partners in its ability to compete in the global marketplace.

The most telling indicator of Canada's future economic challenges is its productivity performance. Unfortunately, our productivity performance—how efficiently we produce goods and services—has been deteriorating.

The 1984 agenda for economic renewal outlined the competitive challenge facing Canada and subsequent actions helped to provide a better framework for restoring productivity growth. Today Canadians are increasingly concerned about their ability to compete. These concerns range from broad economic issues such as inflation, interest rates and the exchange rate, to problems with our productivity performance like the effectiveness of investments, the burden of government and the business climate.

Governments have a responsibility to create an environment that encourages the growth of competitive and successful enterprise. The 1991 budget announced actions to restore fiscal balance and move toward price stability. This will lead to a stable broad economic environment, increased confidence in the Canadian economy and will strengthen Canada's ability to compete in a touch economic world.

Boosting productivity growth and prosperity is far more than a job just for government. The private sector must take full advantage of the opportunities created by the actions of governments. In order to maximize productivity growth, the quality of investments in infrastructure, machinery, equipment, training, education and research and technology must be scrutinized. As well, consideration must be given to private sector spending in the areas of training and research, and to other areas such as education where, by international standards, Canada's level of spending compares well but its performance does not.

Prosperity and competitiveness are not only issues for business, labour and government. All Canadians can help to strengthen Canada's competitive ability by identifying and developing an awareness of the problems. Only then can they be a part of developing solutions.

I would like to conclude by discussing another very important issue to Canadians, and that is Canadians and their environment. Canadians do care about their environment and are concerned that it is preserved and protected. We are all taking action to protect it and are personally involved in finding solutions.

Canada's green plan is a comprehensive $3 billion action plan which expresses this government's commitment to work with Canadians to manage our resources prudently and to encourage sensitive environmental decision-making. The green plan is proof that the government is listening and responding to the environmental concerns of Canadians. It was developed as a result of extensive consultation with Canadians from all walks of life. It is timely, responsive and sensitive to the needs of Canadians. The government has forged a series of environmental partnerships beginning with individuals and ranging through special interest groups and the private sector as well as municipal and provincial governments. Environmental partnerships extend to the international level as well.

Canada's green plan provides Canadians with information to help them make informed decisions about the state of the environment and to help them understand what we as individuals and as a nation can do in addressing the problems. We realize that unilateral action in itself will not solve all environmental problems. Solutions require everyone's involvement and everyone has a part to play so that we may live in a clean and healthy environment now and in the future.

In conclusion, the Government of Canada in its Speech from the Throne has demonstrated and reaffirmed its commitment to national unity, to economic prosperity and to responsiveness to Canadians. The challenges that the country and the government face are serious challenges and they are challenges that are not unknown in other counties around the world. When we look around the globe, we see other challenges in countries like South America and the Soviet Union, countries having difficulties with violence. When we view all of that and we consider the situation in Canada, we recognize that we do live in a great nation but that we have a lot of room to grow and the challenges are great. These challenges will not be met with an ununified effort.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time is over. Questions and comments, five minutes, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by congratulating the hon. member on a well done presentation.

In his speech he spoke a little bit about the comparative position of Canada internationally and he stressed the importance of education and research and development as a means of improving competitiveness. These are very good comments, they are excellent comments.

I would like to add one dimension to this whole debate and that is the productivity question, which has been coming up on a regular basis in discussions. I might suggest that you can put all of the money you want into education and research and development but productivity by itself is not going to improve. Productivity will only improve in Canada if we are able to remove all of the barriers between the provinces and if we are able to ensure and secure a market for corporations and companies which produce goods.

The reason I say this is because one of the reasons Canadian goods are more expensive than American or other goods is because many of the companies that produce those goods have short runs on those goods. For example, a company that manufactures chairs, plates pens or pencils will produce for a local market. If the market can bear 100,000 pens or 100,000 plates, the company would produce that quantity, while other corporations might enjoy bigger markets and perhaps produce 500,000 or 1,000,000.

As a result of that, the unit price will be reduced and the consumer will get the benefit of that reduction.

I want to hear the comments of my colleagues on the question of removing the barriers between the provinces and the target of 1995, which is very far off and should be moved up.

Mr. O'Kurley: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague from Ottawa for posing such a thoughtful question. Indeed, the trade barriers between provinces are certainly an obstacle to increasing our economic growth. There are a number of things that can be done to address that concern.

We could eliminate a number of things. We could eliminate the policies that favour one province's suppliers over lower cost producers from other provinces. We need to eliminate regulations that often make it simpler for producers to ship their products abroad than to sell them in neighbouring provinces. We need to eliminate hiring policies that give preference to provincial residents over those from other provinces. We also need to eliminate occupational standards that restrict work opportunities for residents of other provinces.

One recent estimate put the number of barriers to interprovincial trade in Canada at approximately 500. The government's goal is to see barriers to interprovincial trade, services and investment come down by 1995 to allow Canada to become a single integrated market.

The savings to taxpayers and consumers of creating such a market could be as high as $6 billion, about $1,000 a year for a household of four. Further, today investment and technology flow with ease across international boundaries, markets for goods and services are specialized, and decisions on production are made on a world-wide basis.

I agree with the hon. member that one of the major issues that the Canadian government should address is interprovincial trade barriers.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to rise and say a few words on the throne speech. The throne speech is an occasion for members to give some of their personal views and their advice to the Prime Minister and the cabinet.

I, first of all, would like to commend the Prime Minister and his cabinet, as well as the government caucus, for taking some very tough decisions over the last six years and sticking with them. The government needs to be commended for its goals in this throne speech: to emphasize national unity—on which I will say a few words—and to talk about maintaining our high Canadian standard of living, and indeed increasing it.

The fact of the matter is that, even with all of the problems that we have, when we look at Canada vis-à-vis all the other countries of the world, we come off very well. There are two external measures which we should never forget about. The first measure is the tens of millions of people trying to get into this wonderful country as refugees, often at great personal risk to themselves. There are many thousands each year who are drowned in boats and killed trying to get to safe haven countries like Canada. As well, there are the tens of millions who are trying to come as immigrants. That is an external measure of how well we have done in this country.

I often think that it is the result of the media which constantly are stressing the negative, constantly stressing the very legitimate points of conflict between our ethnic communities in Canada, between our federal government and our provincial governments, and between our regions. That is constantly emphasized by the national media and, indeed, is constantly emphasized here. The problem is that once we permitted television in the House, these conflicts were aggravated because we all play to the television, rather than address the problem. As a result, people tend to forget that Canada is really doing a lot better than we realize, and the immigrants are proof.

The second external measure is the recent study by the United Nations. Nobody can claim that the United Nations is trying to help Prime Minister Mulroney and his cabinet, but the fact of the matter is that when it measured the human development index for 160 countries of the world—which measures such things as literacy, life expectancy and personal basic disposable income—Canada finished second out of all the countries in the world. That is an external measurement which tells me that as a nation we are doing far better than we are prepared to even give ourselves credit for.

My comments concern that. Frankly, I think Canada has proven itself. I cannot imagine why we, as a people, would permit any group of extremists, whether they are in Quebec or in western Canada, to break this wonderful country up. The one thing that is crystal clear is that if we break this country up we will all be substantially poorer and, for many years, will have an enormous problem trying to redefine ourselves. If Quebec separates then the natives might separate from Quebec and the Outaouais might separate from Quebec.

In the west, southeastern B.C. has often wanted to be part of Alberta and in the Peace River country there are similar pressures on the opposite side.

When my eastern European constituents come up to me, they say: "Mr. Thacker, don't mess around with your borders because once you start doing that it is a never-ending process." We could break right down into individual cities wanting to be separated. We cannot have that. This is a wonderful country and we have to work together to keep it together.

The Prime Minister deserves more credit than he gets for the leadership he has provided to this country. The courage he has shown and maintained is really quite extraordinary. He deserves credit because he has his cabinet and his caucus behind him. The government caucus deserves credit if we look at reality.

In 1984 we came to power with a certain set of policies. People, whether from the C.D. Howe Institute, the Economic Council or the Department of Finance, have done extrapolations. If we had carried on with those policies from 1984 to today, the deficit would be over $70 billion and the national debt would be well over $500 billion. Obviously there had to be changes.

The opposition has opposed every tax increase, every cut in spending and, yet, had it been in power it would have had to make similar types of choices. The opposition might have acted slightly different, but we could not have permitted the policies of 1984 to continue because we would have a 50 cent dollar. Anybody who thinks their nation is richer when its dollar drops in value just does not understand the reality of economics and does not know the examples of many other countries which have tried to lower their dollar. It might help for a month or two, but beyond that it is a disaster. Countries have to face up to their basic underlying, structural problems. they have to meet the world economy as it is rather than as they think it ought to be. That is the real problem for so many countries, they have not faced the world as it is.

I believe the Prime Minister deserves a lot more credit for the free trade agreement, the GST and, in this throne speech, the comments concerning education.

We know that education is entirely a provincial jurisdiction, but it is also clear that if the Fathers of Confederation were putting the country together today, they would have given power to the federal government over post-secondary education because that is an area where we are not getting enough specialization and graduates to cope with the world. The reason is quite simple, we have 10 countries with regard to post-secondary education and there is enormous overlap and duplication. We need to have a much stronger Canadian hat vis-à-vis education. Unfortunately, the Constitution does not call for that, but we as a national Parliament have to provide leadership. That is what this throne speech does.

Also, for the first time, the national Parliament is starting to say: "Look, provinces, you have turned this country into 10 separate nations vis-à-vis provincial economic development and provincial rules on regulation of industry." We have more barriers to the free transfer of goods and people and commodities in this country than they do in Europe where they are separate nations. Imagine Europe, where they were killing millions 50 years ago, now have fewer barriers to the transfer of money, capital, labour and educated people than we do in this country, which is supposed to be a common market.

I blame this Parliament and I blame past governments, most of whom were Liberal, because the national government should have been stopping these provincial rules that have blocked this nation from being a common market.

Section 121 of our Constitution clearly sets out that Canada is a common market. This Parliament should have been blocking these rules by using the power of disallowance, for one thing, to keep goods and capital flowing freely across this country. We must start to address that problem and it will take a few years to work it out.

My last point is vis-à-vis the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, why are we in this position? It is because in 1931, Canada became a sovereign nation in every respect except one, the amending of our Constitution. Our previous leaders in this country could not agree on an amending formula. Every Prime Minister since then has tried to patriate the Constitution and come up with an amending formula; whether it was Mackenzie King, St. Laurent, Diefenbaker, Pearson, or Trudeau in the 1970s. When they could not get unanimity, they all properly backed off because the country was being built, it was growing and we still had the second highest standard of living in the world.

Mr. Trudeau decided in 1980, when he got his last majority, to change that. He virtually forced through a patriation of the Constitution as well as a Charter and both have turned out to be disasters. It would have been wiser to have backed off, but he did not. Now we are into this mess. He forced the patriation. Quebec did not sign. After six years of being out, the ten provincial premiers came together representing all three parties in the country and said: "We have to have the Constitution patriated. We have to get Quebec in to sign", because the business of the nation was being hampered. So, in 1986, all ten premiers agreed to have a round. That is what led to Meech Lake.

In Meech Lake, we had all four political parties, all premiers agreeing to it, and then it failed because of the opposition parties in a couple of provinces, as well as a weak Conservative government in Manitoba did not have the courage to stand up and speak for the nation. So we are into it, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to be able to comment on the Supreme Court of Canada and its decisions. The other thing Mr. Trudeau did in 1980 was to transfer massive power to the Supreme Court of Canada. The court, in a couple of decisions on abortion, on Bill 101, have caused a malaise in the country. Formerly these matters were always settled by way of political adjustments and political compromise. But the court has the power to come down with a hard ruling and that has caused enormous malaise in this country. We are a long way from working it out.

I regret that my time has expired. I need at least 20 minutes to get through what I would like to say.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today on this final day of throne speech debate to put forward some of my comments and some of the comments from people in my constituency with reference to the plans of this government for the future and the plan that the government seems to have put in place for the past.

On the first page of the throne speech the words jump off the page:

> This session will be a turning point in Canadian history.

There are many turning points and we are at a turning point in Canadian history. As I travel throughout my riding, as I travel across Canada into various provinces and territories, I find that there is a good deal of dismay at where this country has been taken over the last six and a half years, both socially, economically and politically.

It is interesting that in looking at our thrust toward unity of the country the Prime Minister would be so callous as he was the weekend before last, when he said that Canadians are not patriotic. Those types of comments simply are not helpful when we are trying to bridge the gap between Parliament and the ordinary Canadian voter. I object to that type of statement as do the people in my riding and I am sure across Canada.

One of my constituents, Mr. Jim Miltimore of Summerland, phoned me and I spoke to him again on the weekend. He vehemently opposed this. He and I feel proud to be Canadians. We are patriotic in our own way. We as Canadians are not necessarily demonstrative. We are not chest beaters. We are not flag wavers. We believe, or have up until now, in our country.

It is unfortunate that the Prime Minister, while talking of the turning point in Canadian history, talking about unity of the country, participation in prosperity, and a responsive government as he has in this throne speech, at the same time he slaps the people of Canada with a comment like that. Those types of comments are not helpful.

I have spoken of the three main tenets of this throne speech, Canadian unity, participation in prosperity, and changing the way that Ottawa works—that is a responsive government. I want to speak first about Canadian unity and how the members of my community see some of this, and what I have seen in my participation in the finance committee, in the past public accounts committee, and in various travels across the country and throughout my riding.

Unity goes much further than simply talking about constitutional matters, it goes into economic and social well–being. If we look at some of the occurrences across Canada over the last few years, we have watched some of the things that people see as unifying forces being eroded. VIA Rail is an example. Sir John A. Macdonald made the agreement with CP Rail. The Canadian National Railway followed as a unifying force, making Canadians from coast to coast feel as if part of each other.

We have other modes of transportation. We have better highway systems, better air links, but the fact is that many of the small communities, rural Canadians, depend upon the railways, and railway service has been eroded. Our branch lines have been cut. Essentially the whole rail system has been lost in my riding alone. The Kettle Valley Rail Line has been abandoned and they are now in the process of taking it out. The section from Spences Bridge through the Okanagan, through Merritt and Princeton, have also been abandoned approximately a year ago and will soon no doubt be removed.

This is the type of thing that has unified Canada in the past, and with upgrading can unify Canada again. But they are not the only things. The attack on CBC radio and television by this government has been a terrible thing for rural Canada. In my riding alone I have had many petitions and letters of objection. People listen to the CBC for programs such as that hosted by Peter Gzowski, Cross Canada Checkup, Double Exposure. I can go on and name many radio programs listened to by many people in my area. CBC programs in all areas of Canada are always listened to and watched. A good strong national television and radio network has a unifying effect upon Canada. That has been eroded.

Another matter which was debated in the House on Friday on a New Democratic motion is the funding of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This is a major factor of unification within Canada. I would like to quote from a study and a submission made by the Union of British Columbia Municipalities to the government in summarizing the federal benefits of the RCMP.

I will quote directly from its fourth point: "The contribution to national unity is beyond dollars and cents.

What price does one put on the presence of the RCMP at our council inaugural meetings or the ever-present white and blue cars on our highways and streets?

It is incumbent on the federal government to sustain the image of national unity. In western Canada the RCMP provides policing and the federal government derives a great benefit to the national identity. The federal government is greatly underestimating the contribution of the RCMP to national unity in these negotiations."

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is a part of Canada's heritage. It is looked upon as a unifying factor by many people within Canada. The former Solicitor General proposed to substantially increase the cost to the extent where municipalities in my riding began talking about other options to RCMP.

It does not help to unify Canada when we erode some of the very systems that have brought this country together. Let me give some examples of the problems of passing on taxation from one level to the next level to the next level. Ultimately it comes out of the same pockets: the taxpayer's, the property owner's and the ordinary, middle and low income earner's.

In Penticton, with a population of approximately 25,500 people, the increase the former Solicitor General has proposed, under the present system, would be almost $176,000 in increased policing costs for that community.

That passes on a major cost to the municipality. In Summerland, with a population of approximately 8,400 people, the cost is staggering: $72,663 extra under the new formula. In Merritt, also in my riding, with a population of approximately 6,100 people, the cost would be $118,831 in addition to what it is already paying.

The hon. member from Brant, the New Democratic Party Solicitor General critic, has written letters to the Solicitor General pointing out the importance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the unfairness of adding this extra tax burden to the local taxpayers and the major place that the RCMP takes in Canadian unity.

I implore this government to rethink the cost of policing and to rethink passing those costs on.

I would like to quote from a letter I received. It was a letter to the right hon. Prime Minister from Mr. R. J. Shewfelt, the mayor of the municipality of Summerland. Let me quote two sections of that letter to point out the feeling in our area toward the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and toward the anticipated increases in cost. The mayor says:

> —we are— a level of government picking our tax dollars from the same tree, the taxpayer, and we find the shifting of responsibility to this degree completely unacceptable and unthinkable. We beseech you to please rethink your application to this agreement as we find it absolutely deplorable.

Mayor Shewfelt goes on to say:

> If this action were to come to fulfilment, it would only further alienate the west and we feel this is a very real danger. We feel the west is a trading partner, and surely, we are entitled to the same consideration being given to the third world countries to develop and implement trade.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is a real part of British Columbia, a real part of national unity. We in our communities in the Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt riding want it to remain as the main area of law enforcement in our area.

Let me move on to another area. The government has spoken in the Speech from the Throne about more funding for education, et cetera. What we have seen in

Bill C-69 and in the last budget is the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan and the cap on Established Programs Financing.

It is interesting that some of this is just getting out into the various ridings and they are coming to realize that once again it appears to those in the west and to those in the east, those who are being hit by bills such as Bill C-69, that we are being treated differently. We are being discriminated against for the fact that we live out of the golden triangle of the east. The capping of those funds is because right now we happen to be doing reasonably well economically in comparison, for instance, to Ontario throughout this recession.

Let there be no mistake. There are problems and there are many bankruptcies, but people are realizing that the tax burden is simply being shifted down. Although perhaps the taxes will remain the same at the federal level and they may even remain the same at the provincial level, the municipalities must balance their budgets. In balancing their budgets, they have to come up with the tax money to cover these various expenditures. Taxes are passed on to the property owner who lives in the municipality.

The boundary country has some 200 signatures attached to a letter from Mrs. Thelma Drinkwater of Greenwood, British Columbia. I would like to quote this letter, recently received by my office. It says:

> Please find enclosed a petition signed by more than two hundred voters. We protest the passing of Bill C-69. Our taxpayers are already paying out more of their income than they can afford to cover the cost of the Social Services Programs. If we do not receive our fair share of Federal support it will either mean a raise in taxes or a cutback in this service.
> Neither of these options are acceptable. We therefore plead with you to make our feelings known on (this) subject.

I speak out, as I have on Bill C-69, to point out to this House that here are 200 people from areas such as Greenwood, Grand Forks and Midway who are speaking out through me in objection to the passing on of taxes to property owners in these areas.

Another thing that unifies this country and assists rural Canada is our telephone system. Before the CRTC right now is an application by Unitel to break down what is known as a monopoly. It may be thought that it is a little bit unusual for someone from the New Democratic Party to speak out for a monopoly. In this case it is very clear that if we deregulate to the extent that Unitel wishes or let Unitel in on the long distance telephone responses, we are going to run into major problems, problems that certainly Unitel does not want to talk about.

Right now we all know that there is a subsidy of somewhere between $23 and $39 a month for local telephone services. We also get though this our telephones installed for a very limited prices and all of our servicing done for nothing. We do not pay for our local telephone calls. This is at the expense to some extent of greater long distance rates; a way of equalizing, if you will, the difficulties that rural communities have in communicating with each other.

If we allow Unitel to break in to the lucrative long distance market and drop those prices, we are going to see what happened in the United States seven years ago when the cost of local telephone service will go up substantially on every one of our bills. Those people now in the lower income levels who barely get by on the little amount of income they have will no longer be able to afford the luxury of a telephone. Telephones are so essential in keeping in contact with each other in rural communities and so essential for emergency services in rural communities where transportation of a public nature is unheard of. I am worried about this sort of thing happening.

Mr. Speaker, you have indicated that my time is up. My understanding is that I had 20 minutes of time. I still have two minutes of time. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Canada Post in the rural areas has to be built up and it is being broken down.

Let me move on briefly to the area of participating in prosperity.

• (1310)

Some of the other members have referred to cross-border shopping and the difficulty for the small business community. We cannot knock people for wanting to get the best value for their dollar.

Right now, they see a problem with what is occurring in Canada. They want to get the best value for their dollar, but they are also protesting the high taxes they see as a problem in this country. The GST, the high interest rates, the high dollar and, to some extent, the free trade agreement all have something to do with people going across the border and buying their goods.

It is interesting to look at the free trade agreement as it affects communities such as Osoyoos where I live. Right on the border in Osoyoos, one of the local retailers there, Super Value Store number 36 owner Keith Sheardown, has written me a letter in which he sets out the problems he has just in the area of milk, cheese and what not.

He points out that a Super Value store some 30 miles further from the border is able to sell its milk at a substantially higher price than he does.

While he charges $4.45 for a four-litre jug of milk, across the border that same jug of milk is $1.99. He cannot sell the milk at the same price and this causes problems. It costs jobs and bankruptcies. We are certainly seeing an increase in the number of bankruptcies in Canada and in British Columbia, partially caused by the problem of cross-border shopping.

The throne speech sets out so many things in such glowing terms, but if we look at the history of this government and if we look at what is happening to Canada under this government, it is deplorable. I have one word for this throne speech as a result of that history. That word is: "hypocrisy".

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, part of my riding bounds on the riding of the hon. member who has just spoken. We both have large, beautiful but rural areas. Many of the comments he made indicate that the message he is getting from his constituents is the same message that I am getting from my constituents regarding CBC, RCMP and education.

I guess it is part of the filtering process that this House and the members provide. Many people in my constituency and his constituency give a totally opposite side of that story. I guess that is where the different political parties serve their function, in doing this filtering and in trying to decide what the different solutions are.

It is interesting. Somebody on the weekend from his riding spoke to me about the CBC and felt it was absolutely ludicrous that as a government we are continuing to subsidize this national network to the tune of $1.4 billion.

They agree that this is a good function to perform in Canada, but is it necessary to subsidize it at that level?

In fact his constituents are encouraging me, and I am sure him as well, to try to retain the value and the benefits of CBC, but to continue to cut the deficit and our subsidies to it.

The same message could be had for the others. One area on which I have to stand firm with my colleague from the Okanagan is his concern for the potential problems for rural Canada as a result of the possible breakdown of the current monopoly situation regarding communication.

I can see as a former businessman the potential for competition by not only businesses but people who live in the ribbon across Canada where 95 per cent of Canadians live.

For rural Canada, it will create a real problem. My question to the hon. member is this: Does he, through his thinking and dealing with this problem, have any potential solution? If Unitel is successful, is there some way that the people in the rural areas of his riding and mine could continue to receive the assistance and the assurance of service that they do now under the existing monopoly system?

Mr. Whittaker: I thank the hon. member for his question.

I will deal with the Unitel situation first of all. In examining what has happened in the United States as a result of the deregulation of the telephone services, in some states it has become massively difficult for lower income people to get service because of the increase in prices, as I pointed out earlier, on existing service. Those are provided. It appears right now that, from the Unitel application as I understand it, Unitel simply wants to get in on the long distance, it does not want to service the smaller communities.

If that is broken, experience in the United States shows that we in the rural communities are in for added cost. We are going to end up taking the lumps for the break up and deregulation of the telephone services.

As I understand it, in British Columbia B.C. Tel, although objecting to Unitel's application, at the same time has put in an application to the CRTC to be able to charge those various rates. That is my understanding. I am not certain how solid it is, but that is my understanding.

It is an indication that the gears are in motion to increase the cost of telephone services if this goes through, particularly to those of us in rural Canada who depend on the telephone network in order to network, whether it be in business, socially or for emergency services.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my good friend from Okanagan—Similkameen— Merritt and it is with respect to the Kettle Valley. I have often wondered, being from Lethbridge, why Kettle Valley was closed down many years ago, because it seems to be a more direct route to the coast.

I am wondering if he might comment on that. I know it was cut by the previous government and that was many, many years ago.

With respect to the RCMP, the people who have approached me are always surprised when I give them some additional information. For example, when they find out that the federal government is paying 25 per cent of the RCMP costs, I say to them: "Why should that be? When the Quebec Provincial Police are funded entirely by the Quebec taxpayer and the Ontario Provincial Police are paid for entirely by the Ontario taxpayer, why should the people in those two provinces pay extra taxes to cover the RCMP who are, in effect, the provincial police force in our respective provinces?" When they see it from that point of view, they often admit: "It is true. They should not be paying for it. We should pay more to handle our own policing."

As for the CBC, when we came to power it was getting $800 million. Today it is $1.4 billion. That is an absolute increase of enormous proportions. It is cutting back for the same reason other media outlets are having to cut back, because there is less advertising as a result of the recession. Why should the taxpayers make up that difference, rather than the CBC having to cut as the other media outlets have had to do?

Mr. Whittaker: First of all, I will deal with the specious argument that Quebec and Ontario are not benefiting. If we look at where forces are placed, although we are getting municipal forces in, say, British Columbia, in Ontario and in Quebec we have the Canadian Law Enforcement Unit, CLEU, which deals on a broader basis with drug law enforcement and major crime enforcement across Canada. We have many benefits accruing to both Quebec and to Ontario as a result of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In 1951, for instance, British Columbia had a provincial police force. As a result of the unity question, to some extent because of the idea that bigger is better and the new technologies that had to be kept up with, it was felt in British Columbia at that time that the better route to go was to dismantle the provincial police and go with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

As we have seen in some major investigations, it has probably proven to be somewhat of a good move, especially when we watch the various municipal or provincial police forces keeping information in an investigation to themselves instead of sharing it resulting in two or three ongoing investigations. There is a definite benefit to all communities and to Canada as a whole from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Let me move on to the CBC argument. In Canada, as a young nation, we have something that I think the members opposite are ignoring to some extent, and that is the cultural aspect of Canada. We are a young country, 124 years old. Our subsidies to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation gave opportunities to programs like Tommy Hunter and Don Messer in the maritimes. People such as Anne Murray received their big break on CBC. If it was not for groups like this and symphony orchestras, for instance, presenting major productions on the CBC, we would not be as far ahead right now in Canada culturally. It services that which is not served by the private sector.

I am sure my friend from Cariboo—Chilcotin was probably talking to a broadcaster about this.

Mr. Worthy: No.

Mr. Whittaker: He indicates he was not. Without the CBC we would not have had the type of cultural progression that we have had over the past 124 years in Canada. That is something that is beyond money. It is something that we, as Canadians, have to cherish and encourage in order to assist our own cultural communities, whether it be the visual, the spoken or the audio arts.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I was going to comment earlier that the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin had a faulty filter, but I was able to get that in anyway.

Mr. Fisher: Do it again.

Mr. Butland: Do it again? Okay.

I have a question for my colleague concerning the throne speech. I will not go as far as he did and say it is hypocritical, but it may be and I respect my colleague and know his opinion is very commendable. This is a time when the country needs direction. The wondrous words of the throne speech have no direction for Canadians.

A lesson that I have learned from the hon. member, and I think we should all take it, concern his comments about specifics from constituents in his riding and reports to the House. I think the government should take note of that. He quotes from real people and real situations.

The government has a throne speech that gives us a formula for the future, but it has absolutely no ingredients. I would ask the member to elaborate very briefly on that comment.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that if we look at this throne speech and at the past throne speeches since 1988, we do have many of the same ingredients. We do have some of the same wonderful words.

If I can simply quote the conclusion of the throne speech as an example, it says:

> My government will work with Canadians to achieve its goals of unity, prosperity and responsive government so that all Canadians feel themselves a part of this country, so that all Canadians have an equal opportunity to share in its bounty—

We have seen in the legislation over the last couple of years an attack on the unemployed through the UIC bill, an attack on average Canadians through the GST, and an attack on the environment through cuts in the environmental bill. Yet the government talks about the wonderful things it is going to do. Actions speak louder than words.

In this particular case, the government's actions belie what it has said in this throne speech. That is why I say this is a hypocritical document.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I thank the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Outremont.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to speak through you to my constituents and Canadians on what our Prime Minister has presented in the Speech from the Throne.

I understand that I immediately follow our colleagues from the NDP and that there are ideological positions that seem fairly firm to us. They seem to be saying and do say that the Speech from the Throne is a rehash and presents nothing for immediate action. If we really look at the Throne Speech, and I believe I do not do so in a partisan or aggressive way, we realize that before finding the recipe, we must again identify some ingredients and especially the pillars on which a society that is developing extremely rapidly must build its future—and the future is now.

Coming back to the Speech from the Throne, we see three basic points in it. Therefore the government's plan is in three clearly identified parts. First comes unity. As we say in the Speech from the Throne, a united country is the best guarantee for the survival of our way of life. Psychology, sociology and a knowledge of society and nature are the basis for this statement. There is no doubt that to have diversity, common projects are necessary and unity must be a prime consideration. Without unity, there is chaos. The government therefore wanted to put first and foremost this basic concept of national unity, a united country, and to do so, as other speakers have said, the government will set up some committees that are necessary, not superfluous, to determine more precisely the pith and essence, the thinking, needs and dynamics of individuals and the population as a whole.

The second part, as was said, deals with prosperity. For an organization to prosper, it must have unity of thought, action and direction, as teachers of management know. Prosperity is a result of this unified approach. The government is not afraid to say that it wants this prosperity under certain conditions and identifies very specific objectives: participation in the creation of 2.5 million new jobs. This is a concrete goal, a goal that can be reached since the Conservative government, from 1984 on, has been constantly faced with goals difficult to attain, but identifiable, identified and reachable.

So, 2.5 million new jobs and an increase of at least 25 per cent in real income by year 2000 are a necessity. The last few years we have heard talks about an apparently vanishing middle class in our society, which would have only richer and poorer people. There is no need right now to discuss this argument. But there is no doubt that, with an increasingly fast development in our society, this so-called middle class is having difficulty ascertaining its future, and that is why the government, conscious of its responsibilities and conscious of the evolution of society, has decided, on top of creating jobs, to increase by at least 25 per cent the real income of people. This will allow society to develop more in terms of well-being.

The third point: the government, as always but in a more immediate way, wants to be more responsive to the concerns of the people. The priorities of the citizens are, as they should be, the main concerns of the members of this House. This is the third element of the Speech from the Throne and I am, I repeat, very glad to be able to comment on what our government is doing in that field.

If you allow me, Mr. Speaker, I will quote broadly from a document submitted to the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. For reasons only it knows, the Commission did not make much use of this submission by the Professional Corporation of Psychologists of Quebec. The paper is entitled: "Collective identity and evolution of Quebec society". It seems appropriate, in the context of the Speech from the Throne, to pick and read to you a few quotes.

Almost at the very beginning it says: "—the increase of mental health problems is isomorphic with the severity of the social problems encountered the last few years." Psychologists often use expressions— You are motioning to me, Mr. Speaker, that I have only two minutes left when I have not even started. I will go faster.

Quebec has one of the highest rates of suicide among young people in the Western world. Overconsumption of tranquilizers and sedatives—the reason why it is said we are going through the tranquillizing revolution—problematic relations with the ethnic minority groups—which were again illustrated by the native crisis—an aging population, all of which do not hang well with the shaky integration of our youth on the job market, the overall modification of the family structure, an impoverishment of social groups most vulnerable to the economic slowdown, and, lastly, as is often reported in the newspapers, the growth of openly demonstrated forms of domestic, family, urban and racial violence and others.

I must cut my comments short, because I do not have much time left. But, Mr. Speaker, if the psychologists, with all their conscientiousness, inscribed this statement at the very beginning of their document, it is essential that our societies come back and take up this notion of a united country.

Let me conclude—Do I still have time left, Mr. Speaker?

I would like to read you an extract from an article. I am quoting myself if I may: "In the past, Quebec's history often merged with that of Canada. This cannot be otherwise because we are part of Canada. Quebec's importance on the federal political scene gives us a good indication of the influence we have always had on the orientation of Canada's destiny. The importance of Quebec in the Canadian entity can only grow bigger, if such is our wish. We are, today, in a position to play an even greater part than ever before. In a not so distant time, the Quebecers will be considered by the rest of Canada as the ones who sounded the alarm when it was still time to do so.

I would have liked to tell you that Sir Wilfred Laurier, twenty years after Confederation said, as the Prime Minister mentioned—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Outremont, but I have already given him more time than was allowed to him.

Questions and comments. The hon. member for Bourassa.

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for his presentation.

I would like to ask him a few words of explanation. As a psychologist, when he was talking about the concerns of the citizens, which are, by their very own nature, individual concerns, how does he think that, as a government, we can reconcile individual priorities with government priorities, which are to insure the collective well-being and, consequently, the well-being of the majority?

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for asking such a relevant question. There is no doubt that individual and collective needs can go together, provided that this concept of unity is put forward, as is indicated in the Throne Speech.

Within a concept of unity, individuals can find some sort of personal satisfaction through the fulfilment and the development of the whole group. As a matter of fact, you can find autonomy in the recognition and acceptance of your reliance on others. It is only through this recognition of your reliance on others that you can find autonomy. It is only through its reliance on others that Quebec can find its own autonomy and at the same time recognize that it belongs to a bigger whole, Canada.

But I repeat in concluding, Mr. Speaker, that it is this first theme, which is exciting, and which is presented in the Throne Speech, this fundamental concept of unity, a united country, which is the best guarantee of the survival of our lifestyle.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I cannot ask my question en français but that will come in time.

The hon. member talks about collective rights and the issue of unity. I would like to know what his feelings are on the collective aspirations of aboriginal people within Quebec and throughout Canada. How do they fit into the scheme of constitutional reform and the effort to achieve unity in Canada? How do the aspirations of aboriginal people fit in with the prevailing Charter of Rights and Freedoms and other considerations?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): The hon. member for Outremont has 60 seconds.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer in French, if I may.

I think this question is absolutely relevant, fundamental and necessary. It is one that has to be brought up in the debate. It is rather easy, I would say, for a member from a minority group such as I am to understand the fundamental needs of the group you belong to. As I said, we can only recognize someone else's need once we have come to terms with ourselves. There is no other way. I would say that both Quebec and Canada are going through a maturing process right now and the more the country and the people will get to know themselves "from within", the more they will be able to integrate and involve minority groups which should have their place among us because it is through such groups that Canada can grow. I hope that we will—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I thank the hon. member for Outremont. Unfortunately, his time is up. On debate, the hon. member for Lévis.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, on May 13, 1991, the government formalized the major national concerns of the Canadian people and outlined what the main themes of the federal legislation and administration will be for the next few years. In view of the present constitutional concerns of the Canadians, it was normal to define this constitutional context in the Speech from the Throne. But we also know that, as important as national soul-searching might be, it will never prevail over quality of life, the preservation of our social programs and the protection of our environment in the eyes of the Canadians, all of which depends on the productivity of our capital and human resources. The Speech from the Throne, of May 13, 1991 stated:

> Increasing economic prosperity is first and foremost an issue of people.

We are entering the age of knowledge and how well Canadians live will depend on how well they learn. To face this particular challenge, the government announced the forthcoming release of a work paper on education.

The federal government is wondering if the $11 billion it spends every year on education is well spent. The results are not convincing: "Three out of ten students drop-out of high school before graduating. Four out of ten adults cannot read or do math well enough to perform everyday tasks."

Included in the Speech from the Throne are the following education goals for the year 2000: cutting illiteracy rates in half; ensuring that ninety percent of Canadians attain high school diplomas or the equivalent by age twenty-five; doubling the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, the sciences and engineering; and quadrupling the training provided by employers to their employees.

Mr. Speaker, I think we should find innovative means to help us achieve those goals, at a minimal cost. In Canada, education is financed by the school boards with property taxes, and by the federal and provincial governments, mainly through taxation and loans.

Consequently, almost $11 billion are transferred from the federal to the provincial governments, where those $11 billion are eaten up by various provincial bureaucracies, major education institutions, universities, school boards, et cetera.

All those institutions try to anticipate our collective education needs, that is the number of students opting either for humanities or sciences, the number of elementary schools, the number of colleges and universities, the various services provided to students, the curriculum, the option systems, the credit systems, students' preferences and the demand.

At one end of this planning pyramid, you will find schoolchildren and students who often have to attend schools not of their own choosing, travel by more or less adequate means, and specialize in hard-to-define areas because of the very large number of options available. Too often, the only reason students stay in school is to meet the criteria set by the experts and in the end, get a diploma in whatever subject, also certified by the experts.

Mr. Speaker, I think our education system has lost its focus which should be our students. Our education system does not realize that we live in a market economy. To change the system, the bureaucracy will have to give way to the laws of supply and demand, and to achieve this, all levels of government will have to change their funding programs for education.

Instead of letting public funds, as so often happens, serve the interests of huge bureaucracies, they should be channeled directly to the beneficiaries, in other words, the students.

Governments will have to start implementing a system that provides students with study qualification certificates.

With these certificates, students will be able to choose their subjects, schools, teachers, and so forth. The qualification certificate system could initially show a preference for science and engineering, since those are the areas where the need is greatest and where we have the most catching up to do. The system will encourage private and public educational institutions to compete and also give those institutions an incentive to be more market—and efficiency—oriented. This system would also be a major incentive for the big bad unions, which, unfortunately, are often so concerned about the vested rights of their members that they tend to overlook the needs of young people and the labour market.

The qualification certificate system would do away with a burdensome bureaucracy that has not always proved to be worthwhile. Transfers to lower levels of government must be replaced with transfers to the users themselves.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians must be able to make their own decisions on their future. It no longer makes sense to have bureaucrats decide what careers our young people will choose and how they will prepare for those careers.

In fact, President George Bush recently suggested that U.S. federal funds for education be made directly available to the parents of young Americans, so it would be up to parents and their children to choose their schools or other educational institutions.

Mr. Speaker, in our discussions on educational reform, we should take a look at some examples on the other side of the border. The city of Milwaukee, in Wisconsin, has made qualification certificates available to enable its young people to choose the schools where they want to study.

Similar programs have been implemented in Iowa, Arkansas, Utah, Ohio and so forth.

Mr. Speaker, this concept of channeling transfer payments to young students will form the nucleus of my representations to those who govern this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): Questions and comments? Resuming debate. The hon. member for Cardigan.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, as members of Parliament begin the third session of Parliament, it is appropriate to look back over the last two and a half years since I was elected to serve the Cardigan riding.

In the period of time since I was elected, I have learned many things and I have met many people. The most important thing I have learned is that serving the hard working people of eastern Prince Edward Island is one of the best jobs I could have.

I thank the people of Cardigan for the trust and respect they have placed in me. As I listened to the Speech from the Thone, one thing kept entering my mind, and that was the government record. For my constituents, the people of Prince Edward Island, it is difficult to find much good in the record over the last seven years.

While this government has presided over the six best years of economic growth, the disparity between Atlantic Canada and the rest of the country has grown. While the economy was booming in central Canada, the fishery was failing. While the government was talking about jobs, jobs, jobs, it was jobs leaving Prince Edward Island. An example is the closure of the CFB in Summerside.

This government has had six years of expanding revenue and still has failed to control the deficit. In all fairness, the record of the government is bad. With a record like this behind it, it is hard to believe any of the vague promises in the throne speech.

Much of the throne speech is concentrated on the constitutional crisis that we are now facing. I would like to make perfectly clear that Quebec was not left out in the cold when the Constitution was brought home in 1982. Quebec was led by Rene Levesque, a man who was dedicated to Quebec's separation. Then Prime Minister Trudeau could have offered Levesque the moon and the stars and he would not have signed. Only one thing would have been acceptable to the PQ government in 1982, and that was Quebec's separation.

The situation grew worse when the Meech Lake Accord died last summer. I will not get into the argument of whether Meech Lake was good or bad. Today that is not important. What is important is why the accord failed.

The one person responsible for the failure of Meech lake was the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister pushed and pushed until people were backed into a corner. Most people react negatively when pushed into a corner. With his famous "roll the dice" comment, the Prime Minister destroyed much of the goodwill in the nation.

The decision now is: Where do we go from here? We in the Liberal Party do not want to play politics with the country. That is why we support the principle of a new constitutional committee to evaluate the concrete constitutional proposals. However, we disagree strongly with the timetable the government is trying to impose.

The new committee is to start work in September and is to complete work by January 1992. The framework is simply too short. Because the committee is to develop the government's negotiating position, it will just leave a few short months before the proposed Quebec referendum.

The Prime Minister is painting the country into another corner where he could roll the dice again and lose again. To avoid that situation, the government should put its cards on the table by June 1 and have the committee start working thereafter. Anything that would save time certainly should be considered.

I would like to share with you, Mr. Speaker, what I think should go into a renewed Constitution. Any constitutional change should reflect the importance of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. All Canadians have a strong attachment to the charter. The preservation of our fundamental freedoms is supreme, and no amendment to the Constitution should change that.

We should also look at writing an inspiring statement of the nature of Canada. The statement should outline all those things that make Canada the best country in the world. It should state the values that we share, commitment to our two official languages, recognition of our diverse cultural heritage, recognition of the distinctiveness of Quebec society and recognition of the role of the aboriginal people.

When the Fathers of Confederation wrote the Constitution of Canada in 1867, they divided the powers, giving to each level of government the powers they felt appropriate. What was appropriate in 1867 may no longer be appropriate today. After all, the world has changed a lot in 124 years.

The fundamental principle must be that the power should rest with the level of government that can handled the matter best. The focus should be what is best for the people, not governments, bureaucrats or politicians. In many areas the federal and provincial governments could co-operate. An example is the environment. The federal government should be able to set up guideline legislation stating national standards, leaving it up to the provinces to adapt these national standards to regional and provincial realities.

Historically the federal government has used its spending powers to enter into areas of provincial responsibility. The problem in the past has been how to reconcile the limitations of the spending power with the needs of national standards.

With a change in the division of powers, it becomes possible to achieve a constitutional limitation of the federal spending power without compromising national standards.

Over the last year much attention has been paid to the problems facing Canada's aboriginal people. There is a broad consensus and understanding in Canada of the need to deal with their status, rights and claims. A constitutional reform package must enshrine the rights of the aboriginal people to self-government.

As it stands right now, most areas of the Constitution can be amended with the 7-50 formula, with seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population. However, for many Canadians this is not acceptable. A new amending formula should recognize the basic equalities of the regions of the west, Quebec, Ontario and Atlantic Canada. Each region should have a veto on any constitutional changes that are not in the interests of the people living there.

These are the things I would like to see in our new Canadian Constitution. The stumbling block is our attitude, because in many ways we are our own worst enemies. Canadians are often too harsh on themselves and other Canadians, and that has to change. Far too often we get caught up in the small problems of life. We get caught up in the rat race of life and do not take time to consider how good we have it here in Canada.

With all our problems, and there are many, it is difficult to look under the grey tarnish at the sparkling silver underneath. It is often said that Canadians envy Americans because they are so patriotic and proud to be Americans. The time has come for each and every one of us to say that we are proud to be Canadians. I am proud to be a Canadian.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague for a very insightful speech on the Speech from the Throne.

I do believe it is a time for all Canadians to look deeply within ourselves to come up with the solutions to the unity problems that confront us. If we cannot resolve these problems, then we cannot continue with this wonderful life created for all of us.

If the member has a moment, perhaps he would like to spell out some of the economic problems and consequences of this government's actions and whether he feels this throne speech answers any of them.

Mr. MacAulay: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for her question.

There are numerous economic problems. The disparity between the Atlantic region and the central part of the nation has increased over the last number of years.

One of the areas I am involved with is fisheries. The lack of the government's initiative to put funding into wharf repair has been a major problem for the fishermen of Cardigan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I am sorry but I have to interrupt the hon. member. It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Members' Statements, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

MEDIC-ALERT

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to point out to this House and all Canadians that the Medic-Alert Foundation has designated the month of May as the Medic-Alert Month.

The Foundation is a non profit organization that has helped protect some 600,000 Canadians in the last 30 years. Those Canadians enjoy not only a distinctive identification bracelet recognized in Canada and across the world, but also a 24 hour a day health emergency information service. This service is particularly important to inform health professionals in cases of sudden illness or accident.

The theme selected this year for the Medic-Alert Month underlines its role: "Medic-Alert speaks for you".

I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate that excellent organization for their efforts, and to formally support their statement designating the month of May as the Medic-Alert Month.

SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the Department of Fisheries and Oceans announced that it would not be honouring a contract with Georgetown Shipyard in my riding worth $7.5 million and over 100 jobs, a contract that had been signed for 15 months. Because of the signed contract, the shipyard could not seek other work or pay penalties to the federal government.

This contract cancellation is yet another blow to the people of Prince Edward Island. Crumbling wharfs, increased lobster sizes, and now this.

When the new minister was appointed, the people of P.E.I. had hoped for better treatment than they received from his predecessor. Sadly, this is not the case.

I urge the minister to take action now. He should restore the contract now. Failing that, he should provide compensation to the shipyard to help preserve the jobs of 100 people whose UI has run out.

SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, once again the lack of a comprehensive shipbuilding policy is rearing its ugly head. Instead of there being adequate work for all shipyards in all regions, and instead of government work being assigned on the basis of ability of the shipyards, it has apparently been assigned on the basis of who has more clout in cabinet.

How else can the weekend's announcement of the withdrawal of a $7 million fisheries patrol boat contract from the Georgetown shipyard on P.E.I. be explained. They obviously have no clout with cabinet.

Canadians want fairness. They want the frigate contracts awarded to the region or regions which need the work most. They want the work done in yards that know how to build ships at a cost Canada can afford. What they do not want is a contract awarded on the basis of the minister of defence having been a former vice-president of one of the two competing companies.

Canadians want fairness. Hopefully for the people of Pictou, Halifax, Dartmouth, Port Weller, Thunder Bay, and Georgetown, this and other contracts will be awarded fairly, not by the politics of fragmentation.

PEOPLE WITH DISABILITIES

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval-East): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Access Awareness Week and I would like to invite my colleagues to support those men and women, in their ridings, who try to help people with disabilities participate more fully in the socioeconomic life of our country. In just four years, this national week has allowed us to create an impressive network of partners from coast to coast. Today, thanks to this partnership, people with disabilities can hope to have equal access in areas such as transportation, housing, employment, recreation and education.

This strategy supplements other measures taken by the government in order to promote equality of opportunities for the disabled, including a review of legislation concerning the disabled, the 1991 post-censal survey on disability, and tax measures announced in the February budget.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that considerable progress has been made with regard to the integration of people with disabilities. It is also true that the Decade of Disabled Persons, declared by the United Nations, has had a positive impact on our national week, but we should not stop there. We must keep going and not be afraid to innovate because, as is said in this year's theme, "Access is a right".

ETHIOPIAN JEWS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the world witnessed an incredible humanitarian exercise by Israel for its lost and isolated tribe, the Ethiopian Jews—called Falashas, which means outsiders. They brought home 14,500 men, women and children in a family reunification exercise of great daring that ended their exile of 3,000 years. In a dramatic airlift, expeditiously carried out over 36 hours with complex logistics, there were at one point 28 aircraft filling the sky winging their way home.

The importance of this undertaking at this time in the history of Israel, while coping with high unemployment and the integration of an overwhelming Russian immigration, is of particular importance. It is a message of hope from a small democracy where neither race nor colour nor creed will stop them from responding to their brothers and sisters, wherever they might be.

This is an important message in today's uncaring world. I ask all to ponder what other nation would, could and would want to undertake such a mission. May this success bring personal enrichment and fulfilment to all. Yasher Koach.

CFB CALGARY

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, Canadian Forces Base Calgary plays a major role in maintaining Canada's defence capabilities. It should not only remain as part of our strategic defence network, but it should be improved and strengthened.

As our defence needs evolve, it will be increasingly important for Canada to have strategic forces concentrated and well positioned to respond quickly and efficiently to national and international requirements.

Canadian Forces Base Calgary, at the centre of western Canada, is particularly well suited to provide immediate response in our region. The city of Calgary provides first-class infrastructure and community support for the base. This allows the base to focus on its operational requirements and makes it one of the most efficient in the country.

I urge the Minister of National Defence, if and when he is considering base consolidations, to recognize the importance of Canadian Forces Base Calgary to western Canada, and particularly the mutually beneficial relationship that it has with the city of Calgary.

COAL MINING

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): The Westray coal mine in the Tory provincial constituency of Pictou East is the home of the premier of the Province of Nova Scotia, the Hon. Don Cameron.

The Westray coal mine has entered a contract with the Nova Scotia government whereby it will supply 300,000 tonnes of coal for a 15-year period.

This particular operation has been supported by the Government of Canada. It is one of the best examples of the free enterprise system. There are 300,000 tonnes of coal going from a coal mine which is in direct conflict with the Cape Breton Development Corporation situated on the island of Cape Breton.

What is disgusting about this particular operation is that this 300,000 tonnes of coal is guaranteed by the Government of Nova Scotia even if they do not mine it out of the ground. What a wonderful free enterprise exercise by the federal Conservatives of Brian Mulroney and the premier of Nova Scotia. Shame on both your houses.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, handling of immigration cases has repeatedly been in the news of late.

Last week in Manitoba, the CBC aired an investigation report concerning allegations concerning the conduct of an immigration consultant in the city of Winnipeg.

As a direct result, it appears that we have three subsequent investigations being conducted into activities of three individuals around this case.

But, there are no rules or regulations governing immigration consultants. As a result, many immigrants and potential immigrants may be taken advantage of due to their frustration with the immigration system here in Canada and by their fear of becoming a victim of others.

I urge the minister of immigration to communicate with his provincial counterparts to instil some order to this widespread chaos.

BURMA

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, today a rally of Canadian friends of Burma reminded us that one year ago today, the people of Burma elected an opposition party to 457 seats, more than 80 per cent of the Parliament of Burma.

This amazing democratic victory was blocked by the military supporters of the former dictatorship of Burma, according to Amnesty International and the U.S. State Department.

The military refused to allow any of these opposition members to be seated in Parliament and imprisoned more than 70 of them, along with many hundreds of leaders of the parliamentary opposition.

Nevertheless, Canada continues to recognize this unlawful and violent military regime. Petro-Canada, of which the Canadian government is the sole shareholder, has a contract to develop oil in Burma for the enrichment of the military.

I call on our government to condemn publicly this military attack on parliamentary government in Burma, to recognize the lawfully elected government, to withdraw recognition of that military dictatorship and to cause Petro-Canada to abandon its contract with that dictatorship.

SOCIÉTÉ RADIO-NORD INC.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Société Radio-Nord in Abitibi—Témiscamingue is going ahead with a restructuring proposal for its AM radio network and news service.

People in the great region of Abitibi—Témiscamingue will lose their local news bulletins on television during the summer.

The company rejects a work-sharing proposal for all employees. The union was ready to make concessions representing some 20 percent for all employees.

Mr. Speaker, the Abitibi—Témiscamingue region will lose its right to express itself on television and on the Radio-Nord Inc. AM network.

ENERGY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, last week's decision by the National Energy Board to limit Ontario Hydro's application to export electricity to three years instead of the requested fifteen years is good news. Ontario Hydro could not tell the board how the energy will be generated and what the environmental impact would be.

The National Energy Board made the right decision. If our economy becomes more and more dependent on the export of electricity, we will continue to damage and even destroy the environment in Canada to satisfy the insatiable energy appetite south of the border.

Instead, we should support like-minded Americans who are pressing for energy self-sufficiency through conservation, efficiency and the development of renewable resources of energy such as biomass. We should do the same in Canada.

ONTARIO BUDGET

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, at a time when most provinces are doing their best to control spending and reduce the burden on taxpayers, the Ontario NDP government has chosen to spend $9.9 billion it does not have to artificially stimulate economic growth.

After long months of fighting the war on inflation through prudent fiscal management, interest rates are beginning to fall and many economists are predicting the recovery will begin in the second half of this year.

At a time when most provinces are doing their best to control spending and reduce the burden on taxpayers, this budget threatens to bring back high interest rates. It will not be just the people of Ontario who will suffer as a result of this wanton spending. If the economy grows too quickly, inflationary pressures and high interest rates will return and choke growth in provinces such as New Brunswick where the economy is not as strong or diversified.

OPENING OF EMBASSY IN JAPAN

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have here a draft copy of the menu used at the extravagant buffet reception hosted by the Prime Minister at the opening of the Canadian Embassy in Tokyo. At one table there was loin of muskox with pheasant cocktail sausages, and another with wild turkey brochettes in almond nuts. If that didn't suit your palate, you could visit another table of smoked char with dill mustard sauce. To say nothing of the dessert tables featuring delights of peach crêpes in whisky or wine jelly in tulip lattice.

Only a few privileged people attended this feast. In contrast, last fall 225,000 Canadian children had to use soup kitchens, food banks or breakfast programs. Do they understand why this government feels the Tokyo extravaganza was a better use of taxpayers' money than reducing child poverty? The 6,671 Canadians who went bankrupt in April were not among the lucky few at our Tokyo palace. They and their families can look forward to meals that will definitely not compare to the Prime Minister's buffet.

Canadians are not pleased at all with this government's version of "let them eat muskox".

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is National Access Awareness Week, a time to recognize the contribution of Canadians with disabilities to the life of our country. It is also an opportunity for Canadians from all sectors of society to join together in partnership and to recommit ourselves to breaking down the remaining barriers to full participation, both physical and psychological.

The theme for 1991 is "Access is a right". People with disabilities have the same right as their non-disabled fellow Canadians to become full and active partners in our country's social and economic life.

The federal government is profoundly aware of the need to ensure equality of opportunity for Canadians with a disability, a rich human resource we cannot afford to ignore.

In 1985 the Prime Minister issued Canada's declaration on the United Nation's Decade of Disabled Persons. Since then, the government has built a solid record of leadership on issues affecting persons with a disability.

As the decade of disabled persons declared by the Canadian government draws to a close in 1992, it is reassuring to note the government's continued and unwavering commitment. I call on all Canadians to join the government in pursuing the goal of full participation and equality for all citizens.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In Quebec, the number of people looking for work rose from 346,000 in March 1990 to 468,000 in March 1991. During the same period, Mr. Speaker, the official unemployment rate rose from 10.4 per cent to 13.9 per cent. As a group, young males were the worst off, with an unemployment rate of nearly 24.4 per cent.

What does the Conservative Government intend to offer in the way of concrete measures to help half a million Quebecers who are desperately seeking work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a matter that is important for young students across the country.

This year, under Challenge 91, we intend to spend more than $28 million to encourage the private and public sectors, since both have a responsibility in this area, to help our young people with summer jobs.

And that is why this year, $28 million will be invested in the student employment sector to help these young people find jobs.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister, who probably received this aggressive pamphlet against the recession, published by the Confederation of National Trade Unions.

On the weekend, on Friday, the Quebec Liberal caucus met the CNTU to discuss the recession. Does the minister realize that although the same pamphlet was sent to all ministers in the Tory government and all Quebec members, they have yet to respond and meet the CNTU? The unemployed don't want vague promises. They want a concrete and specific program to deal with the unemployment crisis.

Is the minister prepared to implement the CNTU's six concrete proposals for dealing with the recession in Quebec?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to comment on the six proposals mentioned by the hon. member.

However, I can inform him that if we here in Canada want to try to achieve the kind of economic recovery that will help create jobs so that the young, the not so young and in fact everyone will have a job in this country, we first have to deal with the structural problems in our economy which were addressed in the last budget brought down by my colleague, the present Minister for International Trade and Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

It's all very well to let people believe the problem can be resolved by throwing money at it, but during the past few years, this government has proved that structural measures are needed to ensure durable employment for everyone in the future. And that is what we intend to do, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear from the minister's hesitant manner that his government has been marking time, especially since the free trade agreement was signed with the Americans.

On the weekend, people at the CNTU told us that Montreal was like a war zone, with the number of industries in major sectors that have been closed as a direct result of the free trade agreement with the United States.

About 7,602 jobs have been lost in Montreal as a direct result of free trade. What does the minister intend to do about this and how is he going to get jobs for those 7,602 workers who were directly affected as a result of the implementation of the free trade agreement with the United States and have received no help whatsoever from this government? What are you going to do, Mr. Minister?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is arguing for a return to local employment initiatives and creating nebulous jobs to make people believe that everything is okay we are not going to do that.

The Canadian Jobs Strategy introduced by this government is aimed at helping our workers adjust to market changes.

The hon. member is fond of telling the world that these lay-offs are a direct result of free trade. On the other hand, I could give a list of economic activities that could also qualify as a direct result of free trade.

Listen, Mr. Speaker, it's like being in a storm, and of course the Prime Minister would like to tell the wind and the waves to stop, but that won't stop them. We cannot, unilaterally, try to prove that the real situation is different.

He knows exactly what I mean, and that is why we intend to keep implementing existing programs to help our workers, not further the political aims of the hon. member.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport.

Hapag-Lloyd, a major international container shipper, has announced it is pulling most of its business from the Port of Halifax because of the intolerable rail rates charged by the CN monopoly.

This move will result in the loss of hundreds of jobs and over $20 million annually to that local economy.

I ask the minister if he is prepared today to take the necessary steps to have CN lower its rates, and will he instruct the National Transportation Agency to conduct a full inquiry into CN's rate setting structure in Atlantic Canada, or will we have to sit back and wait as the Port of Halifax is allowed to die and drown in a sea of government indifference?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the premises to the hon. member's questions are inaccurate. The situation that is causing a problem for the Port of Halifax is the problem of over-capacity on the high seas between the various shipping lines. It is not a problem of railway rates from Halifax to Montreal.

Those shipping lines have made a business decision based on ocean economics. In fact, a Halifax port official has stated that even if CN had reduced its rail rates to zero, it would not have prevented this move by Hapag-Lloyd and ACL to shift certain business in the way that they have.

We are working with the Government of Nova Scotia and CN to attempt to overcome these problems, including discussions on a double-stack container service which would give certain cost savings. We will continue to work to see if there is an answer to this situation, which we certainly regret and intend to attempt to overcome.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about reducing CN rates to zero. It might be a nice idea if they would give it a try.

My question is for the Minister of Transport. Canadian Pacific has long enjoyed massive funding from the federal government which has helped it, among other things, to purchase the Delaware and Hudson Railroad in the United States. This railroad lures business from the Port of Halifax to the ports of New York and Philadelphia because they have better freight rates.

When is this government going to create the atmosphere that gives Canadians a break? When is it going to change the tax structure? When is it going to finally create a truly level playing field for the Port of Halifax?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, every time the government has attempted to change the tax structure in Canada, it has met with vicious and sustained opposition from the members of the opposition. It is certainly a change to see that one member of the opposition wants the tax system changed.

Another problem, of course, that makes the situation more difficult is the problem of geography, which is a significant factor. Halifax is further from mid-Canada and U.S. markets than New York, and that is another factor we have to contend with. The situation that we are now attempting to resolve in Halifax was not brought about by government action. It was brought about by a surplus of shipping space on the north Atlantic, and that is a fact that no government can overcome.

TRADE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is Acting Prime Minister today. The Prime Minister has touted this trip to Asia as a mission to increase trade in Canada. Recently in the Throne Speech the Prime Minister exhorted members of Parliament to be more non-partisan. Yet, on the first trip out after the throne speech, he performed the magnificent Kreskin trick, he reads the minds of Chinese businessmen and he dumps on Ontario. My question for the Acting Prime Minister is this: Why is the government jeopardizing trade investment in Canada by bad mouthing Ontario, which has suffered most from this government's economic policies?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and Government of Canada did not write the budget of Ontario. We simply reported it.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): He did more than report the budget of Ontario. In fact, what he did was he read the minds of Asian businessmen and came up with the conclusion that the deficit in Ontario was the most important problem on the minds of Asian businessmen. Mr. Nakawasa, the head of the Japanese Businessmen's Association, said: "No, that is not true." Mr. Tom d'Aquino said he had been there for 24 hours and he had not heard Ontario raised once. So my question to the Acting Prime Minister is this: How does he reconcile this blatant political partisanship with the government's reported statement time and again in the throne speech that we ought not be so partisan in our comments in this House and outside the House?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Lo Yuk Sui, identified by Julian Beltrame no less, as a local businessman in Hong Kong said, and I quote the article: "Lo was also critical of Ontario's recent $10 billion budget deficit and said he might not have invested in the regal property if he had known the NDP government would raise taxes".

I think it is important for us all to understand that actions that we take in Canada are going to have consequences internationally.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. This trip is characterized by the Prime Minister's bad jokes about refugees, by his attacks on his own country, by extravagance and sumptuous living. Will the Deputy Prime Minister agree that taxpayers do not have to pay for a trip whose sole apparent purpose is partisanship?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): That was not the purpose of the trip. That does not characterize the trip.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister and it is on the same subject. The Prime Minister claimed that he was going to the Orient as the chief salesperson for Canada. What he has succeeded in doing, deliberately, in a political way, is besmirching the reputation and the name of a province which happens to have the largest manufacturing base in Canada and which is hurting desperately. Yes, there is a question. My question is, why is the Prime Minister, at a time when there are thousands upon thousands of Ontarians who need jobs, using cheap political purposes to besmirch the economy of Ontario?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer is that he is not.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we know that the Prime Minister himself told a lie in Japan and Hong Kong. He claimed that business men and women—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member please put her question. I am not going to have preambles like that.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: So here is my question: Why does the Prime Minister pretend that Ontario's economic policies are hurting Canada's development when he knows very well that what is hurting us now is the economic policies of the Government of Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, part of Canada's problem is its reputation, which can affect foreign investment, a problem created by the Ontario government's budget. I believe that it is fair for the Prime Minister to mention this reality among others he mentioned in a series of conversations to promote Canada.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise questions on the same topic with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who also happens to be a member of Parliament from the province of Ontario, which presently has over 500,000 people unemployed.

Considering that the Prime Minister's statements were totally and completely rejected by the Japanese officials with whom he met, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs prepared to issue a denial of the comments made by the Prime Minister of this country while in Japan?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister's constituents will be very pleased and surprised to know exactly how much this minister represents their interests.

I want to ask the minister this question again. Considering the Japanese officials plus the Canadian business people, like Thomas D'Aquino, head of the Business Council, confirmed that this issue has not been raised in these discussions; that this matter can and is creating a major problem for investment in this country, what does the minister intend to do to correct this very serious mistake, this flub, this foolish mistake of our Prime Minister?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I was in Hong Kong and Japan last November. I talked to investors in both places and they were quite positive on the policies that the Government of Canada had been following, policies to get the debt problem under greater control, policies that led to the free trade agreement, the goods and services tax which will make us more competitive as a country for investors looking to invest in Canada; the range of policies on improving our trading capacity, improving the regulatory environment, privatization, all these policies are very highly respected by investors in Hong Kong and Japan. That was the subject of the Prime Minister's speech in both places.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Knowing full well that Asian investors are looking at Canada very favourably, that Japanese investors are investing heavily throughout all of Canada—particularly on the west coast—does he think it is appropriate, and in spite of all these other yahoos yelling right at the moment, do they think it is appropriate that the Prime Minister of Canada goes out and purposely bad-mouths one of Canada's major critical regions?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is not what the Prime Minister was doing.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question, in response to that answer, is this. Is it not appropriate to expect the Prime Minister, when he goes abroad to promote trade with Canada, that in spite of perhaps some of his personal priorities, he considers himself to be representing all parts of Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate for the Prime Minister when he is abroad to represent all parts of Canada, which is what he does. It is also appropriate for members of this House of Commons, when they are commenting on activities of the Prime Minister or, indeed, of others abroad, to get their facts straight and not to try to play partisan games here on the floor of this House.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Half an hour ago I watched the Prime Minister on national television indicating that the Japanese were very preoccupied, very concerned with Ontario's annual deficit, that it was a major deterrent to Asian investment in Canada. I watched immediately thereafter Tom d'Aquino, travelling with the Prime Minister, indicate there had been no such discussion of Ontario's deficit. I watched the senior Japanese trade official say that the matter had never been raised and was not a concern.

I have a serious question to ask the minister. Why has the Prime Minister of Canada suggested publicly and in Asia, in front of potential investors in the Canadian economy, that this matter is indeed a preoccupation and a deterrent to investment when in fact we have been told by officials, both Canadian and Japanese who were in the room, that there was no such discussion of the matter? Why is the Prime Minister acting this way?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, everyone in this House who has had any experience with international investors will know that particularly after a series of measures, the Foreign Investment Review Agency, the national energy program, a steady accumulation of a national deficit, there was very real concern in Japan and elsewhere about the investment climate in this country.

One of the things that this government has done—and it has been difficult, controversial and opposed by members on the opposite side—consistently through the last seven years is try to turn around that reputation so that this country can continue to merit the confidence of investors around the world.

That is critical to provinces like his, it is critical to provinces like mine and it is critical to this country. So it is naturally appropriate that a Prime Minister, who was elected to try to encourage people in other parts of the world to share confidence in this country and to invest in it, should continue in that practice when he is abroad, which is what he is doing.

I would hope that hon. members in the New Democratic Party and their allies in the Liberal Party who are trying to defend the Rae budget will take a look at the broader picture of what the Prime—

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, members of this party are not interested in defending the Rae budget. We are interested in defending the 1.5 million Canadians who are looking for jobs.

We find it shocking that a Prime Minister, the country's chief salesman, would tell investors to stay away from Canada.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister a very straightforward question. Would he concur with the Prime Minister of Canada in recommending to Asian investors that they avoid Ontario, avoid Canada as an investment opportunity? Does he concur in that shocking advice by Canada's Prime Minister?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I concur with the Prime Minister's actions consistently since his election as the head of this government to improve and to establish a strong reputation for Canada as a stable economy that can attract investment from at home and from abroad precisely to allow us to continue to create jobs in this country, a process at which this government has one of the best records in the history of this nation.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. He still has not given a clear and convincing explanation as to why the Prime Minister in Japan said, and I quote: "Obviously the question of public finances is the single most important factor in any judgment the Japanese make", when the head of the huge Keidanren Japanese manufacturers' association said this is definitely not the case and they are more interested in their own profitability.

Will the Acting Prime Minister give an explanation of this. He has not done so so far.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. member in earlier incarnations met with the Keidanren. Certainly they knew of him and of his works. I have met with them and my colleague, the minister of industry and of trade, has met with them. We know, as the Prime Minister does, that there is a profound and continuing concern about the investment climate in this country among the Japanese.

He will know that as a result of changes this government introduced, in part to deal with the Foreign Investment Review Agency, which he introduced, there were at least two major investment missions carried out here by representatives of the Keidanren and others in Japan precisely to assure themselves about the economic climate in this country. Of course they are interested in this climate. All of their activities and all of our contacts with them over the last several years including, I am sure his own, indicate that.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister; if the Japanese are so interested in the question of public finance, can he explain why the Prime Minister had to admit that at the dinner they had with him, they did not even bring up the subject. That does not show much concern, does it?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what on this Monday afternoon has caused the two opposition parties to come—

Ms. Copps: The 1.5 million unemployed Canadians.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Yes. We are interested in the 1.5 million Canadians in search of jobs too. We know that requires an investment climate in this country that will attract investment from abroad, and that is what we are seeking to achieve.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. Union and administrators of the Canadian steel industry are in Ottawa today. We all know that the Canadian steel industry is at peril.

The minister is no doubt cognizant of the fact that the American share of the Canadian market has tripled and our share of their market has been cut in half in the last couple of years. Here is an opportunity for this government to help Ontario, rather than bad-mouthing it.

Will the minister demand that the American steel producers voluntarily restrain their exports into this country, as we did into their country in 1986? Will he demand they reciprocate?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, I will be meeting with this group later on this afternoon. I imagine this, among other things, will be raised by our friends from the steel industry.

I want to caution my hon. friend in taking the steps that he has proposed. While there are difficulties at this point with increased exports from the United States into the Canadian market, it is largely related to the extensive strikes that we had during the summer and early fall last year. We are hoping to be able to get that market share down. In that regard we are quite pleased to hear that Stelco has announced a recall of 1,500 workers over the course of the next month or six weeks, which is an indication of a growing market penetration for the Steel Company of Canada.

If we are to take the path that my hon. friend is suggesting, we also must realize it is a two-edged sword. We have been fighting voluntary restraints in the United States market and I would expect that my hon. friend would support us in continuing to do that.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the sword only has one edge and it is always against Canadian steelworkers.

The United Steel Workers of America are pursuing the possibility of an employee buy-out of Algoma Steel, a concept now commonplace in the United States.

Will the minister endorse the concept of employee buy-outs and recommend to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, any fiscal actions to promote such an initiative.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): As one individual, I am supportive of employee share ownership. I think it is a very positive element in the operation of any company. In principle I have no quarrel with that at all. Whether my colleague the Minister of Finance would support that with tax incentives or other things along those lines, is a question I put to my friend the Minister of Finance. He may wish to respond to my colleague opposite.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, given the Prime Minister's lack of knowledge of government policy, we would like to continue on a different subject. Given the Prime Minister's solemn promise to accept thousands of new Vietnamese refugees, is the minister of immigration going to increase the quota of government sponsored refugees, and will the minister now increase funding for that program?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister said last week, refugees are a world-wide problem and we all have to do our share. Canada is a leader in refugee resettlement and under the five-year plan which the Prime Minister was referring to we will continue to be a leader and we will continue to do more.

If the hon. member would recall the five-year plan which my predecessor brought forward in this House it called for more immigrants to Canada and that is what the Prime Minister was referring to.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the only thing the Prime Minister has done right so far in his trip abroad is that he has not lost his luggage.

The minister will remember his predecessor announcing just last November in this House that the government would be accepting 13,000 government sponsored refugees. However, according to statistics of arrivals for the first five months of this year, the government is not meeting the humanitarian responsibilities it defined for itself. How can the minister of immigration expect to bring in thousands more new refugees, government sponsored refugees, as promised by the Prime Minister when this government is ordering cutbacks on its current quotas and current funding? The minister has some explaining to do.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, is it fair to Canada to picture us as reducing when in fact he knows that this year we have 13,000 government sponsored refugees targeted to be brought into Canada.

Mr. Keyes: You haven't met the quota.

Mr. Valcourt: Well, it is not the end of the year if you would care to check.

EDUCATION

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for youth. In view of the fact that the government has cut back in its transfer payments to the provinces for education and therefore the students will have to pay more for tuition, and in view of the fact that because the GST is in place, these students will have to pay more for their books, will the minister increase the annual budget for student summer employment and will he reinstate immediately the five student employment centres which were closed last month?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the budget for this year's Challenge program was increased.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, the Challenge program cannot be said to be a great success. In many areas of the country we have unemployment rates for students which are double and triple the annual average over the past few years. Specifically I want to deal with the high school students.

Will the minister implement a program specifically designed to help high school students get summer employment because many of these will be going into our universities and they will be facing a very bleak future if they do not get these jobs.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I recommend that my hon. colleague look at what the government has done. We do have a program to that effect exactly, where priority is given to high school students. Recently I announced the opening of more that 400 student centres for summer employment, particularly aimed at high school students.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed in an interesting way to the minister of fisheries who answered questions for the Minister of Transport, who is sitting in the House, directed by the member for Halifax and the member for Dartmouth. I hope the minister of fisheries in his capacity for ACOA was answering the question. Otherwise I think we had better have some points of order at some stage as to what is going on.

Even though the Minister of Transport was sitting here in the House, assuming that the minister was answering on his behalf of ACOA and admitting in part some of the answer of the minister about the world-wide situation, is the minister aware, as he was being briefed by the member for Halifax West, that three years ago the Halifax Court Commission brought up their proposal and warned the transport committee and other relevant ministers about the situation in the port of Halifax vis-à-vis New York, Montreal and/or container shipments?

Will the minister responsible for ACOA let this House know what ACOA is prepared to do in diverting ACOA moneys to help finance the bridging problems for the double stacking? How close is the Crown corporation and CN agreeing with the Government of Nova Scotia concerning the double stacking and help for Halifax?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am more than pleased to have a question to answer from a former colleague on this side of the House who, as usual, has asked the only relevant and pertinent question in the House today.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: The situation with respect to the transportation of container traffic through Halifax to Montreal and points west is not something that has come up overnight.

The possibility has been known about for some time, and discussions have proceeded between the Government of Canada, CN, the Government of Nova Scotia and interested persons in the port of Halifax itself to try to see what can be done either to avert or overcome that problem. It is still being worked upon, particularly with respect to the question of double stacking of railroad cars.

In addition, I have been reminded that on several occasions when attempts were made on this side of the House with respect to Coast Guard operations and the use of ice-breakers in keeping certain rivers open and the question of user fees, tremendous opposition has come from the Official Opposition side of the House.

At one point, there was a filibuster actually undertaken by the member for the west coast of Newfoundland, Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. He began a filibuster to prevent such user fees being charged. On another occasion, the member for Kingston—

Mr. Speaker: I think we are getting away from the question. The hon. member, a short supplementary.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Very short, Mr. Speaker.

I would have been interested in hearing what the situation was in terms of the discussions that had taken place several years ago about the diversion of ACOA moneys to help in the financing for the bridging problem with the double stacking.

Since my hon. friend brought up the question of user fees, I would hope that either he had talked to the Minister of Transport to make sure—he can check the facts on this—that the fees for the pilotage of the Atlantic Pilotage Authority where it is now recovery is treated on the same basis as the Laurentian Pilotage Authority which is not following the government direction.

Would he or perhaps the Minister of Transport, who is the real minister here, please give a report to the House on that?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): I know, Mr. Speaker, that I am addressing a real member with respect to that question.

On the question of these port charges, I will have to check into that and get the hon. member a report on what exactly has happened.

With respect to the question of ACOA, if it can play a useful role in this situation, it will as it always does in Atlantic Canada.

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of Transport.

The railway routes in remote areas are presently the subject of a comprehensive study examined by Transport Canada and the relevant provincial governments.

My question is as follows: Can the minister tell us today when this study will be publicly released and when it will be completed?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I admire the hon. member for Abitibi for his perseverance in dealing with this important issue. I want to assure him once again that we have indeed received the study that he is mentioning and that we have also received an interim report from the Royal Commission on Passenger Transportation.

The Royal Commission is making interim recommendations concerning this type of routes and we will certainly be able to answer the question of the hon. member within a few weeks.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

This week 20,000 truck loads of contaminated and toxic soil will be removed from the Expo site in Vancouver and dumped on federal land belonging to the Fraser River Harbour Commission, only one kilometre from the Fraser River.

This decision was made behind closed doors without any consultation. A toxic dump on federal land next to a key fishery is unacceptable. A toxic dump next to prime farmland on federal land is unacceptable.

Will the minister immediately stop this proposed dump and start an environmental assessment review process? Further, will he announce his plans in the green plan for the clean up of the Fraser River?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to find out that the New Democratic Party has become fans of the green plan lately because that was not the case before.

I will be very happy to consider the request made by the hon. member. On the specific issue she brings up in the House, my understanding is that the Fraser Valley Harbour Commission is doing an initial assessment. Out of that initial assessment, which I will be happy to look at, we will then determine what course of action is the best considering whatever the assessment would come up with.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the trucking of this toxic and contaminated soil is to start this week. There has been no assessment. If this soil is too bad to have residential development on it and has to be trucked out of the Expo lands, why is it fit for soil dumping one kilometre from the Fraser River, next to a very important fishery, right next to prime agricultural land in the metropolitan area of Vancouver? Will the minister stop the dumping this week and start the EARP today?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I have already said. My understanding is that the Fraser Valley Harbour Commission is doing an initial assessment of what this soil contains. I will be very happy to look at that report once it will have been forwarded to me and to act upon it.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Last Friday, in response to a question regarding CP Rail's possible diversion of trains through the United States, which could result in the elimination of at least 200 trains per year going through Manitoba, thereby hurting Winnipeg, Brandon and other western communities once again, the minister said: "It is not up to government to make business decisions." Agreed.

Does the minister know that CP Rail has received and continues to receive hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money in subsidies to improve east-west transportation links? Will the minister intervene immediately? Will the minister meet with the CP president now in order to save western Canadian jobs?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the hon. member would be consistent in his examination of this situation. He mentioned in his question that CP Rail is getting some grants from the Government of Canada. We determined, very long ago, that we wanted all business enterprises in Canada to be self-supporting and to reduce the burden of grants that are given by the taxpayers through the government to transportation companies.

At the same time, we want these companies to be competitive. We are working in close co-operation with CP, CN and the other transportation industries to make sure that they are capable of meeting the competition.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the minister is removing subsidies from grains.

Through policies such as privatization and deregulation, the government continues to destroy the trucking and rail passenger industries. Why is the government doing the same to the railway freight system?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the member does not seem to have understood. We want all the industries in Canada to be competitive. We are taking all the necessary measures to make sure that they become competitive. It is only by being competitive that they will remain in business and will provide jobs for Canadian rather than having subsidized jobs.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, earlier today some of the questions that we heard from the opposite side bordered on personal attack and were very close to imputing motives to certain ministers.

It seems to me that some of these questions were not in spirit of this House, nor in the spirit of what is prescribed by Beauchesne and certainly not in the spirit of what we have pledged as a new order of conduct in the House of Commons. I would hope that hon. members in the future would choose their words more carefully because I know that they would want this House to reflect well in the public eye.

PRIVILEGE

ACTION BROUGHT BY BERNARD ROY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege to inform the House about a matter concluded this month, which began in 1988 when I was sued by Bernard Roy, who was then the personal principal secretary of the Prime Minister, on the grounds of slander for statements that I made about him outside this Chamber.

I would like to inform the House that in the past few weeks the action was dismissed and my lawyer's costs were paid.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1991–92

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1992, was presented by the President of the Treasury Board and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there are some difficulties on this side. I do not believe the minister's microphone was turned on. Some people would say that the minister's lights have been out for quite some time. I would not say that.

Perhaps the hon. minister could rise while the microphone is being turned on and speak slowly so that his colleagues in the front and members opposite may hear.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Orders 81(5) and (6), I move:

> That the Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992, tabled this day, be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PROCEEDS OF CRIME (MONEY LAUNDERING) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-9, an Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, be read the first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-208, an Act to amend the Department of Agriculture Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to amend the Department of Agriculture Act.

[English]

The purpose of the bill is to delete the section of the act which permits the Governor in Council to assign powers or duties to the Minister of Agriculture. These powers are currently used to create new agricultural programs. The report of the Auditor General of Canada tabled in this House, I believe in 1989, recommended that this power be deleted from the act. This bill carries out that purpose and will require the minister to come to the House if he seeks to establish a new agricultural program rather than create it on his own without proper authority.

That is the purpose of the amendment to the act. It is a short and very simple act which I hope will commend itself to all hon. members.

SALARY INCREASES

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition sent to me recently by a number of Public Service employees of Agriculture Canada, the Summerland Research Station in particular: "Whereas the government has introduced a new budget which outlines the need for fiscal restraint in this time of recession; and whereas the government has imposed a zero per cent wage hike ceiling on federal public employees for 1991; and whereas the recent 10 per cent total pay increase given to members of Parliament should be rolled back in keeping with this policy of restraint, wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to implement the aforesaid request."

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens from the great city of Logan Lake, British Columbia, who are concerned about the government's decision to cut back on Royal Canadian Mounted Police funding.

They point out in a number of ways how this has affected their community, how this may result in increased levels of lawlessness throughout the region and are asking the Government of Canada to reconsider its funding cuts to the RCMP and provide the police force with a mandate and the ability to continue its role as the only visible police force for many British Columbia communities and a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

NATIONAL EDUCATION STANDARDS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it has been over two years since I started working on a project that calls on the federal government to introduce national education standards.

We have circulated petitions across Canada and I am happy today to introduce one of those petitions in the House. The people who signed it come from the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and others.

Today I will introduce this petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, calling on the government to promote and encourage the institution of national education standards in consultation with the provincial and territorial governments and in consultation with educational and professional industry, labour, parents, youths, volunteer organizations and individual Canadians.

CANADA POST

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present 59 petitions with over 1,500 signatures from the residents of Mabou, Nova Scotia, who are fighting to keep their post office alive.

Mabou has been a thriving community since the 1820s and its post office, serving 410 households, is located in and represents the very heart of this proud community. The petitioners protest the closure of the their post office and petition the government to (1) reverse the decision, and (2) ensure that residents have a say in how postal service is provided to their community, before any decisions are made.

The government can no longer ignore the voices of rural Canadians.

CHILD POVERTY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition from constituents from my riding who are addressing the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

This government has declared its intention to ratify this convention, but the political will must be there. These petitioners are very concerned that we have one in six children in this country who presently live in poverty. They are asking that this government now, even before final ratification, institute programs which will help and support those children who are presently living in poverty.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present yet another petition, signed by residents of Kingston and The Islands, protesting the desecration and destruction of the Canadian flag and calling upon this House to pass a law making it an offence to destroy or desecrate the flag of this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition on the goods and services tax. This particular petition was signed by my constituents living on Black Creek Boulevard, at 250 Scarlett Road, on Sandcliffe Road, on Cayuga Avenue and on a number of other streets within my constituency. They are urging this government to finally come to its senses and to realize that the goods and services tax is destroying this country and to rescind it immediately forthwith.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition wherein the petitioners humbly sheweth that this government has cut back millions of dollars to RCMP services throughout Canada, resulting in a multi-million dollar loss to British Columbia, and the consequences of these cuts have been the reduction and erosion of service and effectiveness of police protection.

The results of these cuts have been the reduction of training, patrols and travelling expenses for the RCMP serving our communities. We, the undersigned, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the RCMP so that it can fulfil its mandate and role as the visible police force for communities across British Columbia and remain as a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Certain items on the Order Papers die on prorogation, including all the questions that are on the Order Paper.

This House has agreed to revive certain government bills. One of them, in fact, was passed last Thursday.

I was wondering if the government might be willing to revive certain Order Paper questions, particularly question 501 which I tabled last April 11 and would run out today in the ordinary course of events.

The question asks the government to give us information regarding its cuts to CUSO, OCSD, Canadian Teachers' Federation, Canadian World Youth, Canadian Crosswords International and CECI, and what the specific criteria was.

I was wondering if the government would consider reinstating these questions as part of the process of allowing things to go past prorogation.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member raised the question. In fact, we have on the Order Paper right at this very moment a motion to reinstate a number of government bills.

Perhaps the hon. member would want to speak with his House leader to see if there might be agreement to pass that motion on a nod.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago I rose in this Chamber to participate in the debate on the proposed changes to the rules of the House. In that speech, I pointed out that there is a breakdown in our parliamentary system.

I also attempted to show the principles behind our parliamentary system and how important it is that members of the government recognize those principles in order for our democracy to work.

My comments have clearly fallen on deaf ears. Today I rise to participate in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. The Speech from the Throne is the cause of summons. Simply stated, members of Parliament are summoned here to Ottawa to consider legislation and taxation which the cabinet claims it needs in order to govern. Our mandate as elected members is clear. We have been sent here to Parliament to represent our constituents' interests when we consider the cabinet's requests.

The reason there is such ceremony surrounding the cabinet's request is to symbolize for all Canadians—including ourselves, members of the other place, and ministers of the Crown—the supremacy of the legislature over the executive branch.

On Monday, May 13, we heard several reasons why we were summoned here to Ottawa. One of those reasons was to consider proposals from the cabinet to once again change the way we operate in this Chamber and I quote:

> My government will propose further reform so that all Members of Parliament can better fulfil their obligations to their constituents.

What right does the executive branch have to interfere in the operations of this Chamber?

Another of the reasons we were summoned to Ottawa was for the cabinet to inform us that it intended to establish a parliamentary committee to study the proposal to amend the Constitution.

• (1520)

This committee will, according to the Speech from the Throne:

> Travel in order to hear the views of men and women across Canada. In each jurisdiction it visits, the committee will be mandated to meet in public session with its counterpart provincial or territorial legislative committee or, where no such committee exists, with counterpart legislators.

How could the cabinet announce that we will be establishing another committee when the original committee has not yet even reported? I do not ask this question to be facetious. The Speech from the Throne said:

The respect of the people for a Parliament and for Parliamentarians is essential for a healthy democracy. But the appearance, and sometimes the reality, of excessive party discipline—

—among other things, has—

—eroded that respect in Canada.

The only way the cabinet could have included it in its Speech from the Throne and announced that there will be a committee of Parliament is if it intends to use party discipline to force us to establish it. The hypocrisy of it all.

I would remind the government once again that the committee to amend the Constitution has not yet reported. There is an inherent flaw in logic for the government to pre-empt the work of one parliamentary committee on the grounds that it believes the work of parliamentary committees to be essential. If it respects parliamentary committees, it should be waiting for this committee to recommend how to proceed. If it has no respect for the parliamentary committees, then it should not use them as a mechanism to amend the Constitution.

On May 13 we heard more of the reasons why we were summoned to Ottawa. The cabinet wishes us to consider legislation that it believes will improve unity, prosperity and government responsiveness. On Tuesday the hon. Leader of the Opposition pointed out that the government's policies in the last seven years have resulted in the unequivocal loss of the Canadian public's confidence in the government's ability to run this country effectively.

I agree with the Canadian public and with the Leader of the Official Opposition. However, it is important that the people of Canada realize that it is not the political system that has failed them but the Conservative government that has failed them. Why should the Canadian people believe anything this government proposes in this next session?

The truth is that this government has not honoured the public trust which empowered it to form a government. It has not provided effective legislation. It is time for this government to take some real initiative. This government is a non-committal government. It is not committed to its social policies. It is not committed to its environmental policies. It is not even committed to Canadian unity.

How can we possibly believe that the government is, in any way, committed to the Canadian public.

The cabinet's agenda of some weeks ago confirmed this government's lack of commitment to the Canadian public. It confirmed this government's lack of substance and it confirmed the lack of any effective plan to launch Canada into the 21st century.

The only thing this government is committed to is double digit unemployment, the GST and economic disparity.

I remind the House that at a time when it is imperative for Canada to increase its competitiveness in the world economy, funds have been slashed for education, training and research and development. The very foundations of our economic competitiveness and prosperity are being deliberately and systematically eroded.

Further, while the government eloquently espouses its vision of restructuring the economy, the only vision this government is providing Canadians, after seven years of economic brutality, is that of workers standing on street corners or in unemployment lines. The government has not provided programs to deal with the impact of the free trade agreement. The government has not provided relief for the 1.4 million unemployed Canadians. Nor has the government protected low income Canadians from the GST.

What the government has provided is the first ever made-in-Canada recession, record bankruptcies and government policies directly responsible for an increased deficit. A strong economy is the basis for a united country.

I do not understand how this government can put this country's constitutional crisis on hold again. Why is this government waiting for another committee report? I would suggest that the government is stalling for more time.

They have tried unsuccessfully in the past to resolve these matters. Why would Canadians have confidence in the record of these successive failures? We must solve the constitutional problems immediately so we can move on to the other problems this government has created.

One more item in the throne speech was a commitment to reduce trade barriers between provinces, something that this government has talked about for years now, and still no real solutions have been developed. How can this government be concerned with interprovincial trade when every initiative it has taken since its initial election has worked against that goal? In 1988, it finalized the free trade agreement with the United States. The free trade agreement works against the concept of cross-Canadian interprovincial trade.

This government talks about education, but how can the government expect provinces to pay for the education cost, to pay for regional development, to reduce illiteracy and to reduce the number of unemployed when it systematically cuts transfer payments? How can we educate with no money? How can we create jobs when every day more and more people become unemployed directly as a result of this government's untenable employment policies.

If there is a lack of productivity in this country, it is due to cutbacks in research and development, cutbacks in transfer payments, cutbacks in education funding and cutbacks in retraining and training programs. How can the government demand Canadian workers to increase its productivity when it ties the hands of these workers behind their backs?

If I may quote from Senator Hubert Humphrey's last speech in 1977, he said:

> The moral test of government is how it treats those who are in the dawn of life, the children; those who are in the twilight of life, the aged; and those who are in the shadows of life, the sick, the needy and the handicapped.

How can this government believe it has the moral wherewithal to govern?

The Speech from the Throne spoke of non-partisanship as essential for Parliament to operate. The Prime Minister asks that the opposition recognize its dual role as partisan politicians and parliamentarians.

I would suggest in closing that if the Prime Minister would recognize his dual roles as an elected member of Parliament and as an appointed head of the executive branch, his government would be well on its way to achieving unity, prosperity and government responsiveness.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his analysis of the Speech from the Throne. I thought there were some perceptive comments, and I would just like to ask a question or two.

Last Friday he was in the House when I detailed some of the cuts to western Canadian provinces undertaken by this government. Many of those he has mentioned here today. These have also ravaged the Atlantic provinces.

I was particularly concerned about the increases that the government is intending to demand of western, northern and Atlantic Canadians with respect to the RCMP contracts.

Today in the House I mentioned how the government was pursuing, possibly by not intervening, the support of CP Rail's potential plans to route trains to the U.S. rather than to Canada, thereby eliminating Canadian jobs and thereby not collecting on fuel taxes, which would be a blow to Manitoba and other western provinces. The government has pursued and continues to pursue policies that are devastating to the whole of Canada.

My question is a very simple one. Can Canadians truly believe that a Speech from the Throne such as the one that was just brought before this House will make any difference at all to the unity problems we are experiencing in this country, to the serious economic problems that Canadians are exposed to?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for the comments and the question that he has put forward.

Again I just want to reiterate what I have said so many times in this House. What has happened over the last number of years, deliberately or otherwise, to the regions of this country is that there has been the whittling away of the institutions that we came to regard as part of our Canadian system. No longer do we see these transfer payments coming, and I say this because I mean it. I believe we would like nothing better in the regions where we live than to get away from this transfer payment system. Until something is put in place we are not going to be able to do that. We are not going to be able to do it in Atlantic Canada, in western Canada or in northern Canada.

I believe some days that this government deliberately does this to our regions of the country, but hopefully not so. We talk about Canadian unity, but if the standard of living is not the same in the regions across this country as it is in the central part of the country then definitely we are not going to have Canadian unity. We are going to pair one part of the country off against the other.

We see another issue on the east coast where the container ports are moving to central Canada because of the rates charged by CNR. I believe this government and any other government in this country still have to play a role in such vital areas as transportation. They have to bring subsidies to bear in some instances so that we can get the goods and services to the markets of this country.

I believe that as long as we keep pitting the regions against one another no matter how many committees we have going across this country we are not going to have unity.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to thank my friend and colleague for his excellent speech in the House. His constituents are well represented. Indeed, since his election in 1988 he has been an outspoken advocate, not only in our caucus but in this House, with respect to the best wishes of the people of Prince Edward Island.

I would like to ask the hon. member, in terms of government policy over the last six and a half years since this government has been in office: Would he consider that the lifestyle or standard of living in his native province of Prince Edward Island has improved, or are Islanders worse off than they were in 1984?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I want to make one brief mention of the University of Prince Edward Island today. When the students return to the classrooms this fall their tuition fees will be going up 15 per cent. That says quite a bit because we have seen a great reduction in the transfer payments in this area of the country. I believe that if there is some way to get away from having these transfer payments eventually, there will be no one happier than Prince Edward Islanders and Atlantic Canadians in general.

We have not reached that area yet. This government has continued to erode and cut back these payments, and certainly the unemployment rate is up. The money for job training or job training itself has not yet come to pass, so many Prince Edward Islanders and I have seen that things have certainly not improved in the last number of years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Jonquière has the floor for 10 minutes.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I appreciate having this opportunity to take part today in the debate on the recent Speech from the Throne. It probably was the most important in modern Canadian history, as it deals with three absolutely fundamental issues.

These are national unity, prosperity and government efficiency. I believe it is the most important made in Canada in the twentieth century because, as we know, Canada could well split up in the next 18 months if no solution is found to settle the national unity issue.

Since the Constitution was patriated in 1982, Quebec has been excluded from the present Constitution and has refused to participate in any constitutional conference, even more so considering the outcome of the last attempt, with the Meech initiative.

So, Quebec, more than ever, feels cornered and is not participating in any conference, hence the potential for a split within 18 months. I mentionned I was happy to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, because, while my government and our Prime Minister were preparing the Speech from the Throne, my colleagues on the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee and myself were travelling all over the country in an attempt to find a way out of the present constitutional deadlock.

As a matter of fact, we have a four-point mandate to answer the following questions: Should we or should we not hold a referendum? Does the existing constitutional amending formula meet our needs? Should it be changed and, if so, what should it be? Finally, should a constituent assembly be set up to solve our constitutional problems? Add to that the issue of public participation. Let us not forget that Canadians do not want a rerun of what they have seen on television during the Meech episode, with individuals making decisions behind closed doors on what the Constitution of Canada should be. Now, the Canadian people want to take part in the process.

So, the importance of the Speech from the Throne is clear in relation to national unity which is linked to prosperity. Constitutional problems of course cannot help this country's economic situation. We can see what is happening with the unemployment level still climbing. I don't think anyone likes the economic situation we are in and we must strive to find ways to bring that level down, to ensure that more jobs and opportunities are available to the Canadians people.

That being said, I would also like to talk about prosperity, Mr. Speaker. We have set targets. By the year 2000, we want to have created 2,5 million new jobs. We are also going to try and raise the real incomes of Canadians by 25 percent. But all that is linked to the issue of Canadian unity. Unless we come up with an answer within the next 18 months, nothing will do. On the contrary, times will be tough for Quebec and all of Canada.

The Speech from the Throne also mentions an important subject, education; our government talks about national objectives for education. That startles many people, since education is under provincial jurisdiction, especially in Quebec. But basically, in the present debate, the whole question of power sharing under the Constitution must be reviewed. Is it good and desirable for Canada to set national standards and ask the provinces to apply them in accordance with their own particular characteristics? Let us take health as an example. The central government sets standards and objectives for health and tells the provinces to apply them on the basis of their needs. Quebec has its own health care system of which it is proud.

Of course, gradually things must change. We must evolve on the basis of our society's present needs. Quebec wants some changes. Should national health standards be reviewed and updated? Why not?

The same thing applies to education. Ideally, instead of each province setting its own standards in a disconnected way from the others, is it not time to think that it might be much better if we had national standards for education?

We talk about free trade and economic exchanges among the provinces and section 6(2)(a) of the Constitution says that all Canadians can settle in any province of the country. If your child leaves a province with its own education system and goes to another province where things are completely different and there are no national standards and no unity in all this, is that good or should we not review this thoroughly to see how it could be changed? But the federal government must not say, "This is the true standard and how we will apply it." It must not be done unilaterally but in cooperation with the provincial ministers and coordinated with them. They together should consider what national standards we should have. Furthermore, these standards should be reviewed periodically because it is no use having standards, an unreachable ideal, if the provinces do not have the money they need to reach those standards.

So when we talk about constitutional reform, with the coming changes, we must review all that.

Mr. Speaker, I still think that Quebec will be part of the next Constitution—and I am sure there will be a new one. It will not be perfect, but if we manage to change the amending formula in order to get rid of the unanimity rule, then, even flawed, our new Constitution would at least enable us to make future changes.

I would like to make an important point, Mr. Speaker, because I heard some of my colleagues talk about equalization. I happened to read in Le Réveil, a local newspaper from my constituency of Jonquière, an editorial written by Mr. Marcel Martel, who was saying: "Per capita, the Tories give out $548 to Quebec and $1,652 to Newfoundland. Thanks to his Conservative buddies, Clyde Wells must be having a good laugh. Try to figure this one out."

Mr. Speaker, that shows how people do not understand how transfer payments work. There are three kinds of transfer payments: the Established Programs Financing, the equalization payments, and the Canada Assistance Plan.

What is the Established Programs Financing? It is funding given to the provinces for health care and post-secondary education among other things. In 1991-1992, the Established Programs Financing totalled $20 billion, of which $5 billion went to Quebec. Equalization payments are the second most important type of transfer payments to the provinces. Out of $8 billion given out in equalization, Quebec received $3.8 billion, and Newfoundland $938 million. That is what we mean, Mr. Speaker, when we say figures can be misleading. To say Quebec receive only $548 per capita, while Newfoundland get $1,652 is like saying Quebec is not getting any subsidy. Now, wait just a moment! Newfoundland has a population of 560,000 people; if you multiply 560,000 by $1,652 and then 6.6 million by $548, you will see that Quebec is receiving a lot more than Newfoundland. You have to be cautious when you use these figures.

Quebec is among the provinces receiving more equalization payments than others. In fact, three provinces get no equalization payment at all, Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. Other provinces receive payments because they are not as prosperous. That is called equalization. Rich provinces pay for poorer ones. It could very well be that 30 years from now, Newfoundland, thanks to an extraordinary find, will contribute more for British Columbia or Quebec. That is the way our country works. Rich provinces should contribute to help poorer provinces. That is nothing to be sad about. It is the very basis of our country and of equalization.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important Speech from the Throne with three themes: unity, prosperity and government responsiveness. Those are three essential issues. We have to find a way out of the constitutional impasse in the next 18 months.

Our Beaudoin–Edwards committee will report to this House by the beginning of July and other committees will try and solve the problems of Senate reform, division of powers and aboriginal rights.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments for a five minutes period. The hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the comments made by my hon. colleague with whom I sit on the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee and with whom I worked a lot and expect to work even harder in the next few days.

He mentioned, if I understood him well, that Canadian unity had an economic dimension. Personally, I believe it. Without "economic harmony" across this country, can we have unity? I do not think so, and that is more or less what my colleague from my party just said.

But the question I want to ask, and I do not mmention it out of spite, is why this government, for example, might allow CP Rail to reroute its trains through the United States? It seems to me that could entail possible job losses for Manitoba, for Winnipeg, Brandon and other Western provinces. Allowing such a move, to my mind, would worsen the economic situation and tear the country apart even further, and destroy the bonds already established. That was my first question.

Now a second one. He talked about national objectives, and I really appreciated his remarks, because I believe that we can have national objectives provided they are set in a cooperative way. They should not be imposed by a level on another one; I believe that we have to work together in order to improve the economic situation, national unity, etc.

Does he believe that a new federalism would be fundamentally based on the principle of cooperation?

Mr. Jean–Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, in response to the first comment or question of my hon. colleague, I would like to remind him that, in the last few years, the government has endeavoured to expand our market in the world.

Canada cannot do business only within its borders, since it exports 30 per cent of its production. Trade between Canada and the United States is a $200 billion a year business. If we look at the provinces, Ontario's exports to Quebec, for instance, total $21 billion annually, whereas Quebec exports to Ontario amount to $17.9 billion.

In that context, and that also applies to our Crown corporations in the transport industry, we must look to foreign markets, among which is our closest partner, the United States, and Mexico, with whom we are working on a free trade agreement.

Moreover, one must not forget that, as of next December, we will have to compete with an economic union composed of 12 European countries. We will then have to face international competition.

That also explains why it is important, in the field of education, that Canada improve its record as regards technology. We are presently not performing well enough in that field and there is room for improvement. The same is true in the field of education, of course, since those two fields are directly related.

What will be the outcome of the next constitutional conference? What will be the powers of Quebec? Will the situation be completely different? It is too early to tell; nobody knows yet, but it is clear that federalism must be changed and renewed. Yesterday, I was pleased to see your leader, Mr. Chrétien, say that Quebec should have a right of veto. This is an issue that our committee has discussed on numerous occasions, namely that Quebec should have a form of protection enshrined in the next Constitution.

That being said, let's wait and see. First, there is the report that will be tabled by our Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, and then the Spicer Commission report will be tabled by July 1st. There is another joint commission of members and senators, that will travel across the country and meet their provincial counterparts. Following that, the government will be in a position to put forward a new constitutional proposal aimed at making sure that Quebec can again be part of the Canadian family and prosper within that context.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Terrebonne.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity today to take part in the debate on the Speech from the Throne.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to share some thoughts with my colleagues regarding the intention expressed by my government in the Speech from the Throne to set national goals in education.

If I get into this subject, Mr. Speaker, it is because it appears to have been misunderstood by some members of this House. You know, over the last few days, we have heard some members of this House complain about interference. Others hide behind the curtains, Mr. Speaker. Why? Because the government wants our young people to have access some day to a lucrative and rewarding job. And why, Mr. Speaker? Because this government wants to give future generations of Quebecers and Canadians, men and women, an opportunity to enjoy an even better quality of life.

Why do members hide behind the curtains and shout "murder"? Because our government reacts when our country is about to miss the turn towards an increasingly competitive global economy.

Mr. Speaker, they shout "murder" and they hide behind the curtains. It may be the best way for them to avoid speaking on the issue when they have nothing sensible to say. But, nevertheless, there are facts that deserve that we go beyond partisan politics.

Thirty per cent of our students drop out of high school before graduating. Is that acceptable? No, it is not acceptable. Should we remain silent when the demographers predict that Canada will soon be a country with hardly no manpower? Should we keep doing nothing when we know that half of all the jobs that will be created between 1990 and 1999 will require more than five years of training after high school? Should we close our eyes on the fact that today, only 60 per cent of our workers graduate from high school?

Mr. Speaker, should we not at least react when we learn that Canadian employers spend half of what our neighbours to the South spend for the training of their employees, and eight times less than what the Germans spend? Should we give up all of our responsibilities because we know that our future prosperity depends on the knowledge and the skills that Canadian men and women will have acquired? Should we keep our eyes closed? No. The world and the global economy are going through a phase of radical change. Borders are opening up. Economical and political blocks are emerging. Competition is constantly increasing. We cannot afford to miss the train. We must adapt. We must train our manpower. We must prepare our workers for the future. That is the challenge we have to face and that is what is proposed in the Speech from the Throne.

Quebec found its identity in the early sixties. At that time, Quebecers really took their destiny into their hands. That is the period that was, and still is, called the Quiet Revolution. That revolution that put Quebec on the way of a new prosperity didn't come about by itself. Around the same time, the Parent Report led to a reform of the Quebec education system. That is almost 30 years ago.

Today, when a revolution is already under way in the world economy, it seems more and more that results achieved in education will be clearly insufficient to guarantee all Canadians a prosperous future. To benefit from this revolution, we must go back to the drawing board, rethink our approach to education and, instead of missing the whole point, we must discuss the question together and find solutions to the problem.

In spite of all this, Mr. Speaker, there are still members in this House who are opposed to the fact the government wants to prepare Canadian men and women to face the challenges of year 2000. For what reason? Because they say that education is a provincial responsibility. But we have always recognized this and we still do. It is written in black and white in the Speech from the Throne and I quote:

> My government recognizes that education is a provincial responsibility under the Constitution and respects that fact.

I think it is very clear, Mr. Speaker. The Premier of Quebec himself, who strongly defends Quebecers' interests, said, and I quote:

> We must discuss some form of cooperation for common goals. We do not see why we should refuse to discuss.

Mr. Speaker, after the Meech Lake failure, the Premier of Quebec stated that his province would have discussions with Ottawa only if Quebec's interests were directly concerned. I believe this is the case.

Quebec is an integral part of the Canadian economic union. It largely benefits from its trade with other provinces since it sells more goods and services in Canada than on foreign markets. It's by opting freely for the federal system, while asserting our distinct identity, that we were able to create our prosperity. That is a system where the provinces are sovereign in their respective jurisdictions, but in which all Canadians have their say on matters which concern the entire country.

Besides, the Bélanger–Campeau Commission Report, that some hon. members in this House should read entirely, states with good reason that: "Federalism, as a political organization principle, is characterized by the flexibility of the arrangements and structures that it makes possible".

So, Mr. Speaker, this government always believed in recognizing the regional diversity of the country. By meeting the demands of Quebec in the Meech Lake Accord, this government was recognizing, not only the distinct identity of Quebec, but also the right of the provinces to opt out of national programs, with compensation, when they thought they could administer more effectively these programs. That was the spirit of the Meech Lake Accord and it is still implicit on this government's actions. So, the discussions that this government will have with the provinces as far as education and training are concerned, will be consistent with this spirit.

Since 1984, our government has taken a lot of initiatives to prepare Canada for the challenges of the year 2000. When we came to power in 1984, you will recall that our country was dangerously mismanaged and heavily in debt. We have not taken the easy way out and we have put in place tools to garantee our prosperity.

A more responsible management allowed us to slow down the growth of deficit. The Free Trade Agreement, taxation reform, privatization initiatives, government spending cuts and a new labour force development strategy are all contributing to a potential enhancement of productivity, flexibility and adaptability, which will be critical to ensure a remarkable quality of life to all Canadians in the Twenty–First Century.

Our initiatives have given results. Since 1984, Japan is the only country that has known a growth higher than Canada's. As regards jobs creation, Canada has been one of the most performing countries of the G–7. But our future also depends on our ability to train workers with more instruction and who are more and more skilled and specialized.

I know that my time is almost over, Mr. Speaker, but if you will allow me, I would just add that quality of life of Quebecers and Canadians is not only a question of exclusive competence or a question of jurisdiction. Quality of life is everyone's concern and it is the responsibility of everyone without exception.

As you know, my Francophone Liberal friends of Quebec talk about the problem of Constitution which has to be solved as soon as possible. They talk about unity, national consensus, but they have signed the repatriation in 1982 without Quebec, a mistake which we have been trying to rectify since then.

The Liberal strategy, Mr. Speaker, must have something machiavellian because the party of the hon. member for Beauséjour has adopted this weekend in Sherbrooke a constitutional position copied from Meech Lake Accord.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, because I know that my time is almost over, our mission is clear. We are going to continue to work so that the Canadians can continue to be able to benefit from a competitive economy. We have never changed our goals since 1984 and we will not change them in the future. The Speech from the Throne shows that we are determined to reinforce the Canadian unity and our prosperity because both are linked.

By taking maximum advantage of the individuals and the richest education systems in the world, we will be able to compete with any country. The sustainable prosperity that will result will ensure the unity of our country for the benefit of all Quebecers and of the entire Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments for five minutes. The hon. member from Welland—St.Catharines—Thorold.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, my colleague made a very interesting speech, and I firmly believe that he believes everything he is saying. However, the fact of the matter is that in 1980 the Constitution was repatriated to Canada. Mr. Levesque, then premier, and Mr. Laurin, one of the negotiators for Quebec at that time, stated publicly and subsequently wrote in books that the province of Quebec, for which they were negotiating, would not have agreed to any form of repatriation of the Constitution or any form of the charter of rights.

• (1600)

I have two questions: Was the member aware of that, and what comments would he have to make on this statement?

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. But, I would like to correct an important detail. First, the patriation of the Constitution did not take place in 1980, but in 1982. In 1980, it was the referendum.

Second, of course, Mr. Laurin made some statements at the time, but I think my honourable friend should rather stick to facts instead of paying to much attention to the statements of Mr. Laurin, at the time. Here are the facts, Mr. Speaker. At that time, Quebec was sitting at the table for the patriation of the Constitution and everybody will remember very well that Quebec and all provinces were about to find a constitutionnal arrangement. Anyway, for his information, I would refer my honourable colleague to the book written by the former Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Trudeau, and more specifically to the chapter written by his present leader, Mr. Chrétien. If he refers to these passages, his present leader, the member for Beauséjour, says it clearly. You will remember the famous night of the long knives and the ploy of the present leader of the Liberal party and member for Beauséjour to prevent an agreement that was about to be made. Really, six or seven provinces were in agreement with the Quebec requests and were ready to conclude an agreement with the other provinces, Mr. Speaker.

Then, when my colleague referred us to the statements of Mr. Laurin, he should also refer us to those of Mr. Lévesque, Morin and several other democratically elected representatives of Quebec who often referred to this night of the long knives. I think it is of public knowledge. You know and all Quebecers know, that against tremendous odds, there was a will, at that time. At the time of the referendum, Quebec had said no to separation, but yes to a renewed federalism. That renewed federalism was never delivered, Mr. Speaker.

At that time, did Quebec see the Constitutionnal Accord of 1982, the patriation of the Constitution, as a renewed federalism? I do not think so. And rightfully, Mr. Speaker, the democratically elected representatives of the time, as well as all Quebecers, did not consider it as the promise that had been made to them.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Southeast): Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member, whom I find very sincere, tell us whether he is for or against an elected Senate, that is elected, for instance, by the men and women of Quebec? Is he for or against that?

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I would remind my hon. colleague that I have unfortunately not addressed that issue in my speech. All I can tell him at this moment is that we must not forget that committees will be struck when convenient to discuss all those issues. And I think that today, not only Quebec's demands, but obviously those of the various regions of Canada must be taken in due consideration. I am sure that, united in their discussions and a consensus, Canadians will be able to find solutions acceptable to Quebec as much as to the rest of the country.

I am from Quebec, and my riding is 98 per cent French- speaking, Mr. Speaker, and I can assure you that we are very open-minded. And the people of my riding, as well as the population of the rest of Quebec, are ready to discuss not only the specific problems of Quebec, but also those of the whole country.

I remain very confident that we will ultimately arrive at a solution acceptable to all.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have a chance to participate in the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Although very much has already been said, more needs to be said, mainly about the shortcomings of the Speech from the Throne. I wish to concentrate particularly on matters relating to the free trade agreement with the United States and the proposed North American free trade agreement.

The Prime Minister made the bold statement that "the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement has helped to secure the Canadian economy in difficult times".

He went on in the next paragraph to say:

> My government believes North America-wide free trade is a logical next step and one that would increase the prosperity of all Canadians if an acceptable agreement can be negotiated with Mexico and the United States.

Most Canadians now reject the confident statement that the Prime Minister made in that first paragraph, and therefore they distrust entirely whether the agreement that may be made with the United States and Mexico will be acceptable to Canadians. Whether it is acceptable to the Prime Minister and some of his friends or not is another matter.

As has been pointed out many times, the Prime Minister promised 250,000 new jobs in the first year after the free trade agreement. In the first two years and almost a half we have lost over 400,000 jobs, perhaps not all caused by the free trade agreement but many of them, and we cannot find those new jobs that the Prime Minister promised us.

We have been losing jobs in the food and beverage industry, in the forest industry—not a few jobs here but thousands and thousands—in the clothing industry, in the electrical and electronic products industry. The workers in those industries know where their jobs have gone. For the most part they have gone south, either to the United States or already many of them to Mexico because the free trade agreement is already bringing in Mexican products at 10 per cent wages under the guise of American products.

Canadians have now begun to see the proposed North American free trade agreement as really a bill of rights for the trans-national corporations, nothing more or less, as a way of reducing our wages and reducing the benefits of our social legislation in Canada and for that matter in the United States and in Mexico.

Thousands of Canadian owned small and medium businesses have been wiped out by the requirement that the Canadian government grant the U.S. corporations what they call national treatment and right of establishment in Canada. This means there is no right of our government to carry out its constitutional obligations for equalizing throughout the regions, no right to assist a Canadian corporation in any way that it does not assist or offer to assist an American corporation, no right to buy from a Canadian corporation on any other terms than it buys from the American corporations claiming national treatment and right of establishment, no right to prevent capital created in Canada by the work of Canadian workers, usually on the basis of plant bought with money borrowed from banks holding the deposits of Canadian workers. That capital produced by Canadians can now be much more freely transported away from Canada to wherever the American based trans-nationals wish to use it without any control by the Canadians who created it.

An extension of that kind of free trade agreement is being sought by the United States, not only as it affects Mexico but as it affects Canada. It will hinder the development of publicly owned and democratically managed enterprises such as health insurance. We have a much higher quality of health at a much lower cost than they have in the United States. It will contribute to blocking the development of child care, which is essential to single parents and for many two-earner parent families.

The free trade agreement limits Canada's ability to care for our natural environment by compelling us to continue selling to the U.S. all kinds of energy on the basis of past sales, as a proportion of our past sales, regardless of environmental consequences and regardless of Canada's needs. In fact, the free trade agreement ban on unfair subsidies specifically allows Canada only to subsidize the oil and gas exploration industries in order to benefit the American corporations to which most of the product and most of the jobs will go.

It also allows for a wholesale grab of our fresh water and restricts us from protecting our soil, water and air from pesticides that would be imported from the United States which has a lower standard of protection of the environment.

The free trade agreement, along with deregulation, is destroying our east-west transportation and communication systems. We just had the truckers here a week or two ago pointing that out to us. There are the buslines and the airlines that are suffering in the same way. These east-west transportation systems have been the lifeline of Canada.

What is next? Our sovereignty over our cultural life, our national control over intellectual property and our control over Canadian defence and military enterprises. Canada's few publishing, broadcasting and entertainment industries are already in severe difficulties.

But President Bush is not satisfied. He states that such small Canadian actions as have been taken to enforce investment restrictions in cultural sectors are "irritants" that he wants to see removed in the U.S.-Canada-Mexico talks. We had prescription drug patent rights increased as a prelude to the free trade agreement. They now cost Canadians hundreds of millions of dollars, if not billions of dollars, but Bush wants total control of all such patent rights for the multinational corporations or the trans-nationals.

As to defence, even though generally the free trade agreement is being used to ban Canada from subsidizing manufacturing industries in order to help the poorer regions of our country as the Constitution requires, nevertheless a gracious exception is made that permits Ottawa to subsidize the manufacture of armaments. Many of those arms manufacturers are American owned corporations.

In return for sending our ships and our planes to President Bush's war in the gulf, the Prime Minister is permitted to sit with President Bush and President Salinas in the North American free trade talks to give away whatever parts of our economic, military and political independence he did not give away three years ago.

What did Canada expect to get from the free trade agreement? What did this government tell us we would get? Mostly it would be easier entry into the U.S. market in return for lowering our tariffs and our non-tariff barriers, and that they would be lowered on the other side of the border too.

Did we get it? No. Fifteen of the sixteen disputes that were adjudicated under this trade agreement went in favour of the United States. One of them went in favour of Canada and that is being challenged outside the authority of the free trade agreement through the U.S. federal courts.

The bill they passed after the free trade agreement amends the free trade agreement, in effect, in favour of the United States, but the free trade agreement prohibits Parliament or the legislatures of Canada from taking action that would be contrary to the free trade agreement.

The American corporations and the American government rule Canada in part through the free trade agreement, but it is not a two-way street. In other words, the free trade agreement is not mainly about trade. It is an agreement that was made under duress, as American rejection of Canadian exports was growing more and more painful. This was a deal that was offered and grabbed by the Prime Minister. It is not mainly about tariffs, because our tariffs are already low and coming down. It is mainly an unequal treaty which gives the U.S. control over the Canadian economy that had been growing over the years but had never reached such a point as it did with the free trade agreement.

In other words, the White House holds Canada in trusteeship to the U.S. based multinational corporations.

Another remark by the Prime Minister in the throne speech was even more ironic, and I quote:

> Canada's ability to prosper in a global economy will be determined by the level of Canadians' educational achievement, by the sophistication of our management skills, and by our attitudes to work and to change.

Further down he says:

> As part of my government's new agenda for prosperity, a discussion paper on learning will be published to stimulate and focus discussion on education and training.

And there follows some vague, general promises of vast improvements in our educational system.

The experience by which Canadians must judge this is that the government's pledges to cut illiteracy in Canada just are not matched by its present actions. It has been cutting its educational commitment to post-secondary education and training year by year. It promised a labour force development board or national training board. It was announced in January and has not met yet. We do not know whether it will meet. We do not have any idea what it will do. One thing we do know is that after promising a handsome training project at the cost of the workers' and employers' unemployment payments, at no cost to the government, they took $100 million out of that for the gulf war.

We also know that the Conservative sales tax proposals include, for the first time in our history, a tax on books and other reading materials. So much for the Prime Minister's credibility in promising vast improvements in our education.

The fact is that there is mounting opposition for these reasons to the free trade agreement, and not only within Canada. Yes, in Canada I have participated in labour meetings, in the fall in Vancouver and earlier this year in Toronto, in which there was strong insistence that methods will be found to prevent heedless plant closings like the closing of Caterpillar, a profitable plant closed simply to increase the profits of the parent company by finding a low wage, non-union area in the American south, and demands going beyond that, that the people of Canada should have control over the disposition of investments.

There is also growing opposition in Mexico. For several years there were small meetings between expert people in church and labour to establish some of the comparable facts in the two countries. There was a major conference last fall with Canadians visiting Mexico and alerting Mexican labour leaders, officials of government, unions, universities and churches to the experience of the free trade agreement in Canada, the experience of the job losses, contrary to the promise of job increases.

The Canadians who went also learned more about the suppression of human rights in Mexico and the vote rigging at election time used to maintain the PRI in power, the Partito de la Revolution Institutional, the party that has ruled Mexico for 72 years. It is the party under which assassinations of labour leaders and other opposition critics are rarely investigated by the police and almost never lead to prosecution and punishment of those responsible. These are apparently necessary to keep the PRI in power, including the government of President Salinas.

We also learned how the peasants are being forced off the land to swell the many, many millions of unemployed in Mexico. We learned how the labour laws are not enforced. There are five to ten million children under the legal age of 15 working in the factories. Why? It is because the owner of the factory or the manager is allowed to take a falsified photocopy of a birth certificate and because for 22,000 factories there are three inspectors to enforce the law. They might be able to visit every factory once in 20 years.

We also learned of the so-called benefit of industrialization of the 500,000 workers in the new areas of the Maquiladora strip, mostly runaway plants from the United States and Canada. The effect has been that in Mexico as a whole the buying power of people's wages has been cut in half during the eighties. So much for the benefits to be brought to the Mexican workers by shutting down factories in Canada or the United States. In fact, Mexican trade unionists told some of us when I was there in March that what we need is an international bill of rights for labour.

The opposition is growing in the United States. This winter and spring there has been mounting mobilization against the free trade agreement. It has not arrived at the point of stopping it yet, but the opposition will increase, the more people experience what it means.

At a meeting I attended in Chicago and at a meeting two of my caucus colleagues attended in Washington, we found that more and more groups of labour, church and university experts have been forming a coalition against the North American free trade agreement.

The AFL/CIO has come out solidly in opposition to the agreement presently proposed. There is a new organization formed partly by workers who have lost their jobs in places like Pittsburgh in the steel mills called the Federation for Industrial Retention and Renewal. It is using American legislation, spreading across the country and organizing opposition to the closure of plants. Sometimes they win and sometimes they lose, but the movement is growing.

Of course the North American free trade agreement is not the whole story. President Bush wants to extend it down to Tierra del Fuego as well.

Four years ago, when this sort of thing was just being hinted at, I met the vice-minister of planning in El Salvador and asked him: "What are you doing about unemployment?" He said: "That is why I wanted to talk with you. We want you Canadians to invest in our cheap labour". Those were his exact words. He speaks good English, and I wrote his words down at the time.

"You have lots of wood in Canada. Send it down here. We will make toys and furniture. We will sell them in the United States. We will get the wages and you will get the profits. Cut the pieces of the jeans, send them down here to be sold. Same thing. That is what the Caribbean Basin initiative is all about".

As I was leaving, he said: "Bring my regards to Sinclair Stevens". Apparently his staff had not told him that we have different opinions among different parties in Canada.

I was at a meeting a few weeks ago in the Caribbean with the Socialist International Parties of the Americas. People from the Caribbean, Central America, South America and North America were there. In the south they were particularly working out local integration, as they called it; in other words, means of defending themselves against the onslaught of the trans-nationals from the north. Generally there was discussion of opposing the North American free trade agreement.

There is a growing international movement, and what we need are trade agreements that are fair to labour. Do not force the farmers off the land to create more unemployment. Give education controlled by the people who do the work, need the education and know what they need. The disposition of the capital should be shaped by the workers who created it and who know that we need that capital so they can continue their work and improve on their work. This is the kind of free trade agreement we need, not the kind that the Prime Minister has been promoting in which he gives such fantastic rosy pictures in his throne speech.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member always pertain to the current situation, and I only wish to add some comments.

Last Friday the Quebec Liberal caucus of senators and members of Parliament, which I have the honour to preside, met with the Conseil central des syndicats nationaux de Montréal, at its invitation, to examine the dramatic reality of Montreal's economic situation. The great speeches of a former president, a distinguished Quebecer, the hon. Jean Marchand were brought to mind. He used to say that Montreal's economy was a reflection of that of Quebec. What he was saying then is still true today.

Today, I simply want respectfully thank those who have invited us and organized such an opportunity for exchange in Montreal. Mr. Sylvio Gagnon, president of the Conseil central des syndicats nationaux de Montréal and Mrs. Monique Simard, the ever popular vice-president of the CNTU. The whole thing was coordinated by Mr. Bégin, in charge of the agressive campaign against recession led by the Conseil central de Montréal. We will get back to this topic soon when we have the opportunity to discuss Montreal's economic situation.

Together with my colleagues from the Quebec caucus in Ottawa, I want to thank them for the warm reception. I am sure these exchanges will lead to a new co-operation. I want to address a question to the member. Is he fully aware of the dramatic situation of Montreal's economy? This is my first question.

Second, I would like him to try, with his usual sensitiveness but in his own way, to inform Canadians about the differences between Montreal's economy, a city which is the mainspring of the Quebec province, and Toronto's economy, the city he has represented brilliantly such a long time.

[English]

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the member for Saint-Denis, for his question.

I will admit that I am not as well informed about the economic situation of Montreal as I am of the economic situation in Toronto. I can assure the member that Toronto has not experienced the level of unemployment that we now have since the thirties. It is worse than it was in the early eighties.

Factories have been closed and closed permanently. In my riding a factory that was making washing machines shut down. The announcement was made within a few weeks of the free trade agreement being signed. Those washing machines are now being made at Whirlpool in Ohio. This factory served half the Canadian market in washing machines. Now 600 skilled employees are looking for work. Some have found it, many have not.

That story has been repeated many times in Toronto. Toronto is of course a rich city by the standards of people who only look at the indices of wealth and growth. We can have a rich city or a rich country with far too many poor people, depending on the way the work is organized; who calls the tune and who gets the benefits.

Toronto has not yet approached the level of unemployment of Montreal and I say that with great respect to the working men and working women of Montreal who have been, as the member has said, the industrial and commercial centre or motor of Quebec and are now being desolated by unemployment in many industries.

I do not know the details of the industrial ownership in Quebec. I believe more of it is locally owned, that is, owned by people in Quebec, than is the case with the branch plants in Ontario.

I believe, for example, that the textile industry and the clothing industry of both provinces are being disastrously attacked by imports. About four years ago a plant employing 200 people in Spadina making basketball shorts shut down. I had toured it just a few weeks before at the invitation of management. It was, according to them, a very modern, very successful operation. It was shut down after an equivalent plant was opened in Mexico to produce the same thing at wages worth one-tenth of what the management was paying in Toronto, and those Toronto wages, those Canadian textile worker wages, are no princely or princessly salary.

I believe that the textile and garment industry of Quebec, which is far greater than the textile and garment industry of Toronto, must be suffering the same kind of evil from the imports from countries where the government forces the wages down by legislation and by persecution of trade unionists.

Mr. Prud'homme: You are absolutely right. I want this on the record.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the speaker, as we all know, is a very sincere person and I wish everyone in the House were as sincere as he. I notice that the magazine The Economist last week has Sweden's consumer prices up by 10.7 per cent on a yearly rate. Sweden's prime lending rate is about 13 per cent as of last week. Does the hon. member think that we should have the Swedish model in Canada? If we did, does he not think that we would have even worse problems that we do at the present?

Mr. Heap Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I have never been convinced that I understand exactly how you can compare Sweden with Canada. Sweden was fortunate enough to be neutral in two world wars. Before that, Sweden was fortunate enough from its point of view to export a considerable part of its population and for the last half century it has had a government that undertook to keep the spread between the richest and poorest from being too great. I believe it has done very well at that, but if it is being caught between the trans-national empires of western Europe and the tentacles off the trans-national empires of the United States, I expect it may be in some difficulty.

I never thought that we should try to model Canada's economy strictly on any other country. We can look at certain ideas and borrow them to try them out. One of the Swedish ideas that was half tried out was that contracts should be negotiated, labour management contracts, in which so many cents per hour would be put into an investment fund of which labour would have an equal share of control with management. There would be joint operation of that investment fund. The idea was not fully carried out but has probably not been very successful.

I think if the original idea had been carried out there would have been higher morale among the Swedish workers. It is very difficult to tell exactly from this distance.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour for me to participate in the throne speech debate and, as you pointed out, recognize that the name of of my riding is both French and English. Probably not too many ridings in Canada have the distinction of having an English and French name in the title. I suppose there may be a few others but I am very proud to represent Portage—Interlake.

I listened to the distinguished member for Saint-Denis and the distinguished member for Toronto debating with an understanding which is usually lacking in this House of Commons, as well as with the respect that should be given and awarded to other members of Parliament regardless of their political stripe.

We talk about national unity, as the Prime Minister did in the throne speech. Part of the problem with this country is the lack of respect for members of Parliament, the lack of respect from one province to another and the lack of respect for our different cultures. That causes disunity within our country.

The goal we should foster is the reassessment and putting back into perspective the reasons we are so happy and successful as Canadians, and trying to find a way of keeping Canada together as opposed to finding ways which divide us.

We should look at the legislatures of the western world. We all have the opportunity on a very regular basis to look at the U.S. Congress and Senate in action, our neighbours across the line. If you would take a few minutes from time to time as I do, you would marvel at the way the elected bodies of our southern neighbours pay so much respect to the elected positions of each other. We just do not do that in this legislature.

I have sat for almost seven years in this House and watched the deterioration of debate to the point where character assassination seems to be the objective, whether it is from this side to members opposite, or from opposite to this side. That shows that we are not quite the sophisticated and cultured elite as we would like to think. There is a major problem with our whole attitude and it reflects on the way we conduct ourselves in this Chamber.

I have also had the opportunity, as have some others, to sit in the House of Representatives or the elected Houses of Germany, Britain, Norway and even of Taiwan. There has not been the same opportunity of time but somehow in those democratic houses there is far more respect and far more fair and open debate on different points of view without getting into the character of one another.

This is a fault that I see in this House and I hope all members in this room will try to change that attitude. I know we do not now have the filibustering or the ringing of the bells but we had a demonstration of sorts in the Senate that I think was really not necessary. I do not think political gains were made by withholding for almost a year a bill that this government put forward. That did not serve the purpose. It did point out that we have some shortcomings I think we should address.

I often listen to debate in this House and I think Canadians are judging parliamentarians on the basis of what they have been able to see and pick up here. A negative point of view, whether from the opposition or from the government side, is generally sensationalized in the media the next day. Right now I could make such an outlandish statement that there would probably be five phone calls in my office and I would get all kinds of ink. That is the way I could get some media coverage and probably indicate to my constituents that I was actually here and participated in debate. I believe those things happen all too often.

The throne speech brought forward the idea of trying to find some common ground among all elected members of Parliament to find a way of uniting Canada, of keeping this country strong and united notwithstanding some of those differences ingrained for the last 300 years, and that is the job of this House.

Primarily and foremost, I believe within the next 12 to 16 months it is going to be imperative that every one of us elected to this House of Commons put aside some of our political differences, some of our political antagonisms toward one another and find common ground to keep Canada united.

Should it become weaker because of our continual friction—which is mostly created, I may say, by politicians and not the common worker, not the individual who is trying to make a living in this country, not one who is contributing to society, not people like the truck drivers who were here last week, or the tobacco farmers who found themselves in trouble in this country, or the steel workers who are meeting in Ottawa right now, trying to find a way to solve some of their dilemma, their loss of jobs— we must put aside some of our frictional differences that lead us to say: "It is your fault", "It is my fault", or "It is the government's fault" from Mr. Trudeau years ago or Mr. Pearson or Mr. Diefenbaker. It is always somebody's fault.

In my view, today is the day we must sit down as parliamentarians and find out what unites us and work toward that end. That way, this House of Parliament will stay with its 290-some members and, in fact, grow.

All this confrontation must come to an end. I see my colleague from Winnipeg, Manitoba, a very distinguished member of Parliament who has sat on a committee with me. I believe some of the committee work in the past has shown that a lot of great work can be done in non-partisan way for the betterment of this country.

I had the opportunity to sit on the Indian affairs committee when I was first elected. I see another colleague of mine, a very distinguished member from northern Ontario. We sat and worked out a lot of great new ideas which were worked into Bill C-31. It is probably not a perfect bill, but I can recall that one, and so does my colleague.

The whole idea is to get away from the controversy, and I think all members should sit down and examine how we can avoid that. Sure, I like heated debates. The number of hours in this House we spent talking about points of privilege, points of order, and differences of opinion that took up the Chair's time to re-evaluate and reassess—and I see some people nodding their heads—when we could have entertained honest and fair debate about how your point of view or mine may differ, and the facts to back it up.

That kind of good, healthy debate is what we should have, as opposed to saying: "You know what he said about me last week, or in the committee, or so on, and you know that report in the paper". This has to be the goal of this session of Parliament. I believe it is very crucial. We should see a tone in Question Period that is less confrontational. Surely, with an attitude like that, within 16 months or so we could find a true solution to Canada's ills and hopefully by then the recession will be long over and the economy will be booming again.

I support an effort by all members to try and work in a more co-operative way. I would like to present my idea as to what I think the Speaker ought to do when there is a bad practice going on. He should tell those two individuals to go meet out behind the curtains so we can get on with the business of the House, which is debate, debate and debate, good debate, the kind that we see sometimes done by our American colleagues. I sometimes admire them. They seem to have an idea of their land so well in hand that they go after the problems and debate them out there.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank my colleague from the government for the comments he has made, particularly a special thank you for his positive comments about my work in Parliament as a member.

I know that when he pleads for some sort of non-partisanship on the major issues of the day that he is sincere.

I, too, want to do exactly that. When we are talking about the country, when we are talking about Canada and what it has been, what it is and what it can be, surely we need to work together. When we talk about the economic development of this nation, of all regions, and about bringing a greater sense of justice to the workers of this great country, we need to work more co-operatively.

However, there is a problem. I recall just a few days ago when I, in fact, had explained to a colleague from the other opposition party what my leader's position was on the Constitution. I had explained it to him personally because I wanted to make sure that he did not misunderstand. It was with respect to what we were proposing to do. My leader had indicated what his preferred position would be and I had hoped that it would take place without any partisanship. I explained it to my colleague, but he got up and took advantage of the situation by pretending and, in fact, indicating quite clearly that he had not heard it before.

There are all kinds of traps and all kinds of dangers and I hope that the spirit will prevail. Thank you.

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I thank my opposition colleague from Winnipeg for those remarks. Already, I believe, the few words that I introduced into this House are working. If we could just multiply that force, this House will not be such an adversarial place against people's characters and individuals. We may not agree with others' policies, we may not agree whether it was the right decision to spend or not to spend, I will accept that and we will debate that in the House. That is the kind of debate that is healthy, and at the end of the day, well, we will vote on it. However, we must get away from these very personal attacks on an individual's character.

Politicians come here with a little bit of a thick skin generally and are prepared to accept the odd shot. My goodness, I chaired the committee on communications and culture for two years as "that pig farmer". No problem. We had a lot of fun with it and I am sure most others did. My good colleague sitting behind me here recalls some of those times.

My point is that it is all too often taken negatively by the public and can then grow into something that really was not there. We all know that perception is something that we have to live with, but the reality is that it does change from time to time. I am grateful for his comments and look forward to a very aggressive but fair and interesting session of this House this coming spring and summer.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak today on the throne speech, as we get closer to the end of the debate and having had the opportunity over the last week or so to listen to colleagues on all sides speak regarding the throne speech.

I would like to take a few minutes to present my views and the views of many Canadians who come from the regions of the country and their understanding and thoughts on the direction Canada should be taking, as someone who listened to the throne speech and the promise of a united Canada, a strong Canada, a Canada that will be developed into the next decade.

I would like to take a minute out from that side of it, because I believe this country, if we go back in history to the founding Fathers of Confederation and John George Diefenbaker and Roads to Resources and Sir John A. Macdonald and the railroad, was built on the pillars of resources which enabled us to build the cities and the future of this country.

In this period of time it is the regions of this country that are going through some very, very difficult economic times.

I refer to regions where 4,000 single industry towns, communities are being jeopardized with pressures from groups of Canadians and people from around the world who do not recognize or understand that the resources are the pillars of this country.

In the throne speech the Prime Minister and this government recognize the fact that literacy is going to be one of the greatest challenges today and tomorrow. The reason I want to pick that section out of the throne speech is because it is reflected in my riding of Timiskaming in northern Ontario. It is also reflected in parts of northern Quebec, northern Alberta, the Yukon and Newfoundland. The country we gather our resources from, whether it is in the mining industry, forestry, agriculture or fisheries, it is the livelihood of individuals which may be third or fourth generation, in which their grandfather, father and now themselves have been able to garner a way of life. There was stability in a resource that no one ever thought would be in jeopardy. These people say, my dad was a coal miner, my great grandfather was a coal miner and I had the opportunity to be one too.

When we look at the over-all picture, and that is basically what Canada has to do at this point, we are in an a period of adjustment in the industrial side, in the cultural side, in understanding each other.

I would like to deal with the industrial side of it because it affects a lot of my constituents as well as a lot of individual Canadians, who through no fault of their own, have now lost or are about to lose their livelihood and what they believed in and what they thought would be their future.

Individuals have worked in the mining community, for instance, for generations. They left school at 14 or 15 because they were big, strapping young men who were able to get the opportunity to work underground. At that time if you were good with a shovel, you had a strong back and strong arms, you made a good dollar. You were able to work. You retired, up until a few years ago, without a pension. Of course, the social network has changed to ensure that individuals now have the opportunity for some small pensions and some good pensions.

The big problems we are now facing are technology changes. In mining, the price is not set here in Canada but is an international world price. Mines that had been operating for 35 or 40 years have closed. Some individuals who are 35, 40, 45 or 50 years old, who were great at what they did, when they look to be employed in northern B.C., northern New Brunswick or northern Ontario, with the technology changes and new mines coming into place, their skills are no longer required, because they are manual skills.

I think that is the industrial adjustment this country has to face. Unless you come from those regions, you do not understand the human side.

Pressures are being put on by policies, whether at the federal or provincial level, to bring in new legislation that adapts to what is very popular in regions and urban centres of the country. I can relate to the fact that policies that were brought in by a provincial government in the Province of Ontario effectively closed down a community in my constituency, Temagami, because it was popular for urbanites to have a playground in which to be able to canoe, to walk through trails. Never once did they reflect on the damage they were doing to individuals in my area who had made their livelihood from forest products, whether it was in the bush operations or sawmill operations. As I speak, after two years, some of those people still do not have work. Their unemployment insurance has run out, some have lost their homes, some have gone on welfare, some have left the area and, unfortunately, some have a very difficult time being able to fill out an application form for a new job.

That is why it is so important for us to be able to make those adjustments. Whether it is in the fishing community or any of the resorts or smaller regions of this country, we have to give these individuals the opportunity to get the basic educational skills required—reading, writing and arithmetic. As a government—I know in my constituency we are certainly trying—we have to ensure, through the educational system, that we can bring the educational skills of individuals up to a level where they will then be able to challenge in a world that is changing. The unfortunate part of it is that a lot of Canadians will still not accept that it is changing times, times in which governments at all levels have to start dealing with what I believe is the future of this country. I believe the time for partisanship is over. The fact is that we have to be looking at the challenges ahead and be able to deal with them in a manner which Canadians can understand rather than the fact that it is popular to say one thing to get elected, but not deal with the fact that it is individual lives, whether it is in the four basic resources or whether it is in individuals who may be involved and a spin-off from that.

It is difficult for me to understand that individuals from other regions of the country will not allow us to continue on the basis of what this country was built on. I hope more Canadians from the urban centres will start to understand that the wealth of Canada is not in Toronto, Calgary or Vancouver, the wealth of the country and what the country was built on is in the regions of this country. We have to ensure that the regions of this country get the opportunity to be able to move forward with the new technology to ensure and enhance the opportunity for those regions to benefit.

I could go on for a good period of time because it is something I believe in strongly. Before the regions of this country are going to be able to ensure stability, urban Canadians are going to have to understand and give us the opportunity to do so.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, it is now fully two weeks since we had the Speech from the Throne and I have been looking forward to making a few comments about it.

First of all, let me deal with one of the matters raised by my friend from Timiskaming and, before him, his colleague and my friend from Portage—Interlake. I hear them say something that many on their side have said in this debate and it comes through sometimes in responses by ministers during Question Period these last few days, and that is that somehow there is a new credo, the word goes out that there is to be no more partisanship, it is all, from here on, going to be sweetness and light, kind of one party system if you like. That makes for great speechifying, but it does not make for much sense because that is not our system.

Let us be clear what is being said. If they say: "Let us get rid of the adversary system. Let us get rid of the partisan approach to politics," which has served this country very well for more than 100 years, I have to tell the gentleman from Timiskaming and his friend from Portage—Interlake that I cannot go along with that. If, on the other hand, their appeal is to not resort to the petty or the personal, we have never felt that should have been done in the first place. If he can be so good as to sidle up to some of his colleagues who, in answering questions in Question Period, regularly thrive on the personal and the petty, then maybe we are making some progress, if that is the language we are talking.

I suspect he is talking more than that. I suspect he is mouthing the words his Prime Minister has been pushing the last few weeks, that somehow we have to stop being partisan. I have to say to him I do not have any intention of going along with that. I will tell you why.

Our whole system is a partisan adversarial system. It is by criticizing, it is by holding up to public scrutiny the other person's ideas, by their holding up to scrutiny our ideas, that we come up with even better ideas. Our whole system is an adversarial system.

In the rush for sweetness and light, in the rush to find a new millennium, let us not throw out the best strategy of all for getting there and that is making sure that the kinds of ideas we have—whether it is about employment or whether it is about national unity—are held up to the most brutal public scrutiny. In the end these ideas will be so good that they can withstand that kind of scrutiny.

This idea that somehow we are going to put all our disagreements aside just does not wash with me and I suspect is not going to work in any event. Better that the government, of which that gentleman is a supporter, tell us what it has in mind instead of sitting on things until next February in so far as national unity is concerned. Then, if we have a few refinements and a few criticisms to make, instead of asking us not to criticize, the government should put its ideas out now and we can say what we think of them.

Let us get away from this false idea that somehow we are going to have a new millennium, a new credo where it is going to be all kiss and make up. That is not the nature of this place. The nature of this place is that you have some ideas and I have some ideas and we are not going to agree all the time. We are sent here by the public of this country to see to it that the ideas we together advance and legislate to become part of the law of the land are ideas that have been held up to public scrutiny, have been refined, not by putting them under the rug, but by attacking those ideas and in the process coming up with even better ways of doing things.

I agree with him to an extent. Let us do away with the petty and the personal. If he asking in the process that we ought to turn a blind eye to the principles that we stand for, we cannot do that. If he is saying when he talks about doing away with partisanship, that we ought to do away with what separates us, I cannot go along with that. If he thought about it a little more, he would not go along with it either.

This speech has been in the public domain for two weeks today, two weeks since the Governor General came to the other place to deliver it. A lot of things have been said about the speech, most of them fairly harsh and the harsher I think the more truthful. It was my leader, the gentleman from Beauséjour, the next Prime Minister of this country, who put it very well when he said on the day the speech was made public that this speech was a cruel joke for the 1.5 million people who are looking for work in this country.

That best characterizes what we feel about the throne speech. It also, by the way, demonstrates very well what I was saying to you, Mr. Speaker, a moment ago. It is difficult to tell the gentleman from Timiskaming that we are going to have sweetness and light when they perpetrate on the Canadian people this latest cruel joke, the 1.5 million people out there who are waiting for some help, the fishermen about whom there was not a word in the throne speech. He wants me to lie low on that. It is fishermen and plant workers, 17,000 of them that sent me here in the first place.

There was not a word in the throne speech about the plight of farmers, about the plight of the forestry industry. Somebody asked me to kiss and make up. Somebody asked me not to voice my outrage on behalf of those people in Burgeo, in Ramea, in François, in the 158 communities that I represent. If somebody asked me to hush that up and to ignore this government's mandate—

An hon. member: It would be impossible to hush you up.

Mr. Simmons: I am delighted to see my friend, the new parliamentary secretary for fisheries, a gentleman all the way from Fraser Valley East. The one thing he does not have to worry about is any fish plants closing down in his riding. I am nevertheless delighted to have him on board and I look forward to working with him.

He is right. When it comes to the fishermen on the south coast of Newfoundland, it is going to be very difficult to shut me up. I am glad that he knows that much about me already. I am looking forward to working with him.

This throne speech is supposed to be the government's plan of action, the government's road map for the next few months or a year or two, and yet in it there is not a thing, not a thing that would give any comfort or any sense of direction or any hope to those unemployed, to those fishermen, to those farmers, to those forestry workers among others I have mentioned.

Like others who sit in this House I am a politician, and I am proud to be a politician. One of the things I believe all of us in this House have learned very quickly upon becoming politicians is that you cannot be all things to all people but you ought first to listen to what they are saying.

Second, you cannot take them in a direction they do not want to go. That is where this Prime Minister is making one terrible mistake, though I suspect it is not an inadvertent mistake so much as it is a calculated risk which he is blundering on very badly.

The attempt to take people where they do not want to go, by that I have in mind the free trade agreement, the goods and services tax, the shutting down a rural post office, the abandonment of railway lines. People have identified with all those issues and they are having difficulty dealing with now. I am thinking again of goods and services tax, the free trade agreement and other issues.

I realize from your signal, Mr. Speaker, that my time has almost expired, so I will conclude very quickly by saying that this Prime Minister's terrible legacy to this country is threefold. He is perpetrating the shutdown of rural Canada. He has already wrecked the Canadian economy. Now he has brought a once great country to the very brink of collapse. I intended to say more about each of these, but I see that my time is up. I thank you, sir, for your indulgence.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member's comments. I guess that is the difference between those of us who sit on this side of the House and those who sit on the other side.

This government recognizes that we have to move in a new direction and that new challenges are faced in the world. The hon. member spoke about the GST. The party that he represents was in power for 20-odd years. Numerous reports were sent forward to the finance minister at the time, recommending to him that changes be made so that the federal sales tax, which was an anchor around the industrial community, be changed to a fairer tax. But they did not have the courage to do so.

History will show that the unpopular moves which have been made by this government are the ones that will ensure our young people and our grandchildren have the opportunity to meet those challenges.

Is the hon. member prepared to stay in yesterday's world, in a little cocoon? Is he not willing to move forward to the challenges facing Canadians? With the policies that he believes in we cannot play on an international field. Is that what he has been saying to us?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, one would have to agree that my hon. friend comes up with wonderfully interesting question. They have very little relevance to what I had to say, but that is completely beside the point.

Let me go back to his earlier point before I answer that question about yesterday. I thought the hon. member illustrated very well the very point I was making.

• (1710)

We remember his speech which he read very well. We must admit that regardless of who wrote it for him, he read that speech marvellously well.

Mr. MacDougall: I did not read a speech. I do not have to read a speech when I want to tell exactly what rural Canada is talking about.

Mr. Simmons: I take it back. He did not read his speech well. I am sorry for saying that.

The point I make is that when he gave his speech he was very forthright about how we ought not to be partisan. Now, as soon as I make a point with which he disagrees, he says: "the basic difference between us is that we are on this side, therefore we are smart, and you are on that side therefore—"

That is the very man who 10 minutes ago was repeating to us not to be partisan. I interjected the point for him that maybe what he ought to think about was not being petty. He did not hear my plea but got up immediately and started being petty.

We are the people, in his words, who do not have the courage, who sit on that side of the House, and all that kind of nonsense. Where is my evangelist now? Where is the man who appealed to me 15 minutes ago not to be petty and partisan? Physician heal thyself, heal thyself. Listen to your own words.

How about yesterday? He asks if I want to go by yesterday's formulas. No, he is dead on. I do not want to. But I appeal to him first not to rewrite yesterday's history.

He and his party have perpetrated the idea that somehow the government of which I was a supporter at the time had shut out Quebec back in 1982. He knows in all honesty that the late gentleman who was then the premier of Quebec was a separatist and he was not going to sign anything. He knows that the people of Quebec were represented here very well by 74 government members and by 8 or 10 members in cabinet.

He wants to talk about yesterday, this nonsense, this rewriting of history, that somehow the people of Canada and the other nine provinces ganged up. What they did was try to deal as best they could with a premier who had no intention at that time of signing anything.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, don't take my word for it. Take the word of the gentleman from Baie Comeau who is now the leader of this government, the leader of this gentleman's party, who immediately after the events of 1982 actually went to the trouble of congratulating the then Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, publicly for the way in which he had patriated the Constitution and brought in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I thought that was a marvellous gesture on the part of the member from Baie Comeau at the time. I wish now he would have the intellectual honesty to own up to what he did nine years ago instead of rewriting history all the time.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am quite pleased to rise and speak to the Speech from the Throne. I would like to use that as a backdrop to the remarks I want to make.

In his opening remarks the Prime Minister, through the Right Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn, our Governor General, stated that:

> This session will be a turning point in Canadian history. Let no one doubt the seriousness of the challenges we face as a country.

He felt that we had the responsibility and the opportunity to forge an historic accommodation that embraces all Canadians, overcomes divisions and discord, and charts a course for prosperity for the generations to come.

Then the Speech from the Throne continues and says in effect after a few other remarks:

> We have been confided the stewardship of this great nation, constructed across an entire continent by generations of men and women determined to make a home for themselves and a future for their children.

There are some things that this government has constructed that in terms of a future for their children have been put much in jeopardy by what I consider to be poorly founded policies on the part of the government opposite.

If this government had not been found wanting in so many areas from an economic perspective, from a social perspective, from an infrastructure perspective, from the kinds of motors of the economy which it has sold off and privatized in a way that has not been helpful to this country, to say nothing of the GST, the free trade and a few other things, I would go into detail in respect to these matters. However, I do believe that before we address the other issues we must address Canadian unity, because without a sense of Canadian unity, a sense of a country that is solid and comfortable with itself, we cannot fundamentally address the other issues, those are the economic ones which can effectively help this country.

The other point that was made in the throne speech is that Canada's history is the history of builders and achievers. Around the world, we all know that we are number two. It is not bad to be number two in the eyes ofthe rest of the world and to be known as a country to which people would love to come and in which people feel honoured to be a citizen participating in the growth and development.

I just wish that were the way we could go about establishing this country. If you look for a way in which we could establish some process and procedures to meet the discomfort and lack of assurance that we are going to be one country, that Quebec and Canada are going to live together, then we have to look to our leader Mr. Chrétien, who has come forward with some really concrete and positive suggestions for action now.

I could say that it is rather sad, but I would say that it is not so sad but a happy coincidence that this government has taken the ideas that Mr. Chrétien put forward and paraphrased them, you could say, they copycat them. I will not say plagiarize, but I will say that if you look at the throne speech, you will see some very interesting remarks taken almost totally from Mr. Chrétien's presentation.

First of all, our leader called for a Canadian round. What did this wonderful Speech from the Throne say? It said it will be a Canadian round.

Second, Mr. Chrétien proposed a joint parliamentary committee to hold nation-wide hearings on a set of constitutional principles. It just turned that around a bit and in this government's Speech from the Throne, it was announced that there will be a committee starting some time in September—just a delay from June, which Mr. Chrétien called for—and that a decision would be taken by this government after that committee makes its report.

It would suggest new legislation either for a referendum or for a constituent assembly. If Mr. Chrétien suggested that the final proposition be submitted to Canadians in a national referendum, I would say that this is close to becoming a copycat approach.

I do not care that it is a copycat approach. I can tell you that—our Leader said this best—if you want to copy what he has done, please go right ahead and do it. We are prepared in the interests of Canada, far beyond the interest of a single political party, to enable the mechanisms that can help this country come together.

We have so little on which we differ that we have got to find the Canadian way and accommodate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Finestone: Our Leader asked the government to consider proposals and not delay the procedures until next February. He presented a whole process for a reform package.

He started by presenting a fundamental concept in November 1990 to the Bélanger-Campeau commission and then those were reiterated a framework of nine principles for constitutional reform on April 21 in a very wonderful speech in Montreal.

He shared that openly with the public and in meetings with the new minister of constitutional affairs. This party and our leader, who is more interested in the evolution of Canada than in partisan politics, want to maintain Canada coast to coast, including Quebec and its particularity. Mr. Chrétien went on to lay out in a more formalistic manner using the Quebec federal Liberal Party Congress, the colloque that we had in Sherbrooke this week, a whole proposal for Quebec happiness, which is a must for Canadian unity.

Canadian unity, of which Quebec's happiness is a necessary element.

[English]

I would suggest that this constitutional proposal is solid. It is an excellent reference point for a constitutional position which could be placed before the people. Then there would be something concrete on which reaction could take place, whether by provincial governments, interested parties or the ordinary men and women of Canada. From there we could go on to step three, which would be an amended principle placed before the people in a national referendum. I think that the process laid out by our leader in response to Canadian unity—far before this response to the throne speech—is a responsible action by the only leader who can truly bring Canada together in the future.

In order that there be no misunderstanding, I would like the general population to know what our leader has said and what the congress of the Liberal Party of Canada Quebec section had to say this past weekend in Sherbrooke:

> Whereas the Liberal Party of Canada recognizes the urgent necessity of profoundly reforming Canada's political and economic structure in order to give the country the dynamism, flexibility and modernism required to successfully face the demands and challenges of the 21st century; (and) whereas the members of the Liberal party of Canada firmly believe that the best option for Quebec remains the adherence to a reformed Canadian federation.

It presents a clear progressive and substantial constitutional reform plan, the fundamental elements of which I would like to lay out for you in terms of national unity and I would call it "our blueprint for Canada".

The first major point is that we reaffirm our faith in a profoundly reformed federal regime as the most capable system of ensuring economic growth, social justice, respect for the principle of linguistic duality, the protection and promotion of the French language and culture, enrichment of multiculturalism as well as respect for minority rights as much within Quebec as in the rest of Canada.

Mr. Chrétien spoke eloquently about respect for francophones outside Quebec and respect for anglophones inside Quebec, and he alluded to the barbecue, the Bloc Québecois under Mr. Bouchard, and the fact that he now is coming around to what Mr. Chrétien said two and a half years ago about the fact that Bill 178 was a totally unnecessary bill. One does not protect French by building a sense of belonging and a sense of participation on the backs or by diminishing other people.

The second point we made was that in the constitutional debate, the joint committee, in its final report, integrate in a non-exclusive manner the following reform elements, and I read them as quickly as I can:

[Translation]

> (a) to define major national and international objectives that are desirable for the progress of Canada as a whole and respond to the common goals of Canadian citizens, such as being internationally competitive and improving the quality of the environment and the social well-being of our citizens;

Some of the reforms.

[English]

A second point here is that a new division of powers taking into consideration: amongst others (1) the identification of the common objectives of the Canadian totality, (2) the determination of the level of government most capable of adequately responding to the needs of the population according to the well-being of the latter, and (3) the elimination, as completely as possible, of the overlapping and splitting of programs and services within the scope of shared spheres of activity, having recourse, if necessary to asymmetrical agreements;

The Third point is as follows:

> (c) incorporation in the Constitution of the distinct character of Quebec, by guaranteeing, for instance:
> (i) the powers Quebec needs to protect and promote French language and culture within its territory, while respecting recognized rights and freedoms;

[English]

I have two more I would like to do, if I may.

Also:

> (ii) in a reformed and elected Senate, the inclusion of the double majority rule for votes on bills and government decisions that may affect the status, protection and promotion of the French language;
> (iii) a veto right; [and]
> (v) the provinces' right to withdraw, with full compensation, from any federal shared costs programs in exclusively provincial jurisdictions, provided that they establish a program which is compatible with the objectives of the national program;

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Unless I have unanimous consent, I will have to interrupt the hon. member. We now have five minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the comments by the hon. member for Mount Royal. I wanted to ask a question earlier but I arrived just as the previous speaker was finishing his speech. In the circumstances, I would appreciate the hon. member's comments, since she seemed to be showing full support for what the other member was saying, which was that when Mr. Trudeau patriated the Constitution in 1982, he said that in any case, the Quebec government did not want to sign. He seemed to say that Mr. Trudeau was right to patriate the Constitution just the same and to include a Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I am sorry, but I disagree. When one of the major provinces of this Confederation doesn't want to sign, for whatever reason, you don't force the issue like Trudeau did in 1982, especially when you are talking about including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. As the hon. member is aware, this was done to destroy Bill 101, because the Charter of Rights and Freedoms included language rights, although language is an exclusively provincial matter, and by putting this into the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, several sections of Bill 101 became ultra vires, so that the Government of Quebec passed Bill 178, thanks to the notwithstanding clause.

So the hon. member was in Sherbrooke, and she mentioned that her present leader had given us a set of guidelines. This is the same man who was there in 1982, and who said recently that he wanted a national referendum, but it didn't matter how Quebec voted, because he would settle the matter once and for all with all Canadians. Furthermore, the hon. member's new leader unreservedly supports the inclusion of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms because it intrudes on the Province of Quebec's jurisdiction over language.

So what does the hon. member have to say about this?

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with any of the remarks made by my colleague opposite.

I can only add that his leader at first supported what was done in 1982; secondly, his leader tried to force things through with the Meech Lake Accord and he failed. A Constitution is alive and can be changed along the way, but very carefully. So I do not feel that I need to go on answering, except that I would like to add some comments, some proposals on the motion that was tabled.

[English]

I continue about constitutional protection under which:

> —the preservation of the proportionality existing regarding the representation of the Supreme Court judges coming from Quebec; the participation of the provinces in the appointment process of Supreme Court judges; the strengthening of Canada's economic integration which ensures: one, a free circulation of persons, goods, services and capital, two, the creation of an efficient, intergovernmental mechanism of consultation and co-ordination of policies, programs and services, three, an effective regional representation within the Bank of Canada, while maintaining the present independence and authority of the latter; the preservation of the principles of equalization payments; the recognition, the respect and the guarantee of rights of our aboriginal peoples including the principle of self-government.

The members of the Liberal Party of Canada, along with the members from British Columbia have approved this document. We are all very pleased with the fact that our leader has given us a basic document. This government chose to use the words of our leader in its throne speech and in the undertakings that it took and it should accept further advice from him and use this as a basic document which can be amended, starting with public hearings in the beginning of September, rather than going to February of next year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A point of order, the hon. member for York—Simcoe.

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, I believe in the spirit of co-operation that we have been talking about today that you will find there is unanimous consent to pass the throne speech on division.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the motion moved by the deputy government whip.

[English]

Is the House agreed to the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

• (1730)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to clarify that it was not our intention to cut anybody off from debate but to allow the debate to go to 5.45 p.m. The agreement was that at 5.45 p.m. the throne speech would pass on division. I think that is clear now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your attention, please. It seems that there was a misunderstanding. I therefore suggest that the debate continue as agreed until 5.45 p.m. and at that time the motion moved by the deputy government whip will be deemed adopted, since it just was. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Delta.

Mr. Rocheleau: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, you said that the motion was adopted, but it was adopted on division, if I understand correctly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I thank the hon. member for Hull–Aylmer for asking me to be more precise. Yes, the motion was adopted on division.

I again recognize the hon. member for Delta.

[English]

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour and a privilege to be one of the final speakers in this very significant debate. Of all the throne speeches I have read and listened to, this is one of the most significant. Coming at this time in Canadian history, it is all the more significant. One of the prime features of this whole debate and of the throne speech was the subject of Canadian unity.

The speaker immediately before me quoted the paragraph which I would like to quote, as many others have, which says:

> Whatever our background and wherever we live, Canadians share the same basic hopes and aspirations. We are proud of the great country we have inherited. Above all, we are determined to leave it a better and stronger place for our children.

As I thought about our country and about what we would talk about today, I thought that it indeed is a miracle that we are a united country. We see the tremendous size of our country, the geographical differences, the cultural differences, the many different races, the different areas of the globe that we come from, and the tremendous economic disparities that our country has. Some areas are very wealthy and very rich in resources, other areas are very poor with very few resources. Yet we have been able to stick together. However, at this time we are faced with very significant and great threats to our unity.

I have noticed, particularly in the last two months, that when I talk to people on the street, or people phone me up and talk on the telephone, or wherever it may be, I hear more and more that we as Canadians need each other. We cannot allow one section of our country to leave. We need the maritimes. We need Quebec. We need central Canada, Ontario. We need our prairie provinces, and we need British Columbia.

We need to know, as well, the actual cost if this country should break up as has been threatened.

I have never seen any specific costs. We have had our economists say there will be great economic disruption, but I think the greater tragedy would be the loss of our social structures. We would see tremendous psychological damage. We would lose our status in the world community. We have just finished a meeting with the European parliamentarians in Victoria, and they were constantly coming and talking to us about what would happen if Canada should break up.

We have been a world example of a nation that has got along together in spite of differences throughout the country. They have, in many instances, looked at Canada and seen how we, despite our diversity, have been able to unite and work together to create a country that has, compared to its population, a tremendous influence on world affairs.

Another aspect of this throne speech that I would like to just comment on very briefly is the fact that we want Canadians everywhere to participate in prosperity. One of the sources of discontent within Canada is the tremendous discrepancy between the have areas and the have not areas. I come from British Columbia where we have great natural resources. We have a great future.

Then we look at the other side of the country, say Newfoundland, where their raw materials are limited, and yet we, as British Columbians, are anxious that the people of Newfoundland will prosper and enjoy the good things that we enjoy in British Columbia.

Through our history we have seen that various regions of the country have suffered while other areas have prospered. I think that, as it says in the Speech from the Throne:

> There is much more to Canadian unity than amending the Constitution. Our unity is strengthened by a strong economy. And prosperity is enhanced by a united country. But disunity in the face of the global economic challenge invites decline.

We need to very seriously consider that as we consider the next couple of years in our country's history. This government has done some very significant things to equalize the prosperity in the country. There was a great deal of anger in my part of the country over the very high interest rates, as I know there was in the maritimes. We felt that the outlying parts of the country were being punished by the rapid inflationary processes that were going on in southern Ontario.

As these interest rates have been allowed to decline, and as we have seen the equalization of opportunities to develop new industries across the country, the government is to be applauded for this very positive step. We hope that these interest rates will continue to drop, that we will see more and more opportunity for Canadian business.

As we prosper, as our economy becomes stronger, we will see that gap between the U.S. interest rates and our Canadian rates decline. This has been a great concern to many in business in Canada.

There is another area, also regarding this, that we need to look at very carefully as a government, and that is to reduce the amount of paperwork that we have inflicted upon our Canadian businessmen. Think of all the various government reports that are required. It is all very well to make it financially possible for them to prosper, but I think we also need to look at other areas where we have put unnecessary burdens upon our Canadian businessmen.

As we only have a short while, I will not go into all of the other details. In talking about the prosperity and ensuring that all Canadians participate in that prosperity, I would like to speak briefly about the Canada—U.S.—Mexico free trade arrangement. There was much debate, much controversy about the Canada—U.S. free trade deal. Of course, there is ongoing debate at the present time about a deal with Mexico and how it would affect Canada.

I hope that we will not just be involved in rhetoric in this debate but will see some very sound research done so we as Canadians will know precisely how the free trade agreement with Mexico and the U.S. will affect us as Canadians. I have heard many reports. Just this weekend I had a long discussion in Victoria about how British Columbia will benefit from the free trade arrangement with Mexico.

We need to not just take a public relations person's word for this, but I trust that the government will bring out the facts that will indicate how much better it will be if we have a true North American free trade area. While we were with the European parliamentarians we discussed a great deal of what will happen in 1992.

A tremendous trading bloc will be developed in Europe and it will, of course, be protecting its own self-interests versus North American interests. There will also be discussion of a possibility of an eastern-asiatic free trade arrangement.

These are the areas. While we are talking about economic factors, we need to comment again on the fact that it is essential that all levels of government control their spending tendencies. Just recently, we have seen in the Province of Ontario a situation where a provincial government, flying in the face of all other governments, has raised its deficit at a time when we are trying get these things under control. More and more of our Canadian dollars are being spent to pay off interest on money which we have borrowed from our children. It is grossly unfair.

In my last minute, I would like to talk briefly about the disabled Canadians who are mentioned in the throne speech. In 1986, there were estimated to be 3.3 million Canadians with some form of disability. Some of them are physically disabled. Some have mental disabilities.

We have seen in the last few years how they have become more and more a part of our society. Yet there is so much more that can be done. I would congratulate the government on its initiative of including the disabled in this particular throne speech. We are looking forward to the specific programs which will be announced as the program is outlined.

I would ask that the government look very seriously at those with mental problems. These people have been neglected in the past. We look at people in wheel chairs, the deaf and the blind. Yet people with mental disabilities are the ones who suffer the greatest.

I would implore the government of which I am a member to make sure that we consider the mental disabilities, the schizophrenics, the depressives in our country who need our help.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to what may be the final speaker from the government side talking about this very fuzzy document called the Speech from the Throne. I have had great difficulty with this.

An hon. member: Read it in French.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I think it would be equally bad in both official languages.

One of the problems that I have with the document is that it is long on platitudes, but the government's actions during the last number of years speak much louder than some of the hollow words in the Speech from the Throne.

One of the things in particular that I find offensive is the fact that this document—the member talks about economic competitiveness—talks about economic well-being being linked to national unity.

In the last number of years, this government has done everything humanly and subhumanly possible—some people might say—and in its power to ensure that we have not just one or two Canadas but that we have a number of different Canadas, all based on the level of input that you can put into society.

The level of economic disparity—he wants to talk about competitiveness—and economic renewal is really what will bring about great national unity. I would like for him to comment for a few minutes about how he could possibly justify the transfer of the burden of taxation from the federal government with its vast taxing powers to the poorest provinces in the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It is 5.45 p.m. and I must end the debate. I remind all members that the motion was carried on division 15 minutes ago.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.46 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

ENDANGERED AND THREATENED SPECIES ACT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–209, an act respecting the protection and rehabilitation of endangered and threatened species.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this act intends to protect and rehabilitate endangered and threatened species. In essence, it attempts to identify, protect and rehabilitate flora and fauna in Canada which are threatened or endangered by human activity; to develop and implement programs to restore the populations of threatened and endangered species of flora and fauna in Canada to self–sustaining numbers; and to provide legislative support to voluntary programs.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–210, an act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act.

• (1010)

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill to amend the Human Rights Act is one that was introduced during the last session of Parliament. I am reintroducing it.

In his 1989 report, the Human Rights Commissioner recommended certain changes in the act. In order to support the Human Rights Commissioner in his excellent work, I had drafted the proposals that he put forward in this bill.

Therefore, the bill could be proceeded with. Hon. members can consider the matter when it reaches committee. I would ask that we proceed with the bill at an early date.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour and a privilege to once again present a petition on behalf of a number of petitioners from the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

The petitioners are concerned about the government's decision to cut back on financial support for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They point out a whole set of concerns such as the possibility of increased levels of lawlessness as a result of the decrease in RCMP support by the federal government.

The petitioners are simply calling upon the government to restore proper funding to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by about 70 Canadians.

These Canadians come from diverse communities such as Surrey, Vancouver, Edmonton, Thorhild, Alberta, Burnaby, Redditt, Ontario, Kamloops, Kenora, Kitimat and Calgary.

All these petitioners are supporters of rail passenger services. They call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail service which was cut on January 15, 1990, maintain and, where appropriate, upgrade remote service on which many Canadians rely, provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

The petitioners want to put Canada back on track.

PAY SUPPLEMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition I received not long ago from a number of employees with Employment and Immigration Canada in the riding of Drummond, and this petition concerns the Pay Supplement Program. Your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to order the government as is its duty, to reverse its unilateral decision to abolish the pay supplement for health insurance, and do so retroactive to December 1, 1990, without loss of benefits.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition signed by residents of Edmonton, Calgary, Red Deer and Calmar, Alberta calling upon the government to enact legislation requiring manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in prepackaged foods and to require restaurateurs and food retailers to provide on demand to customers a list of all food ingredients and additives in prepared foods.

This is a petition I wholeheartedly support. I actively encourage the government to amend the food and drug regulations in order to prevent human deaths as a result of allergic reactions.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present another petition today.

The petitioners call for a bill to be passed by this House to make it an offence to destroy or desecrate the flag of Canada.

This petition is signed by numerous residents of Kingston and the Islands.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the Day.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I have a question on which I would like to have you adjudicate forthwith. My colleague from Kingston and the Islands will also wish to speak to this procedural point, as well as my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier.

We object to this particular motion being put—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could stand in abeyance for just a moment.

Thanks to the courtesy of hon. members, I am expecting a point of order. Probably I should ask for Orders of the Day to see what it is.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REINSTATEMENT OF BILLS

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we object procedurally to the motion that the government seeks to put before the House.

There are three points that I wish to make, and I believe that any one of them is sufficient cause for you, Sir, to refuse to put the question to the House.

First, the motion is defective in that one of its paragraphs is precisely the same terms as the motion already disposed of by this House. This is the paragraph referring to the Crown corporations bill. It is a well-known procedural principle that a matter, once decided by the House, cannot be reopened in the same session. This point is clearly stated in Beauchesne's fifth edition, which I read:

> 416.(1) An old rule of Parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House".

The paragraph in question was contained in a motion put by unanimous consent last week. The motion was carried and the bill referred to in the motion has been dealt with by this House. If the government had wanted to proceed with the rest of the motion, it had plenty of time to put down a new notice without this paragraph; but it clearly cannot now proceed with a motion that includes in my view the offending section.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could help the Chair. What you are saying is that the offensive part of the motion to which the hon. member is referring was in fact proposed with consent some days ago. Is that correct?

Mr. Dingwall: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: But it remains in the existing motion.

Mr. Dingwall: The second grounds for refusing to put this motion is that the motion attempts to place before the House five completely separate and distinct legislative matters which do not lend themselves to being considered together.

The government should have given notice of five individual motions. This motion has a legislative effect and it seeks to do in a speedy way what would never be permitted in the normal legislative procedure. The matters dealt with in this motion would never be permitted to be considered together in one omnibus bill and therefore, I suggest, should not be permitted to be dealt with in one omnibus motion.

It is no remedy to permit the motion to proceed with debate being held as if it were one motion with the question being split for a decision. The motion should be divided into separate parts, each of which, if otherwise found to be in order, should be debated and decided upon separately.

Third and finally, I contend that the motion is in principle unacceptable in that it seeks to circumvent, indeed to subvert, the normal legislative process of this House.

In the past this kind of thing has been done only by unanimous consent. Now the government is seeking to establish an ominous precedent by attempting to force this procedure on the House. This is an offensive and dangerous departure from the practices of all parliamentary bodies and the Chair is, I believe in accordance with Beauchesne's citation 123.(1) and Standing Order 1, required to refuse to put the motion because of its unprecedented violation of the checks and balances written into the rules governing the normal legislative process.

If the government wishes to amend the rules, it should bring in a motion to amend the rules. It knew what it was doing to legislative programs when it prorogued last session. It had had the opportunity before prorogation to deal with those rules. It is entirely offensive for the government to attempt now to subvert the very rules that it claimed to champion only five weeks ago.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that you have the authority to refuse to permit this transgression. On several grounds, three of which I have mentioned, you ought to refuse to allow the government to proceed with this motion.

My colleague from Kingston and the Islands, as well as my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier, would like to make references and interventions on this most important procedural aspect of this motion.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops would defer to his colleagues on the Official Opposition side. I will hear that argument and then move to the hon. member for Kamloops, presuming that the arguments will be brief.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, of course I will be brief. I wanted to refer Your Honour to a couple of authorities that support the propositions put forward by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, but I have a couple more points that I wanted to urge on Your Honour in respect to this important matter.

First I draw Your Honour's attention to Standing Order 1 of the House which states that in cases not provided for in the rules or by any other order of the House procedural questions should be decided by the Speaker—I am paraphrasing the rule slightly—whose decision shall be based on the usages, forms, customs and precedents of the House of Commons of Canada. I stress that.

What is happening today is unprecedented in that the government is moving a motion under Government Orders for debate to reinstate bills in this session. I have searched precedents back to 1938 and did not find one where a motion of this kind was moved for debate. It was always agreed to by unanimous consent. Never before has a government moved to suspend the rules in effect and put bills back into their position at the time of prorogation of a session.

If the royal prerogative is to mean anything the prorogation ended those bills. They have to be reinstated in the usual course, but they ought to have been introduced and dealt with as new bills in this session. That is the proper procedure in the absence of unanimous consent.

The usages and procedures of this House have always been that unanimous consent of the House is required in order to suspend the rules in relation to the reinstatement of bills. That is my first and primary point.

Based on the authorities—and I would like to cite the 21st edition of Erskine May on this point—the obligation to determine the procedural regularity of this motion clearly falls on you, Mr. Speaker. The power is a substantial one and it is set out on page 181 of this 21st edition, and I quote from it:

> It is the duty of the Speaker to preserve the orderly conduct of debate by repressing disorder when it arises, by refusing to propose the question upon motions and amendments which are irregular, and by calling the attention of the House to bills which are out of order (and securing their withdrawal).

Those are relevant words. I could go on if I were to take more time and read more of that paragraph. I commend it to Your Honour's reference on this very important point.

Second, I would refer Your Honour to—

—Beauchesne's, Sixth Edition, citation 171—I believe this is the first reference in this House to the French version of the new edition—and citation 171 reads as follows: "Foremost among many responsibilities, the Speaker has the duty to maintain an orderly conduct of debate by repressing disorder when it arises, by refusing to propose the question upon motions and amendments which are irregular, and by calling the attention of the House to bills which are out of order. The Speaker rules on points of order submitted by Members on questions as they arise".

This is more or less the same wording as Erskine May, Mr. Speaker. I think this is an important citation which gives a good indication of your authority.

Mr. Speaker, I will now refer to Beauchesne's, citation 566. In paragraph (5) of the citation we read: "Any irregularity of any portion of the motion shall render the whole motion irregular".

The author referred to the Journals of the House of Commons for May 31, 1954, at page 674. I found the quote, Mr. Speaker, and I have a copy here. The Speaker of the House at the time referred to this citation with great enthusiasm but did not follow it in his ruling. On that occasion he made a distinction.

So even if the reference is correct and the citation is favourable, I feel that the irregularity to which the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond referred is an irregularity in the motion, and therefore the whole motion is irregular.

[English]

Finally, I would refer to the citation in support of the division of motions to which my hon. friend from Cape Breton—East Richmond referred so ably. There is another serious problem with this motion which I would like to draw to your attention. That is the part of the motion that deals with the act respecting port wardens.

This is not really a motion to reinstate this bill in this House. The words in that section of the motion deemed this bill to have been passed and read at third reading in this House.

In other words, there is to be no discussion of this bill again. It is not put up for debate; it is not put back on the Order Paper. It is deemed passed by this House. That is completely beyond the scope of what a reinstatement motion can do in this House. It is not putting this bill back on the Order Paper. This bill will never appear on the Order Paper; it will be deemed to have been passed. I presume that if this motion were adopted in this form, the clerks would send a message to the Senate informing it that this House had adopted this bill.

For this House to adopt a bill without any debate, without any discussion at any stage, is completely irregular and improper. There has to be some limit to the powers which can be proposed in this place. The Speaker, as our presiding officer, must be able to say at some point: "This goes too far. This is beyond the ability of the House without unanimous consent".

With unanimous consent we can do anything in this place. However, for the Chair to permit a motion that circumvents all our rules in relation to a public bill is a very serious situation for the Chair to find itself in. Based on the authorities that I have cited, which give great authority to the Chair, there has to be some way to place restraints on what the government could do.

What is to stop the government then from introducing a motion saying: "In respect of the following 20 bills, they will all be deemed to be passed by the House of Commons"? Then they are all passed.

In other words, the government could introduce 20 bills on day one of the session, then introduce a motion on day two and debate the motion for two days and deem all of the bills passed.

That is the effect of this motion and that is contrary to constitutional law. That has never been done before. This is far beyond what is a reasonable limit on reinstatement of bills. I stress in the history of the customs, the usages and the practises of this House for over 50 years, according to my research, there has been no such motion ever introduced and passed in this House, except by unanimous consent. The government itself exercised its royal prerogative on May 13 to bring this session to an end on May 12. The publication has been made of the Governor General's proclamation declaring the session at an end. He started it again.

It was the government's decision to do it. It cannot have it both ways and now bring one of these motions to trample on the rights of this House and in effect prevent us from debating these bills. I request that Your Honour declare the motion out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I made an error. I am quite sure some hon. members noticed it. The hon. member for Kamloops, and I apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I simply want at this point to echo the comments made by my previous two colleagues. That is, to consider this motion to be appropriate would be setting a frightening precedent and would be making in my judgment a mockery out of the work done in a serious way by hon. members in this House.

The government is attempting to do in a two-day debate what this House is charged with doing by other well established and traditional means. To reflect once again the views of my colleague who spoke previously, I ask you to think of the consequences.

The government is attempting by a simple motion to deem a series of bills that are not even on the Order Paper, introduced, approved in principle, studied in committee, concurred in at report stage, read a third time, and passed.

If this motion is in order, then surely other motions to deem other bills passed would also have to be considered in order. Conceivably, to take this to an extreme, the government could accomplish by this means its entire legislative agenda within a two-day debate. That is, as some of us have indicated, a result of the change in the attitude of the government.

If this motion is allowed to proceed, we could compress in a sense the entire government agenda, with all of its legislation passed, in a matter of hours or days as opposed to it going through the appropriate stages.

What could possibly stop this abuse? The only thing that could stop it, Mr. Speaker, is your intervention today.

Are there any precedents on this motion? As my colleague who spoke previously indicated to the contrary, in past sessions the House has unanimously decided to revive certain bills from previous sessions, and it was only by unanimous consent that such motions were adopted. Again, I simply want to say that this has been used in this session. There have been some discussions and yes, as we know, a bill was dealt with earlier in this session because of the unanimous consent that it had received in order to enable it to proceed.

I simply want to say that Beauchesne's is clear on this point. In the fifth edition, citation 167, Beauchesne's states: "The effect of prorogation is at once to suspend all business until Parliament shall be summoned again. Not only are the sittings of Parliament at an end but all proceedings pending at the time are quashed. Every bill must", and I emphasize must, "therefore be renewed after prorogation as if it were introduced for the first time".

May is also clear. In the recent edition he notes that: "Proposals have been made for a provision either by statute or by Standing Orders for the suspension of public bills from one session to another or for resuming proceedings upon such bills notwithstanding a prorogation".

These schemes have been discussed in Parliament, carefully considered by committees, but by various considerations have restrained the legislature from departing from the rule that parliamentary proceedings are discontinued by prorogation.

The most recent publication we have as hon. members is the Précis of Procedure of our own House. Obviously a great deal of thought went into the wording to provide guidance to hon. members. It states on page 157 of our own Précis of Procedure:

> —any bill of a previous session, in order to be proceeded with, must be introduced again as a new bill. It is possible, however, with unanimous consent, to reintroduce bills in the new session at the same stage they had reached at the old session and to revive committee work in a similar manner with unanimous consent.

That is in our précis. This is what we use to guide us in our deliberations, in our process here. In my judgment the government is simply ignoring this in order to expedite its legislative agenda.

In summary, I just want to make six points. The motion is out of order in so far as it contains a question already decided by this House, as argued very aptly by my previous speaking colleagues.

Second, the government has had the opportunity to remedy this flaw in the motion and has elected not to do so. It is not the Speaker's job to facilitate the government's business by permitting the other parts of the motion to be put to the House now.

Third, the motion is too broad. It asks too many questions of the House. It should at least be divided for purposes of debate as well as for voting.

Fourth, the omnibus nature of the proposed motion sets a very dangerous precedent for the management of government business as it permits the normal, conventional, historical, and traditional review of legislation to be circumvented.

Fifth, the motion offends the parliamentary conventions surrounding prorogation. All the authorities and all the practices direct bills to die upon prorogation.

Last, there is no precedent for a government motion which lacks unanimous support of the House to revive bills.

I suggest humbly, Mr. Speaker, that this motion is out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. The arguments made so far seem convincing, and I support them all because they are good arguments. It is true that traditionally, when after prorogation a government wishes to resume consideration of a bill at a given stage, unanimous consent is the usual vehicle, and we saw this in the House on May 23 when we gave unanimous consent for Bill C–73, which as you know, Mr. Speaker, has followed the usual legislative course and is now before the Senate.

In that case, I don't see why the government did not apply the same procedure to the other bills it wanted to reinstate. Mr. Speaker, there are two points I would like to make. First, I think we should consider the word "prorogation" and find out exactly what it means. Second, why do we use it and what are the consequences of doing so?

Mr. Speaker, so far, according to my references, prorogation—I will try to be as clear as I can—means that the government, with the consent of the Queen, decides to end a session of Parliament. All business is therefore suspended.

Usually, when the government decides to prorogue, this means it has exhausted its agenda and does not want to continue. What we have before us now is a government that prorogued the House, in other words, it decided to drop the proposed legislation mentioned in Motion No. 1, Bills C–58, C–73, C–78, C–82 and C–85 of this Parliament's second session.

Mr. Speaker, all the authorities I consulted, including Erskine May and Beauchesne, agree—I will read a few because I think it would be useful to know exactly what we are talking about. Erskine May:

[English]

"The effect of prorogation is at once to terminate all the current business of Parliament, not only the sitting of Parliament at an end, but all proceedings pending at the time are quashed except impeachments by the Commons and appeals by the House of Lords". And it goes on. All items are quashed.

We could go on to Beauchesne's. Beauchesne's is a little more explicit on prorogation.

Effect of prorogation and adjournment

Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, citation 167.

(1) The effect of a prorogation is at once to suspend all business until Parliament shall be summoned again. Not only are the sittings of Parliament at an end, but all proceedings pending at the time are quashed. Every bill must therefore be renewed after a prorogation, as if it were introduced for the first time.

What we have before the House, Mr. Speaker, is a motion that is faulty because it is inaccurate. Bill C–73 was reinstated with the unaminous consent of the House and has been withdrawn. The government did not remove the reference to this bill. My colleagues who spoke earlier mentioned this, and I think it is an important point to consider when the Chair will be asked to rule on this matter, Mr. Speaker.

We are now being asked to pass bills that were passed in whole or in part by this House. I think that Bill C–82, for example, had passed all legislative steps and been sent to the Senate. Now the government wants to start all over, but in a very special way, the legislative procedure for the bill dealing with the authority to appoint a port warden for the Harbour of Quebec and so on.

I do not understand why, Mr. Speaker, on May 23, when they came with Bill C–73 requesting unanimous consent, they could not have proceeded in the same way with Bill C–82 or some other bill once consent was given. I now oppose, Mr. Speaker, being presented with this jumble of legislation, some of which we seriously oppose and some of which we have agreed to. I cannot understand why this government, these government bullies now want to impose their will on the House of Commons through force of numbers and then would have us believe that they are sensitive to parliamentary reform and want Canadians to see this House work in a friendly, co–operative way.

We presented arguments, Mr. Speaker. I will not repeat them all because there are some good ones. There are good arguments that the government has no business proceeding as it is doing and that it is contrary to parliamentary reform and all political decency. Administratively, it may not be so different whether it is done unanimously or in the way the government proposes; the effect is the same—the House will have the bill before it. I say to the government that it is bad politically to proceed in this way and that we will regret it in this House. Canadians will again say that the government is again reducing proceedings in the House to the lowest level.

Mr. Speaker, something else concerns me too. Every bill must have authorization called the "royal recommendation". As far as I know, none of these bills has a royal recommendation. Each one of these bills will have to be printed separately and bear the royal recommendation. Mr. Speaker, I do not see how they can come to us with this package and tell us that once the motion is adopted, each bill will be printed and contain the royal recommendation.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is bad management, bad policy and, in my opinion, unparliamentary.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I am aware that some other hon. members wish to address the Chair. I will keep that in mind. For the moment I will hear the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if you are intending to hear further argument, considering my role of responding to arguments, I would rather hear all the arguments and come at the end.

Mr. Speaker: I accept the hon. parliamentary secretary's suggestion.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the recognition and I will try to be brief.

I was not in the Chamber when the motion was formally put. Through the benefit of the modern technology of television, I had the set turned down low and heard a little and frankly could not believe my ears as to what was being proposed by my friend opposite, the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the government House leader.

I am not going to repeat the arguments that have been made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the hon. member for Kamloops, let alone the hon. member who just spoke.

This to me, in the years that I have been here, would boggle the mind in terms of the effective working of Parliament. What really disturbs me, having spent a good many years on the opposition side, is that we know, and my former friends across the way know from when they were on the opposition side, that the prorogation date is sometimes used as the negotiating lever to get bills to move along. Under the tradition and history of the British parliamentary system, come prorogation, everything on the Order Paper died.

It was then incumbent on the government and the responsibility of the government in the new session to reintroduce the bills and/or try to work matters out by consent, as it often did.

Mr. Speaker, you have a good memory also. There were many times in this Chamber in which a deal was made before prorogation. Sometimes, by unanimous consent, bills which were on the Order Paper, certain ones being difficult to agree on perhaps, were nevertheless put together as a package even though prorogation was going to come that hour. In effect, these bills would stay by formal motion in the House in the same position on the Order Paper as they were before prorogation.

To me, without repeating everything that has been said, and I understand what my hon. friend from Ottawa—Vanier mentioned about reform, I am all for the reform of this place. I am all for expediting the business of this place. I think we waste a lot of time in this place. There is a way to do it.

If this government is going to bring in an omnibus motion, in effect just lumping all the bills together that were at some stage in a previous session of Parliament, and then through a formal motion of the House where they know they have the numbers to have that the fait accompli for the passage of all the different items in the motion, then this will bode very poorly to say the least for debate in this Chamber in the future.

Why would a government really worry about the opposition's concern about various bills if it knows that come prorogation date the debate will be cut off and Parliament will be prorogued since it has a majority. In the new Parliament the government knows it will not lose anything anyway.

The government can bring in an omnibus package resolution which has never been done before, as far as I know. I have not had time to go through the authorities, I have not seen an authority to justify this yet. This might be the way for government to really move a lot of business along, to go through this prorogation charade. In a new session, it can put all these bills down on the Order Paper and have one vote because of a Notice of Motion.

I think this is a very serious matter. I know the Chair will give it the consideration it deserves because I can see real problems in the future. What disappoints me is that those who used to sit in the opposition know the few levers the opposition has to focus attention in a proper way on government bills.

I would humbly suggest that this type of precedent, if approved, will remove the lever that is the whole reason for this place.

The former hon. member for Prince Albert, John Diefenbaker would say: "This is a place to talk". We all know we talk too much from time to time and there is too much repetition. There is too much reading of speeches. I wish that would be corrected.

If that was corrected Parliament would not be bogged down in so much tedious rhetoric, taking the time of the House and the staff and costing the taxpayers so much money.

I have to compliment the parliamentary secretary, the House leader and the government for its ingenuity in doing things this way. My compliment, however, is a back-handed one. This type of move shows no respect at all for the whole basis of why we are here in a parliamentary institution. While I give it a back-handed compliment for the ingenuity of carrying out certain instructions or trying to move along with government business, which is commendable, this is not the way to do it. It would be a very invidious precedent. I ask the Chair to exercise the discretion and experience of all table officers in interpreting this motion to make sure it does not come to fruition.

If this happens then, boy, you can kiss goodbye—I mean our government would only be human; it will do it once and do it again—opposition discussion or debate and use a coming prorogation or summer recess as a time when people do come together. It is like the old proverbial hanging. There is nothing that focuses the mind better than when the man is marching up to the gallows. Someone said something classical to that effect.

We all know how this system works. There is a lot of time-clock running, yet there are certain events where there is a focus of attention. If this thing goes through, one can forget about the focus of attention and this place becomes, to me, sadly, even less of a chamber for real debate than it is at the present time.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few brief points.

First, on May 11, 1977, Mr. Speaker at that time ruled on an issue involving omnibus legislation, but it is important to note and I quote from Hansard of May 11, 1977, which referred to "different although related subjects". In other words, the only reason at that time that the omnibus legislation being contested before Mr. Speaker by members of the opposition allowed to proceed was based on the fact that it was different yet related.

The legislation before us today is as follows: "An act to amend aeronautics, an act respecting exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying and selling of certain weapons, an act regarding the status of artists in Canada, and another act concerning combating the laundering of proceeds of crime".

Even if one were to state that the precedent of 1977 was valid, it would only be valid if the bills were different yet related. The bills of course are not related at all. Therefore, any attempt by anyone to utilize that precedent as justification would be faulty.

Second, if we cannot do something by omnibus legislation we surely, as the hon. House leader for the opposition has stated, cannot do it by omnibus motion to pass a series of different bills together. If one is wrong, the other is equally wrong.

Finally, if this precedent is allowed to proceed, then what is next? I ask the question rhetorically. If one can resuscitate five bills with this motion, or four bills, what stops one from resuscitating all legislation from the past? Carrying it to the next level, what stops us from adopting a motion today deeming that all bills have reached third reading, every single bill that is before the House right now? What stops us from resuscitating a bill from 1977, saying that that particular bill has now reached third reading, and we are going to vote on it right now? As a matter of fact, we could actually pass a motion stating it has completed third reading debate.

What we are in fact doing is amending completely the rules of the House by adopting this motion, were we to do so, or were this motion to be ruled in order. The implications of ruling this motion in order would be such that I fear we could render—if a government wanted to, and I am not saying it does—this House of Commons totally irrelevant and redundant. We would simply deem everything and anything to have been passed, to have been at third reading, or to have been at any stage if for any reason the government did not want to proceed with other stages of the bill.

I would hope the Speaker would consider those additional points I have just raised.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to be brief along the same lines as the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. This House is governed by specific rules, practices, and precedents.

As far as I can gather, it has always been the practice that when there is prorogation, all the bills on the Order Paper die. The practice of the House is that with unanimous consent, you can resurrect any bill at the point where it was when the House prorogued. That is the practice. That is the precedence. Not since Bram Stoker wrote Dracula have we been able to see this wholesale resurrection of zombies, which the government is attempting to do with this zombie amendment, or this zombie motion. It is to raise the undead. All these bills are the undead bills, the zombie bills. It is attempting to do that with one motion.

The practices, the precedents and the rules of the House provide a check and a balance and there are certain provisions and certain practices and precedents such as the unanimous consent to resurrect a bill after prorogation which, in fact, is the check on the tyranny of the majority in the House of Commons. That is one of the checks that the opposition has.

Mr. Speaker, you can check the records, but in the past there has been unanimous consent for certain bills to be resurrected. In fact, even in the present session of Parliament there are a couple of bills that have had unanimous consent to be resurrected. I can think of Bill C-83, which is now Bill C-4.

I do not think that the government should be allowed to establish a new precedent. I do not think it should be allowed to overrun a balance that the opposition has had over these many years of parliamentary procedures, practices and precedents. So, I would ask you in considering, to rule this motion out of order and let us put these through the proper process.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do want to spend a few minutes going through some of the arguments that have been put before you this morning and try and address them.

I would like to work backward through the arguments and, therefore, want to start with the comments of the hon. member for Prescott—Russell, the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, and at the same time, the arguments of the member for Kamloops, because essentially, as I listened to them I thought the argument was, in all three cases, the same.

What was originally begun by the hon. member for Kamloops was that he tried to take the process we are undergoing today and paint his picture by taking it to the extreme. It is not an uncommon debating tactic. In fact, it is one that the hon. member uses regularly in the House.

Mr. Boudria: Hey, hey.

Mr. Cooper: I am sorry. I listened. I would like an opportunity to make my arguments, Mr. Speaker.

What he is essentially saying is that if you were to find this motion in order, then it is the same precedent as the omnibus bill and, therefore, what the government could do is come in and make a motion and pass every piece of legislation and everything that the government may ever want to do in this particular session of Parliament.

Of course, we have heard the argument before. We heard the same argument put by the same member when we discussed the rule changes. He said this was the kind of power that was going to be given to the government. In reality, this is a very different situation. We are not, by this motion, cutting off debate. All we are doing is reinstating bills at the stage they were left at in the previous session.

No, we are not cutting off a third reading debate or a report stage debate. We are not cutting debate off. We are simply arguing, and I think very credibly to the Canadian taxpayer, that there is no need to repeat all of that debate that has already taken place.

For example, Bill C-26, one of the bills mentioned in this particular motion, had 12 hours and 35 minutes of debate in the House already. It is now at report stage. Is it necessary to repeat all of that debate? No, I do not believe it is. That is why we are proceeding with this motion.

This is not a case of a government coming in and creating some sort of omnibus bill that ends forever the need for Parliament. What we are doing is saving the time of the House by not repeating debate that has already gone before this House. The hon. member for Kamloops used as his document the Précis of Procedure. I want to make a quick comment on that because I want to deal with some of the other citations that were mentioned by others.

The précis is just that. All it is, in layman's language, is an explanation or discussion of the rules and practices of this House of Commons. It has never been used as a binding authority. It is not Beauchesne's, it is not the Standing Orders. The language in the précis may be strong and very descriptive, but it is designed so that those of us who are not experts in the rules can have some sort of an understanding of the subject that we may want to have some interest in.

Mr. Boudria: That is a really strong argument.

Mr. Cooper: Perhaps it is a very strong argument.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier as usual made a good argument in the House of Commons and as usual it was very persuasive for people who are watching the debate. What he essentially said, and he referred to Erskine May and other citations of other documents, was that all business of the House of Commons is quashed with prorogation. That was the thrust of his argument.

That is not true. We have plenty of precedents where business from a previous session prior to a prorogation has been reinstated. We have plenty of examples of that. It has not always been quashed. Maybe by another process, but bills, questions and all sorts of things—and you know the precedents as well or better than I do, Mr. Speaker—have been reinstated in this House of Commons. The process may have been different, but the precedent is very clear that in fact there is argument and precedent for reinstatement.

The member for Kingston and the Islands made four points, as I listened to his arguments. The first point was that what we were doing was unprecedented and therefore out of order. If we were to take the argument that any time a decision, action or process is new it is therefore out of order, or because it is different it is unprecedented and therefore it cannot be done, then judges, lawyers, the Speaker of the House, I, in my role as a parliamentary secretary to the House leader, the House leaders of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party would not be able to proceed because all we could do if we could rely only on precedents would be simply to follow what our predecessors have done. That in and of itself is not an argument. It is a basis for much of our arguments and in most cases a good reason. Simply because we are using a process or a practice that is not clearly precedented does not in and of itself assure that process is out of order or in some way in contempt of this House of Commons.

We have precedents. We have precedents of reinstating business in this House of Commons. We are dealing today with a different process but the precedents are very clear.

Second, the hon. member says that it is up to the Speaker to maintain order. I agree. I have no problem with that. That is the role of the Speaker. Let us be specific, and I want to raise this particular citation because it applies not only to the arguments of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands but also to the arguments of the Liberal House leader. It talks about the Speaker's right to rule on motions or processes before the House in order to maintain order. I want to read citation 411, page 149 of Beauchesne's fifth edition, subsection (3), the latter part of the paragraph:

> There can be but one question pending at the same time, though there may be numerous matters of business in various stages of progress standing on the Order Paper for consideration during the session. The only exception from this citation occurs at the report stage of a bill, when the Standing Orders confer upon the Speaker the power to combine amendments or clauses for discussion and decision.

There were references made to the power of the Speaker in relation to motions. What this citation is saying is that power, the one referred to by my hon. friends, is at the report stage. It is not particularly in this case and there are plenty of arguments and reasons why the Speaker can find that this particular motion is completely in order.

The third argument the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands made was that any irregularity of any portion of a motion would therefore make all of the motion irregular. I believe what he was pointing to is the fact that Bill C-73, as named in this motion, had been previously adopted by the House of Commons by unanimous consent and has now a new number on the Order Paper and we proceeded with it last week, I believe.

He argues that because this particular part of the motion has already been dealt with by the House, the motion in and of itself should be null and void.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that if you check through your precedents you will find one which says that what has happened here is that the House has taken action on a part of a motion and therefore that part of the motion becomes mute, becomes silent.

Before I proceeded in this way I did seek advice. I sought counsel from people who are experts in procedure. I talked to a number of people to make sure that what I was dealing with here did not require a second motion. I must say the advice I received, I think unanimously, was that what would happen is that all we would be dealing with is a part of the motion becoming mute but not in any way requiring a new motion or some sort of other method of dealing with it.

Mr. Speaker, if you check through practices in this House you will find that on a regular basis we will decide to do something in the House and yet we will continue to go through the process, the forms, even though there has already been a decision of the House. We do that because we recognize that we have a situation which has been changed by this agreement but we continue with that process to follow through with the form. I think that applies very much in this case. The fact that one particular element of this motion has already been dealt with by the House does not in any way make the rest of the motion irregular.

The final argument made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, and he used the example of the port warden's bill, was that what is happening is we are cutting off debate, we are bringing it in at a stage that is not even a stage of the House.

We do not traditionally talk as a message to the Senate as being a part of our first, second or third reading process. We do not traditionally include it in part of the stages of a bill or a motion. Nevertheless, it is very much a part of our process. Our message to the Senate is a signal saying that we in this House have dealt with first, second, third, committee and so on stages of the bill and have sent a message off to the Senate and waiting for its reply. It is a part of our process. It is a part of our practice and to reinstate this particular bill at this stage is completely in order and is consistent with what I have said earlier, that in fact what we are dealing with is not a cutting off of debate but a continuation of a bill at a stage it was at prior to the prorogation of this House. The House leader of the Liberal Party made three arguments. First, he said that one paragraph has already been adopted by the House and therefore the motion is out of order. I think I have dealt with that at length.

Second, he said that there are five separate and distinct matters in this motion and therefore it is abnormal and should be ruled out of order. That is not the case. What we have is five distinct subjects within a motion, but they are not totally separate because of the thrust or theme of this motion.

The thrust or theme of this motion is reinstatement. What we essentially have is a motion asking for reinstatement at a certain stage and the particulars of that relate to particular bills. It is not unlike what we just went through in this House of Commons a short time ago when we dealt with rule changes. We had a motion to deal with rule changes but Private Members' Business and dealing with committees at great length were in that process. We had several subject areas that are unique and distinct in our Standing Orders but the motion that was being debated was the reform of the House.

That is exactly what we are in right now. We have a discussion of a motion before this House to reinstate the business of the House. Then what we have is only the particulars of that motion, the clauses of a bill if I can put it that way, which reinstate particular items at a certain point.

We are dealing with different items in a particular motion and to rule that motion out of order on that basis would mean no motions could proceed in this House of Commons because virtually every motion we deal with on the floor of this House contains in it different and quite often very diverse subject matters and subject areas.

I want to look at citation 751 of Beauchesne's. The reason I want to look at it is because I think it points out the processes of this House, the way that we as members deal with the processes and the way that the Speaker analyses and rules on those processes. Can one imagine a situation in which this House makes a decision on a certain subject and then immediately by motion reverses the decision?

Citation 751(1) of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition states:

> When the motion that the bill be now read a second time is negatived,—

In other words it is defeated:

> —it is competent for a Member to move immediately without notice: "That the Bill be read a second time on—

And a date:

—next".

What we have there is a circumstance in which the House has made a decision and then by motion we can come at it again, at the same stage.

What I am essentially arguing is that what we are dealing with here are the effects of a prorogation, a precedent which has been established in the past with not a new process, but a process which is completely in order.

I want to conclude by making these four points. There is precedent for reinstatement of business in the House of Commons. We have done it before by suspending Standing Orders, by consent of the House. We have done it before by unanimous consent and we did it just last week by unanimous consent.

To bring business back into the House is clearly precedented. We are talking here only of process.

Second, citation 412, subparagraph (1), page 150 states:

> The question is the subject matter of the motion, and on the merits of that subject matter the House has to give a decision either unanimously or by the majority of the members present.

In other words, there are two ways we can go on a motion. We can do it unanimously, which we do from time to time, or we can do it by division. The end result of that vote is the conclusion of the argument. In fact, that is what we are doing here today.

We could have done this unanimously. We could have saved ourselves an hour and fifteen minutes of House time. We could have been debating any one of these bills, for example. Instead, the House has chosen not to do it unanimously but to debate it and then divide on it.

Perfectly in order. A perfectly logical way of proceeding, and in fact that is what citation 412 of Beauchesne says. That is in fact what we are doing.

The third point concerns the argument that we are doing something unique and peculiar. One of the unique points of our particular Standing Orders is that from time to time we suspend our own Standing Orders, we suspend our own rules. We do that sort of thing regularly. In fact, if you look at the rules and forms of the House of Commons of Canada, with annotations, comments and precedents and so on, from 1958, it says in Item X, which is the way it is designated on page 11, that: "The House may even pass an order prescribing a course of procedure inconsistent with the Standing Orders. A motion for such temporary suspension requires notice", and it goes into particular Standing Orders.

We have done that sort of thing before. We have the precedent, we have reinstated bills in this House of Commons before by suspending Standing Orders, by unanimous consent. We have another process. There is nothing wrong with the process that is before us today.

It really boils down to one simple argument. Yes, we could go back and go through these five bills again. We could debate them once more, at tremendous cost to the House in time, at tremendous cost to the taxpayers of Canada, who are saying to us as members of this House: "quit fooling around, get serious, do some business, cut out the partisan games". We have heard it on all sides of the House. What we have done today is not in any way to cut off debate but rather to allow this House to continue the debate at precisely the same point it had ended debate prior to prorogation.

I have listened to my friends. I listened to them carefully and quietly. I wanted to hear their argument. However, there has not been a single compelling argument that would allow the Speaker to proceed to find this motion out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary and I thank other hon. members. I have listened very carefully to this debate. I hope it is going to help me in making a decision. The hon. members would not be surprised if I said that given the complexity of this and given the precedents that have been cited and the authorities that have been cited, that I should reserve. I will try to return to the House as soon as possible. In the meantime we should probably proceed with the debate.

I will do everything I can to return as quickly as possible with a ruling. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I fully understand. I am sure that members in the House will want to co-operate with the Chair if the Chair wants to have time to reflect upon the interventions made by all members of Parliament, and I would concur with that.

However, I believe, as it is germane to our discussions, it would be very difficult for those of us on this side to proceed with debate until such time as a decision is rendered by the Chair.

• (1120)

Perhaps by way of accommodating the Chair and my colleagues to the left, maybe there could be some disposition that we might adjourn to the call of the Chair in order that we may have the decision and then proceed. We are of the view, quite opposite from the government, that the motion is out of order. Until such time as we have an adjudication of the procedural argument, we do not believe that it would be prudent to proceed.

Therefore, I suggest that perhaps we could adjourn to the call of the Chair or until two o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops and then the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would concur with the point raised by my hon. friend. the Liberal House leader. However, I am also aware that we have a legislative agenda that we might wish to pursue other than government business item no. 1. This is a complex issue, as we have argued, and a critical issue in terms of the precedent that will be set for hon. members to consider in the future.

On the list of scheduled business is Motion No. 5, consideration of Bill C–5. I would say, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, that we are prepared to move quickly ahead with this. It is an important piece of legislation and we would be prepared to begin debate on that immediately.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. members with care. They will know that in order for the House to proceed with business, there are a lot of people involved. Therefore, to change the business quickly is always a difficult thing.

We have been in this situation before in this House, on several occasions, when we have been waiting for a Speaker's ruling. What we have done in all cases was to proceed with the debate and wait for the Speaker's ruling, certainly in all the cases that I can think of at the moment.

I would ask that we do continue with the debate. I am quite confident, having listened to the arguments today, that the time of the House in debating the subject will not be wasted.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, just to perhaps help the Chair in deciding, and without getting involved in the cross–fire on the order of business, I understand the problems on both sides of the House.

I listened to the parliamentary secretary in a rebuttal in support of the motion. I am just wondering if I could pose a question to the parliamentary secretary who argued very persuasively on some of the points. I am not going to try to rebut his argument. It stands on its own merit and there are several points that I agree with which rebut some of the points made by the opposition.

Regarding the compelling nature of the precedent, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary this question. In law, we usually never ask a question unless we know the answer. I did not hear the early procedure and perhaps I will be thrown down by my own question. My question to the parliamentary secretary in talking about a compelling nature is: Because there is only one issue here, as far as I am concerned, not all the other more refined arguments about motions in order or out of order and/or some parts of the motion staying mute because the House has already deliberated, and I tend to agree with the parliamentary secretary on that but in his discussions for counsel before he introduced the motion and/or what he said earlier today, and I missed part of it—can the parliamentary secretary give us any precedent from the Mother of Parliaments, where there has been a prorogation and a similar motion was introduced in an omnibus package to reinstate a certain number of bills in a certain form?

If he cannot, will the parliamentary secretary tend to agree with me, although he might not want to, that we can have such a compelling practice and tradition in the procedures and processes of this House that we do not try to make white black and black white by introducing this type of motion? In other words, is there another precedent for this?

When I first heard the argument upstairs on television, I could not believe it. The only argument that the parliamentary secretary made, and I understand the subtlety of the argument, was that there were ways to reinstate bills. I agree with that, but part of my question concerns the fact that, as far as I know the only way to reinstate a bill that was killed in prorogation, is by unanimous consent. I ask the question this way that compelling procedures and practices apply. Can the parliamentary secretary tell us if he found any precedent in any House of Commons for trying to do what he is doing here today?

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to cut the parliamentary secretary off, but I have listened very carefully to the arguments. I can assure hon. members that the Speaker is not in any doubt whatsoever about the issue that is in front of us.

If the hon. parliamentary secretary wishes to respond, I certainly will hear him. We have heard very full argument, and I do not want to keep this going all day.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I think your point is well taken. There has been long and effective argument. I will let my case rest at that.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to have to ask for the co-operation of the House. Under the circumstances—and it is not the first time we have done this by any means at all—I am going to ask the House to carry on with debate on this matter. I will try to return to the House as quickly as possible with an appropriate ruling.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for Mr. Andre) moved:

That, notwithstanding any Standing or Special Order of this House, the following Bills introduced in the Second Session of the Thirty-fourth Parliament be reinstated forthwith in this Session as follows:

An Act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time, referred to and reported by a Legislative Committee with an amendment, concurred in at report stage with an amendment and ordered for a third reading (Bill C-26);

An Act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time, referred to and reported by a Legislative Committee with amendments (Bill C-58);

An Act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time, referred to and reported by a Legislative Committee with an amendment (Bill C-73);

An Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time, and referred to Legislative Committee C (Bill C-78);

An Act to amend An Act to provide for the appointment of a Port Warden for the Harbour of Quebec and An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the office of Port Warden for the Harbour of Montreal, and to validate certain fees and charges established pursuant thereto, be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time, referred to and reported by a Legislative Committee without amendment, concurred in at report stage and read a third time and passed (Bill C-82);

An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports, be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time, referred to and reported by a Legislative Committee without amendment (Bill C-85); and

That the evidence adduced and documents received by any Legislative, Standing or Special Committee of this House, in the Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament in relation to these bills, be deemed to have been referred to a Legislative or Standing Committee in this present session.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will not take a lot of time in this particular debate because what I essentially want to do is put on the record of the House of Commons just a quick discussion of the five bills that are part of this motion, not in a substantive way, but to address what we are trying to do with this particular motion, which is to bring them back at the stages they were at prior to prorogation.

Bill C-26, which is an act to amend the Railway Act, grain and flour subsidies, is an issue that has had a significant amount of time in this House. In fact, it had some three days at second reading stage, for a total of over nine hours. That ended, Mr. Speaker, on April 30. It was then in committee until somewhere around June 5, 1990, that bill came back and had three and a half hours at the report stage. The bill deals with a situation that is already in practice. What we are simply trying to do is to bring the legislative powers up to speed or up to date with what is already being practised. We, therefore, are anxious to continue with the report and third reading stages of this particular bill.

Bill C-58 is an act to amend the Young Offenders Act. It is a very important issue and one that is very much on the minds and in the thoughts of Canadians today. I saw an article in the newspaper just last week talking about the concerns people had with the opposition not allowing or, as it publicly stated, not co-operating with the speedy passage of this particular bill. The bill is at the second reading stage. It has had just a little over two hours debate at this point, but obviously there is much work to be done and much discussion needed yet and we, as a government, are anxious to proceed with those discussions and those debates. We look forward to doing just that because we believe it is an issue that the Canadian public is concerned about and wants to see a decision of this House.

Bill C–78 is an act dealing with the environment. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I do not have to tell you or anybody in this House that that is very much a topical issue, an issue of a great deal of concern to Canadian people. At the second reading stage of that particular bill we had nearly 13 hours of debate, spread over some six days here in the House of Commons. This is an issue that the Canadian public and the Canadian taxpayers want us to work on now. They want us to discuss the issue of the environment. They are anxious for this House to pronounce itself on things such as the green plan and the legislative agenda that the government has put forward through Bill C–78 and other vehicles.

Bill C–82 is an act to amend an act to provide for the appointment of a port warden for the harbour of Quebec.

In some ways, this probably demonstrates best the need for this particular motion that we have before us. In fact, what happened on Bill C–82 is that on November 5, 1990, the House took exactly 45 minutes to debate second reading.

Of course, as you or anyone who watches the House regularly would know, Mr. Speaker, it then went on to committee. It returned to the House on December 14 for the report stage and third reading. It took exactly two minutes of House time because the House supported the thrust of what was going on here.

The House was ready to decide. As a result of that, to reinstate the bill and all those stages would unnecessarily delay a bill for which the House had already indicated a pretty strong degree of support.

By proceeding with this motion, I think we are doing the taxpayer and Canadians in general a favour.

Bill C–85, the last one in the motion, is an act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations, et cetera. At second reading stage to this point, there has been a total of four hours and 45 minutes on this issue.

There are several important stages before the members of this House that we are going to have to continue in the debate relating to this bill. We have the full committee stage. We have an issue that is important not only to members but to a number of employees, employers and people across the country who are very concerned about this issue.

What we are asking by way of this motion is that this particular bill can continue at the stage it was at, which is either at the end of second reading or just having completed second reading and being ready to go on to committee.

We are anxious, as a government and as members on this side of the House, to get that issue before the committee, to discuss it, to look at whatever amendments may be necessary, and we look forward to doing just that.

I want to conclude my remarks by saying that at the moment we have before us some five bills, all of which are important to the Canadian public and to members of this House of Commons. I would hope that we could proceed with this motion as quickly as possible.

The government does not want to in any way tie up the time of the House or to waste taxpayers' money, but rather it wants us to spend our time debating the substantive issues, which are these particular bills. They would be reinstated at the stage they were at prior to prorogation on the successful completion and adoption of the motion before the House at this time.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the parliamentary secretary. I must say that we participate in this debate on the substance of the motion with some degree of reluctance.

I think one could refer to our participation as participation under duress. There is quite a cloud, in my view, hanging over this Chamber today. We have had a motion, the procedure of which has been questioned by many members in this House. Of course, the Chair is in the process of making an adjudication on its acceptability.

Notwithstanding that, the government nevertheless intends to proceed with debating the substance of the motion while the cloud vis-à-vis its procedure is still in serious doubt by members who are on this side of the Chamber.

I make those remarks not to reflect upon any decision of the Chair, but to make it very clear that our participation is done so under reluctance and under duress because we believe an adjudication forthwith would be the most appropriate. If not that, the parliamentary secretary would have availed himself of the opportunity under the guise of co-operation in facilitating legislation in this House, perhaps for a short adjournment in order for the matter to be adjudicated.

Notwithstanding that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader has made reference to taxpayers' money and their concern, with his hand to his heart—the only thing he did not have was a tear in his eye—with regard to these particular bills. It was not my decision, nor was it the decision of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, and it was not the decision of the House leader of the New Democratic Party to adjourn the House for an entire month. It was not our decision. It was the decision of the government that was so concerned about money, concerned about taxpayers' expenditure. I think it ought to take that into account.

It was not the Liberal opposition or the New Democratic opposition which finally came to the decision to prorogue this House. If Bill C-26 was so important to the legislative and economic thrust of the government, why did it prorogue? Is it because it could not get its members here to debate the substance of the bill? What was it? It is utter nonsense to hear the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader make such references to the fact that these bills have now come back to the House and they ought not to start in the ordinary legislative process.

I find it very unacceptable that statements of that particular nature have been put on the record by the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, knowing full well that that is incorrect. I would go on to say much stronger words, Mr. Speaker, but let me say this. The hon. member is very careless with the truth.

The motion before us today in its substance is totally unacceptable to any serious parliamentarian. In my view and in the view of my party, this motion is designed for the sole purpose of subverting the legislative rules of the Parliament of Canada. These rules have been developed over the years and in fact over centuries, not as an impediment to the enactment of legislation, but as a delicate system of checks and balances designed to weigh the need for expeditious decisions on proposed legislation against the need for full examination and discussion of the proposals both in Parliament and in the public.

At the beginning of a session, the government outlines its legislative intentions and in the fullness of time it gives 48 hours notice of specific bills which are then given first reading and printed. After a delay of at least a day, the bill is debated at second reading and then is referred to the appropriate committee to hear evidence about the effect of the bill and to adjust the details. It is then returned to the House for possible further technical adjustment at the report stage and for final debate and approval at third reading. The bill is then considered in a similar process by the Senate and when it has been passed in the upper chamber and by both Houses of Parliament, the bill is then granted Royal Assent.

It is the responsibility of the government to introduce its legislation and to manage it to assure its conclusion by the end of the parliamentary session. The government alone, and this point must be made for members opposite, controls the timing of the ending of a session. Prorogation is entirely an executive act. The government arranges to prorogue a session in full knowledge of which bills will not have been completed in the legislative process. It is utter nonsense for the parliamentary secretary to make reference to Bill C-78 with regard to sustainable development in the environment.

If the government was so bent on having that particular piece of legislation, it had every opportunity to arrange a schedule of this Parliament to have further examination and then a resolution made by this House.

If a bill is so late in introduction or so poorly conceived that its legislative progress is unusually slow, the government alone bears that responsibility. It has more than adequate rules to assist it in taking on this particular responsibility. If a bill has not been passed by the end of a session, its death is thrice the responsibility of the government opposite.

First, the bill was not introduced in a timely way. Second, the government did not properly manage the legislative process of that bill. Third, the government alone had the power to end the session and thereby terminate the life of that bill.

From time to time in recent years some non-controversial government bills and some bills of great detail and national importance, but of little partisan account, have not been completed at the time of prorogation. In such circumstances, the House has been disposed to give its unanimous consent in the new session of Parliament to restore these items to the stage at which they died at the time of prorogation.

Let it be clear to those who are viewing today's proceedings that we have had two examples of such bills in the present session. One of these was the Crown corporations bill, an administrative proposal that, because of an important local interest, was subject to more extensive debate than some items of a similar nature. When the government asked to restore this bill to the stage at which it died in the previous session, we in the opposition recognized that it would be in the interests of the taxpayer and good public policy to expedite the measure, and the required unanimous consent was forthcoming from this side of the House. The bill has now been introduced and passed and consummated by this particular Chamber.

The other bill was the trust and loan companies legislation which is part of the major overhaul of the laws governing financial institutions in Canada. This bill had an extremely extensive committee stage, during which many diverse interests were asked to express their views, resulting in many amendments to the bill. The legislation has moved forward and forward in a spirit of non-partisan collaboration, an attitude that continues. The opposition had no difficulty whatsoever in agreeing to restore this bill so that the valuable work, not just of parliamentarians but of interested citizens and the general public as well, would not be ignored.

In this case the opposition probably was more eager than the government to agree to restore as, in our view, the government has been far too slow in proceeding with the financial institutions package. We are eager not just to finish the trust and loans bill, but to proceed with the other elements of the financial institutions package, especially the Bank Act revisions.

Unanimous consent to restore items such as these is always forthcoming. These bills in the last session were reasonably fairly handled by the government, I might add, and while we could not agree with the government on all of the policies put forward in this legislation, we believed the public interest would be best served by expediting this particular passage.

This is not the case with the legislation dealt with in the motion before us today. The most important of these bills is former Bill C-78, the environmental assessment bill. This legislation is as important as any placed before this Parliament as it addresses a subject of vital interest to the future of every Canadian from coast to coast. We in the Official Opposition co-operated with the government in moving the bill to committee. The government repaid us with vagueness, evasiveness and temporization. It has been unwilling to deal in substantial terms with possible amendments and it has been unreasonably reluctant to give the public any insight into how vital regulations under the legislation might be framed.

My colleague from Davenport will make reference to those specifics when he takes the floor shortly thereafter.

While the subject matter of the bill is important and the need to legislate in the area is essential, we see many flaws in the bill. The bill fails to incorporate any concept of sustainable development. The terms of the bill are vague and general where they should be firm and specific. Many of the factors proposed for governing environmental assessments and reviews are weaker than those under the existing environmental assessment and review order. There are loopholes in the bill that could lead to favourite individuals or companies being able to evade the provisions of the legislation.

There is undue discretionary power permitted the minister. Not that the minister will be bad, but when one person has that kind of power, there must be some limitations and some restrictions regarding large amounts of discretionary power.

There is inadequate protection offered to native communities. The bill fails to give the environment minister sufficient authority vis-à-vis other ministers whose pet project endangers the environment. The bill does not give Parliament adequate authority over the creation or alteration of regulations. The bill is not specifically applicable to all relevant departments, agencies and their legislation.

In short, the bill is full of holes and the government's response to criticism in committee has been completely and utterly inadequate.

Under the circumstances we do not believe that the House of Commons ought to be asked to expedite the passage of the bill. We believe that the new Minister of the Environment ought to be asked to go back to the drawing board and produce a new bill.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dingwall: We do not want to be hoodwinked by some cheap political trick, trying to reinstate legislation which has fallen dead as a result of the government's own ineptitude and subsequent action with regard to proroguing this Parliament.

We have similar difficulties with other legislation in this motion. Some of my colleagues will be dealing in detail with these later in this debate. However, I want to outline some of them now. The former Bill C-26, the Railway Act amendments, which we in Atlantic Canada refer to as the At and East bill, is in my view and the view of my party just plain bad legislation. The bill will further endanger the rail transportation system in Atlantic Canada. It will cost jobs in Atlantic Canada and in southwestern Ontario as well. It will unduly increase the costs of livestock and poultry industries of Atlantic Canada and it will have a destructive effect on the export of Canadian flour.

Those are the reasons why we oppose both the substance of this particular bill and the procedural gymnastics of the government to try to reintroduce this bill through its motion.

The government puts this bill forward as a so-called expenditure reduction, but its disastrous impact on both the agricultural and transportation sector, especially in Atlantic Canada, will be so destructive to the economy that in the long run it will only lead, in my view and in the view of my party, to greater costs.

The opposition cannot co-operate in the passage of bad legislation.

The former Bill C-58, the young offenders legislation, is also a bad bill that no reasonable opposition could be expected to expedite. This bill represents a terrible step backward, away from a concept of rehabilitation and back to a concept of not just punishment but even revenge. The bill does not address the conditions that lead young people to crime and has been judged by experts to be far more likely to reinforce rather than rehabilitate criminal tendencies. The legislation has been universally denounced as a nearly Dickensian retrogression.

The bill should not be advanced. The government should do the honourable thing and withdraw it.

The former Bill C-82 appears to be an administrative bill, but it is of great significance to the shipping industry. Its hasty passage through this House in the last session led to it being slowed down in the Senate.

The government refused to allow the House committee on the bill adequate time to consult the industry on such matters as ceilings on fees under the bill. The bill is also inadequate with reference to verification, audit and accountability; again another reason why this particular motion ought not to be proceeded with and ought not to be adjudicated in this particular House, not only on its substance but on the procedural gymnastics of the government opposite.

The government is now asking the House of Commons again to abandon its right to look into all of these issues. It wants us to leave these important questions to the Senate, its favourite upper chamber. This, I suggest, is a strange proposal coming to us from a well-known foe of the Senate, the government House leader. It is a proposal with which the opposition cannot and will not agree.

Finally, the motion deals with former Bill C-85 regarding the privatization of airports. Our concerns with the bill in the last session revolved around the protection of employee benefits, something that obviously members opposite do not seem to be too concerned about. But, when it affects workers and ordinary Canadians, we on this side are concerned as to what happens with those individuals. We are concerned with the protection of jobs, the equitable sharing of cost and the maintenance of services in both official languages.

In the last session the opposition attempted to approach this matter in a very collaborative manner, but it was rebuffed by the former minister's petty, I might add, mealy–mouthed and duplicitous manner. We believe that the new minister ought to be given an opportunity to correct this situation by starting this bill all over again.

As a supporter of the Speaker in the chair, I want to make it perfectly clear to you, Sir, as occupant of the chair that we do not oppose this motion for the sake of being difficult. As I have already indicated, the opposition has clearly behaved in a reasonable and co–operative manner when presented by reasonable conduct of desirable legislation. We cannot be expected to co–operate either in the passage of inadequate or downright bad legislation. We most especially cannot be expected to co–operate in this attempt by the government to subvert the parliamentary process, to evade parliamentary scrutiny and public input, and to shirk its responsibility.

This motion represents yet another move backward in the government's march toward parliamentary reform.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I say to you and to the members who have participated in the procedural aspects of this motion and who will now participate in the substance of the motion as ordered by the Chair, that we feel very strongly that this has subverted the legislative process which has been codified in the Standing Orders of the House and referred to in Beauchesne's, Erskine May and other sources as referred to by all hon. members on both sides.

Let it be said and let it be understood that we on this side of the House will fight under the provisions of the Standing Orders and parliamentary tradition. Whenever there is bad legislation which is not in the best interest of the public policy of this country, we will oppose, we will amend and we will do our best to get a fair deal, an appropriate deal for all Canadians wherever they live.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to this motion today. I would like to focus my comments on one particular bill, Bill C–26. Before doing so, I would just like to say that in a general sense the debate taking place today goes to the heart of parliamentary democracy in this country.

We have seen example after example of this government ramming through its own legislation, ramming through its own wants and desires without proper consultation, without following rules, I would suggest, and in a fashion that causes people in this country not only to wish for but demand some major parliamentary reforms which are long overdue, given the attitude and the actions of a government in its second majority mandate.

With respect to Bill C–26, I think it is a microcosm of many of the problems that exist with this government. I have a personal interest in Bill C–26. I was the person for the New Democratic Party who was on the legislative committee with respect to that bill.

With respect to Bill C–26, the government has ignored Parliament, the people, experts, reports and now it is going to finally ram through a piece of legislation that was removed from the books two years ago.

The history of this bill is very interesting. The At and East bill is a bill which allows the export of grain and flour through the ports of Halifax and Saint John, through a subsidy program and that is that during the winter months when the seaway cannot be used it is very expensive to transport grain to those two ports. This program was put in place to offset that cost to allow the usage of those ports. Those ports are important to western Canadians like myself with respect to the Canadian Wheat Board when grain is shipped for export. It is important to have open seaports and those are the only two ice–free seaports on the eastern seaboard. It is important to maritimers, to eastern Canadians with respect to livestock, poultry, cattle and so on in terms of getting some cheaper rates for their feed. It is important to places like Dover Flour Mill which rely on the elevator for storage of their grain.

The interesting thing about this program is that the government ignored reports from the maritimes. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, back about 1985 or 1986, approached the government and said: "Look, you are spending too much money on this program. You are spending $40 million a year. Here is a method where you can spend something like $20 million a year and still have the same effect, keep it so that these ports will be competitive."

The government ignored it. There was a major report done. The government ignored it completely. In 1989, it was announced during the budget speech that the At and East program would be removed, effective July 15, 1989, I believe, without even consulting the APTC and without even looking at what it had said. The government ignored it completely and removed the whole program without thinking of the consequences, without looking for alternatives.

The interesting thing about this is that it removed the program and it was never brought up in the House until February 1990, after our party had raised the matter in the House asking what had happened to this program. The next day, bang, it was in second reading.

As this matter went through second reading, it became very clear that the government had paid no attention to the reports of the experts, had paid no attention to the needs of the maritimers and had paid no attention to the needs of the Canadian Wheat Board. It simply saw it as a way to save $40 million; a very narrow minded and short sighted view of a program that has contributed a lot to regional development in the maritimes.

As it went through committee stage, group after group, representatives from the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, livestock groups from Atlantic Canada, people from Dover Flour Mills and others pointed out the frailties and the weaknesses of removing this program and putting nothing else in place. They pointed out that in fact it is going to cause problems with the Saint John elevator and it did. It is closed now. They pointed out that it was going to put the Halifax elevator in jeopardy and it is in jeopardy. They pointed out there were going to be jobs lost and there have been jobs lost. They pointed out that in fact it was going to threaten the livestock industry.

The Canadian Wheat Board came before us and said that the closure of Halifax and Saint John elevator may well mean the loss of wheat sales. We can ill afford in this country a loss of wheat sales. We are having a tough enough time competing with the Americans and the Europeans. The reason they said we would lose them is because nations in warmer climates, such as Cuba, would prefer to pick up their grain from an ice-free port than sail to Montreal to pick it up.

The Canadian Wheat Board said that, all things being equal, if Cuba had to go to Montreal, it may well lose grain sales. It appears that has been the case.

That is something that we in western Canada simply find unacceptable, given the nature of the grain industry today.

The interesting thing about this debate is that unlike many bills and many programs in which there is a straight philosophical difference, in this one there was an alternative. There could have been put in place a well thought out and well researched alternative.

When I came to the government, being the naive person I suppose I am, I thought there was a realistic possibility of actually maintaining, not the At and East bill as it exists now, but a revised At and East bill. It needed updating. It had not been changed since its implementation in the early 1960s. The government ignored that completely and discounted the arguments.

The one thing that was accomplished out of our committee reports and committee hearings was that the government reluctantly, after getting pressure from all these various groups, and the media started picking up on some of the problems, agreed to do a study on the effects of the loss of the At and East program and on the grain elevators in Atlantic Canada.

There was a report prepared and completed in November 1990. It is a fairly extensive report looking at all the various aspects of grain handling in eastern Canada. It comes to some interesting conclusions, which I am afraid the government again seems to have ignored.

I am quoting from the report of the grain elevators in Atlantic Canada, Grains 2000 Study. On page 41 under conclusions, it states:

> The principal finding of this study is that an increase in export grain is required for the Halifax and St. John elevators to achieve financial viability. If incremental flows of export grain are not achieved, the Halifax elevator could face closure and the Saint John elevator would be unable to reopen. The loss of an elevator with water receiving capability will be significantly detrimental for the Atlantic livestock industry. As shown in the analysis, the cost of feed grain in the region could rise by $10 per tonne or more.

What this is saying is that the elevators in Saint John and Halifax are beneficial to the livestock industry because they provide some form of competition for the railways which also bring in feed grains. There is not enough business coming out of the livestock industry to sustain those elevators. They need some increased export trade.

The Canadian Wheat Board is not in the business of supporting elevators. It is in the business of providing the best return it can for its prairie producers and therefore it is going to sell its grain where it can get the best dollar for the prairie producer. The Canadian Wheat Board has said unless there is some sort of program, we are not going to be sending grain out to Halifax. It has said it will do what it can.

During the summer months it does send grain out to Halifax. During the winter months when the seaway is closed, it does not even send a bushel because it is simply too expensive to send by rail to Halifax. The Canadian Wheat Board is doing what it can, but it is not going to do it at the cost of prairie producers.

This report says that unless there is some increase, and it does not need to be a huge increase in export grain, the one elevator of the two still operating will close and neither will reopen.

It also says the general conclusion is that changes to various government programs and so on will not result in a significant increased flow of feed grain through the elevators on a sustained basis. This largely explains the study's finding that to ensure long-term viability of the Halifax elevator and to re-open the Saint John elevator, the flow of export grain must be increased. I have commented on that already.

At the present time, the Atlantic elevators must compete as an eastern point of export for Canadian grain with elevators in the lower St. Lawrence. The primary disadvantage the Atlantic elevators have is the higher transportation costs to move grain to their facilities relative to the lower St. Lawrence. It is more expensive to ship the grain from Thunder Bay to Halifax than it is to ship it from Thunder Bay to Montreal. The ports find themselves at a major inconvenience. There is a more serious problem in the long run and a more serious problem to national unity in this country. It is much shorter to ship the grain through American ports than it is to ship it to Halifax. Canadian Pacific Railway has already purchased lines in the eastern United States and has the capability to bypass Canada completely. It has indicated that it has no qualms in doing so if the economic situation warrants. The plans are in the works for that very purpose.

If that happens, what is going to be the purpose of having a rail line in Atlantic Canada? The At and East Program, which would bring grain along on CN tracks through to Halifax, has already been taken away. VIA Rail has been cut and that has cut movement on those lines and those lines are becoming economically non-viable. The next step is to remove those lines completely. What is that going to do for national unity? What is that going to do for the economy of the maritimes? What is it going to do when you look at moving grain from western Canada to eastern seaports? The American seaboard is going to look very attractive. Those are some of the results of this program.

The report says to achieve some competition, "a freight equalization program will need to be designed so the Atlantic and St. Lawrence elevators are equalized from the Canadian Wheat Board perspective." In other words, this report, set up by this government, says that unless there is an equalized payment, some sort of At and East program in other words, those elevators cannot compete. When those elevators close we lose ice-free ports, we jeopardize the very shaky livestock, poultry and beef industry in Atlantic Canada, we lose hundreds of jobs and hundreds of millions of dollars to the economy and we ultimately threaten Dover Flour Mills, a very efficient flour company which has been competing under very adverse conditions and has been doing very well. If the Halifax elevator closed, Dover Flour Mills would be put in danger.

What do we come down to? We come down to something that is extremely illogical because from a straight, economic point of view, to remove this $40 million program is going to save this government $40 million or $35 million, depending on the year, in its deficit but it is going to cost many, many times that much resulting from the loss of that program: all sorts of unemployment insurance, loss of jobs and loss of economic revenue. For a short gain the government is sacrificing a major long-term loss. It is totally illogical.

I remember challenging some of the members, ministers and others to justify that logic. I asked them to show me where my logic was wrong and they could not do it.

After pressuring them they decided to have a study done. What have they done with this study? They have done nothing with it. This study is concluding basically what the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission was saying all along, that there has to be a program.

An hon. member: And what you were telling them too.

Mr. Laporte: What we as a caucus were telling them. The reason my caucus and I do not want to see this bill passed is that the cost is going to be too high for this country, both in economic and social terms.

We are asking this government to put forth a realistic alternative. That is all we have been asking right from the beginning. In fact that is all the maritimes have been asking for the last seven years, and this government has ignored them.

This government talks about national unity. It goes on and on about the Constitution, from which I do not want to detract because it is a very important issue. But the government seems to fail to realize that it is doing more to tear apart this country than it has ever done to put it together.

We have fought for 125 years, since the existence of our country, to maintain an east-west relationship despite the strong pulls of the north-south which in many ways naturally draw us.

We now have a government that has just cut those east-west ties one after the other: communications, transportation, telecommunications and the media. It goes on and on.

I was talking to some maritimers last week. They were saying: "Why should we worry about western Canada when we cannot get our grain from there? It is too expensive. We do not seem to get the benefits from central Canada. We would be better off dealing with the Americans". When we hear people talking that way, it is a very frightening statement to hear being made by serious people.

I really hope and plead with this government to reconsider its position on this bill. There is no area of this bill that makes any sense. It defies logic. The only place it makes sense from the government's point of view is that it is a cut in the deficit, a very short-term gain, which in reality is no gain at all.

I just want to make a few concluding remarks. I concur with many Canadians in that what we need is some sort of parliamentary reform or change. We cannot continue operating this nation the way it is with the sort of attitudes of this government.

It is with a lot of frustration that I speak on behalf of many people from the maritimes who feel very frustrated and disillusioned with this government. It seems to be ignoring their wishes. I can identify with that, being a western Canadian because this government has certainly ignored the needs of western Canadians.

Small business people, family farms, fishermen and others who are simply trying to maintain a living are being attacked continually by this government, and Bill C-26 is just one example of that attack.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, from this side of the House we are asking ourselves what would cause the government or any government to reintroduce six pieces of badly written proposed legislation and insist that it be examined further.

• (1220)

It is beyond our ability to understand why the government would do that. I will focus on the one of the six bills which I know a little bit better. I am asking myself what is the reason the government insists on presenting Bill C-78 for re-examination. Is it because of political ideological bankruptcy? Is it because of political indifference or even perhaps political ineptness? I do not know which of the three.

Bill C-78 has a very unique distinction. In listening to the witnesses from interested organizations and individuals who appeared before our committee, the bill was criticized by virtually every one of them. It was, in addition to that, amazing that both industry and environmental organizations and spokespersons would agree that they would prefer to operate under the present guidelines on environmental assessment, that they are better off under the present guidelines than under the proposed bill.

That is a rather unique feat, to manage to produce a bill that gets criticized by everyone affected. I wonder about the political sensitivity or political bankruptcy of this government because any cabinet, any political organization called a party—as the so-called Progressive Conservatives like to call themselves—would, in the light of what has happened to Bill C-78 since last June, certainly be glad to have an opportunity to put forward a revised bill. However, the government did not. This is what is so astonishing.

Second, one wonders about the indifference of this government when it has heard speaker after speaker, witness after witness, with some very rare exceptions—I would say one out of 10 witnesses—indicate that his or her organization was pleased with the proposal. In most of the interventions that we listened to, they said: "Please give us another measure or leave us under the present guidelines".

One has to wonder what it is within the machinery of government that makes it so insensitive to the input that has been collected by the committee process. This is what troubles me profoundly. What happened to Bill C-78 is that the government and the chairman of the committee in charge of Bill C-78 did not call one meeting between December and April of this year. This led us to conclude that the submissions made by witnesses had made a point, that they had registered and something was happening.

The previous minister in November and December indicated on a number of occasions that he was going to produce some regulations for us to look at to show how the bill would work, and that he would produce a package of amendments. Fine. We were glad to hear that.

Come January, nothing happened. The same in February, March and April. Now, after all these months, we discover that the government's silence was not due to the fact that it was elaborating on the input received by interested parties as a result of the committee process—which under the old rules was one of the best in the world, we are now heading toward a system that is very narrow because we will hear and admit only technical witnesses—that having heard all the witnesses and receiving that input, the government was elaborating and proposing changes.

We were hoping that the government would introduce a new version of the environmental impact assessment legislation as a result of that. Instead, we discover in the motion we are debating today that actually that has not happened.

The government is blindly, in an insensitive fashion, proceeding as if nothing had happened in 1990. As I mentioned a moment ago, it also decided to remain inactive on this bill for four solid months. This is unusual behaviour on the part of this already decrepit and bankrupt government, as seen in so many other fields of policy making. This was demonstrated by its behaviour on this particular bill which was intended to be a demonstration of the imagined Progressive Conservative commitment to the environment and to sustainable development.

That was the foundation. It was going to be the pillar of Conservative commitment to the practical application of sustainable development as embraced by the Prime Minister at home and abroad on a number of speeches, and by four subsequent environment ministers at various gatherings internationally.

The Government of Canada was committed all the way to sustainable development and the environment. Here we see that when it comes to putting into practice words and rhetoric, this government has fallen flat on its nose.

I would not want to end with only a general statement. I would like to substantiate what I am saying with a very precise analysis, in the time available to me, of our serious reservations about the old Bill C-78, which is now being forcibly reintroduced. Also I would like to explain why we thought that, as a result of questioning and representations, the government was thinking it over and was going to reintroduce a better version.

There is nothing wrong with introducing bills that are poorly written. It can happen to anyone. We know that. What is wrong is the blind indifference to the input received in a process which is intended to improve the quality of the bill. That is the point.

Let me bring to your attention a few sections. In general, one has to say that the objections to the bill were threefold. One, it gave too much power—it still does because that is what we are debating here today—to the department which initiates a certain project.

Second, too much is left to the regulatory power of cabinet. Third, there does not seem to be anywhere in the bill an explicit authority given to the Minister of the Environment allowing him or her to reject a specific project.

As for specific questions, the wording of clause 4 is very weak. It ensures only that environmental effects receive careful consideration before actions are taken. In addition, it is not the purpose of this act to ensure sustainable development despite many theoretical declarations to this effect.

As for section 5, we have to conclude that there were two profound concerns with this section. One, it is weaker than the current regulations. Second, tax breaks are specifically excluded by this legislation as a possible reason to refer a project to a federal environmental assessment review. This, while it may seem to be a dry, technical point, has very serious implications for many energy and natural resources projects.

We then looked at section 6 in particular and found to our dismay that it gives the proponent powers that are virtually unlimited. We felt that clearer rules instead should be introduced and established to remove the notion that the proponent forms an opinion about whether or not a project is to be referred for a review or not. In other words, the powers given to the proponent under Bill C–78 are far too great.

Again, within the same section 6, we felt that the second half is confusing. It begins with the very grandiose statement "for greater certainty" and then by the time one finishes reading that particular section, one wonders what it is all about. In other words, it is a section that badly needs clarification. The section was written and intended to offer the reader clarification. This is a very amusing contradiction.

Moving to section 11, we found that while it lists the factors to be studied by a panel created by the implementation of this legislation, we felt that it did not heed the consultation process of 1988 and that that consultation process is not required in this bill. In addition, the bill does not require the review of alternatives to the proposed project or to native claims.

When we looked at section 11, again we had to conclude that actually the fox is still in charge of the chicken coop. Because, under this legislation the Minister of the Environment does not have the unfettered authority to set the terms of reference and scope of the review panel. We, and a large number of witnesses, felt that this was one of the major flaws of the bill. We are now being asked to re–examine it, in the full knowledge that it has these serious weaknesses.

Concerning section 16, there is a reference there to the "responsible authority". This is the initiating department or proponent. It makes all the decisions as to whether to proceed or refer the project to mediation or to a review panel, or involve the Minister of the Environment if you like. Whatever action is taken hinges, however, on the opinion of the responsible authority, namely the initiating department.

Even more interesting, I submit to you, is the fact that the cancellation of a proposed project is not an option. The responsible authority must withhold approval if the project is referred to a panel, but the bill does not include a rejection of the project even if the project is likely to cause significant adverse effects that cannot be mitigated. At this point I would ask, at section 16, whether any fair–minded and intelligent politician would not think here is something that we must re–examine, something is obviously not coming together.

But this is not all. I must refer you to section 20 where, in the opinion of a responsible authority, a project is described on the mandatory list. The Minister of the Environment has certain powers to deal with the initial environmental report and the minister may do a number of things, which I will not put on record because of limited time. In this section we find a fundamental problem with the approach the government has taken to this legislation. What better reason I ask, within the framework of sustainable development, to reject a project than if it is likely to cause significant problems that cannot be mitigated.

However, we find that the Minister of the Environment does not have that option. In the opinion of this government, such projects may deserve study but they cannot be cancelled. To make matters worse, it is the proponent or proposing department that has a major say in writing the terms of reference for the study of the appointed panel.

When it comes to discretionary powers which, as you well know, are very important, section 24 gives the Minister of the Environment the authority to refer a project to a mediator or a panel under certain conditions.

Well, we find that the Minister of the Environment can only do those things after consulting with the responsible authority. The minister is continually fettered in responding to proposals that have significant environmental impacts. Even under this section the most the minister can do is refer the projects to panels or mediators. The minister does not have the authority to reject any project as unsound from an environmental or sustainable perspective.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether you want me to go on and examine other sections because this report is becoming more and more depressing as we explore in depth the quality of this bill. You can see, however, the point I am trying to make. I do not want to become too tedious, but with the time still allocated, I would want to bring to your attention section 25, which seems to be aimed at environmental groups which intervene in projects.

For example, in section 25, Ottawa-based national groups would be excluded from mediation on any project except one taking place in Ottawa. A national organization could not comment on something happening in Vancouver, Halifax, Toronto, Winnipeg, Montreal or Quebec City. Thus, to be at the mediation table you must live on or own land or otherwise be directly affected by the proposed project.

There are weaknesses in sections 26, 30 and 31. Mr. Speaker, I see you have already pointed out to me that I have only a couple of minutes left.

Let me bring to your attention section 34 which deals with the decision of responsible authority. It is the heart of the bill because it deals with the response to the report prepared by a mediator or a panel. Following the report of a mediator or panel, the responsible authority shall approve the project, under certain conditions of course. Where, in the opinion of the responsible authority, the project is likely to cause impacts that cannot be mitigated or justified, it shall not permit the project to be carried out.

Finally, we find in this section that a project can be rejected, but not by the Minister of the Environment, only by the proponent. Even then, within the same section there is permission that a project can proceed, no matter how serious the impact, if it can be justified. I ask you, what does the word justified mean in section 34? Obviously it means if you can make a good case, I suspect a political case in cabinet, if you are the proponent of the particular project and you are eloquent and articulate and you can perhaps demonstrate that in the short term, that project shall proceed.

I submit to you that this is a very troublesome concept. I would like to take you through the balance of this bill to reinforce what I hope I have achieved in these 20 minutes, namely to convince you that Bill C-78 should not be reintroduced in its present form.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the member. I know he is most erudite concerning the environmental situation in Canada. He has spoken up many times in that area in this Parliament and I have seen him in past Parliaments when I have been a viewer from the outside looking in and I want to compliment him on his commitment to the environment.

In looking at this bill, I would like to ask the member to expand a little bit on one of the parts of the bill that concerns me somewhat, and that is the section where the cabinet decisions are exempted from the legislation. I look at any section of any bill where there are certain exemptions, or the cabinet gets the opportunity to make policy outside legislation, in particular, in my own province of British Columbia, where the agricultural land reserve bill allows cabinet to review certain processes and applications and then override its own legislative body in coming up with decisions. I wonder whether he sees this particular provision in the act as being fair, or does he anticipate that it could lead to some abuse, particularly when pressures are put on the cabinet by various lobby groups or political friends who want a fast track approval in some area?

I would further ask whether there are any safeguards or means of assuring that environmental decisions are given proper weight in these cabinet decisions referring to this and other cabinet decisions where they have discretion.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I would first like to thank the member from the Okanagan Valley for his very generous and kind words. The question which he puts is very central to the spirit and the heart of Bill C-78. Under the bill as written now, cabinet would be fully in command of whether or not it approves a proposal. It would not be bound. It would not be directed by the Minister of the Environment of the day in rejecting a specific proposal. The way it is drafted, the allocation of powers is such that the environment minister is virtually in the hands of the initiating department and minister throughout the entire process. Therefore, the role of the Minister of the Environment is unlike what one would expect from this bill. It is very marginal.

The Minister of the Environment is not the main actor under the terms of the bill under discussion. To answer the hon. member's question, cabinet could be exempted. The process would not even require an exemption because the process is designed in such a manner that under very rare circumstances could the Minister of the Environment put his or her foot down and say no to a project. There is impotence here in the implementation of environmental principles.

That should take care of overriding in their own legislation because it would not be necessary to override. To use a common expression, you could drive a truck through this bill as it is designed.

What safeguards are in the opening portion of the bill, in the preamble? There is good rhetoric but in essence the operative sections of the legislation are written in such a manner that to talk about environmental safeguards, we must go outside the bill itself. The weakness of the bill is that the political responsibility to be discharged by the Minister of the Environment is marginalized by the design of the bill which attributes so much power to the initiating department, which could be the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Finance or the minister of any other important agency which operates at the federal level.

I hope that this gives a sketchy answer to the question of the hon. member. We were surprised, as I pointed out in my intervention earlier, that the bill itself was criticized by virtually every witness. There was not one sector in society affected by this bill that persistently came forward and said they liked it. Usually, from our experience, there is a polarization before committee. One sector of society says it is good and another one says it is bad. In this case, we had a uniformly negative response from virtually all witnesses, except one or two.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague, the member for Davenport, for giving an extremely succinct and penetrating summary of the weaknesses of Bill C–78. He speaks with authority, as we all know, from his long experience on environmental matters.

I want to ask the member, and I know we have very little time left for him to reply, not on the substance of Bill C–78 which, as he has outlined is so severely flawed, but about the process. That is, this motion once again undermines the ability of members from all sides of this House to contribute constructively to legislation because the government refuses to take into account the suggestions made as a result of the committee stage of legislation.

We have a great example with these bills, not only Bill C–78 but the others that are before us, of a government which is ignoring the worth–while suggestions that have been made and an opportunity to improve very necessary legislation.

I would like to ask the member if he would just outline for the record the suggestions that have been made to improve Bill C–78 or to improve the whole process of environmental assessment which are in the public domain and which the government could have drawn upon to redraft this very important piece of legislation.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, on both points the hon. member is quite correct and I agree with him. The process in committee is being very seriously damaged in its credibility by motion No. 1, which we are debating today. It makes a mockery of all that work and, particularly in the case of Bill C–78, it in essence rejects the input that we received from the public. The public interest is seriously affected by this move on the part of the government.

As for the second question, yes, the government in essence is saying that the input provided by members is not relevant. This is, in part, easy to understand because under this system one does not pay much attention to the opposition.

• (1250)

We know that. We live with that every day. However, when this message is articulated, not in relation to opposition members but to public organizations, to witnesses, to associations from coast to coast which take the trouble to make a submission and then see their submission being ignored, then it is a very serious action on the part of this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we in the Official Opposition participate in this debate very reluctantly. Obviously, we are not sure that this motion is in order; we have submitted arguments that the Chair is considering.

Nevertheless, since the debate is under way, Mr. Speaker, without prejudging it, but if the motion is ruled out of order or unacceptable, we must say that this whole debate will have been rather academic. That is how we feel about this. As a matter of fact, having stated the reasons why this motion is defective, I might add that this procedure is contrary to parliamentary tradition and is unprecedented in Parliament. Usually, when the government wants to revive a bill or put it back on the Order Paper following the prorogation of the House, it proceeds by unanimous consent.

Prorogation, as I explained earlier Mr. Speaker, puts an end to everything. It is not us, opposition members, who say so, but the very definition of the word "prorogation". It puts an end to everything and all items on the Order Paper lapse. And the government which—let's be candid about it—controls the agenda, as it controls the debates and the bills, knew full well that, if the House adjourned in May for almost a month and then there was a prorogation, these bills would be lost.

These are no doubt contentious bills, Mr. Speaker. We believe that some of them have been debated well and, so that the Canadian people will know, vigorously. We have tried to get across to this government that major amendments were required. We succeeded in some cases, but in others, we failed. It has to do with the way Parliament works and the rule of the majority where by the majority decides. So, the government does as it pleases.

Bill C-26, Mr. Speaker, is a bill intended to amend the Railway Act.

The purpose of the bill was for the termination of the At and East grain and flour subsidy announced in the budget of April 27, 1989, and put into place on July 16, 1989.

The whole subsidy aspect of Bill C-26 was questioned by many of us when the bill started first reading on June 16, 1989. That is some time ago, two years ago. We have had second reading speeches on February 12, 1990, February 20, 1990, April 30, 1990, and then it was referred to a legislative committee which reported back to the House about a month later, on May 31, 1990. It was debated again on June 5, 1990, and that was it. We never heard about it again. The government comes in after taking its decision to prorogue the House and says: "Well, even though the bill has been here for two years, we could not see ourselves able to take a few weeks or a few additional days during May or April to debate that bill. We would rather adjourn the House and go home." That is what happens when the government does not pay attention to its agenda. It misses sometimes and it is sometimes responsible for the slowness of this House.

The other one is Bill C-58, which was alluded to by my friend, and probably will be the object of great concern to many of us. The bill in question was first read on December 20, 1989. The second reading was on May 30, 1990. It was referred to a legislative committee on June 14, 1990. It was reported to the House on December 10, 1990. Nothing has happened since. That is more than six months ago. The government prorogued, yet it did not give a darn about what happened to that bill.

Here is the government again trying to tell us that the opposition is preventing legislation from going through. The government controls the agenda. It proposes the agenda to the House. We, the opposition, can only dispose of it in due course. It did not propose and we could not do anything about it.

Bill C-73 I think has already been taken care of. If my memory serves me right, C-73, by unanimous consent, was re-tabled or taken up where it was left off and is now called Bill C-8. That is the only bill on which the government came to us and said: "Would you agree to unanimously replace this bill on the agenda?" We did and the act was passed here last week on May 23.

Why could the government not at that time include the other bills with it? Why could it not ask for unanimous consent on the other bills? It did not ask. It picked one, Bill C-73. As far we are concerned, as the argument put by my House leader here today showed, this motion is irregular and out of order because it still contains an item on which this House has passed judgment. This House has decided that C-73 would be passed. This House has decided that it should be adopted and it is now in the Senate.

The motion is weakened by having Bill C–73 taken out of it.

We have C–78, an act to establish a federal environment assessment process. We just had an eloquent speech by my colleague, the member for Davenport. Those remarks I endorse. We have had a long process. I could give all the dates: from June 18, 1990, when it was first read to the House, until its referral to a special committee on October 30, 1990.

I then come to Bill C–82, an act amend an act to provide for the appointment of a port warden for the harbour of Quebec and an act to amend and consolidate the acts relating to the office of port warden for the harbour of Montreal, and so on. This bill was first read in the House on September 26, 1990. We went on to second reading. On November 5 it was referred to a legislative committee. It was reported to the House without amendment on November 22. The bill was concurred in at report stage on December 14, read the third time and passed by this House December 14, 1990. That has been dealt with.

Here we have a government which says that because of its friends on the other side in the Senate, proper study was not given to this bill. It wants us to start over again. I just do not understand. This bill has been passed and adopted. It would seem to me kind of a heavy procedure for the government to reinstate that with a Royal Recommendation and do it all again. It is not our doing, it is the government's doing.

I want to talk in the few minutes remaining about Bill C–85, a bill which touches the official languages; a subject I find very important. The purpose of the bill was to allow for certain employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of airports in Canada and that is a very important bill that we should talk—

CORBY'S DISTILLERY

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my disappointment at the decision made by Hiram Walker Allied to close its Corby's distillery facility at Corbyville, Ontario, in my riding.

Corby's will continue to employ its 170 person staff until September 30 of this year, when the plant and the facility will close down completely. This plant has been a well respected pillar of the Quinte region's corporate community for 132 years. It is deeply regrettable that the rather dramatic market shifts have resulted in this unfortunate business decision. Corby's unparalleled tradition of product excellence and community service as a large employer and generous corporate citizen will be sorely missed in our area.

Although times have been tough for all of us lately, I know that all members will share with me in the hope that we will not see more Canadians continue to lose jobs and go through the suffering and shock that these Corby's employees are now experiencing.

CFB SHILO

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I want to state clearly to this House that I am strongly opposed to any proposal which may exist at any level to either downsize or close CFB Shilo. Should the German army decide not to renew its training contract at Shilo or should National Defence Headquarters recommend the relocation of any of the present personnel, Canadian units currently stationed elsewhere in Canada or at Lahr, Germany, should be relocated to Shilo in order to maintain the strength of the base.

As CFB Shilo is the principal army base between London, Ontario and Calgary, the strength of this base must be maintained to ensure that adequate forces are available to meet any emergency which may arise. In addition, the presence of the base and the civilian jobs which it has created make an immense economic contribution to western Manitoba, which our region cannot afford to lose.

In conclusion, I ask the Minister of National Defence to take whatever steps are necessary to protect the future of CFB Shilo and to reassure my constituents who understandably are worried by the speculative newspaper stories of recent days.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on the 30th anniversary of Amnesty International to pay tribute to this internationally respected human rights organization, with more than a million members in over 150 countries around the world and over 1,000 dedicated staff members.

Amnesty International's work on behalf of prisoners of conscience, over 42,000 since its founding in May 1961, and its tireless advocacy of an end to torture and the death penalty have been an inspiration to all Canadians.

As an Amnesty International representative said, after 30 years we are sure of only one thing: It is now much harder for governments to cover up their crimes and avoid paying the political price.

[English]

Amnesty International has noted that two out of three people are ruled by governments that torture and kill their citizens and that political opponents are held in more than half the countries in the world.

Therefore, in congratulating Amnesty International, let us rededicate ourselves to a world in which fundamental human rights, including economic, social and cultural rights, are respected in all countries throughout the globe.

TRIBUTE TO YVES LAFOREST

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, on May 15 this year, Mr. Yves Laforest, a resident of my riding, hoisted the flag of Quebec on the summit of Mount Everest. Mr. Laforest is the first Quebecer to reach the highest peak in the world, at 8,848 metres.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of my riding and on behalf of all Canadians, I wish to pay tribute to Mr. Laforest and congratulate him on his success.

Now that is an example of endurance and determination!

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, this is National Access Awareness Week in Canada.

Of the 3.3 million Canadians with disabilities, 60 per cent are unemployed.

Access Awareness Week is an attempt to have the public develop an appreciation of the problems associated with disabled people. Access to employment, access to education, access to better housing, access to recreation, access to a better quality of life; these things which most Canadians take for granted as their basic rights are often denied the disabled.

As Canadians, let us support National Access Awareness Week in our communities in order that disabled Canadians will be able to enjoy the same level of services that all other Canadians enjoy.

TAXATION

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the federal tax system is unfair in its treatment of the family. There are a number of family organizations which have made significant contributions toward strengthening the family. Their work demonstrates that the tax system discriminates against the family. Organizations such as the Vanier Institute, the Kids First Association, and l'Alliance pour la justice fiscale have made in depth studies of different aspects of the tax system and have found that there are rules and regulations that provide disincentives to family life, to marriage and to home care for children.

The Prime Minister and our government are committed to reviewing our policies in relation to the family.

I would therefore urge the government to work with these organizations and to use local networks, such as the Family Life Education Council of Calgary, in developing a fair, effective and efficient tax system that treats all families equally and enables them to make the choices that best meet their particular needs.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): "To freedom." Those words resulted in seven years imprisonment for two Portuguese students, which prompted Peter Benenson to found Amnesty International 30 years ago today.

The original objectives of getting the right to freedom of speech and belief for all, and the aims of getting the release of prisoners of conscience who have not used or advocated violence, having fair and prompt trials, and stopping torture or execution of prisoners have all been upheld.

Now, with more than 1 million members in over 150 countries, Amnesty International has established political neutrality and global credibility while investigating some 42,000 cases, from the killing of children in South America, to beatings in Sri Lanka, torture in Senegal, mass imprisonment in Chad and executions in Iran. In 1990 alone, 72 delegations were sent to 49 countries, including the Middle East, Nepal and Romania.

Without Amnesty International, the tyrants would be celebrating. Instead, we celebrate and look for the day when all people have basic human rights.

ADVERTISING

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, Labatt's Breweries announced recently that it was making major changes in its advertising strategy. Instead of using sex to sell its products, Labatt intends to appeal to people's intelligence. Mr. Speaker, it is high time our breweries stopped insulting the intelligence of Canadians by associating sex with the consumption of alcohol. I hope that other big companies will take the same approach and that soon we will no longer see the kind of advertising that exploits female physical attributes for purely commercial gain.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, today VIA Rail is being hauled before the courts for thumbing its nose at the Official Languages Act and language of service provisions. For thirteen years, VIA Rail has been the target of comments, recommendations, exhortations, and warnings, all of which were meant to arouse the corporation out of its lethargy.

Since 1978, in the Ottawa-Montreal-Toronto triangle, the Commissioner for Official Languages has received many complaints about bilingual service at VIA Rail. That is why today, the Commissioner saw it as his duty to file a notice of motion with the Federal Court of Canada, ordering VIA Rail to ensure that the public is able to communicate and receive services in either official language, where there is significant demand for the use of that language.

It is also high time VIA Rail implemented the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms with respect to official languages, by making sure that all Canadians can depend on both official languages being used upon arrival in the stations, in security, ticket collecting, general announcements and security services on board trains and in the stations, and in all other communications between VIA Rail employees and travellers.

Mr. Speaker, VIA Rail, or what is left of it, is still too important to Canadians to be allowed to neglect its linguistic duties. It is time VIA Rail did something about this. Otherwise, the courts will have to order the corporation to behave in a way that is more Canadian and more respectful of our Constitution.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, an editorial in this Monday's Globe and Mail, if accurate, poses some real challenges to Canada's new defence minister. Mr. Dale Grant states that "Few Canadians know that in terms of personnel versus the size of the defence budget, Canada has perhaps the most expensive armed forces in the world."

It has more generals than tanks, more officers than privates. I understand that the fragmentation of the military has led to this excessive management growth. Today there are nine lieutenant-generals, who get $131,000; there are 29 major-generals, who get $100,000 each; 84 brigadier-generals who get $94,000; 3,700 majors who get $64,000 and 7,500 captains who get $51,000 each.

If I were the minister I would cut, cut, cut this bulbous management team to an affordable and sensible number.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, when does construction of buildings increase by 40 per cent in Seville, 169 per cent in Algiers, and 200 per cent in Buenos Aires? When do furniture costs increase by 500 per cent in Japan over four years?

It occurs when External Affairs is involved in overseas projects.

It is not a new development. The Canadian embassy in Washington had a projected price-tag of $28 million in 1984, but it opened in 1988 with a final cost of $82 million.

What could be the reason for these over-runs? The government says that currency fluctuations are to blame. Not so. For example, the Argentinian austral fell against our dollar an astonishing 155,000 per cent. These costs should be declining and not galloping out of control.

Meanwhile, 50 per cent of our diplomats and headquarters staff are over-spending their hospitality budgets, with little concern for cost accountability.

The total cost over-run of these five projects is an astonishing $102 million. External Affairs has become a sink-hole of taxpayers' money. I call on the minister to get all of her houses in order.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, some people over the last few days have been trying to build a controversy between the Prime Minister and the NDP Government of Ontario.

This is not the kind of bickering that Canadians want to hear. The time for various levels of government bashing each other is past. The 1990s, if Canada is to survive economically and politically, will have to stress compromise and common ground.

Right now, Canadians are struggling in a sea of debt. That debt has come to mean high taxes, and high taxes are sucking the life out of the middle class.

The only way around this is to reduce government spending, government deficits and, ultimately, the taxes that all governments impose.

I rise to ask everybody to chill out, tone down the rhetoric, and concentrate on our common enemy.

There is no question what that is. It is called debt.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, in the past week or so, I had discussions with representatives of the Canadian steel industry and of the Canadian trucking industry.

It is no secret that they are going through some very difficult times.

I am dismayed, and so are many of my constituents, to learn that Canada Post has awarded a huge contract for post office box keys to a U.S. company. It seems to me that if the postal boxes can be made in Canada, it is equally possible for the keys to be made in Canada, thereby protecting jobs and our industries which, as I said, are in difficulty and distress.

I deplore this type of action by the Canadian government. In addition to the two industries which I have mentioned, my area is suffering from cross-border shopping.

It is with a great amount of regret that I see that the Neilson chocolate company—all the kids eat chocolate bars—is sending loads of chocolate bars to the United States where they are sold 20 cents cheaper per unit.

I urge the government to consider some of its actions and to provide economic relief for my area and my riding.

HUMANITARIAN AWARD

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I inform the House and also congratulate you on receiving the Humanitarian Award on Sunday from the Jewish community in Vancouver.

It was given to you for the work you have done over the years in assisting Jewish immigrants from Soviet Russia and the reuniting of many families and giving of new hope for many more.

It is interesting to note that from the original one's and two's, hundreds of thousands of Jews are now leaving Russia primarily to make new lives and homes in Israel, and also elsewhere.

It is also interesting to note this event was in the same week as the miraculous air-lift of 15,000 Ethiopian Jews to Israel. This completed Operation Moses, which was started over three years ago.

Congratulations on your well deserved award.

CITY EXPRESS AIRLINES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in June 1986, Rick Brennan of The Windsor Star filed a request under access to information to get the safety records from the Ministry of Transport for City Express Airlines. He got these documents only after a delay of almost five years recently the longest delay in the history of the Access to Information Act.

The request did not relate to personal information about an individual. Instead, it was about the record of safety of an airline used by thousands of people every week. Surely they and the public generally had a right to know promptly if the airline was meeting federal government safety standards and, if not, what the government was doing to enforce them.

The material that was finally released last week showed that City Express did not have a good record. More troubling, the information appeared to show that the ministry was not as vigorous as it should have been in ensuring that the airline lived up to these standards.

Also troubling was the admission by the lawyer for the Department of Justice that she did not vigorously pursue efforts to have this information released. This situation shows a need for a review of the existing law. It also shows the need for the government to begin actively applying the existing law.

Mr. Brennan and the Windsor Star are to be commended for their persistent efforts over the past five years, but these efforts should not have been necessary. The travelling public and all Canadians deserve better.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister in charge of constitutional reform is saying that he wants to involve the aboriginal people in the special committee next fall on trying to get a consensus on the Constitution. I think that is a very good move. I would like to see the minister elaborate in the House as to in what way or how he is going to involve the aboriginal people on that committee.

I also want to say that this establishes a bit of a precedent in that if we have the aboriginal people on the committee, I think we should expand it into a true constituent assembly and involve all kinds of other people that under-represented in our present system, such as visible minorities, the women of this country, poor Canadians and many other Canadians who are under-represented in the kind of political system that we have. If we are to have a true national consensus on the Constitution of this country, we can achieve that by having a truly national constituent assembly.

AST CANADA INC.

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased to learn that a new company is opening in my riding, but the recent opening of AST Canada Inc. had particular significance not only to the riding but to the rest of Canada.

AST Research Inc., a leading North American manufacturer of high-performance personal computers, has maintained a sales presence in Canada since 1986. AST's fiscal 1990 revenues surpassed $.5 billion U.S.

AST Research Inc. proves that North American companies are staying in Canada and are continuing to invest in our economy. The recent opening of AST Canada Inc. is a reflection of the confidence in the global importance of Canadian business. The fact that AST Canada Inc. is fully staffed by Canadians indicates the depth of the commitment AST has to Canada.

With expansion continuing to include regional offices in Montreal and Vancouver, AST is demonstrating the kind of positive attitude toward partnership that is necessary as the world and Canada adapt to an increasingly global market.

ORAL QUESTIONS

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

The vast majority of Canadians do not approve of the excessively high deficit Bob Rae has inflicted on Ontario. However, we believe the people of Ontario will be able to deal with this problem three years and four months from now, when an election is held and they will be able to elect a Liberal government in Ontario once again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I therefore want to ask the Acting Prime Minister why the Prime Minister raised this matter in Asia? Why is he washing Canada's dirty linen in Japan? Why is he giving the impression that a large part of Canada does not want foreign investment?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite unfortunate that the hon. Leader of the Opposition wants to dwell on this particular issue because he knows as well as anyone else that the public finances of any nation are of important interest to Japan, which invests dollars in Canada. The fact of the matter is that there are concerns about it.

Just to set the record straight, and I want to assure the hon. member and other members of the House, the Prime Minister has been in Japan promoting Canada, all regions of Canada: Ontario, western Canada, the Atlantic region, the north, Quebec.

If there was any suggestion over the fact that the Japanese were not interested in the public finances, all one has to do is read the Globe and Mail this morning which says in an article by Edith Terry—

Mr. McCurdy: Who is she?

Mr. Mazankowski: She happens to be in Japan with the Globe and Mail. She is not sitting here, making assumptions, guesses and interpretations. This is what she said: "However, participants at the summit said the Japanese had raised the issue of Canada's public finances before Mr. Mulroney arrived at the meeting". So, obviously his comment was appropriate.

• (1420)

I think what is most important is to summarize the words of Mr. d'Aquino, who said: "I have not heard the Prime Minister say anything that was not terribly bullish".

We have just heard a comprehensive speech, an excellent speech. To suggest there was anything partisan in it would be searching, Mr. Speaker.

REFUGEES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a lot of us in this House have had the occasion to visit refugee camps. There is nothing more tragic than the plight of a refugee, someone who is homeless and too often without hope.

Why did the Prime Minister promise while in Hong Kong that Canada could take in more refugees when the fact is that the budget for settling refugees in Canada has been cut by 20 per cent?

Does the Prime Minister not realize that it is cruel to raise the hopes of people who have neither a home nor a country, just to use them for a photo opportunity?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the record of Canada in terms of immigration and in terms of welcoming refugees to Canada is more than a photo opportunity.

The hon. member should remember and look at the figures because he presided, with his colleagues, over a government that was welcoming people into Canada at the rate of maybe 70,000 people a year a few years ago.

This government increased our commitment to immigrants and we now welcome to Canada over 200,000 people a year, and that is a record that the hon. member should recognize.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, after what happened in Hong Kong and Japan, will the Acting Prime Minister send an urgent telegram to the Prime Minister and ask him to make a real contribution to Canada's reputation abroad—by coming home right now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is a suggestion similar to that which the hon. Leader of the Opposition made when we sent our troops to the Persian Gulf to fight a war. He said: "Bring them home". We did not do it then and we will not do it now.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Last Sunday, more than 5,000 Canadians in the Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands gathered to make themselves heard and demand that the government put an end to the depressed state of the economy in their region. According to Statistics Canada, the unemployment rate in the area is over 27 per cent. When will the government table economic policies that will give some hope and create employment for these people who want to stay in their region? When?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my answer will be very short. I would ask the hon. member to listen carefully to what people say after my visit to the Gaspé Thursday morning.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, we are very anxious to hear what the minister has to say. However, considering his record since 1984, I don't think there is much hope.

The Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands rank second among the regions in Canada with the highest unemployment rates. So again, my question is: When will the government introduce policies to deal with this? We don't care about the minister's photo opportunities. We want concrete measures. When are we going to create durable jobs in this region, the most beautiful region in this country?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, again, I would ask the hon. member to listen carefully to what we say on Thursday to the people of the Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands. I met these people 8 months ago. They made some proposals, and I intend to give them an answer on Thursday. The hon. member will see how we deal with problems. That part of the country was just as beautiful in 1984, and we know how you dealt with the Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands at the time.

TRADE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. We have all been witnessing on television today the clumsy attempt at damage control. What Tom d'Aquino said yesterday the embassy officials are getting him to deny today. What Mr. Nukazawa said yesterday they are giving him the script to deny today. Having bad-mouthed Ontario on this touted mission to increase trade and development in Canada, having misread the collective minds of Japanese businessmen, and having behaved as a narrow political partisan, and having blamed the journalists for his negative comments about Ontario, are the Prime Minister and this government now prepared to apologize first of all to his hosts for misreading the minds of Japanese businessmen and to the people of Canada and the people of Ontario?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if there is any apology necessary it should come from the premier of Ontario who has now acknowledged the fact—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: —that the Prime Minister is out there promoting Canada, all parts and regions of Canada, all provinces of Canada, and it is unfortunate that the opposition fails to recognize, as I quoted from The Globe and Mail this morning, that in fact the Japanese happen to be concerned about the fiscal problems in Canada, the deficits, and that was acknowledged in the report by Edith Terry who said participants at the summit said the Japanese had raised the issue of Canada's public finances before Mr. Mulroney arrived.

That is not only the public finances of Ontario but indeed all of Canada and of course the hon. member should recognize that.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It is a matter of record that this Prime Minister has been bad-mouthing Ontario in Hong Kong and in Japan. As Premier Bob Rae has pointed out—

Some hon. members: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Rodriguez: Now you are listening. I have their attention, Mr. Speaker. As Premier Bob Rae said, when the Prime Minister is travelling abroad he is not a Conservative, he is the Prime Minister of all of Canada. In the Prime Minister's own speech in this House during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, he pointed out that it is time to move beyond special interests. Now is the time to speak for the national interests.

In this spirit, can the government give the assurance that the Prime Minister will not bad-mouth any province on any future trips, not make bad jokes about refugees, will not practise mind-reading in public, and will act more statesmanlike?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is really unfortunate that the NDP gets very sensitive when they are subjected to a bit of criticism. For example, the treasurer of the province of Ontario went to Wall Street and he got a blast for his budget. While we are talking about criticism, in a recent interview, Mr. Atkinson, the chief economist of the Bank of Montreal said there would be a tremendous price to pay for the fiscal and budgetary policies of the province of Ontario.

I quote what CTV said: "So Bob Rae's budget is costing people who borrow money for mortgages a half a point a year". Mr. Atkinson replied: "That's the estimate we are putting on it".

Members of the New Democratic Party cannot hide the fact that the budget that was brought down by the province of Ontario is an economic disaster. They should accept that fact, accept reality, and get on with the business of running the province.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it is to be noted that the Deputy Prime Minister did not answer the questions I posed to him.

We know that the Prime Minister intends to continue travelling in the coming weeks.

Can we have the assurance that in his coming travels, the Prime Minister will set aside his partisan comments and positively represent the interests of all parts of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Again, Mr. Speaker, I have had a chance to read and listen to what the Prime Minister has been saying. This is what Mr. d'Aquino stated.

Some hon. members: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is May 27 and I understand that hon. members quoted quite freely yesterday, so perhaps I might be given the same privilege today.

Mr. d'Aquino said: "The only thing that I heard at lunch was the Prime Minister making a very strong pitch like I just heard him make today as to why Canada is a place that the Japanese should be spending more time both investing in and why we should be having much closer economic and political relations.

I think that is spoken like a true Prime Minister and I am proud of him.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

The minister knows that the government's high dollar and high interest policy has been devastating for the Canadian steel industry. I want to ask him specifically today about the thousands of jobs reported to be sacrificed at Algoma Steel in Sault Ste. Marie, which would destroy the livelihood of thousands of families and devastate the entire community.

What specific assistance is the minister prepared to give today to save jobs and help this community?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague is well aware, we have been part of discussions that involve the company Algoma Steel, the union, the shareholders of Algoma Steel, Defasco, as well as the bankers in the province of Ontario, to try to assist in ways of seeking adjustment to the company so that it can continue in business.

I am sure my hon. friend is well aware of the very serious financial conditions of Algoma Steel. He is also very much aware that if the federal government provides specific monetary assistance to the company, it will very seriously affect its capacity to sell into the United States market.

That option is not open to us, but we are talking to the company to try to assist in ways that will allow it to move into a new regime, possibly helping out in the training and retraining of individuals who would lose their jobs.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Labour.

The minister knows that there have already been thousands of jobs lost at Algoma Steel and there are plans for further lay-offs. Many of them are older workers.

Is the Minister of Labour willing to give a commitment today to designate Algoma Steel workers eligible for the Program for Older Workers Adjustment so that they can be provided with an adequate and respectable early pension?

The chances of these older workers finding jobs in today's recession are almost nil. Would the minister give a commitment today to designate this industry and this community for assistance under the Program for Older Workers Adjustment?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that POWA, to which he is referring, has specific rules. A committee made up of representatives from Government of Ontario and the Government of Canada is actually meeting and will make a recommendation to both ministers. I hope that recommendation will be favourable.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, since January 1, 1989, Ontario has lost 144,000 or 14 per cent of its manufacturing jobs. Employment is down 19 per cent in auto parts, 21 per cent in steel, 26 per cent in machinery, and 33 per cent in furniture. Because of this government's deliberate policies, many of these jobs are lost forever.

When will the minister responsible for industry help Ontario export something other than jobs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that my hon. friend speak to the person immediately to his front and left. He would find out that I am actively helping Ontario companies find new business through trade opportunities in the Middle East.

The member for Etobicoke North and I were on a trade mission. He has just very kindly sent to me a report that he wrote for The Financial Post on the trade mission. He neglected to mention my name in it, unfortunately.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I just wanted anyone who read that article to know that I was the minister who was leading that trade mission, helping Ontario companies, helping Quebec companies, helping companies from Newfoundland right across Canada to British Columbia find business in a very important part of the world, a part of the world where we can find good new business.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the minister is suggesting that he should stay abroad and bring the Prime Minister home. Perhaps that would help.

On November 24, 1988, the Prime Minister in Toronto promised: "to ensure innovative and generous adjustment and retraining programs with the chief priority being the well-being of the individual Canadian worker and his family". Yet today tens of thousands of unemployed Canadians are waiting for retraining.

When will this government honour this promise? When will this government start retraining these unemployed Canadians so that they can be part of Canada's future and not part of its past?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): It is a bit ironic, Mr. Speaker. That member's party in this House fought Bill C-21. It targeted over $800 million which we wanted to invest in the work force of Canada and is exactly the kind of thing the member is calling for.

I can tell him that the labour force development strategy board is having its first meetings yesterday and today. It has been entrusted with finding ways where we can apply these hundreds of millions of dollars and invest in our work force so as to improve its skills and performance.

What he is asking for is already happening. He should come of age.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister was quoting Mr. d'Aquino in support of the Prime Minister. Of course Mr. d'Aquino was part of the delegation. It was the Prime Minister who said: "You dance with the one who brought you".

My question is for the minister in charge of national unity. The premier of Ontario has said that the Prime Minister should speak on behalf of all Canadians and not as leader of the Conservative Party.

Does the minister believe that the words and actions of the Prime Minister overseas are a contribution to his efforts to strengthen national unity?

• (1440)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, although it is obviously important that Canadians who are interested in national unity and in the strength of the economy read what the Prime Minister said and not simply listen to the cast put upon his words in this House.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Millions of Canadians have heard about the Prime Minister's morbid premonition and of his efforts to solicit the votes of 4,000 Vietnamese refugees. They have also seen him bad-mouth Ontario in Hong Kong and Japan, then blame the press, and then have the gall to ask the premier of Ontario for an apology.

Is it appropriate for this man who has so obviously lost control of himself to be in charge of a country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that there is absolutely nothing wrong with the province of Ontario or the people of Ontario. What is wrong is that the Government of Ontario is mortally flawed in its attempt to deal with the pressing economic issues.

Quite frankly Ontario happens to be, through the leadership of its government, the odd province out. At a time when all governments, with the exception of Ontario, are attempting to deal with the fundamental problems affecting our economy, namely inflation and deficit reduction, it is going in the other direction. That does not augur well and does not look well in the eyes of international investors.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Two weeks ago Canada's defence minister announced major cuts in defence expenditures and set off a time bomb for more to come. It is called mass destruction.

All regions of the country that have bases, thousands of military personnel, the Royal Canadian Legion and millions of Canadians are worried about the future of the Canadian forces and the great name they have made for Canada around the world.

Why has the government adopted such irrational cuts to the Canadian forces at a time when it has no defence policy? It seems determined to destroy a large part of one of the great institutions of our Canadian fabric, namely the Canadian forces.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is confused about two different issues.

The announcements that were made several weeks ago by the Minister of National Defence were the reallocation of our existing spending and a reduction in some of the procurement programs which were no longer considered to be priorities, to fit within our existing budget over the coming years.

The second issue, which we are now addressing, is the longer term defence policy review to look at the future roles and the future needs of our Armed Forces throughout this country.

I want to remind the member that the objective is that we will continue to have an Armed Forces, men and women who are professionals, well equipped and are relevant to tomorrow's world. That is the commitment we have and that we will continue to fulfil.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, it sounds as if the minister has backed off and there are going to be no base cuts as announced.

Canadian forces bases cuts would take place in the regions of the country already hard hit economically by the government's own created in Canada recession. Mass destruction is no way to reward the Canadian forces for their outstanding contribution both inside and outside Canada.

Why will the government not bring in a defence policy paper and allow discussion on this issue before it implements its mass destruction of the Canadian forces and the economy of the Canadian countryside? Are there going to be cuts or are there not?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend knows quite well that the work is ongoing. It has involved many people having input, many experts in defence areas, to discuss the future of our Armed Forces.

I think the hon. member also recognizes that there is too much infrastructure at the moment for the size of the force and the composition of the force, and that we will be looking at making changes and adjustments to the costs in order that we can maintain a capable, efficient Armed Forces for the future.

All these decisions will be made by cabinet in due course with opportunities, we anticipate, for the public to review and be involved in this process as we continue through the coming months.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On May 14, the minister released what she then said was a comprehensive and accurate report on the Al-Mashat affair, stating that: "no conspiracies by any individual or government agency, either Canadian or foreign, was involved in this case".

How, then, does the minister reconcile that statement, the fact that Mr. John Burns, an FBI agent, travelled twice to Vienna to meet with Mr. Al-Mashat during the time his application to come to Canada was being processed?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I stand by the statement I made. We in my department are unaware of any connection between the FBI and Dr. Al-Mashat.

There certainly was no attempt by any foreign power to influence any decision on our part or on the processing of the immigration application.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I note in passing that the minister did not deny that such visits took place. If they did take place, it is clearly a contradiction of the report she issued on March 14.

In keeping with the minister's commitment made to this House about full disclosure of relevant information in the Al-Mashat case and given that the standing committee on external affairs is having its organizational meeting this afternoon, will she agree that there can be no real inquiry until we have a full and proper production in public of all relevant documents?

Will the minister agree today to release all those documents, the list of which I sent to her office this morning, so that we can have a proper and full and honest inquiry?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the process so far, including the statement made by my hon. colleague and myself, has been an honest one. I think it is regrettable the hon. member has made allegations that are totally unfounded.

Let me say as well that we have agreed there will be an open and honest inquiry. We are going through documents and we are looking at the privacy provisions and at security provisions. We have said from the beginning that we would produce all of the people and all of the relevant materials to the extent that is possible.

I have given this House my commitment on that from the very beginning, and the hon. member knows it.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the government House leader. I have in my hand a whole list—

An hon. member: What is your credit rating?

Mr. Riis: I will come back to the comments made by the Minister responsible for Canadian Unity and some of the cat-calling he has been doing in a minute. I have a number of quotes that he has made, that the Deputy Prime Minister has made, that the Minister responsible for Canadian Unity has made, and that the Prime Minister has made, all calling for a non-partisan approach to the House of Commons.

The Deputy Prime Minister was screaming a few moments ago to my colleague about his concerns regarding one of the provincial governments. Is this what the government House leader means by a non-partisan approach to the House of Commons?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): No, Mr. Speaker. What I meant was that we should adopt as a practice that which was the practice in this House of Commons being an opportunity for members to ask questions, not make accusations, not make representations.

I would ask that we all take a look at Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 407, which describes how Speakers have suggested we behave. If we follow that, those watching in the galleries and those watching TV would have a lot more respect for all us than they apparently do.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting comment coming from a member of the government who not long ago rushed your chair with their rule books in their hands and brought the House to—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a question, would he please put it to the minister?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my question to the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns his response to my hon. colleague.

Would he not have to admit that the Rae government introduced a number of policies in response to the fact that the fiscal and monetary policies of this government have resulted in rack and ruin in the province of Ontario and right across Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gives me an opportunity to explain to the Canadian people just what is going on with respect to spending across the country.

• (1450)

The Government of Canada has kept its program expenditures increase to an annualized rate of about 3.7 per cent since we have been in office. The Government of Ontario introduced a budget that provides a 13.4 per cent annualized increase in one year. That is inconsistent with the co-ordinated policy that is needed in this country if we are going to get at the root causes of inflation and fiscal consolidation and bring about strength and durability in the Canadian economy. That is what we are all trying to achieve.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Will the minister advise the House and the people of Canada if he and the Prime Minister have now absolutely and without question rejected and ruled out the concept of a constituent assembly other than this House of Commons and the Senate?

If he has, will he give this House his undertaking that the recommendations of this Parliament of Canada will be accepted by the government without modification that the whole matter will be dealt with in an open way and that there will be no changes made behind closed doors.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think most of us who went through the Meech Lake experience will agree we are past the stage in which we want to have proposals put forward that have to be accepted without modification.

I certainly will be interested in the recommendations of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee. I think the whole House will be, and I will be looking for ways in which those can be applied.

With regard to a constituent assembly, the view of the government is known. We believe that it would be unfortunate to put aside a parliamentary system which by and large has worked in the country.

However, we recognize that this system has not earned the respect it requires. What we are proposing for the joint committee that would be established and operating in the summer and in the fall is a parliamentary base composed of members of this House and the other place, but using such elements of a constituent assembly or such other means that reach out to the people of Canada to ensure that we have the broadest possible participation in a process that will recommend the decisions that should reshape this country.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

This is National Access Awareness Week and the theme is "Access is a Right". However, for blind people accessibility is obviously not a right.

The only money provided by this government through the CNIB for Braille services, talking books and teacher training for the blind is less than $50,000 a year.

Does the minister really believe that $50,000 out of a federal budget of $160 billion this year is fair to the blind people of Canada?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to briefly refer my hon. colleague opposite to the statement that we made in the Speech from the Throne.

We will be coming forth with a comprehensive package of measures dealing with accessibility for all disabled in this country: accessibility to housing, to employment, to transport, and to recreation.

The program is well in its definition phases and I hope to be able to make an announcement in the near future.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, people are sick and tired of patronizing statements. What disabled people need is not sympathy. They need support.

In the United States, the federal government has taken the lead in the production and distribution of Braille and talking books. Is it not about time the government got serious and provided this essential service to blind Canadians?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the government is working very closely with the disabled to elaborate this five-year strategy that will be announced.

I have been dealing with them on a regular basis. The plan is coming along very well, and we will be able to announce it in the very near future.

AID

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for External Relations.

The United Nations development report is all about global human development. The 1991 report released last week states that the quality of Canada's aid program is poor. To quote its principal author, Mahbub ul Haq, "it is a cause for concern that only 5 per cent of Canadian aid ends up in the basic human survival programs".

Given that the first priority of Canada's aid program as stated in the minister's own strategy paper is poverty alleviation, can the minister assure us that all new trends in CIDA will not benefit Canadian contractors as a priority but will directly address and correct Canada's poor record in alleviating global poverty?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure my colleague that the strategy defined in "Sharing Our Future" is still what guides our aid programs and sets out our policies.

Therefore I can assure her that our programs are still directed to offsetting poverty and especially to furthering social development. In this regard, I would tell my colleague that CIDA estimates approximately 40 per cent of its funds have an impact on people's social development in health, food, education and even job creation that in the long run can help women and families.

I can assure her that we will continue to direct our programs toward those objectives.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The United Nations development report says, contrary to the minister, that Canada's aid program failed in adequately alleviating poverty and instead was focused too much on the provision of self-serving economic development and technical assistance. It is well known that direct poverty alleviation is best implemented overseas through our non-government organizations and their Third World partners.

Will the minister assure us today that she will cancel all budgetary cutbacks to Canadian non-government organizations and instead provide them a growing proportion of funding according to their program capacity?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I would again reassure my colleague about the orientation of our programs. We have clearly stated that all our Canadian partners, be they non-government organizations, institutions or even the private sector, helped us deliver the kind of aid required for Third World development.

I would also tell my colleague that of course non-governmental organizations are essential and do outstanding work, but I also believe that the private sector too can contribute to the economic growth of developing countries. Our partners in all Third World countries ask us to develop employment and thus contribute to their people's welfare.

For this, we will continue to use all our Canadian partners in the development of Third World countries.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the Japanese government has now officially apologized to those brave Canadians who were interned during the Second World War. In the wake of this action I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

What does this government plan to do to compensate those Canadians for the suffering they went through at the hands of their captors? Will this government help those veterans with their claim for some financial compensation to go along with the apology that we have heard today?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what happened yesterday was certainly an extraordinary event for Canada and the Canadian people and particularly the Hong Kong veterans in receiving an apology from that government after 45 years. It would certainly have to be termed a diplomatic success by any standard.

Nothing can ever really compensate the POWs, the Hong Kong veterans who spent four years in the prisoner of war camps of the Japanese. It is for this very reason that Canadian governments, not only this government but previous governments, have gone a long way to help try to compensate those people. In fact, we have paid over $50 million in prisoner of war compensation to those 2,000 people who were taken prisoner back in December 1941.

Nonetheless, there is a claim before the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations put forward by the veterans groups themselves. They have asked us as a non-government organization to refrain from direct entrance into that particular debate.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

A year ago, officials from the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Development Commission warned the government that unless action was taken to address the imbalance between Canada and the U.S. rail rates, the port of Halifax would be in deep trouble.

In December of last year, the same organization presented a list of options for the government to consider.

What is the government going to do to protect the port of Halifax? What action is it going to take to ensure that the port remains viable and that the employment levels remain viable as well?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I met with members from the port of Halifax last week. I will be in Halifax on Thursday and will be at the port at that time. We will continue to work with all those people involved to ensure the viability of the port of Halifax.

POINTS OF ORDER

REQUEST FOR MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, in light of the response of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs to a question in the House during Question Period and as a member of the Beaudoin-Edwards committee which is sitting until ten o'clock each night making deliberations on a report, would the minister be willing to make a ministerial statement on constituent assemblies tomorrow morning?

Mr. Speaker: I am not at all sure that is a point of order. The hon. member, no doubt, can speak directly with the minister.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

During every Question Period backbenchers from all sides want an opportunity to ask questions concerning constituents back home and the concerns they have.

I am wondering if you would check the "blues" today of the hon. member for Nickel Belt who had six sentences of preamble, making no representation, asking no question. I think you will find in Beauchesne's that is out of order. Would you kindly check?

EXTENSION OF QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, concerning the point made by my hon. friend and in the spirit of the question, I want to say right now that an opportunity should be provided to a number of people who do not make Question Period.

May I suggest that starting tomorrow we extend Question Period for an extra half hour to allow more people to participate in this process?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to set the record straight that during discussions last year with both parties in terms of rule changes, I offered opposition members an extra 15 minutes a day. They turned it down.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to explain that what the government House leader has said is not true. He should have explained that it was part of a large package.

I would like to say that what he has indicated—if people are listening in or watching they will get the wrong impression—was never offered. I am suggesting that starting today I am prepared to offer at least half an hour, if not more, to add to Question Period every day.

ALLOCATION OF TIME DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I heard the parliamentary secretary make his suggestion that somehow there was something wrong with Question Period when members on the other side could not get recognized for questions.

Part of the reason why they and the rest of us do not get recognized for questions every day is the windy answers we get from ministers of the Crown.

I want to make it very clear that the Deputy Prime Minister gave a four-minute answer to the question of the Leader of the Opposition. I have never heard so much drivel in four minutes in this House in my life.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to address that point of order very quickly by suggesting to the House that yes, from time to time answers on this side are too long and from time to time questions from that side are too long.

Perhaps what we can do later at our committee this afternoon is come up with a solution that would be acceptable to both sides of this House.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in order to facilitate the concerns of the members opposite, perhaps they would concur with the suggestion which has been made by my colleague, the leader of the NDP in this House.

Perhaps we could extend, if there is consensus, this particular Question Period for another 10 or 15 minutes to give members on both sides an opportunity to ask more questions. I am sure members of my party would concur with that particular resolution.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I know we are usually chastised for negotiations on the floor of the House.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cooper: I made a serious offer a couple of moments ago. We have a meeting of the management committee in 53 or 54 minutes. I hope to start on time. Perhaps at that time we can come up with a really good solution for all members of this House.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Chair could give some direction. There was a motion to seek unanimous consent of the House. I did not hear anybody deny that, so I am assuming that we are going ahead with a continuance of Question Period. Is that correct, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I might be getting into pretty dangerous ground if I assume that.

The hon. member has indicated that there is a motion before the House to continue with Question Period. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Yes.

AERONAUTICS ACT

Hon. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise for the second reading debate on Bill C-5, namely an act to amend the Aeronautics Act, to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act. I hope that we do not have to soon put forward a further amendment to this act or else the title will be almost impossible to deal with.

As many hon. members will know, I was personally involved in the development of increased fines for aircraft noise violations, so I am particularly happy to speak to this bill today.

These amendments to the Aeronautics Act are being brought forward to update the existing legislation to deal with the issues that have arisen since the act was last amended in 1985. They will also provide the legislative framework for the implementation of undertakings of this government regarding penalties for noise violations and federal-provincial recommendations with regard to airport zoning.

First, I would like to address the section which will provide for an increased maximum for administrative monetary penalties. The 1985 amendments introduced the concept of administrative monetary penalties, which authorized the minister to assess a penalty to a maximum of $1,000 for the contravention of certain provisions. These provisions are designated in regulations which also established the maximum penalty with respect to each provision subject to the limit of $1,000 set out in the act.

In some cases this $1,000 limit has shown to be ineffective as a deterrent, especially with regard to the violation of noise abatement procedures at larger airports, such as Toronto's Lester B. Pearson International.

To overcome this problem, the act is being amended to increase the maximum penalties to $10,000 for corporations and $5,000 for individuals. Bill C-5 will allow the regulations to be amended, increasing the maximum penalty for those offences where such an increase is warranted.

Second, a new section is being added to the zoning provisions of the act, authorizing the minister to make agreements with local zoning authorities that will allow the local authority to make and enforce zoning regulations for local airports, using provincial procedures. This amendment is based on a recommendation of a federal-provincial working group on aerodrome zoning. It met to explore methods of increasing federal-provincial co-operation in preparing and enforcing zoning regulations on lands surrounding airports.

Height zoning around aerodromes comes within the exclusive power of the federal government since it relates to aviation safety while the provinces have the authority to zone such areas for other purposes. Additionally, zoning procedures under the existing Aeronautics Act are more complicated and expensive than those followed by many provinces.

This amendment establishes a system whereby provincial zoning authorities will be able to make height zoning regulations apply to airports at a time and in a manner that will be in accordance with other zoning regulations applying to the area.

If the local authority does not wish to make such an agreement, it is not obligated to do so and the airport may eventually be zoned by the federal government if it comes within zoning policies.

Bill C-5 also proposes amendments to the Aeronautics Act to allow a more expeditious response to urgent safety recommendations.

Occasionally, a body investigating an aviation accident or incident will make a recommendation to the Minister of Transport that requires immediate implementation in the interests of aviation safety.

A new provision being added to the act will allow the minister to make interim orders that will give these recommendations an immediate mandatory effect, while the formal regulation is undergoing the normal process. The interim order will remain in effect until the regulation is completed, or for a maximum of two years.

Another provision of the bill we now have before us will give the minister a new power in the act to withhold, suspend or cancel a Canadian aviation document where, in the minister's opinion, the past record of the document holder justifies this action. This would also apply to any principal of a company which holds the document. This will enable the minister to deal appropriately with situations where an operator, whose certificate has been cancelled, attempts to continue his or her operation by starting a new company or by buying an existing one.

If the minister suspends or cancels a document on this basis, the decision can be reviewed by the Civil Aviation Tribunal.

Two new provisions expanding extraterritorial jurisdiction to the act are being added. The first will make all the provisions of the Aeronautics Act apply, as appropriate, to passengers as well as crew members on board Canadian aircraft operating outside Canada. For example, requiring the use of seatbelts.

The second provision will authorize the Governor in Council to make regulations implementing obligations that Canada has already accepted in principle in ratifying Article 3 "BIS" of what is known as the Chicago Convention, for instance, setting out requirements for aircraft that may be intercepted while over-flying another country's territory.

Last, but not least, Bill C-5, provides for amendments to the security provisions in the act to implement the system of establishing security measures to be carried out by air carriers and airport operators. Instead of security measures being "approved" by the minister, specific ministerial orders will establish those measures that must be carried out by the air carriers. This system will overcome certain legal objections to the earlier method.

Mr. Speaker, I have given only a broad picture of the amendments that Bill C-5 proposes to make to the Aeronautics Act. I look forward to discussing all these facets of the bill with my colleagues when we reach the committee stage.

I am confident that all hon. members will find these amendments worthy of their attention and allow us to bring this most helpful bill through the legislative process in an expeditious manner.

After consultation, I would like to move:

> That Bill C-5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act, be referred, after second reading, to the Standing Committee on Transport.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the motion moved by the hon. minister. All hon. members opposed to the motion please stand.

And fewer than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion is deemed to have been adopted, pursuant to Standing Order 73(3)(b).

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill in front of us today, as the minister stated in her introduction, is to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Much of the bill is in a sense housekeeping. It is to correct various inconsistencies and dated provisions in the existing act. The important element in the act from the point of view of the official opposition is the provision for increased fines for noise violations, in particular, at Canadian airports.

• (1520)

This is an important provision. It is one that is long overdue. It is one which the opposition has been urging for some time in parallel with the proposal for improved noise monitoring systems at our major airports. Certainly the increase from $1,000 to $10,000 in way of a fine for noise violations is in itself a modest enough improvement, but it is at least a step in the right direction and we welcome that provision in the bill.

We also welcome the provision permitting the minister to make an interim order at any time when the safety of the public appears to be at risk.

At the present time, as the minister would know well, the procedures transport investigation bodies are required to follow has meant that the enforcement of regulations has been a long and time-consuming process, a process that has meant the delay of necessary corrective measures. We welcome a step that would enable the minister to proceed in a prompt and effective fashion to ensure that violations of the Aeronautics Act and particularly those relating to noise abatement are dealt with in an effective manner.

Having said that, I want to spend a moment on the question of the general problem of noise abatement and violations at our major airports, particularly at Pearson International Airport in metro Toronto. The impact of the airport in a variety of ways on the surrounding communities has been a constant problem which has continued for a number of years and it seems we are no closer to a solution than we were several years ago.

I say that because we on this side of the House, the Official Opposition, have attempted on a number of occasions to set forward alternative policies for the government to consider and implement as a means of ensuring that the health and the environmental safety of the members of the surrounding communities are not adversely affected by the operations of airports.

Some members will recall that members on this side took an initiative to form a task force under the direction and leadership of the member for York South—Weston and submitted a report to both community groups and to the government recommending a variety of steps to ensure that real progress would be made in coming to grips with the problems at Pearson International Airport.

In that connection, I would refer particularly to the recommendations of that report, which is now more than a year old, which related to various alternative airport use alleviating the heavy pressures on Pearson International Airport. The recommendations with regard to the safe and effective use of the total airport facilities in the Toronto area included an assurance that the facilities of Buttonville airport would remain available to general aviation use.

The issue of how Mount Hope airport at Hamilton might be further used to offset the extreme pressures on Toronto airport and the possibility of even using London, Ontario airport more efficiently and effectively have also been canvassed in our report. The possibilities offered by Toronto Island airport should also be further developed.

None of those issues have been addressed by this government. None of those possibilities have been explored in a systematic fashion, nor has the possibility of the construction of another airport, which the task force under the leadership of the member for York South—Weston suggested, been addressed.

We see a situation in which the federal government has a very large parcel of land available in Pickering for the development of a second major airport for Toronto and yet no progress, no effort has been made to utilize that opportunity. Instead, funds have yet again been channelled into the expansion of Pearson airport.

The possibilities also exist of the development of land transport, particularly fast rail transport between Quebec City and the Windsor corridor. Again, the government has shown no initiative, no progress in exploring the two proposals that the private sector has come forward with to develop that fast rail service, patterned in part upon the highly successful rail services in Europe and in Japan.

This would alleviate many of the pressures on Pearson International Airport but we have had no indication from the government that that initiative, that possibility, can be given a fast-track treatment and we have no assurance to offer to the people living around Pearson International Airport that the rail facilities will be so developed as to lessen some of the pressure on Canada's major airport.

With regard to the situation at Pearson International Airport today, the noise problems are the paramount environmental question but there are other problems which I want to turn to in just a moment.

With regard to noise abatement, the report which the Liberal Party brought forward is quite clear about the need for more effective monitoring of noise pollution at Pearson airport. As I said at the beginning of my brief statement, we welcome the very modest step that was offered today in the way of fining those who systematically violate the existing noise regulations.

The fact remains that those regulations are not in themselves adequate to ensure that the people of the surrounding communities, whether in Malton or in Mississauga or in Etobicoke, have a healthy and enjoyable environment.

• (1530)

I would salute my colleagues from Mississauga East and from York West along with the member for York South—Weston for the leadership that they too have provided in attempting to convince the government of the necessity for pursuing more actively and energetically noise abatement procedures at the airport. In the bill before us only is there the provision for increased fines. Welcome though that may be, it certainly does not address the question, for example, of night flying, a problem that is becoming increasingly acute at the airport where services are now offered on a regular or scheduled basis after midnight and before 6.30 a.m. or 7 a.m., with an impact on the residents that you can well imagine.

The fact is that a number of the schools and public buildings as well as individual citizens are deeply affected by the constant noise of the airport. There are health problems. And, of course, there are certainly property value problems which are pervasive throughout the area.

I would suggest that steps should be taken, even at this late date, to look again at the installation not only of additional monitoring equipment but additional sound barriers and more stringent restrictions on night flights, on full power take-offs and on engine testing at the airport, especially during what should be the quiet hours from midnight until 7 a.m.

Despite those and a variety of other recommendations offered by the Official Opposition, the government has not brought forward any substantial response. It has not indicated the directions of its thinking other than to propose that there be three additional runways built at Pearson airport.

Quite obviously the traffic numbers which the government has brought forward to justify the expansion of Pearson airport by the construction of three additional runways ignores completely the possibilities offered by the greater utilization of the neighbouring airports which, as I have already suggested, might well be expanded and tied in together to a total network of airports for the metro Toronto region.

The impact of the airport, not only in terms of noise but in terms of the adverse effect it can have on ground water from the pollution caused by dumped fuel or by de-icing solutions, has not been adequately addressed.

The impact on wildlife remains a very real problem for all those who are concerned about the adverse impact of the airport on the natural environment. Again, we have had no indication of leadership from the government in those issues despite the reassurances of a succession of transport ministers. I believe there have been something like six in the past few years.

The growth at the airport in traffic has not been matched by any real effort to address the questions raised by the opposition and indeed by my colleague from Dartmouth who has done some notable work regarding the expansion of rail services in Canada and the direction of public funds to that expansion as one method of helping to offset the adverse impacts of airport expansion.

The response of the government has been to undertake an impact study. An agency has now issued an environmental impact statement, the summary of which I have here but which, in total, is several massive volumes. A large amount of public funding has been spent on various studies that compose burden of this report, but what do we have in the end? We have the bald recommendation that the "proposal for three additional runways at Lester B. Pearson International Airport provides the solution that best serves the community at large".

The view of the citizens who live in the area of the airport, the many hundreds of thousands of Canadians who live under the flight paths or, indeed, in the surrounding communities, is to the contrary. They feel that the construction of three additional runways is merely going to compound what are already very serious problems.

I note that as part of this environmental impact process, Transport Canada has invited comment on the report up to July 12 concerning the way in which the impact survey was conducted, but not on the findings of the survey itself. The public's reaction to the survey will necessarily be a more protracted process. It will presumably continue late into the summer and through the autumn, and there will indeed be opportunity for everyone with an interest in this highly important question of airport expansion to offer their views.

The fact is that without some leadership by the government, without a clear indication that it is pursuing the development of alternative methods of transport, thereby ensuring Canadians who live around airports that their concerns and needs are being taken fully into account, I am afraid the process itself is unlikely to offer much confidence to those who have been so adversely impacted by the expansion of Pearson airport.

Equally, if the question of night flights, the question of regulation at the moment is not adequately addressed, then too confidence in this process will be open to serious question.

I want to conclude by stating that while we in the Official Opposition will support the bill, we regard it as a mere drop in the bucket, as it were, of what is required with regard to regulation of air transport in Canada, and particularly with regard to the deleterious effects that a major airport can have on the way of life, the quality of life of the people who have the misfortune of living under the flight paths of a major airport.

I hope the government, in bringing forward this bill, is making a very real commitment to ensuring that those other questions, and serious questions that they, are also being addressed in the most expeditious and sensitive manner.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate today in the second reading debate of Bill C–5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

We have had a chance to visit this legislation in the past, and we are now proceeding to make even more appropriate changes to the legislation that not only affects the mechanics of airline operation and aviation, but protects the safety of those who use the services and those who live beside the areas served.

The act makes a number of very important and positive contributions. I want to go through them very briefly and then deal with some of the areas where I feel some additional improvements can be made within the context of the direction that the government is taking.

For example, the increase in the fines for violations of noise abatement procedures is a good step. If my memory is correct, when we were dealing with this section back in 1986 we argued then that the amounts were too small. This particular bill increases the maximum fine for an individual to $5,000. The maximum fine for a corporation is $10,000.

I want to reiterate the arguments I made then. It is still an unfair relationship. Five thousand dollars to a mechanic is a lot different from $10,000 to Air Canada. I think that the ratio between the fine available for an individual—and let us remember it may be an individual who is only doing what he or she is told, as opposed to the fine for the corporation who may have issued the instruction to violate the noise abatement procedures—is quite out of balance.

Let me add that I am pleased that the minister has recognized the appropriateness of sending legislation to the Standing Committee on Transport. We had agreed prior to it that that would be something we would support. When it gets into the standing committee, I hope we will take a serious look at perhaps finding a new formula.

Perhaps we should be dealing with a percentage of income—the percentage of a pilot's income, the percentage of a flight attendant's income, the percentage of a mechanic's income, the percentage of a ground staffer's income—on one hand or on the other hand the percentage of the company involved—the gross revenue of that airport for that year—so we can put some fairness into that kind of approach. It is really to prevent it from becoming a licence to charge, a way in which to get around the legal requirements.

Ultimately what we really want is to ensure that the noise abatement procedures, whether they be in terms of the ground support, the baffles, what have you, or in terms of the use of certain types of engines in modern airplanes, can be achieved.

The second area is the added authorization between the Minister of Transport and provincial zoning authorities to deal with the enforcement of zoning regulations for airports. There has been a long outstanding need for this kind of correction.

We have a situation in the city of Thunder Bay which has grown up around the Thunder Bay International Airport. I can remember back in the mid-seventies when I was a provincial member having to deal with the realities of the noise contours as applied in their relationship to land development and pressure from the land owners who want to develop and have put pressure on the municipality to agree to it.

It is still before the various levels of government, the OMB, the city, and the province. I believe that this kind of change will facilitate proper zoning controls so that we can protect both the airports and the surrounding residences from encroachment by either one of them.

The new power to make regulations to implement the provisions of the convention on the International Civil Aviation Act is a positive step. It should have been done a long time ago.

The same is true with the provision for interim orders. Where a safety recommendation comes from a body such as the Canadian Transportation Accident Investigation and Safety Board charged with the investigation of aviation accidents comes forward, the government can act immediately. There is a built-in notification procedure. We may wish to take a look at some of the mechanical parts, but I believe that the provision of an interim order is a very good step.

We have to be able to react quickly. We all saw the very graphic results on the day it happened and the results of the interim report of the royal commission studying the Dryden airplane crash, the Air Ontario crash. The government had to have the ability to make reactive steps in order to learn from that accident and to protect passengers and crew members on future flights.

There is also the new provision to give the minister the power to withhold, suspend or cancel a Canadian aviation document where in his or her opinion the past record of the document holder or any principal of a company which holds a document justifies that action.

This will prevent the cancellation of one and having it resurface under another name, under another group of owners. It is designed to protect the public.

We have to make sure that within the legislation before us there are sufficient safeguards for the appropriate appeal mechanism for the individual who may find him or herself caught in the situation, but believes that they have been unfairly denied their right of due process, unfairly prevented from having an aviation certificate issued on their behalf.

I have had one one case that went to the aviation tribunal where an individual was found to be innocent of the decision that was handed down against him. However, there was no mechanism to have his record stricken, it remained a black mark even though the appeal had overturned the initial decision.

So we have to make sure that as we review this particular legislation that we put in place the components that will protect all players, not just the travelling public, not just the government, but those charged with the responsibility and the authorization of transporting people or cargo from place to place. They, too, must have their day in court.

There are a number of other very worth-while changes. They bring us into the 21st century by adding computers to aeronautical products, the software, some language clean-up.

There are two areas that I want to spend a bit of time on because I think they are very important in the context of what is happening today, this month and last month.

The first one deals with changes to section 4 which sets out the extraterritorial application of the act that will make it apply outside of Canada.

You may remember that not too long ago I rose in this House during Question Period, back before prorogation, and raised a question with the then Minister of Transport—in fact, it was the last question to the previous minister—about the ability of airline employees to exercise their right to refuse to work in an unsafe condition that was occurring outside the country.

Let me give a bit of background. Back in April a Canadian Airlines flight attendant refused to board her scheduled duty flight bound from Pearson International Airport to Lima, Peru. She cited section 128 of the Canada Labour Code which allows an employee to refuse to work when they believe it reasonably constitutes a danger.

This flight attendant exercised what she believed was her legal right to refuse to leave Canada to go to a country that, among other things, was suffering from a cholera epidemic. The Department of External Affairs had been sending around a travel advisory for Canadians warning them about this particular situation.

Four days before, in the same destination, a colleague of hers was abducted 300 yards from his hotel by four men who identified themselves as police. He was taken in a car, roughed up and robbed.

Canadian Airlines flight attendants have layovers, or rest periods, as long as 30 hours in Lima. They are taken from the airport to their hotel in a battered bus staffed by an armed security guard. Canadian Airlines pilots who have agreed to extend their duty day times beyond their contract maximum do not lay over in Lima, but are flown to Mexico at the end of their flight duty, one can only assume because they feel unsafe in that particular environment.

The crowning point of this woman's argument was the fact that the day that her flight, the one that she was scheduled to be on, landed in Lima, Peru, there were 30 buildings bombed in that city. This included the Canadian embassy and five other foreign missions. That woman did not get on the plane that night, but her colleagues did.

Labour Canada, which investigated that evening, found she had no reason to refuse to work, and I am advised that that decision has now been upheld in that particular case. But part of the argument from Labour Canada at the time of the initial investigation was that Canadian employees did not have the right to refuse to work in another country. A flight attendant who leaves Canada, travels to another country, remains an employee of the airline, is under the direct control of the airline while in that other country. They are restricted in their travel movements. For example, in Lima, Peru, I believe they cannot travel more than 150 kilometres from the airport. They have their meals and accommodation paid for by the airline.

One of the things I want to address in committee is to ensure that this legislation extends, by eliminating any ambiguity whatsoever, the provisions of the Canada Labour Code across our borders; to the men and women who, in effect, represent Canada. They have the right to a safe and healthy working environment.

My colleague from Mission—Coquitlam is concerned about a decision by NationAir which allowed, the captains of NationAir to let the passengers light up if the flight is delayed. This is in violation of an act of this Parliament, the Clean Air Act or the act that deals with smoking on airlines. We have to look at that.

We have also got to look at the provisions in this legislation that may clarify, once and for all, whether or not the flight attendants, or the crew, have the same restrictions on the length of their work day as the pilots do. There are a couple of reasons for that.

First, it is not something they should have to negotiate at the bargaining table.

Second, the prime purpose of having flight attendants on aeroplanes is not to provide us with drinks or to hand out coffee or snacks or to sell duty free goods. Their reason for being on those airlines is for your safety and mine, primarily at the beginning and the end of the flight. If you have a staffer who has been forced to work for 14 hours non-stop, that staffer is pretty tired. Yet, they are the ones who have the responsibility, in the event of a crash-landing—let us put it bluntly—where there are survivors, to try and open the doors. They have to be well rested. They need to have all their senses about them.

If they have spent 14 hours, either waiting in airports or pushing carts up and down the aisle, or in some cases dealing with individuals who have had too much alcohol, they are not going to be able to perform. So it is important that we clarify this legislation to ensure that there is a legislated mandate for a restriction on the length of time that flight attendants can work while in transit.

I assume my time is almost up, but correct me if I am wrong.

My final point is another area this bill deals with, the question of security. This bill makes some changes in the manner in which security is to be provided at airports in Canada. It also makes some changes in terms of conditions that we expect at the other end, in the other countries our airlines are serving.

But the point I want to raise with regard to this is that we have an ongoing battle between the contract people who provide security at our airports. Transport Canada does not provide security services at Terminal 1, Terminal 2, Terminal 3, Vancouver, Thunder Bay or Halifax. Those are provided, based on the authority of the Minister of Transport, by the airlines themselves. The airlines, in turn, contract out those services and we end up with situations like we have today in Toronto at Terminal 1 where the company that had the contract, in order to regain that contract, bid at a rate that requires them to extract $2 an hour from their existing employees.

We should not be using contract employees, low minimum wage ghetto employees, to provide for the safeguarding of our air travellers in Canada, into Canada, and out of Canada.

We have got to take a serious look at this bill. I believe that within the context of Bill C-5 the opportunity is there to correct a wrong. In the bill itself the minister is losing the power to set the standards and they will now be done by regulation. The bill is dropping the provision for the airline companies or the airports themselves to provide the security. In part, they have gone half way. At the very least, within regulations, it can be changed to decide that they be employees of Transport Canada, or in the case of some of the devolved airports, employees of the local airport authority. But I think we have to take a very serious look at this because we have a responsibility both to the people who provide this service and the people we are providing the service for.

My final point, and again it is an area that I will pursue within the Standing Committee on Transport when this bill comes before it, is that there is wording in Bill C-5 that makes reference to planes being registered in other countries being required to meet the security provisions for Canada. I want to look at that clause because by my interpretation it still leaves a loophole for some airlines that travel within Canada to not have to expose their passengers to the kinds of security measures that all of us go through on an almost daily basis, whether at Pearson or Montreal airports or wherever. If we are to have a secure system, we must make sure that no one has an opportunity to take anything aboard any plane leaving Canada or coming into Canada that can do harm to the passengers and the staff on that plane or harm to the people in the area around them.

I look forward to the work of the committee. I think we can make a good bill that much better and I know the government is listening.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the opportunity to make some brief submissions with regard to Bill C-5. We are presently debating this bill at second reading and I wish to reiterate the position of the Liberal Party that we support this bill in principle.

Unfortunately, its predecessor, Bill C-76, died with prorogation a number of weeks ago and this bill has been brought up for consideration. We consider it to be a good bill, a step in the right direction. Unfortunately, the bill was not brought forward sooner, but in any event the Liberal opposition looks forward to the opportunity to consider the provisions of Bill C-5 in minute detail at the committee level.

As was indicated by the two previous speakers, Bill C-5 is generally considered to be a housekeeping bill. It is entitled an Act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an Act to amend the Aeronautics Act. As you know, a few short years ago, the original act, the act we are amending, was passed by this Parliament.

• (1600)

Over the course of the last number of years, it was deemed necessary to introduce some amendments to correct some minor problems with the original legislation. As well, it updates some of the provisions in Bill C-76.

However, there are some very important changes to the bill. Among the most important changes are the provisions which increase the fines for designated offences within the bill. Fines are increased from $1,000 to $5,000 for individuals and from $1,000 to $10,000 for corporations.

That would include airline companies operating in Canada and other airlines that use Canadian airports. In particular, it would include provisions dealing with noise abatement and contraventions of the provisions dealing with the restriction of noise.

I had the privilege of chairing the federal Liberal caucus task force on Pearson International Airport a few years ago. In fact, the committee rendered its report on June 12, 1989, some two years ago.

Since that time, the report has been circulated widely. We have had numerous requests for copies of this particular report. It was a comprehensive report that studied the workings of Pearson International Airport and all the problems associated with it. The report made a number of excellent recommendations.

The task force consisted of a number of my colleagues, members of the Liberal opposition. It spent a number of days at Pearson International Airport touring the facilities there. Then it listened to a significant number of witnesses who came forward to express their concerns about matters affecting Pearson International Airport.

We heard from the pilots' association, for example. We heard from representatives of the major airlines. We heard from representatives of smaller air carriers. We heard from citizens' groups and politicians from other levels of government. All had very important and significant concerns to bring to our attention.

The report that was released on June 12, 1989 includes a section on noise abatement and hours of operation. This particular section of the report is relevant in considering Bill C-5 which has, as one of its main provisions, the increase of fines.

In this report two years ago we recommended that fines be increased in order to deter and dissuade airline companies from breaching noise by-laws. We believe that with a significant increase in the fines that can be levied, airlines will think twice about breaking curfew provisions at Pearson International Airport and at all airports across the country.

We fully endorse and support the increase of the maximum penalty for breaching noise abatement provisions. As I indicated, the maximum penalties would be increased from $1,000 to $5,000 for individuals and to $10,000 for corporations.

I would ask the committee to consider not only maximum penalties for breaches of noise abatement provisions, but minimum penalties. We know that when we establish a maximum penalty, that is the limit. If we do not provide a minimum penalty, a suspended sentence for example, no penalty at all could be considered an appropriate penalty.

If this Parliament wishes to send a very clear message to those who at times, in a callous fashion, breach noise abatement provisions then the committee should consider incorporating minimum penalties within this legislation.

Once it is proven that a particular company or individual has breached a particular section—and I refer again to the noise abatement provisions—then there would be a minimum penalty that that person or company would be subjected to.

There are a number of MPs from the Toronto area who have a significant number of constituents who are directly affected by Pearson International Airport. The task force heard, of course, that there are problems at other airports in Canada, in particular at the Vancouver airport in Vancouver, British Columbia, and I am sure there are problems at other major airports in Canada. The mandate of the task force that I chaired though was simply to investigate the problems at Pearson International Airport.

I represent a riding that is east of the airport, York Southwest, and I know that the former Minister of Finance, now the Minister for International Trade, represents the riding of Etobicoke Centre and his constituents are very concerned about what is happening at Pearson. A number of my colleagues as well, from Etobicoke North and York West and others from Mississauga, also have constituents who are directly affected. In fact, the task force heard that over 300,000 residents living near the airport are affected by problems at Pearson International Airport.

The residents who have written to us, appeared before the committee or have called our constituency offices have consistently and persistently pointed out the problems emanating from frequent take-offs and landings at Pearson International Airport. In fact, at task force hearings the most animated, the most passionate submissions came from community groups which expressed their serious concern about noise problems at Pearson.

The problem continues. The complaints continue. Unfortunately, this government and its officials believe that the answer is simply to build new runways. We do not believe that is the ultimate answer.

The task force report points out that before there is any consideration of increasing the runways at Pearson, the government should consider increasing the usage of other airports in and around Toronto that are under-utilized at present. For example, the airport at Hamilton. We heard a significant amount of evidence about the under-utilization of that particular airport.

The taxpayers of Canada have spent millions of dollars to update that particular facility and for some reason the government has chosen not to require different airlines to move their operations to the Hamilton airport. A lot of the commercial traffic could be moved to Hamilton. Hamilton is not that far away from metropolitan Toronto. Indeed, it is at times more convenient, or would be more convenient, for people to travel to Hamilton rather than to Pearson International Airport.

We also recommended that, for example, the use of the Buttonville airport, the Island airport, the London, Ontario airport and the Oshawa airport could be increased. Also, we recommended that the government introduce measures to require companies and others to use those airports to draw away, to siphon off some of the very heavy traffic at Pearson International Airport.

Regarding the problems of noise, especially noise in the early morning hours and in the evening hours, the task force recommended that there should be no easing of the restrictions placed on late night flights at Pearson International Airport.

We also recommended the appointment of an independent airport ombudsman to investigate and report on noise complaints at Pearson International Airport. Unfortunately, the government has not yet adopted this recommendation and perhaps at the committee level the members of the committee will consider same. The problem is not going to disappear, although the operators of different airlines suggest that with the advent of quieter aircraft the problem will eventually diminish and go away. That has not yet happened and the task force heard that the fleets of Air Canada and Canadian International Airlines have a small percentage of quieter generation aircraft.

My time is limited. At the committee level the Liberal members of the committee will certainly bring to the attention of the committee the section in the task force report dealing with noise abatement and hours of operation at Pearson International Airport. The problems are well known. The report is extensive; the recommendations are good and I believe the committee can make excellent use of the summary of all the evidence that we heard two years ago. That evidence is still relevant today. That evidence includes the tremendous increase in the number of complaints at Pearson International Airport over the last five years.

We were told at the task force that in the period 1985-88 the number of annual complaints rose from 500 to over 3,500, an increase of over 700 per cent. At the same time, the number of aircraft movements increased from just over 250,000 to just under 350,000, an increase of approximately 30 per cent.

The problem of noise at Pearson International Airport is significant. A community group called the Citizens Against Airport Noise appeared before the committee and I would suggest that perhaps the standing committee that considers this bill would consider inviting this citizen group and others before the committee.

Different citizen groups and community groups have called upon the government to undertake an effective noise abatement program. There is still a lot that can be done. Some has been done over the last number of years but we believe there is still a lot that can be done in order to give some peace of mind and tranquillity to all those who have invested in homes around Pearson International Airport. Believe me when I say it is not pleasant, especially in the summer, for people in a lot of communities around Pearson to have to listen to the aircraft landing and taking off. Some people suggest that the homeowners there purchased their homes knowing that the airport was there but the problems have increased over the last five or ten years because of the increase in air traffic at Pearson.

We recommended in this report, in order to deal with these concerns strict curfew hours, the installation of noise monitoring equipment at the airport, the erection of noise barriers, restrictions on noisy models of aircraft and the imposition of severe fines for violators of noise regulations. This bill does deal with the last point, and that is an increase in fines.

The task force listened to a company called Consult-Air, which advanced a number of noise abatement proposals. We believe some of the proposals had a lot of merit. One of the proposals was the establishment of an ombudsman to investigate and make public recommendations on noise and other complaints related to airport operations.

As I indicated earlier, the aviation industry is taking the position that the new generation of stage three aircraft such as the A-300, A-310 and A-320 series as well as the Boeing 757 and 767 represents the eventual solution to the noise problem.

"There is little doubt that from the standpoint of noise generation, fuel efficiency and environmental protection,"—I am reading from the report—"these new generation aircraft are vastly superior to older, noisier aircraft such as the DC-9, Boeing 727 and 737, the Lockheed L-10ll and the older models of Boeing 747."

While the air carriers are touting the merits of the new generation of stage three aircraft, if we look at the fleet of Air Canada and Canadian, for example, we see that the stage three aircraft are rather limited in those fleets.

In the Air Canada fleet there were 116 aircraft in 1989. There were six McDonnell Douglas DC-873s, the cargo plane, 36 McDonnell Douglas DC-9s, six Boeing 747s, 14 Lockheed 1011s, 33 Boeing 727s and 21 Boeing 767s.

The only aircraft that can be characterized as the quieter generation of stage three models are the 21 Boeing 767s and the six re-engined DC-873s. That is a total of 27 aircraft, 23 per cent of the entire Air Canada fleet.

While it is a significant percentage, it is not enough to lead one to conclude that these quieter generation aircraft are the answer today. It will take a significant number of years before the stage three aircraft constitute a significant majority of the fleet of both Air Canada and Canadian Airlines.

I note that my time is almost up. There are a number of other provisions in this bill that we consider to have merit. One of the provisions in section 4 is to extend the workings of the act to passengers on board aircraft that are not over Canadian air space. That would enable the prosecution of passengers who refuse to buckle up while a Canadian aircraft is landing in a different country.

At present, the bill does not apply to them. Passengers could not be prosecuted even though those passengers could pose a significant safety problem to other passengers when they do not buckle up or follow the provisions of Bill C-5.

In closing, let me say again that the Liberal Party supports Bill C-5. We will make every effort to expedite the considerations of this bill at committee. We hope to participate in a very complete way in trying to make this bill a better bill at committee.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to address certain issues with respect to Bill C-5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Let me say at the outset that we, on this side of the House, agree in principle with the legislation. There are certain sections that require clarification or improvement.

I would like to bring these issues before this House and certainly before it reaches committee at third reading.

First and foremost among our concerns is the fact that the Minister of Transport is given extra added powers to make interim orders to implement safety recommendations of bodies such as the Canadian Transportation Accident Investigation and Safety Board.

I want to ensure that this legislation will also allow the minister to implement air safety recommendations from other institutions and from other committees.

• (1620)

I speak primarily of an ongoing inquiry: Mr. Justice Virgil Moshansky's investigation into the air tragedy at Dryden, Ontario. We understand at this stage that Mr. Justice Moshansky has completed his hearings into this matter and is in the process now of forming his final recommendations.

The report is in its final stage and should be released some time in June.

We are further aware from the information that we have been able to gather that Mr. Justice Moshansky's inquiry went to further in depth studies, not only in the events that led up to the Dryden crash, but in the ability and the competence of those entrusted with the responsibility in Canada of investigating not only airline disasters but airline incidents.

We are also led to believe that problems with the air-side operation at Pearson International Airport will be addressed in his lordship's report.

I compliment the former ministers of transport who were in office during the Moshansky inquiry for implementing the interim recommendations made by the justice, especially the recommendation that affects so many of us in Canada with respect to airline procedure on de-icing.

I want to ensure, and I will pursue in committee, that the recommendations that will be forthcoming and that have been so long awaited from the Moshansky inquiry will receive priority of the highest order and that the legislation that we are in the process of implementing through committee and through final reading will be implemented at the earliest possible time for the betterment of the travelling public in Canada and for international countries that use a Canadian airline service.

The other area that I hope this legislation will implement and allow us to have more of a rapid input into safety measures which affect Canadian air travellers is with respect to safety and security. In light of the events that have happened in the last few days with respect to an international airline, I am told that the X-ray procedure on baggage for all Canadian airlines does not follow the X-ray procedure requiring all baggage to be X-rayed before it gets on an aircraft.

We are told that only the baggage that is carried on by the individual through the security gates at all airports in Canada is subject to X-ray investigation.

I would like to urge today and with this opportunity to speak before the House and in regard to recent events that all baggage which goes on to any airline in Canada not only follow the present procedure that it must be on the same airline as its owner, but that it be X-rayed for suspicious materials. I would like to see that recommendation implemented at the earliest possible time.

My colleague from Toronto spoke at some length on environmental concerns and noise abatement, and quite capably gave the concerns of those areas around Pearson Airport which will be influenced by the increased traffic that we presently experience in the hub of Canada which is Pearson International Airport.

In this bill we will question the environmental concern which will be expressed through the assessment which is presently going on of the contemplated addition of the two extra runways to handle the expanded traffic Pearson is not only receiving now but is expected to receive in the next several years as it becomes the hub of Canadian air travel in Canada.

Needless to say, we should not avoid what the report of the environmental assessment hearing will recommend to us involved in transportation and to the government with respect to the two additional runways which may be added.

I am advised that even with the environmental assessment review with respect to the two runways, an Order in Council can do away with the environmental assessment hearing and its recommendations. The process of adding the two additional runways at Pearson International Airport is a fait accompli, and regardless of what the environmental assessment review will show, the two runways are now in the planning stage at Pearson International Airport.

I caution this government that the noise abatement and noise procedures should be enhanced and given proper consideration at this stage before those two runways are completed.

My colleague has also addressed the noise abatement issue. This legislation draws to our attention another very important deficiency, not only in air transportation in Canada, but in all transportation needs.

What we see in this House day after day is a lack of a comprehensive national transportation policy which not only will guide Canada and its transportation needs in the next two or three or five years, but will bring Canada into the 21st century to be more competitive on the international scene, as we are all trying to do, and to provide a facility within Canada for the ease and convenience of Canadian travellers.

We see, rather than a national transportation policy, an erosion of surface transportation in this country which is really cause for concern. We noticed last week right here on the Hill a lack of transportation policy which for every trucking company in this country, every truck driver and every independent owner is cause for serious concern about the future viability of his and his family's livelihood with respect to certain taxation measures that prevent them from operating in a competitive way with his American counterparts.

We see almost a complete erosion of another surface transportation need; the passenger rail service within this country. I know that in my riding of Thunder Bay, and as I travel across this country and talk to people in many communities across this country, that the erosion of passenger rail service has been one of the key factors in the unity debate which we presently find ourselves in. The national transportation passenger system which brought us all together is now being disintegrated, and that has caused this country great concern. A national transportation policy would be one of those areas in which we could address the need for a national transportation system within this country.

We talk about environmental concerns. We do not use the natural waterways, the Great Lakes system and the Great Lakes seaway to their advantage. If we do not start using the seaway for the transportation, not only of goods, but of persons in the near future, it may well be on its last leg as a viable transportation entity within our country and we would not want to see that happen.

Our highway situation across this country is in a state which requires federal intervention. I was talking to one of our colleagues from the United States this weekend at the United States Inter-Parliamentary Session and any interstate highway system is funded 90 per cent by the federal government. In Canada this national transportation policy is left deficient.

With the lack of a national transportation policy, we see that this act before us today, Bill C-5, is another piecemeal solution to the problems that confront Canada and all Canadians with respect to deficiencies and transportation requirements we so sorely need within this country.

As I said at the outset, we will support this legislation, but we on this side of the House will continue to research, promote and put forward a national transportation policy which will meet the needs of Canadians in this generation and will bring Canada into the 21st century with the transportation requirements that are so sorely needed but deficient from the lack of leadership we are seeing today.

I appreciate the opportunity to make those remarks.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the spirit of Bill C-5, the Aeronautics Amendment Act. What I think is important is that there are some very good amendments coming forward in it. However, some of the amendments fall a little short of what is needed for those people who work for the airlines.

Some of the hon. members who have spoken before me have spoken quite extensively about the important amendments that are coming for those who live and work in the vicinity of an airport. Some hon. members have risen and spoken about those who are the travelling public.

I would like to address my remarks to what would be helpful in this bill—if there were additional amendments—for those who work for the airlines.

To illustrate my concern I would like to give some examples. My first example is a woman who the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan referred to earlier when he spoke. This woman, who works for Canadian Airlines, was scheduled to board her flight from Pearson International to Lima, Peru in early April. She refused to board, citing section 128 of the Canada Labour Code, which allows an employee the right to refuse work when they believe it reasonably constitutes a danger.

Here are the reasons this woman refused to board that aircraft. Lima is the capital of Peru. It not only currently suffers from a cholera epidemic, but it continues to be the scene of continual rebel and terrorist violence. Only five days before this woman refused to fly to Peru, on April 1, 1991, a Canadian Airlines flight attendant was abducted 300 yards from his hotel by four men who identified themselves as police. He was taken in a car, roughed up and robbed.

Canadian Airlines flight attendants currently have layovers or rest periods for as long as 30 hours in Lima. They are taken from the airport to their hotel in a battered bus manned by an armed security guard and dropped off. However, the pilots, who have agreed to extend their duty day beyond their contract maximum, do not lay over in Lima, but are flown to Mexico at the end of their flight day.

The day after this woman exercised her right to refuse unsafe work, terrorist bombing incidents occurred at more than 30 buildings in Lima, Peru including, I might add, the Canadian embassy and five other foreign missions.

In its March 1991 travel advisory for Peru, the Department of External Affairs warns that both street crime and terrorism are serious problems in several cities and regions. Since the conflict in the Persian Gulf, there has been a marked increase in the attacks made against foreign diplomatic missions, restaurants, cultural centres, businesses and public areas in Lima. The notice also urges visitors to consume only food prepared under hygienic conditions, carefully cleaned fruits and vegetables, peeled and preferably cooked, bottled water or water purified by boiling it for 10 minutes if possible.

Canadian Airlines own guidelines for the cholera epidemic include no fish, no salads, no showers, and no water that is not gasified and sealed.

Within hours of this woman's refusal to board that airline, two Department of Labour safety standard officers investigated her claim on site at Pearson airport. A verbal rejection of the claim was given, with a written decision to follow, on the grounds that there is no danger or risk from cholera and that the foreign nature of the job site and the security threat put her beyond the jurisdiction of the labour code.

Yet, there is clear and present danger. I have illustrated in my remarks the clear and present danger that led this flight attendant to refuse to fly to Lima, Peru. Forcing workers to go to Lima is not in the spirit of how we all believe our workers in Canada should be treated.

To provide for this worker the airlines could provide layover flights to Mexico, but they have said they will only do so if the attendants extend their duty days even longer than 14 hours. That would be simply replacing one safety hazard with another. Overtired, overworked flight attendants are not safe.

It would be very useful in this legislation to have an amendment that would restrict the duty days of flight attendants to reasonable and humane hours. In addition, we would expect that either the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Transport, or both, would work to resolve how a worker is to be treated when he or she leaves the country.

One of the other areas that I would like to address regarding this legislation, and another where I would suggest an amendment would be useful, is the whole question of security at airports. I rose in the House last Thursday and made a statement regarding one security firm at Pearson airport which is undercutting another security firm to secure a contract with the airport for its airport security. This is not, I might add, isolated to Pearson. In fact, this is happening at a number of airports across the country. We have recently seen the outcome of such a situation with the dispute that went on at the Edmonton airport.

The particular situation that I am speaking about concerns Terminal 1, where the security firm Aeroguard is demanding a wage cut of $2 an hour from its employees as well as elimination of the group insurance plan. The company is threatening the 100 passenger screening agents with layoffs if they refuse these cuts so it can get a renewal of the contract, so it can win the bid.

This kind of tactic invites raiding, it invites instability in that work group and it does not even provide reasonable job security. There is certainly no reason to develop any job pride. Without pride, without continuity of service, the ability to do a good job as a screening agent is hurt. I think we would all agree, certainly the members in this House who fly thousands and thousands of kilometres a year would agree, that it is very important that these people are very skilled and very committed to the work they do and should be encouraged to develop pride in their work. This is another area where we feel an amendment to this amendment would be useful.

I was hoping today to rise in the House during Question Period, and I did not get the opportunity to do so. However, I certainly will raise the issue now concerning the whole question of who is in charge of enforcing regulations relating to health and safety matters on aircraft. Labour Canada appears to establish the regulations. However, in the case I am going to discuss Transport Canada is charged with enforcement.

The question I was going to raise concerned how on earth Transport Canada could override an existing law under the Canada Labour Code by permitting NationAir to amend its flight safety manual to allow smoking on a non-smoking flight while that flight is delayed on the ground.

Why is Transport Canada circumventing that law? Why is it permitting one carrier this special treatment over the expressed concerns of flight crews about their health and safety?

We have even moved that in this precinct which encompasses the House of Commons, and those of us who smoke have honoured it, the people around us should not have to be recipients of our side-stream smoke, that we should not have staff who are required to work in the same workplace with smokers, that smokers should not be allowed to smoke in the workplace. Yet Transport Canada has allowed this airline, NationAir, to permit smoking if the flight is delayed. Not only are we suggesting that airline flight attendants are subjected to inhaling this smoke. Certainly passengers who do not smoke are being exposed to it. In addition, one small factor in a recent incident with NationAir was that the alarms were all set off in the washrooms by the huge cloud of smoke in place on the aircraft because of the delay.

It would seem to me that this is another area the government might want to think about, including an amendment to this act that would be helpful.

There are four areas where I would suggest we have amendments. In conclusion I would like to point them out: first, an amendment that also protects workers on international flights and their right to refuse what they believe is unsafe work; second, an amendment that would limit the hours of work of crew members of an aircraft that is operated by air carriers, and of the crew members of an aircraft that is in fact carrying passengers; third, an amendment bringing security staff at airports under the employment of Transport Canada; and, fourth, an amendment that will not allow Transport Canada to overrule labour, health and safety regulations.

We look forward to this bill going before committee and we are sure that after our persuasive argument the Minister of Transport will agree with us that those kinds of amendments are also very important.

NOTICE OF MOTION PURSUANT TO S.O. 57

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In accordance with Standing Order 57, Mr. Speaker, I give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order is called for resuming debate on government motion No. 1 to reinstate certain bills introduced in the Second Session of the 34th Parliament and on any amendments relating thereto, I shall move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Dartmouth—Goods and Services Tax; the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona—Canadian Pacific; the hon. member for Saint-Léonard—The economy; the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte—Canada Post Corporation; the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso—Canada Post Corporation.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the hon. minister has given notice of limitation on Motion No. 1.

On behalf of my party I take great exception to the minister's notification, and I want to advise the minister that his motion certainly comes at a very inappropriate time with His Honour, Mr. Speaker, considering the ruling that was placed before him this morning.

I would like to advise the minister that we will be debating this motion, and we feel that the government is certainly not correct in moving this notice at this particular time.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to point out to the hon. members of this House that the minister is complying with the Standing Orders in giving notice of this motion, although the Chair has taken under advisement the issue of whether Motion No. 1 on the Order Paper is in order.

The Chair takes note of the motion of closure that the Hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare has just tabled.

AERONAUTICS ACT

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleague from Nova Scotia will bear with me. I merely want to make a few brief remarks on Bill C-5 which amends the Aeronautics Act.

As members are well aware, many of the provisions of Bill C-5 relate to the security measures that are taken in airports across Canada for the travelling public. The bill is also concerned with the safety of passengers. It is just to those two points that I would like to direct a few brief remarks.

I believe that the regulations and procedures that are most acceptable to the public are those that appear to be reasonable and rational and solve the problem of security in the processing of airline passengers. However, while I am no expert on aeronautics, I am an expert on airline passenger services, having travelled for over 10 years back and forth to my constituency in Halifax West and various other places.

I would like to make a few remarks in the hope that officials will read the record and pay some attention. While I endorse wholeheartedly security measures at airports across Canada, I am not always satisfied that the rules are effectively and properly administered.

Let me just give one rather easy example between airports. As you approach the Ottawa International Airport security area, you simply take your choice of two or three avenues in which to have the required inspection carried out. On the other hand, in the Montreal airport, that is Dorval, you are channelled through one gateway on to the security at which your boarding pass and other credentials are inspected. At Halifax International Airport, you are channelled through one gateway but no pre-inspection is carried out.

Just very simply observing those three airports, there is no question that the most effective inspection method is to channel all passengers through one entry, inspect their boarding passes and any other credentials they are required to have, and then go on to the inspection.

Time and time again I am sure other members have experienced at the Ottawa International Airport where you are simply allowed your choice of inspection stations. There is always confusion about boarding passes. People are held up. In many cases they are asked to check metal objects and so on.

Why could the authorities not simply have a system employed at all airports whereby there is pre-inspection of credentials where passengers are told that they should remove metal objects from their pockets or purses and put them in a container and other information about the inspection process?

This pre-inspection would also allow those poor people whom I encounter sometimes—and I must confess that on occasion I have been one of them—who are late arriving, possibly and hopefully through no fault of their own, and are unable or unwilling to jump ahead of the line and therefore may risk missing their flight.

I think all of us can have mercy on people in that position and through some pre-inspection process allow them to proceed on a priority basis. There ought to be enough humanity among my colleagues to endorse that kind of process, especially for people who are not accustomed to airline security and air transportation.

In pursuing the authority that we in Parliament are giving to the minister and to the government to enact regulations, my plea is simply to have sensible regulations applicable on a uniform basis at airports throughout Canada, regulations that people will understand, appreciate, respect and therefore observe so that in the end we will have a more effective administration with which to achieve the purpose of the safety and security of airline passengers.

• (1650)

I have another point because the bill deals with the safety of aircraft passengers. It is a matter that is also subject to federal regulation, that is the carriage and storage of goods and baggage on board an aircraft.

How many times have you got on an aircraft with a bag which is within the regulations and found as you take your seat that the overhead compartment, which is the proper place to store the bag, was occupied? It could be pillows, equipment, flight attendants' baggage and so on. Consequently you move as a passenger to the next storage area, which means that the passenger arriving after you finds your bag in his or her storage area.

Surely this is a matter that can be regulated in some sensible way so we do not get this ludicrous loading of an aircraft where everybody is searching for a place to put their hand baggage, and then when the journey is completed there is a great mix-up as passengers try to retrieve their baggage.

I do not know exactly how the storage of baggage relates to safety, but the regulation is designed to ensure safe conditions aboard the aircraft. That is why we have the regulations in the first place. Having told airline employees and officials that baggage has to be stowed away, the government must come up with some sensible rules or a system whereby baggage is properly stowed away so that it will not create havoc in boarding and debarking from aircraft.

I know there are no provisions in Bill C-5 specifically relating to security measures at airports or to safety on board aircraft. The fact of the matter is that we in Parliament are giving that authority first to officials to draw the regulations, second to the minister to put them forward, third to the government to enact these regulations as law. My plea is simply that when this power is being exercised some common sense principles should be observed. This common sense element will ensure effectiveness of the regulations.

In justification for making this intervention, because I know my colleague from Cape Breton will be annoyed that I held up what I am sure will be an impressive delivery in the House of Commons, Bill C-5 makes it very clear that people who contravene the regulations may suffer all sorts of severe punishment pursuant to this regulatory authority. Whether they contravene them in Canada or abroad it does not matter because the bill provides that a contravention that occurs outside Canada can be punished within Canada.

The act is very clear on the obligations of Canadians and others as passengers on Canadian aircraft. I want the authorities to be equally clear about the methods, the systems, the processes and the procedures that they put into operation through the regulations which we in Parliament are empowering them to make.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to intervene, but there are two issues that my colleague from Halifax West raised which I think deserve comment with respect to his government's position.

The first is the uniform safety and security precautions that he was asking for that would be consistently applied throughout the country. That is an area that we on this side of the House have been asking the Minister of Transport and his government to implement. That is simply a uniform security measure applicable throughout Canada, from anyone catching an airplane in Victoria, British Columbia right through to St. John's, Newfoundland. They should be as equally applicable in St. John's and Victoria as they are in Ottawa.

We all know, as our friend has just stated, that procedures are not the same in all airports. One issue that the ministry of transport should address is the security precautions within this country, particularly at this time, with a uniform application of security measures not only on luggage which is checked through before boarding but luggage that is taken on the aircraft. This was the second point of his argument.

The reason for my question is that we have had several recommendations from the National Transportation Safety Association, what used to be the National Transportation Agency, to the minister with respect to carry-on luggage on aircraft in Canada.

In 1988 they made a recommendation with respect to what luggage a passenger is allowed to take on an aircraft. This was fine when Air Canada and Canadian Airlines offered fairly good and fairly large planes throughout the country. However, the airlines have down-sized and now just operate between the major cities and have connector flights between all the small and remote communities in this country. Those smaller flights are with smaller aircraft. Yet, we have not changed the rules concerning carry-on luggage on these aeroplanes.

What might have been acceptable on a DC-9 or a 727 is no longer acceptable on a small Dash-8 or a 25 or 30 passenger aircraft. We have not addressed that critical safety issue in the regulations that should be imposed on the travelling public in this country.

The Ministry of Transport is responsible for not making and not implementing the recommendations made consistently to their ministry, not only by the National Transportation Agency but the Canadian Aviation Safety Board.

I would ask my friend from Halifax West to comment on why his government has not implemented those recommendations from the responsible agencies within this country.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I do not see any need for me to respond for the government. Unfortunately, I am not a member of the cabinet and am not privy to these decisions. However, I can say that airport security is an evolving process. I hope that in this bill we can contribute to the evolution of that process. Now, as a result of remarks that have been made, officials will have an opportunity to review those remarks and perhaps the government can make some of those changes.

Rome was not built in the first day. It took time to evolve and airline regulations take time to evolve. I do not see any real difficulty there. We can always look and hope for improvements. Recommendations from other organizations are always welcome if they are improvements.

I hope the member will realize and recognize that I am simply making a contribution, an intervention that I think could be helpful if it is looked at and reviewed in a positive light. I hope that will be the decision of the officials and the government.

I have to endorse what he says about cabin baggage. People will go to the limit of the rules. They will take aboard an aircraft whatever baggage they are allowed to take, because it simply aids their travelling capacity as they will not have to wait for luggage at the end. At the same time, they will observe whatever rules are put in place.

I agree with the member that there is a burden on the government to have, as I have already said, effective and sensible rules governing these areas so we all know what the rules are and we can all observe them with some relish.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REINSTATEMENT OF BILLS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members are aware, we have had a series of comments concerning a problem in the House. Unfortunately, it was impossible to produce a judgment with all the requisite reasons, but I acknowledge the urgent nature of the issue raised by hon. members and the need for handing down a judgment this afternoon.

Consequently, I am now ready to render my decision.

[English]

A point of order was raised this morning relating to government business No. 1, which concerns the reinstatement of certain bills from the Second Session.

• (1700)

After hearing representations from several hon. members, I took the matter under advisement and have been deliberating on the points raised, intending to render my decision tomorrow.

However, I have now received representations, as I have just said, on behalf of the three House leaders requesting that the Chair render its decision this afternoon.

Accordingly, to accommodate this request, I will now render my decision. I will return later to explain the rationale behind it. I should say—and I think hon. members can understand this—that I am trying to accommodate certain necessities and I would hope that it would not become the practice to give a judgment and file the reasons later.

The Chair, of course, knows full well the effects of prorogation on the business then before the House. The Chair must also acknowledge, however, that the notion of reinstatement of business in the subsequent session is well established in our practice.

While this has hitherto been done by unanimous consent, the Chair can find no compelling reason to preclude proceeding by way of notice of motion, nor am I persuaded to reject the motion outright.

The theme of the motion is the reinstatement of certain bills. While the six bills are all distinct, the purpose of the motion is clearly to reinstate the bills at various stages. Therefore, the Chair has decided not to divide the motion for the purpose of debate.

That being said, however, the Chair does have some difficulty in accepting the argument that a member in casting a single vote, can adequately express his or her opinion on six distinct pieces of legislation.

Therefore, government Motion No. 1 will be dealt with in the following manner. There will be a single debate and five separate questions will be put, namely on the reinstatement of Bill C–26, Bill C–58, Bill C–78, Bill C–82 and Bill C–85. No question will be put on Bill C–73 as this matter has already been disposed of by the House. The enabling final paragraph of the motion will, as appropriate, form part of each question put.

AERONAUTICS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C–5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words on this legislation, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

It will be very difficult to live up to the advance billing that has been provided for me by my colleague from Halifax West.

As my colleagues who have spoken earlier this afternoon have already mentioned, the Liberal opposition basically supports the legislation that is before us. Its main substantive provisions concern increasing fines for airline offences relating to the contravention of the airport noise restrictions and expand the power of the Minister of Transport to deal with airports' emergencies under certain circumstances.

The Liberal Party certainly supports the thrust of this legislation, which is to reduce noise pollution at our major airports and to increase airport safety. In fact, members on this side of the House, particularly those representing constituencies in and around Toronto, have called upon the government to take action to deal with the problem of airport noise arising from over–flights and the take off and landing of large jets at the Pearson International Airport.

I am informed that a task force study by the Liberal opposition called "The Report on the Pearson International Airport" cited some rather shocking statistics concerning the number of flights landing around the residences near Pearson International Airport. For example, 747 jets land and take off, waking up residents who live near the airport, at 3 a.m., 4 a.m. and 5 a.m. There are some 300,000 people are living in that area.

Certainly the problem of noise pollution and frequent flights over Pearson International Airport is a serious problem. It is good to see that the members of the opposition have been vigorously representing the concerns of their constituents faced with those difficulties.

In fact, what surprises me about the debate on this particular piece of legislation, in light of the motion introduced earlier by the government, is the fact that Bill C–5, which we support, was not included among the pieces of legislation that the government chose to include in its motion for reinstatement of outstanding legislation from the previous session.

It does not bode well in terms of increasing the degree of collegiality and credibility among members who work diligently in committees to try to improve legislation for the government to reintroduce flawed pieces of legislation which we on this side of the House have opposed and against which we have presented arguments from many people who have consistently demonstrated flaws in the legislation. It does not bode well for the government to reintroduce those pieces of legislation without cleaning them up, without improving them, as this government proposes to do with this motion, and not reintroduce legislation which the opposition members have already agreed to support.

Bill C-5, which was introduced in the previous session as Bill C-76 in June 1990, was not proceeded with any further after that. This is a piece of legislation which, as I have just mentioned, concerns a large number of people living in and around Pearson International Airport and concerns the safety of passengers travelling at airports across this country.

With the government proceeding pell-mell with legislation over the opposition of many interest groups, while at the same time stalling on other worth-while pieces of legislation, it is not hard to see why Parliament is looked upon with such scepticism by so many Canadians.

That is the first point I would like to make in general about this piece of legislation.

Now, hon. members may wonder why a member from a rural riding like Cape Breton Highlands—Canso would choose to speak on the subject of airport noise, airport congestion and the safety at our major airports. Certainly noise pollution from jets landing and taking off is not one of the most pressing concerns facing the constituents in my riding.

It certainly does not compare with the problem of the lack of job opportunities which we face. The airports that we have, and we have some which could accommodate additional aircraft—in fact, we have an airport which could quite well accommodate a regular airline service which would improve the ability of the area including my constituency to attract job opportunities—have not been able to convince this government to provide the necessary support for that kind of regular airline service.

I certainly hope that this government will see fit, since it is beginning with this bill to address certain transportation issues, to address that particular issue.

Unfortunately, and this is one of the real ironies which I want to draw to the attention of the House concerning this piece of legislation and the context in which it is being introduced, at the same time as the government drags its feet in dealing with the noise pollution facing our overcrowded airports, such as Pearson in Toronto, it is simultaneously placing additional costs and additional discouragement on the use of other less congested, less crowded airlines across the country, particularly in regions such as Atlantic Canada.

I am speaking in particular of moves by the Minister of Transport to dramatically increase airport landing fees. These are a considerable disincentive to some of the regional carriers to use the airports in Halifax and in other places in Atlantic Canada. These fees are an additional discouragement to development in Atlantic Canada.

This is occurring at the same time as the government is dragging its feet in dealing with what is a really serious safety and noise pollution problem at Pearson International Airport. Why the government would not work toward diverting some of the traffic away from overcrowded Pearson into other parts of the country, why it would not encourage aircraft to land in less congested parts of the country and at the same time spur development in those areas is beyond me.

Certainly, I hope that while the government considers this piece of legislation it will see that we have to improve airline services. We have to provide better service in some of the outlying regions of Canada. Airline transportation is definitely the most used mode of transportation, and is becoming more and more relevant for an increasing number of Canadians, even those who live in the rural areas, especially those who live in the rural areas.

I hope that the Minister of Transport will begin to stop discouraging airline transportation and airlines from operating in our regions and that this can be done at the same time as he is increasing the safety of airlines in places like Pearson.

In conclusion, I support, as do my colleagues on this side of the House, the thrust of this legislation. Naturally we will want to have it studied carefully in committee to see where it can be improved. I note that it is housekeeping legislation from 1985 which obviously was not completely fool-proof. I hope that we can tidy it up in committee. At the same time I want to make the point, and it is a general point since this is the principle surrounding this bill, that the government should act to make it easier for regional carriers to operate in Atlantic Canada and to encourage the airline transportation infrastructure we so badly need in that part of the country.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to take part in debate on this bill. Here we have the largest or second largest department in the whole government and neither the Minister of Transport nor the Minister of State for Transport are in the House. It seems to me that it should be a requirement in any self-respecting government or cabinet that when a minister has a bill before the House, he damned well should be here for the whole debate. If he is not available, tough cookies. We will inform him about that kind of responsibility he has if and when we get to see him in front of a committee.

I want to mention something about an item in Bill C-5. It concerns security. I do not know where this new minister and the new minister of state have been and how much homework they have done, but it is understandable. I have been through 13 or 14 Ministers of Transport since I came here. My hon. friend from Halifax talks about how many flights he makes. Well I have done over 900 in 25 years. I think I know a little bit about it.

Three generations of my family have been in transportation. I am sure as heck no expert, but I want to remind the House and remind both ministers, if we can find them, that the transport committee went to Europe three or four years ago and we submitted some unanimous, all-party recommendations. We looked into ports, railroads and airports. We spent over three weeks on it. When it comes to airports, we went to Heathrow in London, Schiphol in Amsterdam, the airport in Frankfurt and Orly-Charles de Gaulle in Paris.

The one thing we found in those four locations, and you would have to admit that they are all at least as big as Pearson International and it did not matter what kind of government they had, is that they were not going to leave airport security up to private enterprise. They were not going to leave the safety and security of the travelling public and the airline employees up to whom could get by the cheapest. In every instance the security operations were run by the equivalent of our Department of Transport.

The transport committee made a unanimous recommendation, all parties, that airport security should be operated and run by the Department and Ministry of Transport.

Now that was not easy to come by. We all met sort of half way and we learned from what we found out in those places. So the conclusion remains, as the committee found, that it cannot be left to the airlines to contract for and implement security because they will get by as cheap as possible to cut down costs. Thanks to deregulation they are going to cut corners. They always have and they always will. When you see the spectacle of 60 per cent, 70 per cent or 80 per cent turnover in personnel and security staffs of various and sundry security companies that operate in this country at various airports, it makes you wonder how well trained they are, how good they are at their job, what they get for pay and fringe benefits and what they get for on and off hours because it is a very demanding and boring job.

They get the minimum. My friend had better not say that to me because he ain't been there.

If you put this under the Ministry of Transport, it is responsible for staff, staff training, pay and benefits, a less rapid turnover in personnel. It is deplorable what has been going on at airport after airport across this country. You cannot call that the maximum or best kind of security.

The ministry can bill the various airlines at any given airport on a pro rata basis for the costs for that security, and the costs will likely be higher than they presently are. I have yet to hear any taxpayer or voter complain about paying an extra few dollars on his plane ticket to be assured of the best possible security. Anyone who would suggest otherwise does not know what he is talking about.

I would like to move to another item—airport expansion. There is a fundamental principle about airports. The government, under three or four different ministers of transport, did exactly the opposite of what you should do in transportation economics, airline economics. The stupid mistake was that it went and expanded terminal capacity before it expanded runway capacity. It did it backwards; it had Terminal 3 built by the private sector.

The runway capacity would not handle the traffic from the two terminals already in existence.

I do not know what dummy persuaded the minister of the day to accept that. You cannot do it that way if you are going to have any kind of chance for success. On the second day of the operation at Terminal 3 I flew from Regina to Ottawa on Canadian Airlines International. I landed in Toronto and taxied up to Terminal 3, a very nice building. They welcomed me into the Canadian-plus lounge and then we boarded the plane, taxied out on the tarmac and sat there for 15 minutes waiting for a takeoff slot. Then we got the takeoff slot and went down to where the planes line up to take off. We were plane number 14 to take off and it was 10.30 at night. You could not call it a rush hour. Here was Canadian International Airlines, the new civilized way to travel. Well, nothing had changed, not a damned thing. What is the difference whether you got on at Terminal 1 or Terminal 2 if you still had to sit for 30 or 40 or 50 minutes before you could even take off?

It proves to me, and I hope to you, Sir, that the government did it backwards.

Now let us get to runway expansion, airport expansion. I heard the hon. member for Etobicoke North mention Pickering. My God, did he not learn anything from Mirabel? Is the Official Opposition proposing to go that route again?

An hon. member: Do you not want Pickering?

Mr. Benjamin: He proposed it. If you had listened to him—I listened to him carefully. He was worrying about not using up all the land the government still has at Pickering. Maybe he should start up a chicken farm or something. I do not know.

I want to say that when it comes to airports I have gone through this myself. I bought a house in Regina at Lakeview in 1973, which was right at the end of the east-west runway of Regina airport. The Regina airport was in place 20 years before that house was built. I bought it and knew full well. When the wind was the wrong way the aeroplanes went right through the bedroom, especially a cargo flight for Canada Post at 3 or 4 in the morning. The Armed Forces did their touch and go landings at three, four and five o'clock in the morning out of Moose Jaw Air Force Base. We put a stop to that nonsense.

What do we find at Heathrow? It put in two more runways. It paid for peoples' homes to have double and triple glazed windows, insulated. It put up massive concrete barriers to deflect noise upwards and it put in half a mile deep row of trees all the way around that airport.

What do we do in Canada? We let developers build houses, warehouses and whatnot right beside the bloody runway when we should be safeguarding the area required for an airport in today's age and with the kind of aircraft we have.

It was done backward at Pearson. It can still be corrected. Two more runways must be built immediately. It would be cheaper to buy those peoples' homes and give them a fair market value than it would be to move the whole operation to another airport like Pickering.

If you have not learned anything from Mirabel, you will never learn anything else.

I want to say something else to my hon. friend from Hamilton. I have listened to him for a couple of years about using the Hamilton airport. He still has to find somebody who will use it.

I believe the ministry of transport could order cargo flights and Canada Post mail flights to use places like Hamilton and Buttonville at two, three or four o'clock in the morning, and they would not have to use Pearson. That is not more than 10 or 15 per cent of the total traffic at Pearson International. The difference it would make does not amount to anything.

I am sorry to say to my hon. friend that if Hamilton or Buttonville or Oshawa has visions of grandeur, of becoming some kind of big international airport, he is dreaming in Technicolor. It is not going to happen. You find me an airline that will be prepared to change its national and international schedules to land and take off from Hamilton, Buttonville or Oshawa, bypass Toronto completely, and I will buy you a cigar. It is not going to happen. There is not a single national or international airline prepared to do that.

The ministry and the government could order them to do it. They are not going to do it. When you consider that it is bad enough getting from Pearson to downtown Toronto, can you imagine from Hamilton? Holy mackerel, you have champagne ideas with a beer market. That is your problem.

• (1730)

Do not peddle this Chamber of Commerce hype about air transportation and airports to me. It will not wash.

I do not see how, unless the government moves into the whole area of airport security, takes over complete control and operation of it and bills the airlines on a pro rata basis. Unless it does that, we are going to continue to have the spectacle of the lowest bidder with Air Canada, which by the way represents 18 other airlines at Pearson. It does the negotiating on behalf of all the other airlines, and my hon. friends are not aware of it. But Air Canada as the biggest operator does the negotiating. It gets the cheapest bid. Then we have the spectacle of an even larger turnover in security staff and a demand by the employer for those people to take $2 an hour less pay. At present they are probably getting an average of $8.

If people try to live on $8 an hour these days, if they have a mortgage, a wife and two kids, forget it. The government cannot leave things like airport security, the safety of human beings, to private enterprise. It is going to get by on the cheap. It is going to cut corners. The government cannot allow that. It cannot play fast and loose with the safety and security of travellers and the employees of those airlines. It has to put an end to it.

That is why I started off by saying that it was the unanimous recommendation of the transport committee some three years ago, which has been totally ignored. I do not even know if anyone in the department read it, but we were very proud of it. We worked hard for those three weeks in Europe looking into all the matters that we were given the authority to look into. We learned some things. There is nothing wrong in seeing what others do and then applying the elements that can be used in our country, and do it.

Nobody is 100 per cent right or wrong. If the ministry thinks it has solutions to all the problems, it is dreaming. It has left out decisions made in the transport committee, and our unanimous report. As far as I am aware, it did not even reply to our report. It was the first and only time the transport committee was allowed to go overseas and see what is being done in other places.

It reminds me of the story of the rooster running a chicken coop. He went out for a walk one morning and came across an ostrich nest and in it was a big egg. He rushed back to the chicken coop, rounded up all the other chickens, herded them out there by the nest and said: "Look girls, I am not complaining but I just wanted you to see what they are doing in other places".

I hope that the government will be amenable to accepting amendments to the legislation in committee that will allow for the implementation of some very obvious things, allow for airport runway expansion in a sensible and fair manner, and allow for the total responsibility by the ministry for airport safety and security.

We cannot have it any other way. If we do it any other way, we are taking a lot of chances.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, this gives me the opportunity within the confines of my debate to address the issues just raised by my hon. friend from Regina. He spoke of a large egg. The member has certainly laid an egg, because we now have it on record that it is the opinion and policy of the New Democratic Party federally that it is against airport expansion at Hamilton. That is just terrific. He asks: "Why expand Hamilton airport? Why would we bother to expand Hamilton airport? Why do we not just add more runways to Toronto Pearson International?"

People do not fly to Pearson International. People have to drive there. The member is from Regina. I have to drive to Pearson International Airport. I have to get on Highway 401 or the 403 at the godforsaken hour of 6 a.m. in order to get there at 8.30 a.m. because of the congestion on the highways, because of the pollution. I mean, it is all jammed up, Mr. Benjamin. It is jammed. So what do we do?

We have to look at a way of moving the passengers or the cargo, of dispersing it a little. Take it away. Take the pressure off Pearson International Airport. Move it around. Why not move it to Hamilton? It is logical. JFK and LaGuardia airports work hand in hand in New York. There is San Francisco International and Oakland International. In fact, there is even San Jose International.

Three airports working in concert, transferring and shuttling passengers back and forth.

In London, England, there is Heathrow Airport and Gatwick Airport. Those are major airports. Gatwick certainly did not start up all of a sudden as a big, major international airport. It was the size of Hamilton.

Do you know what it was that made it work? It was the vision. It was the policy that said let us look at this situation in a multi-modal approach to transportation.

Let us look at the situation, not try to funnel hundreds of thousands of millions of people a year into Pearson International Airport and then have our hon. NDP friend sit in a plane for an hour to take off, because our airports cannot accept all of the planes everywhere at one time. Planes are going to have to wait to take off because they do not circle any more. Why not offer those people an alternative? I am suggesting that Hamilton is the alternative.

I want to get back on track because we are discussing Bill C-5, amendments to the Aeronautics Act, including the increase of the maximum penalty for breaching noise abatement provisions. I do not have a problem with that. In principle I agree with Bill C-5. We will see what will happen when it is brought before a committee on which I will be a participant.

Where I take great exception is with the piecemeal politics being pronounced by the Minister of Transport. I say piecemeal and I will explain. The Minister of Transport, and my hon. friend, have sat on the transport committee for two years because the government did not want us sitting for almost a year. Six ministers of transport in six years. The latest Minister of Transport already—we have not even sat down with him yet—has begun to walk the same well-worn path that his five predecessors have worn thin. To my way of thinking, what is of paramount importance is consistency, consistency of security and consistency of vision.

It is incumbent upon this government to examine transportation and its policies in totality, a multi-modal transportation policy sensitive not only to the environment and to the quality of life of individuals and families living near and around airports but to any other mode of transportation.

I have great difficulty understanding the direction or purpose of conflicting back to back aviation studies released by Transport Canada. Conflicting, you ask. I have a report before me, Aviation in Southern Ontario, a Strategy for the Future. Then across my desk just last week was Airside Development Project, Environmental Impact Statement Summary 1991. We have a Transport Canada study of January 1990 and we have one for 1991.

I said conflicting because the January 1990 study outlines the current problems at Pearson International Airport. It examines the existing capacity of the facility and suggests options for congestion relief at Pearson International, among them diversion of aircraft movements to other airports. The document referred to the many—I think there are 52—land based airports within 80 kilometres of downtown Toronto. At least five airports have a potential role in resolving the congestion problems at PIA. That is what the 1990 study said.

The 1991 study just crossed my desk lists. Page 9, point 3, under "Diverting Traffic to Other Airports", refers to the airports at Hamilton, Toronto Island, Oshawa, Buttonville and Downsview. It says in conclusion that Hamilton airport has received significant investment infrastructure in recent years, and we are all aware of that.

It then goes on to say, if you can believe it:

> The fact remains however that airspace conflicts with LBPIA, lack of ground transportation to the Toronto market, consumer preference for LBPIA—

All these reasons and the reasons stated for other airports in the area:

> —preclude these sites from offering any appreciable airside capacity increase to southern Ontario—

Imagine, one report a year ago saying "let's look at the alternatives, let's look at the other airports surrounding Lester B", and on my desk last week a 1991 study saying "forget the area airport; it is just not going to work".

That is where I start to think that politics are starting to enter into this thing somewhere. The government to my way of thinking has to start to build a case for Pickering. It makes sense. It has an airport three-quarters built in Hamilton worth millions of dollars, but it is going to build Pickering from scratch and funnel a few million more cars and all the pollution that transportation creates to a brand new airport at Pickering.

This 1990 report acknowledges that Toronto Island Airport has limited potential to relieve congestion at PIA. The main reasons for this are that jet powered aircraft are prohibited from using the facility and that no new runways or extensions to runways will be permitted. Toronto Island Airport has three runways, the longest of which is 1,220 meters, so it is out of the running. Oshawa airport has two runways, the longest of which is 1,060 metres in length. It has the facilities to accept several types of aircraft with limitations due to runways and navigation aids. The study notes that the facility is severely limited in terms of growth and is not equipped to serve increased traffic, especially commercial passenger traffic. Oshawa is out. Buttonville is a privately owned facility which has two runways, the longest of which is 1143 metres in length.

The report states that the facility is not amenable to expansion given the urbanized periphery. That figures. There are a lot of houses around there. You are going to have to spend a lot of money to buy all the homes around that airport. You are not going to be able to land planes into Buttonville without being sensitive to the environment and to the quality of life of those individuals who live in and around Buttonville.

The report states also that even if lands were available for the extension of the runway, Highway 404 would have to be realigned and some of the terminal buildings would have to be removed. You can imagine the expense there.

Then it talks about Hamilton Airport, the preferred airport to Pearson International.

An hon. member: Why is the NDP against it then?

Mr. Keyes: Preferred. I mentioned you were out taking the phone message and it mentioned it. Can you imagine the NDP being against Hamilton? Study after study concludes that Hamilton is the logical alternative to Pearson International, a venting for Pearson International, a reliever of congestion for Pearson International.

The study notes—this is the 1990 study of Transport Canada—that Hamilton has the facilities to handle all types of aircraft but that the distance that can be flown from Hamilton by various aircraft is limited due to the length of one principal runway. We have three runways.

The study agrees with the recommendations of the Hamilton–Niagara federal Liberal task force on Hamilton Airport in that with comparatively minimal expense to upgrading Hamilton could accept traffic from PIA.

I spoke earlier about the need for a multi–modal approach to transportation. GO Transit which operates a station at Malton, a mile away from PIA, has confirmed it is giving serious consideration to a link–up with Pearson.

Such a network of transportation would not only help solve some of the congestion at Pearson International but could ultimately be used to transport passengers with connecting flights to or from Hamilton Airport.

In addition, a new GO Transit station is currently under construction at Aldershot, Ontario; 15 minutes by GO bus to Hamilton Airport.

Access to Hamilton Airport from Pearson International and the southern Ontario region is quick and efficient although the Government of Ontario could play a greater role in the development of Hamilton Airport by improving road access to that facility.

An hon. member: That is the NDP government.

Mr. Keyes: Yes, the NDP government. We need help. We have a chicken and egg scenario, as I like to refer to it. As other individuals have said, Hamilton is prepared. The city is prepared. The Regional Municipality of Hamilton–Wentworth is prepared. The residents of Hamilton are prepared to accept an expanded, versatile and modern facility at Hamilton Airport.

The only thing that is holding us up is that the major commercial carriers, whether it be cargo or passenger, say: "We can't go to Hamilton because there is no access". There is this one little two–lane stretch of road that branches off from the 403, a major highway with its exit ramp already in place. I think it is about five miles from 403 to the airport. They say: "We can't do that until that is fixed up". Then the NDP government says: "We can't fix that up until the commercial airlines indicate to us that they are going to use the airport".

It is a chicken and egg. Somebody has to play the right card and say: "Listen, the feds say we have trouble at Pearson, too much traffic. We need to put in a couple of more runways".

Nonsense I say. Just create at a minimal expense some multi-modal approach to transportation between Hamilton and Toronto.

Travellers are aware of the difficulties associated with departing or arriving on time at Pearson International. Many have waited on the tarmac as my hon. friend from the NDP has indicated. The clock ticks by either for take-off clearance or for a space at the gate.

Considering that it would take roughly the same time to travel from Hamilton Airport to downtown Toronto as it would from Pearson International Airport to downtown Toronto, one has to acknowledge how Hamilton Airport could play a positive role in alleviating air transportation congestion in southern Ontario.

• (1750)

I will refer to the second report here. This latest report to cross my desk is in contrast to the first report that crossed my desk a year ago. As this Transport Canada environmental impact statement summary outlines, Hamilton Airport is too close to Toronto.

Mr. Boudria: I thought it was too far.

Mr. Keyes: It is too far because a person has to get on a bus to Toronto airport.

This report says: "It is too close". There are other examples of dual operating airports in the world, as was explained a little earlier, which function with great success. They are meant to compliment the services of each other.

Hamilton airport, 60 kilometres from Pearson International, is much farther than the 16 kilometres which separates two of the world's busiest airports, JFK International and LaGuardia. LaGuardia basically serves domestic flights, although American and Canadian carriers fly into the facility from Canada.

Passengers regularly land at LaGuardia on domestic flights and transfer by shuttle bus to JFK. Conveniently licking up the two airports in New York is an interstate highway.

In California, passengers transfer between San Francisco International and Oakland International on a regular basis. The two airports are some 90 kilometres apart straight across San Francisco Bay. A shuttle bus transfers passengers with baggage from one facility to the next facility in an hour.

Passengers also transfer from San Francisco International to San Jose International. There are three principal airports in sunny California.

Passengers arriving at or departing Heathrow International in London also transfer to flights in Gatwick, some 45 kilometres from each other.

Transport Canada must encourage the development of Hamilton airport as the second principal airport in southern Ontario and must co-operate with the province of Ontario to similarly develop an effective means of ground transportation between Pearson International and Hamilton. We cannot say it enough.

I have only a couple of minutes remaining, so I will conclude my remarks. There are other concerns related to Bill C-5 and to the over-all strategy which I think this government has failed to implement. It is an over-all vision for the future of transportation in this country. It is something that incorporates not just talking about planes today and cars on the highways tomorrow and the trains next week.

All of this has to be co-ordinated. The Open Skies agreement will surely increase pressure on that already over crowded Pearson International.

Testimony from the Dryden inquiry from Transport Canada indicated that because of delays at PIA, planes which are de-iced in the winter risk recurring ice contamination while sitting on a tarmac waiting to take off. There is that risk.

I talked to the airport management. It is already talking about putting one of those de-icing machines at the end of a runway. We will see.

We have agreed that in order to realize the expansion of Hamilton we need a commitment from Transport Canada and the Ontario government.

I want to conclude on a final note. Sometimes people think: "Keyes, you are just an opposition member blowing in the wind". The reality is that you are in opposition and have to oppose the government policies.

What I am trying to do is not oppose government policy because, really, there is not any. What I am trying to do is to try to help it create a solid policy for the distribution at that busy airport at Toronto.

It is not just me speaking. Transport Canada has mismanaged the nation's airports and has failed to plan for aviation deregulation.

An hon. member: Who says?

Mr. Keyes: Says who? Says the Auditor General, Ken Dye, on October 31, 1991. It was in all the papers. It is not just Keyes saying that they do not have it, it is the Auditor General who says: "They ain't got it." Let us get on with it and let us have another look at Pearson and Hamilton.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

CANADA POST

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to continue with the question that I posed to the minister responsible for Canada Post on May 24 of last week.

The question that I asked the minister concerned the rental of a box at the Skydome that Canada Post took upon itself to rent or lease. I raised it at the time because I do not think it is the type of signal that Canadians want to see Canada Post sending out at this particular time.

I would like to know what the exact dollar figure is on the rental of that box. The minister, obviously, did not give me the answer to that. However, I am led to believe that it was sub–leased from another corporation. The corporation from which Canada Post leased that box or sub–leased it paid in the vicinity of $200,000. Whether it is $200,000, $100,000 or $50,000, the point is that it is money that Canada Post should use for other purposes, such as reducing postal rates throughout Canada. It is just a symbol of the arrogance that Canada Post, from time to time, has displayed in this country.

I raise this because I have been in some of those communities in my riding that have felt the effects of the policies that Canada Post impose on some of smaller communities in Canada.

• (1800)

There are rural communities in my riding that no longer have the services they used to because Canada Post has taken it upon itself to remove those services. There are areas like Seal Cove, Grand Manan, Meductic, and Castalia, as well as many other places throughout my riding, that are suffering because of some of the arrogant policies of Canada Post.

While I am on my feet, I do want to give the minister some credit for what he has done. I know that he, himself, cannot be responsible for all the day to day activities of Canada Post, but I do want to give him some credit.

In 1984, we made a commitment to the people of Canada that Canada Post would cease to be a burden to the Canadian taxpayers. We as a government and the minister responsible have lived up to that commitment. We have taken a $500 million deficit and turned it into a $149 million surplus.

However, we have paid a price for that turnaround. Much of what we are doing, we are doing at the expense of rural Canadians. The problem, the mismanagement of Canada Post, is not at this rural level.

If the truth were known, I think most of it is at the corporate level. Rural Canada is certainly not solely responsible for some of the difficulties that Canada Post has got itself into in past years. Yet the small, usually poorer areas of Canada receive the brunt of every government policy.

I want to quote, before I finish, and I hope you, Mr. Speaker, give me the opportunity to finish on this note. There is a suggestion that the first class postal rate in this country is too high. That we are in fact subsidizing some of the other services that Canada Post offers. So, if I may:

Glen Smith, President of UPS Canada Limited says—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. Your time is up. You only have four minutes.

The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport for two minutes.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post was established as a Crown corporation in 1981. This action had the support of all parties in the House of Commons as well organized labour, business and consumer groups. The post office needed purpose and direction. It was time that business values were applied to the operation of postal services in Canada.

By applying sound business management, increasing productivity and streamlining its operations, Canada Post has turned deficits of hundreds of millions of dollars into profits for the past two fiscal years. I hope it continues the same trend.

The Canada Post Corporation has achieved this goal through the hard work of its employees, which has promoted the growth of mail volume in a competitive environment.

Like many other Canadian corporations operating in a competitive business environment, Canada Post is active in the promotion of sporting events and is winning new clients because of it. Canada Post rents box seating for the sole purpose of conducting business. These rentals and the hosting of customers are normal business functions that help the corporation improve volume and revenues, acquire new customers and retain existing ones.

These activities increase revenues by promoting volume growth thereby ensuring the financial success of the corporation and job security for its employees. As well as being an active member of the business community, Canada Post contributes to Canadian society by supporting community, sporting and cultural activities. Canada Post participates in community activities such as Winterlude, Carnivale du Quebec, and the Calgary Stampede; in arts and culture activities such as the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, the opera, the Nova Scotia Symphony Orchestra and the Music '91 Festival in British Columbia; and in sporting activities such as the 1988 Calgary Winter Olympics, the P.E.I. Canada Winter Games, the Canadian Football League, professional baseball and the games for the disabled.

As well, Canada Post helps disadvantaged Canadians through its funding of literacy organizations.

The elimination of postal deficits has removed a burden from Canadian taxpayers and Canada Post profits now help the government reduce the deficit through the payment of a dividend.

In 1981, Canadians were wishing that the post office was run like a business, making money instead of accumulating a $600 million deficit. Well, now the corporation is and Canadians can be proud of that.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pursue a question that I asked the Minister of Transport in the House on Friday. It had to do with the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway is intending to divert its unit coal trains through a place called North Portal, Saskatchewan, through the northern United States and up again to Thunder Bay, thus bypassing entirely the province of Manitoba.

I asked the minister whether or not the government was aware of this intention by CPR to bypass Manitoba. The minister said she was not aware of CPR's intention but said that even if she was, she would not do anything about it because it was strictly a business decision.

I do not think this is strictly a business decision. This is a decision made possible by policies adopted by this government, going back to the adoption of the Freedom to Move legislation in 1987, the transportation deregulation policies of this government which make it more possible and more permissible for Canadian railways to use American lines.

We predicted at that time that transportation deregulation—which, I might add, had its origins with a Liberal Minister of Transport, now the member for Winnipeg South Centre— would lead to the use of American lines and the disappearance of railway traffic in western Canada, and for that matter in Canada generally.

This attempt by the CPR to get a waiver of compliance from the FRA in the United States for its bathtub coal cars is just the tip of the iceberg. It is a precedent for what could become very widespread use by Canadian railways of American lines. This would have its effect not only on Manitoba, as in this case, but on other areas of the country and ultimately on Canadian ports.

This concern has been expressed not just by me but by many who are concerned about the future of Canada's transportation system. The trend toward the use of American railway lines, because of the disadvantage Canadian railways now find themselves in vis-à-vis American railways, could lead not just to the loss of jobs in the railway system but also in Canadian ports.

We need to have a hard look at the ways in which railway transportation in this country is being disadvantaged by the tax system. In the meantime we need to call on the railways, particularly the CPR in this case, to act like good corporate citizens—perhaps for the first time in CPR's history—and maintain the use of the Canadian rail lines and the Canadian rail system, until such time as the government wakes up to what is happening and addresses the various ways in which the railways are being put at this disadvantage—whether it is through provincial fuel taxes or other issues the railways may have a legitimate point about.

I think they do have a point, for instance, with respect to fuel taxes. In many cases fuel taxes had their origin as a tax to pay for highways. The railways, by having to pay the fuel tax, are not only paying for their own roadbed, which they have to pay for exclusively out of their own revenues, but they also have to pay for highways, in other words for the roadbed of their competitors, through these various taxes.

I think the railways all have a point, just as individual Canadians might have a valid reason for cross-border shopping. However, they have a responsibility to seek changes in their own country rather than opportunities in other countries. That is the solution, not what the CPR is intending to do now.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): At the outset let me say that I am pleased to have this opportunity to set the record straight regarding the alleged diversion of potash and coal traffic from western Canada to the United States destinations. What began as a sound business decision on the part of CP Rail to reduce operating costs has been distorted by many parties.

Let me explain. For many years now CPR has moved potash from mines in Saskatchewan and coal from south-eastern British Columbia to trans-border gateways either in Saskatchewan or in Manitoba.

• (1810)

From there these commodities are carried onward to destination points in the United States by interconnecting American railroads or from the mine sites entirely over Canadian Pacific lines to the port of Thunder Bay for vessel loading and delivery to ports on the Great Lakes.

There is no intention on the part of CPR to change these traffic routes. The real question deals with the fact that part of CPR's coal car fleet is made up of bathtub gondola cars that were manufactured in Canada and used domestically to export coal to the west coast. They are also used for the transport of low sulphur coal to power generating plants in Ontario, and CPR has a surplus of this equipment. These cars are cheaper to operate than the equipment currently used in transborder coal and potash service, so CPR applied to the U.S. regulatory authority for approval to operate these cars in the United States.

This approval is necessary because the cars were built in Canada and do not satisfy all the U.S. specifications. CPR has applied for a waiver of compliance on these specifications. The specifications do not compromise the safety of the rail car but are technically outside the United States design criteria.

It is looking for a waiver to avoid paying for the modifications solely for the sake of modifications. CPR's actions are a response to competitive advantages enjoyed by U.S. railroads.

I am sure the hon. member would be further interested to learn that CPR feels that its proposal to use these bathtub cars should not result in the loss of any Canadian railway employment. Indeed, if the proposal is accepted, CPR will generate increased traffic levels. To repeat, the use of the bathtub gondola cars is clearly an attempt to reduce the operating costs for the traffic in question.

Cost reductions of this nature will ultimately benefit Canadian exporters as they help Canadian rail carriers to remain financially viable and thus, capable of providing rail service at competitive prices.

The minister and his government support the efforts to assist Canadian shippers to be competitive in U.S. markets.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House this evening to defend once again the economic interests of the people of the Montreal area.

It is not the first time I have raised this important issue, but in the light of the current situation, I think it deserves our undivided attention, Mr. Speaker.

During Question Period on May 22, 1991, I quoted the new provincial economic forecasts published by the Conference Board of Canada. According to the forecasts, the economic situation in Quebec was worse than expected and the recession's impact was more severe than in other provinces.

If we compare the unemployment statistics of the two most heavily populated provinces in this country, we will reach the same conclusion as the Conference Board, Mr. Speaker. In April, the unemployment rate in Ontario was 9.4 per cent, while in Quebec it was 12 per cent. And if we consider the two largest cities in the country, in Toronto the unemployment rate was 9.1 per cent in April, while in Montreal it was around 13.1 per cent.

Actually, Mr. Speaker, when we look around the Montreal area, the picture is even gloomier. As the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel remarked yesterday, Montreal looks like a war zone. Because of the severe impact of the recession on the Montreal area, I felt I had a duty to take part in this adjournment debate and ask the government to pay attention to the figures I am about to quote.

Mr. Speaker, 22 per cent of the population of Montreal, which means about one out of four, lives below the poverty line. We cannot tolerate this kind of situation. In the province of Quebec, 2,097 bankruptcies were recorded in April 1991, 62 per cent more than in April last year. And 79 per cent of these were personal bankruptcies. The remaining 449 bankruptcies were filed by businesses, the highest figure in Canada, Mr. Speaker.

That is why this problem requires special attention from the Conservative government. Even more discouraging is the Conference Board's forecast that the economic situation in Quebec will continue to deteriorate and that during the coming year, the unemployment rate will not drop below its current level, which averages 12 per cent across the province, Mr. Speaker.

I am here this evening to ask the government to table concrete measures for the economic recovery of this region. When will the government unveil its action plan to provide durable, full-time jobs for 223,000 unemployed workers in Montreal, Mr. Speaker?

On the weekend, 5,000 people in the Gaspé held a meeting to sound the alarm. They want to stay in their region, they like it there, but there are no jobs, there is no economic activity. In that region, and in the Montreal region as well—we saw this last weekend and it happens every weekend—busloads of people to leave to go shopping in the United States. Something has to be done. The situation is critical. I think that if the government fails to come up with a comprehensive solution to deal with our economic problems, we will lose jobs that will never be recovered.

[English]

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Conference Board forecast mentioned by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard for the Canadian economy is similar to the forecast contained in the February budget. Its forecast, like ours, is for a resumption of economic growth this summer and for healthy economic growth to continue during 1992. I should point out that the Conference Board does not say, as I think the member said in his question, that the Quebec economy will continue to deteriorate. Its forecast is that the Quebec economy, like the Canadian economy, will as a whole begin to recover later this year.

Short term interest rates have declined by some 500 basis points over the last year and are continuing to decline. The differential between Canadian and U.S. interest rates has narrowed by over 250 basis points over the same period. This is helping to create the conditions for the economic recovery that we and a consensus of private sector forecasters expect to begin in the very near future.

There are abundant signs that the economic activity is beginning to firm both in Quebec and nation-wide. Housing starts have risen and resale activity has picked up sharply. Export growth resumed in March and car sales have picked up more recently. Employment increased significantly in April after stabilizing in March. Business confidence has strengthened.

The Conference Board's business confidence index rose by over 20 per cent in the first quarter. These developments are consistent with a recovery in the second half of the year since they are precisely the indicator that one expects to respond first to a decline in interest rates. It obviously takes time for some business people and households to make specific plans for major new purchases once they see lower interest rates.

New orders in turn generate new production. This is why we are now seeing and will continue in the coming months to see a marked increase in economic activity in response to lower interest rates. The Quebec economy will obviously share fully in this pickup. The policies of this government will continue to create the conditions that will permit sustainable and non-inflationary growth.

CANADA POST

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I wish to come back to a question I asked the minister responsible for Canada Post last Thursday, regarding the imminent closure by Canada Post of some 200 rural post offices across Canada, including the post office in Mabou in my constituency.

The following day one of the minister's own backbenchers, the member for Carleton—Charlotte, asked the very legitimate question: why at the same time as Canada Post is jacking up postal rates and closing rural post offices has the corporation rented a penthouse box at the Toronto Skydome for its corporate friends? I am told that the rental on this box amounts to somewhere between $100,000 and $225,000 per year.

Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting question and one that the minister cannot so easily slough off by saying that his government no longer interferes with the business of this Crown corporation. It was his government that approved the corporate plan which is leading to the elimination of hundreds of post offices across Canada, including the one in Mabou.

The minister himself has been free with his opinion that Canada Post ought to be privatized completely.

This is one of the most short sighted and wrong-headed Tory government's policies, policies which are effectively leading to the decimation of infrastructure and the government presence in rural Canada.

What galls the residents of Mabou and Avonmore, Ontario, St. Redempteur in la Gaspésie and all the other places that have lost their rural post offices recently is not so much losing their post office, though that is bad enough.

It is the way Canada Post goes about it. It is the complete lack of consultation and candour. It is the trampling of the interests of the people in the communities Canada Post is there to serve.

It is Canada Post calling the residents of Mabou to a public meeting to tell them that Canada Post carried out a 12-month review and did not talk to anybody in Mabou.

It is telling the residents of that community, who are 100 per cent satisfied with their post office and their postmaster, that the closure is to provide better service but that keeping their post office and their postmaster, with whom they are 100 per cent satisfied, is not an option that is available to them.

It is calling a meeting to consult the communities after the decision has been made and telling them that the decision they are opposed to is irreversible. Some consultation that is.

It is this unbelievable arrogance that the mandarins of Canada Post know better than do those communities they are supposedly in business to serve, what is best for them. If they would just shut up and take it, later on they will like it.

The people of Avonmore, Ontario, of Mabou, Nova Scotia, and St. Redempteur, Quebec are not backward hicks who are totally resistant to all forms of change. They are proud and educated people who want a postal communications system that does not treat them as second class citizens. They are willing to work with Canada Post toward orderly methods of delivering on the Canada Post mandate.

In a meeting last week with senior officials of Canada Post the citizens of Mabou showed that they are willing to consider alternatives to achieve savings for Canada Post while providing quality service.

What they will not accept is to be patronized and marginalized by this corporation and by this government.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, like many other organizations that provide service to the public, Canada Post has had to adopt new methods of providing service to respond to the evolving needs of Canadians. Canada Post is committed to making postal products and services more accessible. In rural Canada, the corporation is achieving this goal by using the resources and expertise of local business to increase significantly the number of places that offer postal products and services.

Canada Post is therefore changing the way it provides postal service in many rural communities. In contrast to some other service oriented businesses which have adjusted to changing times by withdrawing services, Canada Post makes every effort to maintain its retail presence in the community through its century old partnership with local business.

In order to do this, Canada Post has implemented a program which has been the subject of many misconceptions, the conversion program: converting from a corporate operated outlet to one operated by local business in a rural community. These outlets provide all of the retail postal services currently available, such as the sale of money orders and posting or picking up parcels and signature items.

Mail delivery is maintained within the community through a variety of methods such as postal boxes in a retail postal outlet, postal boxes in a postal delivery centre, or community mail boxes at one central site or at individual sites. Canada Post ensures that the community maintains its unique postal identity. Customers continue to be able to send and receive mail locally.

The retirement of the former postmaster of the Mabou Post Office in March last year gave Canada Post an opportunity to review postal service in this community. Customers were notified in writing on March 28 that changes would be made to postal service. A public meeting was held on April 30, where in addition to explaining the process and responding to local questions, Canada Post encouraged community input to assist it in determining the best type of mail delivery for the community. Canada Post is currently accepting applications from local businesses interested in the opportunity to operate a retail postal outlet.

In communities where changes have been deemed necessary but which are unable to support local retail operations, or where community efforts to retain the status quo affect the corporation's ability to maintain retail services, Canada Post has no other option but to offer these services from the nearest existing retail outlet. I can assure the hon. member that this option is clearly not one favoured by the corporation, and I urge residents to support local businesses should they apply to operate a retail postal outlet in Mabou.

Surveys conducted yearly since 1988 by independent research firms, the most recent being an October 1990 Decima survey, indicate that over 90 per cent of rural Canadians are satisfied with retail postal services offered through local businesses in their community.

Canada Post is a business and, like all businesses in any community, it must manage in an effective manner if it is to succeed. The conversion program achieves this and benefits the customer, the community's business base, and the corporation. When over 90 per cent of customers surveyed have expressed approval of postal services provided by retail postal outlets this government supports this program.

ARMENIA

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was the 73rd anniversary of the independence of Armenia. The contribution of Armenian Canadians to the Canadian nation is a rich one. The preservation of Armenian culture and language is coupled with a deep loyalty to Canada and a determination to participate in virtually every area of Canadian life.

Multiculturalism means we are free to cherish our cultural roots while at the same time play a valued role in Canadian society. Armenian Canadians are a vivid example of this ideal in action.

The dream of the Armenian people has not been crushed. Their struggle for recognition and independence continues.

I call upon our government to follow the lead of the Government of France in recognizing the atrocities committed against Armenians as a genocide and to help defend the human rights of this courageous people who have suffered so much.

FUR INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, something happened in my riding of Nipissing today that will shatter many stereotypes, instil pride in our community and set an example for many others, for today marks the opening of the deMidici North Bay Fur Tanning and Dyeing Plant.

This is a plant which will operate as a joint venture between deMidici of Milan and the Nipissing Indian band. It will be located in an industrial park on the Nipissing Reserve itself. When it is fully operational it will employ approximately 50 people of which the vast majority will be native. The production of this world-class facility will be almost totally for export and will bring to North Bay customers which previously would not have done business in Canada.

Indeed the cause for optimism has not left us altogether. Here we have an example where an Indian band aggressively sought a partner to integrate fully its fur trapping activities by developing export markets for manufactured products.

Why did deMidici set up shop with the Nipissing band? Because, in its own words, "the Nipissing Indian Reserve is a progressive community with an excellent work ethic".

That is right. While the Prime Minister is thousands of miles away preaching about the need for investment and competitiveness in his own partisan ways, we here in Ontario are trying to do something about the recession that his government created.

AT AND EAST PROGRAM

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the removal of the At and East program in 1989 meant the closure of the grain elevator at Saint John and put in question the viability of the elevator at Halifax. These elevators are an important link to the viability of the livestock industry in the maritimes. They provide an essential role in the delivery of competitively priced feed grains to the maritimes. The loss of the Halifax elevator would also mean the closure of Dover Flour Mills and would deny grain producers of the only ice-free port on the eastern seaboard.

During committee hearings on this subject, the government agreed to conduct a study into the future of these elevators. The report concluded that both elevators can only be viable in the long term with an increase of export grain moving through these facilities. The report further concluded that this could only be accomplished by a freight equalization program. That is exactly what the At and East was. The government should openly commit itself to developing some program to ensure the long-term viability of these two elevators.

The APTC, the Atlantic Farmers Council, Dover Flour Mills and virtually every other economic group in the maritimes are concerned about this issue.

It is about time that the government takes this issue seriously and provides some real leadership on this important matter.

THE ARMENIAN PEOPLE

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, internationally, Canada has a reputation for tolerance and freedom. Our country has been much enriched by the contribution of hundreds of thousands of Armenian immigrants who found a safe haven in Canada. Their dedication and unconditional loyalty have enriched the Canadian mosaic.

Yesterday was a memorable occasion for our fellow citizens of Armenian origin who were celebrating the seventy-third anniversary of Armenia's independence.

I wish to join all Canadians in paying tribute to the heroic struggle of the Armenian people who want to regain the independence they lost under the Communist regime. The events that caused these valiant and brave people such terrible suffering must not be forgotten.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, we are told by the government that a new defence policy is forthcoming.

The Department of National Defence is doing a complete review of Canada's defence policy and how it spends its $12.6 billion annual budget. However, the review process we have seen to date has been unfair and irresponsible.

The government has permitted speculation and rumours about base relocations, base closures and our withdrawal from NATO. These speculations are running rampant without any opportunity for public input.

In my opinion this is unfair to Canadians who want a full and public debate about the objectives of our defence policy. It is unfair to the military personnel who have served Canada so well and unfair to the many Canadians who directly and indirectly depend on the military.

Canadians want a military that serves Canada's defence needs into the next century. Even more, Mr. Speaker, they want a defence policy that is fully debated by all—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, according to a recent Gallup poll, 63 per cent of all Canadians and 65 per cent of Quebec residents think that the Official Languages Act is a failure.

Professor Robert Young of the University of Western Ontario advocates that every province should have full control over language, culture and communications because, according to him, bilingualism has not reduced support for independence in Quebec and it arouses anti-Quebec sentiment elsewhere in Canada.

If, as the Prime Minister says, the House of Commons is the greatest constituent assembly there is, then it is time we publicly discussed this issue. However, when we do, let's remember the impact that changes in language rights will have on the French speaking minority outside Quebec and the English speaking minority in Quebec.

THE CANINE CAPER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, The Canine Caper: It is a real dog's life out there, unless of course you are a dog working for Revenue Canada in which case you get royal treatment.

Canadians are going to be howling mad when they hear that the government has built a dog house for 10 dogs for the less than humble cost of $375,000. That is $37,500 for each of the salivating residents of this luxury pad.

Canadians have been telling members of this government to keep their paws off their money. Instead the Tories dogmatically go on wasting tax dollars. Their behaviour is almost Pavlovian.

The political animals across the way are barking up the wrong tree if they expect Canadians to swallow this one.

This time the Tories have bitten more than they can chew. This could well turn out to be a dog's breakfast for them. Tory members of Parliament better watch out the next time they go near a "pole".

DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, since this is National Access Awareness Week, Integrating Persons with Disabilities, I would like to stress the dedication of many volunteers and agencies in my riding, including the Office des personnes handicapées du Québec, whose headquarters are located in Drummondville, and the Drummondville association for the disabled.

During this week I urge all Canadians to take active measures at the national, regional and local levels to eliminate the barriers encountered by more than 3 million disabled persons, and facilitate access for the disabled to employment, housing, transportation, education and recreation.

Mr. Speaker, as individuals or organizations, as small businesses or large corporations and governments, we should all consider this year's theme—Access is a right—and think about what we can do to make our communities accessible to all persons with a disability.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, last evening I attended a reception to commemorate Amnesty International's 30th anniversary. There I met many people committed to ensuring that all people have basic human rights.

As opposition critic for human rights, I rely heavily on Amnesty International for information.

The organization, though non-partisan, has provided invaluable assistance and information to all parliamentarians involved in the advocacy of human rights.

I think back to a recent incident in which I worked with Amnesty.

• (1410)

Two Jamaicans were to be executed, contrary to articles 14 and 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. I, on behalf of Amnesty, appealed to the minister to intervene on behalf of those prisoners. As a result of this, the execution of these two men was stayed.

The 45,000 Canadians who volunteer with Amnesty must feel immense satisfaction with their work.

On behalf of my colleagues in this House, I would like to salute the 45,000 Canadians who work unselfishly to achieve basic human dignity for all people around the world.

AIR CARRIERS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, a report submitted to the National Transportation Agency of Canada has concluded that the lack of consistent policies among large air carriers regarding services for the disabled may unduly restrict their travels.

The NTA has ordered air carriers to react to this conclusion within thirty days and to comment on the steps the NTA intends to take to remedy the situation.

If the remedy is approved by the NTA, standards for the transportation of disabled persons on board aircraft seating 30 passengers or more will be applied. These standards would come into effect on August 1, 1991.

Mr. Speaker, this conclusion was the result of a preliminary report submitted by two investigators who were asked by the NTA in October 1990 to survey the situation. The purpose of their investigation is to examine the policies of air carriers for the transportation of disabled persons.

PROVINCIAL BUDGETS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, to hear the Prime Minister talk, you would think that the whole world is focused on Bob Rae's projected budget deficit of $9.7 billion.

Why make an international incident of it? Is he concerned if a Conservative premier has a deficit? Not if recent history is a guide. In 1986 when Premier Grant Devine of Saskatchewan, which had balanced budgets under the NDP, ran up a $1.2 billion deficit, we did not hear comments from the Prime Minister or from finance. They did not chide Alberta Premier Don Getty about his 1987 deficit of $4 billion–plus.

Ontario's deficit will be 3.4 per cent of its Gross Domestic Product. Saskatchewan's was double that at 7 per cent. Alberta's deficit took 6.9 per cent of its GDP. Surely the Prime Minister and Deputy Prime Minister are being silly, petty and ridiculous. The country would be well rid of both of them.

FRASER RIVER FESTIVAL

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, this weekend the annual Fraser River Festival will be held at the Deas Island Regional Park in my riding of Delta.

A very special guest at the festival will be the Minister of the Environment.

This event is put together through the co–operation of the federal and provincial governments, as well as businesses and environmental groups.

The mix of sponsors is reflected in the events which celebrate all aspects of the Fraser River. The Fraser River Festival provides a special opportunity for families to learn more about how both people and wildlife use the Fraser River and its estuary through a variety of displays and entertainment.

It is a very popular event in the lower mainland. Last year almost 10,000 people attended and organizers hope for even more this year.

I would like to take this opportunity to wish the organizers of the Fraser River Festival the very best for a successful 1991 festival.

MULTIPLE SCLEROSIS SOCIETY

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, multiple sclerosis is the most common disease of the central nervous system, usually striking young adults in the prime of their life.

Since the month of May has been designated multiple sclerosis month by the MS Society of Canada, let us pause and remember those who must live with this disease and also those who take care of them.

I encourage my colleagues and all Canadians to support the carnation fundraiser–public education campaign, and I take this opportunity to recognize the worker of the society's many volunteers.

The Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada is made up of 160 local chapters in communities all across this country. It is relentless in its pursuit of its goals in finding the cause and a cure of this dreadful disease.

On behalf of the federal government, I wish to express the gratitude of all Canadians to the members and the volunteers of the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has just announced the creation of a so–called new department of regional development for Quebec. However, he immediately added there would be no new initiatives, no new programs and no new money for this program. Could the Acting Prime Minister tell us what all the hoopla is about? Is the government trying to fool Quebecers?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the minister of health will be in the House a little later to respond more fully. The intention here is to focus on the regional development problems and difficulties that exist in the province of Quebec, particularly in so far as they relate to the need for adjustment and restructuring.

The hon. minister of health will be providing a leadership role and working very closely with the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister responsible for International Trade.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr Speaker, I am glad to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare just arrived in the House. Perhaps he would care to remember that when he was Minister of Industry, it was his lack of initiative that put the Quebec economy in the catastrophic situation it is in today. In Quebec, more than 12 per cent of the labour force is unemployed. More than 400,000 people are looking for work, without success. In the Montreal region alone, 213,000 people are jobless. Every day, plants are closing down and employees are being laid off at Air Canada, VIA Rail, Canadian Pacific, Pratt & Whitney, General Motors and Canadair. Why doesn't the minister simply rise in his seat and admit that when he was Minister of Industry, he messed up and he is going to mess up again?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, when Quebecers hear the Leader of the Opposition giving economic advice, they should remember what happened when he was Minister of Finance, which should be some consolation.

Mr. Speaker, what was reported in Le Devoir this morning is simply an administrative measure that gives the minister responsible for economic development in Quebec a management framework. I must say there are quite a few contradictions in what the Leader of the Opposition is saying. He tells us we should look after Quebec's economy, but when we provide a framework for this purpose, Mr. Speaker, he doesn't like it. I don't know what his position will be tomorrow. As far as I am concerned, the federal government has for years been involved in Quebec's regional development through federal-provincial agreements. The responsibility I will have—as soon as a framework has been provided—for regional economic development in Quebec will be similar to the responsibilities I had as Minister of Industry.

Mr. Speaker, I think Quebecers have no trouble understanding these nuances, and the leader of the Opposition should be able to understand them as well.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr Speaker, I think the framework announced by the minister is just a house of cards. I would now like to ask him a technical question. Before embarking on this exercise in public relations, did he consult the Government of Quebec.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, when the Government of Canada—and I trust the hon. member will agree—defines its administrative structures, I would be very surprised to hear that he did so when he was a minister and his government was in power. We have to consult the provinces on the way the federal government's obligations are to be structured. Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said earlier. This has no connection whatsoever. Once again, the Government of Canada defines its administrative structures and it does so effectively, something the Liberal Party is not in the habit of doing.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister, who just gave a fine example of why we have problems with national unity in the country. In announcing the development agency, the minister is doing in Quebec what his government did in the Maritimes with ACOA. It is a smoke screen to hide the cuts in funding for transport, research and development, transfer payments. The Atlantic Region has suffered a net loss of $3.4 billion. My question is: Can the minister promise that starting today, there will be no less funds for all economic development in Quebec? Can he assure us that he is not fooling Quebec as his government fooled the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first I will tell the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard that it is absolutely not an agency. I do not know where he got that idea from, probably from Le Devoir, but the reporter was careful enough to give both options. Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Liberal Party, which should applaud the Atlantic Agency initiative, seems to want to refuse the same opportunity for Quebec. Why would what is good in the Atlantic and in the West not be good for Quebec, Mr. Speaker?

• (1420)

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): The problem is, Mr. Speaker, that it was good neither for Atlantic Canada nor for Western Canada or any other part of Canada.

It is nothing but window-dressing, Mr. Speaker! Quebec is the businessmen's Mecca. They need sensible policies in order to prosper. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that this government spends more time covering up than dealing with the real economic problems of this country.

Here is my question, Mr. Speaker. What good will this do if the minister and his government keep the Canadian dollar at 86 cents, maintain absurd interest rates and do not come up with any adjustment policy for continental free trade?

Mr. Speaker, what we need is not blue patronage garbage, but good policies. When will we get them from you?

[English]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to know that for the Liberal Party having Atlantic management is not good for those regions of Canada. I am very pleased to know that.

[Translation]

I want to tell the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard that, in fact, by creating a special administrative structure for the management of Quebec economic and regional development, it will be possible to find Quebec answers to Quebec problems. What is wrong with that?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and deals with the creation of a Quebec regional development department or agency.

Will this department or agency get more money? No. Will the minister institute a consultation process on regional development with the Quebec government and the people of Quebec? Does this government intend to appoint a committee to discuss with the people of Quebec how these regional development grants should be administered?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I do not think that this government feels it has to immediately inject new funds simply because an administrative structure is set up.

I am always amazed that the opposition party the hon. member represents is not aware of the fact that the government of Canada is operating, in Quebec and elsewhere, but particularly in Quebec, under federal-provincial agreements signed with the Quebec Premier in 1988. So, we consider this agency, department or whatever only as a framework already agreed to by the Quebec government in which funding is in accordance with the terms of agreements signed with the Quebec government, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Across Canada, the rates of unemployment are shocking, just as they are in Quebec. Statistics Canada reports today that the number of Canadians receiving unemployment insurance is up significantly to 1.2 million Canadians. That does not even count the number of Canadians who are on social assistance and out of a job as a result of the policies of this government.

In light of those statistics and in light of the comments from the Bank of Nova Scotia reported today that the federal government's economic policies will prolong the economic downturn, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister a question.

We have seen how effectively and how rapidly this government can institute damage control about events taking place in Japan when the Prime Minister makes comments on other Canadian provinces. Will the government do some damage control, get Canadians back to work and deal with the real unemployment situation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the slowdown was in fact predicted back in 1989. It was recognized then that there were tremendous inflationary pressures within the system that had to be checked. We wanted to do that to avoid the very horrendous kind of recession that we experienced in 1981–82 which saw inflation rise to 13 and 13.5 per cent and interest rates to 22 to 23 per cent.

What is encouraging is that we have developed a plan, a program for recovery based on the reduction of interest rates in relationship to our fight against inflation. Interest rates have come down by 5 percentage points in the last year. Employment is increasing, not decreasing. Consumer and investor confidence and business confidence are improving. Housing starts have improved. Housing sales have improved. Statistics Canada reported that it believes the recession has bottomed out.

There are positive signs that the economy is turning around. It is important that it is turning around in such a way that we will have a durable, sustainable kind of economic growth with price stability, and that is what we are all after.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the facts from Statistics Canada today clearly indicate that the number of people on unemployment insurance is up considerably in the months of February and March, so I do not know how the minister can say that we are on a clear turnaround.

What is this government going to do in terms of innovative programs to deal with the very serious unemployment problem across the country?

I would like to cite one example. Yesterday Canadian Auto Workers and Chrysler came up with an innovative agreement that encourages investment and creates jobs. This sends a clear message to people who are interested in investing in this country and to investors from within this country that these kinds of initiatives can in fact create jobs here in Canada.

My question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. Will the government take that positive message here in Canada and abroad and encourage other corporations to enter into the same kind of innovative job creating investments here in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the very constructive nature of the question posed by the leader of the New Democratic Party.

Indeed we should all applaud the agreement that was reached between Chrysler and the Canadian Auto Workers' union. That is precisely the kind of co-operation that we need in working together to deal with the competitiveness issue, to deal with the productivity issue, to deal with the issue of adjustment and restructuring.

It is not a government issue only. It is an issue that all Canadians must face. The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology is in fact on that kind of a mission. He will be introducing a discussion paper which will deal with all the issues as they relate to the competitiveness of Canadian industry both at home and abroad. I welcome the hon. member's support for that, because I think in building that kind of co-operation and that sort of togetherness, we can deal with this issue.

In so far as her earlier comment about February and March statistics is concerned, I would only remind the hon. member that the April figures show a bit of a turnaround. I think the ones that she has referred to are history.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the Minister of Fisheries said that the crisis in the port of Halifax was due to a surplus of shipping space in the north Atlantic and not to government inaction.

Would the Minister of Transport admit that the surplus of shipping space and more competitive freight rates in the United States are what is squeezing Halifax out of business? Will he commit to a reinstatement today of subsidies to the Atlantic ports?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I fully understand the member's concern for the fate of the port of Halifax. She can rest assured that we will do all in our power to make sure that the port of Halifax handles its share of goods in and out of Canada. As a matter of fact, the Minister of State for Transport, who was going to be in Halifax today and tomorrow, has been asked to meet with the port authorities to discuss what can be done on the part of Transport Canada to help them, taking into consideration that in the past the authorities of the Port of Halifax have always been very innovative in finding ways to make sure that the port is used to its full capacity.

• (1430)

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, if the government is truly going to do all in its power to assist the Port of Halifax, that will be reassuring, as opposed to empty rhetoric.

If every region of Canada is important to this government, will the minister explain why his government has failed to intervene and undertake the necessary assistance to create a truly level playing field for the hard pressed Port of Halifax? We do not need mere words, we need some concrete action and we need it today. I would like to hear from the minister.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the pleasure of sitting in this House at the time, but I am informed that in a previous sitting of this House in years past, this government introduced some legislation to do precisely that. The most vocal opponent to those measures was a representative from the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the crisis in the Port of Halifax caused by the policies of Canadian National.

CN is a Crown corporation. The National Transportation Act clearly states in section 3(d) that transportation is recognized as a key to regional economic development.

My question is how do the rates charged by the CN monopoly contribute to regional economic development when it was exactly these rates that caused the loss of over 400 jobs and over $24 million annually from the Port of Halifax last week? Can the minister please tell me how that is in concert with the stated intentions of the National Transportation Act.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, an individual, who probably knows more about shipping and the Port of Halifax than the hon. member, mentioned yesterday that a representative of the Halifax Port Authority, one of the officials on the board of directors, indicated that even if CN had reduced its rail rates to zero, it would not have prevented this move by the two companies that decided to take their business away from the Port of Halifax.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

Will the minister confirm that the real reason the government refused to act and allowed this crisis to develop was to force the province of Nova Scotia to come up with over $4 million a year to subsidize the leasing of new container cars by CN or run the real risk of losing thousands of jobs and hundreds of millions of dollars from the economy of Nova Scotia, which has already been badly battered by this government's economic policies? Is that the real reason for the inaction?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the member is interested in knowing the real reason for the decision by these companies, it is because of the over-capacity on the high seas. It has nothing to do with the railway rates.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. It is about opening up the constitutional negotiating process to the public.

I would like to ask the minister to elaborate on his ideas yesterday of an aboriginal panel to be attached to the constitutional committee next fall. I would like him to tell the House what kind of powers that panel would have and who would appoint the panel. Could he elaborate a bit more on that for us today?

Second, can he tell the House what ideas he might have for expanding that concept to citizens' panels for a number of other key areas in building the Constitution of Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think we all recognize that the situation of aboriginal Canadians is not comparable of that of any other group in the country.

Having said that, I would not exclude the possibility of considering the application of the idea of panels or something like that for some other groups. It is a proposal that is still being worked out and considered by the government.

I would welcome the opportunity to discuss it with other members of the House, perhaps most usefully, after the Beaudoin–Edwards report has been tabled, although I would be prepared to enter into discussions before that time.

What I am looking for is a way that would make it clear that the powers of decision at the end of the day would rest with members of the House of Commons and the Senate, but that we would recognize that there are some groups in the country whose interest in this process requires them to be treated as more than simply witnesses and that there is a need for some way for them to be heard very fully and with an opportunity to exchange views with members of the committee.

Those are the goals we are seeking. I am seeking to combine the best elements of a parliamentary system with the best elements of more populist approaches, and I very much need the help of the hon. member and others in the House in designing that kind of system.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Given his response to my colleague, I am wondering as we are both members of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee—the committee has worked very hard. It is working each night this week until 10 o'clock at night in drafting the report—if the minister would be willing to come before the committee to ensure that the Beaudoin–Edwards committee report is as worth-while an exercise as we all hope it will be.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the members of the committee think it would be useful for me to meet with them, I would be delighted to meet with them.

CITY OF WINNIPEG

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

For several months, Winnipeggers have been waiting for a federal plan to rebuild and revitalize the economy of their city. Instead of action, we have had the end of the core area initiative. We have had the unemployment rate double. We have had several thousand aboriginal families living in abject poverty, and still there is absolutely no word from the federal government.

When will the people of Winnipeg hear from the federal government about the plan to save jobs in our city?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has dealt with this issue on a number of fronts.

First and foremost, it is important to bring inflation down. We are doing that. It is important to bring the deficit down. We are doing that.

It is having an effect on reducing interest rates which, in turn, is spurring investment, housing sales and housing starts. These are the kinds of broad macropolicies that are required in order to get the economy revitalized.

In the agriculture sector, and we recognize that Winnipeg is indeed a very important city in relation to the agriculture sector, we have brought forward a new agriculture policy which will provide security and a safety net for the producers which in turn has a very good impact upon the total economy of Manitoba, and indeed all of rural Canada.

I think what is happening right now is that the fundamental policy changes that we have implemented are having an effect. We stand by our projections of a buoyant growth in 1992 with growth reappearing in the second half of this year.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the only thing that this government has reduced has been the size of the city economy. It has not done anything in terms of its macropolicy.

Let me ask the same minister a supplementary question about a specific project.

Winnipeg is ready to expand its Convention Centre into a complex that will act as a major boost to the tourism industry. Twenty years ago, the Liberal government was there to help start this project.

Presently there has been no word from this government. In fact, this government has refused to help the Convention Centre and with its expenses of this project.

When will we hear from the government about the future of the Convention Centre and its plans?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, possibly I could help the hon. member.

He will know that a number of us have had meetings regarding the Winnipeg Convention Centre. I find it interesting that in his question, he made reference that the Liberals were there to help. Yet, the Convention Centre did not receive any money.

DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State responsible for the disabled in this National Access Awareness Week.

With recent figures showing that approximately 60 per cent of disabled people are now unemployed in Canada, I want to ask the minister what new and immediate initiatives can disabled people expect from the government as a result of last week's announcements to help overcome the obvious discrimination against employing the disabled in Canada?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague opposite will well know the concern of the government for disabled people. We mentioned that very specifically in the Speech from the Throne.

This week is concerned about increasing awareness. It is the fourth year we have had a National Access Awareness Week. We are in the process of preparing a comprehensive plan for the disabled to ensure that they have greater access to employment, housing, transportation, recreation and education. Those are the themes that we are putting forward this week.

We will have a comprehensive program, to be announced very shortly.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

Will these new government initiatives contain anything to have employers appreciate the tremendous resources and talents which are wasted by their refusal to bring disabled people into Canada's work force?

I wonder if the minister could be just a little more specific as to what he has in this comprehensive plan that will gain for the disabled greater access to recreation facilities, to training, to housing, and all those other things which the rest of Canadians take for granted and are largely out of reach for most of the disabled people in Canada.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Generally I can respond in the affirmative. Just for the record, I would like to state that in Canada 13.6 per cent of our population is disabled. We have 3.3 million Canadians suffering a disability, physical or mental. It is incumbent upon government to increase the access for those people to the very issues that I mentioned a few minutes ago.

The program will address that and it will also address it by dealing with increasing partnerships in this country, partnerships with other levels of government and also partnerships with industry. That will be front and foremost in the package of proposals that we are going to put forward.

EXTRADITION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

A British Columbia man charged with 36 counts of sexual assault on boys and girls was held in the Philippines pending the arrival of extradition papers from Canada. The papers had to arrive within 45 days. With one week remaining, they were sent by third-class mail, a slow boat to Manila. They did not arrive on time and Martin Bakker was released.

No one, including Interpol and the Canadian embassy, knows the whereabouts of this man.

I want to ask the minister what she has done to ensure that this kind of outrageous incompetence, with such tragic consequences, will not be repeated.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am very interested that the hon. member knows that the package is on a slow boat to Manila because if that is the case, she is the only one who knows the whereabouts of the package. Nobody else does.

I have indicated that I find the situation very disturbing and horrifying. It is a mistake that was made. We are not sure where. I have asked my department for a full investigation as to how it could have happened. I might add that when the second batch of papers were sent to the Philippines, the extradition process could be continued, and we hope to apprehend the individual and extradite him to stand trial in Canada.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear that they will be able to extradite him, if they can find him.

I want to ask the minister what plans she has to locate this man, if in fact he is still in the Philippines. How will she find him? What methods can she use to bring him back here to Canada to face trial on these counts of child sexual assault?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that we have every intention of proceeding with the extradition and to that end we have the full co-operation of the Philippine authorities.

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry. Is it true that the Quebec Minister of Forestry unilaterally decided to deprive woodlot operators in eastern Quebec of some of the seedlings required for private reforestation, on the pretext that they receive federal funds from the plan for eastern Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm or deny any of the reports that we have heard on the news in the last couple of hours. I would have been very disappointed, particularly in light of the very productive and cordial discussions that have gone on between myself and the minister of forestry for the province of Quebec, if he would have taken any precipitous action that would make life, particularly at this point of the planting season, more difficult than it already is for our private wood lot owners.

QUEBEC'S JURISDICTION OVER EDUCATION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the government announced in the Speech from the Throne an unprecedented federal invasion into education and training. In this House, only the members of the Bloc Québécois rose to denounce such interference. Today, only a few hours ago, Liberal and PQ members of the National Assembly of Quebec almost unanimously passed a motion denouncing the federal government's interference in the sacred field of education, which is in provincial jurisdiction. My question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration is as follows:

In view of this position taken by both the Government of Quebec and the National Assembly, will the government finally withdraw its plan and agree to respect both the Constitution of Canada and the nearly unanimous political will of the Quebec National Assembly?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no attempt or intention on the part of the federal government to interfere in a provincial jurisdiction like education. If the hon. member were fair about the Speech from the Throne, he would recall that it fully and frankly recognizes provincial jurisdiction. If the Bloc Québécois member wants to deny Canadians and Quebecers an opportunity to discuss the need for developing a learning culture in Canada, well, I simply say that Canadians need more than education in brick buildings; they need to develop a learning culture in this country. This is what we want to do nationally—invite discussion.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, we now see what is behind the mask. Just when this government is promising Quebec a thoroughly renewed federalism that takes into consideration Quebec's aspirations, it decides to launch an unprecedented offensive—something Pierre Elliott Trudeau himself would never have dared to do—and intrude in fields like health, education and regional development. My question is directed to the minister responsible for Quebec and regional development. I want to ask the minister, who knows perfectly well that the Quebec government has always wanted to be master of its own regional development, I ask the minister, who is so proud of the fact that he voted yes in the May 1980 referendum, I ask him to tell us why he now wants to impose on Quebec a structure that symbolizes federal arrogance and interference?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, last year, when I became responsible for the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean was a member of this government, and at the time, I was also given responsibility for regional development. So it is rather surprising that today, he is rending his garments and would have us believe—since I am maintaining the same responsibility, I would ask—I trust the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean agrees the minister responsible for Quebec has the right to intervene to help Quebec with its regional development, Mr. Speaker.

PASSES FOR CONVICTED PERSONS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General regarding passes for convicted rapists. Larry Takahashi was charged in 1984 with sexually assaulting 138 women across Canada, most of them in the Edmonton area. He was convicted of 16 of those charges and was sentenced to three life sentences.

Will the minister tell the House why he is now being allowed out on a "supervised recreational pass" in Agassiz, B.C. Will he tell us whether he will revoke this pass, especially given the fact that the Parole Board has repeatedly denied all forms of parole.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am obviously not aware of the case of which my hon. friend speaks. I will undertake to look into the matter and get back to him.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): This is not the first case. We have had Daniel Gingras in Alberta as well, and two people are dead because of it.

Will the minister not only review the case, but review his policy which allows abominations like this to occur? Is he aware of the fact that women and men are concerned about violence in this country and about the fact that victims do not get deals, but convicted offenders do?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I met with the corrections officers from all across Canada last evening. I think it is fair to say that this is a group that is trying to rehabilitate people. For the most part their successes are never brought up on the floor of the House of Commons. But, yes, there are some things that escape through the net and those are brought up.

I stand behind a policy of trying to rehabilitate people. I know that there are instances where, when they are brought up in this manner, they look like they are out of whack. But basically, what we are trying to do is put people back in society and that is what the policy is designed to do.

EDMONTON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and concerns the transfer of the Edmonton International Airport to the local authority.

The original memorandum of agreement, which was signed by the Deputy Prime Minister in 1989, was a lease to purchase agreement. Today the document is merely a lease agreement.

My question is this: Given that the local authority plans to spend tens of millions of dollars over the terms of the lease to improve the infrastructure of the airport, will the minister restore the purchase clause in the agreement?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. I would like to mention to him that with regard to the leases that are contemplated between the Minister of Transport and the Government of Canada and the airport authorities in the various places where we are discussing the possibility of developing the operation of the airports, these leases are going to be for a very long term period. The local airport authorities that will be investing in the improvements of the airport will have plenty of time to fully amortize their investment. Therefore, we have no intention at this time of changing our policy of devolution of airports, not a privatization of the airports.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the new minister responsible for this new structure.

I would like to ask the minister why, after announcing there will no new money and no new programs, only a new structure, he is indulging in this kind of provocation, while he knows perfectly well that everybody in Quebec, and especially the people involved in regional development, wants Ottawa to withdraw from this area. Why this kind of provocation today?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have always admired conversions, and I am sure Quebecers would have been delighted if this one had taken place 20 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that this measure makes perfect sense. When I was given responsibility for the department, and I am referring to regional economic development in Quebec, obviously this responsibility does not come under the responsibilities of the Minister of Health. Considering the needs and priorities involved, we found it it was necessary to have a structure that would, for the time being, administer the same content and the same responsibilities and would make it possible for us to intervene effectively in regional development.

And I trust a member from Montreal will not contradict me on that score, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. At a time when there is talk of a new distribution of powers between Ottawa and the provinces, of eliminating duplication and all the administrative red tape that unfortunately exists now in the field of regional development, when all Quebec spokespersons at the Bélanger-Campeau Commission unanimously told Ottawa to get out of that field, I ask the minister why he heavy-handedly involves the federal government in a field from which Quebecers want Ottawa to withdraw?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the last parts of my colleague's question, because it would be very ironical and Quebecers would take it very badly. I will just say this: I would agree with my colleague if the recommendations of the Bélanger-Campeau Report or any approach to constitutional change applied tomorrow morning. But in fact, my colleague is asking, if an agreement for constitutional renewal is reached in two years, whether or not I will then be working as minister responsible for regional development to help Quebec develop its economy. No thank you, Mr. Speaker.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Canada has always had a strict safety code that Canadian auto makers must meet. Recent changes to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act have given American cars exemptions from some of the codes and even special status. The same considerations were not given to the Canadian industry and will result in lost Canadian jobs and a double standard for safety.

Will the minister move immediately to correct this incredible situation that allows Americans to sell products in Canada that are against the law for the Canadian industry to sell by creating one standard for the entire industry.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any recent relaxation in the regulations, but my hon. colleague is asking a very pertinent technical question that I will be glad to take under consideration.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Toronto production of the Phantom of the Opera required a new lead. Apparently the producers thought that no Canadian was qualified for the role, so they hired one Peter Karri. There was only one problem: he was not a Canadian citizen, nor a landed immigrant.

He is British. Even though he was living in Britain, his application was somehow magically processed in Detroit, Michigan, in a matter of days.

I ask the minister, why was Carey's application fast-tracked while thousands wait for years?

An hon. member: Double standards.

An hon. member: Look at all those hockey players who get in.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will acknowledge that sometimes people do intervene. Members of Parliament often do in order to try to speed up the admission to Canada of someone. In the particular case in question, I will look into it and get back to the member.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. We learned in this morning's Le Devoir that the government is thinking of establishing a department or agency to oversee Quebec's regional development. A question was asked about it but went unanswered. I want an answer. Did the government consult Quebec and the Quebec minister? If so, whom and what was the answer? Finally, was the former Minister of External Affairs consulted?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question just now, but for my colleague's benefit, I will repeat what I just said. When any government in Canada, federal or provincial, defines an administrative structure, it does not consult other governments. The structure is defined by the government and secondly, it is quite obvious that my colleague is not at all opposed to our setting up mechanisms for regional development in Quebec.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 36(8) of the Standing Orders, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 11 petitions.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committee, a list of which is attached.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the first and last report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in relation to the subject matter of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River in relation to the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

The committee heard from the various parties involved in this case: the then Solicitor General, the hon.

member for Scarborough—Rouge River and the acting Privacy Commissioner. The committee also sought opinions from the Law Clerk, from Parliamentary Counsel's Office and from three distinguished experts.

After careful examination, the committee recommends that the House adopt an order requiring the Solicitor General to provide to the Justice Committee, within 30 days, the unexpurgated versions of the report by Mr. Weir governing the escape by David Gingras and the report by the Board of Investigations concerning an offender, all pursuant to section 8(2)(C) of the Privacy Act, section 18 of the Constitution Act, 1867, section 4 of the Parliament of Canada Act and section 108(1) of the Standing Orders.

I would also state briefly that I wish to compliment the member for Scarborough—Rouge River for his detailed and important work regarding the supremacy of Parliament, which is important to all of us. Although I sit opposite from him, I compliment him on his work.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the third report of the Standing Committee on House Management. I intend to move concurrence in the report later this day.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I am not giving unanimous consent to the presentation of that report.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could perhaps assist the hon. member. There is no need for unanimous consent at this stage. The hon. member might want to consider the rules and later, when the report is moved, the hon. member might want to take advantage then of whatever rights there are.

UNEMPLOYMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-211, an Act to amend the Unemployment Act (temporary community service).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to introduce this bill to amend the Unemployment Act (temporary community service).

The purpose of this bill is to ensure that individuals in temporary service to the community as jurors or emergency workers are not disqualified from unemployment benefits simply because of their participation in such an activity.

[English]

This amendment will ensure that persons in temporary service to the community as jurors or emergency workers are not regarded as disqualified from unemployment benefits because of their participation in such activities.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I would move that the first report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we have not had an opportunity to look at the report. I wish the member would give us the time to reflect on it before concurring in it.

Mr. Lee: Very well, Mr. Speaker.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, once again it is an honour and a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, Clearwater, Logan Lake and Avola, British Columbia, who are concerned that the government has decided to cut back on support for the RCMP. They are concerned that this may result in increased levels of lawlessness and obviously reduce the effectiveness in terms of offering police protection. They are calling upon Parliament to urge the government to restore proper funding to the RCMP so that it is able to fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible and viable police force for communities across British Columbia and remain as a visible and viable symbol of Canadian unity.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition to the House pursuant to Standing Order 36. This petition deals with the CBC and expresses the concerns of many residents of Victoria about the cutbacks to the CBC. They urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the CBC so that it can fulfil its mandate and they urge the government to re-examine its priorities in this area and look to the issue of CBC's service in the capital city of British Columbia, the city of Victoria.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present yet another petition from 150 residents of northwestern Ontario, from Schreiber to Thunder Bay to Kenora to Keewatin.

• (1510)

All of these petitioners have one thing in common. They are supporters of rail passenger services. Unfortunately, they have another thing in common. None of them have access to it any more.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail service, —which was cut on January 15, 1990—maintain and where appropriate upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely, provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern, passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

In short, they want to put Canada back on track.

TAXATION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition to the House today signed by residents from primarily the Prince George, B.C., area.

They call upon Parliament to bring in a fair tax system.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition presented to me by 132 members of the community of Briercrest, Saskatchewan, which is a small community in the southern part of my riding.

The petitioners are concerned about the loss of their post office and other post offices throughout rural Canada. They know that the post office is an integral part of rural Canada. They call upon this government to reverse its policy on closing or converting rural post offices and to keep the post offices open in Briercrest and other rural communities.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of various people in British Columbia.

The concern here is that the federal government is either cutting back on policing or adding additional cost to the tax base of municipalities to come up with extra money for policing.

These people in British Columbia have stated that the federal government is uncompromising in its negotiations with its provincial counterparts by maintaining that their share of funding will be reduced as of March 31, 1991, resulting in additional cost to the taxpayers and municipalities.

The petitioners are urging the government to consider restoring proper funding to the RCMP so that it will fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia and remain as a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners on this petition, through me and through Standing Order 36, want to draw to the attention of this House that many Canadians feel that Marie Sklodowska Curie, a servant of mankind, a scientist whom fame could not corrupt, should be honoured by Canada as she has been honoured by many different countries of the world for her discovery of radium.

There is an organization in Canada using her name to honour her contribution to mankind and to Canadians. It will be very fitting. The petitioners call upon this Parliament to see that Canada strikes a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth, which falls on November 7, 1992.

I might remind the House that is when we celebrate 125 years of the birth of our country.

Speaker's Ruling

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all the notices of motions for the production of papers also be allowed to stand.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REINSTATEMENT OF BILLS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday morning a point of order was raised relating to Government Business No. 1 which concerns the reinstatement of certain bills from the Second Session. Yesterday afternoon, to accommodate a request from the three House leaders, I informed the House of the Chair's decision on the matter, undertaking to return to set in context that decision. I would like to do so briefly at this time.

[Translation]

I do not propose to restate the arguments which were presented yesterday but I would like to thank the hon. member for Cape Breton–East Richmond, the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the hon. member for Ottawa–Vanier, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley–Hants, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russel, the hon. member for Nickel Belt and the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader.

[English]

Before looking at the terms of the motion itself, two concepts must be examined: the concept of prorogation and its effects, and the notion of the reinstatement of the business of one session in the subsequent session.

Prorogation has the distinct effect of interrupting the business of Parliament and, possibly, altering its agenda. Its most significant impact is on the legislative process.

[Translation]

According to Beauchesne's Edition, Citation 167:

"(1) the effect of a prorogation is at once to suspend all business until Parliament shall be summoned again. Not only are the sittings of Parliament at an end, but all proceedings pending at the time are quashed. Every bill must therefore be renewed after a prorogation, as if it were introduced for the first time."

[English]

Bourinot's fourth edition, pages 102 and 103, states this in even more explicit terms:

The legal effect of a prorogation is to conclude a session; by which all bills and other proceedings of a legislative character depending in either branch, in whatever state they are at the time, are entirely terminated, and must be commenced anew, in the next session, precisely as if they had never been begun.

Thus prorogation gives Parliament the chance to start anew in dealing with the business of the nation.

While the effects of prorogation are clear, there have been many occasions when the Government has sought the permission of the House to reinstate legislation considered in the previous session. This has always been considered an extraordinary procedure. In fact, on two separate occasions, July 22, 1977, and March 22, 1982, the House amended its Standing Orders to permit certain bills to be reinstated in the next session. These and other instances of reinstatement—including several proposed in this Third Session—have been dealt with by unanimous consent.

In the situation before us, the Chair appears to be facing an "unprovided case" as I understand the terms of Standing Order 1. In considering this case, I am mindful of the words of one of my predecessors in his ruling of March 23, 1966:

It is only in exceptional circumstances and when there is little doubt about it that the Speaker can intervene and of his own initiative, amend the resolution proposed by an hon. member.

I have carefully reflected on the learned ruling of Speaker Macnaughton on June 15, 1964, which I commend to the attention of hon. members. I have had, reluctantly, to conclude that this is indeed one of those exceptional instances to which Speaker Lamoureux referred.

The Chair can find no precedent for the reinstatement of bills by way of motion, following notice. Hon. members may wish to refer to a ruling on June 13, 1988, which offers certain useful parallels. However, despite the unprecedented nature of this situation, the Chair has found nothing in the rules of the House or in our practice which precludes such an approach and accordingly will allow the motion to proceed.

However, if this approach to the reinstatement of business is acceptable, the form of the motion poses some difficulties. Some hon. members contend that the motion must be divided so that a separate debate and a separate vote can be held on each item of business addressed. The Chair views the subject of the motion as the reinstatement of business, not the individual items of business to be reinstated, and therefore concludes that a single debate will give members adequate opportunity to express themselves on the motion.

Nevertheless, the effect of the motion is to reinstate several distinct pieces of legislation and members must be afforded an adequate opportunity for assent or dissent on each of those items. Accordingly, separate questions will be put on each of the bills to be reinstated.

The reference to Bill C–73 also causes some concern since it was reinstated by unanimous consent on May 23, 1991, and has now been disposed of by the House.

[Translation]

Citation 424(1) of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition notes that the Speaker:

"has the unquestionable authority to modify motions with respect to form".

Accordingly, no question will be put on this item.

[English]

In summary, government motion No. 1 will be dealt with in the following manner: there will be a single debate and five separate questions will be put, namely, on the reinstatement of Bill C–26, Bill C–58, Bill C–78, Bill C–82, and Bill C–85. No question will be put on Bill

C–73. The enabling and final paragraphs of the motion will, as appropriate, form part of each question put.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REINSTATEMENT OF BILLS

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 655).

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that we are very disappointed with the ruling on Motion No. 1. We had serious reservations about this proposal, but we will put up with it because we have no intention of appealing your decision. We accept, somewhat reluctanctly shall we say, that this government be once again allowed to disregard the principles of parliamentary democracy with yet another special measure. We consider it special because they used a motion to reintroduce or reinstate five controversial bills which were found wanting last session.

Mr. Speaker, as I already explained, every item on the Order Paper at the time of prorogation is supposed to die on it. However, since the government has introduced a motion to reinstate these bills, we have to consider them now.

[English]

Since I began my remarks on the government's heavy-handed motion to reinstate certain bills, for which it could not receive unanimous consent because they are indeed not very good bills, a new element has been introduced into the debate—closure. It is now using its majority, the tyranny of the majority, to impose upon the rest of us its will.

That is far from being democratic. Here we have an abuse of power by the majority because the government happens to have the numbers and it can impose upon the minority a process which, to say the least, is objectionable.

Obviously the Conservative government in power has become an old hand at closure. The media do not pay attention to it any more. The government uses closure, abuses it, anytime for anything.

It should be noted that in the five years, and I have the statistics to give the House, the Conservative government has used time allocation 31 times to limit debate, compared to previous federal Liberal governments which used time allocation 29 times in 19 years. Between December 1986 and December 1990 the Conservative government used closure 18 times. In the 77 years before 1984 governments, all governments, used closure 19 times.

Most recent, this government used closure to terminate debate on changes to our Standing Orders, many of which placed greater limits on the opposition, limiting debate and our ability to better oppose the measures the government puts forth.

Now the Tories want to re-introduce certain bills at the stage these bills were abandoned like hot potatoes. When they prorogued the House, they abandoned those bills. They knew what they were doing and yet they proceeded because they said: "We have the numbers." Again, that is a tyranny of the majority.

There were good reasons why these bills were abandoned. They were abandoned because they were flawed. They were controversial. They were publicly opposed by many. They were obviously not a priority for this government, since it let them stand not for months or weeks but for years. Some of those bills have been standing on the Order Paper of this House for years; they cannot be a priority. What is the hurry all of a sudden? Why could the government not go back, take the comments made on the debate on these bills, readjust the proposals and come back with an amended proposal?

Let me emphasize that the Official Opposition has agreed to the reinstatement of certain bills at the stage at which they died. We did it unanimously, which was the way to do it. The traditional way in Parliament is to go to the opposition and say: "This bill died at prorogation, not because we did not want to have it, but because of the circumstances and would you please accept that it be re-introduced". We did; Bill C-73 is an example. Last week we were asked for unanimous consent and we gave it, but not for the five other bills under study at this time.

Instead of taking the opportunity to introduce better bills, bills which are more responsive, considerate and constructive, the government provided the opposition with absolutely no alternative but to oppose this motion No. 1, which is a grab bag of five bills which the government wants to reinstate.

One of them is Bill C-26. I want to go through the five bills because I think it is important.

Bill C-26, an Act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies). As we have said in this House in debate, the bill will devastate economic things in the east. It will have an impact on parts of the agricultural and transportation industries and cost jobs in southwestern Ontario and in Atlantic Canada. We said that in this House. Was it adjusted? No.

Bill C-58, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code. Here we had an opportunity to make much needed changes to the legislation. We have approved and endorsed that. Instead of providing greater opportunities for the rehabilitation of our children, this bill steps away from it and that is hardly a sign of progress for our justice system. It is a cop-out.

Look at Bill C-78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process. Clearly the government wants to get this through, since it was promised by the previous minister. He is in the House right now and I salute him for what he ever did on the question of the environment. Unfortunately he was moved.

Many of us know on this side, and I remember when I spoke about it, that the bill was flawed and could be improved. The government did not improve it. It came back with the same bill; no improvements, nothing. With its numbers it is going to impose that on the House again. Bill C-78 is full of loopholes. It gives the government total discretion to decide whether an environmental assessment process should be implemented.

There is a lack of guarantees for the Canadian public that every project under federal jurisdiction will undergo present or proper assessment. One clause of the bill gives the Governor in Council the power to make the regulations determining which projects will be assessed. When we were considering the bill in this House during the last session, we had no regulations to study to determine how strong or how weak they would be. Such a clause leaves the government open to political lobbying. Can we hope in such a case that those lobbying for environmental protection will prevail over those lobbying to have the project exempted from the assessment process?

That is the key to that bill. That is what we were saying in this House. Did they listen over there? Did the government amend the bill? Did they make the bill a little more sensitive? No, not a thing.

Finally, I want to talk about Bill C-85. Bill C-85 is a bill concerning the privatization of certain airports. The government wanted to give municipal authorities some control over these airports.

We mentioned in this House in debate—and I was the one who made the point—that the protection we were looking for was basically with one small aspect of that bill concerning protection of official languages.

We had serious concerns that the principle of institutional bilingualism may be compromised if and when local authorities take over the management of airports. It is a point that we wanted to make because we are worried that this government, not having too much direction, is possibly going to get rid of official languages and give it to the provinces or to other jurisdictions. The government wants to get rid of it like a hot potato. We said that we will try to convince it to look at this bill and do with Bill C-85 what we did with Air Canada, that is subject this group or these airports to the entire impact of the Official Languages Act.

The legislation in its form at this time provides that Part IV, Part VIII, Part IX and Part X of the Official Languages Act apply. These parts relate to communications with and services to the public, responsibilities and duties of Treasury Board in relation to the official languages of Canada, the Commissioner of Official Languages, and the court remedy.

Why did the government exempt Part V, Part VI and Part VII? Part V dealt with the fact that English and French are the languages of work in all federal institutions. Officers, employees and employers of all federal institutions have the right to use either of the official languages at work.

Part VI gives English and French speaking Canadians equal opportunities and the right to gain employment or advancement in the federal institution of their choice.

Part VII was a commitment of the Government of Canada to enhance the vitality of English and French linguistic minorities in Canada and to foster pro-recognition and use of both French and English languages in Canada.

It is difficult to understand why the government chose not to apply these parts of the Official Languages Act to Bill C-85.

Do I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Official Languages Act was passed some three years ago, I think it was July 1988? We are now into the spring of 1991 and we still have no regulations pertaining to that bill.

That may be part of the problem. If it is, government members have the power to move. They have the numbers. Why do they not use their numbers to impose upon the issues that are important? Indeed, why do they not use the numbers to do the right thing instead of using them all the time to try to get things done their way and doing things which in our view are not democratic or parliamentary?

We object strongly to the motion of closure being put on this Motion No. 1. We will vote against it.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should say that I regret having to rise in the House today to debate the particular motion before the House which is currently being considered.

Before commenting on the substance of the motion, I would like to go through the course of events that has brought us to this stage now.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, we are not dealing with a nebulous concept such as some some of the practices of Parliament. What we are dealing with in the House today is a very serious move by the current government to ram through a motion which will enable it to bring back to the floor of this House and its committees, legislation that by all rights should have been started fresh in this Parliament when the House prorogued just a short time ago.

• (1620)

Let us go through what we have dealt with so far. As the previous speaker mentioned, we are dealing with five bills which originated in April 1989 with the throne speech beginning the government session after the free trade debate. Those bills were introduced and made their way through the usual processes and readings in this House. The members on this side, and undoubtedly on the other side as well, had concerns about these bills and were bringing them forward in the House and in committee.

For whatever reason, the government did not feel they were important enough, or felt there was so much opposition to them, it did not make it a priority of this Parliament to deal with those bills prior to prorogation of the House.

Following prorogation, the House returned with a throne speech and, rather than seeking unanimous consent of the House to reintroduce these bills, as was done with one bill, the government has now introduced a motion which will in essence go back in history in but a day's time for this legislation to be dealt with.

With the introduction of this motion, questions were raised by members on this side of the House about the nature of this motion and the procedure the government was following. I read the brief ruling on what this government is doing this morning and heard it read in the House this afternoon. I think the government is putting the Speaker in the position of making difficult rulings. While we will, and have to, abide by the rulings, we hear in the wording of this ruling that the Speaker of this House is really giving an important and serious signal to the government about this kind of action.

I noted that the decision said that these were exceptional circumstances and unprecedented. These were the words used for the ruling that has allowed this particular motion to be before the House. What next? We have, of all things, a closure motion brought in a short time ago by this government meaning that by tonight when we vote on this particular motion, the five bills that are before us are going to be back into the process and system.

In a short time today, through this motion, the government has been able to abrogate a great deal of the responsibility and duty that a government in our parliamentary democracy is supposed to accept, or we were led to believe should accept, when bringing forward legislation. That has put these bills in a difficult and unfortunate situation. Of course we will continue to debate them in committee and in the House when they make their way through the various stages.

This is not really a great deal different than if the government was to introduce in one day a series of bills and by motion, through closure, pass all that legislation quickly in one day. Why bother having Parliament sit and debate and have legislation reviewed by committee? There is no sense, from the government's point of view, in bothering to debate any of this legislation at all. What we might get from this government is that we might sit two days a year: one day in the spring and one day in the fall, and that would be about it. I think what that really is doing is challenging a lot of the duties and responsibilities—not just of Parliament—but of the government of the day, to ensure that when it is the government's job to bring forward legislation that it is brought forward in a reasonable and timely fashion and the rules that we have got accustomed to in this House are followed.

As you know, the rules of this House are there for a reason, to give members of Parliament time to deliberate on various motions and legislation being brought forward by the government. It gives Parliament through its committees an opportunity to hear from various groups and individuals who have particular concerns or expertise in an area. By doing that, we end up with better legislation because it does give people in a particular sector, for example people who are affected by a proposed law, it gives them a chance to make their views known. There is that important public input into the legislative process that we would not have. That is why we follow some of those old-fashioned principles, and I don't think there is anything wrong with some of the old-fashioned ideas about how Parliament has run itself.

We know that there is a need to balance the demands and needs of modern government against time, especially the time that Parliament and parliamentarians need to debate and review legislation. Finding that blend is often a difficult course to follow. I suggest, though, that this particular case is an example where the government has not taken the opportunity to try to find that blend or that balance between a modern government and the demands, needs and responsibilities of Parliament.

When we see what the government of the day has done, I think it just adds more and more to the concern that many Canadians have that Parliament and the government rides roughshod over the concerns of many Canadians. It is no wonder that people would start to feel that way when they see and hear what is being done, particularly by this government.

I would hope that after the next election, when the New Democrats form the government, that these are not the kinds of rules or motions that we will bring forward to this House. These are the kinds of rules that have really led people to seriously question our form of government.

Many in this Chamber, and probably most Canadians, would appreciate some of the approaches and attitudes toward Parliament that members from all sides have had, but in particular, Mr. Stanley Knowles. He was an outstanding parliamentarian from our party who really gave most Canadians an opportunity to see what it meant when Parliament was run the right way.

I am afraid that the government today is not helping any of us in this House in attempting to defend the institution of parliamentary democracy in which we all participate, argue and defend. It is often very difficult to do when we have a government doing exactly as it is doing today. It is attempting to accomplish, in a two-day debate or within a few hours, what traditionally should have taken some time to ensure that the bills before us are given the time needed for a proper course of debate, a proper review in this House.

I am hopeful that as this session of Parliament goes on, as we have heard the calls from the government members opposite, from the cabinet ministers in particular, they are talking about a new non-partisan approach to dealing with the issues in this country. Hiding behind those words while using motions and closure, as the government is doing now in this Chamber, does not lend any effort to a non-partisan role and leads members on this side of the House, and I think rightfully so, to challenge what the government is doing with this motion and with closure on these bills.

• (1630)

In wrapping up, the point I wanted to make as best I could was that the government, through this motion, the use of closure, is actually ramming through bills in this House that should have had the proper time for debate and review. This government has really thrown out the window a great number of very important traditions that Parliament has established over the years. It just gives rise to more and more resentment for our form of government and, in particular, against the Conservative government that is in office now. I hope it can learn a lesson in this session of Parliament. If not, I hope Canadians teach the government a lesson in the next election campaign.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, this particular motion before the House of Commons is a very interesting motion. As you know, everything that is done in the House of Commons is done by a motion. Somebody has to put a motion to do everything that is done in the House of Commons.

The House of Commons has evolved over the years as an institution with a procedural framework that is there for a particular reason. It is difficult to understand, I am sure, as people would wonder, why we have traditions such as the Leader of the Opposition being separated from the Prime Minister by two sword lengths. That is kind of difficult to understand in this day and age, or why somebody in the gallery is not allowed to take notes.

The traditions in Parliament have evolved over years and years and years. The procedure has its basis in the prorogation or the dissolution of Parliament. It is such because a Parliament has got to start and a Parliament has got to end. A Parliament ends with a general election. The adjournment of the House is usually made and then the dissolution takes place.

The Speech from the Throne, together with the budget speech, form the two main segments, the two pillars of the House of Commons and of every legislative body under the British parliamentary system. They are there for a reason. The Speech from the Throne calls members back to the House of Commons to tell members why they were called back to the House of Commons. In other words, it outlines the government's legislative reason for bringing parliamentarians back here to Ottawa.

What becomes of the Speech from the Throne, and why would we call it a Speech from the Throne entrenched with its tradition of outlining a legislative program, if the government of the day in 1991, using its majority, says: "We don't need a Speech from the Throne because we are going to use our majority to bring back bills that were presented to the House last year, or the year before or the year before that"?

The Speaker has made a ruling. I respect that ruling. I would respectfully submit that if there is anyone who is really in a mood to condemn the procedures adopted by this Chamber, then the condemnation should be on the shoulders of the government of the day.

This motion now before the House is an historic motion, perhaps the most revolutionary change to the rules of procedure brought into this House at any one moment in time in our history. The government has said that: "We will take five bills that were before the House of Commons in the last session", which could be two years ago, "and we want them now brought into this House at third reading, at the committee stage. We want them brought in and we want them at the position they would have been if the House did not dissolve". That is what the motion says. In other words, it is going to bring back five bills in one motion and it is going to put them where they would have been if the House did not dissolve, as if nothing has happened.

What do we have? Let us take any of the bills. There is a bill to amend the Railway Act; a bill to amend the Young Offenders Act; a bill to amend the Crown Corporations Act; a bill to amend the federal environmental assessment process; a bill to amend the act concerning the port wardens of Quebec and Montreal; and a bill relating to certain matters of employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports to local authorities. Montreal, that is Dorval, is being transferred to a local authority. Vancouver is also being transferred and so is Winnipeg and some other airport.

There are six bills. One of them is already passed so we are left with five. Take for example the federal environmental assessment process. The government can take it because it is not worth very much. It is through the House of Commons, with all of its rules, with its checks and balances, that the government is accountable to the people of Canada. Every member of Parliament sits down and speaks to the second reading, the principle of the bill, and is given certain assurances by the government. The bill then goes into committee. All of a sudden, the members discover the government is not prepared to do really what it said it was going to do.

Just suppose the members of the House of Commons then say: "We are now going to stall this bill". That is a legitimate rule of procedure. There are not very many rules left on which a private member or the backbenchers in this House can exert any pressure. The accountability of the Government of Canada to the people of Canada has eroded over the years because of these rule changes.

• (1640)

A minister no longer needs to know what is going on in his department because of this erosion. A member's power in the House of Commons has so decreased over the years that the House of Commons has merely become an institution of lists.

Here we have the members of the House dealing with bills and having the power to say: "We are not going to pass this. The government has fooled us. To the Environmental Act it is not prepared to accept amendments. We are going to stall it until dissolution".

Along comes dissolution and along comes the government again next year and calls the bill as if it has passed all of these procedures and gone into committee. In other words, the government can do whatever it wants. It does not have to go back to the beginning again.

We have environmental bills. We have the Clean Water Act; we have the Clean Air Act; we have the Environmental Contaminants Act; we have the Fisheries Act. We have acts coming out of our ears to protect the environment and then we ask under this legislation: Is this going to now solve the problem of, say, polychlorinated biphenyls being used in transformers on telephone poles? "Oh, no" says the government.

Is this going to solve the problems we have in all of our wilderness areas of the use of aerial spraying of herbicides, for example, or insecticides such as fenitrothion, Matacil or any of these toxic substances sprayed over large areas? The groups concerned discover that this bill is really not going to solve that problem.

Those of us who were interested asked the question: "Will the bill be able to solve the problem of the total destruction of our fishing resource on the east coast of Canada by foreign nations, licensed by the Government of Canada? The answer was no. We are still giving out the licences to the Russians and to the fleets from Japan, Cuba, Denmark, Poland and Germany; some of the countries which operate massive factory freezer trawlers within Canadian waters, destroying our environment and the fishing resource. All because the Government of Canada has decreed that fisheries in this nation shall take its guidelines from the Department of External Affairs.

I discovered just the other day that France has not even paid its bill from 1987 for its licences. The federal cabinet met two years ago, I discovered, and passed an Order in Council forgiving the French $450,000 of their licence fees and they promised to pay the remaining $355,000. They have been doing so since on the instalment plan. They paid three times two years ago. This year the federal government got a cheque on March 27, and France still owes for its licence fees back in 1987.

The Soviet Union still has not paid the $997,000 it owes for its fees for last year. Here is a Canadian fisherman who cannot get a licence unless he has his fees paid for. Here are men and women today who look out at the ocean and see nine foreign nations fishing 12 miles off their coast and they are not allowed to get a licence. Why? To protect the resource of Canada.

We look at this legislation and we do not want it to go through because it does not cover the polychlorinated biphenyls in the transformer, it does not cover the fenitrothion in the forests and it does not cover the fishing resource which is being destroyed by nine foreign nations licensed by the Government of Canada through the Department of External Affairs.

We went through that two years ago and last year. Now we know what the government was up to. It was up to passing something that really did not mean all that much. As an example, and I am just using it as an example, now the Government of Canada can come along and say: "By a majority vote, we are going to bring back a bill introduced two years ago that went through all those stages and we are now going to take that and have it marked 1991 as if it has passed all the stages again in 1991 that took place two years ago."

The entire framework of the passage of legislation and the accountability of the government to the people of Canada have suffered an incredible blow by this decision of the Government of Canada. Somebody can ask today a legitimate question: Why do we have a Speech from the Throne? The Speech from the Throne outlines the legislative program. Why do we have mechanisms in place to protect the people of Canada against bad legislation? Now that all goes down the drain because the Government of Canada, by using its majority, can say: "We will bring back a bill from last year, from two years ago, from six years ago, from 20 years ago, from 50 years ago" because we see dissolution under the rules of procedure going back to Erskine May. The rules of procedure always dealt with dissolution and prorogation in the same paragraph. That is the way it is presented. Everything on the Order Paper comes to an end.

There has only been one exception to that and that was when there was unanimous consent, and this dates back quite a number of years. Everybody concerned in the House of Commons was saying: "Well, we have gone through all of these hearings on a particular bill and everybody really wants this bill, it is good for Canada, it is good for us, so let us all agree now to bring it back at the same stage as we had it before." That is legitimate. It is a legitimate use of the majority vote of the House of Commons.

The House of Commons can do anything it wants with a majority vote. This motion, which deals with five bills before the House of Commons, is not a legitimate use of the authority of the majority of the House of Commons and it strikes another blow against the accountability function of the House of Commons on behalf of the people of Canada.

• (1650)

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise in this House to speak against a motion to reinstate a series of legislation which in its content and substance is inept and incompetent.

I am especially pleased to do so following upon my colleague who is not only one of the finest orators in this House, but undoubtedly one of the finest orators in this country. What he has said about this motion and the specific pieces of legislation contained therein were comments with which I am sure all Canadians, certainly all Newfoundlanders, would agree and stand proud to be with him.

I will use Bill C–78 as the specific example of why this motion should not pass, why this legislation should not be reinstated, why it should be allowed to die on the Order Paper, as indeed under the proper legislative process it should be allowed to do so if this government had any understanding of what democracy was all about.

[Translation]

I am pleased to speak to the motion for the reinstatement of Bill C–78 concerning the environmental assessment process. The very principle of environmental assessment is the basis of a new perception of our global ecosystem whose resources are not unlimited.

According to the Brundtland Report, the environmental assessment process plays a key role in the search for sustainable development. I unconditionally support the principle of an environmental assessment legislation in Canada.

However, Mr. Speaker, Bill C–78 is so flawed it will in fact undermine our existing standards for environmental assessment.

As Steven Hazel, from the Canadian Arctic Committee, said, and I quote: "With Bill C–78, Canada now has environmental guidelines that have the force of law and a bill that is no more than a set of guidelines".

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, Mr. Hazel is right and that is why I am against this bill being sent back to committee.

[English]

Bill C-78, this government's incredibly incomplete environmental impact assessment bill, this government's view of the way in which a modern society ought to approach the environment, spent five months in committee.

There were briefs presented by environmentalists, by industrialists, by legal organizations, by aboriginal groups, by virtually every segment of Canadian society. Virtually without exception, every single witness opposed the bill.

These were witnesses chosen by ourselves, but also chosen by the government to come and defend its bill. Yet, upon reading, upon sitting there, and upon questioning, they unanimously said that this government has no idea of the way that a modern society ought to evolve in the treatment of the air we breathe and the water we drink.

The reasons that were given ranged from the fact that the bill was vague and incomplete to the fact that it attacked the very integrity of the ecosystem.

A great number of groups presented very serious amendments and they were extensively discussed. Indeed, with the former minister we sat and discussed them. We were told on numerous occasions that the government would be bringing forth amendments.

We were told that the bill would be made whole. We were given promise after promise that the press releases of the government would eventually come to reality, and the bill would be changed.

Appointment after appointment was broken. Amendment after amendment which was promised was never delivered, and there were rumours of cabinet fights, divisions and debates.

Unfortunately, in this government the environment minister does not count for much. Senior ministers, such as the minister of health, the minister of energy, and the minister of foreign trade consistently came in and said: "This Conservative government cares not a whit for the environment".

Now, we find ourselves in the situation we are now in. The bill died on the Order Paper. In its supreme arrogance and lack of understanding, this government comes to us and says: "we would like to reinstate it", of a bill unanimously rejected by the people of Canada.

If there has ever been a government which is out of touch with reality, it is this one. If there has ever been a demonstration of that fact, it is in this government's treatment of Bill C-78.

The premise of the bill, to begin with, is entirely wrong. With the world-wide presentation of the Brundtland report some years ago, the notion of sustainable development became the fundamental principle of environmental assessment. The term "sustainable development" is now learned by children in grades 1, 2 and 3 in every school in every province of this country. Yet, the term "sustainable development", as if the government was afraid to express the words, does not appear once in the bill. If there is any indication of how far behind the thinking of this government is, it is surely that.

There is no modern country that does not understand that it cannot have a sound economy in an unsound environment. There is no modern country that considers the environment to be in opposition to the economy. There is no government, except for this one, that does not understand that the air we breathe, the water we drink and the soil in which our food grows are not free goods; that in depleting them as the country is we are not only devastating the environment but we are devastating our economy.

If you wonder why our health costs are rising, take a look at the air we breathe and the water we drink. If you wonder what is happening, why there is such a huge deficit—if you think the economic deficit is great, I simply ask you to examine the environmental deficit which we are in the process of leaving to our children.

Today's most successful nations—Germany as an example—are nations which understand the total integration of the economy and the environment. Japan, not necessarily a nation known for its environmental awareness, has nonetheless cut its wastage by 42 per cent. It has cut its energy costs by 30 per cent and is now one of the most energy-efficient nations in the world.

Those are environmental objectives. Yet this government seems to wallow in some 1850s philosophy that simply says that we can produce and produce garbage and simply waste resources as if it makes no difference.

Sustainable development is vital to Canada because our economy is so terribly dependent on natural resources. Sustainable development must be the cornerstone upon which modern legislation is built. Therefore, it only stands to reason that sustainable development must be the cornerstone upon which the environmental legislation of this government or any government must be built.

There are other problems as well with Bill C–78. The scope of the environmental assessment in this bill has been narrowed—not widened but narrowed—to the point where those of us in this country who would seek to involve every project that affects human beings find ourselves in the situation—and I will elaborate upon this—where the government can declare exemption after exemption, as it has done in the case of Kemano, Rafferty and Point Anconi.

The assessment is not mandatory. In other words, this government can decide who its friends are and who its enemies are, and treat them differently.

• (1700)

Closer examination has demonstrated that, outside of the United States, there is no government that has brought in an environmental bill with this amount of discretion, without objective standards of assessment, with no way that anyone can plan ahead and no time limits on the assessment.

When the business community appeared before us, the conclusions they drew were exactly the same as those of the environmentalists who appeared before us. They said that they cannot live with this bill. They also said that it was impossible for us—

An hon. member: I agree with the hon. member, absolutely.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): The member opposite stands up and speaks for all that side of the House and says that I am right.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that interjection. That side of the House has stood up and unequivocally agreed with me. I want to congratulate that side of the House. I congratulate the members opposite. For once in their lives they understand what a terrible thing they are doing to this country.

Oh my God, this is indeed a great day for Canada. Finally, for the first time in my history in this House an intelligent word has been spoken on that side of the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle–Émard): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand how other members can come in and start to laugh. I suppose they find the environment a laughing matter. Oh no, please stay, do not leave.

The environmental assessment process in this country must not be open to political manipulation. We must have clear rules that people can understand. Environmentalists must know how they are allowed to go forth with their objections or their modifications. Indeed, members of the business community must be able to plan and arrange their financing. Yet, that is not what the government does.

This government stands up here day after day mouthing vacuous statements about how it will get the economy moving. Yet, it turned to the business community and said: "We will not give you a bill that will allow you to plan. We will not give you a bill that will allow you to finance. We will not give you a bill that will enable you to create new jobs. We will not give you a bill that will enable you to compete around the world. We will give you a mishmash of political statements that essentially will reward our friends and destroy our enemies." That is not the way to run a modern country.

As far as the environmentalists are concerned—that vast army of people from the Atlantic to the Pacific to the great north who, every day for little pay, totally concern themselves with the protection of this planet—when they come forth and say they want intervener funding, when they say they want to be able to come to the table, they want to be able to match the great governments and the great corporations with their war chest, they want to be able to provide intelligent and profound objections, they want to be able to show how projects can be mitigated. Does this government say: "We will provide intervener funding"? Does this government say: "We will provide you with the ability to be able to stand up to your opponents"? No, not at all. This government says: "This country is for the rich and the large institutions. Go away, little interveners. Go away environmentalists." There is no money provided in the bill for intervener funding. It is an absolute disgrace.

The essence of democracy in a modern state is that third parties must be allowed to come forth and complete the process of investigation. All the power and knowledge does not solely exist within this House, it exists in thousands of communities across this country, people who have deep knowledge. They have to be provided with funding. It is the way to operate a modern state. The fact that this government refuses to do it is one more proof that what we are seeing on the opposite side is simply the finest 16th century thinking that the world has ever generated.

When we take power in two years, I can guarantee that no member of Parliament will have to stand up and wonder if the water that he is drinking is safe.

Mr. Speaker, you are asking me to sit down and I am certainly going to bow to your will, but let me simply say that Bill C–78 is a very flawed piece of legislation. Defeating the bill would not leave a legislative vacuum. Unfortunately, Bill C–78 is weaker than the existing guidelines which have subsequently been strengthened by court decision.

My feeling is that if we have to go with Bill C–78 or none, go with none. Go with the existing guidelines that were introduced by a Liberal government.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this government should recognize, as we all do, that this legislation will create more problems than it would solve. This bill should immediately go back to the drawing board. The environmental assessment principle is so important that it would be harmful to continue to examine such a half–baked piece of legislation.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this debate today, but I must say that I am getting rather tired of having to deal with closure and its effects, and the way that this government mistreats the precedents and the practices of this House.

An hon. member: A new definition of democracy.

Mr. Milliken: A new definition of democracy, as the hon. member says. That is what this government is trying to introduce to Canada. Frankly, I think it is time we exposed the fraud that it is trying to perpetrate on the people of this country by moving this kind of motion today and then closuring it. I suggest it is perhaps one of the worst outrages that has been perpetrated in this House in many years.

I want to deal with the propriety of the motion that the government has introduced. I suggest that it is contrary to all the practices of this House for the last 124 years. It is a breach of the proprieties of this place. While the Speaker has ruled that the motion is in order, and I respect that ruling, I suggest that it is still morally wicked of the government to proceed with this motion and particularly then to apply closure to the motion and thereby curtail the debate on it.

What the government is doing by this, and let us make it perfectly clear what is happening here, is short–circuiting the legislative process on five bills. On one of those bills it is doing something that I suggest is completely unprecedented— frankly, the whole practice is unprecedented—and that is declaring the bill to have been passed by this House. In other words, tonight, when the vote occurs on this motion, a bill will be deemed to have been passed by this House which has never been introduced or debated at any stage in this session of this Parliament.

I suggest that this wrong. It is wickedly wrong. It is a gross violation of the constitutional principles on which this House has operated on since Confederation. Indeed, it is contrary to the whole practice of British parliamentary tradition for 900 years. Nothing like this has ever been tried before. I suggest it is wrong. The government knows it is wrong.

That is why there is not a single minister in this House showing his head. They are so disgusted and ashamed of what they are doing that they have all run for cover in the lobby or into their offices. I suggest that it is their obligation to be here and listen to this debate. They should be ashamed of their actions. I see every one of them has fled.

I want to thank the three members on the other side who are here to listen to this debate. I think it is wonderful that they are participating in this way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has been here now for six years—

Mr. Milliken: No. Two and a half—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Two and a half years. It seems like six years anyway. I just want the hon. member to know, and I do not think I have to direct this to him, because he is knowledgeable about the procedures of the House of Commons, that you do not talk about who is and who is not in this Chamber. The fact that they are outside watching you on television, or looking after constituency work, I would hope that the hon. member would carry on with this very interesting debate. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I was careful at the end to make reference to the presence of the three that were here. I thought that I was referring to their presence, not to the absence of the other 160, but that is beside the point.

I want to turn to the arguments advanced by the parliamentary secretary yesterday in the course of the procedural argument about the propriety of this motion. I want to say how outrageous his arguments were and I want to expose them for what I suggest is a fraud on the people of Canada in what he said.

• (1710)

I want to turn, first of all, to page 651 of Hansard for yesterday where he said:

> We have precedents. We have precedents of reinstating business in this House of Commons. We are dealing today with a different process but the precedents are very clear.

There are no precedents for this kind of motion to be debated in this House. I searched back to 1938—the parliamentary secretary was invited to produce his precedents—and I could find no precedent where a motion to reinstate a bill had ever been debated in the House. On the occasions when such a motion was presented to the House, it was agreed to by unanimous consent. There was never a debate. There was never the moving of a motion and a vote. There was never closure used on such a motion. Every single time the very particular and special procedure of unanimous consent of all members was sought and obtained before any bill was reinstated.

The principle of unanimous consent is a very fancy, unusual practice. It may happen often, but it is very fancy and very unusual. It is very particular, and it allows this House to do almost anything that this House could possibly do.

It has been used in the past to allow the government to get around having to go through all stages of a bill. What the House is in effect doing is saying that we agree that this bill has passed through the stages up to a certain point. Beyond that point, we will then discuss it.

They are saying to the government: "You do not need to go through each of the stages with debate". It is a short-circuiting of the normal legislative process, but it has always been done by unanimous consent. Yet, here the parliamentary secretary said there were precedents. He was asked to produce a precedent. He has never produced a precedent. There is no precedent. This is a violation of all past practice.

The hon. member for Kamloops, in an extremely able submission, pointed out that even the Précis of Procedure, in this House, an excellent publication that I know members of the staff of this House have worked on for many years. They have produced an excellent volume. It has indicated that the practice of this House through 124 years has been to require unanimous consent for the reinstatement of bills.

Yet, today we are witnessing a gross breach because it is not one bill that the government is moving on here. It is five bills. It already has two by unanimous consent in this session. Since May 13 when we started again, two bills have been reintroduced by unanimous consent.

The second reading stage was avoided on both of them. I think on one report stage was avoided as well. Fine. We agreed to that. All members of this House agreed. Every single one permitted the bills to go to that stage, but that is not the case today.

Now we have five bills being moved forward in this way. The government says: "Not only are we going to force those five bills to be put into the House at these stages, but we are going to move closure on the motion because we are not going to permit discussion of the merits of this motion and the putting of the five bills". That is a particularly disgraceful aspect of the current proceedings.

The second point he raised was at the bottom of page 651. He said that there were precedents for another matter. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I believe that if you check through your precedents you will find one which says that what has happened here is that the House has taken action on a part of a motion and therefore that part of the motion becomes mute, becomes silent.

Again, he did not produce the precedent. The Speaker rooted through what the parliamentary secretary referred him to and his guess is as good as mine on this point. I do not know what he is talking about. He never produced any authority, and yet he makes these blanket statements designed to hoodwink the Canadian people into thinking that this is somehow normal and regular.

It is not normal or regular. If this was so usual or common, the parliamentary secretary surely would have cited a precedent from the British Parliament. There are 400 years of records he could have dug through to find some precedent that might have supported this.

He is always telling us how much we should emulate the British Parliament, what a great institution it is, and how if we only followed British practice we would be way ahead. Yet he is not following British practice in this case. If he is, he has no authority for saying so. He has not produced a single tittle of evidence to support this gross breach of our practice and I suggest that it is totally inappropriate.

Then we go to his other suggestion. The first point was that what we were doing was unprecedented and therefore out of order:

> If we were to take argument that any time a decision, action, or process is new it is therefore out of order, or because it is different it is unprecedented, and therefore cannot be done, the judges, lawyers, the Speaker of the House, I, in my role as parliamentary secretary to the House leader, the House leaders of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party, would not be able to proceed because all we could do if we were to rely on precedents would be to simply follow what our predecessors have done.

Well, our predecessors have done quite a lot. There is lots of room within the sphere of parliamentary practice and precedent for the parliamentary secretary to work. What he does not want to do is allow this House to debate bad bills that this government in its incompetence, bungling, and fumbling wants to introduce into this place.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Milliken: He is ashamed—and he should be—to produce these bills in this House and allow them to be discussed because he knows that if we have a full debate on them the Canadian people will, as they have so often with this government, rise up and say: "Let us get rid of this bunch. How long can we stand to see our country torn apart by this Conservative mob? They are no good". They are at 14 per cent in the polls. That is the evidence of their incompetence and the distrust and dislike they have sown across this country from one coast to the other and to the other. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, they have had enough.

If the parliamentary secretary had any courage he would be in here allowing debate on these bills and introducing them in the proper course. Instead, he brings in a motion and says we want to deem all these bills virtually passed. "We will limit debate on that motion. We will put closure on it and shut off debate so Canadians cannot hear how badly we are performing. They are going to hear how awful we are as a government. We do not want our faults exposed in this House". That is what they are doing by this.

Let us look at the things they have left out. Let us think of the bills they did not put in this motion that were on the Order Paper. What about the conflict of interest bill? Where is that? I think it was introduced in November 1989, and we have never seen it. It has never been called for debate. The Prime Minister in the last election said we will have special conflict of interest legislation so that members of Parliament are not found in conflict. We want to run an honest administration. Yet no administration has ever had as many members charged with criminal offences as this one has.

That is the kind of thing that should have been dealt with in this legislation. The government introduces it and then does not call it. It sits on the Order Paper. Why did it not bring that back in and deem it to have had first reading in this motion? I know why. The government's own backbenchers, the ones who are having trouble, the former members who have been convicted are saying they cannot have that kind of bill. That is why we do not have it.

Yet the government should be introducing this kind of legislation and proceeding with it. We have asked it to move on it for two years and nothing has happened. It is afraid to proceed with that legislation and it should be ashamed of itself.

It will move with other taxation measures that impose taxes and charges on the people of Canada, and take away their benefits. It will proceed with its weak-kneed environmental legislation. We have just heard from the hon. member for Lasalle-Émard in a very capable speech about what it will do on this issue. We heard from him how bad the environmental bill was and that is one of the ones it is proceeding with under this special order.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is wrong, it is unprecedented, it is improper, and the government should not be carrying on in this way. As the hon. member for Halifax says, it is pernicious. I quite agree with her.

He then says, and I quote again the parliamentary secretary who obviously does not know what he is talking about, on page 652: "It is part of our practice and to reinstate this particular bill at this stage is completely in order". He is talking about a bill that is going to be introduced under this motion when it carries tonight. I am sure the members who are not here now will reappear and vote to put these bills back on the Order Paper. One of them will never appear on the Order Paper because it is going to be deemed to have passed. That is what is happening with this other one.

The parliamentary secretary says: "Part of our practice and to reinstate this particular bill at this stage, that is the stage of having been passed, is completely in order and is consistent with what I have said earlier, that in fact what we are dealing with is not a cutting off of debate, but a continuation of a bill at a stage it was at prior to the prorogation of the House".

In all the precedents I looked at back to 1938, and I will lay a bet with the minister at any time, there was never, ever a case where a bill was put to the point where it had passed this House. Every precedent I looked at back to 1938, and frankly there were precious few reinstatements in the period, brought the bills back to no more than the completion of the report stage, or its former equivalent, completion by the Committee of the Whole.

In other words, there was always a debate allowed at third reading of every bill that was reinstated. But here in this motion today, we have a bill that is deemed passed by this House, so there will be no debate at any stage on this bill.

An hon. member: That is terrible.

Mr. Milliken: It is a national disgrace.

An hon. member: It is a travesty.

Mr. Milliken: If this kind of thing was reported in parliamentary journals around the world, the Canadian Parliament would become a laughing stock because of the outrageous conduct of the government in introducing this motion. It violates all the constitutional principles of debating bills at three readings in the House of Commons. That is the standard practice in every British parliamentary institution and has been for hundreds of years, and this government is violating that practice.

Who is to blame for this practice aside from all the members on the other side? The government itself had a choice.

They had a choice. Remember those words. Hon. members opposite may remember them because they came up in a debate. They had a choice. They chose to prorogue the last session and leave the business unfinished on the Order Paper. They sent us away through April and early May and said: "We do not want you in Ottawa. We do not want questions every day. We do not want to listen to you. We do not want our sins exposed to the people of Canada on national television here on the floor of the House of Commons".

They sent us home instead of sitting around and dealing with that business. They could have had us here debating Bill C–26. They could have had us here debating Bill C–58. They could have had us here debating Bill C–78. We could have debated Bill C–82, or at least the other place could have continued with it. We could have debated Bill C–85, but no, no, the government decided that we should go home. It got this House adjourned and sent us home.

Members went back to their constituencies and did their thing for a month. Then the government said: "Well, we are going to prorogue the session now". It did so on May 12, by proclamation of the Governor General, and brought the last session to an end.

We in the opposition had nothing whatever to do with it. We were never consulted. That was done by the government; it was its choice and at its time. It ended the session and thereby killed everything that was on the Order Paper.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Milliken: That is provided for in the law. The government is entitled to do it if it wants. We did not sit around and say you should not have done that. We said:

"That is your executive act and responsibility", and the government ended the consideration of those bills at the stage they were at at the time.

Having done so, it started a new session and now it is saying: "Well, we are going to pretend we did not do what we did. We are going to pretend we did not prorogue the session in relation to these five bills. We are going to reinstate them and we are putting them back where they were. One of them was passed by the House of Commons. We are going to say it is passed again, and pretend there was no prorogation".

The government made the choice to prorogue and now it is saying it will pretend it did not happen, at least on these bills. However on others it does not like, such as the gun control bill and the conflict of interest bill, it will just continue as though they are dead. It will do what it wants with them later and come up with new bills on those items.

Of course, we have not heard anything about conflict of interest. It was not mentioned in the throne speech. It was a big item during the election campaign in 1988, but we have seen absolutely nothing since. It is just like day care and all the other broken promises that this government has made over the years. I do not want to go through that kind of list.

Finally, I want to turn to one more point that the parliamentary secretary made in his argument. He said:

> Yes, we could go back and go through these five bills again. We could debate them once more at tremendous cost to the House in time, at tremendous cost to the taxpayers of Canada who are saying to us as members of this House: "Quit fooling around, get serious, do some business, cut out the partisan games".

The government has been talking all this non-partisan nonsense, saying that this House has to stop being so partisan. Then it comes and does a trick like this, breaching every parliamentary precedent, I suggest, that ever existed. It is breaking new ground, limiting debate and cutting members off from their opportunities to speak.

This House has not been slow in passing bills. This government has got away with closure something like 14 times already. This is the fifteenth time it has used closure in this Parliament. We have had bills moving through this place at record speeds.

The evidence of that, if the hon. member argues that point, is the number of lengthy adjournments we have had where the government has sent us away: "We do not have anything more that we have to do today. Thank you. You members can go home for a month or two months". That has gone on repeatedly in this Parliament. The hon. member knows that.

This government is a dry well, a dry hole when it comes to new innovative ideas. It has not got any. It does not want Parliament sitting here debating rehashed ideas and junk legislation which it is bringing forward to keep us occupied.

What it is doing is saying: "We will limit debate. We will jam everything through in three weeks and then our members can go home to try to revive their electoral fortunes". That is what is going on here. This is part of exactly the same game: ram the bills through five at a time in one motion like this, two days debate, and then some of them will never get discussed in the House and the others are at least at a stage where we can get the debate finished in two days. That is what is going on here.

The people of Canada are being hoodwinked by the parliamentary secretary's smooth talking words about non-partisanship in this House and the need to get together and co-operate on business. He says: "Co-operate as long as it is on my terms and if I suggest it, it is non-partisan. If it comes from the opposition, it is partisan, and we are not going to play those games". That is the kind of message we are getting from this government and it is dead wrong. It is cheating. It is deceiving the people of Canada.

We are not here to be told that our suggestions are partisan and the government's are not. No one is more of a partisan player in this House than the government House leader, and members on the other side know that perfectly well. His parliamentary secretary is falling into the same bag of tricks.

We on this side of the House will oppose this kind of abuse of the procedures and practices of this place.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to be speaking on this day, especially following the hon. member from Kingston who so eloquently put the argument about the nature of the debate we are having today.

Here we are debating a motion of closure dealing with bills from another Parliament. It seems to me that the decision the government has taken in this case is very, very peculiar and probably sets a very dangerous precedent for governments of that ilk down the road. Hopefully the only solace that the Canadian population can take in this is that the next government it elects to sit on the other side of the House and support the will and the needs of the people is going to be a government which cares about the people, understands democracy and will produce what the people want.

Under the leadership of Prime Minister McLaughlin we expect that is exactly what will be delivered.

The matter has seriously been addressed by my colleague from Kamloops and by other members who have spoken today. I want to add a few words specifically about one of the bills included in this list before us. That is specifically Bill C–78, the environmental assessment legislation, which I consider to be the most important piece of legislation that this government could deal with either now or in the future.

We are trying to deal with that legislation now. We had dealt with a considerable amount of witnesses' testimony and work that was put into Bill C–78 in the previous session. I am totally surprised that the government would seek to reintroduce Bill C–78 as if no testimony and no work had been done on that legislation. Virtually every witness who appeared before the committee argued strongly—and I was on that committee—for substantial amendments to Bill C–78. Almost every witness who appeared before us provided us with many pieces of paper containing strongly worded, very technical amendments to Bill C–78.

I brought with me today just one–third of the briefs of witnesses' testimony that appeared before us.

• (1730)

These were witnesses such as the West Coast Environmental Law Association, the Canadian Bar Association, the Rassion Academy of Aquatic Science, the Canadian Environmental Law Association, the Sierra Club, the Canadian Wildlife Federation, and a whole host of others.

They were witnesses who came to us and not only said that this bill needed amendment but suggested the amendments to us.

I am quite surprised that the government decided to reintroduce this bill because even members of the department were indicating that the bill would have to be amended.

I am not normally a betting man, but I am willing to bet that when this bill comes back before us the government is going to make some amendments to it because of the evidence that it has heard and agreed to.

This was an ideal opportunity for this government. It was an opportunity which it has completely missed, an opportunity to take the wealth of information that was presented to us, to review Bill C–78 in the context in which this evidence was presented and redraft the most important bill that this Parliament is going to have to deal with, rewrite it and present it to us in a new form, a form that perhaps the members of the opposition could accept and deal with quickly because of its importance.

Is the government going to take the opportunity given to it with the proroguing of Parliament? No. It is going to sit back and, in the lazy–handed way that it has dealt with this legislation so far, it is simply going to throw it back on the table and then take its lumps on it.

There are going to be a lot of lumps on this one, because you cannot compromise on the environment in Canada. The people of Canada and certainly the New Democratic Party are not going to sit here and allow this to happen without expressing concern.

Bill C–78 is a fatally flawed piece of legislation and it has been told to us, as I indicated, by many who appeared before us.

I have a couple of comments that I want to put on record from the Canadian Environmental Law Reports. They relate to an article that appeared in the March 1991 issue, written by Ted Schrecker who, according to this, is with the Department of Political Science at the University of Western Ontario.

He talks about the substantial need to amend the bill as well, arguing that the legislation in front of us is actually weaker than the environmental guidelines which have caused this government such incredible distress over the course of the last year on things such as the Rafferty–Alameda dam in Saskatchewan, the Oldman River in Alberta, and the James Bay II project in northern Quebec.

Because of lack of time and because the arguments are so extensive, I jump to the conclusion of this piece by Ted Schrecker.

He concludes: "It is hard to escape the conclusion that it would be preferable were the government to scrap the legislation". After reviewing and examining all the contents of Bill C–78, he concludes it would be better to scrap the whole thing, start over again and deal with a real commitment to the environment.

The government had many opportunities, some of which even I presented to it, to deal with Bill C–78, to substantially amend it and to rewrite the bill so that we could deal with it in this House.

Prior to the prorogation of Parliament, after the suggestions of the Minister of the Environment I presented to the Department of the Environment and to the committee studying Bill C–78 my own 111 amendments, which I considered minimal to salvaging the existing bill.

The government has had many weeks to examine the amendments that I and others have put forward, but I would like to consider that it would at least look at the ones that I, a parliamentarian and a member of the study committee, put forward. These amendments could have created a very substantial and stronger bill.

Some of the changes included in the 111 amendments which I gave to the government are as simple as the establishment of a parliamentary auditor on sustainable development, and the inclusion of the words "sustainable development" in the preamble of the bill. That is something not very difficult to do, but it does not exist in the existing bill.

The government had the opportunity to present a brand new bill into this House, and it chose not to.

My amendments also wanted to include all areas of federal jurisdiction within the context of environmental assessments. That means expanding it to include Crown corporations and foreign aid programs of this government. My amendments also included the ability to order parties to comply with mediated agreements. There are all sorts of provisions in this legislation which call for mediated agreements, but there is no compliance required. What good is mediation if it can be ignored?

The legislation in front of us right now does not have any provisions to allow for a halt to any project should it be found to be environmentally damaging.

We can prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that a project will damage the environment, but unless the Minister of the Environment has the political will to move, the legislation does not provide any opportunity to halt the project or halt the damage being done or would be done to the environment. This is a major, a fatal flaw in the legislation that the government had an opportunity to correct and chose not to.

I am also suggesting we close a lot of the loopholes in the legislation that give broad discretion to the minister to exempt virtually anything he wants from the assessment and to include joint federal–provincial endeavours under the terms of the existing legislation.

I also wanted to see intervener funding included in this act because it talks about public participation, but public participation cannot occur unless the public has the funds to participate in that project.

Most important to me, I would like to greatly expand the aboriginal rights provisions in the context of environmental protection and ensure that they are written directly into the act so that there would be no guessing, no need for interpretation of what aboriginal rights means in terms of the application of environmental assessment to land not only held for the Indian people, but also land in which the Indian people themselves have an interest.

I would also like to ask the government to include, through my amendments, the power to force groups or developers to participate in the process and abide by the decisions. In other words, there are no provisions in this act that actually would force a developer to work through the environmental process. To me, that is very important in all of this.

I would be very interested to hear the Minister of the Environment or the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment, who sat through most if not all of the committee hearings on this bill, come into the Chamber and argue in this debate why Bill C–78 has to be brought back in in its original form. I cannot believe that either the new Minister of the Environment or the parliamentary secretary could actually stand and defend the bill as it stands now.

The testimony has been overwhelmingly against the bill as it exists. The department is planning a significant number of amendments to this legislations which will substantially improve it. Perhaps their amendments will not be ones that I will agree with wholeheartedly, but they are amendments that will take the bill from .0 to at least .5 on a scale of 10 in terms of acceptability to the Canadian environmental community.

• (1740)

The bill as it stands is a big zero and the testimony says: "Throw it out or substantially amend it". The government has indicated a need or desire to amend it, but instead it brings it back and it includes it in this package which, very peculiar as it is, is put in front of us to look at holus-bolus. I do not want government members in the Chamber today who are looking at this list to say: "We have done all this work. How can we afford to lose it? Bring back the bill and start up where you left off".

Where we left off on Bill C-78 was precisely the point which said: "Start over. We have the evidence which shows us how to do that, so start over". The government gave up that chance, gave up that opportunity, and just decided in its lazy fashion to bring it back, introduce a couple of amendments hopefully to appease the members of the environmental community and then get on with business.

In the meantime, we are going to continue to have massive developments in this country go without adequate environmental assessments. We are going to have parts of our environment, sea, land and air, subjected to environmental catastrophes that need not happen if we have the proper and adequate legislation in place to deal with it before the dangerous times occur. That is what Bill C-78 is supposed to do: to get in before something happens, not after.

This government is great at dealing in crisis. It is in crisis constantly but, by golly, we have to do something and this is a legislative opportunity to prevent a crisis from occurring. As far as the environment is concerned, there is nothing more important.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to this motion. I have two major points to make: one general and one specific.

My general point really echoes the arguments of my colleague who spoke earlier today and spoke so eloquently, the member for Kingston and the Islands. He talked about the unprecedented action of this government in taking bills that had died on the Order Paper of the last Parliament and ramming them through, doing something which has never been done in this House in its 124-year history and, indeed, for which no precedent can be found in the British House of Commons in its nearly 1,000-year history.

I can only say that the government should hang its head in shame. One wonders today why the government prorogued the House of Commons last time. Why did it prorogue? We heard a Speech from the Throne which did not appear to tell us anything new or different. It did not appear to give us any new blueprint for Canadians. It was remarkably low on specifics about its program. Yet we had the prorogation. One presumes it was because the government wanted to get away from here, take some time, regroup and come back with some fresh ideas.

Instead of fresh ideas, we have today this pernicious—and I underline that word—motion of the House leader ramming through five bills. We are just supposed to pretend that prorogation did not take place. We are just supposed to accept the government's decision that these bills will come to this Parliament in the state in which they were supposed to have died in the last Parliament.

My learned colleague from Kingston and the Islands, although only in this House as I have been for two and a half years, not six, is certainly much more of an expert on procedure than I am.

There is one thing which has taken up, to some degree, our time here in this House recently, time that all of us as members of Parliament on both sides of the House have used in talking to the media. It has been discussed on television and in the newspapers across the country. It is the theory of a less partisan style of politics in the House of Commons.

I believe it was here, in this very House, that Sir Winston Churchill responded to the question of the neck of England being wrung like a chicken by saying: "Some chicken, some neck". If I may paraphrase Mr. Churchill, if I may take the liberty of doing so, may I say to the government members present: "Some form of non-partisanship". If this is the best that can be done, I am afraid that the people of Canada, already disappointed with the direction in which their government is leading them, will only have that disappointment increased to a point of absolute disbelief and disrespect for this venerable institution, the House of Commons.

We, on the opposition side of the House, have listened to the pious mouthings on the other side, about how partisanship must be dropped in the best interests and the honour of the country. What happens today? Today five bills are being rammed through with the government's favourite Draconian measure, closure. This evening we will be forced to vote on these bills because of a total disregard for the history of this Chamber, for the tradition of British Parliaments and, most specifically, a contempt for the people who are represented by the members of this House.

I would like to get a little more specific. There is one bill among these five that is of particular interest to me as the member for Halifax, and indeed is of interest to all Atlantic Canadian members. I refer to that wonderful Bill C-26.

For those who are not quite so aware what Bill C-26 is about, let me refresh your memories. Bill C-26 is the bill that takes away the At and East grain subsidies, the subsidies to the Atlantic ports. Today in this House I heard the Minister of Transport say that this government would do everything possible, everything possible, to assist the beleaguered ports of Atlantic Canada, and particularly the port of my home city, Halifax.

The Port of Halifax has a long, honourable history. In 1749 Cornwallis founded that city. From 1749 until this government got its hands on it, the Port of Halifax thrived. Haligonians, because of their port and the spinoff from it, managed to survive in good times and bad. That is coming to an end because of the policy of this government.

For weeks now I and my colleague, the member for Dartmouth, have been pleading with the government to do something about the absolutely unacceptable situation in the Atlantic ports, and particularly the Port of Halifax. The unfairness of freight rates between Halifax and central Canada have been a rallying cry for Atlantic Canadians since Confederation.

We have talked a lot about what various people gave up when they entered into Confederation and what we sacrificed to become Canadians, what we are proud to have sacrificed to become Canadians, because being Canadian is, to us, the single most important facet of our lives. Being Canadian is intrinsic to our existence. It is what we stand for, it is what we believe in.

However, we are human. We know what we gave up in Confederation. One of the things that we in Atlantic Canada gave up, and particularly in Halifax and Nova Scotia, was the thriving north-south trade. We gave it up because we said: "We want to be part of this country. This country is important to us, we are committed to it and we will stay committed to it".

Look at the polls. From then until now, who have been the strongest federalists in this country? Who are the ones who remain most strongly committed to the concept of Canada? Every time—and my colleague from Newfoundland knows this—they are Atlantic Canadians. Atlantic Canadians believe in this country, they want this country to succeed, despite the fact that governments, and most particularly this government, seem to take some perverse pleasure in kicking us when we are down.

I refer again to the comments made today by the Minister of Transport. He said: "We will do all we can, all that is in our power". That is what he said. I heard him. You heard him, Mr. Speaker. You were there. He said: "We will do everything in our power to assist the Port of Halifax".

One of the things in the power of this government is to take Bill C-26 and consign it to the garbage can where it belongs. This bill has an interesting history. On July 15, 1989 the At and East subsidy was cancelled, flat out cancelled without legislative enablement. It was just cancelled. The government in its wisdom said: "That is it for the At and East. It is gone". Since that happened, the grain elevator in Saint John, New Brunswick has closed and the grain elevator in Halifax is working at a quarter its capacity.

Has there been a bill to enable this cancellation? No, indeed, or at least not passed. Bill C-26 was introduced in the very late fall of 1989 and immediately received strong opposition from this side of the House. I want to pay tribute to my colleague, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, who certainly increased my knowledge in the area of grain subsidies and the history of the At and East subsidy and its role in bringing Ontario grains to the Atlantic ports. Without the assistance of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, I would not have had the knowledge or learned the facts and figures I needed to know to make representation in committee and in this House against the cancellation of this subsidy. I definitely want to say thanks to him.

This bill went to a legislative committee. With my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex, and the support of witnesses in the grain industry and the transportation industry and the support of the mayors of Saint John, New Brunswick, Halifax and Dartmouth, we stopped this bill cold in the legislative committee. It stopped there. It did not come back for third reading. There was lots of time. This bill was stopped cold in the legislative committee months before last month's prorogation and the government did not attempt to bring it back.

What does the government do? It reintroduces the bill under this pernicious, and I use the word again, pernicious motion. Is it not interesting? Is it not ironic that on the same day, the very same day that the Minister of Transport says: "We will do everything in our power to assist the Atlantic Canadian ports, and in particular the Port of Halifax," that Bill C–26 raises its ugly head, the ghost of Christmas past. Bill C–26 is back here being rammed through with closure by this government.

If this is everything that is in the power of the Government of Canada to help the Port of Halifax, it is no wonder that the government party is at 8 per cent in the polls in Atlantic Canada, 8 per cent. I have been hearing for days and days that the Conservatives are at 14 per cent. Well, not in the Atlantic and Bill C–26 is part and parcel of the reason.

Atlantic Canadians are committed to this country. They are committed to federalism. A poll last week told us that Atlantic Canadians have the strongest belief in the country in bilingualism. Atlantic Canadians, the most tolerant people in this country, are absolutely right.

Atlantic Canadians have taken just about every brickbat and every bomb that the government can throw at them. However, there comes a point. The point has come with this bill not only being reintroduced when the government did not have the face to bring it in for third reading after its disgraceful behaviour in the legislative committee, but being rammed through, forced through on the same day that we hear these wonderful promises from the Minister of Transport. This is unacceptable. It is unacceptable to Atlantic Canadians.

All of us stand here in front of you—there are three members here from the Atlantic in the House now, my colleagues from Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba—and say: "This must stop". We have heard the eloquence of the member for Kingston and the Islands on the unprecedented behaviour of this Parliament, unprecedented in Canadian or British parliamentary history.

We have heard the eloquence of the member for LaSalle—Émard on the question of the environmental bill that is supported by virtually no one in the environmental sector in this country.

We will hear more, and we will hear it soon, but I say that if this government does not want to see people marching in the streets, this government had better look to its own advice. We are supposed to be in a less partisan House of Commons. The people of Canada know when the wool is being pulled over their eyes and they will not accept it.

The people of Canada understand when this government is trying to hide behind empty phrases and foolish words and at the same time is continuing to attack certain regions and certain sectors of this country. Mr. Speaker, 8 per cent; just wait. Very soon this government will deservedly be in a minus position.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, after the fine speech given by the member from Hamilton just a minute a go, it is hard to know where to continue on in this type of debate.

I guess what it brings to mind, and the reason for joining in, is that as the rules of the House of Commons were changed since the last session, it takes a while for the impact of these rules to begin to sink in for individual members, particularly those of us who are new to the House of Commons.

What has struck me, as I have watched the House reorganize itself, is just how democratic the motive behind these changes has been. I do not say that loosely and I do not say that without some sadness. I think it is important that the members of Parliament maintain their confidence in this institution and show Canadians how it can work.

When we returned and looked, for example, at the case of the reorganization of the committee system in the House of Commons, we found ourselves into one battle after another to make sure that people across this country had an opportunity to discuss the issues before a committee. We have found out that they are all cut back and have less of a mandate. They are not able to generate the discussions we thought they would at one time.

In the case of international human rights, we found it in fact to be cut entirely from the mandate of the human rights committee. I know there are many Canadians and groups such as Amnesty International, which yesterday celebrated its 30th anniversary, which look forward to having a chance to speak to a small group of parliamentarians in the subcommittee on international human rights. The fact that opportunity is being taken away from them because of the change in rules and the change in the structure of committees is something that will be regretted in the months to come.

I know too that in the health and welfare committee there is a great deal of concern. There are huge areas to be discussed, from poverty, to changes in the health care and income support systems in this country. If they do not have a broad representation from all the parties in the House of Commons and if they do not have an opportunity to listen to the groups coming in, they will be pushed very hard to develop the expert reports we have seen from the House of Commons committees in the last few years.

The House reconvened last week after the Speech from the Throne. I guess one of the reasons why the government does not wish to have this House sit as regularly as it did before is that it is watching the decline in the fortunes of the government since the House was reconvened. If we think back, it was only a few weeks ago that the House heard the Governor General in the Senate chamber deliver the Speech from the Throne, outlining all the commitments that the government was going to be making.

Then we found out within a few hours that in fact no matter what the government's publicly stated agenda was, it was breaking rules on immigration and the Prime Minister was on a trip overseas. It is similar to the one of the last Conservative Prime Minister whose government fell around the jokes created by a trip overseas to Asia. Here is our Prime Minister right now making as many errors and showing as bad judgment as his colleague, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. It is a government which has been plagued by stupid mistakes, by bad judgment, by not understanding the true wishes of Canadians to be governed responsibly. In changing the institutions, it simply wished to restructure the House instead of dealing with the real issue: if Canadians had a chance to deal with this government directly in a general election, these guys would be dismissed out of hand as being one of the most inappropriate and undemocratic governments seen in the history of this country.

Although we have to struggle to deal with the government every day in Question Period and try to show Canadians just how incompetent it is in so many areas, we must remind the country that we, too, share in the desire to see that the House is restored to being the focal point of public debate and to see that the rules are restored in a way that makes it not only easy to criticize the government, but easier to work together as a team on all sides of this House to produce good legislation.

The government decided to ask us to restore legislation, and it actually did that with several pieces of legislation, including the Railroad Act, the Young Offenders Act, an act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations, an act to establish a federal Environmental Assessment Process, an act to amend an act to provide for the appointment of a port warden. Some of these are small pieces of legislation and others are very important.

The government is operating in an undemocratic fashion by pushing these pieces of legislation forward for the last two years, rather than by going back and facing the basic faults in its legislation and facing the very serious and thoughtful amendments put forward by other members of the House of Commons, including my colleagues from Newfoundland and from Kingston and the Islands. The government wishes to start as if these amendments were never presented and the legislation is perfect.

The role of the opposition is to be a thoughtful opposition and a thoughtful critic of what the government is trying to do. But the lack of opportunity, as posed to us in this particular case, makes it very difficult for an opposition party to continue to deal with the government when we do not feel the government is being honest in its motives.

We could go through a number of these cases. Take, for example, just how controversial the Young Offenders Act is. You cannot deal with the Young Offenders Act in isolation.

In this country right now, we are going through a crisis on questions of safety and security. We find that Canadians are very concerned that they cannot walk down their streets. We have women who are extremely worried about violence in the home. We have, for the first time, reporting systems on violence against women. We have a caucus colleague here, who is supported by this caucus, who wants a royal commission on violence against women. There are several groups now, for example social policy and social planning groups across this country, which are interested in safety issues. The Young Offenders Act is sort of the tip of the iceberg. But if this government only wants us to deal with the tip of the iceberg, how will we ever get at the heart of the matter?

We see the reports from Statistics Canada this week that violent crime is up dramatically in almost every Canadian city, with the exception of Toronto. We read in the newspapers of this rise in crime—such as today, about a couple of particularly violent people who are allowed to be out on parole—and that upsets Canadians.

We cannot deal with the issue of safety and security by only dealing with the issue of criminality. The issue of security is that of using the role of the federal government to make sure that our society is safer and to make sure our larger cities are safer. Jail is the end product of a system which is unsafe. It makes people in this country feel unsafe in their daily activities, whether it is walking to work, walking home in the evening, living in an apartment by oneself, being an elderly person going out on payday when the old age cheque comes in, or on payday if they are between 55 and 65, and finding themselves in confrontation with people who wish to take away their grocery money.

In our city this happens frequently. We need to reach out, but we cannot reach out if the government presents us with situations where we cannot have good discussions about this. If you take away the committee system and if you take away opportunities to debate specific pieces of legislation brought forward , then we are left dealing with the end product of a bad system and not the system itself.

Let me continue on for a minute with the question of safety. If you want to deal with the question of young offenders, you have to deal with gangs, race relations, employment opportunities and training and education issues. There are a whole number of things which come into play. The fact that they have failed is the reason that we have to deal with the issue of the Young Offenders Act.

The government came back to us and said: "We consider this to be all finished. It has passed report stage." We said: "Well just a minute. Let us discuss what we are trying to do here in the House. Let us listen to Canadians. Let us realize that Canadians are looking at safety for an unsafe city and nobody is there to protect them. We would like to use this opportunity to expand discussion, to see that our amendments are taken seriously and produce a wider debate in this House of Commons."

In the case of the federal environmental assessment, this party has taken the environmental process as being the benchmark of good government. When the so–called green plan was put forward we stood up in this House and, at that time, said: "This is a fraudulent process. It is not well thought out in its legislative framework. There has not been consultation with groups and with the provinces, and the minister does not know what the government really means by certain sections. We do not even think the money is in place." We stopped and said: "Let's review this environmental review process because this is a test of faith among Canadians for how the system should be working."

If you ask Canadians what really makes them proud in this country they will tell you that the one thing that makes them the most proud is the great sense of wilderness, the unspoiled space. We have a country so large and so full of resources that they do not want to see it put at risk. They ask the federal government to please show leadership. They ask the government not to get into discussions on devolution but to show leadership and assert the federal assessment process on environmental matters.

The government provides a piece of legislation which is very weak and one in which the Canadian people do not have confidence.

If you watched television last week, The Journal on CBC, you would have seen the treatment of the B.C. forests. It may not be the scare scenario sent out by German television but let us assume that there is a problem there. Where is the environmental review process? The famous dam in Saskatchewan which has led to several court cases, the Rafferty-Alameda dam, is another example of the federal government's flawed process.

We find that there are people who now have to take the federal government to court over the Oldman dam in Alberta.

We could go across the country, one province after the other. We could look at the future developments in northern Quebec, northern Ontario and northern Manitoba. The purpose of the opposition is not to obstruct government but to co-operate with the government when the interests of Canadians have been thought about and taken into account. We all heard in our constituencies that people are concerned about the integrity of government and integrity in the governmental process.

Do we hear a thoughtful response to integrity? No, not at all. What do we hear?

An hon. member: The government does not even know the word.

Mr. Walker: It is a faint memory from its parents and it certainly has lost it. The government does not know that Canadians do not want to hear about more things being rammed down their throats. They want this government out and if the government is going to stay, they want at least a few responsible pieces of legislation.

The member for Kingston and the Islands, who is our watchdog on the way that this government tries to ram one thing down our throats after another, can tell the Canadian people that so many pieces of flawed legislation are presented to this House of Commons that it is a record in Canadian history. Because of the influence of members such as this, we strive to review pieces of legislation and to improve them. We want to see a better environmental review process. That is why we are forcing the government today to explain to us, more clearly, why it does not want to start over again and produce a better piece of legislation but rather wants to push ahead.

My guess is that its green plan is to fill all those green seats over there with the Conservatives. It does not care about the green of Canada, it cares about the green on the government side.

• (1810)

I want to say that there are going to be a lot of empty spaces there after the next election. That is going to be green for Canadians because all the members sitting there are going to be gone. They are going to be gone because they are irresponsible. They are going to have to face the music.

All these pieces of legislation that have been presented, including the ones today to be hurried up, are just going to be a testimony to how little they understood what was going on in the country.

When the Prime Minister returns from his overseas trip—and trip is a good acronym for what he is doing; he is falling all over himself and being a total embarrassment to all Canadians—he is going to find out once again that the measures of the people he left in charge are being rejected by Canadians. What people want is a working organization.

There was grand talk in the Speech from the Throne about the reform of Parliament. There were discussions about free votes, about making Parliament a more responsible organization. There was an expression when I was in university which said: "The next day is the first day of your life." Today has to be the first day. If you are going to reform Parliament, do not wait for a report from a committee. Do not wait for some grand scheme from the Prime Minister's Office or the Privy Council Office. Start out by saying: "Today we are going to do things differently. Today we are going to respect Parliament. Today if the opposition wants to bring to the attention of the government that these pieces of legislation should be reviewed, we are going to take them seriously. We are not going to just jam them down everybody's throat".

When we hear and see the government taking this seriously, then we will know that in fact we have a more democratic institution.

As I think about these issues and as I look for signs from my colleagues as to whether we will be successful today in stopping the government in its actions, I can hope that many more will join me in speaking out against the government's actions. We will be able to see that each and every one of these pieces of legislation today will be returned to the committees and to the proper stages for full consideration, and that the precedent of ramming these things down our throats will be stopped.

There are many other things I could refer to, but I see there are many colleagues who wish to join me in this debate. I thank you for the opportunity to ask the government to stop what it is doing and to reconsider the arbitrary nature of the new rules of the House of Commons.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take advantage of this opportunity to join in the debate this evening with my colleagues from Winnipeg, Kingston and The Islands and with others in the House.

We see the decision by the government today to put this motion before the House as the confirmation of the destruction, and that is what it is, of our parliamentary system of government.

We have heard a lot of talk in the last few weeks, including discussion in the throne speech—

Mr. Walker: On a point of order. Could the Speaker indicate who is representing the government in the House right now?

An hon. member: Riding roughshod over Parliament.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think it is against the rules and precedents of this House to call attention to the presence or absence of members. The previous comment was out of order, I believe.

Mr. Dionne: It is also mandatory that a minister of the Crown be in his seat at all times when Parliament is in session.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: All afternoon there has been no minister in this Chamber.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I just want to confirm and support completely my hon. friend from Northumberland—Miramichi.

The nerve of the government Whip. He has a lot of nerve, and he can use it in his own government caucus. We are debating the motion before the House, which is a complete abrogation of tradition and history of this House.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order! I think members from both sides have had an opportunity to raise points of order and messages were sent back and forth. The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte has the floor again.

[English]

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I think the points of order that have been raised illustrate the point that I tried to make at the beginning of my speech. That is the following.

Parliament is being systematically destroyed by the government. Canadians watching this debate are wondering what the fuss is. The Government of Canada has introduced a motion putting a series of bills that died on the Order Paper at various stages of progress in the last Parliament before this Parliament, after a new throne speech, and has deemed those bills to be reintroduced at whatever position or progress they had made in the last Parliament.

In hundreds of years of evolution of parliamentary government, such a motion has never been put before any parliament anywhere in the British parliamentary system because it is a form of executive dictatorship.

It is a government saying: "It is does not matter whether Parliament has proposed,"—government proposes and Parliament disposes—"we are going to introduce these bills. We are going to deem them to have been already considered by this Parliament and we are going to dispose of them in advance of a proper examination of the legislative matters put before the Parliament of Canada."

This government has been talking about trying to introduce a measure of civility into Parliament. It is trying to introduce a measure of non-partisanship in Parliament. That is what it has talked about. What it is really talking about is: Will you give a particular party, the governing party, a break? Will you be gentle as we go into the night with a particular party, the governing party?

This governing party should not ask for gentleness from the opposition. It should not ask for understanding from the opposition. It should not ask for compliance from the opposition. It should not ask the opposition to accept being manipulated by the governing party when the institution is being destroyed. Parliament is being destroyed by the governing party today.

That is why Canadians are cynical. Canadians have a profound sense of fair play. It does not matter whether you are talking about a Canadian on the farthest point on the east coast on the craggiest rock in Newfoundland or a Canadian in St. Louis du Ha Ha, Quebec or a Canadian in Prince George, British Columbia. They understand the institution.

They understand that this is the place that belongs to the commoners. It does not belong to the Prime Minister in his ornate chambers at 24 Sussex. It does not belong to the Leader of the Opposition and it does not belong to the leader of the third party. It does not belong to independence. It does not belong to corporate Canada and it does not belong to Bob White.

It belongs to the people. Any time you tear up the rules of Parliament, any time you take short-cuts in Parliament, any time you say that hundreds of years of tradition of Parliament can be done away with, you do not short-change the opposition. You do not-short change corporate Canada.

• (1820)

You don't short-change the Canadian Federation of Labour. You don't short-change me. You short-change the people, because it is their institution. It is their Chamber, to ensure that their voice is heard and they have a chance to comment on the decisions of the governing party of the day.

The governing party of the day regrettably for the country—a country in desperate need of leadership on the constitutional front, a country in desperate need of leadership on the economic front— does not have the confidence of the people. Even as a member of the opposition, one who wants to replace the governing party, I say it is regrettable for Canada that at this time in our history only 14 per cent or 12 per cent or 8 per cent of Canadians have confidence in the government of the day.

What does this government do? Does it attempt to lay bare before the people of Canada its agenda? Does it attempt to persuade the people of Canada and the elected representatives of the people of Canada of the value of its agenda? Does it say that it has a vision for Canada and such a profound belief in our vision for Canada that we are prepared to debate it and to defend it?

No. It uses the tyranny of the majority. It uses the temporary trust given to this party as a consequence of an election two and a half or three years ago to bulldoze its legislative measures through the Parliament of Canada, to deny the people of Canada a chance to be heard, to deny the elected representatives of the people of Canada—not an opportunity to speak, but their obligation to speak, their responsibility to be heard in the proper examination of bills.

We may as well be blunt in this Chamber. What do we have? We have in Canada today the worst possible combination of governmental systems. We have a Prime Minister who wants a presidential system, a Prime Minister who wants to rule with absolute power and who assumes that the members of the Conservative Party are automatically supporters of every government measure, a Prime Minister who takes for granted that the members of the Conservative Party will support any and every government measure, a Prime Minister who sees not a Parliament with all it entails but sees purely a majority, a Prime Minister who has hauled off the velvet glove and exposed a brutal fist of a party with a majority in a parliamentary system, and who wants to behave in a presidential fashion.

However, a president who attempts to act in that fashion has imposed upon him the checks and balances of a congressional system. He is subject to the veto of a congressional system. There is no veto in this place. The greatest power belonging to the people in this place is the power of public opinion. The only ability the opposition has to represent the people is through Question Period and debate. We do not have the ability to out-vote the government. No matter what is proposed, we do not have the ability to stop the government. Only an appeal to public opinion, only in examining legislation in detail to point out its flaws and suggest improvements and put pressure on the government through an appeal to public opinion can opposition parliamentarians influence the government.

We cannot out-vote the government. No matter what it proposes, we can only expose its program and examine it.

If we take away that ability to expose, to examine, to debate, to propose amendments, to make changes, to seek to improve, to stop dead in its tracks what is worthy of being stopped dead in its tracks, we do not have a Parliament any more. We have a lovely gilded Chamber, rich and ornate, reflecting the history and evolution of the country, but absolutely neutered in its responsibility to reflect and echo the voice of the peoples of Canada in every region of this country.

That is what has happened today. This is serious business. As this governing party sinks deeper and deeper in the polls, it becomes increasingly removed from the people of Canada and from the values and views of the people of Canada, increasingly withdraws into Fortress Ottawa, increasingly withdraws into its offices and the sheltered existence of a member of Parliament, a particular one who cannot go home any more.

As this party finds itself reduced to that state, it increasingly takes away from Parliament and from the people the responsibilities of members to be heard. It shuts this place down.

What are we reduced to? We are reduced to the Speaker sitting in his chair presiding over a debate, quietly, pleasantly nodding his head, hoping for order. We are reduced to members like myself and others in the opposition, the independent member from Nova Scotia, feeling a burning sense of outrage, and raising our voices in anger, hoping that our anger will reverberate, resonate, and echo across this land because only the people can put a stop to this tyranny.

We are reduced to government members not even caring in the face of this unprecedented action, not even caring about the destruction of the institution, hidden away in their offices, wondering whether they have any future after this Parliament.

Where are the media? Well, if it cannot be said in four sentences, if it cannot be reduced to an eight-second television clip, if it cannot be reported as a sensational front-page headline, if the story cannot be told in the space given to a columnist, newspaper journalist, or a television reporter then it is a story not worth telling. The story that is unfolding in this Parliament today does not make an easy headline. It cannot be described in an eight-second clip. It is the story of the destruction of a tradition that is 800 years old, the British parliamentary tradition.

It is the end of the bloodless revolution. It is a bloodless counter-revolution bred by indifference when the institution is dismantled, regrettably with the acquiescence of the Chair. I hope that members are paying attention to this debate, particularly members who are here for the first term. I have only been here a short while, a little more than a decade. It does not take long to begin to understand that the statues out on the grounds of Parliament Hill, of McGee and Diefenbaker, Pearson, St. Laurent and Laurier, leaders of this country, are more than just bronze relics collecting dust. They are part of the institutional memory of this place. They stand and give testimony to the struggle to build a country. The one behind the Library of Parliament, of McGee, who died at 43, is a testimony to the struggle for Confederation itself, to the contract entered into by many peoples, to the institution in which the voice of a country could be heard.

Those kinds of parliamentarians would be absolutely outraged, would feel a sense of betrayal. They would suggest, I am sure, that what is being done today by the government in the name of efficiency, in the name of making it easier, in the name of ducking one's responsibilities, is a betrayal of the parliamentary evolution in this country.

I hope Canadians will understand that the debate today is not a procedural argument. The debate today is not about whether the government should have an easy time reintroducing four or five bills. The debate today is not about whether or not the government should have an easy time reintroducing four or five bills. The debate today is not about whether or not the opposition has been denied some ability to tackle in greater measure four or five pieces of legislation. The debate today is about whether or not a government half way through its term, a government at record low levels in the polls, a government showing record disdain for the views of the people and the Parliament of this country will be allowed in the interest of its own partisan convenience to destroy hundreds of years of parliamentary tradition.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you the people of Canada, when they become aware of what is happening here today and when they become aware that their institution is being destroyed, will not stand for it. I say to you that unless this Prime Minister is absolutely convinced that his record is beyond redemption and therefore it makes no difference, unless this Prime Minister and this party want to wear the label of tyrants—dictatorial tyrants—in the history of this country, then the government should recant, come to its senses, withdraw this bill and show some basic respect for democracy, some respect for Parliament and ultimately, respect for the will of the people of Canada. It should withdraw this bill immediately.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I guess I am happy to participate in the debate. I am sorry the debate is here. I just want to share the views in perhaps a more restrained way than my hon. friend from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. I agree with almost everything he said.

I have sat here through this debate and I should be somewhere else, as most members should. It is a beautiful night outside here at the House of Commons in Ottawa. Summer has hit finally and most of us should be somewhere else.

I think the intervention of the hon. member for Miramichi, who is a member of longstanding, who pinpointed and really cuffed the ears of the government Whip, illustrates the reason why I wanted to participate in the debate on this motion. I argued before the Speaker made his ruling that this is one of the more fundamental rulings that, as far as I am concerned, has ever been made by the Chair, which is going over a period of time. The precedent that this sets will affect in a most adverse way the whole reason why we are here.

Number one, I will come down to the procedural point because, quite frankly, I want to take on the Chair. I just want to mention that I could not believe—I am just horrified—that the Chair made the ruling it made. It is the grossest interpretation of the rules that we have ever had. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the Chair forgot something.

We had a Prime Minister some years ago who wanted to do certain things in terms of our Constitution. He wanted to patriate it. Thank God he did. With all the criticism that he gets for having patriated the Constitution and the revision of history that in effect Quebec was left out—and of course, with a separatist government it was never going to sign anything—he at least brought our Constitution document back here. This gave us the opportunity to have something called Meech Lake.

Having said all that at one time, the Prime Minister, with the persuasion of premiers and/or public opinion decided to go to the Supreme Court to see if the Constitution Act 1982 was valid. The Supreme Court of Canada said, among other things in a most interesting decision, a little vague in some definition: "Oh, yes, Mr. Prime Minister of the Government of Canada, you can do what you are going to do but there is something called a convention. The convention says you should get some approval of the provinces".

Without going into that too far, this fundamental issue we are debating tonight, and I agree with my hon. friend from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, is not the five or six bills that are there to be reinstated. We all know there is to be reinstatement. I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who, in effect, asked if there was a government minister in the House.

I know I am sort of moving around and have not zoned into what I want to say. But that intervention by the member for Winnipeg North Centre asking that simple but fundamental question about the whole parliamentary process: "Is there a minister of the Crown here?" and finding out there was none, illustrates the problem we are debating here in the House of Commons with this notice of motion.

I cannot believe it, knowing a lot of my good friends on the opposite side, that they have amnesia in terms of parliamentary tradition. I know tradition can suffocate us all, but it is not tradition for tradition's sake. It is tradition for the sake of the people. As has been said here before in the debate, the whole reason we exist is not to come here and make crazy speeches or stand up on points of order. It is to try to represent the people to see if the public purse is being spent in the way it should be spent, according to the mandate the public has given to the government and/or the bills given to the government.

The very fact that there is no minister of the Crown here responsible for the public purse is a denial of the very reason why we exist. I was going to be rather restrained earlier tonight, but we had the government Whip, who may be able to whip all the eunuchs on the government side into submission, having the nerve to come up here and try and defend this fact under another rule of the House. This may be debated another time because of the intervention of the member for York Centre. The very fact that the government Whip should have known better, but who obviously does not, is one of the reasons we are debating this notice of motion tonight. No government in the history of the Parliament of Canada, no government in the history of the Parliament of England has ever tried to have this motion debated in their respective Houses of Commons.

For some 20 years I sat as an hon. member of the opposition with a government party called the Progressive Conservatives, and I do not regret that too much. But, my goodness gracious, Mr. Speaker, if I had not bolted a year ago, I think I would have bolted tonight, when I heard the government Whip answering the member for Winnipeg North Centre on the fundamental reason why we are here: do we spend the public money in a proper way?

The whole essence of the thing is that it is not answered unless you at least go through the formality. We know the minister of the Crown here, and I am glad she is here—or another minister—is not going to really listen and/or take all the points of view. It is at least, however, a recognition of the principle of the power of the purse. The people send us here, pay us good money, give us good pensions, give us good perks and we are supposed to debate the public purse. My gosh, this is the first time in the 26 years I have been here that I have not seen a minister of the Crown to, in effect, defend the Crown, defend the spending of the public money, as the member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned.

The Associate Minister of Defence had better not laugh. She has a beautiful smile and she is a lovely person. But I am suggesting that one of the reasons the government is in total trouble today is because they do not understand certain basics. One of the basics is Parliament. The Prime Minister never earned his spurs. He did not come up through the ranks. He won the leadership of my party. I supported somebody else. That may have been part of my problem. But he never earned it, he never sat here. I agree we sit here too long.

But for the government Whip to come in here and try to justify the unjustifiable was something.

I am going to get down to the motion. I know the public watches this on television and they might not understand this. I quite agree with the earlier comments of other colleagues. I am not going to get into the different bills involved. Quite frankly, sitting in the opposition, understanding the procedures of the House, I have sometimes wondered: why do all bills die in a prorogation and then you have to bring them back?

• (1840)

This is why I am horrified by the Speaker's decision. There was a timetable with the opening of Parliament and a prorogation. The timetable was like a person going to the gallows, it helped to focus attention on the bills in question. We know a lot of bills go through by consent, others are debated too long, some are debated fairly, but then comes the end of Parliament. A summer recess is okay, but we come to a prorogation which is the termination of that session, historically—for 124 years in this Parliament—it was time to focus attention on what was left on the Order Paper. It was the time that government and opposition got together and, often by unanimous consent, agreed on a legislative package of bills which were read and approved.

I listened to my hon. friend, who is a good parliamentarian and one of the better, as far as I am concerned, from Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, make a very passionate speech about two or three hours ago condemning the government. I am not going to agree with everything he said because the opposition has to bear some of the responsibility for what we are facing tonight. The opposition has to decide when it is going to draw the proverbial line in the sand. When is the opposition going to stop agreeing and doing things by consent?

We cannot adjourn Parliament as we adjourned it three or four times in this most unusual year of Parliament–on, Parliament–off, Parliament adjourned, Parliament called back. In my experience I have never seen a more hiccup period of Parliament. We hiccup on for two or three weeks, then we hiccup off, then we take another lozenge and come back and hiccup this way and that. The opposition had better smarten up, it had better decide what it is going to agree on.

I know there is competition between Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and the other party which thinks it is going to be Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, regardless of what Premier Bob Rae is doing in Ontario—and I am not going to get into that of course—but the opposition has to decide before it agrees to adjourn. It has to say: "Okay, government House leader, we will agree to adjourn but what bills are we going to pass? What bills are we going to turn over to a new Parliament."

From what I understand as a result of some of the discussion and debate here today, I do not think that was discussed or defined very well. I am suggesting that the opposition had better start to decide whether it is an opposition to a government that it, from its point of view, quite properly, and from the public point of view, has properly condemned. It had better decide whether it is really going to oppose, not obstruct but oppose, or whether it is going to be a hypocrite and oppose in rhetoric and then cave in when the moment of truth comes.

I do not know if this debate is going to go its full course. I know that, from a government point of view, we used to discuss this. We would say: "Oh don't worry about the opposition, it is going to cave in at about eight o'clock or nine o'clock. Don't worry fellows, at eleven o'clock you will be able to catch your planes."

There is some of that feeling here tonight. The government will start to pick up its ears. Government members are as human as any of us in the opposition or in the independent row. I am the dean of the independents. They are all there to my left. I start the row here. They are all human and they do not like to be here either. They want to know if we are really serious or not. Already, when this motion was put this afternoon, I saw two chairpersons over here talking to opposition members, obviously looking for consent on certain things. Either the organizational committee is meeting tomorrow to set up the committees or whatever.

The opposition has to decide, if this government is as odious as it says and the public and polls believe, to oppose, not obstruct but oppose. The opposition cannot oppose by making a rhetorical speech in the House of Commons on rule changes. In effect, this opposition has already been sandbagged on the rule changes that came in before we got out on one of those hiccup pauses. It got bamboozled on the rule changes and now we have a motion like this and I really do not know if we are even going to carry the debate until eleven o'clock.

I will come back to what I said before, as Prime Minister Trudeau found out—and thank God he brought the Constitution back. I used to be a lawyer, and I am not going to argue with the Supreme Court decision about the convention, which in effect said: "Mr. Prime Minister, you can do what you are doing legally, but the convention says you should have some approval from the provinces."

There was another federal-provincial conference and we all know what happened. Thank God the Constitution came back, for which I give Prime Minister Trudeau full credit. All the talk about Meech Lake, all the things said by the present Prime Minister and his revision of history, is totally intellectually dishonest. If we had not had the repatriation of the Constitution, we never would have had the opportunity for Meech Lake, even though it was botched a year ago today. Even then, with the Prime Minister speaking, with a majority government, the Supreme Court said: "Hey, Mr. Prime Minister, there is such a thing as a convention".

I am fundamentally disappointed and sick in my heart that the Speaker of this House, a friend of mine, made a peremptory decision to allow this motion to stand in order. I said in the preliminary debate before he made his ruling that there are no precedents. I asked the government parliamentary secretary: "What precedent do you have for what you are trying to do"? The parliamentary secretary knew, and I knew before I asked the question, that there was no parliamentary principle. There was no parliamentary precedent to try to do what we are doing here.

I have been in Parliaments before where, by consent, before we prorogued we made a House order putting bills A, B, C, D and E in the same position in the new House as they were in the old House. Also, when the new House came in, by consent order, we agreed to elevate certain bills into the stage they were at before prorogation. All of them by consent. However, we have, this time, a complete abdication and ignorance of the fundamental parliamentary tradition allowing the opposition to speak and hold the Parliament and the government to a time clock—and if it does not beat the time clock and get all the bills through by prorogation it would be able to make a deal, or at least try to make a new deal, or it goes back to start again. That is the way the system works.

That was a convention of this House for 124 years. It was a convention, and is still a convention in the House of Commons in England, the Mother of Parliaments, for all its hundreds of years. Some may ridicule the member from Kamloops as the parliamentary secretary did in his rebuttal yesterday claiming that his argument was extreme. It is not extreme.

Once the government has this precedent on the books, why should it worry too much about what the opposition says at any time about any bill? It can say: "Let them debate until the cows come home. Then we will have a prorogation some time, and then we will bring in an omnibus and ominous motion to put all the bills that we, the government like, put them all in one hat and throw them into the House of Commons. With a majority government we do not have to worry about debating each individual bill. We can put them back on the Order Paper at whatever stage they are at".

That, to me, is a convention that breaches fundamental rules of this institution. I am sad that the Speaker has made that ruling that forces us to debate this issue tonight.

There are so many things that can be said. That type of ruling ignores the practical working of this House, just by what has happened tonight and for the government Whip to say what he said. I cannot draw attention to the interest of members. This is not a sexy issue in terms of the public but as far as I am concerned, this is one of the more fundamental rulings the Chair is ever going to make and I am sad. I have sat here and missed three opportunities to participate in a small way, knowing that the ruling has already been made and knowing full well that the government majority is going to have its day because you have turned the clock back and you really make this place a charade by this type of ruling.

I know it is useless to talk now. The government's motion will pass. I just hope the opposition decides to oppose and I hope the debate continues until the appointed hour when we vote. I hope that having been sand-bagged on the rules changes and on this notice of motion, somewhere in the collective opposition there is going to be a willingness to say to the government: "Hey, we know you have the numbers, but we are not going to give this by consent".

We all know, if you have been around here long enough, that three-quarters of the things done here are done by consent. I just cannot believe that having been sand-bagged on the rules changes, on this motion and some other matters that there is still going to be that receptive nature to do things by consent. The opposition has been whip-sawed enough and it should tell the government to change its ways because nothing is going to be done here by consent with this type of motion.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to speak on this motion, although, like the previous speaker, I am sorry that it is necessary to do it. I cannot match the eloquence of either the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants or the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte but I agree with the point they are making, that this motion of the government is a step toward destroying the power of Parliament as a place of real debate by people elected by the people of Canada.

It is only one step in a long process but what is happening, to put it briefly, is that the government has invented a totally new rule yesterday and today in Parliament. It never discussed the rule with the opposition, which was the usual way, until the last few years, of changing the rules. It just announced that it is going to do it differently. It had prorogued the last session, that is to say it ended it, and according to all the experience of centuries in this and other Parliaments, that means the legislation died. It could be brought in again and started afresh with fresh debate, and previous governments have used that system to good effect.

Now the government is just saying it is not going to bother with that, it is going to run five bills through, which have no connection with each other; five bills it wants through, in one motion, limiting the debate to one day by closure. In other words, each person gets a chance to speak for at most 20 minutes and he has to talk about five different bills which have nothing to do with each other. After people have spoken until eleven o'clock this night, it is over.

That is not by itself dictatorship but it is part of a pattern of dictatorship. I remember nine years ago when the same Tory party was in the opposition and it objected wildly to the then Liberal government doing something like that. The Liberal government brought in a motion to control or regulate the oil companies. The Tory party objected wildly on behalf of its friends in the oil companies and it shut down this House for two weeks. It hijacked this House by abusing a rule that was then customary. It was not written in the books. It was a customary rule. The Speaker, a member of the government party, had to uphold the rule until the opposition party blackmailed the whole House into agreeing to change the rule.

The rule was simply this: Because the opposition had demanded a recorded vote according to its rights, it refused to come in. It refused to re-enter the House to let the vote take place.

Nothing was done for two weeks in Parliament. This is the same Tory party that is now complaining that we debate things. "We waste time," it says "debating." It wasted two weeks doing nothing in order to blackmail the government party and the Speaker of that day into agreeing to change certain rules, including the rule that it had used to get those changes.

The rules were changed by agreement then and once since then. In the last three years this government has not wanted to waste time getting agreement to change the rules. It just lays it down and says: "This is how it is going to be. Like it or lump it." That is what it did yesterday, and the Speaker liked it.

We can lump it. That is the government's attitude. No more attempt to have rational discussion. Just: "We are the boss. Do what we tell you."

Debate is slowly being cut down to next to nothing. It means that the people who elected opposition members to speak for them in Parliament are being cut out of their voice. Bills will be passed so quickly that the public will not have any idea of what is happening because the newspapers do not publish the full detail of the bills.

A few people may find out but the general working public will not know what is being done to it by the government in Parliament with the opposition being more and more, month by month, gagged by this kind of rule change, one-sidedly.

Previous speakers have made that point, as I say, very powerfully and eloquently. I want simply to agree with them in that outline and then take the matter a little bit deeper.

Why is the government doing this? This government is clearly the ally or the tool of the Business Council on National Issues. This is a group formed in the mid-1970s. It is composed of 150 of the chief executive officers of the biggest corporations in Canada. They are worth, perhaps, $1 trillion, one thousand thousand million dollars. That is a lot of money in Canada.

Some of them are American-owned companies. They are calling the tune for this government. They asked for a free trade agreement, and they got it. They asked for cuts in the social programs, and they got it. Their third demand was for an increase in the military. We will see whether they get that.

In order to do what the Business Council on National Issues, made up of the richest corporations and the richest men in this country, is demanding, this government is using these more and more dictatorial measures.

It has rammed through the goods and services tax, which takes off the tax from the owners of property. Not one penny of the cost of the property of the manufacturing company is in the form of tax. Only the work of the workers turning steel into washing machines, leather into shoes or cloth into clothing is taxed in the goods and services tax.

The workers must pay more as workers and as consumers while the owners pay less. That has been the progress of this government for the last seven years and it was the progress of the government before it, but it did not move as quickly.

This government is dismantling Canada Post. It wants to privatize it so that it will enrich some of its friends who will be able to buy it up for a song. It is chopping down the unemployment insurance system which has established and stabilized the life of this country for 45 years.

It has completely withdrawn any government responsibility for the funding of it and it has stolen hundreds of millions of dollars out of it for training purposes which have nothing to do with the original mandate of unemployment insurance. There may be people out there in the public who will say "who cares?" The people on bread lines care. The working people who know that wages have gone down in the last 10 years care. The people in Toronto and metro Toronto who cannot buy a home, cannot rent a home, care what this government is doing to them.

There will be others, the comfortable ones, who will say: "Well, fair is fair; the Tories won the election in 1988". Was it fair? In the last two weeks of that election there were huge and expensive advertisements, the estimate is that they cost more than $50 million. That would be two or three times as much as the Tory party or any party would be allowed to spend in the constituency campaigns in 295 constituencies. That would have been illegal if it had been spent by the Tory party. It was not spent by the Tory party, it was spent by its friends in the Business Council on National Issues and by the subordinate groups of sometimes smaller businesses that it directs.

With the help of that $50 million spent by the richest people in Canada and in the United States on that last two weeks advertising campaign, letters were sent to their employees saying: "If free trade loses the election, you lose your job". That is quite a threat. I was shown some of the letters by working people in my riding.

With the help of that, this government now feels it can do anything it wants to do and tell the opposition to go jump in the lake. It can do anything that the Business Council on National Issues tells it to do on behalf of the richest class in this country, to the detriment of the working class in this country. By "working class" I do not mean people such as I was when I worked in a factory wearing dirty shirts and dirty jeans, working with dust and grease and ink, and so on; I mean all the workers, including the mental workers, school teachers, and many professionals who are becoming mobilized into the same situation as wage and salary workers. Almost all of them are being hurt by the changes this government is making in the laws. The government is ensuring its power to make those changes without opposition in this Parliament by the way it changes the rules.

When it comes to the next election, if it takes $100 million instead of $50 million to buy the advertisements and mislead and intimidate the public, the Business Council on National Issues will do it.

The richest class in this country has seized control of this government and it will not listen to the opposition or to the public. It believes—it is very confident, very cocky—that it can do it again and again throughout this Parliament and again in the next election.

Some of my colleagues have been saying: "You will not be back in the next election". One hundred million dollars can buy a lot of brainwashing, especially through the very powerful companies that own so much of the newspapers, radio and television, and that are destroying the small publishing companies, the small printing companies and the small weekly community newspapers which might have a more independent opinion. It is doing that through the GST and through extortionate raises in postage rates for small papers.

Parliament is not in itself the power in this country. Parliament is only an instrument, an instrument used by somebody. A few centuries ago when "Bad King John" thought he could do anything he liked, the barons got together, got him out on the island of Runnymede and presented the charter to him and said: "We would really like you to sign this". He looked around and he did not have enough of his own men to fight the barons and so he signed it, the Magna Carta. A few centuries later, King Charles I forgot about that. He thought he could tax people without the permission of Parliament. The English common people who fought the civil war cut off King Charles' head and established the principle that Parliament shall rule over taxation. No king or queen ever tried that again in England.

My friend says it was tried in the States.

We are getting this presidential style of executive power, copied in Canada by the present Prime Minister, from the dictatorial presidents of the United States: Reagan and Bush. It is done at the behest of the same rich corporations in the United States and in Canada. They are running the show and calling the tune.

Someday, and I do not think it can be very long, the people of Canada are going to decide that it is enough; electing people to Parliament is a waste of time. The Prime Minister senses, or his pollsters have told him, that the people are getting fed up with Parliament.

No wonder, when they see that the people who represent them are either on one side where they just vote like trained seals for anything the Prime Minister calls for, or are on this side where we are more and more gagged and cannot speak out against it to tell the public what is happening and to warn it of what is down the road.

The food banks are growing with people who cannot feed their children properly. Some people cannot find a decent place to live in our big cities. Four hundred thousand jobs have been lost as a result of the trade deal and the recession. The recession was made worse in Canada by the government's high tax policy, which was not to keep inflation down. Inflation was already down. The high interest policy and the high tax policy were to make sure that Canadian goods would not compete in the U.S. market and thus make the U.S. partners unhappy.

This makes the rich richer and the poor poorer. The working people in Canada, which forms the huge majority of the Canadian population, are not going to stand for it indefinitely.

Last summer a small handful of Indians got fed up with delays, and delays, and delays for 200 or 300 years in their land claims. The government turned out 4,000 Canadian troops against them. What will happen this summer? A month ago, the workers at Caterpillar Tractor in Brampton occupied the plant; a sit-in, in order to demand a better settlement than they had got from a company which was making high profits in Brampton but had decided to close down. Because of the free trade deal it was profitable to move to Alabama where unions are practically prohibited by law.

The Rae government of Ontario negotiated that situation to a peaceful conclusion. There was no violence at Caterpillar Tractor thanks to Bob Mackenzie, the Minister of Labour in the NDP government.

It does not change the situation, which is growing worse and worse for working people in Canada. It does not change the situation in which they see that it is no longer possible for them to express their will through elections which are perverted by third party advertising and through a House where the opposition is being gagged.

If this government continues to follow this course, it will build up the conviction in the people of Canada that they cannot do what they need to do for themselves through Parliament. They will have to use other means. That will be a sad and painful day for Canada. The responsibility for it rests on the people across the other side of the aisle.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have been in this place now for some 13 years. I have seen good days and I have seen bad days in the House of Commons. I have never seen a worse day than today. Unless we smarten up we are going to destroy our own institutions.

• (1910)

The government should be the custodian of Parliament and the opposition should be its watchdog. Today, this Parliament was treated by the Government of Canada in absolute and total contempt.

For hours this afternoon there was no minister of the Crown in this House. I am glad the Minister of Justice is here to hear what I am saying because she should be the one most concerned about how the laws of this country are promulgated.

Mr. Della Noce: Spit it out, spit it out.

Mr. Dionne: If you have something to say, Mister, get up and say it.

Maybe we need another Cromwell around here for a little while to clean out some of these people who have no respect for the democratic process.

Mr. Della Noce: We let you speak. That is democratic.

Mr. Dionne: You let me speak? I thought I had a right to speak in this place. I thought I had a right to speak anywhere in this country. You let me speak? You are damned right you let me speak, because you cannot stop me. If you want to try, come across here right now.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dionne: What we have seen today in this House should never be seen in this House. It is an absolute disgrace and it falls squarely on the so-called government of this country.

If we go on like this, bunching bills together, having one or two members of the government party sitting in this Chamber with no ministers here, no one accountable, then we are going to fall into anarchy. We have seen this happen over and over during this Parliament.

This has been, in my years in Parliament, the worst day of Parliament that I can remember.

An hon. member: That is right. They are arrogant.

Mr. Dionne: The arrogance of that crowd opposite is boundless. Not only if it does not like the rules does it abuse the rules, but it does not even have the good sense to try to change the rules properly.

What has gone on here today is very disturbing to anyone who has any notion of how this institution is to function and protect the fundamental rights of the citizens of this country.

The rights of the citizens of this country were not protected today when business of government was being carried on in this House without a minister present, with sometimes not even a member of the government in the House.

Mr. McDermid: Where were you?

Mr. Dionne: I was here, Sir.

Mr. McDermid: You were not here all the time.

Mr. Dionne: Where were you? You must have been wearing invisible clothes.

An hon. member: He just snuck in.

Mr. Dionne: It is obvious that there is not much point in saying anything to these people over here because they do not have any sensitivity for this institution.

If this institution falls because no one has stood up and spoken for the rights of the members of this Parliament, then every Canadian will have lost and we will have a system of anarchy.

From the Chair on down, we have to guide and guard the rights of the people in this Chamber and we have to ensure that the basic rules of this Chamber are adhered to and are enforced.

An hon. member: They are now.

Mr. Dionne: Not today they were not.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I was going to start off by saying that in the less than three years I have been in Parliament, I do not think I have witnessed heretofore the kind of anger I have witnessed tonight. There is a lot of anger on this side of the House. There is a lot of frustration. We saw the anger just a few moments ago.

I think I know my hon. colleague from Miramichi, and he is a gentleman. Rarely have I seen him raise his voice. Tonight we have seen it. It is a measure of the deep frustration and the deep anger that is felt on this side of the House.

We are dealing with very serious business here. We are dealing with a government that is deliberately gagging the opposition and showing utter contempt for this House and for our democratic institutions and for the people of Canada.

Mr. Milliken: Repugnant.

Mr. Harvard: Yes, as my colleague from Kingston and Islands says, it is repugnant. What it is doing is repugnant.

I have noticed that we have not had the pleasure or the benefit of any of the government members speaking to the issue.

Mr. Milliken: They are ashamed.

Mr. Harvard: Are they ashamed of their own measure? Are they ashamed of their own motion? I would have thought they would be proud of this and that they would stand up and support it and speak to it. No, they sit there silent. They say nothing. Absolutely, nothing.

An hon. member: Absolutely ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Harvard: I really think that is just another form of contempt of this House and of this Parliament.

What are we talking about here? We are talking about a pernicious motion that would allow this government to go back more than 100 years to the first Parliament and resurrect some bill that died in the first or tenth Parliament or twentieth Parliament. Resurrect that bill and just continue on with it at the stage at which it died.

I suppose that the government would say: "Oh, no, no, we would never do that. We would never do anything like that. After all, we have great respect for this institution. We have great respect for democracy."

It has done it. It has never been done in this country before. It has not been done in our Mother of Parliaments. The government feels it can do this. I think it tells us how out of touch this government is with the Canadian public. It is out of touch. All you have to do is read the papers, watch television, listen to radio and read the polls and you will discover how people feel about this government.

An hon. member: Fourteen per cent.

Mr. Harvard: It is totally and completely out of touch. What it is doing in the House here today is just another example of that. It would not do anything like this. No government would want to resurrect a bill that was deemed dead some time in the past. This is what this government is doing.

An hon. member: It does not have anything else to do.

Mr. Harvard: It seems to me that this government does not want any kind of opposition, no kind of irritant. If there is an irritant, if there is an obstacle, if there is an impediment to its juggernaut, then by God it is going to move it out of its way. It is so arrogant it believes that what it does is right. It is hardly even worth debate. If there is going to be any debate, it will not put up with it very long, because it has a Draconian device, a Draconian mechanism called closure. If you deign and if you dare say anything in opposition to the government's proposals or to its motions, it will cut you off.

• (1920)

It will gag you with something called closure. The government has used it over and over again.

I believe it has come to the end of the line and I know that it has come to the end of the public's tether. People are fed up. They are sick and tired of this arrogance, this approach.

When Canadians went to the polls in 1988, they elected a Parliament. They elected 295 representatives. Regardless of party stripe, they expected us to do a job. In the case of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party, who found themselves in opposition after the election, they expected us to do our job to fulfil the role of opposition. They want us to oppose. They want us to scrutinize. They want us to examine everything that this government does.

We are all imperfect human beings, but I do think that we try hard. The government obviously takes a different tack. It has a different idea. It apparently feels that when Canadians went to the polls and made their collective decision in 1988, they had elected a government with a full and complete mandate that was more or less a dictatorship. It did not have to pay attention to the traditions of this House. It did not have to pay attention to the opposition, to rules, or to regulations. After all, it was given this mandate, this right to rule, this right of Tory rule which should not be questioned.

Canadians disapprove of this style of government, they disapprove of it vigorously and they will show their disapproval at the next election.

A motion like this does not draw a lot of public attention. A motion like this should draw considerable public attention, but it does not. One of the reasons it does not is that we live in the television age and television relies on pictures with lots of action, lots of movement. Television does not like talking heads. Even if the talking heads make a lot of sense, television is not really interested.

We talk about this matter in the House of Commons and it is not going to turn Peter Mansbridge on, it is not going to turn his producer on. You can say the same for Lloyd Robertson and for the anchorperson over at Global. This is not good television. However, just because it is not good television does not detract from its importance. Not on your life.

We are talking about a tradition, a convention in the House that should be respected. After all, we have rights on this side of the House. We have a job to do and I would hope that this government would show some respect for the opposition. It can do its job. It can push through its agenda as much as it likes, but it should show respect for this side of the House.

The government may not realize it, but this side of the House is just as important as that side of the House. The government has its role, it has its function, and we have ours. Unfortunately, I think we find ourselves in a situation where, because of the kind of presidential system adopted by this Prime Minister and by this government, we do not have the sufficient checks in the system that we should have. Maybe the founders of our parliamentary system never thought we would come to this stage. Yet we have.

We are going to have to rethink this process. We cannot continue on with a government that continues to batter away at this House and batter away at its traditions. There is only so much there. After awhile there will be nothing left.

How far can the government take it? If the government in effect says to heck with this House, to heck with the opposition, to heck with precedent, if that is the view of the government, how much more down the road can it go? We all know how low it is in the polls. What if we have not had an election by the summer of 1993? What if we have not had an election by the fall of 1993?

An hon. member: Heaven forbid.

Mr. Harvard: According to the law of the land, we are supposed to have an election. Will this government find some reason to postpone the election? Will it find some reason? Is it possible that this government would decide, in its self-interest, that an election in the fall of 1993 would be an unfortunate irritant, an unfortunate obstacle? This may sound kind of apocalyptic, but if it can do whatever it likes with the traditions of the House, why not postpone an election? We might as well try the whole ball of wax.

I hope this debate can continue. I would hope that something would strike the government and it would realize, for once, that it has gone too far. It has really gone too far. This is an example of trampling on Parliament, trampling on the rights of the opposition, and of course by extension, trampling on all Canadians.

I suppose we should not be surprised. All we have to do is look at the record of the government. We can recall all the stories the government put out about the proposed free trade deal back in 1988 and how it was going to be a Godsend for us, it was heaven-sent to us. Of course, if we rejected the free trade agreement the country was going to fall apart, its economy was going to fall apart. Remember those days? Well, here it is, more than two years after the implementation of the FTA and yes, the economy is falling apart.

We are cognizant of what this government tells the public. What did it tell us about the goods and services tax? The then Minister of Finance told us that prices were going to go down. After all, manufacturers would not be paying the old 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax anymore. Of course, since they would not have to apply the old tax anymore, that saving would be passed on to the consumers. Remember that story? Remember how the government told us that story over and over again? Do not worry about the GST, it is the greatest thing since sliced bread. If we could only get rid of the old MST and apply the GST, it would do wonders, lower prices, boost the economy, increase exports. Remember all that? Remember that wonderful story the Tories told us. They went from one end of the country to the other and told us it over and over again. It did not matter what Canadians said. As many as 85 per cent of Canadians said: "We don't believe you. We think it is a pack of lies. We do not think manufacturers will pass on the savings, certainly not all of the savings. So we do not believe you." But the government said: "No, we are moving ahead. We are going to bull our way through this."

• (1930)

The government did move ahead despite all the petitions, protests, hearings and speeches in the House. Despite how bad the polls were against the GST, the government said: "No, we are going ahead with this bill." And they did.

Here it is, just a few months after the implementation of the GST, and what do we find? We are discovering surveys, which of course the government would like to question, which say prices are not going down, prices are going up. Why have the prices—or at least most of them—gone up? It is because—surprise, surprise, surprise—the manufacturers did not pass on the savings from the removal of the old manufacturers' sales tax. In other words, a lot of the manufacturers just took the 13.5 per cent and put it in their pocket.

That does not surprise me and I do not really think it surprises any Canadians, except maybe this government, particularly at a time when the economy was in recession. Why would beleaguered and besieged manufacturers not reach for anything, including the old manufacturers' sales tax or the removal of same, and take those savings and not pass them along to the consumers of Canada but put the money in their own pockets? It makes a lot of sense, particularly in an economy where you are trying to survive. So that is what the manufacturers did. It came to no surprise to anybody in the country except this government.

Mr. Speaker, I guess I am hoping against hope, but I would hope that the government would rethink this motion. It is a bad motion, it is going to hurt this Parliament and it is going to increase the cynicism that is felt in this country. People are already in a bad mood. They are in a sour mood. They are down on us. They are down on all of us. They are particularly down on the Prime Minister. All of us in this House feel that. We are all getting a blast from the people because of how Canadians feel about the Prime Minister and about this government.

I wish the government would do some rethinking because this place is very important, in fact this is the highest court in the land. This is really the place where the decisions should be made and this is where the voices of Canadians should be heard.

In my final words, I would love to hear the Conservatives stand up and defend this motion. I am prepared to stay here until the bells have to ring at eleven o'clock. I would be more than happy to hear what they say. I want to hear their defence of this motion, but I doubt whether they will be speaking. I wish they would withdraw this motion.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I usually begin my debate by saying how pleased I am to rise and address the motion before the House, but in this case the pleasure I would ordinarily take is less than normal here.

As I have watched and listened to the debate this evening, I have taken note of the absence of participation in the debate by members opposite. I am not suggesting that there are not members opposite, there are lots of them, but over the last couple of years, having had an opportunity to work with a lot of the members on the government side, I have a feeling, in fact I think I know, that they are a little cautious about participating in this debate tonight because I do not think any one of them can really articulate the reason why their government wishes to proceed in the way it is this evening. There is a feeling there, I can feel it on this side of the House, amidst all of the rhetoric that they are a little bashful about this. They may even be a little sad about it. But I would like to remind the House of six or seven lines from Beauchesne's, which may have been referred to earlier in debate, and I am sure members have read it all before. It is on page 1, chapter 1, paragraph 1. It is the first thing you read in Beauchesne's.

The paragraph recites what for all parliamentarians are the principles of parliamentary law. I know we have all heard it but I cannot get through my remarks without putting this on the record one more time. I know, Mr. Speaker, you have heard this many, many times. However, this particular paragraph articulates the principles of parliamentary law. I will just read it very quickly. The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law have always been kept steadily in view by the Canadian Parliament. These are:

> To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner—

There are two other items, but I cannot help but note that the cardinal, number one principle of parliamentary law, that I read when I first came to this place, "to protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority" is precisely the principle that is at stake here tonight. To be technically more precise, it is probably the issue that was at stake when the motion was first put and its propriety was debated here in the House.

I have to say respectfully that I am really in doubt as to whether or not the way the process was handled was really in the best interests of Parliament. I know the Speaker has made a ruling. I know that I and my colleagues are not in a position to challenge that ruling, but I really have a fear that something is out of order. What has happened here is that the government has proceeded in a way that I feel breaches that fundamental principle. It is one of three or four principles, all we have in this House to protect the minority—the rules and the principles. What is happening here tonight clearly breaches, tramples that first principle.

When Parliament set up shop here 123 years ago, it adopted a concept that had been in being for many years before that. I mentioned it before here in the House and others have. The process goes back to the year 1215 when the 25 bold barons went to the king and said: "I am sorry, you may not proceed in this manner any more without the approval of our group".

That group eventually became Parliament. Over time, the king developed his court and his councillors. The living modern vestige of those counsellors is today's Privy Council, the Privy Councillors, the king or queen's councillors, who sit in this House today.

I have believed for months now that the king's councillors who sit in this place have a very special role in this place. One of the things they do not do is tell Parliament what to do. They lead the government here but they don't act for the king here. They cannot do that because the king cannot come in to Parliament. That has been a rule of Parliament for many years.

When the Privy Councillors do something like they have done here today, representing the king—we have a new king, by the way, and we know who the new king is—they, as representing the king, are telling Parliament how it will structure its work. From their perspective, from the king's perspective, from the Privy Council's perspective, Parliament is an obstacle.

• (1940)

It is at best a means to an end, but usually it is an obstacle. I do not blame the government for viewing Parliament as an obstacle. Its job is to propose legislation and get it through the House.

What is really happening, and I know it was discussed earlier, is that the bills the government is proposing to be revived are, as I speak now and as things were yesterday and last week, dead. They did not exist except in the history books. The government is saying is that it wishes to take those bills that are dead and bring them into this Parliament and revive them just as they were before they were dead.

In addition, we are discussing closure here tonight. Closure is not the issue. It adds insult to injury that in making this proposal the government wishes to do it by closure. As ugly as closure is, it is not the closure issue I am discussing here. It is the concept of reviving bills that are dead.

Maybe some of this is my fault, and I will explain this in a minute. Maybe it is the fault of some of the other members that this has occurred. I recall about six or eight months ago proposing for discussion that private members' bills be revived in a new session of Parliament. There was a lot of favourable response to that at the time and there were reasons I made that proposal, but I will not go into that now. At the time one of the objections was that it could not be done because in a new session the old bills are all dead. The government bills, the private members' bills, and the motions are dead. They cannot be revived. It is a sacred principle. It cannot be done.

I did not accept it as a principle that could not be looked at again. I still do not say that the government could not re-address that principle, could not look at it more closely. I think we should in Parliament. We have an obligation to rethink the processes here. We are in a period of reform constitutionally. There is no reason we cannot rethink processes here in Parliament.

Now it is eight months later and the same people who told me it could not be done, that private members' bills could not be carried over, have now come to this House, and with the concurrence of the Speaker, are saying they can and will revive dead bills. Somebody has it wrong somewhere. Maybe I got it wrong then and maybe I have it wrong now, but I do not think so. I think the government has it wrong now.

There are five bills. One of them, Bill C–73, was in the last session a miscellaneous privatization bill. I spoke in the House, as did my colleagues on both sides of the House, and that bill died. As we began this session there was a sense that maybe there was some interest, some good reason to revive a bill that had gone a great distance in the House, had basically gone through the system and at the present time was capable of obtaining unanimous consent in the House for reintroduction. That consent was had.

Bill C–73 happens to be listed among the bills in this motion. I know the Speaker has deleted it from this motion because Bill C–73 has already been disposed of. That was all done with unanimous agreement. A few days ago I thought it looked rather good for Parliament to be able to get something like that done in isolation. Was I surprised to show up here in Ottawa last night to see what the government had done with this motion.

What is wrong with what the government has done? I will try to articulate it again.

The bill is dead. The five bills are dead and do not exist. We have rules in this House that regulate how we do our business. The whole system of rules includes the business of first reading, second reading, third reading, referral to a committee where appropriate and other procedures. Those procedures have been in existence for time immemorial; certainly since the beginning of this Parliament.

Those rules are in place. I do not know whether they are sacred rules, but they are real rules that we have followed forever in this House.

In view of the principle I read earlier in Beauchesne's about the need to protect the minority—that is not just the minority here but all minorities—how can the government proceed as if it did not matter and it was just another item of business? What if the government was to propose tomorrow that 10 new bills be simply adopted and be deemed to have been read three times and passed in this House?

If I am to take the Speaker's ruling today to mean that the government majority can do whatever it wants, then the government can do that too. Members opposite shake their heads. I say: why not? If the government can abandon the rules that dictate how we introduce and pass bills in this House and trample a fundamental principle of Parliament, if it can do that today, why can it not do it tomorrow? There is no rule. There is no principle that remains to protect us, the opposition, the minority. It does not exist. I cannot find it. What if the government did it? Let us wait and see.

I wish what was being proposed was a reform that had been discussed, debated which achieved a large consensus, maybe even unanimity. It is not a reform. It is retrograde and it is destructive and it comes from, not a lot of members in Parliament, but from cabinet, the Queen's Privy Councillors who sit in this Parliament.

This is a sad day and I know it will be revisited. I want my constituents to know that if there was anything I could do to stop this today, I would. That is why that principle supporting the minority is the number one item on the number one page in the number one chapter in our rules. However, there is nothing I can do. I can simply talk. I can debate. I can encourage members opposite to change their views.

In any event, I put that respectfully to the Chair and to my constituents. The rules have been breached and the rules that protect the minority have been breached, the rules in this House. To quote Sir Edmund Blake from 1873—I happened to read this last night in some casual reading I was doing and you have heard this before—he said: "The privileges of Parliament are the privileges of people and the rights of Parliament are the rights of the people".

It is not just our little group here on this side of the House of Commons that is affected by this. It is everybody on the street. There are some members of the public here in the House tonight.

I want to make a confession on behalf of a lot of members, including members opposite. In this year of a huge deficit, a huge national debt, the Canadian public expects all members of Parliament to embark on the very old process of budget estimates, reviewing the government's spending. This is a process that is integral to our oversight function in this House. I want the public to know that we will have a total of five days to review the billions of dollars of spending of this government.

• (1950)

That is a very cynical result of the prorogation that this government has just embarked on. I wish the members opposite well in their attempt to rewrite the rules of Parliament, to trample on the rights and privileges of the minority which we are. I wish them well. It is a sad day. I hope that, before the vote, some of them will change their minds.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to make some very brief submissions on the resolution before us.

I concur completely with my friend and colleague who just spoke. I concur completely with all my colleagues who have spoken, and I would go so far as to concur completely with the Independent Conservative member for Annapolis Valley—Hants from the province of Nova Scotia. He was his usual eloquent self, and he has a lot of experience in this House.

He was shocked. He was extremely shocked at the actions of this government, at what is taking place here. That drove him to stand up and give one of the finest speeches I have ever heard him deliver in the seven years that I have been here in the House.

My experience in this House does not match the experience of the member from Nova Scotia, but the point he was making is a point that has been repeated time and time again by members on this side of the House. The issue is very simple.

We are now in the Third Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament. What does all that mean? The Thirty-Fourth Parliament is the Parliament that was constituted as a result of a general election that took place two years ago when some people in this country made that terrible mistake and elected a Conservative government. They are the same people who wish they had the opportunity to withdraw their vote and vote again.

I will not be overly partisan with regard to this particular matter. We are in the Thirty-Fourth Parliament. I was initially elected to the Thirty-Third Parliament in 1984, on September 4, 1984. Mr. Speaker, I know that you were probably elected in the First Parliament back in 1867.

In every Parliament there are a number of sessions. What is a session of Parliament? A session of Parliament begins with a throne speech. I have heard a few throne speeches over the last seven years, and I heard another one a few weeks ago when the government said: "This is a new beginning. We are going to do this. We are going to do that. This is part of our program".

It was met with a big, huge yawn from one end of the country to the other. People in Canada said: "So what? Who cares? The government is incompetent. The government has lost the moral right to govern. We want an opportunity to turf this government out". In effect, the throne speech meant absolutely nothing.

In order to begin a new session of Parliament, other than the session that begins with the election of a new Parliament, we have to prorogue—not to be confused with pirogies. Mr. Speaker, you might be familiar with pirogies. We can eat pirogies but we cannot eat a prorogation.

Prorogation took place on May 12 of this year. Prorogation simply means that the government has completed an agenda that it set forth in the throne speech. It is turning the page and embarking on a new agenda. When that happens, the old agenda dies. It is the end of the old session. The Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament died and we started a new session.

There were a number of bills still on the Order Paper, six or seven pieces of legislation. Those pieces of legislation are not important for the purposes of this argument, except to say that they were at various stages of the legislative process. All were introduced. Some were debated at second reading. Others had gone to committee. Some had come back for third reading. I believe one or two may have been sent over to the other place where the beloved senators sit.

As a result of prorogation those bills should have died.

Some hon. members: They did die.

Mr. Nunziata: They did die as a matter of fact. They died but they were not buried. They ought to have been buried according to 124 years of Canadian parliamentary history. How many years of parliamentary history?

An hon. member: Eight hundred.

Mr. Nunziata: Eight hundred years of parliamentary history. If you go to the father of Parliaments in Great Britain, or should I say the person of Parliaments in Great Britain, and you go back 600, 700 or 800 years, you will not find a precedent, not a single, solitary precedent, no justification, no rationale, no legal jurisdiction at all, for what government members are trying to do.

What are they trying to do? They are trying to say: "Well, we prorogued but we were only half kidding. We were joking. We were pretending. We really are not starting a new session of Parliament. We want to complete the old session, because we do not want these bills to die. We want to perform mouth-to-mouth resuscitation and revive these bills", not reintroduce them as they ought to do. They should reintroduce them at first reading, proceed to second reading, to a legislative committee, back to this House for third reading, report stage and off to the Senate.

No, they want to revive or resuscitate these pieces of legislation at the stage they were at when they were supposed to die.

You have made a ruling, Mr. Speaker. It is not often that I disagree with a ruling that you have made, but I am afraid you have made a terrible mistake by concurring in the wishes of the government and allowing this process to take place. In a few short minutes, the bells will start ringing and the House will be called upon to decide whether the government can in effect revive those dead bills.

We know that the government has a majority. We know that the government members will filter in from all over Parliament Hill in order to vote. They will effectively allow those bills to be revived.

What are the consequences of this particular ruling and this particular procedure that is taking place? As I have indicated, there is no precedent. There is no tradition. There is no convention. What this government is doing is in effect trampling on the rights of the minority. Those of us in opposition have a responsibility under parliamentary tradition. We are Her Majesty's Loyal and Official Opposition. It is our role to oppose, to hold this government accountable, to provide alternatives to the government of the day.

By allowing government members to do what they are doing, we are being denied our rights in the opposition. What are those rights? Those rights include debating certain pieces of legislation. We have no opportunity to debate six or seven or eight pieces of legislation, if this motion carries.

Members opposite wake up and say: "Well, they have already been debated". They have not been debated in the Third Session of the Thirty–Fourth Parliament. They may have been debated in a previous session, but they have not been debated fully and completely. The parliamentary process will not be followed with respect to these eight pieces of legislation.

In effect, we are being denied the right to debate and we are being denied the right to vote on certain pieces of legislation. What kind of precedent will be set as a result of this? Today they want these five bills. What is to stop those characters opposite tomorrow from saying: "Well, when Joe Clark was Prime Minister, he had a good idea. When the present minister of constitutional affairs introduced this bill, it had reached second reading back in 1979, we thought it was a good idea. Why do we not revive that bill?" It may have gone to third reading, it may have gone to the Senate, but it died when the government died.

Well, it can effectively say, and the precedent will be set: "We like that piece of legislation so by a vote in the House," as we are about to do in a few short minutes, "let us revive that piece of legislation at the stage it was at in 1979." That is the precedent that is being set. In fact, this government, as a result of the precedent you set, Mr. Speaker, and because of what the government is trying to do, will be able to revive, resuscitate any piece of legislation that died over the last 124 years of Canadian parliamentary history.

Now is that due process? Is that in keeping with the Canadian parliamentary tradition? I submit it is not. You yourself, Mr. Speaker, are playing host today, yesterday and tomorrow to a group of parliamentarians from Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union. You invited them to visit our country so they could see how the parliamentary process works.

They are watching from the gallery and they are probably wondering what the heck is going on in the Canadian Parliament. This may have been possible under previous Communist regimes in the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia or Czechoslovakia, but not in Canada, not under Canadian parliamentary tradition. The power of the majority is being used in a summary and callous fashion to walk all over and destroy the rights of the minority.

Mr. Speaker, you were called upon to assist this government in trying to extricate itself from its own incompetence and mismanagement. It mismanaged the Second Session of the 34th Parliament. It was not able to adequately and appropriately govern. It made mistakes. If these bills were so important to this government, why did it prorogue the last session of this Parliament? The Conservatives should have completed their agenda and then come forward to the people of Canada with a new throne speech and a new vision for Canada.

We are now being asked to deal with the mismanagement of this government. I have seen a lot of mismanagement and incompetence over the last seven years from this Conservative government. I have seen, time and time again, the Conservative government trample on the rights of the opposition. I have seen closure motion after closure motion after closure motion. We objected on this side of the House and we objected. This is far worse than any closure motion that has ever been allowed in this House, in terms of the terrible and horrible precedent that this particular government motion will set. It ought not to have been allowed, but somehow the government was able to convince the Chair without citing a precedent. If we do not abide by the law of stare decisis, the law of precedent, then I do not know what is going on in terms of due process. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that in this place precedents play an extremely important role in the governing of the workings of this House and indeed the Canadian judicial system.

The government, when called upon by the opposition to cite one single precedent in the last 124 years of Canadian parliamentary history, was not able to cite one single solitary precedent. Yet, I do not know how the government did it, but it convinced the Chair that this motion was in order. We will be voting on it in a few short minutes.

I ask in closing that government members come to their senses in the few years and the few short months that remain in terms of the life of this government if they are to leave this place with any bit of respect from the people of Canada. If they have any iota of dignity, then let them at least preserve it. They have destroyed the country and now they are trying to destroy Parliament and the workings of Parliament.

I call upon decent, hard working Conservative members, if there are any across the way, to vote against this government motion that will set such a dangerous precedent for years to come in this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, in concluding a debate significant to the very survival of this House, I would like to say that on May 23, it was not the Opposition that decided to prorogue the House and have a Speech from the Throne. It was the government's decision. The government knew perfectly well that by proroguing the House and having a Speech from the Throne, all bills before the House would die on the Order Paper, ending the current session. The government would then be able to make a fresh start with a new agenda.

After the Speech from the Throne, we saw there was practically nothing on the government's agenda. And now it comes back with a number of bills we would have had plenty of time to consider if the government had been really interested and serious about the business of this House. After all, before the House was prorogued, we adjourned for nearly a month, and if we consider the number of days the House has sat so far in 1991, it is quite ludicrous.

With a new session, Canadians were expecting some new initiatives, a new agenda from the government that would put the economy back on its feet and restore national unity and the confidence of Canadians. Nothing happened, Mr. Speaker. His Excellency the Governor General read a good speech to an attentive audience, but there have been no bills or initiatives to reflect what was in the speech, Mr. Speaker. The only thing we can see, Mr. Speaker, is that they want to reinstate certain bills which had already been introduced in the last session.

If the government was really serious about these bills, negotiations should have taken place before prorogation, as is usually the case. Many times before, my colleagues the government and NDP whips, the Speaker and myself, as Liberal whip, have had discussions to reach unanimous consent on several issues. But if the Speaker starts to innovate either with this motion, with the rules that were rammed down our throats or with regard to committees, of course we will have to go by the rules and insist that they be strictly adhered to from now on. But, as the government will realize, that is not going to make life easy for them because, from now on, there will be no more co–operation, at least from this side of the House, the Official Opposition.

I will close on this, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that the government will think twice before the vote because it will be doing away with the co–operation of the Official Opposition in this House.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I was unfortunately delayed. Had I have been here, I would have voted with my party.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-16, an act to amend the Agricultural Products Marketing Act and to provide for other matters in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT COMPENSATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-212, an act respecting the establishment of a compensation fund for members of the House of Commons.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if I may say a couple of sentences about this bill. The purpose of the bill would be to set up a fund to help members pay the costs of any libel suits which they may incur in pursuit of their work.

• (1010)

Libel charges sometimes aimed at harassing the member in his work are occasionally brought against members as a result of statements they make in the House, to the press, in public and in private. The purpose of this fund would be to provide legal assistance so that the member is not stuck with a $20,000 or $30,000 bill for simply carrying out his functions. It would stop harassment by some heavily financed pressure groups and corporations which sometimes use legal suits as a way of stopping the member's actions on very important issues.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present to the House a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston and the Islands who call upon this House to pass an act to make unlawful the desecration or destruction of the flag of Canada.

I note this particular petition is a thick one with several hundred signatures.

CANADA POST

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to table several petitions from the people of Sainte-Blandine, a group of citizens who got together and set up a committee for the survival of the local post office.

These people had already met their federal member, the minister, but to no avail. She who did not even bother to acknowledge the 1,500 letters she received on the subject.

This petition was signed by the people of the parish of Sainte-Blandine, including Father Parent; members of the credit union; representatives of the Conseil régional de développement du Bas-Saint-Laurent; the MPP for Rimouski, Mr. Tremblay; representatives of Urgence rurale and the AFEAS du Bas-Saint-Laurent; representatives of the Ficelle group, who want women to have access to employment, and even by Mgr Ouellet of Rimouski.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present nearly 2,000 names on petitions of people from across Ontario asking the government to legislate that all automotive fuels must contain at least 3.2 per cent oxygen. Ten per cent ethanol blended gasoline has a dual environmental advantage over regular gasoline because the high energy and oxygen content burns more efficiently and the need for toxic gasoline additive such as MMT is eliminated. It also removes 5.9 per cent more carbon dioxide from the emissions. It removes 25 per cent more carbon monoxide from the emissions, 8.5 per cent volatile organic compounds, nitrous oxide and urban ozone.

As we head into the summer months, we have to be aware of the high pollution levels in the various cities. Last Monday Toronto's was extremely high from automotive pollutions.

I ask the government to pay attention to what these citizens are asking for and take to immediate action.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia, who are concerned about the government's decision to cut back by millions of dollars the support of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. With the information from Statistics Canada yesterday indicating an increase in the levels of violent crimes, this becomes even more of a problem. The petitioners point out a variety of concerns they have as a result of these funding cutbacks and are urging the government to consider restoring proper funding to the RCMP.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade) moved that Bill C–6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, after much reflection and very careful examination, I introduced Bill C–6 in this House. The amendments proposed in that bill provide for the selective and severely restricted import, possession and export of automatic weapons for certain narrowly defined military and related industrial purposes.

Under present law, alone among Canada's few manufacturers of military material, our producers of automatic firearms and related equipment are effectively prevented from competing on a level playing field, even in that small part of the international market to which Canadian foreign policy would quite properly limit their access.

As things stand now, these firms can only manufacture such equipment for the Canadian military and police forces. They may not even produce for Canada's allies and closest defence partners, while foreign firms are at liberty to sell to Canada's Armed Forces. The restrictions put Canadian companies at an unnecessary disadvantage and threaten the viability of some. They could eventually preclude Canada from meeting its own future requirements for weapons.

Introducing carefully defined new flexibility to permit exports of automatic firearms to our NATO allies and close defence partners will demonstrate Canada's commitment to meeting its own requirements for basic defence products from Canadian sources. It will also enhance Canada's contribution to joint allied preparedness, most notably in its role in the North American defence industrial base.

As everyone in this House knows, Canada's role in UN peacekeeping is longstanding and widely respected. Imagine Canada's peacekeeping forces in country x. Did they do the job without the appropriate weapons? If our troops were there with other UN peacekeeping forces, be they Swedish, Australian or whatever, would it be wrong for those Swedes or Australians to be armed with Canadian firearms? I think not.

Bill C–6 will place very tight controls on exports of automatic firearms from Canada by establishing a new automatic firearms country control list under the Export and Import Permits Act. Such controls are in keeping with Canada's traditional strict policy on exports of military weapons. They are also fully consistent with Canada's program of action to bring greater transparency and consultations to the international trade in conventional weapons. Our objective is to encourage restraint when excessive build–ups of conventional weapons begin to develop, particularly in regions of instability and potential conflict.

This in a nutshell is what Bill C–6 is all about.

My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will comment further on arms control issues later in this debate.

For my part, let me now explain Bill C–6 in greater detail.

Canadian defence industries are at present allowed to export military goods, including sophisticated weapon systems and components, to Canada's allies and other countries under export controls administered through the Export and Import Permits Act. The discretionary authority of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to issue or deny permits for the export of automatic firearms is not fettered in any way. Permits can in theory be approved to export automatic firearms to any country. The problem is that this authority is of no consequence because under the 1977 amendments to the Criminal Code automatic firearms fall within the definition of prohibited weapons. Automatic firearms are deemed to be weapons that fire more than one round per squeeze of the trigger. The code specifies that such weapons may be possessed or imported only by or on behalf of the Canadian Armed Forces and members of Canadian police forces.

As a result Canadian defence firms could face criminal charges if they attempt to repair or manufacture automatic firearms for Canada's allies and close defence partners. In contrast, competitors from other countries may sell their automatic firearms to the Canadian forces.

This anomalous situation has created an uneven playing field for the Canadian defence industry and its workers. Changes are needed to help them.

In short, the requirements of the Canadian Armed Forces and Canadian police forces are simply not sufficient to enable Canadian firms manufacturing automatic firearms and military equipment, which includes such weapons, to remain economically viable. Due to our relatively small domestic market, Canadian defence industry must have access to selected legitimate foreign military markets. Like other Canadian producers and manufacturers, it needs to export to survive. Foreign sales lower per unit costs and make the manufacturers less dependent on domestic contracts and government funding. They also help ensure supplies in times of emergency.

The government recognizes the shortcomings of the unintended effects of the 1977 amendments to the Criminal Code. For some time it has sought to find a satisfactory means to provide the Canadian defence industry with the necessary increased flexibility. In considering the options, the primary consideration was to ensure that the discretionary export of automatic firearms would be subject to effective licensing and enforcement.

The nature of automatic firearms and their potential use make tight control on their import, possession and export an absolute requirement. We know only too well that automatic firearms can be readily bought and sold on the international market, frequently without any effective national or multilateral controls.

They are widely used by terrorists, criminals and those involved in the narcotics trade.

It was precisely because of these factors that the government decided not to introduce new flexibility with respect to exports of automatic firearms until it was satisfied that effective licensing and enforcement of exports of such goods was possible.

In particular, we wanted the controls to be as stringent as possible and at the same time to ensure that the discretionary authority to issue permits for automatic firearms was clearly constrained.

We also wanted to increase substantially the penalties for violations of export controls. Bill C-6, tabled in the House on May 23, meets these criteria. Under the Export and Import Permits Act, the authority of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to approve permits for exports of automatic firearms will be limited to those countries listed on a new Automatic Firearms Country Control List. The minister's authority to refuse inappropriate applications remains total and undiminished.

The list is to include only those countries with which Canada has an intergovernmental defence research development and production agreement.

The bill applies only to automatic firearms. It does not affect controls on other weapons prohibited under the Criminal Code. All other controls provided under the Export and Import Permits Act remain unchanged.

In keeping with the concerns shared by most Canadians for restraining the arms trade, the required defence production arrangements will be concluded only with Canada's NATO allies and close defence partners. Those countries will be made known through the publication of the automatic firearms country control list.

Applications to export automatic firearms to countries not on the list will be denied. Exports of automatic firearms will be permitted only to a government with which Canada concludes the necessary arrangements. Sales will be permitted only to governments and acceptable designated consignees approved by the Canadian government. Sales to civilians will not be permitted.

Canada currently has defence production arrangements with 10 countries, of which Sweden is the only one not a member of NATO. An arrangement with Spain is under negotiation. Once the amendments are passed by Parliament, cabinet could include those countries on the automatic firearms country control list through a single Order in Council.

Proposals to include other countries on the list will be subject to an intense, case-by-case review to confirm that (a) the requirement for automatic firearms is legitimate and reasonable; (b) that defence co-operation with Canada will enhance regional co-operation and security; and (c) the country being considered for defence co-operation does not threaten regional or world security and does not maintain an excessive level of armaments.

Automatic firearms are military goods and are included in the Canadian export control list under item 2001. Each application to export automatic firearms to an approved country must therefore still be reviewed on a case-by-case basis and normal licensing requirements will still have to be met.

These include providing an end use statement and supporting documentation, and most notably an international import certificate from the country of final destination.

In addition, applications will be subject to the normal intense interdepartmental review and the guidelines adopted by the governments in 1986 will be applied, that is, exports of military goods will be closely controlled to countries which pose a threat to Canada or its allies, countries involved in or under imminent threat of hostilities, countries under United Nations Security Council sanctions or countries whose government has a persistent record of serious violations of the human rights of its citizens, unless it can be demonstrated that there is no reasonable risk that the goods might be used against the civilian population.

• (1030)

Exports of automatic firearms will be reported in the annual report on exports of military goods from Canada. All production facilities in Canada for automatic firearms have to meet existing rigorous DND and DSS security standards and are subject to regular, rigorous inspections.

Bill C-6 also increases penalties for offences of the Export and Import Permits Act as follows:

a) for summary convictions, fines are increased from $5,000 to $25,000, and imprisonment for up to 12 months or both.

b) for indictment, fines are increased from $25,000 to an amount that is in the discretion of the court, which in practice means that there is no ceiling, and imprisonment for up to 10 years instead of 5 years or both.

These increased penalties are intended to ensure that an adequate deterrence is provided for, taking into account the seriousness of the offences and the value of goods that might be involved. These penalties will apply to all offences under the act, not just those related to automatic firearms.

To address the issue of criminal liability, complementary amendments will be made to the Criminal Code to permit import and possession of automatic firearms for an industrial purpose in accordance with the Export and Import Permits Act.

The Criminal Code was never intended to regulate legitimate defence industry activities, which are more properly administered and controlled under the Export and Import Permits Act. The current provisions of the code create unnecessary confusion as to what can be exported and imported and which legislation and regulations the government applies to controlling exports and imports of military goods. Except as specifically provided for by Bill C-6, possession and importation of automatic weapons remain illegal and subject to criminal prosecution under the code.

The EIPA is being amended to introduce new, additional controls on the export and import of automatic firearms. Exports of automatic firearms will be permitted only to those countries listed on the automatic firearms country control list. Applications for permits to export automatic firearms to countries not on the list will be denied. A country's inclusion on the new control list does not in itself constitute authority to export automatic firearms to that country. It merely establishes the necessary ground to be considered on a case-by-case basis.

The controls will be applied in two stages:

1. A defence research, development and production agreement will have to exist between Canada and the country of final destination, and that country will have to be included on the automatic firearms country control list maintained under the Export and Import Permits Act. If an arrangement does not already exist, one would have to be negotiated and the proposal to add the country to the automatic firearms country control list would have to be approved by cabinet through an Order in Council.

2. Applications to export automatic firearms will be reviewed on a case-by-case basis and will be subject to the same strict guidelines and licensing procedures applied to all exports of military goods from Canada.

The effect of the changes will make Canadian controls on exports of automatic firearms among the most stringent in the world.

The changes to the Criminal Code complement those being made to the Export and Import Permits Act. Adoption of Bill C-6 will end the anomalous situation created by the 1977 amendments to the code. As a result, it will no longer be a criminal offence for Canadian firms to import or possess automatic firearms for the purposes of repairing or manufacturing automatic weapons for our NATO allies and close defence partners.

Adoption of Bill C-6 will also demonstrate Canada's commitment to meeting its own defence requirements by helping to ensure the survival of production facilities established in Canada as part of the North American defence industrial base.

Canadian defence requirements include the need to ensure that we have the capability to repair, overhaul and upgrade military equipment for the Canadian Armed Forces. With the exception of the 1950s and part of the 1960s, the post-war evolution of the Canadian defence industrial base has been characterized by a general decline and an increasing inability to meet the operational requirements of the Canadian Armed Forces. Despite successive efforts to re-establish domestic capabilities in such key defence industrial sectors as small arms and ammunition, the Canadian forces remain highly dependent on non-domestic sources of supply for critical end items and specialized equipment and components.

In the 1970s, the number of non-domestic sources relied upon by Canada to meet peacetime operational requirements increased dramatically. As a result, Canada became vulnerable to a broad range of supply disruptions, both in peacetime and in wartime. This reliance, combined with insufficient quantities of operational military equipment and war reserve stockpiles, seriously eroded Canada's capability to deal effectively with a protracted conflict. The importance of the domestic defence industrial base to the implementation of any defence industrial preparedness policy cannot be overstated.

The 1987 DEFENCE Industrial Preparedness Task Force identified the following strengths in the Canadian defence industry:

The ability to convert civilian production to defence production in several areas;

A developing capability to repair and overhaul major capital equipment;

A small arms and ammunition production capability;

An abundance of raw materials essential for wartime production;

Benefits, via joint production, from proximity to the United States.

On the other hand, the task force noted numerous serious weaknesses, including most notably:

A lack of skilled labour;

Dependency on non-domestic sources of critical items;

Long lead time for military production;

Insufficient defence related capital investment in new technology, facilities and machinery.

The task force concluded that the Canadian Defence Industrial Base was "fragmented, highly specialized, and not geared to meet the operational requirements of the Canadian forces".

The task force noted that Canada had purchased a diverse range of military equipment from an equally diverse range of non-North American suppliers, including Germany, the United Kingdom, Italy, Switzerland and Sweden. It recommended that Canada recognize that joint allied industrial preparations strengthen overall security, and that Canada work with its allies to enhance national and NATO preparedness. It recommended in particular that Canada "continue to pursue co-operative arrangements in the interests of rationalization, standardization and interoperability when they clearly contribute to the readiness and sustainment of the Canadian forces".

Bill C-6 seeks to reinforce defence industrial co-operation with our allies and defence partners in key defence product areas, including small arms, automatic firearms and light armoured vehicles. The automatic firearms are manufactured for the Canadian forces by Diemaco of Kitchener and the light armoured vehicles by GM Diesel Division in London. Neither production facility can survive on the basis of Canadian requirements alone. Both will fail if new flexibility with respect to exports of automatic firearms to selected countries is not introduced. In this regard, Bill C-6 is of critical importance both for the specific long-term requirements of the Canadian Armed Forces and for the Canadian defence industrial base generally.

Diemaco was established by DND in 1976 as the centre of excellence for the provision of small arms to the Canadian Armed Forces, to ensure that Canada would not be totally dependent on foreign suppliers in times of emergency. Its facility is unique in Canada and is important to DND's long-term operational readiness.

The awarding of a contract in 1984 to produce the new family of weapons for the Canadian Armed Forces created 300 direct jobs at Diemaco's plant in Kitchener; 200 direct jobs at its 75 Canadian subcontractors who manufacture components; plus an equal number of indirect jobs. This contract is nearing completion and Diemaco must now be able to secure export contracts. The requirements of the Canadian Armed Forces alone cannot sustain Diemaco over the long term.

Of particular concern is the possibility of Canada losing Diemaco's $40 million computer-based manufacturing capability, which includes product design, engineering, metal finishing, plastic moulding, precision casting, forging and machining, and extrusion techniques. At a time when Canada must upgrade the competitiveness of its industry, it would be extremely unfortunate and regrettable to lose Diemaco's related worker skills and technical expertise.

Diemaco, supported by its numerous subcontractors, is currently competing for a contract to supply the Dutch armed forces with automatic rifles. The Dutch government has asked for assurances that Diemaco would be able to export the weapons if it won the contract. Owing to the current provisions of the Criminal Code, it may be illegal for Diemaco to manufacture automatic firearms for the Dutch armed forces. Failure to adopt the proposed changes to permit the proposed exports to the Netherlands will jeopardize Diemaco's future and could mean that the entire small arms manufacturing capability of the Canadian defence industrial base will be gone before long, possibly by as early as June, 1992.

The only solution is for Diemaco to win selected, legitimate foreign contracts and for the government to permit the company to export its modern, high quality products to our allies and defence partners. Success in winning the Dutch contract will mean an initial 7,680 person years of direct Canadian employment with the potential of almost doubling over the life of the project. Success will also ensure the ability to continue the development work necessary for new small arms for the Canadian Armed Forces into the next century.

Since receiving its first contract from DND in 1977, General Motors Diesel Division has become a world class producer. To produce the light armoured vehicle, General Motors Diesel Division employs 600 skilled workers at its plant in London, Ontario. In addition, GMDD draws on suppliers and subcontractors from across Canada including companies and workers in Richmond and Vancouver, B.C.; Edmonton; Winnipeg; Quebec City; Saint John and Moncton and New Brunswick; Mulgrave and Bridgewater in Nova Scotia; and St. John's, Newfoundland.

Last year it won a contract to export light armoured vehicles to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. This capped a marketing campaign that spanned more than a decade. It was first approved by the Liberal government in 1981 and has since been supported by successive Canadian governments. However, the anomalous situation under the Criminal Code may limit GM's ability to those few, but important, foreign markets to which Canadian foreign policy would permit access.

The government proposes to resolve this anomaly by adopting the amendments proposed under Bill C-6; negotiating a bilateral defence research, development and production agreement with Saudi Arabia; and including Saudi Arabia on the Automatic Firearms Country Control List.

The export of the LAVs has been reviewed and again approved—after all licensing requirements were met and after careful review and study. In doing so, particular attention was given to the requirement to control closely exports of military goods to countries "threatened by or engaged in hostilities". In the end, it was decided to approve GM's application.

A primary consideration was that the results of the Gulf War ensured that Saudi Arabia is not now, nor, in the immediate future will it be, an imminent threat of hostilities. Another was that the export of the LAVs by Canada to Saudi Arabia will not threaten Saudi Arabia's neighbours and will serve to enhance regional security.

Saudi Arabia has a legitimate right to self-defence. Its requirement for LAVs armed with automatic weapons is reasonable given its need to maintain a defensive military capability sufficient to continue to deter aggression. The LAVs are lightly armoured. Even when armed with automatic machine guns and cannons, they are designed for and have a particular military use, such as patrolling the oil fields, the oil pipelines and other strategic sites. Because of their light armour, the LAVs are not as effective in an offensive role for which heavily armoured and heavily armed vehicles such as main battle tanks are best suited.

Moreover, Saudi Arabia shares with Canada and with other members of the allied coalition, a commonality of interests in supporting the UN Security Council resolutions and in strengthening regional security arrangements. It is currently working closely with other states in the region, and with members of the coalition, to develop appropriate regional security arrangements for the post conflict period. These efforts are fully supported by Canada.

The requirement to control exports of military goods, including automatic firearms, is clear and obvious. The Export and Import Permits Act provides the government with the necessary means to do so. Enforcement of controls requires vigilance, intelligence, and close international co-operation. It also requires the support of exporters and clear licensing guidelines. The 1977 amendments to the Criminal Code place unnecessary restrictions on Canadian companies established to support Canada's defence requirements. Our NATO allies can export automatic firearms to Canadian forces, but Canadian firms cannot export to meet their requirements for the same goods.

Adoption of the proposed amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act and the Criminal Code are necessary and pertain only to automatic firearms. The amendments do not pertain to other military equipment, nor do they alter Canada's longstanding policy on stringently controlling exports of military goods.

The new, additional and strict controls on exports of automatic firearms were developed to meet a specific and limited requirement of the Canadian defence industry. Increased flexibility in certain areas is being created only with respect to a single category of military goods, namely automatic firearms. Other export controls remain in place. Adoption of the automatic firearms country control list and limiting exports of automatic weapons to our NATO allies and close defence partners, to those countries with which we have bilateral defence research, development and production agreements, will help ensure that Canadian manufacturers of automatic weapons and equipment with automatic firearms remain viable. They will also ensure that Canadian controls on such goods remain the most stringent in the world.

These exacting Canadian controls reflect the government's commitment to arms control. They are fully consistent with recent Canadian arms controls initiatives including the proposal to hold a world summit on the instruments of war and weapons of mass destruction. They are also consistent with the program of action on conventional weapons.

Canada's concern is the build-up by certain countries of levels of armaments in excess of legitimate self-defence requirements. Certainly no permit would ever be approved to export automatic weapons from Canada to a country which undertook such a massive build-up of arms. It simply would not happen. If a country with which Canada had a defence production agreement began to develop its military arsenal to the point of threatening its neighbours and regional security we would simply stop issuing export permits and suspend all outstanding ones.

• (1050)

Such action is within the discretionary authority by the Secretary of State for External Affairs provided for by the Export and Import Permits Act. It has been exercised in the past in response to changing security considerations and would be used in the future without hesitation if necessary. For example, no Canadian military goods were approved for export to Iraq after the outbreak of the Iran–Iraq war, an indication that Canadian controls are applied and are effective.

Our intention is to control more effectively, not to prohibit, the sales of military equipment. Canada will be extremely careful in deciding which countries it should sell firearms to. We will also make known which military goods are exported and to which countries.

To conclude, the proposed amendments to the Export and Import Permits Act and the Criminal Code will create a framework for Canadian defence firms that will enable them to compete more effectively under very closely controlled conditions. Canada needs a strong defence industrial base to lower per-unit costs and ensure Canadian sources in times of emergency. With these amendments, Canadian firms will be better able to meet Canada's defence requirements and those of our NATO allies and defence partners.

Mr. Allmand: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering if the minister would accept a technical question for clarification which I consider to be very important. Would he mind accepting such a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions or comments but we could do it by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in the minister's speech he said that only those countries with which Canada has an intergovernmental defence, research, development and production arrangement would be eligible for the automatic firearms country control list. I think he used the word "only". But in the text of the legislation in clause 2 on page 1 it says:

> The Governor in Council may establish a list of countries to be called an Automatic Firearms Country Control List including therein any country with which Canada has an intergovernmental defence, research, development and production arrangement—

The wording of the text of the bill suggests that while you would include all those countries it would not be limited to those countries.

I wonder if the minister would clarify that because there is quite a difference. If it is as the minister said in his speech that the list is restricted to those countries, then I think that the text of the bill should be amended and I would support that. It would provide more control. But the way the text is written it seems to be contrary to what the minister said in his speech because it says those countries must be included. It does not say it is restricted to those countries.

If you look at the French text it seems closer to what the minister said and I think this is extremely important. Also on a technical point, Mr. Speaker, I want to know if the minister has already prepared such a proposed list and, if so, would he be willing during the debate to make it available to the House so we know exactly which countries he proposes to put on the list.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a very quick question which the minister could perhaps answer at the same time as it flows from the same point. Are there any arrangements with Saudi Arabia? The minister has said that one of the purposes of this bill is to permit this particular deal with Saudi Arabia. Are there any arrangements with Saudi Arabia which the minister could tell us about, as we proceed with this debate, which fit within the definition set out in the act?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are two questions for the hon. minister. Under this section we will allow it this time, but let us not make it a precedent.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comments with respect to the question from the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

I will have to check on the specifics and whether there is a reason the wording in the bill is that way. The countries will have to be on the country control list and it will be those countries with which we have a defence arrangement, as I described in my remarks.

In response to the member from Victoria, we have not completed an arrangement with Saudi Arabia. That would have to be completed before exports would be provided for.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the most striking thing about Bill C-6, which the Minister for International Trade has just introduced, is that it seems both unnecessary and inopportune.

It appears unnecessary because for more than 13 years the export of conventional weapons has been satisfactorily regulated within the existing terms of the Export and Import Permits Act.

It is surely not beyond the ability of the government's legal counsel to identify ways in which such regulations could continue to be utilized without the cumbersome necessity of Parliament amending legislation which until now had been found satisfactory. In that sense, the bill is inopportune.

In an additional sense it is inopportune. By lumping together questions of the legitimate export of conventional weapons with amendments to the Criminal Code, the general impression is left that somehow such exports, unlike other exports, raise questions that must ultimately be encompassed within the Criminal Code rather than within trade legislation. This inopportune impression will only be reinforced by the fact that the government has also chosen this same day to introduce—or reintroduce—its long awaited gun legislation.

Such juxtapositions of separate policy questions can only be described as unfortunate. With Bill C-6, which essentially addresses an anomaly in the Criminal Code, much larger questions are being opened, questions which were never intended to be covered by the Criminal Code. I have already noted that the fact that exports of conventional weapons are spoken of in the context of the Criminal Code is an unfortunate juxtaposition.

As a result of introducing amendments intended merely to permit the continued sale of small arms to certain nations or the import and re-export of weapons incorporated in Canadian-built vehicles, a range of much more fundamental questions is inevitably raised.

In the past, Canada's policy has been to authorize the export of light weapons—never weapons of mass destruction—to countries designated by a minister upon the recommendation of officials. For example, the sale of Canadian-made automatic weapons or light armoured vehicles has been covered by such policies. Against such a background, Canada exported to NATO allies and other designated countries some of the military equipment necessary for their self-defence.

Aircraft, light weapons, radios and other matériel were exported, helping to sustain the equipment of Canadian forces, creating thousands of jobs among suppliers across Canada and, in a number of instances, enhancing Canada's high-tech capabilities, whether in the automotive, marine, communications or aeronautical industries.

• (1100)

Now, however, it seems that an anomaly has been identified in the Criminal Code. We are to understand that since 1978 fully automatic weapons have been classified in the Criminal Code as prohibited weapons and accordingly cannot be either imported or exported under defence contracts. Such a prohibition, it is now discovered, prevents the further export or even the import and re-export of such weapons.

How can this be? Since 1978, such weapons manufactured in Canada have been exported. Similar weapons, manufactured elsewhere for incorporation in Canadian-made vehicles, have been imported and re-exported.

Is the government now saying that any such exports during the past 13 years were in error? Is it saying that those officials and ministers who reviewed and authorized such shipments in the past were acting, unwittingly of course, in contravention of the Criminal Code? If the ministers were not then acting in contravention of the Criminal Code, why would they be doing so today by authorizing identical or similar shipments?

What has occurred that requires the government to introduce these amendments, opening a host of questions which do not belong here but in other debates? What is it that the government has suddenly discovered about the Criminal Code that requires this extraordinary procedure? Is this the way in which to initiate a review of the controls that Canada exercises over the export of arms? Is this the way to back into a debate or discussion of disarmament? Is this yet another instance of the government's lack of a clear policy direction? What assurance can Canadians take from this incident that the government knows where it is going and what it wants to do in our trade policy, in our defence policy and in our foreign policy?

Nothing in this bill relates to the sale or possession of automatic weapons in Canada itself. That is a matter which rightly belongs to the gun control legislation introduced earlier today. That long-delayed legislation will, we hope, deal effectively with all questions pertaining to the sale or possession of automatic weapons in Canada.

By way of contrast, the bill now before us relates only to the export or import and re-export of automatic weapons in commercial contracts. However, in raising such a question the government inevitably creates confusion and invites debate on what constraints we Canadians choose to exercise over the export of conventional weapons and how effective our controls are over their export.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs raised some relevant questions in February. I quote from his speech: "The practical problems here are considerable. What weapons are defensive and what weapons are offensive? How much is enough? How can arsenals be controlled when political conflict persists and how can political conflict be brought to an end when arsenals continue to threaten? How can countries which have developed economies so dependent on the arms trade with the Middle East accept tighter controls which will cost jobs and profits? And what efforts can be mounted to bring all countries into a control effort so that restraint on the part of some does not simply lead to bonanzas for others?"

These and other complex questions raised indirectly by the bill now before us will continue to be debated by Canadians. They properly belong in the realm of foreign and defence policy. They should be raised in that context, not in the much narrower context of correcting an anomaly in the Criminal Code. For our part, we in the Official Opposition would welcome an early review of Canada's armament and disarmament policies, of Canada's policies with regard to the export of convention arms and, more broadly, of Canada's foreign and defence policies.

The proposed amendments to the Criminal Code and to the Export and Import Permits Act, particularly how the automatic firearms control list will function, are questions best considered in committee. It is for that reason that we in the Official Opposition believe that this bill should now proceed promptly to the committee stage so that the questions it inevitably raises can be dealt with effectively there, taking into account the commercial, the defence and the disarmament considerations that are all involved in the control of Canada's export of conventional weapons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions or comments. The hon. member for Victoria is next on the list. He will have 20 minutes, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party to address the issues put before the House. The government has introduced this bill to authorize cabinet to waive the provisions in the Criminal Code permitting the import and export of automatic weapons anywhere in the world. That should be understood by the House.

Today we debate second reading, that is approval in principle of this bill. I am fascinated by the statement of the official spokesman for the Liberal Party, that the Liberal Party wants this bill quickly moved to second reading where it can receive technical amendments. The issue before the House today is the principle of this bill. We in the New Democratic Party are firmly and unalterably opposed to this bill which will permit the export of automatic weapons anywhere in the world and runs completely counter to every effort to restrain arms sales: the bane of the existence of humanity in this century.

Just as the government begins an effort or said it was beginning an effort to try to restrain sales, what is one of the first pieces of legislation it brings before the House in this session? It is a bill to permit further export of weapons around the world by Canada.

It is an irony that this bill comes before the House on the same day in which the government has introduced a gun control bill for Canadians. Why is that what is good for Canadians is not good for people who live in Saudi Arabia and other parts of the world?

This bill drives a hole through the government's policies and constraints on arms sales around the world that directly led to the horror of the gulf war, that directly led to the massacre of millions of people in this century. A policy was proclaimed by the Prime Minister in February. Let us listen to the words, first of all, of the government in its official policy statement set out in September 1990. The Arms Control and Disarmament Division of External Affairs prepared a document outlining the Canadian position. That document says that it is Canada's objective:

> —to ensure that Canadian military exports do not contribute to the violation of human rights nor to the exacerbation of conflict, while ensuring that we meet our requirements for national security and obligations for collective defence.

Further:

> Canada believes that increased restraint by all states with respect to the transfer of arms would contribute to the promotion of peace and security, particularly, in the areas of actual or potential conflict.

The House of Commons defence committee said earlier this year, following the gulf war in a report released in April:

> Governments have a responsibility to exercise controls over military equipment, from its design to its sale or transfer and wherever possible, to its ultimate end use.

However, listen to the words of the Prime Minister, who said on March 13 the following:

> There is a general view, without getting into the question of a total interdiction for the moment, that clearly a lot of these weapons, to understate the case, fell into the hands that should never have had them in the first place. We could be much more active in that area if we wanted. We have all the technology in the world. We have all the resources we need.

This is the Prime Minister speaking. He continued:

> We could be big arms merchants. We have chosen not to be, although it is a very lucrative business. We have chosen not to be, because it is fundamentally inconsistent with our policy, to develop it, to peddle it, to finance it, and then to deplore its use.

• (1110)

That is a direct quote from the Prime Minister of Canada. What happened to his policy? Where did it disappear to?

The minister has carefully explained that behind this bill are two immediate potential sales of arms for Canadians and for Canadian companies or Canadian based companies. The first is the potential sale of automatic weapons to the Netherlands. The other is the sale of 1,117 light armoured vehicles by a General Motors plant in London to Saudi Arabia.

The significance of this bill is that it would permit those light armoured vehicles to be armed with automatic weapons. Without that waiver of the Criminal Code, this deal is not likely, at least in a complete way, to come to the plant in London.

In attempting to justify this deal, the minister says that these are not weapons of mass destruction. What I say to the minister is that in this century more people have been killed by automatic weapons than any other weapon invented by humanity, and most of those who were killed were civilians. How can the government say that this is not a weapon of mass destruction?

The weapons that are going to be mounted on these light armoured vehicles and sold to Saudi Arabia are almost certainly going to be used by that country in controlling its own people. What kind of country is this going to?

Let us listen to the report from Amnesty International on Saudi Arabia:

> At least 27 prisoners of conscience were imprisoned and other prisoners of conscience may have been among more than 70 detainees held without charge or trial. Some political detainees were held without trial in prolonged incommunicado detention. Torture was reported common and one death in custody may have been caused by torture or ill-treatment. Sentences of amputation and flogging continued to be imposed and carried out. At least 111 people were executed, 16 of them for political offences.
> Information about political prisoners was limited because of strict official censorship and restrictions on freedom of movement within the country and access from abroad.

Let us look at the United States Senate report and that of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1990'. It states about Saudi Arabia:

> There were no significant developments in human rights in 1990; significant restrictions remain on the freedoms of speech and press, peaceful assembly and association, religion, the right of citizens to change their government, women's rights and worker rights. There were credible reports in 1990 of the mistreatment of prisoners and incommunicado detention.

We all learned unfortunately during the gulf war a little more of the kind of regime that there is in Saudi Arabia.

Listen to the words of the former trade minister, the current minister responsible for Atlantic development. He said in the House of Commons of March 7 of this year: "We are discussing automatic weapons, that is rifles and other small arms of that nature, machine guns and the like which are necessary for armies, police forces and civil authorities to have if they are to be in a position to keep order in their own countries".

Project Ploughshares has said of these weapons, according to a GM spokesperson: "Military leaders of small countries may like its capacity to 'quell' civil disturbances".

We have here a weapon which this government proposes to permit to be exported to Saudi Arabia. Let me make it clear as well, the bill does not just specify Saudi Arabia. The bill gives the cabinet a licence to add any country in the world to the list of countries to which these weapons may be sent.

I come back: If gun control is all right for Canadians, why is it not all right for other countries and other people? Are we not a common humanity? Are we not our neighbour's keepers? How can we in this House, in conscience, pass a bill which will permit the export of automatic weapons to other countries if we do not permit those weapons in this country except for our own national security?

No case can be made that the export of automatic weapons to Saudi Arabia or most of the rest of the world is in our military or common security. The only case made by the government for the export of these weapons is one of jobs here at home. No case can be made on the basis of conscience, no case can be made on the basis of our national security for this bill and for the provisions within it.

In March the government spoke for Canadians when it set out a policy that might at least begin to turn back the arms race which has caused such destruction in this century and when the government called for a world summit for the transparency in arms deals and for restraint at home in arms deals. We supported the government when it said those things. We supported the government in committee, in the House and in public.

What has happened to that initiative? Where has the government gone? Is it because we have had a change of minister? Is it because this government never was serious about trying to restrain arms sales?

My friends in the Liberal Party asked me during the course of this debate: "What about jobs?"

Mr. Fontana: CAW supports that bill.

Mr. Brewin: Let me speak on behalf of the CAW. My friend asks me to do that. The CAW have been long supporters of the New Democratic Party and we are proud of that support. I want to put on record the fact that the local in the area, Local 27, calls on this House to support the bill.

An hon. member: Pat Clancy too.

Mr. Brewin: I will get to Pat Clancy in a minute if the member will just restrain himself. CAW makes the case that the jobs are vital for its members and for that community. We respect and honour the position that it takes.

Let me quote directly from a letter from Pat Clancy, the area director for CAW Canada. It reads:

> The CAW has for years taken the position that Canada should not become a major international arms dealer. We have taken a position that workers in plants producing armaments should not just be thrown on the unemployment roles, but that their jobs would be protected by conversion methods, building products for peaceful use.
> The problem with the current situation at GM Diesel in London is that the workers have in fact been building these military vehicles for some years now for the U.S. military. No doubt, many of those ended up in places like Saudi Arabia. If these orders were to be cancelled, it would mean a lay off of approximately 700 workers because there are no plans to convert this facility to produce alternate products.
> As far as the NDP is concerned, we realize that the party represents a broader constituency and therefore should feel free to deal with this issue consistent with party policy. I am sure you realize however, as a union, we cannot take a position that would mean the immediate loss of 700 jobs.

Our caucus took those views carefully into consideration, but we feel that even though the immediate prospect may be the loss of jobs in Kitchener in respect of Diemaco and in London in the case of the Saudi Arabian deal, we have no choice but to oppose this bill with all the vigour that we can muster. We say, in the broader interest of the Canadian national interest and the broader questions of the world interest, that this is a bad bill and this is a bill which must not be accepted by this House.

This is the time to begin to turn around the whole inevitable race toward the escalation of arms sales. When we begin seeing what happens with this bill and we look back at the developments over the last number of years, we begin to see how the government will be back in a few years with yet another arms sale and another arms sale.

Here is how it works. The minister referred to the fact that Diemaco was started by DND in 1976.

It was supported initially as a producer of arms supplies for the Canadian forces. Most Canadians would support that initiative, but what all of us should have realized and must now realize is the down escalator that displaces our economy and our community.

Once a company finishes producing arms for the Canadian Armed Forces, which in the world scale of things is relatively small, it then is faced with a choice. It either stops the production altogether, or seeks new markets. To stop production means a loss of jobs. Obviously, everybody starts looking for new markets. The first and most automatic is the United States with which we have a defence production sharing agreement. We sell a certain amount of the weapons to the United States, but after a period of time the United States' market dries up. We then look to our "allies" in Europe and other places. We begin seeing what arms we can flog to them.

That is what has happened in the case of the light armoured vehicles. That is what has happened in the case of automatic weapons. We have run out of our own markets. We have run out of American markets. We have run out of European markets, so now we start turning to the Third World. We start with a country like Saudi Arabia with which our government has relatively friendly relations, notwithstanding its human rights record and its place right in the heart of one of the most turbulent and tense regions of the world.

What about next week? What about next year, when the Saudi Arabian deal runs out? Where are these companies going to start looking? They will be back with the same argument, but now they will be looking for less and less savory regimes, such as El Salvador or South Korea where they may need arms to turn on the students.

Where next? Iraq? The government will make a case, and the case will be exactly the same as the case brought by the minister before this House today. The case will be that notwithstanding the human rights record, notwithstanding the tensions in the regions, notwithstanding our policies about arms control and notwithstanding the human cost that will ultimately result from this, we have to do this because of jobs.

The time has come to say "stop." The time has come to begin looking at alternatives, for ways in which this country and our people can earn their living. We have a program, DIPP, Defence Industry Production Program. Those funds should begin being used now to divert military equipment and military production to civilian production.

The whole direction of government policy must shift and it must be done in consultation with the communities and the workers involved. We must begin a serious program of conversion so that we no longer find ourselves in the invidious position that this escalator has put us on.

Mr. Speaker, let me refer you to the article by John Lamb who is executive director of the Arms Control Centre. He writes about this very deal.

The record of the government over the long period of time has been eroding step by step by step. Since the 1930s, Canada had a very restrictive arms export policy, but in the 1970s, under a Liberal government, this policy began being reversed. First, it was decided that in future, commercial considerations would be taken into account in the evaluation of export permit applications. Then the onus on who should make the sale was reversed. In the 1980s sales were being approved which had previously been turned down. By 1986 we were selling to known human rights violators and now we are on the slippery slope.

Let me finish by referring the House to a number of very wise comments, the first by Surgeon M. Keeny, Jr. in the Arms Control Association article called Focus in which he concludes:

> The New World Order should not be inaugurated with a massive buildup of sophisticated conventional arms in this most dangerous, unstable, and unpredictable region.

He was referring to the Middle East.

> In such a world, the president's "level playing field" would soon become the "floor of the jungle."

Also let me refer to a very persuasive article in Newsweek, the edition of April 8, 1991, by Anthony Sampson, the author of a number of books on international players, including the arms bazaar. He says:

> It will not be easy to withstand national pressure to sell weapons for short-term economic advantage. But if we cannot face up to the danger and the opportunity this time, we may not have another chance.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the wisest words of all come from the prophet Micah, who said:

> He shall judge between many peoples,
> And rebuke strong nations afar off;
> They shall beat their swords into ploughshares,
> And their spears into pruning hooks;
> Nation shall not lift up sword against nation,
> Neither shall they learn war any more.

This House has a chance to say "stop." I plead with the government to withdraw this bill. Failing that, I plead with the House to defeat it. I ask all Canadians who are watching this debate to let their members of Parliament know that they want this bill stopped.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the member of the New Democratic Party. He makes a compelling argument that yes, it is incumbent upon all countries, including Canada, working in concert with the international community, obviously, to work towards peace and towards the eradication of weapons. But it has to be a collective and an international agreement.

What Canada does in isolation will not solve the arms control problems of the world. We are a very small player in this particular area. While we all agree that peace should be something we all work towards internationally, one has to be very realistic. I find it rather peculiar and hypocritical in a way—

Mr. Barrett: One has to be realistic.

Mr. Fontana: I find it rather peculiar that the New Democratic Party, which says it stands for workers and labour, would suggest it is going to add to the human misery of people and put them on the unemployment pile. Not only 700 people from London, Ontario, but close to 5,000 other people across this country, in New Brunswick, British Columbia, Quebec, all these other people are directly related to something which is legal at this point. In fact, the New Democratic Party's suggestion is that we ought to get rid of Pratt & Whitney, which develops engines that go on helicopters. We ought to get rid of the aircraft industry, Buffalo aircraft, for instance, which are sold to other countries. They may or may not be used for military purposes. The fact is that you are talking about 50,000 or 60,000 people. You are prepared to put them on the unemployment rolls. That is absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. Speaker, let me ask a question of the member of the New Democratic Party, who professes to be standing for the working people. The CAW in London and CAW across Canada supports this measure. I want to ask what he is gong to tell the workers in those plants, not only in London, but across this country, who depend on these jobs. You know, 10 or 15 years from now, who knows if the world can get its act together and talk about the kinds of things that he just talked about. If it can, that is fine. But what is he going to tell those men and women on the plant floor that need those jobs? We have 1.5 million unemployed in this country and our industries are going down the tubes.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the member voices the very dilemma that this House is called upon to resolve. I would be very interested at some point in hearing what the Liberal Party's position is going to be on this question. I hope we will hear sooner or later from the member on that.

But let us just pull the dilemma right up. First of all, the precise answer to the employees in that area, is that the government should immediately sit down with the company, the community, and the employees involved and begin developing alternate industries and alternate ways of earning of a living. The transition from a military economy to a civilian economy is one that has been long delayed and it is time we got on with it.

He says that maybe in 15 years the world will get its act together. It is not going to get its act together if the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party persist in nibbling away, step by step, at the restraints in arms control we have. If we do not get our own house in order, how can we ask the rest of the world to do that?

But let us also look at the economics of this. There are workers today, as the member has pointed out, who may face a job loss if this bill does not go through. But if this bill goes through and next year they make the sale, what are they going to do then?

An hon. member: It is ten years of work.

Mr. Brewin: Ten years. All right. If some other company comes in next year, in ten years they are going to have the problem, then they will have to sell to somebody else and to somebody else. In terms of jobs and a sound economic base, it is very clear that the defence industrial base has some major flaws. We are dealing with a world military situation now, where the markets in Europe and in the United States, because of the end of the cold war, will be shrinking. So the industry is forced to move to other places. It is time that we had a thorough review of all of these issues and got our act together.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague, was it not the former President of the United States, a former leading general in World War II, President Eisenhower, who said, "beware of the military industrial complex," back in the 1950s, almost 40 years ago. This same nibbling away and rationalization has been given for massive arms build-ups. Is it not correct?

Rather than talking about 40 years ago, 40 days ago members of this government were saying publicly that Canada would not participate in building up arms in that particular region after the Iraqi war.

Mr. Fontana: Defensive weapons.

Mr. Barrett: Defensive weapons—Twiddle-de-dee, twiddle-de-dum, commonly known on the streets as BS. I will not go beyond the initials. But tell that to a child who has been shot and killed by an automatic weapon that it was only defensive.

Mr. Fontana: Cars are killing people too.

Mr. Barrett: Oh, cars. Now cars are causing wars. Okay. If that is the Liberal position, let it be the Liberal position. I am anxious to hear the Liberal position.

I want to ask my colleague a question. The Liberal Party is just as hypocritical as the Tories. Was this government not in the forefront of pious statements just 40 days ago saying: "We will lead the world in restricting arms sales"? Was it not the former minister of external affairs who went to the region alone, ahead of the United States Secretary of State and said: "Canada has a different position. We will not contribute to sales in this region"? Was it not those self same people? I have a short memory. Perhaps you could remind me.

Mr. Brewin: I am glad to assist the hon. member in getting on the record of the House statements made by the former minister of external affairs who said in January: "Unrestricted arms sales in the Middle East are no longer acceptable and constitute a threat to the security of all members of the United Nations".

This is one of the particularly invidious issues, the sale of arms into the Middle East region. When one country has additional weapons, then its neighbours feel obliged to get into the market and add to it. Saudi Arabia, in the last year in which statistics are available, was second only to Iraq in the world for the importation of arms. It spent 22.7 per cent of its Gross National Product on arms sales and arms purchases.

We think it is time this stopped.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am always astonished when I hear the position taken by NDP critics on Canada's defence. This morning, however, I am absolutely flabbergasted. I would like to remind the hon. member that in Canada 300,000 workers earn a living in the defence industry.

This morning the hon. member suggested that to keep Canada looking pure as the driven snow it should no longer produce the weapons it needs for its own security, but he knows perfectly well that both our industry and our purchasing power in this country are too small. What he is suggesting but does not have the courage to say outright is that in future, to keep up its virginal appearances for the NDP's sake, Canada should no longer manufacture its own weapons but purchase them abroad, in other words provide jobs for people in other countries so that we will at least have the means to ensure our own security.

I would like to know whether the hon. member will finally come out and say so in this House.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, let me just respond to the member who asked that question by throwing back at him the words of his leader, the Prime Minister of Canada, who said on March 13: "We could be big arms merchants. We have chosen not to be although it is a very lucrative business. We have chosen not to be because it is fundamentally inconsistent with our policy to develop it, to peddle it, to finance it, and then to deplore its use". That is why we are against this bill.

This bill says nothing about the production and sale of arms within Canada. It deals with the export of arms to any country in the world. The bill does not limit cabinet in any way as to the countries that it could be selling arms to. There is no practical limitation. All the cabinet has to do is enter into some kind of arrangement with any tinpot dictator, any violator of human rights, anyone who could turn against us the next day. That is what this bill authorizes and that is what this bill is about.

With respect to the defence industry within Canada, what we have said in this debate and what we will be saying again and again until the lesson gets through to the government is that there is a fundamental problem with engaging in defence production which we must resolve in this country. It is a difficult problem. If we want to make arms for our own forces then we have to think of the ultimate consequences. At the very least we should say we are not going to further weaken the restraints and constraints on arms sales abroad. We should be sitting down across this floor and across this country, having discussions between employers and employees, companies, and the defence industry, and working the answers to this fundamental dilemma.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today on Bill C–6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of, and dealing with certain weapons.

I would like to comment on the nature of this bill, what it is doing, some of the history behind the bill and the stringent controls that are built into it.

In effect this bill will allow Canadian manufacturers of automatic weapons to broaden their marketing efforts to compete for foreign defence contracts. Currently Canadian firms are restricted to selling to Canadian military and police forces only. Under this new act the export of automatic weapons will be subject to a new regime of Canadian government controls, already among the most stringent in the world. It is important to remember when we look at this topic that these are among the most stringent in the world and we are adding to them, not subtracting from them.

A new list called the Automatic Firearms Country Control List will be created. It will set out the names of those countries to which Canadian manufacturers can sell.

• (1140)

Only countries with which Canada has defence, research, development and production bilateral agreements will be eligible for inclusion on that list. Automatic firearms will not be sold to countries that are not included on that list. I want to emphasize that Bill C–6 will help companies such as Diemaco, which is in my riding of Kitchener, become more competitive.

As the Minister for International Trade stated: "I am delighted that the government has seen fit to make these changes at this time. Canadian companies that are only able to rely on domestic orders are in danger of losing their viability. Once the changes are adopted Canadian companies like Diemaco will be able to help our NATO allies and our close defence partners to meet their requirements for small arms".

I would also like to say that my colleague from the neighbouring riding of Cambridge was in the Netherlands last week with the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association. He, too, is pleased with this decision and said that: "The awarding of the international contracts would help keep defence companies viable, thereby allowing the Canadian forces to continue to purchase, repair, and maintain their equipment in Canada, rather than having to seek foreign suppliers".

It is important that under these amendments companies which violate the new regulations could face fines amounting to the total value of the illegal transaction, and officers of such companies could face jail sentences of up to 10 years.

Complementary changes to the Criminal Code have also been introduced. If we look back historically at what has taken place on this issue since January 1, 1978, fully automatic weapons have been classified in the Criminal Code as prohibited weapons. Importation or possession of these fully automatic firearms has, therefore, been illegal except in the case of the Canadian Forces or Canadian police.

The amendments to the Criminal Code will correct this situation. However, the prohibition on the general sale to civilians of automatic weapons in Canada will remain unchanged as was established back in 1978.

As chairman of the special committee on Bill C–80 on firearms, I can say that nothing we are doing in these amendments, either now or during the previous session, will in any way frustrate the new gun control bill that was also introduced and tabled in the House this morning. I have to make it very clear that they are two separate issues. This bill deals with the export of weapons, while the other bill on gun control concerns Canadian civilians. Canadian Armed Forces and police always had an exemption from the prohibition that applied to all civilians in Canada.

Mr. Brewin: What about the Saudi police, are they okay?

Mr. Reimer: The hon. member likes to speak from his seat. I did not interrupt him. I would wish that he would not interrupt me.

The new gun control bill tabled by the Minister of Justice this morning will deal with civilians in Canada. This bill will deal with exporting weapons that are not available to civilians in Canada. That is the important difference we have to keep in mind.

Also, Canada is the only NATO country which prohibits its exports of automatic firearms to its allies and defence partners. If the tables were reversed, our defence requirements would suffer and we would protest to our allies. It is ludicrous that Canadian firms can export rockets, missiles, bombs, F–18 aircraft, in fact any defence equipment, but they may not export automatic firearms to our NATO allies and close defence partners.

That is the only restriction and that is the one we are addressing today in this bill. This restriction which came about in the 1977–78 gun control amendments for civilian use, not Armed Forces use, never was intended to restrict companies such as Diemaco in their exports or their hopes to export to our NATO allies and defence partners.

I discussed this with the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce who is here this morning. I am glad he is here. I asked him if, when he was minister and introduced the bill back in 1976 for gun control in Canada, it was the intention in his bill—which later was taken by another minister to fruition two years later—and if it was ever the intention of the government through him as the minister at that time, to stop exports to our defence partners or NATO allies of fully automatic weapons. His answer was no, he did not think that in any way that was ever intended. It was an oversight.

That is fine. That is the history. That is where we have come from. Today we are correcting that oversight and that is all we are doing today.

This issue has been before me for six years, since 1984. When I was elected as the member for the federal riding of Kitchener this company came to me and said: "We've discussed this with the former administration and it has admitted to us that it was an oversight. Please take our representation to the government and see if we can make this change". This change was almost accomplished in 1987, but for a variety of reasons it was deferred. Now we are facing it again. I am glad that we have now finally bit the bullet and said: "Let's face the question and let's act on this issue".

I think it is necessary to put this action into the full range of foreign policy and international security considerations as well, not just within our own domestic question with respect to gun control.

All the production facilities in Canada must meet rigorous Department of National Defence and the Department of Supply and Services security standards and all are subject to regular inspection. All exports and imports of automatic weapons will continue to be tightly controlled and will be subject to the same stringent controls long applied to all exports of military goods.

Exports of all fully automatic weapons will be permitted only to those countries on the Automatic Firearm Country Control List, which will include only those countries with which Canada has concluded intergovernmental defence, research, development and, production arrangements.

In the international arena the government is seeking support for proposals to increase controls on the world arms trade, in particular exports which contribute to programs to develop weapons of mass destruction. We are also working at the United Nations to encourage greater transparency in arms transfers through the establishment of an international arms transfer register. In a unilateral effort to bring greater transparency to arms transfers, Canada has begun publishing annual reports on exports of arms from Canada.

Should this bill go through and should Diemaco in my riding which makes all of the rifles for the Canadian Armed Forces be permitted and win the contract with, say, the Netherlands, then that would be put into this annual report. A full accounting of every gun we sell to the Netherlands would go in that report. It would be fully transparent for all to see.

At the same time we recognize that all countries have a legitimate right to self-defence. Canadian firms should have the opportunity to meet their requirements within the strict limits imposed by Canadian arms control policy and export control licensing requirements and procedures.

These controls will be applied in two stages. First, a defence research, development and production agreement will have to exist between Canada and the country of final destination, and that country will have to be included, as I indicated earlier, on the Automatic Firearm Country Control List maintained under the Export and Import Permits Act.

• (1150)

If an arrangement does not already exist, one would have to be negotiated. The proposal to add the country to the Automatic Firearms Country Control List would have to be approved by cabinet through an Order in Council.

The Canadian government will closely control proposals to establish arrangements with other countries. There are four criteria which I would like to go through:

1. Countries that pose a threat to Canada or its allies would not get on the list.

2. Countries involved in or under imminent threat of hostilities would not get on the list.

3. Countries under United Nations Security Council's sanction would not get on the list.

4. Countries whose governments have a persistent record of serious human rights violations, unless it can be demonstrated that there is no reasonable risk that the goods might be used against their civilian population, would not get on the list.

Those are four very clear criteria.

Exports of automatic weapons would be permitted only to a government with which Canada concludes the necessary arrangements, or to a consignee authorized by that government. They would never go to civilians. This is a government to government sale under these stringent controls.

Applications to export automatic weapons will be reviewed on a case-by-case basis and will be subject to the same licensing procedures applied to all exports of military goods from Canada. Military goods are defined as those listed under Group 2 of the export control list. Automatic weapons are listed under item 2001—small arms and machine guns. These procedures include providing an end use statement and supporting document, and most notably an import certificate from the country of final destination. Applications to export automatic weapons to countries which comply with the above criteria would be closely controlled. In particular, all such applications would be subject to an interdepartmental review and would have to be approved personally by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The creation of the new stringent export controls, in particular the creation of the Automatic Firearms Country Control List, completely satisfies my concerns and those of the government with respect to arms control.

Canada will continue to advocate increased international restraint and effective controls on the export of conventional weapons. At the same time Canada continues to recognize that all countries have the right to self-defence as guaranteed under article 51 of the United Nations Charter. This bill will give Canadian firms the opportunity to help Canada's close allies and defence partners meet their legitimate defence requirements.

The bill does not represent any relaxation of Canada's export control policy. All exports of these weapons will be tightly controlled using the same stringent guidelines long applied to all exports of Canadian military goods. I might further add that Canada currently has defence production arrangements with 10 countries, of which Sweden is the only one that is not a member of NATO, hardly a country that we would say is a country we would not want to have this type of opportunity to export to.

An arrangement with Spain is under consideration at the present time. Cabinet could only include those countries on the Automatic Firearms Country Control List through an Order in Council should they qualify under the stringent controls that I have already pointed out.

This bill is of vital concern to the Canadian defence industry in general and, at this time, to the plant in my riding called Diemaco in particular.

In 1976, Diemaco was established by DND policy as the centre of excellence for the provision of small arms to the Canadian Armed Forces so Canada would not be totally dependent on foreign suppliers in times of emergency. This facility is unique in Canada and is fundamental in allowing the Department of National Defence to maintain its operational readiness.

Diemaco was awarded a contract to produce a new family of small arms for the Canadian Armed Forces back in the mid-1970s, resulting in 300 jobs at Diemaco and 200 jobs at its Canadian subcontractors, plus an equal number of jobs with other associated firms.

The end of this production for the Canadian Armed Forces is, however, approaching and this important industrial preparedness capability provided by Diemaco and its approximately 75 subcontractors stands to be lost now to Canada.

It must be stressed that these are high quality, technology-oriented jobs. The investment by the Canadian government of some $40 million in technology and computer-based manufacturing capability had made and will continue to make a significant contribution to Canada's competitiveness. The capabilities supported include product design engineering, manufacturing engineering, metal finishing, plastic moulding, precision casting forging, and machining and extrusion techniques.

Over the past few years Diemaco has been competing for a contract to provide the Ministry of Defence of the Netherlands with a family of small arms valued at more than $120 million, potentially followed by a further $100 million worth of spare parts and other support. Securing this contract will mean an initial 7,680 person-years of Canadian employment, with the potential of almost doubling the employment over the life of the project. Success will also ensure the ability to continue the development work necessary for new weapons systems for the Canadian Armed Forces into the next century. The Dutch have now begun a new testing phase with DND, supplied with rifles from Diemaco. Without this legislation in place the credibility of this proposal will obviously suffer.

The United States Department of Defence will be looking to Diemaco and its subcontractors for components to maintain its inventory of rifles and machine guns. This could involve 20 Canadian companies and export sales of $5 million.

Let me wrap up. We are correcting an oversight in the gun control legislation of 1978 for civilians, not armed forces. That is number one.

Number two. What we are doing is keeping a Canadian centre of excellence which the people of Canada, through the Government of Canada, have asked a firm to provide. Go out and hire the people. Go out and do the research. Together we will build this centre so that you can make the weapons for our Canadian Armed Forces.

We have a limited need. If we want that expertise to exist in Canada—I think we do—and if we want those kind of people to develop that expertise into the future, then they have to be able to export, at least to our friends and our allies.

That is all we are asking in this legislation. We are talking about basic military equipment for law enforcement and simple defence needs. These are not weapons of mass destruction. These weapons, such as the fully automatic weapon made in Kitchener, or the light armoured vehicle from GM in London, are for law enforcement and simple military defence needs.

This will be regulated with the the stringent controls I have outlined. With those stringent controls, this is a responsible piece of legislation correcting an oversight of the past.

• (1200)

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, let us just examine those stringent controls a little more carefully. The member has waxed eloquent about stringent controls. The English language gets completely twisted on its head. It reminds one of George Orwell.

This bill sets out in section 2 the following new section 4.1.

> The Governor in Council may establish a list of countries, to be called an Automatic Firearms Country Control List, including therein—

And I emphasize the word "including," not restricted to, but including therein—

> —any country with which Canada has an intergovernmental defence, research, development and production arrangement and to which the Governor in Council deems it appropriate to permit the export of a prohibited weapon described in the paragraph (c) or (e) of the definition "prohibited weapon" in subsection 84(1) of the Criminal Code, or components or parts thereof, that is included in an Export Control List.

As the member knows the bill goes on to say that the minister may issue an export permit provided the country of destination is one of the countries listed on the Automatic Firearms Country Control List.

There is no constraint whatever on cabinet as to what countries can be countries of destination. Any country on the globe, any dictator, any violator of human rights, any country that is a market for these weapons of destruction can be on this Automatic Firearms Country Control List. Parliament is imposing, through this bill, no constraint whatever on the cabinet. The country that this year makes a case a year ago could not have made a case. It 10 years ago could not have made a case on the basis of human rights violations, on the basis of being in the middle of the Middle East, an area of intense tension. Those countries could not then have made a case, but today can.

Next year, 10 years from now, even less savory dictatorships will be able to make that list. This bill provides no stringent controls. Not a scintilla of control is imposed by this bill.

The member is simply completely wrong. Why does the member not just come out clearly and say that this bill now permits the complete, unrestricted export of these weapons of destruction, weapons which have killed more human beings in this century than any other weapon ever invented. How does the member answer that?

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why the member opposite is saying that. The member opposite is saying that there is an absence of any control whatsoever, if I understand him correctly.

That is not what I said. I went through four specific criteria.

Mr. Brewin: That is just a matter of policy.

Mr. Reimer: These four specific criteria are very clear. They are very clear.

Mr. Brewin: That policy can be changed overnight.

Mr. Reimer: Any country that poses a threat to Canada or to its allies cannot be on the list. That is number one.

Mr. Barrett: That is not in the legislation.

Mr. Reimer: The member keeps talking from his seat, Mr. Speaker. He will have his opportunity, I am sure.

Mr. Barrett: That is not in the legislation.

Mr. Reimer: Second, with respect to these criteria which must be met before any country can get on that list, they are there for the Government of Canada to follow. It is openly publishing them here right now. It is saying that these are the criteria we will be following before a country can be on that list. I think, therefore, they are criteria that are very significant. However, the member is not listening.

Mr. Brewin: I was listening very carefully. On a point of order, the member—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that the hon. member for Kitchener has the floor. I would like him to reply to the questions and comments and get on with the debate because I have another great speaker coming up. The hon. member for Kitchener.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. Brewin: Just as it is not fair for a member to suggest another member is not in the House, it is not fair for the member to suggest that another member was not listening when I was listening to him and listening very—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kitchener will complete his remarks, please.

Mr. Reimer: Permit me to try again, Mr. Speaker, if I may. There are stringent controls and the criteria are very clear. Before any country can get on that list through an Order in Council, it must meet these four criteria: that country cannot pose a threat to Canada or its allies; it cannot be involved in or under imminent threat of hostilities; it cannot be under United Nations Security Council sanctions; and it cannot be a country which has a persistent record of serious violations of human rights. How much clearer do we have to be? The criteria are there and you cannot get on the list if you violate any of those four.

I have to say that the criteria are there. They are clear, public and known. Every year—

Mr. Brewin: They are changeable.

Mr. Reimer: The opposition likes to say "and they are changeable". These criteria are the new regime of stringent controls, which are being introduced in this bill and—

Mr. Brewin: No, they are not in the bill.

Mr. Reimer: If I may continue without the interruptions of the hon. member, they are the criteria by which the Government of Canada would add or consider adding a country to that list.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I am shocked that I am the next speaker. It comes as a great surprise to me that the great Liberal opposition has disappeared today on this particular debate. We know that the government has abandoned its principles, but now we find that the opposition is sitting on the fence. Where does the Liberal Party stand on this issue? We know the hypocrisy of this government and I will deal with that chapter and verse in a moment. You must help me in my shock and disappointment, Sir, to find that the Official Opposition refuses to take its place in this debate.

Mr. Bélair: Stop talking about others and talk about yourself.

Mr. Barrett: Talk about others. This is politics, my friend, and the political matter is clear on this issue. The government has taken one position, the New Democratic Party has taken another position, and the Liberals are hiding again. I have to say that because it is political. I do not like being political in this place because on occasion it has been noted that people have been partisan in this Chamber but the government has set a new arena for being partisan. You have to go to Japan to do that. Far be it from me to be partisan here at home. I am not in Japan, but I have to take my place in this debate.

The member who just spoke misspoke accidentally, but he left himself with the impression that the criteria he was talking about were in the bill. Nothing could be more incorrect. The member who spoke did an eloquent job speaking about something that was not in the bill and that confuses me. I know it is not out of order, but it confuses me. So how can he say the policy was in the bill when it is not in the bill? I did not get a chance to ask him what section of the bill he was referring to, but that is the way it is.

I have decided that what I would do is speak through the government's own words. I find it preferable, rather than giving an unrestricted point of view of my own, that I show some respect and dignity to the government of the day. This is not a change of temper in my approach to politics. It is just that once in a while I read things that the government says, and once in a while I would like to believe it. I have been shocked again even though I am young and ingénue in this whole process. I am shocked that the government is also playing a game of politics, saying one thing in one location and something else in another location.

The example I am going to give is appropriate because it took place in western Canada, a region largely unknown to members of this House and albeit it is a superior region of this country, we are modest about that superiority. This is what the former minister of external affairs made in his very pious mode.

• (1210)

I love to see him in his pious mode, when the fount of all wisdom comes down and says: "This government is going to take its place internationally and present this point of view".

Here he is with his best pious views out on his home turf, none other than Calgary. The Right Hon. Joe Clark at a luncheon hosted by the Calgary Chamber of Commerce, a hotbed of radical politics. What did he say on page 3?

Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring this to your attention because you are listening more than anyone else. This is what his rationalization was about the current follow-through on the war we voted against in the Middle East. I quote page 3 with some pontification.

"Canada did not put the lives of its men and women at risk for the sake of a few cents a litre on oil. No, no, no". He goes on to say: "Nor was this war about democracy"—that is interesting. "Kuwait is not a democracy of the Canadian sort, although there were signs before August 2 that it was moving in that direction".

If I may permitted an aside. Kuwait just sent a guy to jail for 15 years for wearing a T-shirt. I can imagine what is going to happen if this government goes down further in the polls and some bad youth comes out with a terrible picture of the Prime Minister on a T-shirt. Is he going to get 15 years?

"Kuwait is not a democracy. It is possible that Canadians would not choose the Kuwaiti system". It is impossible, but that is his definition. That is not the point. "Peace is not the province of the privileged who are lucky enough to be in democracies, the universal right. Aggression is a universal wrong". Piety number one.

Piety number two is on page 4: "That is why we are in the gulf. Not for oil, not for democracy, not for others, but for the principle that Canadians have always defended, a principle Canadians need if this country requires its security and prosperity to prevail. We are there based on the universal principles of international law".

I am going to get to more claptrap, but at this point I am just reading little excerpts.

This is a government that says, as a justification for going to war against Kuwait, and this is Mr. Clark in Calgary—

Mr. Hockin: Why are we talking about war. This is a different bill.

Mr. Barrett: We are going to get to his quotes on arms control. Just do not get nervous. He has even said things about arms control that are attached to this. He spoke to the Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Volpe: Are you going to table those, Dave?

Mr. Barrett: Table this? I will give you 1,000 copies. He goes on to say: "This government does not necessarily defend democracies". We saw that. This policy shifts day to day. When it says: "this is just defensive weapons," one begins to wonder about further hypocrisies.

This is the one that will grab your attention, Sir, and perhaps the attention of the Liberals. The former minister gave four reasons why we have to take the position we have.

Third, he said: "A durable peace will require addressing the full spectrum of problems that have plagued that region. That means dealing with other conflicts, including the Arab—Israeli conflict. That means addressing the symptoms of conflict, the proliferation of weapons and destruction and the arms trade, the constant chase for spheres of influence". How in the world is selling these arms to Saudi Arabia, a consistent violator of human rights—which my friend referred to as a policy matter—going to be consistent with the policies of that minister, the ones which say we have got to stop selling arms?

You cannot say one thing in Calgary and do something else when you are a government here in Ottawa, because someone will accuse the government of being hypocritical. If no one else does, for want of such an accusation, I will make it myself. The government is being hypocritical.

It says one thing in one part of the country. It says one thing in other speeches, but does something else by this bill here today. I am shocked, disappointed and, frankly, hurt. In my tender years I do not like to experience those emotions.

The government was fibbing. The minister in that speech could be accused of fibbing, and guess who did the accusation? No one other than Douglas Roche. I was not serving in this House when Douglas Roche was a member here, but he was a Conservative. He would never reach the low of being a Liberal; he was a Conservative. He sat in this House and he was appointed by this government as the ambassador for disarmament. He has an article in today's edition of The Toronto Star saying that the arms sale must be killed and gives all the reasons, as a former ambassador and a former Conservative, and this government is bringing in this bill.

Mr. Brewin: And supported by the Liberals.

Mr. Barrett: Is it supported by the Liberals?

Mr. Brewin: We don't know.

Mr. Barrett: We do not know what the Liberals do. This is the best in Liberal tradition. Maybe yes, maybe no; it is the old tango. The Liberals play the game any way they want. They can run out of here and say: "We are not for arms sales, but not necessarily for stopping the sale of arms". The Liberals invented Orwellian doublespeak. They are the experts at it. When they cannot even dance on the fence they do not dance at all. They do not even participate in the debate. Where are those great spokespersons from the Liberal Party?

Mr. Hockin: Now you're talking, Dave.

Mr. Barrett: That is true. When the government becomes a hypocrite it is right up front about being a hypocrite. You have got to admire its honesty. When the government is hypocritical it is open, honest hypocrisy which anybody can understand. The Tory's hypocrisy is there for everybody to see, but the Liberal's hypocrisy is being hidden and that is not fair in the political arena of this country. Hidden hypocrisy is worse than principled hypocrisy, even though the government practises principled hypocrisy.

Look at this quote on page 6 from the hon. former minister of external affairs. This is a lovely quote. This went over with senatorial tones by the former minister. This is what he said in Calgary, Alberta, where nobody in central Canada would report it. He said: "28 nations supplied both Iran and Iraq during the eight-year war. Between 1984 and 1988 the dollar value of major weapons exports to Iraq was higher than any other country in the developing or developed world. During the same period, middle eastern countries occupied five of the top six spots as destinations for arms. The Middle East, much of it underdeveloped, has spent a larger portion of its Gross National Product on arms than any other region in the world. There is a worrying, parallel phenomenon of the growth of new suppliers in the developing world, many of whom put few restrictions on their arms exports".

Hypocrisy, shocking, naked, unvarnished hypocrisy coming from this government denying what the minister himself said in Calgary. He said he would not do it and that it is a shame on developing countries that are doing it. Who the heck is now selling guns into that region? Oh, they are just automatic weapons. They are okay; they are safe. You only have to pull the trigger once, so when you kill somebody you spread it around. It diminishes your moral responsibility. If you have to pull the trigger every time then you are more morally responsible, but since they are automatic weapons it diminishes the morality. That is the kind of quixotic thinking that goes on over there in its sheer naked hypocrisy.

Mr. Hockin: Nonsense.

Mr. Barrett: It is nonsense. I am glad that the member agrees with me. I am glad that I have got one Tory who has come to his senses. If I only knew his name and the seat he represented, I would broadcast exactly who yelled out "nonsense" at the government's policy. I welcome his frank, open admission here on this day of our Lord, May 30, 1991. I will take your name and mail what you said to your constituents.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I resent that the hon. member does not know my name or my riding. It is London West. I do have to object to what he just said by way of hypocrisy. The government is very clear in this bill that we are not dealing in weapons of mass destruction. We have made that point very clear right from the beginning. That is why I am rising on the point of order.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, now we have a new dimension of doublespeak. The Conservatives are trying to get into debate under points of order, something that I have wanted to do on occasion I confess. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is true on occasion I have violated parliamentary rules the same way. That is why I am able to recognize it so quickly.

Nonsense is the operative word. The government says in a speech in Calgary that sending arms into that region is a violation of all common sense and then three months later it is in the business of peddling guns there.

Will we be confronted with the same kind of pious nonsense when the next outbreak of war takes place in the Middle East and the government rushes in to assist, declaring peace must be brought to the region and we find that it is our own arms and it is our own vehicles that have been part and parcel of the killing in the region? Is there a question of morality here? I think so. But the overwhelming morality is the hypocrisy of the statements, as I go on reading from the speech of the minister.

I want to go to page 8 of the same speech in Calgary by the minister. He says: "We will propose that the countries who are signatory to the conventional forces agreement in Europe undertake not to export arms affected by that agreement to countries outside Europe". Here is a clear-cut statement of Canada's position by that minister. The statement was made on March 8. Here we are on May 30 violating what the minister said would be Canada's position. If that is not hypocrisy I do not know what is.

The minister, speaking for the Canadian government, announced to all Canadians at a Chamber of Commerce meeting: "We will propose that countries who are signatory to the conventional forces agreement in Europe undertake not to export arms affected by the agreement to countries outside Europe". Is Saudi Arabia outside Europe? Unless the map has been dramatically changed, unless there has been another heretical view by the Papal Nuncio on Galileo's view of the world, Saudi Arabia is still not in Europe. It is a direct contradiction of what the minister promised the Canadian people and said the Canadian government was going to do.

I know this bill is being brought in on a day when the Prime Minister is not in the country. The Prime Minister would not stand for this hypocrisy. If the Prime Minister were here today he would defend the policy announced by his government. It is a rebellious group of government backbenchers and cabinet ministers who have grasped this opening and decided to revolt against the statements of the Prime Minister no matter how revolting those statements are and contradict the position of the government.

I ask the government before it is further embarrassed to withdraw this bill and consult with the author of the statement who promised that the Canadian government position would be no sale of arms outside of Europe. If they do not do this, someone will use stronger language and call the government liars. They might do that. They cannot do it by name but they can certainly call a party liars.

That is my fear. Some young witness on television or in the gallery here today might say: "My goodness gracious, the government is lying". I do not want that to happen. I suggest they either withdraw the bill or get the government to clarify the promise made by the minister that they would not sell outside of Europe.

I want to confess. Those admonitions I have been giving to myself and others about my being an ingénue are not true. I have seen hypocrisy before but I have never seen it as clear as this. I do not want to mislead the House, Mr. Speaker. I have come to the conclusion that this government is hypocritical, that this debate is a farce, when this government goes outside of this Chamber and makes promises elsewhere and comes in and does something else.

If you are going to sell arms, come up front, do not lie about it to the people of this country and to our European neighbours and say you are not going to do it. Do not tell them to do something you are not prepared to do. Do not go around lying in the world that somehow you are some kind of wonderful paragons of virtue when in fact you deny your own promises made just on March 8 of this year by the former secretary of state.

Do not lie to the Canadian people. Be up front and say that you are in the arms sale business. We understand your position, but the hypocrisy and lying from this government is what is completely unacceptable.

As for the Liberals, my last word to them is: "Stay on the fence". They might win an election that way. Never again will the Canadian people put up with the kind of claptrap with the Liberals denying any position at all and hoping to get votes for it.

Where the heck do you stand on this issue, you Liberals in the Official Opposition. We know where they stand. What are you hiding from? How will you vote on this? We are anxious to see.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): First, Mr. Speaker, let me congratulate the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, my neighbour in the Victoria area, on another very powerful speech.

The issues that this bill addresses are far broader than that of the sales of particular arms. They go right to the very fundamentals of where this country is going with respect to its international policy and its role, as it sees it, in the world.

We have the comments of the former Secretary of State for External Affairs as referred to—

Mr. Hockin: Question. Question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Brewin: I know I am a new member and I have a lot to learn but I understood this is questions and comments.

I am prefacing, eventually, a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member does have an opportunity to have a short comment, and then put a question to the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the underlying long-term basic policy issue that this bill puts front and centre is the issue of whether we are going to be a leader in restraining the sale of arms or we are going to continue to participate in the business of selling arms around the world.

The most recent figures show that the average annual sales or export of arms by Canada reached $1.5 billion, earning Canada a place in the top 15 military suppliers in the 1980s, according to the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute.

The real issue now is how we are going to begin to turn this around.

The member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has been for his whole political career a defender of the position of workers in British Columbia and across Canada.

I would like to give him the opportunity to outline his thoughts on how workers in this situation should best be looked after and protected. Is it to pass a bill like this, or does the member have, as I know he does, alternatives in mind?

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, someone suggested that was a planted question.

Unfortunately, our planning was not good today and it is not a planted question.

I will address it in terms of a global view since the minister whom I quoted was taking a global view. Let us take, for example, one area of government policy, the export of oil and natural gas.

If this government were serious about building a sovereign, firm, industrial base in this country to provide meaningful jobs for Canadians, it would cut down on our export of raw materials, particularly oil and gas, and start building an industrial base on those energy products.

Why, for example, are we shipping our Canadian oil into the United States and subsidizing American truckers' jobs with cheap Canadian crude oil that is made from both light and heavy oil into industrial products, and for industrial use in transportation? Why are we doing that?

We could put a surtax on exported oil to force the Americans to bring the price of their transportation costs up to our level. Just as this government acquiesced to a surtax on forest industry goods from British Columbia, we should do the other.

• (1230)

What would we do with the money? We would expand the industrial base. Alberta could be the foundation of a major petrochemical industry. Certainly the export of LNG should be a consideration for western Canada. We should be building ships in this country after the United Nations' admonition that 40 per cent of all raw materials leaving any nation should go on that nation's ships, built by that nation's shipyards, and manned by that nation's crews. We don't have a merchant fleet left any more.

These are not things of startling revelation, but my colleague asked me to give a couple of examples of what we could be doing if we were a government of determination. Those are things that are simple and that would more than employ tens of thousands of people in this country. Part of the price of doing business with the Japanese in terms of the export of LNG, which I favour, would be to do it through ships built in Canada, manned by Canadian crews. Why not? There is a whole range of things.

Is the selling of arms the only thing that we have left to create jobs. Is that the lack of vision? I cannot believe it. We have highly skilled and highly paid professionals within the bureaucracy of this government who can come up with these ideas and many others.

I am not a Christian, but I noted with some interest that the member ended up his comments with a quote from one of the prophets, about beating your weapons into ploughshares. I puzzle about Christians sometimes. Do they really mean what they say? All those prayer breakfasts that the members of Parliament go to, is it a charade? This trade in arms is immoral. It is against what we say in daily prayer in this Chamber, and yet we are going to go ahead with it. That is hypocrisy, too. I wonder about it.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak in a quiet temperate way on this bill, because it does not deserve the kind of hyperbole that we have had to listen to for the last 25 minutes. The facts behind this bill are rather dull and mundane and bureaucratic. They have nothing to do with the great questions of principle that the hon. member wanted to bring forward, nothing to do with the Old Testament or the New Testament, and nothing to do with the war in Iraq.

This bill has to do with export permits and restricting export permits for these kinds of weapons. It also concerns redressing an anomaly that existed in our industrial base for a very limited class of military equipment. Certainly it has nothing to do with weapons of mass destruction. The hon. member tried to, in his hyperbole, drag in images of mass destruction, the Old and New Testaments, Middle East conflict and so on. None of that is really relevant to this bill.

I will not repeat what the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and the Minister for International Trade has said earlier today. He has outlined the details of the bill.

I wanted to outline two things, first of all from the point of view of being a minister of state in the department of industry, and second as a member of Parliament from London, Ontario. Close examination of this bill will make it clear that it is totally consistent with all that the government has said concerning the proliferation of weapons and controlling the arms trade. The government is seeking support for proposals to increase controls on the world's arms trade, in particular exports which contribute to programs to develop weapons of mass destruction. This remains a policy and we have put in place to that effect.

We are also working actively in the UN to encourage greater transparencies in arms transfers. That is exactly what this bill does. It makes everything transparent. It is not hypocritical. In fact what we are doing is transparent, greater transparency in arms transports through measures such as establishing an international arms transfer register. In a unilateral effort to bring greater transparency to arms transfers, Canada has begun publishing annual reports on exports of arms from Canada. This is not hypocrisy; this is transparency.

We believe this is an important subject and must be handled properly and with clarity.

At the same time, we recognize that all countries have a legitimate right to self-defence. What the hon. member misses is that every country must have a limited stock of rifles, for example, to defend itself through its police forces as well as its military, and also for internal peace purposes. Even more important, you have to transport your troops. You put your troops in a truck; you can put them in an open truck or you can put them in a covered, light armoured vehicle which can have a turret for defence, but not a weapon of mass destruction. That is really what we are talking about.

They take those two very mundane parts of the storage of any police force or any military and they make them sound like weapons of mass destruction. They are not. It is a very pragmatic supply for one's own security.

It means that we are going to be making these things in Canada. Is that not a good idea? Do we have to buy everything? Does the hon. member want to buy all of these light armoured vehicles from other countries? Does he want to buy all rifles from other countries? We are going to be making these. We do not have a big enough market here in Canada to make them just for the Canadian market. If we are going to be world class and have a centre of excellence in this particular product, we have to export. That is what this bill is allowing to happen.

This bill is a bureaucrat's delight in the sense that there are a number of permits that have to be achieved before any kind of export can take place. Designations have to take place; agreements have to take place; there has to be a publishing of the regulations. This thing is so transparent it is the very opposite of hypocrisy. It is being honest and straightforward with the Canadian people.

The bill is one that does not deserve the kind of hyperbole and high temperature that the hon. member tried to bring forward.

What does it mean? In my home town the hon. member would expect me to stand up as a member of Parliament from London West. I notice the Liberal member from London East has also supported this, along with the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Auto Workers and intercorporate council for General Motors. This means 10,000 person years of employment for not just the London area, but for subcontractors across Canada.

I want to give some sort of sense of what this would mean. If we decided to buy our light armoured vehicles, for example, from another country, close down that business, we would be saying goodbye to close to 1,000 workers in the London plant, to say nothing of the hundreds, perhaps thousands of subcontractors helping with this product. It is a benign transport vehicle with a rifle on a turret. That is all it is. It is not a weapon of mass destruction.

These are integral to our own defence. They are integral to other countries' defences. Why do we not make them here? That is all this bill does. It allows it to be done and to give employment. It is very interesting.

You would expect a member from London to stand up and just talk about its impact for London, Ontario. Ultimately it is more important for reasons beyond that. I am also talking about jobs in Richmond, British Columbia; Vancouver; Edmonton, Alberta; Winnipeg, Manitoba; I am talking about high-tech skills being maintained in Quebec City. I am talking about industrial benefits and export earnings centred in Nova Scotia, in Mulgrave and Bridgewater.

The economic benefits of Bill C-6 extend all the way to St. John's, Newfoundland, directly, indirectly in the short term, in the long term and most importantly, in terms of jobs and dollars. The economic benefits for the country as a whole which flow from this are really quite astounding. The potential immediate contracts in the offing are close to $1 billion. For any country's military, an industrial source of contracts for $1 billion is an immense job creator, an immense centre of excellence, and that is what this bill will help do. It gives economic spin-offs, perhaps double or triple, direct employment perhaps approaching 10,000 person years, and future contracts, as yet unvalued, but similar in magnitude to what I have just mentioned.

Mr. Dickerson, the secretary-treasurer of the intercorporate council of General Motors, supports this bill very much. He would not support it if we were making weapons of mass destruction, but when we are making essentially a transportation vehicle, he does support it. He supports it because of the jobs for his union and the jobs for the subcontractors and their employees.

The heart of this bill is that we are restricting access through restricting the Export and Import Permits Act. We are creating jobs and we are dealing with a bureaucratic anomaly. The bill does not deserve a great deal of debate in this House.

What we should do is look at what it is. It is a pragmatic solution to a bureaucratic anomaly. That is all it is, but it also does help us to have a centre of excellence in two industrial categories which are very important for thousands of Canadians.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member who has just spoken could answer one question for me and maybe even a couple.

Would the secretary-treasurer of the CAW, who was quoted as saying that he supports this, not be equally supportive of any move that was going to create the same number of jobs or sustain the same kind of employment?

It is not this particular work that the secretary-treasurer is interested in. It is just that he would rather have employment than unemployment. That is the question, really.

The other one is this. The hon. member mentioned it is just automatic rifles and light armoured vehicles that we are producing. Canada needs those for the defence of its own country.

From what potential aggressors would we be defending ourselves with a lot more rifles and a lot more light armoured vehicles?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member's first question, you have to live in the real world.

There are no contracts for General Motors diesel division, outside of the locomotive division, in the offing. There are contracts for this transportation vehicle. That is what we are dealing with.

We cannot deal with potential jobs that may or may not arrive for some other product. There is no other product on the horizon. This one is there. It is a transportation vehicle which could be used by the UN. It could be used by any civil power that wanted to transport its police. It is a transportation vehicle.

It is equipped with a turret and an automatic weapon just to defend it. For example, if you were defending your own country in a state of siege, and you were under attack from hand grenades or whatever, you would have to have some sort of facility. You are not just going to be a sitting duck but you are going to deter that kind of attack.

I am not going to hypothesize what kind of civil disturbances in Canada might occur which would give rise to this or what kind of disturbances could occur elsewhere which might give rise to this.

All I am saying is that you cannot have a transportation vehicle with no means to deter people who want to throw a hand grenade at it or whatever. That is what this is for. It is not a tank which rushes into an offensive position.

It is a transportation vehicle which is very lightly armoured and has this automatic capacity simply as a defence against any kind of rush that might occur against it.

That is what we are talking about. We are not talking about weapons of mass destruction. We are not even talking about a tank.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the member for London West says that this is just a transportation vehicle.

Let me see whether he would agree with the following description of the light armoured vehicle: "In its many variations, all of which are included in the Saudi Sale, it can be used as a troop carrier, a communications command centre, a towing vehicle, a mortar launcher or an anti-tank weapon. Virtually all vehicles carry machine guns. Some may carry rocket launchers or cannons."

According to a GM spokesperson: "Military leaders of smaller countries may like its capacity to quell civil disturbances."

Let me ask the minister if he agrees with his colleague, the former trade minister, who said about these weapons: "We are discussing automatic weapons, that is, rifles and other small arms of that nature, machine guns and the like, which are necessary for armies, police forces and civil authorities to have if they are to be in a position to keep order in their own countries."

This bill is not about the vehicles. This bill is about the automatic weapons that are to be placed on these vehicles. The sale of the vehicles themselves was approved before this bill saw the light of day. The change that the government is seeking is a change in the Criminal Code which presently prohibits the export and import of automatic weapons. It is changing the Criminal Code, in section 8 of the bill, to permit a waiver of the Criminal Code provisions in respect to export of otherwise prohibited weapons, namely automatic weapons, to any country the government chooses.

The purpose of the bill deals strictly with the weapons themselves, not with the vehicles. As noted, the former minister of trade says: "We are discussing weapons which civil authorities may need if they are to be in a position to keep order in their own countries". How does the government justify this on any moral or ethical basis whatever?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I must ask the hon. member a question. If we have a peacekeeping operation, let us say in Cyprus for example, there are transport troops. If there are terrorists surrounding this transportation vehicle, the troops need some means of deterring those terrorists. That is why it has this turret. It is not a weapon of mass destruction. It is like a policeman who is carrying a gun. The hon. member wants our peacekeeping forces, wants UN peacekeeping forces, to be in a vehicle with no means of deterrence whatsoever. That is all the light armour does. That is all the automatic weapon does.

He would like to ensure that any peacekeeping operation, any NATO operation is completely denuded of this capacity. This bill makes certain that there is a deterrent. As a matter of fact, without this bill we could not allow exports to a country that was going to engage in a peacekeeping activity, for example, in Cyprus, the Middle East or whatever. Without this bill we could not export to our NATO friends.

I know my hon. friend across the aisle does not care about NATO but Canadians support NATO. Three-quarters of Canadians support NATO very strongly. We cannot export this product to them either.

This product allows us to be a centre of excellence in this particular industry. This is a transportation vehicle that is very lightly armoured and can be used for peacekeeping, can be used for police purposes. In nine cases out of ten, if not every case, it will be used in a context which we will approve of, which is primarily peacekeeping in nature.

The hon. member's particular suggestion would mean that our peacekeeping forces, if they use this vehicle, would not have any means of deterrence whatsoever. It would make them a sitting duck and highly vulnerable. Therefore, this bill is responsible. It is transparent and, frankly, it is just a bureaucratic change to remove an anomaly that was in the Criminal Code.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the minister might well make any observations with respect to this particular vehicle. As I understand this new bill, the Canadian government would be permitted to distribute in this instance this particular vehicle with a gun on its turret—whether it would be for peacekeeping or for its potential use in a war zone situation—to any country. The government has not put any restrictions in this bill as I understand it.

Could the minister please enlighten me as to how the government would control which countries would be allowed to get access to these vehicles from Canada? Is there going to be any kind of control? Is there going to be any list of criteria? Will the human rights criteria which we have supported so ardently and feel so strongly about be a fundamental criterion?

• (1250)

If it were, where would you put Saudi Arabia in that regard? I do not think Amnesty International has given Saudi Arabia a very fine grade or mark. I could understand our distributing or giving access to the Netherlands, as a NATO partner, or to be a participant in the forces that would be the new forces in Europe. However, I certainly do not see how we can have no restrictions, no accountability and no yardstick of measure in the distribution of any kind of war games and war toys.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the controls come in two stages and I will be very careful in outlining them here.

If these amendments are adopted today, it is quite right, as the hon. member asked, to say: "Well what controls will apply to the export and import of automatic weapons?" It is a reasonable question and it is a responsible question.

The controls will be applied in two stages. First of all, a defence, research, development and production agreement will have to exist between Canada and the country of final destination. That country will have to be included on the Automatic Firearms Country Control List maintained under the Export and Import Permits Act. If an arrangement does not already exist, let us say a country wants to be a customer and we do not have an arrangement, one would have to be negotiated and the proposal to add the country to the Automatic Firearms Country Control List would have to be approved by cabinet through an Order in Council. The Canadian government will closely control proposals to establish arrangements with countries.

Let us say we are uncomfortable with a country that applies. These are some examples of where we will closely control any proposals to establish arrangements: first, countries which pose a threat to us or our allies; second, countries involved in or under imminent threat of hostilities; third, countries under United Nations Security Council sanctions; fourth, countries whose governments have a persistent record of serious violations of the human rights of their citizens, unless it can be demonstrated that there is no reasonable risk that the goods might be used against the civilian population.

Export of automatic weapons would be permitted only to a government with which Canada concludes the necessary arrangement or to a consignee authorized by the government.

Applications to export automatic weapons will be reviewed on a case-by-case basis and will be subject to the same licensing procedures applied to all exports of military goods from Canada.

As we all know, these include an end use statement, supporting documentation and so on. This, frankly, is a bureaucrat's delight. There are a great many transparencies in the act. It will be dealt with on a case-by-case basis.

I think that will deal with the hon. member's very responsible question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

The House took recess at 12.53 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

HONG KONG VETERANS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, just before he left on his far east trip, the Prime Minister received a letter from our Hong Kong Veterans Association reminding him that Japan had never apologized for its treatment of them.

On Tuesday, we saw how effectively that message was carried across the Pacific when Japanese Prime Minister Kaifu apologized for what he described as the "unbearable suffering" his country brought to the Canadian servicemen. The apology, according to at least Southam News, went far beyond anything expected.

We realize that nothing can properly make up for what our Hong Kong veterans went through in the war. However, it is some consolation to know that their ordeal was a big reason why Canada became one of the first countries in the world to pay prisoner of war compensation.

In fact, our country has paid out over $50 million in POW compensation to former prisoners of the Japanese or their dependants. No amount of money can fully compensate our Hong Kong veterans for what they endured, nor can words, but yesterday's apology in Tokyo shows that their bravery in action and courage in captivity is acknowledged.

On behalf of the veterans in my riding, I want to say how pleased we are with this result.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, 1991 marks the 10th anniversary of the International Year of the Disabled and the end of the Decade of the Disabled.

In 1985 Canada showed its support for disabled persons by issuing a declaration on the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons. Since then, however, Canada's record of leadership and action on disability issues has been poor.

The rights of disabled persons have still not been officially acknowledged by a United Nations convention. Such international recognition would go a long way to ensuring the rights of all persons with disabilities.

The theme of National Access Awareness Week is "Access is a Right". This government must take the initiative and make that come true at both a national and international level.

I call on this government to show real leadership and true commitment to disabled Canadians and to disabled persons throughout the world, and ask that it seek to establish a United Nations convention that will recognize and support the rights of all disabled persons.

U.S. IMMIGRATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make the House aware of recent actions by U.S. government officials which amount to nothing more than paranoid harassment.

Six members of the Moravian Church in Nicaragua travelled to Winnipeg last week as part of an exchange program with the United Church. Two of the six, a 60–year old fisherman and a 25–year old secretary, did not have their U.S. entry visas before the group left Managua.

When the group arrived in Miami they had to stay overnight to wait for their connecting flight to Winnipeg. U.S. Immigration officials quickly separated the two from the group, forbade them to communicate with the others, and held them under armed guard. In fact, the two were escorted by armed guard all the way until their flight left the ground after a stop in Minneapolis.

The actions of the U.S. Immigration officials were way out of line. These people all had valid travel documents, Canadian visas, return air tickets and a letter from the Moravian Church naming the six as members of an inter–church exchange program.

It is bad enough that they had to go all the way to Costa Rica and pay $40 to get their Canadian visas to go on this trip. This harassment from the U.S. officials just made matters worse, and I call on the U.S. ambassador with the hope that our Nicaraguan friends will not be subjected to the same treatment on the way home.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, regarding the gun control bill, as you know I would have preferred legislation with stricter controls on firearms. I would have preferred to see military, paramilitary and modified semi-automatic weapons taken out of circulation altogether.

However, I must consider the pros and cons, which means whether to keep the present legislation which is defective in the extreme, or accept new legislation as a compromise solution that may not be perfect but will at least restrict access to firearms.

Finally, since I am being asked to look favourably on this bill and accept a compromise, I hope my pro-gun colleagues will do the same.

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, a few years ago I said that Edison could not have invented the electric light bulb if he depended on this government's science and technology policy. That is still true today. Do we need further proof that the government cannot be taken seriously when it promises to ensure the prosperity of Canadians? Once again, we have it in the form of the government's reply to a recent report by the Standing Committee of the House on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development.

The government rejected all the recommendations made by the committee. It does not seem to understand the challenge that globalization represents for our economy. It does not seem to understand that the jobs of Canadians, economic prosperity and maintaining our social programs all depend on increased investment in science and technology.

The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology has now promised Canadians a new debate on prosperity. We do not need a debate. We need action. Unfortunately, this government's actions are a clear contradiction of what we were promised.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, last week the government released a further example of its commitment to deficit reduction because of a crisis in its popularity.

The 1990 annual report of the Public Service of Canada showed that for the second consecutive year the size of the public service actually increased, for an increase of 6,335 since 1988. As well, for the fourth consecutive year the highest paid levels of the public service, the management category, increased.

Last fall the Auditor General had pointed to a certain lack of urgency in the government's efforts to control spending. Despite all its talk about restraint, we see a government which sees urgency the result of crisis, not commitment. It should be of little wonder that this government's budgets do not balance when its words and deeds do not.

If Canadians want sincere commitment to fiscal restraint, they need to send Reformers to Parliament.

RURAL CRIME WATCH

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, breaking and entering, theft, vandalism and trespassing are steadily increasing in rural Alberta. Rural Crime Watch, a co-operative effort by rural people and the RCMP, is confronting this situation.

Rural Crime Watch is an organization of rural people working together to reduce crime and protect property. They are creating public awareness and promoting crime prevention.

Three basic elements of the Rural Crime Watch are: property identification, house and building security, and range patrol. Rural crime is costing us millions of dollars each year. These costs are reflected in loss of property, increased insurance premiums and repair of equipment. Rural Crime Watch is helping to reduce these costs.

On behalf of the citizens of St. Albert riding, I wish to recognize the efforts of all those involved in Rural Crime Watch, working with the RCMP to make rural Alberta a safer place to live.

GUN CONTROL

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Minister of Justice announced the long awaited gun control bill.

The minister laboured and brought forth a maybe. While the intentions may be honourable, we are worried on this side of the House about the follow-through. Much of the heart of the matter will be left to subordinate legislation, that is regulation.

I call on the minister today to present with the greatest of speed her proposed regulations so that all sides of the House may study them and so that she may show to us that her much vaunted statements about public security and public safety are backed up in the appropriate manner.

We also call upon the minister to reduce the life of the firearms acquisition certificate from five years to two years, to impose its acquisition for each firearm acquired, and to extend its use to the purpose of ammunition.

We on this side of the House look forward to discussion on this vital issue. We look forward to the passage of a bill which shows Canada taking its place as the country on earth with the sanest gun laws.

TAXATION

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, every member in this House shares the view that measures have to be taken to strengthen the Canadian economy and has his or her own theory as to the best manner by which to accomplish this.

Let us throw this one out for discussion: a tax reduction, and more specifically a tax cut, in the level of Canadian income tax.

• (1410)

The United States tried this in the 1960s with great success and in fact spurred the strongest period of sustained economic growth in the history of that country.

In 1981, when the same strategy was again implemented, there was an economic resurgence that lasted eight years.

A 10 per cent cut in the Canadian income tax rate would go a long way in boosting investment and economic strength in this country.

Let us open it up for discussion. Would it work? Should we try it? Let us debate it.

FEDERAL SUPERANNUATES

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, federal superannuates across the country have been waiting for over five years for this government to make desperately needed reforms to their pensions. The government has promised but has not delivered.

There is presently close to $70 billion sitting in federal pension funds and increasing at a rate of about $3 billion a year. At the same time surviving spouses' benefits are largely inadequate, and it has been years since the death benefit payment has been raised.

Is it any wonder that federal superannuates want an independent pension management board with the power to manage the pension fund.

They also want the government to remove all forms of discrimination based on such factors as age and marital status. This is necessary to bring the legislation in line with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Pension Benefits Standards Act, and the House of Commons committee on equality rights.

Federal superannuates like other pensioners in this country have contributed much to the development and growth of this nation. Pensioners everywhere deserve to receive pensions that will allow them to live with dignity and respect. The federal government should be leading the way. Let us give pensioners the proper recognition they so rightly deserve.

ALLERGY AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, the month of May marks allergy awareness month and I wish to take the opportunity to salute the Allergy Information Association, the largest voluntary agency in this field. For over 25 years it has alerted Canadians to the hidden dangers of living with allergies by promoting awareness, by lobbying for accurate textile labelling, and by providing authoritative advice to their fellow Canadians who may suffer from allergies.

Allergies to natural and man-made substances cause reactions that vary from person to person. Some find allergies to be minor irritations, others are handicapped, and in some instances allergic reactions are tragically fatal.

We need to increase our awareness and understanding of allergies and their causes. As is so often the case, education is the key. By knowing the ingredients in everyday products we use and by being aware of the pollutants in our environment we can learn to live safely with our allergies.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the performance of the President of the Treasury Board in the last 36 hours would be laughable if he were not playing tragically with the lives of half a million Canadians.

In a spectacular reversal of the February 26 budget announcement, the minister told Public Service union leaders yesterday that there will be no wage increase this year, not even for those who are earning $16,000 a year. No wonder the deficit and debt are so high if the government's idea of managing is to change its mind on a whim and leave others to deal with the fall-out.

This is the same minister who just a month ago said that with 12,000 reductions every year in the Public Service, there is no reason there could not be a 3 per cent increase.

Where were they for the last month? Did they not know what their budget situation is? Employees' livelihood and service to Canadians are in the crossfire while the minister blithely sits back and turns up the heat on the battlefield. Perhaps he should join his leader in Japan who seems to have an equally perverse sense of what he should do and say to benefit the country.

ABITIBI'S ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Opposition members have some catching up to do on the news from Quebec.

On April 21, 1991, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney announced that the minister and member for Roberval, the hon. Benoît Bouchard, would be Minister of National Health and Welfare and also the minister responsible for regional economic development in Quebec.

Since 1984, together with Benoît Bouchard, I have fought for the economy of the region, in co-operation with local communities. Since 1984, federal Liberal members, members of the New Democratic Party and, today, Bloc Québécois members have avoided any involvement in decisions on issues such as: CANMET; tax benefits for isolated areas; airports servicing Val-d'Or, Amos and Lebel-sur-Quévillon; the shelter in Barraute; the Article 25 and Défi étudiant projects; the establishment of community development projects in Senneterre, Barraute, Lebel-sur-Quévillon, Amos, Matagami, Joutel, Val-d'Or, Malartic and Cadillac, and many other important issues in the riding.

Mr. Speaker, the minister and member for Roberval, Benoît Bouchard, has worked hard to ensure that Abitibi gets its share of federal money, and he will continue to do so in Quebec.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future says that while a great many Canadians see bilingualism as a worthy personal goal, they reject the present official languages policy and favour a more flexible and practical approach such as delegating language jurisdiction to the provinces or having French as the official language in Quebec and English as the official language everywhere else.

Professor Jean Laponce of the University of British Columbia suggests that we can address these concerns by adopting the Swiss solution, where money, goods and people move freely across the country but language rights do not. They are attached to places and not to people.

Since the minister responsible for constitutional affairs says that the government has decided to give this House the opportunity to demonstrate its capacity to serve the interests of the country in the most open and innovative way, is it not time we tackled this head on?

DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, during National Access Awareness Week, all Canadians are urged to work together to make our country equally accessible for all its citizens and to think about ways to integrate persons with visible and invisible disabilities.

National Access Awareness Week focuses on improving access to transportation, housing, employment, education and recreation. As was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, this government will propose a five-year strategy for ensuring equal access to employment, training, housing and transportation, and for promoting community integration and public sensitivity. Canadians from all walks of life must work together to remove the barriers faced by disabled persons.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On May 15 the secretary of state said with regard to the Al-Mashat affair: "A report was made. It is as complete as it can be and it tells people what they need to know. The report speaks for itself".

Today a second report was made public.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: There seem to be some interjections during the preamble of the hon. member's question. I would hope, unless they are very properly addressed, they would remain for some other time, until we make very clear whether there is any need for any interjections. The hon. member.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comments.

On May 15 a report was made public by the secretary of state which, as I quoted, indicated that all the facts, all the details, were full, complete and accurate.

Another report was made public today which totally contradicts report number one. Forty of the forty-seven paragraphs in the second report contradict or give new information.

Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs adopting the words that were used in another context by a U.S. President, that this first report is now inoperative? Is she still prepared to stand fully behind report number one as she said she would, even though report number two contradicts it?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this morning I and two other ministers set aside two and a half hours to go through the very documents that the hon. member is alluding to.

I have since indicated that I am prepared to go through this again this afternoon, even though I am supposed to be in this Chamber this afternoon making a speech.

I am not going to be here making a speech. I am going to be before the committee, and I would hope the hon. member would come then and deliver his question at that time.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not consider this a game. I consider it very serious business of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my second question is directed to the same minister. On May 14, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated in her report on the Al-Mashat affair, thereby contradicting every principle of ministerial responsibility, that Mr. Chrétien, Associate Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, was the only public servant to blame for the way this case was handled. Today's report proves Mr. Chrétien innocent. I want to ask the minister: Does she still blame Mr. Chrétien?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of blaming anyone. We are only talking about a report. I will answer all questions before the committtee this afternoon, in English and in French.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I just simply point out that the minister is quoted as saying: "I don't think one should underestimate the impact this could have on their reputations". In other words, we now have another contradiction of a report.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to put this question. In report number two that was made public this morning, there is a very glaring discrepancy between statements that were made in this House in Question Period by the Prime Minister and by other ministers that they had no knowledge of any of these events until April 30. Yet in report number two, and I would like to quote, it states: "Copies of this note were sent to the legislative assistant and the deputy press officer at the Prime Minister's Office, the legislative assistant of the Deputy Prime Minister's office, the legislative assistant at the office of the Government of the Senate, the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs," and another long list of the offices of over eight ministers, plus their parliamentary secretaries, plus an armload of officials, all knew about it April 8, even though the first report said it was April 30.

I want to ask the minister, does she still stand by the first report and say that everything in it was the unvarnished truth when her own second report totally contradicts all those statements made in the House?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, let the record show that the minister is refusing to answer questions.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, we now have two versions of what happened in the Al-Mashat case. We have version A that was released by the government on May 13 and we have version B that was released today.

I have a very specific question. In version A it states at page one and I quote: "Mr. Al-Mashat was not considered a valuable source of intelligence and that there was no evidence that his life was in any imminent danger". Version B, at page 7, it says and I quote: "He could provide useful information. In addition his life was considered to be in almost certain danger if he returned to Iraq".

My question to the minister is: Which version is the truth, version A or version B?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, both of these documents are before committee and this morning we were quite prepared to answer all of those questions. We are quite prepared to answer them this afternoon before committee and will be happy to do so at the appropriate time.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, version A says at page one that "the defectors committee had decided on March 1 that Mr. Al-Mashat did not qualify as a defector". Version B that was tabled today says that "on March 1 the defectors committee made no final decision concerning his defector status".

Again, I ask the minister, who is consistently refusing to answer questions and it is becoming—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I have allowed the question and the minister can answer it if she wishes. I want to point out to all hon. members and to the public, there is no particular rule, and in fact there is no rule, that says that a minister has to answer questions. If the minister does not answer the question, hon. members can take the reason for that as expressed. In the meantime, I will ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to draw whatever conclusions we might.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the first version says that the defectors committee had made a final decision on March 1. The second version says that the defectors committee did not decide or had not made a final decision on March 1.

Again I ask the minister, what version is the truth: version A or version B?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to answer all questions on this issue. I think it is unfortunate that hon. members are trying to pre-empt their own committee.

I do not have the documents with me because I came with them to the committee this morning and I will have them with me at the committee this afternoon. I will answer all questions related to these documents at that time, as will my two colleagues.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Where were you this morning, Svend?

Mr. Robinson: The minister responsible for constitutional affairs says where were you. I was in the committee prepared to ask questions of ministers who, instead, were hiding behind civil servants.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members know that this is not the committee this afternoon.

An hon. member: This is the mother of all committees.

An hon. member: And where is the father?

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member would want to put a very careful question.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, in this House ministers cannot hide behind public servants.

I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask if the members on the other side will allow members on this side to put serious questions of concern of Canadians.

I want to ask the minister this question. In view of the new report, the revised standard version of the government's response to the Al-Mashat affair, will the minister explain to Canadians, through this House, why it was that after she learned on April 16 that Al-Mashat had been allowed into Canada, why it was that according to the new report she did not take any steps whatsoever to order a full and thorough inquiry into what went wrong here? How can she explain her negligence as a minister in this important question?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have an answer to his question on the basis of the documents, even though what he has put before the House is not certainly the facts as I would perceive them. He will have that answer this afternoon in committee.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister could then clarify, if she says she is going to be bringing answers to committee. Is the minister also prepared to table in the committee this afternoon all the documents that were requested by the committee on Tuesday, including the complete immigration file of Al-Mashat from Vienna? Will she come clean with Canadians on this file?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it was the people on this side of the House who came forward with a view that the committee should look at this. That was our initiative.

We are quite happy to have the committee look at everything that is appropriate to go before a committee as we have in the past.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians would say that what is appropriate is the truth and that is what we are looking for on this question.

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is to the same minister.

I would like to ask why the minister, after learning on April 16 that Al-Mashat had been allowed into Canada, despite the earlier decision of both this minister and the former Secretary of State for External Affairs to deny admission to a previous Iraqi diplomat, did not tell the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, did not tell her successor as Minister of Immigration. Why did this minister tell no one about this flagrant breach of immigration law in this country? Why did she clam up and cover up this issue?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member seeks all this information, I assume that the hon. member really does want the information, although it does come as a surprise that in seeking this information he walked out of committee.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On May 15, 1991 at page 99 of Hansard she stated, and I quote:

> A report was made. It is as complete as it can be and it tells people what they need to know.

Today she released a chronology of events which is 26 pages long. That is contrasted with the five pages of the first report. There are many additions and, more important, contradictions.

In version B on page 11, we are told that on March 8, immigration officials drafted a memorandum about the case for her attention. There is absolutely no mention whatsoever about that memorandum in version A. Why did the minister tell this House that version A was "as complete as it can be" when that was simply not accurate?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am going to have all of these documents in front of me before the committee. I will be very happy to answer all these questions, as I was this morning when, let the record show, this member walked out too.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, if this memorandum of March 8 had been brought to the minister's attention in early March, this whole sorry Al-Mashat case could have been nipped in the bud.

Why was its existence suppressed until today? Why the cover-up?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has taken the position, I think, that the matter is going to be considered later on this afternoon. There may well be a lot more questions on the Al-Mashat affair and I think they had better be carefully directed in such a way that they are clear and that they are appropriate to be answered.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The minister has indicated to members of this House and to the national media that he did not become aware of the particular subject matter of Al-Mashat until on or about May 7, 1991, and this has been reported both in the English and French press.

The new report today states, and I quote:

> On Tuesday, April 30, the Clerk of the Privy Council sent a memorandum to the Prime Minister, informing him of Mr. Al-Mashat's arrival in Canada. This memorandum, based on proposed replies in House cards prepared for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, indicated that the ministers had been briefed to that effect and would respond.

My question to the minister is this: Would the minister indicate to the House why the contradiction?

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my answer will be the same as that given by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At 3.30 p.m, the committee that was asked to consider this matter will be delighted to answer their questions in the presence of both ministers.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

Will the minister not admit that the statement of March 14, 1991, is seriously flawed, and that the statement released today, made public here in Ottawa, confirms beyond a reasonable doubt that the minister was seized of the knowledge on or before April 30, 1991.

I ask the minister, will he not now avail himself of the opportunity and explain the obvious contradictions of facts.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): My answer is no to the first two questions. As to the third, it will be answered at 3.30.

[Translation]

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. We are glad to see the minister tabling a new bill today for the control of firearms. Last time her own Tory colleagues prevented the bill from being passed. Is the minister prepared to keep her promise to the people of Montreal that the bill would be passed by June 21?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I recently heard the hon. member saying at a press conference that he intends to hold up my bill to examine various details and regulations that are not essential to the passage of the bill. I am therefore not in a position to make that kind of promise because it is up to the House either to accept or reject my bill. However, I hope my bill will be passed as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): That was the Liberal Party she heard about. We said something different. We asked that the project go ahead.

The minister mentioned the regulations. Canadians are suspicious about this bill, because at the same time they are bringing in a bill to regulate guns today, her bill. The House is debating a bill to sell arms to the Middle East. Talk about hypocrisy.

Will the minister acknowledge that the guts of this new bill, her bill, will be decided later by regulation, including the magazine size, the definition of the military assault weapon, what is safe storage, all those definitions?

Will she acknowledge that she has put a provision in this bill to allow members of Parliament to block those regulations in Parliament. Has she not, in fact, made a deal with the Tory backbench: "Support me now and block my bill later"?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's imputations are offensive but, alas, not surprising. Because this is a contentious subject, when I brought forward my suggestions for change I tried to be as forthcoming as possible and bring forward not only my proposed legislative changes, but the use I intended to make of the regulatory power. Some of that regulatory power is conferred upon the Governor in Council by the legislation and some of it exists already.

With respect to the definition of military and para military firearms, I already have the power to make the determinations. What I lack is the technical advice. I have, therefore, constituted a national advisory council on firearms with a broad mandate, including the mandate to give me a list of criteria that will enable me to impose those regulations.

I am advised by my staff who monitor those meetings that that, in fact, may be the first project they finish. I hope, perhaps, to have that list of criteria in the month of June. But whether or not the hon. member supports my legislation and whether or not it goes through, I intend to act on those regulations. I do not need this legislation for it.

With respect to the limitation on magazine sizes, I have indicated how I propose to use the regulations. I do need the legislation to have that power. If the legislation is delayed, then for those who wish to see those limitations it is a matter of cutting off their noses to spite their faces.

I make no apologies whatsoever for allowing this House to review those regulations. I have every confidence that the majority of members of Parliament will support sensible regulations. I find it astonishing that the hon. member would now impugn a provision which empowers members of this House to review the acts of the Governor in Council.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. In commenting on version A of the government's interpretation of the Al-Mashat affair, the Prime Minister said on May 15, 1991, on page 94 of Hansard with respect to the role of Mr. Paul Tellier, the Clerk of the Privy Council, that Mr. Tellier had said in speaking of Mr. Al-Mashat, "do not admit him". Those were the Prime Minister's words in the House of Commons in commenting on version A of the Al-Mashat affair.

In version B, made public today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it is clear that nowhere was such a direct order given by Mr. Paul Tellier.

Why did the Prime Minister in the government's first version of the Al-Mashat affair suggest to the House of Commons and through the House to the people of Canada that a direct order was given by the senior bureaucrat in the land to stop Al-Mashat from coming into Canada when clearly no such direct order was given?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is using quotations of version A and version B.

This matter was brought before the appropriate standing committee so all of the information could be brought forward and all the facts ascertained. I am surprised that the hon. member now, after we have agreed to bring it before the committee so all the facts and relevant facts could be brought forward in an appropriate fashion, still insists on raising the matter on the floor of the House of Commons. I have no objection to that but surely it is a matter that should be properly questioned at the committee where all the witnesses they require and/or demand will be available to respond.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the only surprise today is the massive contradiction between version A and version B and the total inability of the government to explain the contradictions between those two versions.

The Prime Minister claimed he was not informed until April 30 of the Al-Mashat affair. The former Secretary of State for External Affairs said he was not informed until May 7. Why then does version B released today say that on April 8 a briefing note was sent to "the legislative assistant and the deputy press officer at the Prime Minister's office, the legislative assistant at the Deputy Prime Minister's office, the legislative assistant at the office of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the legislative assistant for the Minister of International Trade", the legislative assistant to every bloody minister in the cabinet? How can they claim they did not know? Even the chauffeur knew about the Al-Mashat affair.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is so interested in obtaining the facts he may attend the committee this afternoon and stay and listen to the information that will be imparted at that time.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The fact is that the laundered version of events that was first presented—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member no doubt has a question which will assist the House, but I would ask that she put it in terms that do not make it difficult for the Speaker or unnecessarily difficult for the hon. member.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, it is also true that the first version wrongfully blamed the nephew of Jean Chrétien. The fact is—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: The fact is that today's version makes it quite clear that the responsibility for the whole affair lies directly in the office of the former minister for external affairs, the Right Hon. Joe Clark.

I believe, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. member: That's enough.

An hon. member: Order.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put a question and not put conclusions. We can argue about that later.

Ms. Copps: —that the hon. minister should take the advice that he gave on the RCMP affair in 1978 and accept ministerial responsibility and offer his resignation?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe the rules of this House preclude me from answering questions relating to my former responsibilities. For that reason, I went today to a meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade to make myself available to questioning by members of the House of Commons. For reasons that can only be related to the fact that the committee hearings were not televised and it is possible for histrionics and deliberate falsehoods to be televised in this House—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —that the hon. member and her colleagues are pursuing the course of raising this matter.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister.

As you know, version No. 1, which was a whitewash, blamed Jean Chrétien's nephew for what happened—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I asked the hon. member to not make accusations at this point in the House. If what I asked the hon. member to refrain from doing is repeated in the other official language of our country, it is just as much a matter of concern to the Speaker as it was the first time.

The hon. member can put a question and can perhaps draw whatever conclusions hon. members wish to draw afterwards, but let us put the question first and see then what the answer is.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I believe the former Prime Minister is an honourable man. I know that 12 years ago he tabled in the House a proposal relating to ministerial responsibility. Considering today's events, when we realize that all the other people in his office had the information, is he prepared to accept his responsibility as a minister and resign?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say two things, the first one in English.

[English]

I should not have used the phrase "deliberate falsehood". That is inconsistent with the rules of the House and I apologize for that and withdraw that phrase.

[Translation]

Second, as far as ministerial responsibility is concerned, the government's position was made clear today before the parliamentary committee. However, for some reason, Liberal and NDP members left the room and did not avail themselves of the opportunity provided under our Standing Orders to ask questions in a committee that had been appointed because the Opposition and the government had sought a way to get at the truth of the matter, the truth, without partisan accusations. That is what we are looking for here.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question affects some 250,000 government employees and their families. My question today is directed to the President of Treasury Board. Would the hon. minister confirm that during some four months of negotiations with the alliance representing 150,000 government employees, the only offer that his negotiators were prepared or willing to discuss was the government's wage offer of 0 per cent increase in the first year, 3 per cent in the second, and 3 per cent in the third year of the contract.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to confirm that the guidelines set out in the budget were those on which our negotiator based discussions with the unions.

That being said, we also told them of the fiscal situation which commanded us to to take these measures. We are quite prepared to look at other aspects of the collective agreement, which is a very thick document dealing with a lot of other issues, but first we have to make sure that we agree with each other on the particular basis of the 0–3–3.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, would the minister confirm that yesterday he told negotiators for all of the government servants that if they did not agree to this formula, 0–3–3, he would bring in legislation imposing the settlement on all of the workers, and if so, does he believe the government has been bargaining in good faith? Is this really free collective bargaining?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): At a time, Mr. Speaker, when hundreds of thousands of Canadians are without work, at a time when there are great threats to our fiscal position, we decided in the last budget to take measures. The unions were not particularly targeted, but we indicated to them that we would ask them to make a contribution as they have over the last six years by accepting very reasonable settlements. It was made very clear in the House that if these settlements are not reached through agreement, through negotiation, we would eventually have recourse to legislation.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. As members will know, the contracts for RCMP policing in two territories and all provinces except Ontario and Quebec expired March 31, and negotiations with the federal government have broken down. I join with the municipal authorities across the country in calling for an early resolution.

This matter is of critical importance to my constituents in the St. Albert constituency and, for that matter, for all Canadians.

Can the minister advise the members of this House and the public whether he has made any progress in bringing the provinces back to the table to negotiate a settlement?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the House that the federal government has offered to renew the present contracts with the provinces, the municipalities, and the territories for a further term of one year on the same terms and conditions as the last year of the present 10–year contract.

The provinces, for their part, have offered by telephone, and I expect to get it confirmed, that they are prepared to come back to the table to negotiate in good faith the issues of cost base, cost ratios, and accountability.

I think there is a new sense of urgency and a good feeling about the negotiations and I would hope that we can wrap them up as soon as possible.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On Tuesday morning my colleague, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, submitted a letter to the minister requesting 18 specific documents related to the Al–Mashat case. We requested these documents in advance of this morning. These documents are still not in our hands. I would like to ask the minister why this is so and what has the government got to hide and why is the government inhibiting the work of members to have a full inquiry into the Al–Mashat case as promised by the minister?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has been listening very carefully to questions, and I hope has been treating the questions and the issue properly. That is clearly a question for committee. The hon. member may want to put another question. It cannot be a question that should be put to the committee.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding that this party requested these memos from the minister. It beggars the imagination to understand why they have not been provided to us. I am not saying to the committee. It was not within the context of the committee that these were requested in the first place.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Stewart: We cannot understand why they have not been produced to date. I asked the minister why they were not produced, and if she will guarantee to us that they will be produced immediately so that when the committee does resume hearings, we will be able to make proper inquiries.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the documents referred to are similar to documents that have been requested by the committee.

As I am only too happy to do, we will produce the documents. They are in the process of being gathered up to bring to committee. Let the record show that this hon. member walked out this morning too.

POSTAL SUBSIDIES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Northerners appreciated the Conservative government maintaining at $15 million the subsidy for air stage service to deliver food and other goods sent by mail to isolated communities in northern Canada and Quebec. Can the minister tell us today that priority will be given to perishable foodstuffs and a directive to that effect will be issued to users of this northern service, together with a fair postal rate for residents of northern Canada?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question and share his concern that the postal subsidy really go for nutritious food so that inhabitants of remote areas can have access to such food for better health. Therefore in the coming weeks, we will define what is meant by "perishable food" in cooperation with the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Post Office, and the main distributors concerned.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

On May 14, he and the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a statement on the Al-Mashat case about which they released a report to Canadians. In that statement, the minister said: "There have been no hidden motives, no espionage capers, and no conspiracies by any individual or governmental agency either Canadian or foreign."

If this is all so straightforward, why are there two versions of the report, version A released on May 14 and version B released today? Will he answer that question?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I find it strange that members of Parliament opposite are yapping their mouths all over Canada about the importance of this issue but they refused this morning to listen to the minister of external affairs and myself explain and answer all these questions. Theatrics will not help Canadians understand what really happened which is what this government wants.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, if this minister and his government really wanted Canadians to understand what happened in the Al-Mashat case, they would not refuse to answer questions in the high court of Parliament before 29 million Canadians.

I ask the minister again if he stands by what he had to say May 14 and the statement released at that time? Why are there two versions of that statement, version A, released May 14 and version B, released today? Why can't he answer that before this Parliament and make clear what is going on to the people of this country?

• (1500)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I stand by what I said on May 14. The only thing I can add is that this morning in committee the only thing missing was the kazoos.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is the regular question put to the government House leader concerning the business of the House.

I wonder if the government House leader would indicate what the business will be for the remainder of the day, for Friday, Monday, Tuesday, and the remaining part of next week. Could he give us some detail?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary was seeking the floor on a point of order, but I would ask him to defer to the hon. House leader.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will continue debate on Bill C-6. Friday will be an allotted day for supply. Monday, we will continue second reading of Bill C-5, the Aeronautics Act and, if time permits, and if not completed earlier, we will resume second reading debate on Bill C–6.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–5 passed second reading and I do not think we want to go back and redo it.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think there has been some confusion between the Aeronautics Act and the airport devolution bill which was the one that we just put on the Order Paper. The numbers are wrong. I think the bill we are referring to is the airport devolution. I do not know its new number. It should be C–7 or C–8. I am not sure.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to take the time of the House, but to be clear, we will be on C–6 this afternoon. Friday will be an allotted day. Monday is airport devolution and Tuesday has yet to be decided.

POINTS OF ORDER

ALLOCATION OF TIME DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to express my concern again that this side was denied any opportunity to ask more than two questions. I realize—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I would invite the hon. member to come and see the Speaker in the Speaker's chambers if the hon. member wishes. Nobody was denied anything.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: There are 45 minutes and I did the best I could today given the questions and the answers. Two members from the government side were heard. I would like to be able to do more. I would like to have more time. But it is not appropriate to say to the Speaker that somebody was denied their right to ask a question. That is not so.

EXTENSION OF QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, rather than listening to the daily new Conservative whine in the country, once again may I suggest that in order to facilitate hon. colleagues across in terms of Question Period, let us agree now to extend Question Period for an extra half hour every day. It will allow more people an opportunity to participate.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the last session, in response to a point of order from the hon. House leader of the Liberal Party, there was a concern about the length of questions and the length of answers. There has been concern about the number of questions.

In Parliament, all members are supposed to be equal. There are 100–plus backbenchers here who do not get an equal opportunity to ask questions. There is obviously a need for change and reform. Beauchesne's is full of descriptions as to what Question Period should be. No one would recognize Beauchesne's description and what happens in this House.

I think it is highly appropriate that we do discuss this matter. Perhaps we should follow the example of the mother of Parliaments in Britain where they manage to get in 45 questions in a 45 minute Question Period as opposed to the average of 26 we get. There is strict adherence to all of the rules. About an average of 30 seconds per question and 30 seconds for answers is the way they do it. Perhaps we might experiment with that and see if we would not be serving this House and the public who is watching a little better than we do.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have one brief question for the hon. member opposite. He makes reference to the quality and tone of Question Period here today and previous ones.

I would like to ask the hon. member: Who made you Speaker of this House? I would like to know that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to seek the opinion of the Chair. I want to refer to three brief citations in Beauchesne's fifth edition: 358(1)(a), which were guidelines that were established by a previous committee, I think in 1964. It is still part of Beauchesne's and theoretically still part of our rules. It says:

(1) Such questions should:

(a) be asked only in respect of matters of sufficient urgency and importance as to require an immediate answer.

I then want to go to Citation 359(5), which says, again referring to questions:

The matter ought to be of some urgency. There must be some present value in seeking the information during the Question Period.

Citation 360 says:

A question may not:

(3) seek information about proceedings in a committee which has not yet made its report to the House.

My point is this: we had a number of questions today that were raised on an issue which this House and the people who watch this House know is presently a matter before a committee. It is a decision of this House to have that undertaken.

I then put before you two questions, Mr. Speaker. The first one is the question of urgency. How can there be an urgency for these questions to be asked in the House of Commons during Question Period when there was a committee meeting this morning on the very same subject which, as you know from having listened to questions, members walked out of?

Second, there is scheduled a second committee on the same subject for this afternoon.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you consider the question of urgency.

Further, citation 360(3) refers to the proceedings of a committee. In fact, all of us are suffering from some confusion. We have been under the impression that if there was a hearing in a committee of the House of Commons, then there would be no need to repeat that hearing on the floor of the House of Commons, either in Question Period or at another time.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you examine those three citations in light of the questions I have put to you, because I think it is something that we as members of this House need to understand clearly. Quite frankly, if I can express a personal opinion, I am quite concerned that we are going to have a committee hearing on a subject and then have the same hearing here on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes three references to Beauchesne's in terms of the report of a committee and some urgency and immediacy.

Surely to God the hon. member opposite is not trying to have members of Parliament believe the contention that two documents on a very major, important subject matter are not of some urgency to the Canadian people. I think most reasonable individuals would come to the conclusion we have, that it is of great urgency to the Canadian people to know all the facts.

The second point is that the hon. member, not I, referred specifically to certain proceedings of the committee. The hon. member should know that members of this party have made requests of the Chair, of the appropriate ministers involved, to provide all the information in advance. In fact, 18 different documents have been sought. However, they have not been forthcoming.

Third, there was an agreed-upon schedule in terms of who would appear first and who would appear second. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you today that if you were to read the minutes of that committee, you would find a breach of the undertaking which the chairman of that committee gave to all members of the committee. Furthermore, certain witnesses arrived today who were not scheduled to arrive in accordance with the rules that the chairman had agreed to, which had been put forward by us. That is the second point.

• (1510)

The third point is that we did not make any reference to any committees here today in Question Period. We made reference to two public documents which are there for Canadians to read and to examine.

Finally, when has Parliament been denied the opportunity to ask questions on any particular subject matter? This is the Supreme Court in terms of democracy and Parliament, not a committee and not the back rooms of the Conservative Party.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I think these interventions are useful to clarify what is happening. All of us as members of Parliament have long lists of files of people having difficulty on immigration issues. I know that ministers who are active in these areas in the House will know that this is an ongoing major concern of, I suspect, every single member of the House of Commons.

Today there was confusion in terms of two documents—virtually nothing to do with what is going on in the committee—regarding a certain individual who appears to have jumped the queue. We are seeking answers from the minister. The minister refuses to respond. As a matter of fact, on a number of occasions she did not even stand up in her place.

Mr. Speaker, I know you will say the minister does not have to do that. We appreciate that, but ministers, to give them credit, always attempt to reply in some form or another.

Today a critical issue right across the country, from one coast to the other, is this immigration issue. That is why we felt that the minister should have taken the opportunity to clarify on behalf of the government what the position was. She chose not to and made a mockery out of Question Period. That is why there is an element of frustration today.

Mr. Speaker: There may well be an element of frustration, but as the hon. member clearly pointed out and as I pointed out earlier, hon. ministers do not necessarily have to answer any questions. Also, if this does anything to alleviate the element of frustration, I think on at least one occasion the minister said that this was going to be in front of the committee this afternoon and that there would be another opportunity to ask questions.

As I have said before, if the House wants to change dramatically the way we have been handling Question Period, discussions are always appropriate and the Speaker of course will always try to assist in those discussions.

The hon. member for Cumberland—Colchester. Is it on a different point of order?

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): It is something the same, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect. I have tried to determine the rules of Question Period and have gone through the Standing Orders and through Beauchesne's. Perhaps you could tell me or give me direction on where the rules for Question Period are. What rules can I go by?

Mr. Speaker: I would be very pleased to discuss all of the rules, old and less than old, that we try to apply to carry on Question Period. I know what the hon. member would want is the very best possible way.

I invite the hon. member to come and have a discussion with me about it.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I just want to assist Your Honour. The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader read Your Honour certain citations from Beauchesne's concerning Question Period. I have one very brief citation that I think might be of assistance, and that is citation 417 of the sixth edition which states:

> Answers to questions should be as brief as possible, deal with the matter raised and should not provoke debate.

That is the citation. I think it would be very helpful, Your Honour, if the parliamentary secretary could instil that message into ministers opposite.

While I am on my feet, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary, or perhaps one of the ministers, could answer why it is that the standing committee on external affairs, which is dealing with this very important matter, which the ministers opposite say is so important and so crucial, and which they are so anxious to have explained before the committee, is not being televised so the people of Canada can see what is going on and the cover-up that is being perpetrated here.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to both comments of my hon. friend. First, I appreciate very much the citation that he referred to. I think it is important that ministers on this side be held to brief answers.

All of us, including the hon. member who has expressed his frustrations with Question Period earlier today, would be happy to see that happen. The quid pro quo would be that the questions on the other side also be briefer.

I would like to see a target of 30 seconds per question and answer.

Second, the hon. member wants to know why a committee is not televised. He knows exactly why the committee is not televised because he is a member of the House management committee which is going to be dealing with the issue and developing the guidelines which will be established for the committees of the House of Commons.

For him to imply, directly or indirectly, that somehow this government is responsible for that, he should be ashamed of himself.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I am also a member of this committee ably chaired by the hon. member for Peace River, Mr. Cooper. Perhaps with the new Standing Orders we could also start to call each other by name and not by the name of our riding.

That said, I know that the House has many times adopted motions by unanimous consent. I am speaking to Mr. Milliken and Mr. Gauthier, two great parliamentary experts. If the House agreed unanimously right away, what I think is becoming an extraordinary committee could perhaps be televised at 3.30. I am not a member of it, but I observe it very closely.

[English]

I am observing very, very, very closely because I have a very close interest in this committee.

First, instead of having quarrels, maybe we should have unanimous consent to have just this committee televised. It has been done before. The chairman is right. We are now discussing this issue, but that does not preclude us from doing it by unanimous consent, and you know what I think of unanimous consent. If I was in another state of mind I would speak in much more rude terms about what I think of it. A couple of times I was very unhappy about members of Parliament calling for unanimous consent, time and time and time again until those who objected were absent from the House. That is another debate.

My hon. friend and colleague said why not televise the debate? I would say to my colleague that if we start quarrelling now at the management committee there will be no work done, so I will try to distribute equally, not blame, but favour. Why do you not ask for unanimous consent to televise this very important meeting this afternoon? Why are we still debating among ourselves? On this point my friend from Kingston and the Islands is absolutely right, why are we debating how to do it?

I will be on the record. I object to televising the committee if there are no rules. I said in private and I will repeat it in public: I do not want members of Parliament to work with a camera under their noses. If you put it under mine, you will see what can come out on television if you look at my nose.

I would say that Mr. Speaker may wish to ask for consent to televise the debate this afternoon in an orderly fashion. I watch TV. I will not watch the members. I watch Canadian television. I want to have an orderly House. I do not want a circus. I am sure I would lack elegance if I used what I have in mind. I want an orderly, well-run House and committees. Television, yes with certain rules. The committee seems to interest so many members, why do you not ask for consent, Mr. Speaker? Why do my colleagues not ask for consent to televise the debate this afternoon? We may get it. I am anxious to see who will say no, but that does not preclude us from making very severe rules as to how we would televise the debate of committees.

As a matter of fact, my colleague, Mr. Gauthier asks: "Is there unanimous consent of the House to televise the debate this afternoon in an unorderly fashion, since we do not yet have orderly rules to televise the debate"?

• (1520)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): After that short intervention, Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, we seem to be at a crucial moment. My hon. friend, in his usual thoughtful way, has presented us with a way out of this slight dilemma.

There is a concern that Canadians ought to hear the statement by the ministers and officials. There was a feeling that the House of Commons was not the appropriate place but that a committee was. It seems that we have a suggestion that makes eminent sense to me, that we have, among ourselves, as colleagues who want the Canadian public to know the level of debate and the way these issues are handled, an opportunity to watch the proceedings on television.

I can only speak on behalf of the New Democratic Party but I want to indicate that we are anxious to televise this very critical committee meeting at this point.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Just a couple of words, Mr. Speaker.

The suggestion that the opposition not be permitted, under the rules, to talk about what is in progress or under discussion at standing committees is a rather strange point of order for the government to raise since quite obviously the original rule in the original House of Commons in Britain was certainly to protect the responsibilities and the duties of the opposition and the accountability of the government to the people.

Certainly Question Period should be a tool, perhaps the only efficient tool we have left, to call the government accountable to the people of Canada through the House of Commons. It certainly does not help matters for the government House leader to stand here and say: "Well, now, I love the British system of Question Period". As we all know a minister must be given notice of every question asked of him a day in advance. Not only that, but he need not even show up in the Chamber except for one day a week. Perhaps that is what the government is attempting to do with this point of order.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise and make two points. First of all, I want to thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis for raising this issue because it confirms my thought that the reason the members walked out of the committee this morning, that they had this charade here in the House of Commons, was because of the lack of television in the committee.

Secondly, I want to say this—

Mr. Prud'homme: Point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to hear the hon. parliamentary secretary for a few more words and I will then hear the hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Cooper: Second, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this—

Mr. Prud'homme: Point of order, point of order. If not, I will make a point of personal privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is a veteran of this place. I will defer to his point.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, no one but the chairman of the committee of management knows how much I respect chairmanship, and in your case Speakership. However, if the hon. member for Peace River thinks he can impute motives to me, I have not—and I repeat not—since I left him this morning at the management committee spoken to any one of the people—maybe they prefer not to talk to me either, I don't know. I have not spoken to any one of them. He may walk out if he wants—yes, he does.

You are not going to impute motives to what I am trying to propose to the House as a solution. We must find a way that is harmonious and acceptable. Every member can walk out. I would not give a damn.

I know one thing. Nobody is going to impute motives when I am on my feet explaining what I am trying to do. I was trying to help you out, Mr. Speaker.

May I say first that it seems the Al-Mashat affair is falling on a hell of a lot of nerves. We have not seen the end of it yet so I think we should be all cool.

I will keep cool, but you will provoke members by imputing motives. I have been here too long, so I know not to do any dealing or wheeling, I just follow debates. That is the British parliamentary tradition.

Mr. Speaker, you are there to allow tough debate to take place between members. That means I respect the member who just walked out, Mr. Cooper. I was listening to what he was saying. I was listening to what my colleagues were saying. I was listening to what Mr. Milliken was saying and then I thought that I should help, to participate, by saying: "Let's delay a little bit. If there is unanimous consent, we can do it this afternoon".

Unanimous consent played against me in the past. I swallowed my pride and I accepted it, so you cannot have it both ways.

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, if some people want a big debate, please believe me when I say I am in excellent condition to give it to them, but that is not my intention unless people try to attribute motives that are completely foreign to me—and I see one member of the committee looking at me and smiling. He did not go out—I refer to Mr. Langlois. Well, we work together on the committee. We want to get along well. We want to change the mood of Parliament, but if some people want to get into petty politicking, Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to accommodate them. However, I would not like myself as Marcel Prud'homme, MP, if I started to be a second-rate petty politician. There are too many petty politicians. We have more important things that should concern us, like the survival of our country, and how Mr. Paproski, Mr. MacDonald, my friend Corbett, and I should talk without getting into petty politics. We are trying to find a way and when we try to help make the House run more smoothly, we are put down by petty politicians. Well, I will not accept that—it is as simple as that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Denis made a proposal to the House to allow broadcasting the committee proceedings this afternoon. Does the House agree to this proposal?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous agreement.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

I just want to explain to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that his turn came up. I was trying to get him on just before one o'clock. Unfortunately he was not in the Chamber and there was nobody else. I had to recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the Liberals have not had a speaker in two rounds, whereas the NDP—

Mr. Heap: You do not even want to speak.

Mr. Allmand: I want to speak. I am here and I am ready to speak. It is my turn, I think.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan has the floor for debate.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, the election which saw me return to this place took place just two years, six months and two days ago. On the whole it has been an interesting experience, a learning experience. I try to serve my constituents as well as I can. As far as the work in this place is concerned, there have been the up days and the down days. This is an up day in the sense that I can say what I want to say about this bill over a period of 20 minutes and get it on the record for the sake of the record. But it is also a down day when I consider what we are doing, passing legislation that will enable us to take a greater part in the international distribution of arms than in the past, to be better, if you like, merchants of death. We want to do a better job so we are going to pass legislation that will make it easier to do so.

• (1530)

It is a shame. One should almost be ashamed to be a Canadian with this kind of legislation being considered. I am one of the products of the depression. Most of the members in this House, will not have much memory of that. I can remember how bad things were during the depression in a small community on Vancouver Island, a small coal mining town. I can remember what that depression did to my father, a very hard-working labourer who worked at farming, at coal mining. He was anxious to get ahead, anxious to raise his children the best way that he could. He was very optimistic about being in Canada and being a Canadian, although he had been on the continent since 1897. He was very ambitious and very optimistic about the future until the depression hit.

All of a sudden, though they were still the same people, there were still the same resources, there were still the same needs to be met, there was no work, no opportunity for gainful employment, to do the things he wanted to do, to look after his family the way he wanted to. That went on for years.

We started one now, we are into it, but nothing like the depression of the 1930s. It went on for years and it was not until Hitler started rearming Germany and did such a good job of it and put the continent of Europe to work, and the effect dribbled out over the rest of the world and reached South Wellington. Finally the miners in South Wellington were able to go back to work because Hitler was rearming Germany. We were getting ready to fight a war or at least to supply arms and munitions, soldiers and sailors, et cetera, to help somebody else fight it. We were not sure at that time.

Because we were getting ready for a supreme war effort, all of a sudden there was all the money needed to reopen the coal mines and to reopen the rest of the economic activity that had been going on in that area previously and since. It took an approaching war to put people back to work.

One of the arguments being advanced for the legislation before us today, Bill C-6, is that if we do not open up and extend our markets for war weapons there is going to be increasing unemployment in Canada.

Have we learned nothing between 1933 and 1971? Thirty-eight years and even today we say we have to be preparing for war or for somebody to fight a war if we are going to keep people working. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you share some of my shame that a Canadian is not able to come up with a better answer for creating employment which will enable us to distribute the goods that we can produce and the goods that we import. To say that we have to have this kind of legislation, we have to open up markets of the world to what we are producing here because it is the only way we can maintain some minimum employment.

There have been several speakers ahead of me. Some have said 300 people are going to lose their jobs if we do not approve this legislation. Others said the total effect of all of this could be as much as 300,000. Whether it is 300,000 or 300 or 3, we should not have to be producing war weapons to find employment to enable those workers to feed their families.

In 1991 we are still talking the same language we were in 1933. Surely Canadians deserve better than that from our government. That is why I feel, as one of the members in this Chamber, that I am failing not only my constituents but people all over Canada when we are not able to show the government that there is another way we can produce for peace. We do not have to produce weapons of destruction. We do not need to come up with more modern ways of killing people to put a relatively small handful of our working force back to work.

The Minister of Small Businesses and Tourism spoke earlier, and I apologize to him. I did not name him properly when I referred to him earlier. He said: "Well, it is really very limited. It is just automatic weapons, automatic rifles, if you like, and armoured vehicles. That is not very much".

I heard earlier from someone that the legislation we are changing now is legislation that has been on the books for 14 years. For 14 years it has been good enough. We have been able to export enough arms to suit somebody or other, but they have not raised this as a real issue. For 14 years we got by with it. Now, all of a sudden, it is important that we do raise it. We raise it because we are not able to sell enough of these automatic rifles and these light armoured vehicles.

We know this bill is going to pass. There are too many Tories in the House. They will pass it and Canada will be looking for more opportunities to sell more weapons. The bill will pass. Once they have this, how many years will it be before they want to extend it a little further? How much of a step is it really, from automatic rifles to field guns, to atomic weapons eventually, perhaps? How much of a step from light armoured vehicles to heavy armoured vehicles, to tanks, to gun ships? Where is the end?

Once we take this first step and we find out that it has worked, it has put a few people back to work, is there not going to be pressure from the employers concerned to expand our markets even further? Of course, the reason this is developing, we all know, is that a good deal of the world is gradually coming to its senses and is spending less of its efforts on manufacturing and obtaining war weapons, which means the market is more limited. So to get into that more restricted market, we have to relax some of the rules that have governed our country with respect to selling, manufacturing and distributing war weapons. We are doing it because the market is more restricted.

The rest of the world is beginning to come to its senses and I hope it will continue to do so at a greater rate. But when that happens, this may be the first step, automatic rifles and light armoured vehicles. What will be the second? If the Tories remain in office, and we certainly hope they do not, how long will it be before they come to us saying: "Well, we did the rifles and the light armoured vehicles and we want to go one step further now".

As my colleague from the Liberal Party suggested, the same companies will be there and the same workers, because by then they will probably be unemployed again. So there is need.

There are rules. We have been reassured by government spokesmen and certainly the Minister of Small Businesses and Tourism told us about the rules. That makes me feel much more comfortable. I know there are rules against the import of heroin, for example. It is nice to have those rules. It would be better if they worked. There are rules against all kinds of things. We regularly pass legislation and we have rules with them and they will work to a point.

However, how long are the rules on the export of weapons of war going to work? We are going to say: "You can only sell them to certain nations and those nations must not sell them to anyone else". Have we done a very good job of watching that in the past? To the best of my knowledge, we did not sell any weapons of war to the country headed by a person who, inside and outside this House, was called the Butcher of Baghdad. Our hands were not that dirty. We did not sell any weapons directly to him. We all know that we sold components that were included in weapons that were sent to him. For 20 years we were content to go on doing business, indirectly, with that person and then all of a sudden we called it quits. We decided we would put on an embargo and stop those weapons from getting to him for a relatively short period. Now we want to open up and sell them to his neighbour.

If we are really thinking seriously about stopping murder on a mass scale, which is what war is, of all the places in the world to send more weapons, surely the last should be what I call the Arabian peninsula. That is probably not the right word for it now—that group of nations in that part of the world, the powder keg, the tinder box of the whole world, the worst place I would think to send anything.

We should be expending our efforts on trying to cut back on everyone's shipments to that area rather than looking for nations within that group of nations that we feel we can trust today and maybe tomorrow, but we are not so sure about the day after.

Our hands will be dirty. Our hands are dirty now; we know that we are selling some of these arms internationally and we are proposing to look for more opportunities to sell them on a wider basis. Is that really good enough? Are we really that desperate? Can we not find useful employment here in Canada for these people who are unemployed?

There has been a great deal of talk in this House about the budget brought down by the province of Ontario. I notice that some $4.5 billion is being spent on the construction of schools, hospitals, highways. Those are useful things.

If anyone is killed there, it will be because of accidents on roads perhaps or because of accidents during construction. However those are useful endeavours.

Those kinds of things can be done all over the world. There are nations that are hungry. There are nations that are starving. We know that. We know there are all kinds of facilities that could be built there if we want to do something positive, as well as here in Canada. There is lots that can be done.

I believe it was the former head of the World Health Organization, Dr. Hugh Keenleyside, who first said that four-fifths of the world's population goes to bed hungry sometimes, but one-fifth of the world's population goes to bed hungry every day of their lives.

There is much that can be done in Canada alone and also beyond Canada in the rest of the world. We do not have to be making weapons of war to put our people to work. If we manage our economy properly, if we do our jobs properly as members of Parliament, we would not be looking for ways to sell more arms and munitions; we would be looking for ways to serve humanity, both Canadians and those outside Canada.

Those are the kinds of things that we should be working at in my opinion.

Those who spoke before me had their own points of view, and I appreciate that. I am sure each one of them was sincere, and I expect those who follow will hold sincerely the views that they espouse on the floor of this House just as I do. I am not saying anything that I have not said on other occasions, not in this House perhaps but in other places. I believe fervently that it is the route to go. I believe there is a better way for human beings to go, and we are not really demonstrating that when we pass legislation such as the legislation before us today.

We can come up with plans. We can come up with plans for Canada. We can come up with plans for Canada to work to help other nations that are trying to pull themselves up by their own bootstraps, but we are not doing it. We are giving no real thought to that, as far as I am concerned.

All we are really concerned about is the size of the deficit, which in the main acts as a way of redistributing income. The way it really works is that it takes more income from the lower and middle classes by way of interest and shifts it to those with money to invest, the higher income people. The deficit is a way of redistributing income. As long as the money is borrowed internally, there is not that much real problem in handling it. As I say, it is shifting the income in the wrong direction, but it is still handled as long as we are doing it internally.

In that regard I can go back to the advice of a former minister of finance in the province of British Columbia, a Tory as well, Herbert Anscombe, who said in the late forties, I believe, that if a government has to borrow—and it should not borrow—it should make sure that it does its borrowing within its own boundaries. In his case he was talking about B.C. In Canada we should be borrowing within Canada. We should not be borrowing outside.

We have done it before. I talked earlier about the war effort that put the people in South Wellington back into the coal mines, back working. Canada could not borrow during that war. Canadians put out a real effort to fight the Second World War. We never borrowed a nickel from abroad. There was nobody who would lend it to us then. They were all investing their own money in their own weapons manufacturing and whatever. We had a million people who were not working when our population was about, I suppose, 30 per cent or 40 per cent of what it is today, a million people in uniform contributing nothing positive, burning it up, using it up; we were producing a lot of stuff that was being sunk in the North Atlantic. However, people were working. They had jobs. There was enough for them to eat. There were clothes for them to wear. They could buy things that they could not buy before the war started, before Hitler put them all to work.

I used to listen to this very prominent spokesman for the CCF. He was not the party leader. He was a medical doctor, Dr. Lyle Telford. He talked about how ridiculous we are in our society when there is no limit to the amount of effort that a community can be organized into producing if we are preparing for or fighting a war. But when it comes to feeding our own hungry people who do not have clothes to wear, proper accommodations and all those things, or when it comes to helping other nations of the world, we do not have the money to do it. We have the money only when we are preparing for or fighting a war.

There is a better answer. This legislation is in the old style. It is what we were preparing to do in the early 1930s and started to do later on in the 1930s. It put the coal miners to work. They were thankful. They appreciated Hitler, they really did. I am not kidding; I am not joking. They were in pretty bad shape. They recognized that it was what he was doing, as bad as it was, that put them back to work and enabled them to put food on their tables and clothing on their children and themselves.

What a way to run a country. What a failure. What a shame that in Canada today, some 58 years later, we are still only able to come up with solutions that result in murdering more people.

I am ashamed that we are going to pass this legislation, and I recognize we are. I wonder just how long it will be before we are arguing the next step down the road. There is a better route.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill before us, Bill C–6, is to amend the gun control provisions of the Criminal Code and the Export and Import Permits Act to permit the export of automatic firearms to the armed forces of other countries. That is the purpose of the bill, to permit the export of automatic firearms to the armed forces of other countries.

We are opposed to this bill as written because it is wide open. It permits the sale of these firearms to any country whatsoever. The minister, in his speech this morning, said that only those countries with which the government has an intergovernmental defence, research, development and production arrangement would be on the list of those who might be sold these weapons. But that is not how the legislation reads. The legislation reads differently than the speech of the hon. minister.

Article 2, subsection 4.1 on page 1 of the bill states:

> The Governor in Council may establish a list of countries, to be called an Automatic Firearms Country Control List, including therein any country with which Canada has an intergovernmental defence, research, development and production arrangement—

The exact words of the bill say that those countries must be included on the list, but it does not say that the list is restricted to those countries. Where in fact the legislation differs from the speech of the minister is that while the list must contain those countries with which Canada has arrangements for defence, research, development and production of weapons, it is not restricted to those countries.

If the government was to amend the legislation to restrict the list to those countries, it would at least be an improvement. It would not be totally satisfactory, but it would certainly be an improvement.

As I pointed out, I do not know if this is simply a mistake in the drafting of the legislation, but it is certainly not acceptable as it is. As I said, it is wide open. I refer to the French version of the same section. It seems to be stricter and more limiting than the English section. In any case, it is too wide open and is unacceptable in its present form.

Under the present Canadian law no business can sell arms to another country without a permit from the Canadian government under the Export and Import Permits Act.

• (1550)

However, in the legislation there are no guidelines or limitations to which countries we can sell these weapons. It is left totally to the discretion of the government.

I must say that over the years, both Liberal and Conservative governments have spelled out policy guidelines which they have used in deciding to which countries armaments might be sold.

If you look at the most recent report on this subject, which is called the Export of Military Goods from Canada, 1990, the first annual report on this subject, the former Secretary of State for External Affairs sets out the guidelines in that report.

These guidelines are as follows. It stated that Canada would closely control the export of military goods and technology to (a) countries which pose a threat to Canada and its allies. That is pretty evident; (b) countries involved in or under imminent threat of hostilities; (c) countries under United Nations Security Council sanctions such as South Africa; (d) countries whose governments have a persistent record of serious violations of the human rights of their citizens unless it can be demonstrated that there is no reasonable risk that these goods might be used against the civilian population.

Those are the guidelines set out by the present Conservative government for the sale of arms.

Those guidelines have never been submitted to Parliament for approval and they have never been legislated. They have not been legislated, nor have they been put in terms of a motion and debated in this House so that they could be approved.

We submit that this bill must be tightened to reflect at least the policy guidelines set out by the government in the paper that I just referred to.

We could, in this party, accept the sale of certain weapons to countries with which we have collective security agreements for defensive purposes and for peacekeeping. We certainly cannot accept the sale of these weapons to areas of conflict or imminent conflict or to areas where there are serious human rights violations.

In the Iraq–Kuwait War, 95 per cent of the arms used by Iraq were sold to it by the five permanent members of the Security Council. Ninety–five per cent of the arms used by Iraq came from those five countries which then later were at war with the same Iraq. It was a very sad situation which was decried by almost all the political leaders of the world, including our own Prime Minister, our own Secretary of State for External Affairs and many others.

It is an extremely ridiculous situation when we sell a country arms and it in turn uses those arms against us. That shows us the ludicrousness of the arms trade.

In addition, during the Iran–Iraq War, the first gulf war which took place just a few years ago, 28 countries sold weapons to both sides. Twenty–eight countries made money from the death and destruction rained on both sides in that war, a war which went on for nine years. Over 1 million people were killed.

Here we had mostly north western countries selling arms to an area of conflict to keep that conflict going with human beings being destroyed on all sides. This is an example of obscenity in the most extreme way.

The bill provides a list which would limit the number of countries to which these arms could be sold. We say that the legislation should limit the kinds of countries that can go on that list. The government seems to agree in principle to that. The minister said that in a speech.

As I said earlier, the words of the section do not reflect what he said. It appears that one of the potential buyers of arms as a result of this bill is Saudi Arabia. We do not have any arrangement with Saudi Arabia for intergovernmental defence, research, development or production and so I would be interested—I still do not have an answer—as to how the government would intend to proceed with that particular sale.

I must point out that Saudi Arabia, a middle eastern country, is in a region where we have had 26 wars since 1945. The Middle East is the region with the most wars, more than any other region in the world, since the end of the Second World War. Technically, Saudi Arabia is still at war with Israel. No peace agreement has been reached between Israel and Saudi Arabia. Egypt is the only Arab country in the region that has a peace agreement with Israel.

In addition, Saudi Arabia has a serious human rights problem. In the reports of Amnesty International, there are several examples of very extreme human rights violations. Saudi Arabia has no written constitution or criminal code. People are imprisoned very often without any charge, hearing, or right of defence.

One has to wonder, in view of the legislation and the expressed intentions of the government, how Saudi Arabia might be on such a list. It is possible, and we all work for and hope, that these countries will become more democratic and develop legal and democratic procedures to protect human rights and, consequently, I will not say that there could not be a day when Saudi Arabia and other countries in that region might be acceptable as countries to which we might sell arms for defensive purposes, peacekeeping purposes and so on. That does not appear to be the case right now.

I would also like to know, and I think members of this House would like to know, which countries are on this list right now. The government must have some idea of what countries would be on this Automatic Firearms Country Control List. I think it would be helpful in the debate, or at least in committee, to know who would be on the list in accordance with its own guidelines.

If this bill goes to committee, and I presume with the majority the government has it will go to committee, we will be proposing an amendment that the list must be submitted to the standing committee on external affairs for approval before any permits are issued, and if there are any additions to the list that the proposals for addition must also be sent to the committee for approval. In this way Parliament will have some sort of control over this list of countries which would be potential buyers of weapons under this legislation.

It is hard to understand why the government is bringing in this legislation at this time. During the Iraq-Kuwait war the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs made very extreme statements opposing the arms trade. On February 8, 1991, the Prime Minister said, and I quote from a speech he made in Ottawa: "One of the main lessons to be learned from this war is the danger to us all of the proliferation of both conventional and non-conventional weapons". He went on to say: "The major arms exporting firms and nations have contributed to the current crisis. The great majority of weapons in Iraq's arsenal came from suppliers in the countries of the five permanent members of the Security Council. This problem must be brought under control and the time to act is now". That was the Prime Minister speaking.

He went on to say: "When the war is over, the world community must co-operate to prevent the proliferation of these weapons and to roll back that proliferation which has already occurred". Finally, he said: "Next week I will propose to the UN Secretary General, Mr. Perez de Cuellar, that the United Nations convene a global summit on the instruments of war and weapons of mass destruction". That is what the Prime Minister said.

• (1600)

On February 20, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, and I quote from his speech in London, England: "I believe it is imperative that the world declare that there be no Middle East arms bazaar. Ninety-five per cent of the weapons in the hands of Saddam Hussein came from the five permanent members of the Security Council". He repeated the statement of the Prime Minister that he would request a world summit on the control of arms.

Just yesterday, President Bush of the United States announced an ambitious plan to curb unnecessary and destabilizing weapons in the Middle East, including a freeze on a nuclear weapons program and an eventual ban on all missiles throughout the region. Even the President of the United States sees the need for curtailing the sale of weapons into the Middle East.

We, as a party, are proposing that certain restrictions be written into this legislation so that weapons of this kind could not be sold to any country whatsoever, especially to countries in areas of conflict and countries with serious human rights abuses. When the time comes, we will be extending that principle in a legislative way to all weapons that would be sold by this country. We now sell weapons to allies, countries with which we have collective security arrangements for defensive purposes and for peacekeeping. We, as a party, would like to see this put in a policy statement or in legislation for the House.

A country that we can look to in this sort of thing is Sweden, because Sweden is one of the largest arms producers in the world. It has very large arms producers in the names of Bufor Saab, and so on. I have here a copy of Sweden's policy on arms exports in the English language, 1989 version.

It is expressing Swedish policy. It says: "The general view has been that for reasons of security, Sweden should permit a certain volume of arms exports, but that we should at the same time be restrictive in our choice of recipient countries so as not to risk compromising Sweden's policy of non alignment by becoming involved in other country's military conflicts". It goes on. The Swedes have put into legislation certain guidelines which prevent them from selling to certain countries and allow them to sell to certain other countries, more or less along the same lines of the policies I have already referred to.

If you have a policy controlling the arms trade, that must go in hand with another policy dealing with disarmament. Some countries, especially Third World countries, get their arms from more developed countries, but the developed countries manufacture the arms for themselves. We must not only stop the trade of arms to Third World countries and countries which do not have their own industries, but we must also make sure that those countries which produce arms disarm themselves in an effective way so that there is balance in the world.

An arms trade policy must go hand in hand with a disarmament policy and also go hand in hand with a policy of conversion. By conversion I mean a policy whereby we assist industries which have been in the arms business to convert to more peaceful types of production.

In conclusion, let me say that we cannot support this bill in its present form. We will vote against it. If it is passed by the majority in this House and sent to committee, we will propose amendments to put limits on the list of countries that can buy weapons from Canada and to oblige that list and any addition to the list to be sent to a committee of this House for examination and approval.

That is our policy with respect to this bill.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): I am very glad that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has taken part in the debate because I always want to hear what he says. On most matters, I find myself very much in agreement with him. I also find that he is a person who speaks his mind without fear.

However, I have one question for him on the basis of what he said. I understand that he and his colleagues in the Liberal caucus will oppose this bill in its present form. Further, if it is carried on second reading and referred to committee, it will seek an amendment in the committee to limit the countries to which the cabinet would be able to approve the sale of these weapons, and require these countries to meet criteria somewhat in line with criteria that were used by this government and the previous Liberal government, although they were never brought to Parliament to be approved.

In fact, I would add that when members of Parliament inquired of this government or the Liberal government which countries were on that list, they were always told that it was confidential information. We could never find out which countries were on it.

I expect that the member for Victoria, our critic, will be very interested in the hon. member's motion in committee. I would guess, although I cannot prejudge it for him, that there is a strong likelihood he would support that amendment.

I am not clear—perhaps I did not listen carefully enough, although I did listen—as to whether the member would support the bill, if so amended.

I want to ask the member, since he is a person of legal standing, what he thinks about what has often been referred to as the Nuremberg trials, and the resulting principles.

I remember as a student hearing about them at that time. The allied powers put on trial officials of the Nazi government and officers of the Nazi armed forces, including guards and commanders at concentration camps, death camps and so on, for things they had done, which in civilian life would certainly have been considered crimes, such as murder or kidnapping and deportation.

They were called crimes against humanity. The defence that many, if not all of those officers used, civilian or military, was: "I was acting under orders. The decision was not mine. I was obligated as an officer of the forces or as an official of the government to carry out those orders. I am not responsible for anything that was wrong in what I did".

The decision as I understand it, the basic principle used at the Nuremberg trials, was that every person is responsible for what he does. If my government orders me to do something that I consider fundamentally morally wrong, then I must not do it.

In the light of that, I would like to ask the hon. member whether he supports the sale of these arms, even to a list of countries created with the restrictions that he has in mind.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as I stated we have a funny feeling that this bill will pass despite our opposition. If this bill passes and is sent to committee, we will be proposing amendments which would more or less—I cannot spell out the exact amendments now—restrict the sale of such weapons to countries with which we have collective security arrangements for defensive purposes and for peacekeeping.

We would forbid the sale to countries that are in a state of conflict internally or internationally, or where there is a strong possibility that they could be involved in such conflicts.

We would also propose another amendment whereby the government would be obliged to submit the list of countries to a parliamentary committee. Any new countries to be added to the list would be submitted to a parliamentary committee for the scrutiny and approval of that committee.

• (1610)

There are two kinds of amendments.

If the government was to accept those amendments—by the way those amendments would bring our law pretty much in line with what the Swedes have and what we have declared to be policy—I would agree to the legislation, because it would mean that we would be restricted to selling these kinds of weapons to countries with which we have collective security arrangements for collective defence, not for offensive purposes but collective defence, and for peacekeeping.

I am very strongly in favour of disarmament. I mentioned that. I said a policy on the arms trade must go hand in hand with a disarmament policy. I hope the day will come when we can reduce our arms on all sides and armies will not be necessary. We will probably still need peacekeeping forces.

To be honest with the hon. member, if the government was to accept the sorts of amendments we have in mind—and we have not drafted them in their final form—then I would agree to the bill. For several years I was a member of a cabinet which sold certain arms to friendly countries for defensive purposes, I did not object to that. I did not resign from cabinet. However, I do object that weapons of these kinds are sold to countries that are in a state of conflict or about to be in conflict, or that use the weapons to deny the human rights of their own citizens or crush their own citizens.

It is that sort of thing I think is intolerable and I could not accept.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to speak briefly. In that light I certainly would like the minister to have the opportunity to speak so I will just make my comment. Perhaps you would like the hon. minister to do so and then perhaps our colleague could answer.

Following my exchange with the minister, I was concerned regarding the kinds of equipment we are talking about now. The minister assures me that our little trucks will not cause problems and could not be used in some kind of confrontational situation. What I really wanted to know was what would happen if it was a different weapon.

Second, my colleague, whom I certainly respect and whose speech I found fascinating and certainly educational, talked about the transparency of the Swedish model. Will that put a stop to third party sales? I mean, if the Swedes decided to sell to someone, what stops them from selling those weapons to another country that we would not have been able to sell to in the first place?

I hope the minister can ask his question.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to add a point of information in response to some of the points the hon. member was making.

We have agreements with the following countries: the U.K., Belgium, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, Italy, Sweden and the United States.

I wanted to clarify that this is in the bill, because the suggested amendment by the hon. member asked to do this. An Order in Council would be required to add these countries to the Automatic Firearms Country Control List. Also, if we wanted to add countries to this list for other purposes, there would be the same kind of transparency.

I think a lot of what the hon. member has been suggesting is accomplished in the bill.

Also, in terms of the nature of the light armoured vehicles, they are wheeled vehicles and therefore cannot be used on the desert and are just used for defensive purposes. They cannot be used in an offensive way in the Middle East. That is by way of response to a question she asked earlier.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister to look once again at the wording of the legislation. As a lawyer, I find that the wording of the legislation in section 2, proposed subsection 4.1, does not restrict the list to countries with which they have arrangements. It says: "including those countries." It does not say "restricted to".

The French version is much more limiting. I raised this question this morning with the minister for foreign trade and he did not have an answer for me. It appears wide open at the present time.

I do not think that the bill deals properly with this. I know that there is a list. By the way, I suggested that we also have an amendment which would oblige the government, if it intended to put by Order in Council any country on the list, to put the proposal before the standing committee on external affairs for examination before the permit was issued. This would allow Parliament to have a say on who is on the list and who is not on the list.

In answer to the hon. member for Mount Royal, yes, in Swedish law when companies sell to other countries they have provisions in their contracts, it seems—I do not pretend to be an expert. I read Sweden's policy in this booklet where it points out that Sweden has now sued certain countries, taken certain countries to court, for transferring weapons to a third country. We can have sanctions if we want. For example, if a country broke a contract and transferred those arms to a third country, we would put them on a black list. We might sue them as the Swedes are doing but we might also say: "That is the end of it for you, fellow. No more sales to you".

There are different ways of dealing with this, but we can control to a much greater extent the end use of arms sales than we do now, and countries are attempting to do that.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to rise today in opposition to government Bill C-6. For those folks watching the proceedings in the House of Commons, as a word of explanation to those Canadians, what the government is attempting to do with the legislation it has introduced and wants to pass through the House of Commons is change the rules and regulations so that it would be in a position to export automatic weapons and certain personnel type carriers, basically to Saudi Arabia.

We in our party oppose this for a variety of reasons. First of all, I think as Canadians we were able to take some pride in Canada's historic role in being more of a peacekeeper than a major merchant of death. Canada has no great history in terms of conquest and imperialism. We have never seen ourselves as a major military power. We have never supported a major arms industry.

Canada has a global reputation that has won us respect in all corners of the world. We have played active roles in peacekeeping. We have consciously turned down the opportunity to become a nuclear power in the past. This has been with the agreement of all parties, whether the Conservative Party under John Diefenbaker or the party of Louis St. Laurent or Mike Pearson or Trudeau.

As Canadians we have always valued our role of being peacekeepers, of trying to have a voice of sanity in the United Nations and in other international bodies.

Of course, what Bill C–6 does is begin to turn Canada away from that tradition. The irony of it is this government knows no shame. Just a few months ago we had some very brave words by the Prime Minister and by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, exalting the need of restricting the arms race, particularly the selling of arms in the Middle East, the most volatile spot on the face of this earth.

The Prime Minister said and I quote: "There is a general view, without getting into the question of a total interdiction for the moment, that clearly a lot of these weapons, to understate the case, fell into hands that should never have had them in the first place.

• (1620)

"We could be much more active in that area if we wanted. We have all the technology in the world; we have all the resources we need. We could be big arms merchants. We have chosen not to be, although it is a very lucrative business.

"We have chosen not to be because it is fundamentally inconsistent with our policy to develop it, to pedal it, to finance it, and then to deplore its use."

That was the Prime Minister on March 13. As well, the Secretary of State at that time stated that the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, the arms trade, the constant chase for spheres of influence, is something he regretted and he thought that was one of the major problems of the Middle East.

We had all these great comments by our Prime Minister and our Secretary of State. Canada was going to take a major new initiative. What is the initiative? The initiative is Bill C–6. The reality is that this government wants some of the limitations on exports of weapons removed so that it can sell and make the deal with the Saudis.

Does this government know no shame? Does this government not recognize that Canadians are not fools? It can say one thing in February or March and then totally contradict itself two months later.

Again, I have always felt that the Orwellian period started in 1984 and the actions of this government continue to reinforce that Orwellian notion of saying one thing and doing something else.

I fear the government has started down the path toward selling more and more arms. The reason, of course, is entirely economical. This government, and I must say past Liberal governments as well, have to a certain extent supported the arms industry through DIPP. Some $300 million is used from public funds to promote the defence industries.

One would tend to think that this is a sunset type industry, that with the end of the cold war the major reason for the arms race has now disappeared, or surely at least a fair-minded person would say it has substantially disappeared.

I am sure that if I could go through the quotes of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State I would find something in their statements supporting my contention that with the end of the cold war, the arms race surely has to come to an end.

Now we are left with all these industries that used to produce arms. We have cutbacks to our own defence budgets in this country and in order for these industries to be viable, they have to start exporting more. As a result we ease the restrictions to allow our defence industry to start exporting to other countries. That is the only reason. It is economic.

Instead of the government beginning to realize that the arms race is at an end, that we have to address the problem of converting the arms industry to peaceful use, instead of extending its energy and its efforts in job retraining and the whole area of conversion, this government is trying to prop up those industries by loosening the restrictions so they can export more to countries like Saudi Arabia.

How irresponsible. How irresponsible on an international, global sense, and how irresponsible on a local economic sense. How stupid as well. Let us not continue to try to support the industries whose time has come, thank God. Let us rather be joyful that the need for the arms industry has decreased. Let us ease the transformation of the arms industry into peaceful industries. Let that be the goal and the objective of the government, rather than Bill C-6 which just gives them a greater lease on life.

Bill C-6 also damages our international credibility, as with so many other steps that this government has taken. I am sure even poor John Diefenbaker would just shake in his grave over it. We have been continually losing our creditability in the following areas: the sense of fairness and neutrality of not being an arms dealer; a country willing to work in international efforts like the United Nations Peacekeeping Organization; and a country that other countries in dispute can come to as a fair-minded mediator. Certainly Bill C-6 heightens that.

The Canadian government can no longer speak with the same type of credibility in urging international arms control. We will be laughed out of international fora when we stand up to make proposals after we pass Bill C-6.

As well, because of the economic reason of maintaining our defence industries, we are proposing to loosen the restrictions a little bit. What happens if there are further defence cutbacks in other countries as well as Canada? It is not going to be enough to maintain those industries. Will not the temptation to ease further restrictions be there? Of course it will be there, and we start down the slippery slope where we could conceivably end up being a full scale arms merchant selling to the highest bidder for whatever we can get away with.

Of course the government says it has its criteria in terms of existing legislation as to the countries to which it will deny the export of military goods and technology. Included in these four items are countries involved in or under imminent threat of hostilities. We are going to be selling these to Saudi Arabia. In the period of 1977 to 1986, 37 per cent of the global arms trade occurred in the Middle East. Fourteen wars have been fought since 1967 with more than three million dead and we are going to sell them more arms.

Does that not contravene section (b) where Canada generally denies the export of military goods and technology to countries involved in or under imminent threat of hostilities? I then look at section (d): "Countries whose governments have a persistent record of serious violations of the human rights of their citizens".

Surely nobody is going to stand up and claim that Saudi Arabia has a sparkling record in terms of human rights. One could very well foresee the possibility of these personnel carriers being used against the people of Saudi Arabia themselves should they ever begin to rise up and demand a more democratic system. We will see Canadian troop carriers with automatic weapons mounted on them facing the people of Saudi Arabia.

It makes no sense even under our existing guidelines.

The other point I want to make is that it is very hard to control the final use and destination. Yes, we are going to attempt to restrict the sale and export of these weapons, but can we really determine who the end users will be? Of course we cannot.

I also want to address the larger question that I commented on at the beginning of my remarks. I think there were many of us who saw some light at the end of the tunnel when it became obvious that the arms race and the cold war were going to end, that the trillions of dollars that had been spent on useless arms production could finally come to an end.

• (1630)

I have always maintained that the major reason for the deficits that we have in the world today, be it the Third World, France, England, the United States or Canada, is due to the arms race. The trillions of dollars of capital that the arms race has taken out of the world economy has made capital more scarce and forced up interest rates at the expense of health, education, food, social programs, pensions and so forth. Human beings throughout the world have paid a horrific price because of the arms race. The farmers going broke in my constituency because of the high interest rates in part are victims of the arms race. It is the arms race that has caused these massive deficits. It is the arms race that has caused the scarcity of capital and high interest rates.

When we saw the possibility of an end to the arms race and the cold war, there were many of us who had high hopes for the so-called peace dividend. Finally nations could start redirecting their resources, not just their capital, but their scientists, their technology and their manufacturing capacities toward peaceful and human needs rather than the death industry and the production of goods and services meant to kill people.

We have been disappointed because I am afraid that the peace dividend is still very illusory. It is certainly not there. Perhaps we should not have been so naive. We should have realized that the arms merchants have done very well in the past in their industry and they were not going to give up that easily. They are still very active today. Certainly for them the war with Iraq was a tremendous blessing. They are hoping to regenerate an arms race, maybe a little different. Maybe they can convince the Russians and the Chinese that with the sophistication of the American weaponry, they had better start spending some more. If they start spending more, perhaps other countries will spend more. Perhaps we can pick up the arms race again and then the merchants of death will be quite happy and the whole peace dividend will start, like a mirage, to disappear.

What a tragedy that would be. What a sin that would be to all humanity. Surely we hope for the end of the arms race and that these massive human and physical natural resources can be focused on the meeting of human needs on a global scale, from the homeless in Canada and the people who stand in line at the food banks all the way around the globe to the starvation and the human suffering that occurs in many lands.

As human beings we have the resources. Never in the history of the human race have we been able as human beings to develop the capacity to meet the needs of every man, woman and child on the face of this planet. It has been the arms race that has allowed us to continue and that has forced us to live in a world of scarcity when really we should be living in a world of plenty.

In conclusion, I would like to put on the record the famous quote from former President Dwight D. Eisenhower:

> Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket fired signifies in the final scene a theft from those who hunger, and are not fed, those who are cold and are not clothed. This world in arms is not spending money alone. It is spending the sweat of its labourers, the genius of its scientists, the house of its children—.This is not a way of life—.Under the cloud of war, it is humanity hanging on a cross of iron.

I implore this government to back off and to recognize what it is doing with Canada's reputation, what evil it is inflicting in the world. Back off. Rethink this and for heaven's sake, do not proceed with this legislation.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have just a brief question that I would like to put to the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle. I first of all want to compliment him on his excellent speech and comments that he made on Bill C-6, which the House is debating today.

I am particularly interested in the comments that the member made on the whole question of conversion. Looking at some of the information we have, Canada sold around $1.5 billion worth of arms annually in the 1980s, and I would like to hear the member speak a bit further on some of the methods or steps or ways that we might use for conversion as the way to help those workers and industries which currently produce arms to produce goods for the peaceful sector, if you like.

I would like to hear the member comment a little further on that. I think that is an important aspect of what we must try to do in Canada and in the other countries of the world if we are going to try and break the arms race.

Mr. de Jong: I thank my colleague very much for the question. Unfortunately, I do not have all of my statistics with me today, but groups like some of the peace institutes have put out columns which show $1 spent on child care, $1 spent on education, $1 spent on housing, $1 spent on hospitalization and so forth. In other words, $1 spent in the peace and the social sectors creates so many more jobs than does a dollar spent in the production of arms.

Some claim that the production of arms is really the great job generator. That is not true. Partly because of the high sophistication of armaments today it is not very often job creative. To speak of the defence industry as the creator of a great number of jobs is not quite accurate.

If you spend the same amount of money on things like education or housing and health, you can create three or four times the number of jobs than with the money spent on defence.

The second point in the conversion which I think is important, and again I do not have the accurate figures with me, is that the defence industry takes a horrendous number of our intellectual resources, our scientists.

I remember once on a delegation in Washington listening to one of the vice-presidents of Hughes Aircraft saying that what is used in the defence industry is generally 10 years ahead of what is used in the domestic industry.

There are many scientific discoveries that need to be innovated and brought into daily use, opening up tremendous new possibilities in terms of manufacturing, which now are just captured by the defence industry. We have spent so much of our intellectual resources in the defence industry that if you turned them loose in the domestic industry, many of our problems such as pollution, energy, biomedical problems and so forth would be solved. Using the scientific knowledge that the defence industry has for domestic purposes could also create many more jobs.

The government can work with industry and should be working with industry in terms of converting.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment I would like to make in response to the remarks about food banks and soup kitchens made by the NDP members who spoke earlier.

I can inform the hon. member that recently, Diemaco bid on a contract to supply the Netherlands Ministry of Defence with a series of small arms, a contract worth over $120 million that might be followed by another contract worth $100 million, to supply spare parts and other maintenance items.

If the company gets the contract, this will represent 7,680 person-years of employment in Canada, a figure that might almost double for the duration of the contract. It seems this would also mean that it would be possible to continue designing new weapons systems for the Canadian Armed Forces until the year 2000.

There is also the General Motors Diesel Division, also located in Ontario. It seems Saudi Arabia has decided to purchase a number of light armoured vehicles, a purchase that may be followed by other orders which might create between 1,500 and 2,000 new jobs in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, according to my NDP colleague's logic, if we want to avoid soup kitchens, we have to create jobs. In the same vein, if these plants in Ontario cannot survive, they will have to close, and the United States will get those jobs, and what is now being done in Canada will be done in the United States.

My point is, there is not the slightest hint of realism in the hon. member's speech and in all the NDP speeches I have heard today. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would be interested to know the position of Bob White, who represents the United Auto Workers in Canada, and I would also like to know the position of union workers at General Motors and Diemaco, who support this bill, Mr. Speaker.

• (1640)

[English]

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I understand the need for jobs and I understand the desperation of people, especially given the recession that has been made by this government, that to them there is an immediate job of $25 an hour as opposed to something that might happen somewhere later down the road in terms of conversion.

Their immediate needs and concerns are going to be with that job, but that is the creation and the situation you have created and that is the choice that you are giving to people. I say that is a bogus choice.

Why not use that logic and take it one step further? Why do you not legalize the growing of marijuana and the processing of heroine? You would create many jobs right across this country. Where do you stop? Where do you draw the line?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): Order please.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas—Canada Post; the hon. member for Labrador—National Defence; the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel—Employment; the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands—Cross-border shopping; and the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona—Edmonton International Airport.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, before I begin the debate I would like to ask if you could point out to me that there is a member of the cabinet in attendance here as the Standing Orders require.

I saw a couple before, but I do not see any member of the cabinet now. One member has returned.

The hon. minister has indicated that he wants to hear what I have to say and I am very glad of that. As he may suspect, I will be opposing this bill.

The purpose of this bill is to allow the export from Canada of automatic weapons and light-armoured vehicles armed with automatic weapons. The export of automatic weapons is now prohibited by the Criminal Code.

The bill provides in section 8 for an exemption to the code in cases approved by cabinet.

Section 8 in effect would permit the export or import of automatic weapons or components if approved by cabinet notwithstanding the other prohibitions in the code, so long as they were sent to countries which were on an approved list for the export of automatic weapons or components, and it authorizes the minister to create that list and to issue the export permits.

That is what it is about. Some of my colleagues have gone into some of the reasons for objecting to this bill, often quoting statements of this government which are in contradiction to the purpose of this bill in connection with the arms trade.

I want to go just a little bit deeper into the matter to discuss basic reasons for opposing this bill. Basically I would say that in our time, the arms trade is immoral. It is immoral because it is trade in the means of coercion; that is to say, a means of controlling people by violence or threat of violence. Means of coercion are sold by the owners of coercive power to other owners of coercive power for the sole purpose of coercing people by violence or threat of violence.

This government and its predecessor, the Liberal government, in spite of having some alleged guidelines which were not made public, sold arms to the dictator of Indonesia, the dictator of Chile, and the dictator of Philippines, all of whom used arms against their own people.

If the Liberal amendment suggested were to be adopted in this bill, I would look at it with great interest to see which of the countries that either the Liberal government or the present Conservative government sold arms to would be excluded.

What we have here is a situation that was lampooned by Mark Twain in his novel Tom Sawyer Abroad. Tom Sawyer, Huck Finn and their friends are travelling around the world in a balloon. They pass across the Sahara Desert and they look down and see bodies lying in the desert. They bring the balloon down and investigate. It looks like a caravan that had been covered over in a sand storm and smothered. People had been killed. Another wind had blown the sand off and the bodies lay where they had fallen with their clothes, their weapons, their money and their jewels.

Tom Sawyer, the leader of the group, gives a judgment: "It's our duty to take that money and those jewels, because if we don't, someone might come along and steal them". Mark Twain was writing at the time when the United States was taking some of the colonies from the Spanish empire, such as Cuba, the Philippines, Puerto Rico and so on.

That is the basic argument used now for the arms trade. Nobody seriously believes that we need it to defend Canada from an attacker. The argument is: if we do not sell it, somebody else will, and therefore it is our duty to sell it.

I am saying that this is immoral at the present time, because I did not always think so. I have had an individual struggle of conscience on this for a great many years. I came from a conventional family. My brother served in the navy. My uncle served in World War I and was gassed in a gas attack in France, and later served in Palestine. It was more or less taken for granted that when there is a war, able bodied young men join up.

Before I was of age, I debated that with myself, with pastors, and with anybody else, starting with my parents. I was finally persuaded that I could see at that time no other alternative to surrendering to violence and so I joined the army. I volunteered and took the parachute training at Camp Shilo. When I was ready to go overseas the war in Europe ended. Then I volunteered for the Pacific and that ended soon.

• (1650)

I had made the moral decision that I was ready to go overseas and take the chance of killing people or being killed on the ground that it was necessary to do that for peace, good order, democracy, and basically for the survival of the civilians who were behind the front lines.

I began to rethink that when I heard about the bomb our ally dropped on Hiroshima on August 6, killing about 60,000 people, nearly all civilians. The Japanese war was already ending. They had begun to sue for peace. It seems likely that the use of the bomb was not so much to save American lives as to send a signal, a threat, to the Soviet Union that America had the monopoly on nuclear weapons.

As nuclear weapons multiplied and became the property of other countries, including the Soviet Union, I remember a sermon preached by the Rev. George Macleod, then of Iona, Scotland, who argued that if some other country is using nuclear weapons against us we do not accomplish any good by joining in the nuclear exchange. It will only ensure annihilation of all concerned. Nobody is to be protected in a nuclear war.

I was persuaded and became what he called a nuclear pacifist. I still thought that other weapons, hand weapons, small weapons, guns like rifles and so on, were fair to use. My young brother disagreed with me and said: "You are inconsistent. If you accept pistols and knives, you accept nuclear weapons". And I said: "No, we draw the line".

This year I have decided my young brother was right. I cannot tell him so now. It happens that he died in the fall. But if he was here I would tell him: "Larry, you were right and I was wrong in 1956 on that point". I see the outcome of it now. At that time, I thought that people defending their land against invaders or against dictatorships with guerrilla warfare, using what is called small arms weapons, were fighting a just war.

I now think that it is impossible to draw that line in our time. Perhaps it was possible in ages past. Perhaps it was possible before 1945. I am not sure. But I do not think it is possible now to draw that line.

Somebody has mentioned at least three million people killed in wars since World War II. They were killed mostly in the south between southern countries fighting each other, but with weapons sold to them by the north.

As the Prime Minister has said, the weapons industry and weapons trade is lucrative. Arms bring some of the highest profits of any of the manufacturing industries. In fact, for example, a group like Litton Systems gave up manufacturing civilian goods entirely in order to concentrate exclusively on manufacturing war goods. It produces fewer jobs, as was also pointed out, than producing the means of life, but with more money, more profit on the dollar. It also produces more dictatorship. It shores up dictators or it causes originally democratic countries to become more dictatorial because of the secrecy and the power and the repression associated with war or with the preparation for war.

In the last two or three years I have become very interested in what I heard called the civil society. I heard about it occurring in eastern Europe, in Poland, in Czechoslovakia, in Hungary, in East Germany, principally in those countries of northern eastern Europe, but also in the Baltics. Then I heard about it in the Soviet Union when I visited there nearly two years ago. I found there was a great spread of what were called "informal organizations," that is to say, they were not registered with the government. This was considered by people who talked with me to be an important advance. They said there had not been any real growth of civil society there either under the Czars or under the Bolsheviks.

In other words, they thought of the civil society as voluntary groups that sort of mediate, provide a cushion, between the state and the individuals. They considered that the growth of civil society in the Soviet Union was very hopeful. But the more clear example of that has been in Poland and Czechoslovakia, East Germany, and Hungary where a tremendous change was made in the relatively short while, though after long, long years of waiting, and with relatively little violence.

The Polish government was not overthrown by armed resistance, nor was the Czech government, nor was the East German government, nor was the Hungarian government. It was a civilian movement.

I visited Chile 18 months ago to observe the election there. That was not the most important vote in Chile recently. The most important vote was the year before in the plebiscite that defeated the only candidate standing then for the presidency, General Pinochet. That opened the way for a genuinely pluralistic election and that was the one I observed 18 months ago.

When I talked with people before and after voting day, I learned that again it had not been brought about by a military overthrow of General Pinochet, who has a huge armed force for a country of only 13 million or 14 million people, far, far larger in proportion than we have in Canada, for example. He was not defeated by military power. The change was brought about by organized civilian resistance.

Something like that is also happening in El Salvador where, in between the government and the guerrillas, the FMLN, there is a growing civilian movement. In January when I visited there, I talked with peasants who have gone back to the land. I talked with peasants who have gone back to their farming, even in a conflictive zone. Some of them get killed, but they are going back in greater and greater numbers. They are coming back from other countries, from Nicaragua, from Costa Rica, from Honduras, to re-settle their lands, to do what they and their ancestors always did, grow food and raise families. They are unarmed. They take no part in the fighting on either side. That movement is growing, and I believe it is an important force in the possibility of ending the civil war there.

People were astonished a year ago in the election in Nicaragua. First of all, many were surprised—I was, but so was Ronald Reagan—that the Sandinistas lost the election to the coalition ranged against them.

But the second surprise was that the Sandinistas not only had arranged for that clean election, supervised by the United Nations, but accepted the result of it and did not attempt to block it, as has happened in El Salvador and in so many other Latin American countries. In fact, the Sandinistas are in charge of reducing and dismantling their army.

Mr. Speaker, what I am trying to say is that there is now this movement for peace and it stands sharply against the stated view of the United States 43 years ago. This is the plan worked out by George Kennan in 1948 when he was head of the State Department Policy Planning Staff. He wrote, and I quote:

> We have about 50 per cent of the world's wealth, but only 6.3 per cent of its population. In this situation, we cannot fail to be the object of envy and resentment. Our real task—is to devise a pattern of relationships which permit us to maintain this parity without positive detriment to our national security.
> To do so, we will have to dispense with all sentimentality—We need not deceive ourselves that we can afford the luxury of altruism and world benefaction—We should cease to talk about vague and—for the Far East—unreal objectives such as human rights, raising standards of living and democratization. The day is not far off when we are going to have to deal in straight power concepts. The less we are hampered by idealistic slogans, the better.

• (1700)

My point is, the days of using power symbolized by the gun are passing. That kind of power to kill, and only power to kill, is out of date. The life of the world depends on the people who use the power to make life, like those peasants in El Salvador who have gone back into the war zones to grow food and raise families.

This bill, which we oppose, now belongs to the past and should be dropped by this government. I hope the government will consider that. There are better ways to earn a living than by preparing for killing.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to respond to my hon. colleague who has been philosophical this afternoon. He did not embark on a tirade at all. He quietly shared with us his philosophy and how he arrived at his philosophy and why he is taking this position on this particular bill.

I do not so much want to debate him because, philosophically, he has the right to put forward his life thinking and his life experience on this subject and I do not want to criticize that at all. What I found in his presentation was an almost 19th century Robert Owen. He captured the magic of the Robert Owen 19th century socialist idea of maybe being able to have a civil society that somehow interposed between the state and individuals and sources of power in a community. Let us just look at this ideal universe towards which he would like to see the world move. Does he foresee a situation whereby there would not be a need for any police, any military however minor, and does he foresee, even in a Robert Owen world 100 years later at the end of the 20th century, no need for firearms? If so, could he explain how that world would work?

I share his Utopian view in many ways. It would be great if we did not need these firearms, but since the beginning of time we have had to have police forces with firearms. We have also had to have some defensive enclaves of a military nature in order to protect a country, including Central American countries. I just want to get a genuine sense of it. Does he see a world that has no firearms or transportation vehicles, for example, which would look after the local military, however small?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for his question because it is very direct and relevant to what I was saying.

My simple answer is that I cannot draw the picture of the kind of world the minister is talking about when he suggests that is where I am heading. I might be heading there in my mind, but I have not arrived there. As I have acknowledged, my own view on the question of police forces, small arms, small wars and so on has been changing in the last 30 or 40 years. Some people might think I am a slow learner, but I have arrived at the view that it is practically impossible to keep a small war small.

I would say the Sandinistas in their little isolated patch of hills in Central America thought that. They could drive out a bloody dictator, Samoza and then be able to control their own country. The United States told them "no". The United States had purposes for Samoza, rather than some successor, and would not permit that.

The United States was prepared, and the United States is prepared now. General Colin Powell has threatened to use direct military power to resolve the negotiations between the Government of El Salvador and its army—or the army and its government because it is the army that controls the government—and the FMLN if things don't go as General Powell and President Bush think they should.

It is becoming more clear that even a just cause, fought defensively with limited weapons, no longer is allowed to operate in isolation.

What I am saying is that the world is moving. I am not saying that it is possible for Canada immediately to disarm totally, let alone persuade other countries immediately to disarm totally. I am saying that those of us who can should make a start, and a start is not to increase our arms exports. That is moving backward in history rather than forward.

The arms export is not for the defence of Canada, and I don't believe it is for the defence of Saudi Arabia. It is for the enrichment of the people who manufacture those arms. That is the reason for doing it. Otherwise they would put their money into something more useful: building civilian vehicles or building ships, or building other things that we need to produce life instead of to produce death.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, at the present time, the Criminal Code states that anyone who is not a member of the Canadian forces or of a police force and who imports or has in his or her possession certain weapons such as automatic rifles or firearms is guilty of an offence. It is therefore illegal to manufacture such weapons in Canada or to import them for the purpose of including them in Canadian export goods.

Canada's defence needs require Canada to have, among other things, the capacity to repair, overhaul, and improve the Canadian forces' equipment. Our forces need sufficient equipment to fulfil the tasks assigned to them, be it UN peacekeeping missions or actual combat. However, our defence budget is rather small. So, our defence industry must have access to the international defence market in order to survive. Because of foreign sales, it is less dependent on Canadian contracts and government financial support.

The legislation, when passed, will allow Canada to import, as well as manufacture and export, these weapons to countries with which Canada has signed bilateral defence production agreements.

This bill will not weaken the Canadian exports control policy. The export of these kinds of weapons will be strictly controlled using the same stringent guidelines that have applied for the longest time to Canadian military equipment exports in Canada.

A country control list will also be established. The export of firearms such as those produced by Diemaco will be permitted only to the countries on this new list. As with any regulation made under the Export and Import Permits Act, it would take an Order in Council to add countries to the list. Only countries with which we have an intergovernmental defence, research, development and production arrangement would qualify.

We will adhere strictly to intergovernmental arrangements, and exports will be closely controlled to countries which pose a threat to Canada or its allies, countries involved in hostilities or under imminent threat of hostilities, countries under UN Security Council sanctions, and countries whose governments have persistent records, of human rights violations.

The same guidelines will apply military exports. These criteria have been very useful in maintaining strict controls on exports. At the same time, they are sufficiently broad to require new policy development.

• (1710)

Mr. Speaker, Canada will continue to promote the tightening of international constraints and effective controls where exports of conventional weapons are concerned. We will ask for a meeting of the world's major arms exporters to encourage them to make an official commitment to greater restraint when exporting conventional weapons, especially to regions where the build-up of such weapons appears to be taking on alarming proportions.

However, Canada continues to recognize the right of every country to defend itself as guaranteed under Article 51 of the UN Charter. This bill will give Canadian businesses a chance to help other countries meet their legitimate defence requirements, while observing the strict limitations imposed by Canada's weapons control policy. These amendments concern the Canadian defence industry, first of all, and two companies in particular.

In 1976, Diemaco, a company in Kitchener, Ontario, was established by DND as a centre of excellence for the provision of small arms to the Canadian Armed Forces, to ensure they would not be totally dependent on foreign suppliers in times of emergency. Its facility is unique in Canada and it is important to DND's long term operational readiness.

The awarding of a contract to produce the new family of small arms for the Canadian Armed Forces created 300 direct jobs for the company itself, 200 direct jobs at its Canadian subcontractors, and an equal number of indirect jobs. This contract is nearing completion, however, so that Canada may lose Diemaco's substantial manufacturing capability and that of its 75 subcontractors.

These are quality jobs with a focus on technology. The Canadian government's investment of $40 million in this computer based manufacturing capability contributes and will continue to contribute very substantially to Canada's competitive position.

There are a few examples of the capabilities covered by this investment: product design, engineering, metal finishing, plastic molding, precision casting, forging and machining, and extrusion techniques.

Mr. Speaker, recently, Diemaco bid on a contract to supply the Netherlands Department of Defence with a series of small arms, a contract worth more than $120 million that might be followed by another contract worth $100 million to supply spare parts and other maintenance items. A successful bid would mean 7,680 person years of employment in Canada, a figure that might almost double for the duration of the contract.

This would also mean it would be possible to continue designing new weapons systems for the Canadian Armed Forces until the year 2000. The Dutch have now entered a new testing phase for which weapons have been provided by the Department of National Defence. If this bill is not passed, it will be very hard for us to convince them to take our proposal seriously.

The U.S. Defense Department will turn to Diemaco and its subcontractors for the components required to maintain its supplies of rifles and machine guns. This could affect 20 Canadian companies and represent $5 million a year in export sales.

Diemaco and Hughes Leitz together developed an optical kit for the Canadian forces. This kit could easily be exported and create 200 person years of employment.

Without these changes, we will lose the whole small-calibre weapons industrial infrastructure before the end of 1995.

Saudi Arabia has decided to buy some light armored vehicles and it may place other orders that could create between 1,500 and 2,000 jobs. GM would have to provide automatic weapons with their vehicles. These weapons would have to be imported and then exported. It would be illogical to insist that these vehicles, made in Canada, be sent to another country to be equipped with automatic weapons.

Note that light armored vehicles are considered defensive. They are on rubber tires and are very lightly armored; they are used to patrol oil fields and pipelines. For offensive purposes, heavy tracked armored vehicles would certainly be preferred.

Not only will this bill implement stricter controls on the export of automatic weapons but it will prove that the federal government is determined to meet Canada's strategic defence needs, to ensure the survival of the facilities created as part of the North American defence industry infrastructure, to improve legitimate export prospects, and to create new jobs in Canada.

In summary, we must create and safeguard employment. We must increase competitiveness by developing and keeping leading-edge technology. Exports must increase to improve the trade balance. Small business must also be supported by keeping many subcontractors employed. Canadian capacity must be maintained for times of tension. Canada must be allowed to contribute to its allies' defence capability. The destination of automatic arms must be closely controlled. Finally, we must help Canada remain an active and competitive partner in the North American defence industry infrastructure.

[English]

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I particularly enjoyed the comments on this bill from the member opposite.

As a follow-up to a question I put to the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, I would be interested in this member's comments on the point I made about the need to have a conversion developed in this country. This would be a means by which, in a very realistic way, we would have a chance to get out of the arms race, giving those people working in these industries an opportunity to work in other areas that could be developed.

I think that is important. The author of a very important book entitled The Rise and Fall of Great Nations of the World made the point that one of the reasons Japan, as an example, was able to develop such a dynamic economy and put considerable resources into developing trade in its technological and automobile industries was that it did not have to allocate all those funds to armed forces.

Clearly, if it is not guns, it is butter. If a country allocates or spends in Canada some $1.5 billion annually on arms, I would be interested in knowing the member's views on conversion. What ideas does the government have on how to redirect some of those funds so that we could get out of the arms race and have people employed in the peace sector.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, we have to recognize that Canada is not a very big player in the manufacturing of arms. We are a minor player in that field in that we do not produce on a mass level a high volume of offensive arms. We are mainly engaged in producing conventional weapons that are used for defence.

In this case the two industries that we are talking about, Diemaco and GM, are supplying the Canadian army with light vehicles and the type of weapons that are used normally in defensive action.

Those two industries, based in Ontario and employing several hundred people, would not survive by supplying only the Canadian army.

• (1720)

We have an opportunity to sell some of those products to friendly countries and maintain those high quality jobs in high technology.

The government would be ill-advised not to take this opportunity to enhance those jobs and solidify those two companies and their contractors.

As for the conversion aspect of my colleague's question, I certainly appreciate and agree that we should be looking at ways to augment and increase jobs in our production capacity in more society-oriented products. However, since there is a market and we still have a limited capacity to access that market, the country and the government should put every effort possible together to give our manufacturing firms access to those markets in order to consolidate their base and maintain the jobs that exist in those plants at the present time.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's response to the question put by the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley. I find it very interesting that he says he wants to enhance those jobs and solidify the positions of the two companies, but on the other hand he agrees that we might want to think at some time in the future about changing the role of those workers and changing the direction of those companies.

If we, as Canadians, do not agree with being in the arms race, and if we genuinely want to ensure that those workers have jobs, would it not make sense that at the same time as this government allows these contracts to be let that it begins to do some serious planning about conversion of those jobs into peace-type jobs as opposed to jobs that create war machines?

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Mission—Coquitlam for her question and her comments. Of course, we should be very careful not to put the country in a position where we would have to import the arms that our forces may need in the future to provide the defence of our country and to help them to fulfil the role that from time to time we will ask them to perform for the United Nations.

We should maintain in Canada a basic industrial manufacturing capacity for the type of conventional arms that our forces will need. If we do not maintain that position, one day Canada will be a net importer, a net buyer of that type of weapon. That would put in jeopardy our balance of payments, create hardship in the economy and lose jobs. I personally think that we have to maintain a level of manufacturing capacity in Canada that will assure that we can equip our Armed Forces with the type of equipment they need to perform the job that we ask them to perform.

On the other hand, we should, as the government is doing, look at alternatives, look at ways to diversify the economy in order to create the type of jobs that will benefit the Canadian economy.

I repeat, we should be very careful not to put ourselves in a position where we will have to buy the equipment we need to ensure our security.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise in this very important debate which we are undertaking today. Some of the most eloquent and cogent arguments I have heard on this subject in many years of following the debate on arms control and the questions of disarmament have come in the debate today.

I would like to compliment very much a number of my colleagues whom I see seated around me, particularly the member for Trinity—Spadina, the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle and others who have spoken very eloquently. I would hope that this debate reaches far beyond the limited confines of this Chamber and becomes a debate throughout Canada. It is a very important debate, one of the most important debates perhaps that we have engaged in yet, although its subject matter may seem on the surface to be relatively mundane.

What startles me the most, and has startled many of us, is the utter hypocrisy of what we are witnessing today. Many of us who were involved in the gulf war debate in January, when we were called back to debate the resolution supporting United Nations action, will remember the government saying repeatedly that the situation in the Middle East was indeed the result of actions in the past. Weapons had been sold to people who clearly should not have had them.

There were repeated references made to the fact that Saddam Hussein had been allowed, in fact encouraged, to build up a massive armaments inventory in order to counteract the growing threat of the Ayatollah in Iran some years previously. The government repeatedly assured us that our fears about engaging in the gulf war were not grounded, that what we were doing was preparing for a new world order in which these kind of conflicts would no longer take place. The government said that after the gulf war the nations of the world would see to it that a new world order was established in which weapons of destruction would no longer be circulated or sold, that mechanisms would be put in place to control the sale of arms and that we need no longer worry.

The government said to us if only we would support its position on the gulf war, if only we would support the position of the United Nations—speaking essentially for the United States—that this war was necessary, afterward everything would be all right. We would no longer need to fear the effects of the arms race.

In fact, in the period immediately following the war, the government, seeking to assure Canadians of that, went so far as to issue statements such as the following. On March 8, the then Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> The world cannot let a victory become a truce, an occasion for nations to rearm, regroup and return to battle. The peace which now beckons—must become a pattern.

He went on to say that to have peace in the Middle East region would require addressing the full spectrum of problems including, and I quote:

> The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, the arms trade, the constant chase for spheres of influence.

He then went on to describe how weapons used by Iraq were supplied largely by the five members of the Security Council: Britain, France, U.S., China and the U.S.S.R., the very people who sanctioned and, indeed, spearheaded the effort to fight that Gulf War. They in fact were fighting against their own weapons.

Following that we all remember that our own Prime Minister took the opportunity when President Bush was making his visit to our nation's capital to say to President Bush very clearly, and I quote:

> There's a general view—without getting into the question of total interdiction for the moment—that clearly a lot of these weapons, to understate the case, fell into hands that should never have had them in the first place. We could be much more active in that area if we wanted. We have all the technology in the world; we have all the resources we need. We could be big arms merchants; we've chosen not to be, although it is a very lucrative business.

"We have chosen not to be because it is fundamentally inconsistent with our policy to develop it, to peddle it, to finance it, and then to deplore its use".

• (1730)

It is very hard to believe that the government led by the people who made those statements would now be proposing Bill C-6. It would vastly increase the scope and the range of weaponry which Canada peddles in the world.

It is very hard to believe that the government should be coming forward with this bill when we heard statements during that war that these kinds of wars are inevitable if weapons are allowed to build up and the arms trade is allowed to flourish because these weapons must sooner or later be used. I recall very clearly during the gulf war, because it startled me so much, an expert on weaponry and the arms trade discussing the issue on one of the many TV programs. The expert was asked whether in fact the war would have any impact on Canadian arms exports, and whether there was an opportunity there for arms manufacturers and exporters as a result of the war. The answer that this arms trade expert gave was that there would in fact be no sales as a result of the war because this was an inventory war.

I recall very clearly, as we all do, seeing signs in different stores in our communities where we come from indicating that there is an inventory sale. They have too many shoes. They have to clean out their inventory or whatever the commodity is. Here we got to the point where we had to have an inventory war because there were so many weapons awash in that region that sooner or later the temptation to use them became overwhelming.

We have had our inventory war. We have had our commitments from the government that we were in fact going to seek a new world order based on limiting very dramatically the flow of arms around the world. But what do we get? We get Bill C-6 and we see the Minister for International Trade, when he was defending the introduction of this bill, and other members from the government who have defended the bill before us, saying there are essentially two reasons why we have to adopt this particular piece of legislation. One is that they need to protect the jobs in the industry and the other argument is that in fact they are not weapons of mass destruction. Really all they are saying when they talk about arms control is that the methods of mass destruction and these particular weapons that would be affected by this bill will not be included in it.

Let me deal with those arguments for just a minute. First there is the question of jobs. Certainly I do not want to underestimate the importance of jobs in our economy. I do not want to see people unemployed who currently work in the armaments industry any more than I want to see farmers thrown off their farms. I do not want to see aboriginal people whose traditional lifestyles are being undermined forced to go on welfare.

I have particular feelings for this case because in 1974 I was a candidate for my party in the constituency of London East where the GM plant that is to build these weapons is located. Many of the brothers and sisters in Local 27 of the UAW are good friends of mine and I know them well. Clearly they are concerned about the loss of jobs, and well they should be.

I would like to say to those brothers and sisters in Local 27 that they are not in fact the victims of a move by the opposition to curb the arms race or to unrealistically restrict a legitimate trade in these kinds of things but rather they are victims of a whole trend which we see more and more of.

A lot of that trend is wrapped around the whole question of free trade. Certainly the concern that people feel in southwestern Ontario about the loss of jobs stems directly from the fact that there are not alternate jobs or economic opportunities in that region because of the massive devastation wreaked on that region by the free trade agreement with the United States.

Second, I think it is symbolic of the fact that we are more and more integrating our economies between Canada and the United States, and a big part of that integration will inevitably mean in my opinion that we will become more and more involved in the arms trade. That is a result of the fact that the United States depends very heavily on the arms trade. Its economy is based in large measure, in far too great a measure many Americans and many other people in the world believe, on the arms trade. We are very rapidly coming to the same position.

Many of us have seen the arguments. Even when it comes to things like Minute Man missiles and other weapons of mass destruction, we see feature stories on television and read articles in the papers about citizens of communities in California, in Georgia, and other places that depend very heavily on the arms industry. We see stories that these people will lose their jobs, that whole communities are in danger of being wiped out. Therefore it becomes a rationale to continue even the most appalling kinds of weapons manufacture. Those kinds of things are rationalized by the need for jobs, and we are getting closer and closer to that.

The other aspect of the whole free trade philosophy involved here is the commitment and the orientation toward viewing things only in terms of the bottom line. If there is a market opportunity, if there is a buck to be made, we have to be there. That is the free trade philosophy and that is the philosophy that we are seeing today.

The second argument the minister made was that these are not weapons of mass destruction, that these LAVs, these light armoured vehicles, are really a very insignificant kind of weapon. Let me read a little bit about the particular weapon that we are talking about:

> The light armoured vehicle is a multi-role small tank on wheels, built to operate in a wide range of environments. It is amphibious, relatively fast, capable of moving up to 63 miles an hour on a road, can climb steep slopes, can be air-lifted or dropped by transport aircraft and helicopters. In its many variations, all of which are included in the Saudi sale, it can be used as a troop carrier, a communications command centre, a towing vehicle, a mortar launcher or an anti-tank weapon.

When I see things like "having the capability of being a mortar launcher or a communications command centre", we are not talking about something that is removed from warfare that includes mass destruction. We are talking in fact about a weapon that can be very integral to warfare, including weapons of mass destruction, as we saw very clearly in the gulf war where 250 of these vehicles were used by the United States military in their operations.

There is another aspect that disturbs me about these weapons being pooh-poohed as not being weapons of mass destruction and therefore not significant. This is the fact of what will necessarily happen when we sell these to various governments with dubious human rights records and with very poor records of allowing their citizenry to have influence in the affairs of their countries. I think we are going to see that they will be used on a widespread scale for putting down civil disturbances.

In other words, we will see people like Saddam Hussein, or the leadership in Syria, or other countries such as that, using this weaponry to quell civil disturbances, to further oppress their own people and to further perpetuate the kind of power that they already have.

I cannot see that allowing countries with these kinds of regimes to obtain this kind of weaponry for the purpose of quelling their own populations represents a step forward for Canada in any way.

The third problem I see here is that it will become even more tempting to get involved in all kinds of Third World trouble, to pursue a strategy of intervention in Third World disputes, and in fact to foment those Third World disputes if the whole question of spheres of influence and control by the superpowers is in some way threatened.

I see this very much as being part of a new world order that might not be so much based on mutual assured destruction, the old theory of having a balance of nuclear forces. That theory is being eclipsed by the end of the cold war. What we are seeing is a new world order based very much on strategic interventions all over the world with just as destructive an effect, and perhaps more destructive because there is much less public outcry when these kinds of interventions are made.

Further, I would like to speak about the arms race in general. We had all hoped when the cold war began to thaw, when it became clear that the old power blocs were disintegrating, that there might well be a peace dividend that would accrue to the world and that would be a benefit to the world's people.

We are cutting budgets here by 5, 10, 15 per cent and saying that the activities of departments thus cut will not be affected. We are talking about a cut of 2 to 4 per cent in the arms trade which would yield over $200 trillion in the next decade. When we are talking about countries with per capita incomes of $150, $300 or $500 a year, $200 trillion is a massive amount of money. It seems quite ironic that we should be talking about increasing the arms trade while at the same time we are cutting foreign aid from our own country.

Furthermore, I would like to make the argument that the arms trade has been a big factor in creating many of the current economic problems we see world-wide. Certainly the high interest regime we have just come through has been directly related to the arms trade. There are very many credible economists who have said that the inflationary interest rate spiral we were in was fuelled directly by Ronald Reagan's arms build-up during his 1980 to 1988 regime and that our own economy has suffered as a result. We are hearing arguments continuously that we have to absorb the kind of Draconian economic measures here because of high interest rates. In fact, those high interest rates were fuelled originally by the arms race.

The arms race has created a situation where very, very poor countries are in a position where they are almost forced to devote huge percentages of their Gross National Product and of their national budgets to support buying armaments to defend against others who have had arms sold to them, their neighbours and so on. Therefore, there are situations in Central America, the Middle East, and elsewhere, where poor countries are devoting huge amounts of money to the arms trade. First of all, the only thing they can afford to do in their own countries is starve their own people. Second, when they import from other countries they are importing armaments instead of other very useful commodities which we could be exporting to them.

I am worried as well about Canada's international credibility. We have consistently taken a good line when it comes to arms control, when it comes to search for peace around the world, and for new mechanisms to ensure that a new world order would be a peaceful world order. But what does it do to Canada's credibility when, so quickly after a major war which should have taught us a lesson, we are out there flogging weapons with the best of them? Surely the countries around the world that look to Canada for leadership must be very, very disappointed when they see Canada leaping with both feet into what it sees to be a small commercial opportunity, the way we are doing here.

I see you are telling me that my time has almost expired. In closing, I would like to quote a few words from a former Conservative member of Parliament from Edmonton, Douglas Roche, who was Canada's ambassador for disarmament from 1984 to 1988. Certainly members from all sides of the House recognize Doug Roche as one of the most articulate and committed people when it comes to the whole question of disarmament.

He said:

> The government is rushing this legislation, trying to get it passed before the summer recess. Public opinion ought quickly to be mounted to fortify opposition efforts to defeat the bill. It was public opinion that stopped Canada from joining the U.S. Star Wars initiative, that stopped West German arms manufacturers from settling in Cape Breton, that stopped the acquisition of nuclear-powered submarines.

Bill C-6 is another watershed moment. It must be killed.

I agree with those sentiments. I would hope that the public of Canada becomes aware very quickly of what is happening here, that the public of Canada will make its views known very quickly to the Government of Canada and to all members of Parliament. We cannot afford to proceed with this legislation. We will be forever branded as hypocrites if we do.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I just want to pose a question to the hon. member. He paints a rather lurid portrait of Saddam Hussein, Third World repression, and the government leaping in to the selling of arms. It is a kind of exaggerated, lurid portrait which has nothing whatsoever to do with this very technical amendment to a piece of legislation.

The hon. member should be reminded that there will be three criteria applied to the exports of automatic weapons under this bill. The three criteria, first of all are transparencies. It is very important to him that we be open about what we are doing and the transparency is in this bill. Canada will report exports of automatic weapons in its annual report on exports of military goods. It is a public document and it is also submitted to the United Nations. He made reference to the United Nations. This document will be submitted there. It is very important that he not exaggerate secrecy. This is transparent.

Second, there is consultation. We are going to initiate consultations with other countries, particularly our NATO allies and close defence partners, on controlling exports of automatic weapons.

Finally, in terms of restraint, he talks about these weapons or these firearms ending up in the hands of Saddam Hussein or somebody else. Canada will export automatic weapons only to those countries with which we have bilateral agreements. Right now, and I listed them a few hours ago, we only have agreements with 10 countries, of which Sweden is the only one that is not a member of NATO.

It is not fair of him, it is not furthering the cause of truth and openness, to paint portraits of countries such as Iraq as receiving these weapons.

These countries will be listed on the automatic firearms control list which will be available to the public. So it is very important that the House realize there is not only transparency in this bill, there is not only an undertaking to consult, but there is very great restraint on the countries that will be eligible for these firearms.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to expand a little more on some of the remarks I made. I can understand the minister's concern because the plant that is to manufacture these weapons is located in the city which he represents.

I am aware, as the minister says, that there are 1,000 CAW workers there. I know many of them personally. I had wished, though, that the minister would have explained to us what the government has done about the commitment that it made in 1987 to prepare facilities like the GM plant in London for conversion to non-military purposes. We made a clear commitment four years ago. As far as I know, there has been absolutely nothing done. We spent huge amounts of money, $300 million a year or thereabouts, gearing up for the arms trade, and nothing for conversion. I think that is one argument that needs to be made more often.

When the minister speaks about transparency and so on, the member for Mackenzie says it is so transparent we see right through it. I think there is a certain ironic truth to that.

Certainly the groups that monitor the arms business, such as Project Ploughshares and others, are not at all convinced that the mechanisms that are in place either in this bill or in other legislation are adequate. In fact, they said they are very inadequate. One of the big problems is the trans-shipment of arms from one point to another. We have no control over what happens once we have sold them to one country; they can very easily sell them to another and so on down the line. This is something that is widespread in the arms business and it happens every day.

• (1750)

He also says that we should accept the government's assurances about countries that are on the list and that it is a very restricted list. I am not aware that Saudi Arabia is on that list or has met any of these criteria. In fact, in a lot of people's opinion, Saudi Arabia should never be on that kind of a list, even if you accept that the criteria are adequate.

Furthermore, I hear that countries like Thailand, which recently experienced another in a long series of military coups, is considering a purchase. I would not be at all surprised if the same arguments were made there.

We have a list of criteria that is supposed to rule out arms going to human rights violators, people in danger of imminent conflict, and others like that, but those have been around for a while. In spite of that, over the last three years we have exported military commodities to countries like South Korea, Turkey, the Philippines, Indonesia—which is still occupying East Timor in a manner very similar to the occupation of Kuwait by Iraq—Peru where a civil war is going on, and Zaire which is a notorious civil rights violator, one of the worst in the world. We have exported military commodities to those particular countries.

When I see the government exporting other kinds of military commodities to those kinds of countries, I am not reassured. I am sure many other Canadians are not reassured by the argument that this particular class of weapons will be restricted only to our very best and most trusted friends.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a comment on this matter and put a question to my friend who gave an excellent speech. It is too bad that I cannot put the question, in some way, to the minister who just posed a question. I would say to him, are these contracts we are talking about not with the Netherlands and Saudi Arabia, and did not even the government, the Department of External Affairs which has become like an international trade agency, seek out the the contract with Saudi Arabia?

I see the minister leaving the House, but I have to put the question to my friend anyway.

The government should face the issues squarely and not mislead us. Deal with the issues squarely. The government's problem is that the Prime Minister has got such a big mouth that he gets himself into trouble, not only in Tokyo but when he was here talking about these arms deals, and the former minister of external affairs, Mr. Clark, is clearly on the record saying: "We should cut arms sales to the Middle East."

The government now brings in a bill to amend the Criminal Code which would allow arms sales in the Middle East. It is in a sticky wicket.

I want to ask the member two questions. Does he find it as ironic as I do that on the same day the government brings in legislation for arms control in Canada we are also getting legislation to export guns? I find this very strange.

Second, I would ask him to comment on this. Has he picked up the problem, as he mentioned, with workers and jobs and so on? When Diemaco, the gun manufacturer, was Canadian Arsenals, a public corporation, we could cut back the labour force. We were just making guns for Canadians and we could move them somewhere else. Once we privatized it and made it a private corporation it has got to have more arms sales. It has got to go into the foreign market. It has got to virtually sell to anybody it can. That is another result of privatization.

I wonder if the member, in the short time I have left him, could comment on those two points.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member very much for his intervention. Certainly I also note the tremendous irony of the comparison between what the government was saying during the gulf war and persuading Canadians that in fact it was serious about bringing these kinds of situations under control and particularly persuading Canadians that they needed to support the war effort because the government was committed. That was part of the strategy to bring these kinds of situations under control.

It is indeed ironic that we have today witnessed the introduction of gun control to our country which, I must confess, in my own constituency makes it much tougher for Dene hunters to obtain food for their families while, at the same time, the sultans of Saudi Arabia will be riding around with our automatic weapons.

That is truly an ironic situation which I think will not be lost on the Canadian public.

The last point that the member made is also a very good one and I am glad he raised it. It is an important part of the public debate. I know people in the House who were here when Canadian Arsenals was privatized. When the Crown corporation was privatized many of my colleagues made the argument that in fact this is precisely what would happen. Rather than supplying those needs which we as a small peaceful country have on a peacekeeping basis, ensuring our own forces have what they need, produced by ourselves—it was a nice neat little industry in so far as these can be—we are now being driven by the profit imperative.

Certainly, I can sympathize with the workers in London, but when they have built for Saudi Arabia, who are they going to build for next? Are they going to build for South Korea next? Are they going to build for Guatemala next? Once we start on that slippery slope we cannot get off.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Shall I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CANADA POST

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday in this House I informed the minister responsible for Canada Post about the fight being waged by the community of Avonmore, Ontario, to keep its post office. Avonmore has had a post office since Confederation. It is sadly ironic that it will soon be closed at a time when Canada is seeking to preserve national unity and its federal symbols.

On May 23 over 60 residents of Avonmore stood on the steps in front of the House of Commons and held a rally to save their post office. They presented a petition with over 700 signatures, calling upon the government to rescind its decision to close their post office on June 27.

They also gave me a children's petition. It showed that the whole community has come together to voice its objections over the callous action taken by Canada Post to close the Avonmore post office.

The community of Avonmore feels betrayed by Canada Post. It is frustrated and angry that it was simply told that it was going to lose its post office and there was nothing it could do to stop it. As far as the people of Avonmore are concerned, their meeting with Canada Post representatives was a sham, nothing more than a farce.

The point I want to make today concerns the issue I was trying to get across to the minister responsible for Canada Post in my question to him last Thursday. That is, Avonmore will not only lose its post office, it will also not receive a retail postal outlet. There is only one store in the community and the owner does not want to have an RPO.

Canada Post has informed the people of Avonmore that it will be installing mailboxes when the post office is closed. However, this means that to register a letter or buy a stamp, the people of Avonmore will have to travel over 24 kilometres to the nearest post office. Postal service in Avonmore will therefore be considerably downgraded when the post office is closed.

The people of Avonmore should not have to leave their community and travel 24 kilometres to obtain such basic services as the ability to buy a stamp. This is totally unacceptable. It is a blatant contravention of Canada Post's promise to rural Canadians.

In June, 1988, Canada Post placed full-page ads in newspapers across Canada emphasizing, in its own words, that it would be "keeping our commitment to rural Canada". The ad stated that, and I am quoting: "Canada's rural communities are vital to Canada Post. In fact, one of the most important parts of our commitment is making postal products and services more accessible to rural Canadians".

This ad was nothing short of deception and propaganda. It went on to state that the corporation's commitment to its customers "will be to maintain and improve service as we evolve". Well, something must have gone terribly wrong during the evolution process. Canada Post's pledge to provide equal or better service when a post office is closed is not worth much to the people of Avonmore.

For all Canada Post and this government cares, the residents of Avonmore and other rural Canadians, who have no post office or shining RPO to serve them, could travel over 100 kilometres to buy a stamp. As long as the master plan to eliminate over 5,200 rural post offices by 1996 goes ahead, the government and the corporation will be happy.

• (1800)

In conclusion, the people of rural Canada feel betrayed. Luckily they will have an opportunity to throw a monkey wrench into the master plan long before 1996. The government has ignored rural Canadians far too long. As a result, it will be the government that will be closed down come the next election, closed down in the very same quick and harsh manner in which the people of Avonmore will lose their post office.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Post Corporation has been working very hard to improve the efficiency and availability of postal services in Canada, to meet the expectations and changing needs of all Canadians.

Like other organizations that provide a public service, Canada Post has had to resort to new ways of providing this service in order to respond to the pressing needs of all Canadians, and it will continue to enhance the availability of postal services and products.

For instance, Canada Post meets its objectives in rural Canada by using the resources and skills of local businesses to significantly increase the number of locations offering postal services and products. Incidentally, other businesses providing services to Canadians in rural areas have made necessary adjustments by cutting some of their services. Canada Post has made every possible effort to maintain its business ties with these communities by strengthening its partnerships with local businesses with which it already had a long-standing relationship.

Furthermore, the corporation has developed a number of ways to ensure postal delivery is maintained in a community. Some examples are: mail boxes in retail postal outlets, community mail boxes at a single designated location or on individual sites.

Meanwhile, Canada Post ensures that the community retains its specific postal identity and that all customers are able to send and receive their mail locally. Recently, Canada Post reviewed postal services in the community of Avonmore which, as the hon. member of the opposition is no doubt aware, has been provided by a term employee since the postmaster retired.

On March 27, Canada Post sent a notice to all customers, informing them there would be changes in their community's postal services.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago I raised with the minister of defence speculation in the press that the government was considering closing Armed Forces bases across the country and two bases that we now operate and have operated for some time in Europe.

This speculation has gone on for some time. It has gone on in the complete absence of any defence policy in this country whatsoever. In 1987, when the last white paper was written, it was out of date. It is even more out of date at this time. We have been operating all this time with absolutely no defence policy in Canada or no indication of the date when a defence policy may be brought forward.

Yet we go on with ad hockery in this country. We go on with the administration of defence by the Department of Finance. There are $2.5 billion worth of cuts in the last budget. This was the most severe cut to any department probably in Canadian history and certainly the most severe cut that the Canadian forces have received for some time. However, rule by the department of defence is no way to create a defence policy for this country. It is incumbent on the Government of Canada to bring forward a policy so that the people of Canada, who are now discussing the Constitution, who are now discussing native rights, will also be able to discuss how they want sovereignty to be maintained in this country and how they want security exercised in this country.

It is 1991 now and it is time not only for the government to bring forward suggestions as to the direction they want to go, but to engage the Canadian people in a public debate on those very directions.

What makes the lack of policy at this time even more reprehensible is the fact that Canadian forces have just performed well in the gulf. They performed with professionalism, they performed with competence, and they deserve better. They deserve better, as do the people who work at the bases we have all across this country. There are hundreds of thousands of people in Canada now whose jobs depend on those bases, either directly or indirectly, and it is not fair in a time of economic recession to keep them in suspense, to keep them in concern and in distress, and in worry about their future and the future of their jobs. That is not the way to run the country. We had the example of Summerside, where a whole province was affected very negatively by the closing of one base. There are areas of this country that depend very, very much on the presence of the Armed Forces to create jobs, particularly in areas of the country normally referred to as have not areas, less developed areas of the country.

It is important, when that policy is brought forward and when the closure of bases is contemplated, that economic and social aspects be taken into consideration. We did not see that before. Before, when the government closed bases in Canada, it used an axe where a scalpel would have been desirable. We probably do not need all bases across this country. My colleague from Toronto even called for the closing of Downsview in Toronto, and yet Downsview continues to survive and prosper in spite of the need for land, for development, and for housing in that community. It mystifies those of us on this side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that fiscal and geostrategic realities now before us have a direct impact on national defence. A comprehensive examination of the defence policy enunciated in 1987 has been undertaken by departmental officials. Both the minister of defence and the Associate Minister of National Defence regard the review as vital to the future direction of defence in Canada. They are fully committed to formulating a policy that will set forth a balanced, workable, affordable, and appropriate plan for the Canadian forces.

I can inform this House that the socioeconomic impact of our options is being factored into the policy review and we are doing our best to ensure that effects will be minimal. It is certainly premature at this point to discuss the closing of specific bases as a decision on this matter has yet to be reached by cabinet. However, no part of the defence program is immune from scrutiny.

Allegations that Canada is operating within a defence policy vacuum are not valid. The principles upon which Canadian defence policy rests have remained virtually unchanged. For example, we continue to remain committed to defence and collective security, arms control and disarmament, and the peaceful resolution of disputes. All members of this House will recognize that during the crisis in the Persian Gulf, Canada accepted its responsibility as an active member of the United Nations and made a credible contribution to the multinational effort.

This review was not conducted in isolation. The government continues to listen closely to the views of Canadians and has taken these views into account—

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, May 24, I had the pleasure of attenting a meeting between Quebec Liberal caucus members and representatives from the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU). The member for Saint-Denis, who is the president of the caucus, the member for Saint-Henri—Westmount, the member for Mount Royal and myself discussed the serious economic crisis Quebec is facing with the representatives of the CNTU. There is one thing that I find absolutely unacceptable. The CNTU had also asked to meet with representatives from the Conservative Party, the government party. That meeting was never held. Not only was there no meeting, but they told us that they had not even heard back from the Conservative caucus.

On May 27, the Minister of Employment and Immigration replied to the question I put to him about a document prepared by the CNTU by saying that he knew of no such document. For the purpose of this debate and maybe also for the person who will be designated to answer me tell us and, more importantly, tell the CNTU if the government is willing to accept the economic recovery plan put forward by the CNTU to fight the recession.

• (1810)

The CNTU asked the federal government, first, to reduce interest rates; second, to improve eligibility requirements under the Older Workers Assistance Program; third, to reform the unemployment insurance system to provide real protection to the workers losing their jobs; fourth, to bring forward selective income tax cuts; fifth, to come up with a tax reform that would do away with the GST and the harm it is causing the Quebec economy as well as across the country; finally, to undertake a review of the free trade agreement which is causing enormous problems, as we all know, particularly in a city like Montreal.

The CNTU told us that Montreal was like a city after an air raid. A number of industries in major sectors of the city have closed down as a direct result of the free trade agreement with the United States. As a matter of fact, 7,602 jobs have been lost in the Montreal area because of free trade.

The CNTU provided us with this list—and I will gladly pass it on to the minister or his representative—of all the businesses affected by job losses as a direct result of free trade, with the company names, date of closure or lay-off, and number of jobs lost. So this government would be well advised not to come and tell us that free trade is a good thing!

Free trade has done a lot of harm. It has seriously hurt a host of Quebec businesses. I would like the minister to reply.

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I am pleased to provide some answers to the questions and points raised by my hon. colleague, the member from the Montreal area.

Mr. Speaker, I will let other more senior cabinet members answer the various initiatives proposed by the CNTU. I just found out about them when I heard the hon. member read them and I must tell you that some points certainly deserve attention and consideration, but others are not at all realistic. Removing the GST and changing the free trade agreement are not among the government's priorities. On the contrary, these measures were implemented to strengthen the economy of Canada, Quebec, and Montreal, and to make businesses more competitive.

In answer to the arguments made by my hon. colleague concerning closures and layoffs in some industries in Montreal, I would say it is not different from other places. In the early 1980s, the North Shore, which I represent, went through a frightful slump because the iron ore industry declined. Our iron ore exports dropped; north shore mine workers who had been there for thirty years lost their jobs. It is not unique to Montreal. It is happening across Canada.

The industrial structure of the country is changing every year and my colleague from Papineau—Saint-Michel could also have listed Montreal companies that have grown and expanded and reached new markets, obviously because of free trade.

An hon. member: Name them!

Mr. Langlois: My colleague asks me to name them. He says that he is prepared to table a list of companies that closed down; he should be just as able to table a list of companies that have grown and progressed and created new jobs, Mr. Speaker.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that border shopping is a serious problem in eastern Ontario. Ernst and Young was commissioned by the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Kingston to undertake a study concerning the cross-border traffic in the Kingston area.

It did a study for the neighbouring riding of Leeds and Grenville at the bridge at Lansdowne, Ontario, which is represented by my seatmate.

Written declarations, which are filed when someone is returning to Canada with less than $300 in goods after an absence of more than seven days, increased the first quarter of 1988 to the current year from 6,600 declarations to 19,500 declarations, an increase of 197 per cent.

B-15 forms, which are filed at the border when duty or taxe is paid, increased from 2,100 for the similar period in 1988 to 13,200, an increase of 517 per cent in the three years.

Finally, verbal declarations, which are made when someone is returning to Canada with less than $100 in goods after an absence greater than 48 hours, increased from a total of 46,000 for that same period in 1988 to 130,000 entries in 1991, an increase of 182 per cent.

Similarly, verbal declarations from 1990 to 1991, that is the one year period, for the same three months, increased 51 per cent.

The merchants of Kingston are well aware that Tory times are hard times. Some 33 increases in taxes since 1984 have crippled the Canadian economy. They are driving Canadians south of the border in increasing numbers, radically increasing numbers, as this study indicates.

The anticipated loss to the Kingston community to the purchases being made south of the border as a direct result of this government's ridiculous policies is about $100 million this year.

That is estimated to cost Kingstonians alone job losses of between 500 and 700 people. That is a disaster for the Kingston community. This particular problem is affecting all the communities along the St. Lawrence River that are close to the American border. It is time this government took action.

I asked the minister the other day to take action and I am asking now: what is the action going to be? We got a bafflegab answer.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that the minister and his department have undertaken an extensive consultation process with the people who are involved in the cross-border shopping issue.

We have to deal with it, and we are dealing with it through consultation with the stakeholders, including all three levels of government, the private sector, labour and consumer organizations, and we are making headway toward a better understanding of the complexity of the situation and needs for specific solutions.

The Minister of National Revenue has spent a great deal of time and effort ensuring that we find more efficient and effective ways of dealing with this matter. He has been addressing the issue of border congestion and I can assure the hon. member that he and his department will continue to develop ways to ease congestion, better ways for the travelling public, both Canadians and Americans.

There is no one solution to this complex problem, and I think the hon. member knows this. What may well be appropriate for eastern Ontario border locations may well be inappropriate for others. As the hon. member is no doubt aware, the minister and departmental officials at all levels have been meeting with local mayors, provincial government officials, and other concerned parties to ensure that the solutions for each border office are tailored to the needs of the community served.

Canada Customs continues to perform a delicate balancing act between enforcement and protection of Canada's borders while, at the same time, providing efficient service to the travelling public.

I would emphasize that only through consultation with members of local interest groups can we come up with well thought out solutions to the varied concerns of border communities. I would urge the member to encourage his constituents to join with business, labour, governments, and consumers in dealing with this issue.

EDMONTON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rose yesterday, May 29, to ask a question of the Minister of Transport and that question was: Would he include a purchase clause in the lease agreement? In other words, would he make the lease agreement for the transfer of the Edmonton International Airport to the local authority a lease to purchase agreement?

He gave me the answer: "No." He did not want to privatize the airport. He missed the question because I was not talking about privatization. I was merely asking that a purchase clause be inserted into the lease agreement so that at some point in the future the local authority, the Edmonton Airport Authority, could exercise an option or negotiate with the federal government to take over the international airport.

The reason this is important is that when the local authority will lease the airport, it will put $10 million a year into infrastructure improvements each year for 10 years. It wants a little certainty about whether the return will come to it after this time. Also the people who will lend the money to the Edmonton airport authority would like some certainty as to who is to own the assets after this 10-year period. Having a lease agreement only is not very workable now.

In fact, I would like to quote a consultant which the federal government consulted on this issue. The consultant, the Royal Bank of Canada, said: "We believe it is much cleaner to avoid these issues entirely by leaving ownership of the assets with the federal government indefinitely". They would like to have the assets owned by the federal government indefinitely. They would like a reversion clause in the lease agreement so all the infrastructure improvements might revert back to the federal government.

This is very unfair to the local authority. The government wanted to privatize it at first. It was realized that maybe some local authorities might fail and the government might wish to take it back. The government started out with a lease to purchase option. In fact, the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada went to Edmonton in 1989 and signed a memorandum of agreement for a lease to purchase. Two years later the purchase option was taken out.

I would like an answer tonight whether the parliamentary secretary, the member for Calgary Southeast, will make a commitment to ask the Minister of Transport to put a purchase option into the lease agreement. It will not cost them anything. It is just an option that the two of them get together near the end of the lease to discuss terms and allow the airport authority to take over and purchase the airport after it has put in $100 million or more worth of infrastructure improvements.

The building is now 30 years old and a consultant hired by the local airport authority has said the building might have to be replaced. Transport Canada has been very negligent in the upkeep of the building and it is very important.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member if he will make a commitment to go to the Minister of Transport and have this clause added.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question and also his efforts on behalf of his constituents in Edmonton to get involved in the negotiations between the department and the local airport authority.

However, my hon. friend may not be aware of all the background that went into the developing of the government's position regarding lease versus sale. I can assure the hon. member that the matter was thoroughly examined and not just by bureaucrats.

As you may recall, when the government approved the principles for the creation and operation of local airport authorities in May, 1989, it gave a specific negotiating mandate to the Minister of Transport. This mandate states that the airports are to be transferred on terms to be negotiated to newly created community based non-profitable organizations, the local airport authorities. In other words, they were not to be privatized.

This is not to say that the transfer will disregard sound business principles. On the contrary, the mandate also requires that the airports be transferred on the basis of fair market value with appropriate consideration for their future earning potential.

Finally, the government, not the department, decided for several reasons that negotiations were to be initiated on the basis of transfer by way of long-term lease for a number of reasons.

For one, it was felt that the sale of airports to new and unproven business organizations might be seen by the public as putting at risk these essential elements of our transportation infrastructure.

As the hon. member noted, early in 1989 Transport Canada's airport transfer task force retained the corporate finance division of the Royal Bank of Canada to report on the financing for local airport authorities. The report considered the question of lease versus sale from the perspective of lenders and investors and took into account the legal, financial, and perceptual implications.

To put it succinctly, the Royal Bank found that from a technical perspective for financiers, it does not matter if the airport authority owns or leases the property and assets as long as it has the unfettered right to use the facilities and, more importantly, the authority to generate revenues from the airport's assets.

They also concluded that they believed it to be preferable in Canada for the airports to be leased to the local airport authorities rather than sold.

I can also add that the conclusion that leasing is preferable to an outright sale has been strongly endorsed by the airport authority advisory board. This board was constituted in 1989 to provide the Minister of Transport with advice from a private sector perspective on all aspects of the airport transfer initiative.

Officials at Transport Canada and the Department of Justice are meeting regularly with the four local airport authorities and I believe that progress has been made within the framework set out by the government.

The hon. member's interest in this matter is most appreciated, and I sincerely hope that my comments have alleviated his concern.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until 10 o'clock a.m. tomorrow pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—CANADA POST

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent) moved:

That this House call upon the government to institute policies that would require that service to Canadians be the priority for Canada Post.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure today to bring forward concerns I have heard over the last two years I have been in Parliament about what primarily is happening in Canada Post, concerns which people in my riding and across Canada have voiced over the difficulties they are experiencing with service within that organization.

• (1010)

If we consider the situation around the world, probably the most changing technology is in communication. It is my opinion that Canada Post represents in Canada a very, very important means of communication which must serve Canadians to its utmost, must smooth its process and make certain that every Canadian, whether living in the far north, metropolitan Toronto, Vancouver or the maritimes, receives a service that is first and foremost number one.

How Canada Post Corporation deals with this type of quality service which we need is going to be fundamentally important to all of us. In rural Canada its dealings with this type of service seems quite strange to me. In rural Canada corporate post offices are being closed; in rural Canada the 5,221 post offices that existed in 1986 are dwindling. Today about 1,000 of those post offices have already been closed or converted. What has this done to rural Canada? This has taken away the only federal presence in many small communities. It has taken down the federal flag in those small communities. It has left those small communities without the pride and the privilege of Canada's presence.

This has eliminated about 3,000 jobs at the same time. Those jobs in small communities are very important. In most cases they are relatively low-paying jobs, but I think another significant point here is that 80 per cent of those jobs are for women. We are seeing women in small rural communities losing the privilege of working and helping others in those communities.

We have eliminated the one-stop service of Canada Post. In certain cases, mail is now picked up in one location and other postal services, the services one would expect to have, at counters, are being done elsewhere. In some cases, rural Canadians have to travel as much as 12 miles in order to receive service today which they could have counted on just a few short years ago.

What have we heard the government say on this issue? The government and Canada Post Corporation maintain that changes in postal service, for example a closure or a conversion, would only take place under certain circumstances. Canada Post and the government have suggested these circumstances would only be through resignation, retirement or promotion of a postmaster, loss of a postal site, or local initiative. In other words, they have very clearly set out the premise for which closures would occur. These are called by the government "natural occurrences". The correspondence that I have been receiving suggests that natural occurrences are not the means by which many Canada Post facilities are being shut down.

A small community, Mossley, Ontario, stated in a letter to me just a short while ago: "Canada Post Corporation has promised and continues to advertise that communities of Canada are given a 90-day period of meaningful consultation before community consent". A period of consultation was never offered to the Mossley community. The Mossley post office will be shut down on June 28, 1991.

It is interesting to note that I have a letter from the member for London—Middlesex who represents Mossley: "By working together, as Minister Andre said himself on Mossley Heritage Day, June 6, 1987, we can ensure that the Moseley post office remains operational for at least another 122 years". It is being closed this June. What a change in position.

I also have the notes from the statement of the minister at that same meeting. He very clearly stated that Mossley post office was secure, adding that he hoped it would remain that way for another 122 years.

The minister, speaking to a group of heritage people in Mossley in 1987 suggested that this government would protect our post office and make sure it remains open. Now, five years later, there is a total change of commitment.

It appears that the guidelines, the rules and the regulations that have been set forth for rural closures are changing day by day, month by month and week by week, but not to improve service to Canadians. Let's be very clear. The primary goal of Canada Post service to Canadians is the goal that is being torn apart by the actions of this government. However, a very unnatural occurrence happens every time a Canada Post office gets closed in these communities.

Across Canada, 157 post offices have been targeted for closure or conversion in a very short time. Across Canada, another 250 jobs will be lost. I would like to point out that I have a listing of post offices that are scheduled to be closed. I can say very clearly that there is a full sheet of the names of post offices to be closed in Ontario. Post offices are to be closed in maritime Canada; Newfoundland, Labrador, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and in Quebec. There are 63 closures scheduled for Ontario, 18 for Manitoba, 22 for Saskatchewan, five for Alberta and seven for British Columbia. Every province in this country will have several closures.

This list, by the way, comes from negotiations with Canada Post, and it is a Canada Post target list.

An hon. member: The hit list.

Mr. Pickard: A very good point.

We realize that we are talking about 150 communities which are going to lose their postal outlets the way they see them existing today.

Across Canada, another Canadian institution will be dismantled. In front of every post office, the presence and the pride of all Canadians flies. We know that when people see our flag in our communities, it brings pride and respect to them, to their community and to their families. When we see the elimination of post offices, we also see the elimination of the symbol "Canada" in these small communities. That is what is happening. That is what this government is permitting Canada Post Corporation to do.

The government will argue that natural occurrences give rise to Canada Post action, that in each of the 157 cases a natural occurrence has happened. Did it? Or did Canada Post utilize a January 1991 agreement with the Postmasters Association to push nature along, an agreement which stated that over an interim period of time it would eliminate part-time workers?

Where a Postmaster had retired or was urged out of the job by certain offerings of Canada Post, the post office became available to be shut down. I think there are very many actions taken in Canada Post to unnaturally close post offices. In some post offices, term employees have been doing the work of regular employees for over two, three, four years and longer.

• (1020)

The work has been getting done. The people have been working for Canada Post, but now those people are done.

What criteria does Canada Post use to decide on post offices to be saved or post offices to be sacrificed? In 1991, in Quebec, Canada Post has targeted 12 post office conversions to date. Yet, Canada Post Corporation has advertised to staff 12 group-type post offices and seven grade-type post offices.

The group-type post offices are very small. Hopefully, Canada Post will staff these and will not let the competitions expire without filling the positions.

Why do 12 small post offices close and 12 group and 7 grade post offices have post office job competitions? What are the criteria? Where is the quality of service? Where is the equality of service for 7 communities in Newfoundland and Labrador, 15 in Nova Scotia, 4 in Prince Edward Island, 2 in New Brunswick, 12 in Quebec, 63 in Ontario, 18 in Manitoba, 24 in Saskatchewan, 5 in Alberta and 7 in British Columbia?

Equality will end this summer as we see Canada Post's massive campaign to convert the 1991 crop of post offices into oblivion. It is not only through Canada Post Office conversions that the government and Canada Post attacked rural Canada. Earlier this year, rural Canadians dodged another bullet fired by the government with, as a result of the government's policy direction, the elimination of a postal subsidy program. Canada Post was preparing to pass increases along to community weekly newspapers, which would have increased mailing costs from 200 per cent to 1,000 per cent.

How does that affect the lot of our average Canadians? Letters have come in to my office, and I thought, Madam Speaker, I would relate to you one which came from my home community. This was sent in to the Kingsville Reporter, in my home town, by a person who was very distressed at the fact that these postal rate increases would alter her ability to have the newspaper delivered.

"I was just ready to seal my envelope with a cheque for the Reporter covering the period to June 1, when—cancellation—cancellation when I read your editorial. I do not feel we can pay all that extra money to a government I absolutely abhor. It has brought nothing but depression and disillusionment into my life. Now that we are both retired and watching our pennies a little more carefully, I cannot, in conscience, let Jack send off the subscription cheque for such an increased amount."

Now we are going to hear from the government that it has put a delay on those rate subsidy changes. However, it has only put a delay on rate subsidy changes in postal code 2. Postal codes 3 and 4 already have those subsidies decreased. They are going on presently and it appears that by March those increases will go ahead.

I have talked to people from many, many, many small newspapers across this country and it has been very, very clear. Loss of subscription, loss of revenue, loss of news and loss of communication is the result of this government's callous way of looking at subsidies in rural Canada.

We have seen losses in transportation: VIA Rail and Air Canada. We have seen losses in CBC. We have seen losses with Canadian small newspapers. I wonder: would the same actions be taken against Canada's daily newspapers if in the same situation? Would this government stand against the great dailies in this country? I do not believe so. I believe the actions are usually taken against the small who are unable as a unit to protect themselves as well.

The postal rate subsidy given to rural Canada was given for a very specific reason. I would like to take a second to quote Bill Pratt, President of Canadian Community Newspapers Association. In his article he states:

> I mean, dammit, I thought we had a pretty good relationship going for the past couple of centuries. There was even a time when politicians thought newspapers were important. The thoughtful knew newspapers could be a valuable tool for bringing people together through sharing of information.
> Some politicians encouraged establishment of papers, and, because papers were a vital part of the political and social infrastructure, they decided to subsidize delivery of those papers to readers through the postal service.
> The relationship began to cool a few years back. I'm not sure why, but I suspect it was about the time they invented "Canada Post".
> I like to think we might discover some intelligent life form in Ottawa: that someone will realize community newspapers can mean a lot of business for Canada Post at very little real cost;

I think he is putting on the line a very direct comment: communication in small, rural Canada, communication in distant regions is just as important as communication in major cities. The government should be concerned about those people in outreach areas who need a little help because of the vast size of this country and because the local communication in smaller towns is not as efficient as The Globe and Mail. They also cannot have advertising and other costs that one might get from a major newspaper.

Coming from a community like Windsor, seeing a small newspaper close is going to be very drastic to that community. We saw CBC close; we saw the end of local news on television. Are we to see the end of local news in the media, in the local newspaper now? It appears we are heading in that direction under this government and Canada Post's policy.

Early this year, rural Canadians did dodge that bullet, but I would suggest to this government at this point in time that it make every effort to re-analyse postal subsidies and not just say it is going to put a moratorium on it for nine months; re-analyse it and look at a fair system for all Canadians across this country.

I believe it is extremely important that rural Canada gets its fair share.

What I would like to do is go back to a statement that was made when this newspaper legislation came in. The newspaper legislation did come in on the basis that the government House leader, in response to a question I had in the House, said that rate increases would only be 25 per cent. On further inspection, rate increases for rural newspapers came up as high as 1,000 per cent. I think the decision was made on a very ill-timed, very ill-conceived bit of knowledge that the government had. It has certainly hampered rural Canada tremendously.

Finally I would like to come to the point of the government's idea that it has become a much more lean, efficient organization for Canadians. We have heard the government brag about the profits that Canada Post has shown. The government, for its part, did not listen to all Canadians on concerns, but it certainly was very proud that in the last year, 1988-89, it showed a profit of $96 million and that in 1989-90 it showed $149 million.

• (1030)

May I just point out that in those two years it also received $500 million in subsidy from the Canadian government. That certainly throws a different angle on what it is bragging about. The profits of Canada Post have only been gained through a $500 million subsidy.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague for his very thorough analysis of the problems which are facing Canada Post at this time.

He mentioned the problems in his area of southwestern Ontario. I too come from a highly populated area in the Niagara Peninsula. He mentioned some assurances that he received from Canada Post at an earlier time.

My question to him concerns the fact that assurances were given to him directly, and to the people in his area, about keeping the post offices open, and he used the term I believe, "at this time". I too have received that kind of assurance from Canada Post. I was told that the post offices in Welland, Thorold, St. Catharines and Niagara Falls will be kept open, notwithstanding the fact that Canada Post has put in a huge sorting plant in Stoney Creek.

I would like his opinion as to how much credence I should put into these assurances that the post offices for which I am responsible in the Niagara Peninsula would not probably suffer the same fate as many of his have suffered.

Mr. Pickard: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank very much my colleague for that very good question. It does bring into perspective an issue that I happened to see yesterday here in this House: statement one, statement two. It appears that from time to time, and I am not sure how long a time period, everything changes. The example of Mossley in my opinion well illustrates a situation where a minister said: "This post office will remain open for another 122 years. No questions. No worries. No problems". However, just a few short years later the post office is scheduled for closure.

There are 157, and I have got the listings of each one of those post office here in this document which came from the negotiations with the union and Canada Post—it is Canada Post's documentation—closures listed on this document.

We know that what is said at one time, over a long period of time, could change. It seems that there have been statements made politically which change very rapidly. I have a major concern that we do not have solid policies suggesting where we are going. We see changes occurring. That type of thing happened, I believe, with the postal rate increase.

The opposition on this side of the House and the back bench on that side of the House shook enough fences that there was a delay in the increase. It was very political.

This government must examine its policies, clarify its policies and tell the Canadian public where we are going—not piecemeal, and chop, chop, chop Canada Post apart.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I too want to compliment my colleague from Essex-Kent for an excellent presentation on his valid conclusions as to what is happening with Canada Post in this country, and where we as a nation should be going.

He mentions several regional areas in the country that are being hurt and also the people in this country who are being hurt. For many years the rural post office was what bound communities together, it was the meeting place where people gathered.

With our current great concern with national unity, this should be a major consideration of this government when it considers closing rural post offices.

My question has an economic basis. If we examine the position of Canada Post during the past two years, we will find it is true that on the books Canada Post shows profits of $96 million in 1988-89 and $149 million in 1989-90. This is what Canada Post shows as a profit. Yet for the same two years almost $500 million was paid to Canada Post as subsidies to offset certain mailing costs. That eliminates that so-called profit that Canada Post is claiming.

For almost two years the 46,000 CUPW workers have been without a contract. Since July 1989, 46,000 CTC employees have not received wage increases. While Canada Post boasts of profits, it conveniently takes almost $500 million in subsidies and does not give its work force a raise.

What would happen if these points were factored into the statements of Canada Post Corporation? I am sure there would be no so-called profits, and the numbers would be inclined to prove it.

Mr. Pickard: I thank my colleague for a very astute question, one that illustrates our consternation. Many times in this Parliament partial truths are told, the whole picture never being revealed.

The government has been telling us for two years that Canada Post is in the black, that Canada Post is a profit-making corporation with profits of approximately $100 million two years ago and $150 million last year.

That is total fiction. The truth is that we support the Canadian government in its endeavour to subsidize Canada Post, don't get us wrong on that. However, the truth has to be told that there is a $500 million subsidy to Canada Post for regions, for disabled people. Those subsidies must remain for communication.

The other point made by my colleague is that two years of negotiations have not brought a contract with Canada Post employees yet it states that it has a profit of $100 million, $150 million. Once it settles that negotiation there will be retroactive pay which has not been taken into account anywhere in the documents of Canada Post, meaning that the $100 million and $150 million—and we are talking about 60,000 employees—may not all be there. It may be another sham.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to the members of this House about the services offered by the Canada Post Corporation.

[English]

Canada Post is organized in 10 divisions with a head office located in Ottawa. Canada Post has a national customer base of about 26 million people and over 1 million businesses served by more than 16,700 locations where postal products and services are available.

With approximately 47,000 full and part-time employees Canada Post also deals with more than 7,800 entrepreneurs across the country who provide mail transport and delivery in urban, suburban and rural areas. Canada Post delivers, on average, 40 million pieces of mail every working day, serves over 11 million addresses in every part of Canada, walks, drives and flies over some of the most formidable terrain in the world in some of the worst weather conditions. It runs a network of 26 major mechanized processing plants, buys more transportation services in Canada than any other corporation, and Canada Post makes a profit.

When Canada Post became a Crown corporation, its revenues were in the $1.5 billion range and yet it had no modern standards, systems or procedures and no balance sheet or general ledger in place.

The management team had to put these into place to improve and expand service and break even financially while business was proceeding full speed ahead.

In its bleakest year, Canada Post cost taxpayers around $600 million. That was more than nine years ago. Since then the corporation has moved from that deficit to a profit of $96 million in the fiscal year 1988–89, which was the first in over 30 years, and to $149 million profit in the fiscal year 1989–90. That profit allows Canada Post Corporation to invest in new equipment which will improve postal services.

The biggest story, which you do not see in the headlines, is that at the same time Canada Post has improved the reliability of and accessibility to its services, increases in the basic letter rate have been limited to less than the rate of inflation. In real terms, the price of a stamp has actually decreased. Canada Post is committed to giving Canadians more reliable, accessible and affordable service.

Let me explain what the people at Canada Post have been doing to improve postal service in each of these areas. With respect to reliability, Canada Post has set up a program of operational improvements for collecting, processing and delivering mail. Uniform standard systems and procedures were introduced at all processing plants so that mail would move in a co-ordinated, predictable way across the country.

For example, a special system for colour coding the mail has been instituted. This allows employees to designate which mail should be treated with priority within a postal facility in order to maintain service standards.

[Translation]

The corporation's National Control Centre is linked to nine divisional control centres, and its role is to monitor mail flow 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Corporation management meets every morning at the control centre to evaluate the results of the past 24 hours and measure them against projections. This procedure is essential, Madam Speaker, because in this way, Canada Post can evaluate its performance in terms of meeting its commitments and take specific action to make it even more competitive on the market.

[English]

This state of the art technology has won the corporation international acclaim. Canada Post is vigorously marketing the management system on the international scene with success in New Zealand and the United States.

One may recall news articles announcing a multi-million dollar contract with the United States Postal Service and Systemhouse, based on technology used by Canada Post. Clearly defined standards for the delivery of properly prepared letter mail were established, and an independent firm of auditors, Ernst and Young, was hired to measure Canada Post's performance regarding those standards and publish the results every quarter.

Canada Post is one of the first postal administrations in the world to have its performance independently measured and the results published. Other postal administrations such as USPS have implemented a similar procedure and the results show that they have a long way to go to achieve similar results to Canada Post.

The delivery time standard here in Canada for properly prepared letter mail is within two business days within the same urban centre, within three business days between major urban centres in the same province, and within four business days between major urban centres in different provinces.

[Translation]

In fact, Madam Speaker, the results have confirmed Canada Post's progress. For instance, Canada Post is the first postal administration in the world, as I said earlier, to have its performance measured by an independent auditor and to have these findings made public.

The last report by the firm of Ernst & Young for the quarter ending in March 1991 shows that, at the national level, 97 per cent of local mail was delivered in accordance with the standards to which Canada Post is committed. These performance standards were met, Madam Speaker, while setting a priority on outstanding customer-oriented service. Three factors are involved in providing this service and maintaining this priority:

reliability, accessibility and reasonable cost of products offered.

To achieve this, Madam Speaker, the Canada Post Corporation embarked on an operations enhancement program for mail pick–up, processing and delivery. It has put in place the requisite standards, systems and procedures in all its facilities, to ensure that the mail is routed across the country in a manner that is co–ordinated, controlled and predictable.

[English]

The people at Canada Post are constantly looking for ways to improve service performance to those set standards. By using resources more efficiently, better service to customers can be provided and costs for providing the service can be managed more responsibly.

Another indication of reliability is the greater volume of mail delivered. That volume has increased by 38 per cent since 1981. By trusting Canada Post to deliver more of their mail, people are showing confidence in its ability to provide efficient and reliable service.

Canada Post promised to make its products and services more accessible. The corporation's goal is to make it easier for customers to buy stamps, mail letters and receive packages. That is why Canada Post is extending its century–old traditional partnerships with local businesses and setting up retail postal outlets with the people who best understand retail sales: the small businessman or, as I should say, the small business person.

This program will increase the number of outlets by more than 25 per cent over the next five years. This is only the beginning. Canada Post has one of the most extensive delivery networks in the world, serving over 11 million addresses throughout the country. Over each of the next five years, an estimated 225,000 new addresses will be added to this network.

One of the biggest demographic changes in Canada over the past 20 years or so has been the growth of sprawling suburbs around our major cities and towns. The community mailbox is one method used here as well as in the United States to extend service to suburban areas. One of the advantages of community mailboxes is that they have special compartments for packages.

At the present time, the corporation has approximately 27,400 community mailbox sites across the country serving approximately 712,000 customers. Under the Community Mailbox Implementation Program, a further 6,000 sites are scheduled to be opened in the fiscal year 1991–92, which will serve about 157,000 additional customers.

Retail postal outlets located in communities across Canada offer extended hours, giving customers greater access to products and services Monday to Friday and on the weekends.

Canada Post business is increasingly meeting its competition, not only private courier companies, but the avalanche of electronic message transmission technologies. In order to stay in business, it must provide its customers with products and services which meet their needs. Canada Post is doing just that. A system for letters and parcels which allows both customers and commercial customers to choose the best speed/cost combination for their needs has now been introduced through various parcel products.

Canada Post wants to regain a significant part of the parcel delivery market. It is making parcel products more competitive and attractive to commercial customers, providing both regular and expedited services.

• (1050)

In meeting the challenge of the electronic age, Canada Post offers customers electronic mail, Telepost, Intelpost, Envoy Post and volume electronic mail, which usually provide next day delivery. For an added cost, Telepost and Intelpost can provide same–day delivery for top priority messages. Priority Courier will deliver urgent documents the next morning, guaranteed. Canada Post provides timely information on delivery status and location via the track and trace system. Special letter products offer unfeatured courier service which also guarantees delivery within the purchased time frame as early as the next day, or the customer receives a new special letter envelope of equal or greater value, free.

The corporation has also made significant inroads in the commercial market with its own unique advertising medium called Ad Mail. Using the postal code in combination with demographic and socio–economic data allows Canada Post to compile a variety of data on any targeted market. Adding this to the extensive network and flexibility makes it possible for mailers to distribute advertising material in areas as small as one carrier route or as large as an entire region, to all the rural communities in a given area or to all of Canada.

Another commitment to Canadians is affordability. When Canada Post became a corporation nearly nine years ago, Canadians were promised they would get their money's worth. Since then, basic letter rate increases have been kept below the rate of inflation. Comparisons are often made between postal rates in Canada and other countries without taking into account the different wage rates, geographic sizes and population densities involved.

Canada is the second-largest country in the world and our relatively small population is widely dispersed. By comparison, all of Great Britain would fit into an area the size of the maritimes. The basic letter rate when measured in terms of the minutes of labour required for the average worker to earn the price of a stamp is lower than in many countries. In comparison to the major OCE countries, Canada ranks second only to the U.S. In Canada, mail is moved from St. John's, Newfoundland to Vancouver, B.C. for the same price as between Ottawa and Hull.

By any yardstick, that is value for money. Canada Post is delivering on its promise of better service to its customers.

In 1989-90, as was indicated earlier, the profit was $149 million. While this amount may appear large in absolute terms, on revenues of $3.6 billion it is small. It represents a return on equity of 10.5 per cent and is a step toward the industry norms of 14 to 15 per cent. The corporation has made its second consecutive profit and for the first time has paid dividends of $60 million to its shareholder, the Government of Canada. That means that Canadian taxpayers are no longer subsidizing postal operations. They now only pay once for their postage stamp.

To Canadian businesses, which provide approximately 80 per cent of the postal volume, the availability of reliable, accessible and affordable postal service is essential. Inefficiencies in the postal network mean higher costs for businesses, increasing their vulnerability in the highly competitive marketplace.

To build the postal service for the future, Canada Post must maintain its profitability. The corporation must maintain its profitability and invest those profits into revitalizing its aging plants and equipment, while continuing the improvement in efficiency. It must continue to increase volume by providing services which meet market needs and focus even more on serving its customers well.

Through the 1990s and into the 21st century, Canada Post will continue to improve upon its success by providing Canadians with reliable, accessible and affordable products and services specifically adapted to the needs of the Canadian consumer.

It is clear that the opposition, through its statements, would have the government direct Canada Post to move itself backward to those dark days when it was a main drain on the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Pickard: We had good service.

Mr. Cadieux: I do not have much more to say. I will finish soon and you will have your chance to address whatever issue you want to address.

The responsibility of Canada Post is to collect and move the mail efficiently while at the same time maintaining self-sufficiency. It has done it. It is doing it and it will continue to do it.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, in listening to the hon. minister's speech, I could not help but think about how hard the Canada Post public relations people must have been working last night to prepare.

That was an incredible statement of statistics supporting the national objectives of the corporation. Not once in the minister's speech did I hear him talk about the needs of the Canadian people.

He talks about the market needs, but whose market are we talking about? Are we talking about the market needs of Canwood, Marcelin, Gallivan and Edam, which are communities in my constituency? The market needs of those communities are directly related to the service component of Canada Post.

I did not hear one word from this government or from this minister about commitment to the policy of serving the needs of rural Canadians.

My question to the minister in the short period of time I have is twofold: First, is there a commitment from this government to needs of rural Canada? Second, when I listened to his speech, he talked about colour coding and the way in which colour coding speeds the process of mail delivery. Is the minister aware that in colour coding blue is for Monday, yellow is for Tuesday and red is for Wednesday? If a red box arrives on Monday, it sits in the goldarn post office until Wednesday until it goes out.

That mail is not being processed to service the needs of that community. It is being serviced to meet the needs of Canada Post. I would like to know if the minister is aware of that and if he is prepared to do anything to correct it.

Mr. Cadieux: Madam Speaker, in his introductory remarks, my hon. colleague said that he could not help but listen to the speech. I suppose that is flattering and I thank him for listening, even if he could not help it.

On the other hand, I think perhaps that my hon. colleague, when he eventually gets the "blues", will re-read the speech very carefully and perhaps reassess his statement in general.

It is always odd to hear the opposition members of this House bitch about statistics when they are not in their favour.

Whenever a statistic comes up, regardless of the subject, if it happens to be damaging to the government they quote them every hour of the day.

In this case we have statistics which demonstrate that not only does the service improve but that the customers are happy with the service, including those in the rural areas.

Why should we not use those statistics? We cannot expect the opposition to acknowledge or even underline en passant that the majority of Canadians are happy with the improvements brought about by Canada Post which are directly for customers in general, including those individual customers in rural areas and not just the commercial customers as my hon. friend tries to demonstrate.

A little bit of clarity and honesty in statements in this House with respect to what the Government of Canada is doing for Canadians would be appreciated once in a while.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

STRAWBERRY GROWERS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, strawberry growers in Nova Scotia have recently been advised that the application of federal sizing standards will be enforced more rigorously than in previous years. The variance standard will require strawberries to meet standards within one-eighth of an inch in diameter. This precise measurement would prevent our growers from being competitive and will result in much of the crop being left in the fields and many part-time jobs being lost.

In March, the horticultural council passed a resolution increasing the allowed variance to one-quarter of an inch and although it has been approved in principle, the department has advised that the change will not be implemented in time for this year's crop.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture to address this situation and ensure that any unnecessary obstacles are removed and that this change be implemented as soon as possible.

MYANMAR

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, this week marked the first anniversary of the democratic election in Myanmar, formerly Burma, during which the National League for Democracy won a landslide victory. Yet these newly elected government members are not allowed to take their seats in Parliament. The transfer of power seems no closer today than it did a year ago.

By April of this year, the military junta has arrested almost 80 of 457 elected NLD members. There are over 500 party officials now in detention. Reports of torture abound, and at least three parliamentarians have died while in prison.

I call upon the Government of Canada to demand the following on behalf of all fair-minded Canadians: First, the immediate transfer of power to the democratically elected government of Myanmar, the immediate release from prison of all members of the National League for Democracy, and that Canada officially recognize the duly elected government of Myanmar.

The Government of Canada must then bring all its influence to bear at the United Nations so that the rest of the world can also begin to do what is right for the people of Myanmar.

PEPIN-ROBARTS COMMISSION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, it is interesting and significant to note that in 1979 the task force on Canadian unity, commonly known as the Pepin—Robarts commission, said that our French-speaking minorities will make more headway as a result of social consensus and provincial legislation than they will from constitutional guarantees.

That commission went on to recommend that each provincial legislature should have the right to determine the official language or languages for that province. Some are now suggesting that this 1979 task force was ahead of its time.

If, as the Prime Minister says, this House of Commons is the real constituent assembly, should we not dust off the Pepin—Robarts report and openly debate its pros and cons?

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, the mayor of the city of Hamilton has written me a letter advising me that at the City Council meeting of May 14, 1991, a resolution was passed condemning: "the actions of three local Conservative MPs in refusing to meet with the Finance Administration Committee to discuss the composition of the Hamilton Harbour Commission".

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Keyes: As most members will know, Canadians have the right to demand that members of Parliament must be accountable, not only to their constituents, but also to their communities and institutions. When a member fails to even meet with officials of their own city, town or region, there develops a lack of trust and confidence.

The resolution also stated that the Prime Minister would be made aware of the dereliction of duty by the three Tory MPs and that the City Council would instead meet with the Liberal MPs from the area. One Hamilton alderman summed up Hamilton's frustrations with the members of Lincoln, Burlington and Hamilton—Wentworth this way: "When our local MPs adamantly refuse to talk to City Council, we have a real serious problem."

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, documents filed before the Quebec Superior Court indicate the insidious, pernicious and unethical tactics used by tobacco industry advertisers to sell death to youth and other targeted consumers.

A 1988 advertising plan notes that very young starter smokers choose Export A because it provides them with an instant badge of masculinity, appeals to their rebellious nature, and establishes their position among their peers.

Similarly, we know young women of child-bearing age are manipulated into smoking by advertising which associates smoking with slimness, attractive appearance and popularity. What incredible gall do these poor corporate citizens have, to challenge federal legislation banning their obscene advertising and recently to ask smokers to protest tax increases on cigarettes that certainly do not compensate for either the public cost or private suffering caused by tobacco addiction and the poor societal values they propagate? I urge a complete ban on advertising and promotion of cigarettes in Canada and exemption from copyright legislation for educators and critics of such advertising.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, fishermen in Cheticamp, Nova Scotia, are occupying the Fisheries and Oceans office today to protest the federal government's mismanagement of the fisheries resource in their area.

The problems facing east coast fisheries have been wreaking havoc on the economy and the social fabric of maritime communities. Years of Tory and Liberal fiddling has done nothing to provide for a stable and prosperous fishing industry in the Atlantic and the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

I spoke to the fishermen this morning and they told me that they are being squeezed by declining stocks, inequitable quotas and increasingly Draconian UIC requirements.

The government has to sit down with all sectors of the inshore fisheries to work out a fair and equitable distribution of quotas and plan for a fisheries with a future.

Express your support for the fishermen. Phone them in Cheticamp at 902–224–2017. Tell the fisheries minister as well. Call him here in Ottawa at 613–992–3474.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, last week I rose to protest the human rights violations against Jews in Syria.

Today, I rise to protest the bizarre and inhumane treatment of two particular Syrian Jews, Selim Swed and his brother Elie.

They have been imprisoned without charge for three and a half years. They were beaten and tortured during this period and were ultimately brought before a tribunal last week.

Their in camera trial lasted only a few minutes. They were not allowed to speak or have a lawyer. They were sentenced to six and a half years in prison, even though no charges were ever made public.

I call upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make an urgent representation to President Havez Al–Assad on behalf of the Sweds before the 15 day clemency period expires on June 5, next week.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the Department of Employment and Immigration recently handed out scores of lapel pins to its employees in Kingston. The pins were stamped with the logo "C–21", a reference, of course, to that pernicious piece of legislation which reduced unemployment insurance benefits for thousands of Canadians and drove up premiums for millions more.

The pins are in recognition of work done by public servants to learn and implement the new act. The employees were not amused. Over 60 pins have been delivered to my office in protest. With the government claiming the cupboard is bare, it is hard to understand how the department could spend money on pins, bells and whistles and not on salaries.

To add insult to injury, this government, which is supposedly doing all it can to alleviate the losses being caused by cross–border shopping, did not even adhere to its "buy Canadian" policy. Stamped on the back of the hooks of the pins are the words "Made in the U.S.A.".

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the decision by the Solicitor General to reinstate contracts to provinces and municipalities for the provision of RCMP services must be applauded.

So must the efforts of my New Democratic colleagues, as well as representatives from municipalities across Canada, who fought together to convince the government of the error of its ways.

Extending RCMP funding provisions, initially terminated on March 31, demonstrates that the government has finally listened.

While the Solicitor General has indicated the contract extension is only for one year, it provides provinces and municipalities an opportunity to properly negotiate a new agreement.

It also provides further opportunity for my colleagues and I to press our position that the federal government should not renege on traditional funding for provincial and municipal RCMP services.

Speaking on behalf of B.C. municipalities, the Solicitor General's decision demonstrates his good judgement. Speaking on behalf of my B.C. colleagues, it is proof positive that things can happen when you have an effective voice in opposition.

HOUSING CO-OPERATIVES

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, tomorrow I will officially open the Artspace Housing Co-operative in Edmonton East. This will be the first Edmonton housing co-operative to operate under new CMHC guidelines which will house more lower and moderate income families than previous housing co-operatives.

A surcharge will come into effect if a family's income is or rises above $54,000. This will ensure government funds are targeted to those most in need.

I congratulate the government on implementing its new guidelines.

In another co-op in Edmonton East, the Sundance Housing Co-operative, there are 30 families on the waiting list. There is an NDP MLA and an NDP member of Parliament living there, the member for Edmonton East, both high income individuals. They are shutting out these families from affordable accommodation. This is a travesty perpetrated by two free-loading politicians and they should have the decency to get out.

THE SEVENTEEN DAYS OF JUNE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, beginning on June 8 in Winnipeg, the largest gathering of aboriginal people in North America will begin a major convention entitled "The Seventeen Days of June".

First peoples in Canada are wondering what will be the federal government's recognition of this event. Organizers have asked the government to support their efforts and the Secretary of State has said no.

Distinguished Canadians, including Peter Gzowski, David Suzuki and nearly 500 chiefs from across Canada, will be participating. The Assembly of First Nations will be meeting to elect a new grand chief. Will the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be there?

A children's program has been planned, as well as an arts and cultural show, an elders' forum and an international pow-wow.

Canadians would like to know why the federal government would have a portfolio to supposedly support events of such historical proportion when ministers cannot find the will to participate. The international pow-wow may even have to be cancelled without help from the Secretary of State. This is truly indicative of how the federal government really treats matters important to aboriginal peoples in Canada.

TOBACCO-FREE CANADA

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this morning in Montreal the hon. Jean Corbeil, Minister of Transport, is speaking at a ceremony where the Canadian Council on Smoking and Health is presenting Air Canada with an award for its leadership in helping to create a tobacco-free Canada. Members may be aware that today is World No-Tobacco Day.

On January 1, 1990 the Non-Smokers Health Act came into force. On that day, all inter-city buses became totally smoke-free at the owner's request. Smoking on trains was reduced to one-third of every third car and terminals and stations were limited to one-third of the area accessible to the general public.

With respect to airlines, the minister banned smoking on all Canadian registered aircraft on flights of six hours or less. For longer flights, a progressive reduction in the number of seats reserved for smoking passengers is still in effect. These numbers will be reduced by 25 per cent each June 30, until all flights become totally non-smoking on July 1, 1993, making Canada a world leader in the elimination of smoking in air travel.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, more bad news for Quebec! Ministers Michel Pagé, André Bourbeau, Marc-Yvan Côté, Lucienne Robillard, Claude Ryan and Gilles Rémillard have had reason to criticize the federal government, and now Yvon Picotte, Minister of Regional Development, is up in arms against Ottawa's intrusion in the area of regional development.

At a time when it is generally agreed in Quebec that the province should have exclusive responsibility for regional development, Ottawa once again wants to insult us by interfering.

Quebecers will no longer let themselves be manipulated in this way. We don't want a federal department for regional development. We don't want a patronage machine in Quebec.

This is blatant provocation on the part of Benoît Bouchard, who dares to call himself a Quebecer and a defender of Quebec's higher interests.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has now expired.

CHESS CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, over 7,500 students coming from more than 400 schools participated in a series of chess tournaments earlier this year leading to the national championship. School teams went to 50 regional championships and the best players from these went on to provincial championships. On the Victoria Day weekend, the winners from each province played off in the finals in Montreal and national champions were declared:

Grade I, Jonathan Gottlieb of Hampstead, Quebec; Grade II, Andrew Ho of Vancouver, B.C.; Grade III, Roman Golts of Willowdale, Ontario; Grade IV, Erez Davy of Windsor, Ontario; Grade V, Darryl Kong of Vancouver, B.C.; Grade VI, Anthony Castillo of Longueuil, Quebec; Grade VII, Matthew Grabove of Quispamsis, New Brunswick; Grade VIII, Nicolas Soudre of Pierrefonds, Quebec; Grades IX and X combined, Howard Wu of Victoria, B.C.; Grades XI and XII combined, Peter Olszewski of Oakville.

The winner over all was Quebec. Congratulations to the participants and the good work they do for the disadvantaged children of the world.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

On May 15 the Prime Minister said in this House that he was only advised of the Al-Mashat affair on April 30. It is now public knowledge that not one, not two, but three senior officials in the Prime Minister's Office were informed of this affair on April 8.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he is in communication with the Prime Minister to ask if on his return the Prime Minister will be acknowledging that he knew of the Al-Mashat affair much earlier than the April 30 date that was given to this House.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, first and foremost I am pleased to note that the opposition are now acknowledging the fact that there was no ministerial involvement in the Al-Mashat case prior to his entrance into Canada on March 30. I think that is a very significant development, and perhaps the information that has been provided clearly states that.

Ministers and members of the Privy Council Office and members of the Prime Minister's Office are making themselves available to the committee to deal with all of these particular issues. That is why the committee process was utilized to get to the bottom of this issue. I invite the hon. member to participate in that process. All the witnesses they have asked for will be there and all of those areas can be clarified.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): We are talking about who will appear before the committee. It may well be that the Deputy Prime Minister should appear before the committee because we have also learned in the public reports made yesterday that the Deputy Prime Minister's own office was informed of the Al-Mashat affair, again on April 8, and we would like to know whether the Deputy Prime Minister's office told him, and did the Deputy Prime Minister in receiving this knowledge from his office inform the Prime Minister?

The whole point is this: This is a government that knew what was going on but did not acknowledge it publicly in any way.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, just to clarify the point the hon. member is making, I was first apprised of this issue on May 7 or May 8 and I heard it in a television report. It was also drawn to my attention at that time by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, at which time he took the necessary action to deal with this particular issue.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, it is absolutely incredible that it was a whole month from the time that his own office and his own political assistants were seized of the matter, were given information, were given a memorandum, and the Deputy Prime Minister himself says he did not find out for another month.

Is that any way to run a government, when you don't know what is going on and your office won't even tell you?

It is clear that there are so many contradictory, differing versions of what happened, what did not happen, who did what, who did not do what, that the only way we can get at the truth is to see the original sources ourselves. We have been asking since last Monday for the tabling of the essential documents, including the memos that went directly to the Prime Minister's Office and the Deputy Prime Minister's office.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister this: Can we be given assurance that there will be no more foot-dragging, no more puck ragging, that they will proclaim and table those documents first thing Monday morning in this House so we can begin to get to the truth for ourselves and get rid of all these false reports?

• (1120)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is quite obvious that the hon. member is not interested in the truth because when the truth is stated they will not accept it. They want their version and not the correct version. There is no cover-up. There is no ministerial involvement. There is no contradiction.

If he wants to have all the information, why does he not participate in the committee process, read the documents, ask the proper questions, call the proper witnesses and he will get his answers.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister as Minister of Finance. Perhaps he will be willing to take responsibility for that part of his duties.

Today, Statistics Canada reported that the economy began shrinking again in March. Today the government's made-in-Canada recession is 12 months old.

The minister has been saying that the new r word is recovery, but Canadians say the new r word should be resign.

I ask the Minister of Finance: Will he produce immediately a new economic recovery budget and, if not, will he and other ministers produce their resignations?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, after all these years of being in the House of Commons, one would have thought that the hon. member might be a little more original than that. That is an old trick.

Mr. Tobin: You're trying to sell a used budget.

Mr. Mazankowski: If this is a used budget, it is much better than the budgets we saw when his party was in office. They failed to deal with—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): This budget is a lemon.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, the hon. member from Winnipeg was there as well and he knows very well that in those days they failed to deal with the fundamentals.

There is nothing new in what has been reported. My predecessor, when he tabled the budget in February 1991, indicated that the economy would begin to stabilize by mid-year, after a total decline of about 2.5 per cent in output. He also indicated that the unemployment rate would exceed 10 per cent.

This is all part and parcel of the projections in the budget. We are taking steps to ensure that we can bring interest rates down if we deal with the inflationary pressures, the inflationary expectations. There are signs we are making some progress and we stand by our projections that there will be growth emerging in the second half. That has all been outlined in the budget.

I ask the hon. member to reread it and particularly pay attention to page 4.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance in turn if he will read today's Statistics Canada release which said that after the economy ceased shrinking in February, it began shrinking again in March. That may be the Tory version of recovery. That is not what Canadians say.

The Minister of National Revenue yesterday made a remarkable confession, a death-bed confession for this government, when he said and I quote:

> We have moved too far in the taxation area, and we're in the process of reviewing the whole thing.

Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue is half way there. He has admitted the government has gone too far in raising taxes 33 times, including the GST.

I ask the Minister of Finance: Will he go all the way and bring in new, fairer tax policies that will stop killing the Canadian economy?

[Translation]

My question to the minister is this: When will he introduce new tax policies that will not destroy our economy?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think in fairness the hon. member would acknowledge that the weakness in the first quarter largely centred around the month of January. Since that time there have been a number of positive indicators in terms of improvement in business confidence, improvement in employment, and interest rates have continued to come down. There has been an improvement in terms of housing sales and starts. That was taking hold in April and I think the hon. member would recognize and acknowledge that that turnaround has in fact started to emerge.

Insofar as the comments of the Minister of National Revenue, I think he was making the point that taxes are but one component and clearly the taxes on liquor, gasoline—let us talk about taxes at the provincial level for example. That is part and parcel of this issue. The whole cross-border shopping issue is a matter that involves more than taxes. It involves marketing, the costs of doing business vis-à-vis the United States, important new methodology and practices of marketing which are employed in the United States and are not employed here.

Furthermore, in terms of Canada's overall position in the G-7, we are about number three in our level of taxation vis-à-vis the other G-7 countries.

We do not stack up as bad as the hon. member—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we are getting into a speech now.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. This morning, Statistics Canada confirmed that the recession is still with us and that it is getting worse. A few days ago, we heard that the number of people on unemployment insurance continues to rise and that in two years, Quebec lost 124,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector. As for the human factor, today in Montreal more than 20,000 young children will have to be fed at school, because they are undernourished and unable to learn. What is the government going to do to deal with this situation and put the country back to work?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member may be aware that last week as well Statistics Canada reported that the worst of the recession was over. In fact it indicated at that time, according to its statistics, that there was a turnaround emerging. As I indicated in response to her question last week, the April employment figures indicate that the worst of the recession is over and that we are optimistic and confident that growth will re-emerge in the second half. That is what we said in the budget. That is what we indicated in our economic statements in 1990, and what is really developing is holding true to form for the projections that we advanced at that time.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, those Canadians who are unemployed and their families cannot eat projections, projections by this government that are usually wrong.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Yesterday the Minister of National Revenue admitted that Canadians are over-taxed. Today Quebec unions and the Quebec Manufacturing Association are denouncing the high-dollar policy that is making it very difficult for Canadian exporters.

If the Minister of Finance will not resign, will he repent and bring in some fair taxation policies so that Canadian businesses can compete and Canadians can buy goods?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, all I will do is try to respond to the hon. member with some facts which are very simple. The United States and Japan extract about 30 per cent of their Gross Domestic Product in the form of taxes. Canada extracts about 34 per cent; the U.K. and Germany, 37 per cent; France, 42 per cent; and Sweden, 55 per cent—that one country that is held up as a model by the members of the New Democratic Party.

I realize that that may not provide solid comfort, but the fact of the matter is that until we deal with the fundamentals, as the former Minister of Finance indicated, the key to growth and prosperity is to bring down interest rates, and the way to bring down interest rates is to remove the inflationary pressures and deal with the deficit problems throughout the country, and indeed all the provinces have to join in that effort. That is what is going to bring about sustainable growth. That is what will bring about price stability and that is the tack we are on. I am convinced it is the correct tack in this matter.

• (1130)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Madam Speaker, for the Minister for International Trade. If the government wants to make some fundamental changes and to reverse policies that are costing Canadian jobs, we better take a look at the trade deal because we know how many jobs that cost Canadians.

We understand that on June 10 the government will begin talks with Mexico and the United States here in Canada on an action plan around the trade deal. Yesterday the Minister for International Trade admitted that Canadians will not be able to compete with cheap Mexican goods because of low Mexican wages.

The U.S. Congress spent months discussing the trade deal with Mexico. It had a long debate, as did the Senate. It was an opportunity for the American population to hear some of the views on this, while this government has not allowed this opportunity for Canadians in this House.

Given the serious consequences of the Canada-U.S. trade deal, would the Minister for International Trade postpone his talks and put into action a plan that will include a full debate in this House on both the effects of the Canada-U.S. trade deal and the projected effects by this government of the Mexican trade deal? Workers out there know what the effects will be, and they want to hear answers.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I know it is difficult for Canadians to understand the beneficial impacts of the free trade agreement.

As we have been implementing the free trade agreement, we have had a serious recession. If my hon. friend will be fair and look behind the numbers, she will realize that the free trade agreement has softened the impact of the recession on the country.

Let me give her three specific statistics on this. Our trade surplus with the United States in 1988 was $14 billion. It increased to $17 billion in 1990. That represents increased jobs. Exports to the United States were up 12 per cent comparing 1990 over 1988. We had seen a swing of direct foreign investment between Canada and other countries going from a negative to a positive position, the first in 16 years. That swing was in the order of $6.5 billion. That also is a positive element and had a positive impact on the economy.

In those three ways, we can demonstrate that the free trade agreement has softened the impact of the recession on this country. My hon. friend is talking—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. minister is now getting into debate.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The Minister of Agriculture knows that the National Farm Products Marketing Council held hearings last year regarding the feasibility of the establishment of a national apple marketing agency for fresh apples. The minister knows that the report has been in the hands of his predecessor and himself for a few weeks, even a few months. The recommendation was to set up such an agency for Canadian apple growers.

Will the minister today stand in his place and announce to Canadians and Canadian apple producers his acceptance of that report so that the next step can be taken, the establishment of a national agency for Canadian apple producers?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, the philosophy of this government is to support national marketing agencies when they are supported by the producers. Once that is shown, we will be very pleased to support that outcome and that effort on behalf of apple producers in Canada.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, a supplementary for the same minister.

The minister knows that he has to give approval to that report before the producers can be asked for their approval. The ball is in his court and he is fumbling it. He is not responding to the producers and giving them the opportunity they are requesting.

The minister also knows that American producers and the United States government do not like Canadian agencies and organizations such as the Canadian Wheat Board and supply management organizations. Will he admit that it is pressure from the United States government and United States producers of these products that ship a lot into Canada that is causing his and the government's heel dragging and the further steps that need to be taken to put this agency in place?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I expected a statement such as that to come from a little to my right, from the New Democratic Party. The hon. member is seeing his blatant anti-Americanism come forward in a strange way.

The apple producers, and the member knows several, rely on their ability to compete in the United States so that they can derive profit from their efforts. If the hon. member is suggesting that we should not be sure, and the apple producers themselves should not be sure that they will still have the ability to take advantage of export markets along with the domestic market, these are questions that have to be addressed and these are questions that will be addressed.

Mr. Vanclief: They have been.

Mr. McKnight: The hon. member says they have been. I can read to the hon. member letters from several large apple producers who question the report. What we will go through, and I am sure the hon. member supports this, is the process of the council. We, on behalf of the producers, will support the outcome. But the hon. member has to remember that the outcome is in the hands of the producers.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of Treasury Board. It concerns the damage that his slashing of jobs in the Public Service is doing to the health and welfare of Canadians.

This memorandum, sent by the deputy minister of health and welfare to all employees, says that the government's policies mean cuts to health promotion, cancelling the campaign against drinking and driving and even delaying approval of life saving drugs.

With health care costs skyrocketing and medicare in danger, how does the government justify cutting services that help keep Canadians healthy?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, because of the fiscal situation that we have explained time and again in this House, we have to take difficult measures. In the budget, for example, we did not target the Public Service, but we had to ask them to be part of the solution, among others. These cuts, of course, have their impact, but what is the alternative? The alternative is that we can go out and borrow more money, keeping services beyond our capacity to pay, disregarding completely the result that in a few years' time it will not be a reduction, it will be massive cuts.

Of course these cuts may have some impact. We want to contain them as much as possible. This is why we are proposing a freeze to the unions to give them some comfort because we want to maintain the number of public servants, even to increase it.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

It seems to me we have money for pins so that employees can advertise the GST, but no money for health care.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the Deputy Minister stated that instead of producing more with fewer resources, everybody will now have to do less with fewer resources.

Is the minister at all concerned that his Preston Manning agenda implies that the elderly will have to wait even longer for their pension cheques and for the drugs that relieve their pain and suffering? Does the minister have at least some concern for the sick and the elderly in this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the government is fully aware of the importance of effective service delivery.

That is why—and I believe my opposition colleague is fully aware of this, since we are constantly in touch on this matter—we are proceeding with a thorough reform of the public service, our purpose being to try to do more with less. We all have to go this route, both industry and government.

It would be unthinkable to keep evading the problem. It would be irresponsible. We must learn. And I can inform the hon. member that after travelling across the country from Vancouver to St. John's, I found to my delight that public employees are ready. They have come up with some extremely positive recommendations and I am delighted.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Members of this House learned yesterday for the first time, in the government's version of the report on the Al-Mashat affair, that on Tuesday, April 30, the Clerk of the Privy Council sent a memorandum to the Prime Minister based upon suggested responses by two senior ministers of this government on the Al-Mashat affair. What ministers were instructed to respond if they were asked questions in the House was that Al-Mashat was processed under normal standards and was not accorded preferential treatment. That came out of the Prime Minister's office.

• (1140)

Will the Deputy Prime Minister explain to this House and to Canadians why the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office were prepared to have ministers deliberately mislead this House on the fast tracking of the Al-Mashat application?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member knows that such language cannot be accepted in the House. I do not think that anybody wants to deliberately mislead anyone. The hon. minister may want to answer the question.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, my understanding is that the Clerk of the Privy Council is prepared to appear before the committee and the hon. member can ask him that very question.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, we also learned yesterday for the first time that on April 8, not only the legislative assistant to the Prime Minister, but the deputy press officer to the Prime Minister, the Privy Council Office, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and a member of the Conservative caucus, all knew the circumstances of Al-Mashat. Yet the Prime Minister says he knew nothing until April 30. My question—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is bringing to the floor of the House of Commons something that is before the committee. He is not, in my view, referring to things that belong in this House but questions that can be asked in committee.

I will give the floor to the hon. member, but I would advise him to be very careful with his questions. This has gone a little too far.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister a supplementary question.

In view of the glaring inconsistencies in this report which point to either a massive cover-up or a massive screw-up, will the Deputy Prime Minister assure the House that the Prime Minister will appear as a witness before this committee to come clean with Canadians on his role in this affair?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there is no cover-up. There are no contradictions. What the government has attempted to do is provide all the information that is available, to update that information, and to refine it. The document that was tabled yesterday was a refinement of the earlier information. There are no contradictions. There is no cover-up.

PCO officials, PMO officials have been invited to appear before the committee. They will appear before the committee and the hon. member can have his fun at the committee, get the answers, and get the truth. The truth is going to hurt the hon. member.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister if he is not too busy talking to the opposition.

Southern Ontario is now the only part of Canada which lacks a regional economic development agency. At least one minister has said that if Ontario does not like it it should complain.

Well I am here this morning to complain. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will immediately have the government establish a regional economic development agency or department for southern Ontario, bearing in mind that some 42 per cent of all of the job losses in this country recently have occurred in the greater metropolitan Toronto area.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, Ontario companies benefit from various policies of the federal government in a number of ways. They are one of the largest beneficiaries of the defence industry productivity program. They are major beneficiaries of the trade policies that we follow, the program to help people sell into border states, to sell into the rest of the United States. They are also major beneficiaries of the EMDP, the Export Marketing Development Program.

In addition to that we do have a regional development program in northern Ontario called FEDNOR. There are a number of research and development programs that assist companies across Canada, and the companies in southern Ontario are large beneficiaries of this.

It is important to realize that the effect of the announcement by my colleague from Quebec on the change in the regional development programs in Quebec is simply an administrative change. There is no change in the funding. It is designed to put the delivery of the program closer to Quebec companies and closer to the people who are receiving it.

If my colleague wants to review the basis for these programs, going back in the past, western diversification is to help companies diversify—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the question raised by the hon. member has been answered.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Last year the Prime Minister attempted to set up a task force on education. It did not get off the ground. It was a complete failure. This House will know that this year in the Speech from the Throne the Prime Minister talks about doing more or less the same thing.

Why should Canadians believe the Prime Minister in this particular initiative? Why should they believe that he could launch a successful educational initiative when in fact he failed a year ago, when it was an utter, complete, total failure?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member will read the Speech from the Throne carefully he will see that the pledge to develop a learning culture also is a pledge to respect the constitutional jurisdiction of the provinces.

The government is attempting to build on a constitutional responsibility to provide equal opportunities for Canadians and to provide regional economic development or the reduction of economic disparities. The implementation of that kind of strategy and that kind of leadership requires consultation and co-operation with the provinces because their jurisdiction is essential for the delivery of these programs.

My colleague, the minister for industry, will be producing a very important component of this in terms of the competitive strategy. My colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will be part of this very important component.

The most important thing that the Prime Minister stated in this was the need to bring all levels of government in Canada together, to commit ourselves mutually to use all our powers, whatever they are, at all three levels of government to create a culture of learning so that Canadians can be world leaders in the 21st century.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. The Speech from the Throne contains no specific measures indicating how the Prime Minister and the government intend to proceed with this initiative and get good results. I have here a confidential paper prepared for the government, following the Speech from the Throne, and it does not contain any strategies for this purpose. Canadians wonder whether this initiative is a sincere proposal or whether it is simply a ploy to enhance the government's popularity.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the Speech from the Throne described the main themes of the government's policy. Further details concerning training and the creation of a learning culture in Canada will be given next month. I am sure Canadians will be very happy with the specifics of this policy and will be reassured as to its authenticity.

CANADIAN FORCES BASES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday in Germany the Minister of National Defence said that before he closes Canadian forces bases that he did not have to get permission from anybody. He has to get permission from the people of Canada, who put him where he is.

He also said at the same time that he would be making a statement on defence this coming summer.

When hundreds of thousands of Canadians all across the country depend on Canadian forces bases for their livelihood, and have serious anxiety about the future of those bases, why is it that the government refuses to do what other major countries are now doing, and that is to have full and public discussion on national security and national defence in this country? Why does the government refuse to do that?

• (1150)

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member has misquoted the minister who has been in Germany the past week and who was quoted as saying: "It is not done in isolation. At the end of the process it is a decision of the Canadian cabinet".

We have already said the decision will have to be made right here in Canada. When decisions are going to be made and when it is time for a discussion, which we are looking at as a possibility, we will open up and tell the people what decisions the government has made at that time.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, by that time it will be too late.

I understand that the House of Commons committee is the master of its own fate, but for two years I have been asking that the House of Commons committee be the vehicle for that public discussion of defence policy.

Will the minister, or will somebody on behalf of the government, undertake to write to the chair of the House of Commons defence committee requesting public hearings across Canada on defence policy before decisions are taken by cabinet that are irreversible? Why not do that?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, if a cabinet minister wrote to a committee, that member would be the first one to say we are interfering in the independence of the committee. Obviously, if he cannot get more than one person to voice the same concern he has not got a majority to get his own way.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Many violent crimes including wife battering and the sexual abuse of women and young children can be traced to the hard core pornography which is so readily available today. Moral values and the vital role which the family plays in our society have been under attack because of the cancerous effect of hard core pornography.

Will the minister address this urgent issue by introducing legislation soon?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the hon. member. The government does intend to introduce legislation during this session of Parliament aimed at child pornography.

We will also be very interested to review a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in a case known as Butler that will be argued before the Supreme Court of Canada in June and will help to elaborate the guidelines with respect to other forms of pornography.

I would also point out to the hon. member that from June 10 to 12 of this year I am convening a symposium on Women, Law, and the Administration of Justice in Vancouver which will address this among other issues and will, I hope, provide some very useful guidelines to the government on a broader approach to the question that he raises in the House today.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment.

Twenty thousand truckloads of toxic soil are being trucked from the Expo land sites in Vancouver to environmentally sensitive lands at the mouth of the Fraser River. This is being done without any consultation, without any notification, and without the mandatory environmental assessment review that this government is supposed to hold. This contaminated soil will be one kilometre from the Fraser River. It poses a risk to fisheries, to farmland, and to the residents in that area.

The Minister of the Environment will be in Vancouver this week. Will this government finally take its obligations to the environment seriously? Will the minister announce in Vancouver a halt to the dumping of this toxic soil? Will the minister institute the environmental review process which is supposed to be mandatory?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to inform the House that the Fraser River Harbour Commission during the course of this week has been conducting an initial assessment on the proposal to move the landfill in question.

I am advised that steps will be taken to ensure that no environmentally significant damage is done and that if there are mitigating circumstances, the remedy will be put in place.

Furthermore, I can inform the House that the Minister of the Environment will be in Vancouver later today and I know this will be an item of concern for him in terms of his consultations with the appropriate officials.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

On May 16 the Federal Court ordered a full environmental review of the Alcan project in British Columbia. This House also knows that a management plan for the Fraser River basin will be incomplete without such a review.

Can the minister tell this House if lawyers in her department have reviewed this issue and the decision of the Federal Court? Will she tell the Federal Court that this government will finally do the right thing and order a full environmental assessment of the Alcan project in British Columbia? If not, why not?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, again I am pleased to have the opportunity to inform the House that this very important but very complex decision which was issued by the courts referred to during the course of last week is under full examination at the moment by the Department of Justice officials and by the relevant departments concerned.

I would anticipate that an announcement will be made in the very near future as a result of those determinations. I am sure the House will be informed of that information as soon as it is available.

TRADE

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The free trade agreement is hurting some 70,000 Canadian employees of the printing industry. Free trade was supposed to relax the obligation to mark the country of origin on printed products. It has not. As a result, Canadian products are strictly monitored and turned back at the border. Worse, American clients of Canadian producers are closing accounts because their consumers are rejecting products marked "Made in Canada".

Why is the minister not pressing his American counterparts for a level playing field? Why is he not asking them to end the discriminatory practices of American customs officials?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right that the free trade agreement is designed to avoid the problem that he sets out. If he has specifics that he would like to bring to my attention, I would be very happy to look into it right away.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I already did and I will be pleased to be even more specific. The minister is quite aware that Canadian customs regulations regarding the entry of American printed matter are both loose and loosely applied. American printers, for example, bidding on Canadian contracts do not have to identify the country of origin on their products. The Manitoba telephone systems directory and yellow pages are an example.

Will the minister undertake to have the revenue department be as tough as American customs officials unless the regulations imposed on Canadian products are relaxed?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the specifics that my hon. friend has given me just now. This will give me an opportunity to look into it with more precision and I will get back to him.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister who wants to answer for the new minister responsible for regional development in Quebec. The people of the Gaspé region and the Magdalen Islands are quite disappointed with the empty shell the minister unveiled to them yesterday. Does the government not believe that $340,000 a year is insufficient for the economic development of that region, whose official unemployment rate is 27 per cent? How can you develop the economy in a region where unemployment is 27 per cent with $340,000?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am amazed at how changeable the hon. member for Saint-Léonard is. For weeks now, the members for Saint-Léonard, LaSalle—Émard and Windsor West have risen to ask what the government was waiting for to act in Quebec, Montreal, etc. We have a structure for action in regional development. For several days, no doubt for electoral reasons, opposition members had fun saying that we should not intervene in regional development. I do not understand his logic very well.

On the other hand, I had the opportunity to speak to the member for Gaspé, who is next to me today, Madam Speaker. He told me the opposite of what the member just said. He said that the government's decision was very well received in the Gaspé. Of course more should be done but the important thing is to start by doing something.

• (1200)

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, this amount for the new economic development agency is part of a sum already allocated under the 1988 Canada-Quebec Agreement. Everyone will remember the election announcement that was made then.

Is this new agency another recycled election promise?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would like to repeat that the government is trying to take effective action within the limits of its budget and is preparing action programs. This is one of them and I would ask the hon. member to take another look at the reaction of people in the Gaspé. To his short-lived shame, he will see that he is not right—we are.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

As the minister well knows, the question of whether co-operatives should have to pay the GST on their share capital has been kicking around his department for over a year. Co-op people are getting very irritated by being told that investment in a co-op is no different from buying a membership in a country club.

Therefore I would like to ask the minister: Why should this 100 per cent Canadian owned sector continue to be the only business sector in Canada that has to pay the GST on its investments?

Could he tell us, since this situation can be rectified by either the stroke of a pen by the Minister of National Revenue, or by a legislative amendment, which I am sure we would all support, which one we can expect and when we can expect it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member and other members have made representations to me with respect to the treatment of co-operatives under the GST.

My predecessor and myself have been trying to make the necessary refinements and administrative changes to ensure that the GST works smoothly. We are looking at that at the present time, but I am not in a position as of now to indicate precisely whether in fact we can take action on it.

I think the hon. member knows we have to examine it in detail to ensure that it does not create demands for other concessions in other areas. However, I can assure him that we are looking at it very seriously.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I certainly appreciate the opportunity to ask it.

Changes have been proposed by the Horticultural Council of Nova Scotia, the Department of Agriculture and the producers. They all agree on changes proposed for the sizing of strawberries. However, the changes are being delayed through the department because of a backlog. This delay will cause berries to be left unharvested in the field and the loss of jobs.

Would the minister commit today to trying to expedite these changes so that they could be made in time for the harvest, or could he instruct the department to accept the standards prior to the paperwork being completed?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, as the member knows, any changes have a regulatory process. Although there is widespread support for those changes, the regulatory process must be observed.

I can tell the hon. member that we will work on it as efficiently as we can. I am sorry I cannot commit to him that I will bypass the well established regulatory process even though I recognize the importance to him and to his constituents.

Point of Order

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS BY MEMBERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. My question of privilege arises out of yesterday's exchanges after Question Period. As you well know, Madam Speaker, although you were not in the chair and Mr. Speaker was, there were several points of order, somewhat heated and at times very aggressive. My point of order arises from what happened in the exchange between the hon. member for Saint-Denis and myself and my point of privilege is this: Beauchesne's citation 234.(1) says in the final part of it that:

> A point of order cannot be raised on a point of order.

I take that to mean that a point of order cannot be interrupted by another point of order. What happened, if you look at yesterday's Hansard, was that I was speaking on a point of order and was interrupted by the hon. member for Saint-Denis on a point of personal privilege which turned out, if you continue to read the arguments, not to be a point of privilege but rather a point of order.

My request is that the Chair review Hansard, have a look at that exchange and relay back to me whether I was, in fact, interrupted by another point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: On a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Denis on a point of order.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, first, I think it is really childish to raise this today.

Second, it was a question of privilege because motives were imputed to members. When Mr. Speaker in his wisdom reviews the debate he will conclude this, I am sure. If not, I will take note. If Mr. Speaker is to render a decision I would hope that he would not communicate it to the member privately. I would hope that, as he just mentioned, he will make his judgment public because I am interested in following that.

I repeat that I find it rather childish to raise that today, but it is in good spirit. I will be waiting for Mr. Speaker's decision on the point of order raised by the hon. member that was not a point of order.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, just to reaffirm what my colleague has said, I do not believe the intervention made by the parliamentary secretary is in fact a point of privilege. It is a bogus point of privilege. If anything, it may fall within the definitions of a point of order. I think the hon. member for Saint-Denis has carefully put to the chair both the circumstances as well as some of the motives which were being attributed to him. I believe the hon. member for Saint-Denis was quite appropriate in rising when he did to respond to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

I submit that it is certainly not a point of privilege.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Peace River, the hon. member for Saint-Denis, and the hon. House leader for the Official Opposition.

Having heard all sides, I will of course take the matter up with the Speaker, who will then act according to his usual very wise judgment.

On a different point of order, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING COMMITTEE ON ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I just wish to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader—and I am certain that he is aware of it—some of the deliberations that have taken place in one of the standing committees of the House. I do not wish to get into what was said or what was not said, but I refer of course to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs.

I believe the parliamentary secretary and the appropriate ministers have been informed of some of the statements attributed to one of the members of that particular committee. I would just ask the parliamentary secretary if he would review those circumstances to make certain that our committees can run well and run effectively without having that kind of provocation, I suggest, being touted about.

I just raise that as notice for the parliamentary secretary or, indeed, the chief government Whip who might want to take it under advisement. That was the intent of raising it here this morning.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I missed the very early part of that point. As the House will know, Whips are commonly charged with the responsibility of suggesting membership for committees. Throughout my 3 years of experience, I think all of us attempt to take the seriousness of the responsibility of committee membership as a primary concern as we begin to exercise that responsibility.

I guess part of what bothered me yesterday was the number of press people who called. It was interesting to me. In each and every case when the press called I asked if they had ever seen a transcript of remarks, and not a single press person had seen a transcript. Some of them had talked to native people. I asked them if the native people had seen transcripts of the total situation, of the total set of remarks.

All of us in this Chamber from time to time develop a public perception based on something a newspaper headline writer does, or a 10-second clip, and all of us feel the unfairness of that from time to time. We feel we are misinterpreted, and difficulties are created for ourselves and for our families.

I guess the best advice I have to the House is to accept a couple of principles.

• (1210)

We are all elected democratically to come to this House to represent our constituents. What is being called into question here, particularly by the media and I hope not by the Liberal Party, is the reputation of a member of this House who has been returned or re-elected by constituents to serve in this House on behalf of all of the people in the riding. The riding we are talking about obviously has a number of people of aboriginal descent. They are certainly a well-known group in the country.

We might all simply say that this House unanimously approved that committee report. We have a member on the committee. The member will have a chance to both teach and learn and to live through some very difficult times. The nation might indeed be very well served by the reality of the experience that member has had to undergo over a period of time.

I just hope that we are not moving in this Chamber to the point where we think that something a newspaper says about us or something we are supposed to have done would be a factor in this Chamber in excluding somebody from accepting the responsibility and the role to serve to the best of their ability on a committee. If somebody does things on a committee, perhaps we could—

Madam Deputy Speaker: This was to be my suggestion, if I can interrupt the hon. member. The Speaker has been very patient and has listened very carefully to the question.

Perhaps the hon. member for Saint-Léonard will allow me to make a comment and then, if he still wishes to rise, I will of course recognize him.

I think this is a very important matter, but it really does not belong in this place. It belongs in either the House management committee or the aboriginal committee. It really does not belong in the House.

I have listened to the hon. government Whip. Of course I will listen to the hon. member should he still insist on having the floor, but I still do not feel that it belongs in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. I simply wanted to point out that first of all, I don't think my House leader wished to impute motives to the member on the committee.

The important thing here is that our committees each have certain areas they are supposed to consider. It is all a matter of credibility, and I think my House leader was merely making suggestions to the parliamentary secretary and the chief government Whip. Perhaps we should take the trouble to become familiar with all the issues; we may have to review our whole committee system some day.

This is only a suggestion, and it is certainly not my intention to impute motives to anyone in this matter.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government responses to six petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) for leave to introduce Bill C-19, an Act respecting banks and banking.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-213, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act and other acts in relation thereto.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to introduce this bill today. I had introduced it during the last Parliament, so this is a reintroduction.

This voluminous bill is a reprint of Bill C-79 introduced before the last election, which the Deputy Prime Minister will be very familiar with. I know he will want to support this bill.

I have made some modest changes to it to reflect what I believe to be the wishes of most hon. members. This bill should be dealt with promptly by the House and referred to committee so that changes can be made to the Canada Elections Act before the next election.

Like other hon. members, I am apprehensive that the report of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing expected in October may come too late to be enacted before the election and we will be stuck with the Elections Act we now have.

I am bringing the bill forward in that spirit, and hope for co-operation on all sides.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-214, an act to amend the Criminal Code (human being).

He said: Madam Speaker, this is a bill which is identical to a bill I introduced in the last session. I regret that I have to do it again, because it is an awful lot of paperwork for nothing.

We could have, perhaps, taken the suggestion of my colleague the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River and simply reprinted these matters.

However, this bill is an attempt to come to grips with the very difficult question of the personhood of the unborn child. It adds in the Criminal Code of Canada a definition of human being which would thereby extend personhood to the unborn child and give it the same protection and rights that we all have in Canada, the primary one being the right to life.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

• (1220)

NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–215, an act to amend the Narcotic Control Act.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is a very short bill. Its purpose is to amend section 16 of the Narcotic Control Act and it is very specific. The idea is that when the police forces of any particular jurisdiction seize the ill–gotten gains of drug dealing, specifically cash money, after due process of law that money will not go in to the Consolidated Revenue Fund; rather, the money will be sent back to that police force, dollar for dollar, to fight drug–related activities in the municipality where the cash was seized.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING ACT

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–216, an act to amend the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act (nutritional value of food).

He said: Madam Speaker, again this is a bill that was before the House previously and I am bringing it forward again. I hope the government will see some merit in this bill particularly. It is an attempt to provide for legislation to ensure that the nutritional value of all packaged foods is stated on the package. Included would be certain vitamins and minerals, the carbohydrate content, the fat content and the caloric content of each individual portion.

Most members will know that many foods have some of this information on the package, but it is completely voluntary. This bill would require that it be compulsory for all packaged foods in Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I wonder if I may have the consent of the House to revert to the tabling of committee reports, concerning Private Members' Business.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of the House for the hon. parliamentary secretary to present his report?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consent has not been given.

PETITIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, my petition today includes signatures from various parts of my constituency regarding the proposed cutbacks to RCMP funding coming from Blue River, Avola, Little Fort, Barrière, Clearwater, Blackpool, Birch Island, Vavenby, Monte Creek, Monte Lake, Darfield, Chase, Westwold, Pritchard, Logan Lake, Savona, Deadman's Creek, Kamloops, Pinantan, Paul Lake, Cherry Creek, and Kamloops Indian Reserve, as well as rural areas, and neighbourhoods and communities within the city of Kamloops. The petitions ask the government to restore proper funding to the RCMP.

Now it has been done. On behalf of all of these literally thousands of petitioners, I want to say thank you to the minister responsible for the RCMP for listening to these people and restoring funding, at least for the next year, so that a contract can be negotiated that is fair to the provinces, municipalities, and rural areas, as well as to the Government of Canada.

Again, I think it demonstrates clearly that petitions can be very effective from time to time.

TAXATION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to introduce a petition to the House today signed by residents from Prince George, Robson Valley, Vanderhoof, Burns Lake, Fort St. James and the Houston area of my riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

It is an important petition because it calls upon Parliament to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a petition of well over 5,000 signatures by my constituents of Scarborough—Agincourt calling on the government to present fast changes to the Young Offenders Act, because they feel that the need to protect society is far more important than the need to protect the young offender.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

AGRI-FOOD POLICY REVIEW

Question No. 21—Mr. Althouse:

For the year 1990, did the Consumers' Association of Canada receive funding from Agriculture Canada to take part in the agri-food policy review and, if so, (a) how much money did the Association receive (b) how was the money disbursed (c) what was the amount allocated for each task force that the Association participated in (d) was any money used to fund the study entitled "The Reform of the Canadian Supply Management System of Agricultural Commodities", and, if so, did the Department request the study from the Association?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): (a) During 1990, the Consumers' Association of Canada received funding from Agriculture Canada to take part in the agri-food policy review, in the form of two contracts: December 1, 1989 to March 31, 1990 for $40,000.00 and April 1, 1990 to November 6, 1990 for $80,000.00.

(b) The money was disbursed to the Consumers' Association of Canada directly for work completed on the basis of the requirements of the contracts. In the first instance, it was through four payments of $10,000.00 each to cover costs of participants in the Dairy, Poultry and Competitiveness Task Forces and for Secretariat support. In the second instance, there were payments of $35,000.00 on September 17, 1990 and of $45,000.00 on November 6, 1990 to cover costs of ongoing participation in the Task Forces and of Secretariat support and costs of preparing a report on a new generation of supply management.

(c) There is no breakdown available in regard to the amount allocated for each task force in which the Association participated. However, payments were made against agreed overall estimates of costs for participation and support to the Dairy, Poultry and Competitiveness Task Forces and the Supply Management study in order to ensure the Department's arms-length relationship with the Association.

(d) The Consumers' Association of Canada study "The Reform of the Canadian Supply Management System of Agricultural Commodities" was financed in part by the second contract as indicated above. The specific deliverables included consultation by the Association's team with agri-economic experts and other stakeholders, the organization of regional workshops and preparing their report and analysis.

The Department responded with financial support to the Association's request.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, in the last Parliament I had questions on the Order Paper from February 26 for 77 days until the House prorogued. These were starred questions and should have been answered in 45 days. I have now resubmitted these questions and they are now 63 to 67 again on the Order Paper.

I have a couple of questions to the government as to why it is not answering written questions expeditiously and why these could not be dealt with immediately, seeing they have already been on the Order Paper and expired once for 45 days.

Why did the government, if it saw fit to roll over its own legislation to this House, not do the same thing with written questions on the Order Paper?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I will take the hon. member's intervention as a representation and see what I can do for him.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S. O. 31—CANADA POST

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pickard (p. 863).

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I hope I still have the opportunity to question the minister on this issue.

In the minister's comments he consistently said that any increases Canada Post had were particularly within the rate of inflation. If my memory serves me correctly, from last year to this year we went from a 39-cent stamp to a 40-cent stamp and then the GST put us up to a 43-cent stamp. Therefore, the cost for purchasing a stamp to mail an everyday letter in this country has gone from 39 cents to 43 cents within one year which is an increase of 10.25 per cent.

If my mathematics is correct, that is well beyond the rate of inflation within that same period of time. I do not know how the minister can stand in this House and say that any increases by Canada Post have been certainly within the rate of inflation, because, in my estimation, this is not correct.

I would like the minister to respond, please.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, again, what I think the hon. member and all hon. members should do when they are using numbers is to apply the appropriate numbers to the appropriate places and in the appropriate comparisons.

If I were to follow the logic of the hon. member to every increase in the cost of any product in this country we should add the GST. Obviously, if that logic is "logical", we come up with a bigger increase.

On the other hand, we are talking about increases imposed by Canada Post. If the hon. member looks at increases imposed by Canada Post, it is not 39 cents to 43 cents, but Canada Post administers the GST, which is a tax applicable to all products and services including the services given by Canada Post and any other competitor to Canada Post in the country.

• (1230)

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether he would care to provide some clarification in connection with a number of myths that are doing the rounds about Canada Post's services. They say that residents in rural areas are thoroughly dissatisfied with mail services. It is a myth that people do not like the kind of service being offered by Canada Post in rural areas. The second myth is that Canada Post is getting out of rural areas and that people doubt services will still be offered in small communities. However, as far as I know, the people in my riding who live in small rural communities are still getting their mail, so perhaps this is one myth the minister could debunk.

Finally, Madam Speaker, could the minister comment on the notion that Canada Post is destroying the economy and the social fabric of small towns and villages across Canada?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, although opposition members have repeatedly tried to make Canadians believe that people in rural areas are dissatisfied, their attempts have obviously been unsuccessful, since after consultation with people in rural areas the statistics clearly show the vast majority of rural residents are satisfied with the service offered by Canada Post and with the changes and improvements made in rural areas in recent years.

As for Canada Post withdrawing from rural areas, Madam Speaker, it is not; except perhaps in the minds of certain opposition members. Of course, changes are being made, positive changes, which have in fact improved services in those areas. As for destroying the social fabric, I think the hon. member was correct in calling this a myth. It is another myth created by opposition members, because there has been no withdrawal of service. The service is better, and postal communications are continuing. So there has been no destruction of the social fabric in rural areas as a result of the service offered by Canada Post.

That this House call upon the government to institute policies that would require that service to Canadians be a priority of Canada Post.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a very short question, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the minister has suggested, in his answer to the last question, that in fact local communities affected by the shutdowns which have taken place have supported it.

I just want to indicate that in my constituency there is a new town being formed this very weekend by the name of LaSalle. They have written to the person responsible for the post office saying: "Happy Birthday, LaSalle. By the way, we are closing your post office. Yours truly, the federal government". They go on to say precisely what damage this is going to mean for LaSalle and its hopes to be able to develop itself as a good, small town serving its areas.

I want to ask the minister if he is prepared and if this government is prepared to put into effect a mechanism for consultation with local communities like LaSalle.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am glad the hon. member understood when I said I would recognize him on a short question. The time has expired. I will allow he minister a minute to comment.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, first of all, I am not personally aware of the specifics of the case with respect to this new town of LaSalle, not that I doubt that my hon. colleague would quote accurately. If he would provide me with a copy of that letter which allegedly was sent by Canada Post, I presume, and not the Government of Canada, I am sure the department or the minister will get back to him with the facts and appropriate responses.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today and speak on this motion, a motion presented on an opposition day in reply to the motion of supply.

The motion on the table today reads very simply:

I have been the post office critic for the federal New Democratic Party for quite some time. Earlier this year I sadly turned it over to the member for Churchill, who is now serving as the federal New Democrat Party's post office critic. I am now serving in environmental areas, areas I am also very concerned about.

On behalf of the member for Churchill and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, I want to say a few words about Canada Post, the service coming from Canada Post and the motion before us today.

I believe this is a very appropriate motion with very appropriate timing. It is a time when Canada Post is actively engaged in closing rural post offices. Canada Post has been acting over time in the way it deals with post offices; it started to close post offices in 1986 and just prior to the federal election in 1988, it slowed down; and then stopped closing post offices.

Shortly after the election in 1988, after the people had returned members of the government to their seats, post offices began to close again. Now we are seeing an escalation during the summer, the summer before what should be a year prior to a federal election.

In 1986, Canada Post came out with a plan which indicated that all rural post offices in Canada would eventually be closed, probably by the year 1996. Here we are engaged in a furtherance of that plan. We are seeing that the plan Canada Post talked about in 1986 is coming to fruition.

One of the hon. members just a few moments ago talked about the myth of commitments to rural Canada. We know that since 1986, 1,028 rural post offices have been closed or privatized and out of those 3,000 full or part-time jobs have been lost. Three thousand full or part-time jobs have been ripped out of the heart of rural Canada, jobs which have served those communities very well and which quite often have provided income for people who were engaged in helping with the church, the school and the business community in many forms other than just simply selling stamps to members of that community.

The motion is very appropriate because these closings are continuing. This year they have been stepped up. In Canada this year, I believe, there are close to 250 post offices under attack and scheduled for closure, 24 of which are in my own province and four in my own riding.

I have just returned from Saskatchewan where I have already met with Canada Post in the communities of Canwood and Marsden. Next week, during which Parliament is sitting, Canada Post will be visiting the community of Edam to tell it that its post office will be closed. I mentioned that there were four in my riding. The other community is Gallivan, Saskatchewan. Its meeting with Canada Post has also concluded.

• (1240)

Canada Post's closing of these post offices in the three month period—the announcements were made at the end of March—of April, May and June has been greater than it has been for any equivalent period of time since 1986, when the Prime Minister and the cabinet approved the policy of Canada Post which allows for the closings to take place.

I want to quote briefly from Cynthia Patterson who is Rural Dignity's national co-ordinator. Cynthia Patterson has been working diligently on behalf of rural Canadians for many years. In my mind, she is doing a very admirable job.

Rural Dignity and Cynthia Patterson have to be congratulated for the work they have been doing.

Cynthia Patterson says: "Rural Canada's back is up against the wall with Canada Post at this time. We cannot afford to lose our post offices. The federal policy attacks the rural infrastructure, rural service and rural jobs. The Prime Minister promised in 1984 to support small towns with big dreams, but what he has done is make us small towns with big nightmares."

Very appropriate. As I said, I have just returned from my constituency where these community meetings proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that the members of those communities are experiencing the nightmare of having their post office taken from their midst.

The mandate of Canada Post is indeed one of service. That this motion addresses service is most appropriate. When the Canada Post Corporation was created, the mandate that Parliament gave to Canada Post was very simple and very clear.

I want to just state for the record, one more time, so the government understands the mandate and what the Canada Post Act says about the mandate. Section 5(2) of the Canada Post Act reads:

> (2) While maintaining basic customary postal service, the Corporation, in carrying out its objects, shall have regard to
> (a) the desirability of improving and extending its products and services in the light of the developments in the field of communications;
> (b) the need to conduct its operations on a self-sustaining financial basis while providing a standard of service that will meet the needs of the people of Canada and that is similar with respect to communities of the same size;
> (c) The need to conduct its operations in such manner as will best provide for the security of the mail;
> (d) the desirability of utilizing the human resources of the Corporation in a manner that will both attain the objects of the Corporation and ensure the leave as is commitment and dedication of its employees to the attainment of these objects; and
> (e) the need to maintain a corporate identity program approved by the Governor in Council that reflects the role of the Corporation as an institution of the Government of Canada.

Every single one of those clauses indicates the desire of Parliament in 1981 to ensure that Canada Post was delivering a service to the people of Canada, doing it in such a way that its employees felt a part of that needed service to the Canadian population, and ensured that the corporation knew that it was meeting the needs of the people of Canada and not the needs of its corporate structure.

What has happened since 1981 when this act was passed by Parliament is that a government changed. We have now a corporation that is attempting to meet the financial needs of the corporation rather than the needs of the people it is serving.

I am very committed to the needs of all Canadians and particularly to the needs of rural Canadians when it comes to getting the postal service they deserve.

One point in that regard—I want to make it very clear—is that I want the people of Canada, those who are reading the Hansard of today's debate and those who are watching on their television screens today, to rest assured that when this government changes so will this policy against Canada Post services.

No longer will rural or small communities have to pay the price of this corporation's profits. Rest assured that when this government changes, so will this policy. I am committed to that from now through until this party forms the government and has to adopt the policies that we know will work in rural Canada.

When the Corporation Act was established in 1981, the second thing in the mandate was self-sustainability. The first element of the mandate was service, but the second was self-sustainability. We on this side of the House agreed that self-sustainability was a goal that we should be working toward within Canada Post and we proposed many different ways of dealing with it, ways in which the government and the corporation could utilize the creative ability to increase revenues and not decrease expenses, which could only come at the expense of service and the people of Canada.

The government has ignored all requests and flexibility within the network to help increase the revenues for Canada Post except when it comes at the expense of employees, people of rural Canada and the services that are provided to the Canadian population.

We must know Canada Post went beyond self-sustainability and has run into the realm of profits: two years ago, $96 million; last year, $143 million; and well on its way to its goal of a $250 million profit this year, about 60 per cent of which is supposed to be earmarked to return to the federal government. We have gone from the point whereby the users of Canada Post were being subsidized by the taxpayer to a point where the taxpayer is now subsidizing the government through Canada Post.

The corporation has taken self-sustainability to new limits and it is astounding to hear members opposite stand over there and talk about how good all of this is for Canada in general. We might note that the way in which Canada Post describes self-sufficiency is that there must be a 14 per cent return on its investment. Canada Post will not feel that it is self-sufficient until it has a 14 per cent return.

In my mind, in a government agency self-sufficiency means you do not cost the taxpayer any money and you do not take any money from the taxpayer for other purposes. Self-sustainability is a very simple concept: you simply break even on operations. Canada Post is quite able to become self-sufficient without closing a single post office in Canada.

A couple of years ago the government recognized that the Canadian population was quite concerned about the operations of Canada Post, and in trying to meet the needs of the Canadian population it set up a committee, something called the Postal Services Review Committee. It staffed the committee and provided it with about $1 million in funds to travel around the country and listen to the concerns of people and to report back on what was happening within Canada Post. The report in November 1989 was particularly interesting. I will quote from the recommendations to the Canada Post Corporation from the Postal Services Review Committee and I think it will enlighten all members of this House, particularly government members on this issue: "The committee is deeply concerned that these changes," talking about rural post office closures, "which have reduced the level of service for some rural residences continue to be implemented. Canada Post has acknowledged that the savings to date from all 319 rural conversions," and it is almost three times that number now, "have not been material. "The corporation could, therefore, readily modify its planned activities without adverse impact on its goal of self-sustainability." In other words, according to the Postal Services Review Committee, Canada Post could become self-sustaining without the closure of one rural post office in Canada.

The report's conclusion is that: "The corporation's commitment to the objective of financial self-sufficiency and what appears to have been the corporation's concentration on improved service to large volume mailers has and continues to cause service reductions primarily affecting households and small businesses. There is room for eliminating service inequities and for improving service without putting undue strain on the corporation's financial requirements."

The group of people that this government hired to look at Canada Post operations says that this can be done without closing rural post offices and, more importantly, that what is being done is cutting services to the people who rely on the post office.

How did the government respond to this report which was tabled in the House of Commons and debated here both on the floor of the House and in committee? The government fired the committee and refused to give them any more funds to continue the work of investigating Canada Post operations. By firing the committee, it put back the entire evaluation of Canada Post operations on to the corporation itself.

Now we see the corporation hiring public relations firms and polling organizations to give us statistics which tell us that Canadians are happy with the service.

The government's own committee found out that Canadians are not happy with the service. We, who come from rural Canada, know that the people are not happy with the service that is being provided by Canada Post in any of this conversion closing or privatization policy and practice that is taking place out there.

In the meantime, what is Canada Post doing while it is closing operations and putting 3,000 rural Canadians out of work? We find out that Canada Post has just spent money to ensure that Canada Post Corporation has a box at Skydome so it can entertain its business clients while watching the Blue Jays play baseball.

The minister responsible for Canada Post in this House on May 24, just a couple of days ago, supported Canada Post's decision to buy a box at Skydome by saying that from time to time the corporation has to entertain its business clients. In the meantime, I have got a postmaster who has put in 14 years of service, has never been declared a full-time postmaster, has served her community for the last three years, and is being put out of work so that Canada Post's corporate management can entertain business clients at a ball game in Toronto. It is just a shocking indication of how much time, money and thought the government spends on the large corporate structure in this country while ignoring the needs, wishes and will of the ordinary Canadian people, the people who live in, enjoy living in and want the quality of life provided by rural communities. It is something that I am not going to forget for a long time.

I also want to indicate one thing in terms of service that I alluded to earlier in a question to the minister who was responding so well for the public relations department of Canada Post. When the minister talked about the corporation providing new service qualities for mail delivery, he talked about the colour coding delivery requirements so that you can put priority on mail. Even in my own community, a small community, the boxes arrive at Canada Post from sorting depots in some other part of Canada marked with a red tag for Monday, a yellow tag for Tuesday, a green tag for Wednesday. Those are boxes of mail that are supposed to be delivered on those particular days based on Canada Post's new schedule of efficiencies.

Sometimes the mail arrives in North Battleford with a purple tag on a Monday. Purple tagged mail is not supposed to be delivered until Wednesday so the letter carriers are told: "Don't touch that box of mail, leave it until Wednesday", even though he has only got half a bag to deliver, a half-empty bag. He could take that purple box, sort it into his bag and deliver it on Monday. But no, Canada Post corporate efficiency structure requires him to keep that mail on the side of his sorting table until Wednesday when he can pick it up, take it out and deliver it. I know that there is some first class mail in those boxes that is being held for days.

The general public doesn't know that. When the general public gets its mail it says; well, today was the day I was supposed to get my mail because the letter carrier delivered it today. But, in fact, the mail the letter carrier should have got today may not be arriving until tomorrow, because that is the way Canada Post operates its new efficiencies and proclaims so well that everything is going fine and dandy, it is meeting its schedules—schedules that it has established.

The one other point is that Canada Post changed its schedule of delivery in rural Canada, whereby the postmaster was in the past required to ensure that the mail was sorted to rural boxes within an hour and a half of the truck arriving. The truck arrives now and the postmaster is not required to put the mail in the box within any period of time. It used to be, before they cut the subsidy and the Western Producer had to be reduced in size and lay off some of its people, the farm publication used to arrive like clockwork on Thursday mornings in every one of these rural communities. Now, some of these communities don't get their Western Producer until—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. Questions or comments, the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague on outlining the deficiencies and anomalies of both Canada Post and its operations.

I am glad that he is concentrating on the rural area. From the point of view of someone from a city, I just wanted to draw to his attention the fact that Canada Post is at least as negligent and at least as shoddy in its operations on the urban side.

For example, the Armour Heights area in the riding of Eglinton—Lawrence used to have a post office that had been at that location for 20 years and served an elderly population that is growing in numbers. They have moved that post office from a pharmacy, previously Leonard's Pharmacy, down the street a kilometre and a half to an area that has no parking, no accessibility. It just staggers the imagination that instead of making the service much more accessible to the clients, we are moving it into an area where it is less accessible, less efficient, causing further aggravation and strain to the people who depend on it.

In addition to that—and I know my hon. colleague will agree with me—what we are doing as well is putting two people out of work. At the same time we are ignoring the fact that 1,100 people have signed a petition asking the post office to review the reasons that led to this kind of decision. Just imagine the kind of operations and the kind of management techniques that are being applied in Canada Post.

While rural Canada is a very important component in the importance of the post office to the economy, those of us in the cities—and I would ask the hon. member to make a quick comment or an observation— are being given short shrift as well on post office matters.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his question.

There are probably two to three hours worth of observations that any member of the opposition could put on the record concerning Canada Post's deficiencies in service and quality. Certainly I was not ignoring the urban side in my remarks, there is simply not enough time allocated to any one member to deal with the inequalities that exist.

In my former capacity as the postal critic for my party, I did travel extensively in Canada and visit quite a number of urban postal stations and discuss urban postal needs as well.

The member is absolutely correct in his description of the way in which Canada Post is operating in urban Canada. I can give a couple of examples from my travels, one of which is just down the street here in the centretown area of Ottawa. Over the last four years the Canada Post retail outlet has existed in three different locations. If you happen to live in the centretown area of Ottawa, you do not know where to get your mail any more because the post office has moved from one location to another, as each retail postal outlet operator has found that the contract they were provided by Canada Post has not met their personal needs and, therefore, have given up on the contract.

This is also one of the major concerns that we have in rural Canada, that when a post office is established in a rural community in a retail outlet, when the retail outlet closes or ceases to exist or the owner retires, there is no place left for the post office to go and the community loses its post office.

The one other thing I wanted to talk about on the urban side was quite simply the inequalities that exist when new developments are brought on stream. In Halifax, for example, where they have built a new subdivision in one part of the city, the letter carrier will deliver the mail on one block. He or she will not deliver mail for the next block and begin delivering again in the subsequent block. It is quite simply because the block in the middle has been considered a new subdivision in downtown Halifax. It is a most discouraging situation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a question or a comment. I am afraid that will be the only one I will be able to entertain.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rose because I had a particular problem in my own riding that the hon. member may be familiar with and perhaps he would care to comment on it.

There are two rural post offices located fairly close to one another. One is still a post office and the other is now a retail outlet, because a few years ago Canada Post closed this post office and moved it in to a video store. I understand they now sell postal supplies in the video store.

I am told that when the video store orders new supplies from Canada Post, the delivery time is approximately one week. When the post office a few miles down the road orders similar supplies, the delivery time is three to four weeks.

It appears to me that what Canada Post is trying to do is to lower the level of service in the post office so that they will be able to stand and say: "Well, the post office is losing business. Nobody goes there. Everyone is going to the new retail store because it is so wonderful and convenient". Of course, everyone knows that is claptrap.

I wonder if the member who has just spoken, who has had some considerable experience as critic in this area, could say whether this kind of practice on the part of Canada Post is, in fact, commonplace. Are the actions of Canada Post designed to make the figures that the minister responsible cites with such glee and enthusiasm in this House, saying how wonderful things are at Canada Post, if those figures are not cooked by the kind of policies the post office is pursuing in denigrating service in rural post offices and trying to force customers to use their new retail operations contained in stores, which obviously are not providing the same service to customers of the post office?

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, to my colleague from Kingston and the Islands I want to say thank you again for pointing out a very important part of this Canada Post debate.

The hon. member from Kingston and the Islands is absolutely correct. It is not just a problem that affects his constituency, but is one that has been brought to my attention from communities across Canada. In particular, it has been voiced in my own constituency, where we also have retail postal outlets operating near rural postal stations.

Before I forget, Canada Post likes the term RPO, retail postal outlets. But for us, the only RPO that we want is the rural post office. That to us is the real RPO we have to be working with.

But to get back to the point that the member for Kingston and the Islands raised, I know of many situations where the retail postal outlet receives supplies weeks in advance of the rural post offices. In fact, rural postmasters have had to borrow from each other in order to get enough stamps, money orders, priority post envelopes, to have enough security mail envelopes, and the paper required to keep notes on the registered mail, the security mail going out.

In fact, several of the postmasters in my own constituency have even resorted to the practice of buying their own staples, their own pens, their own paper, because they simply cannot get it from Canada Post in time for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on this motion, moved by my colleague from Essex—Kent, that this House call upon the government to institute policies that would require that service to Canadians be the priority for Canada Post.

We are at a point now where Canadians are wondering just how far this government will permit Canada Post Corporation to go before it steps in, if at all, to restore full national postal service for the people. We have been witnessing the disintegration of postal service throughout the country. Rural and urban residents are realizing that the Canada Post of the future will not reflect its past motto of service to the people. Instead, it has taken up a bottom line corporate mentality. This policy has been particularly hard on rural communities across Canada.

Over the last month I have been involved with the people of Avonmore, which is in my riding, who have been fighting to keep their post office open. Canada Post has indicated on June 27 that Avonmore will join the hundreds of other rural communities across Canada without a post office. In fact Canada Post has made no secret of its plans to eliminate over 5,200 post offices in rural Canada by 1996.

In many cases this means that the only federal presence in these communities will be removed; the Canadian coat of arms will be taken off the wall, the flag pulled down and the building sold. At a time when Canadians are wondering about the future of Canada, it is truly amazing that the government is content to sit back and allow Canada Post to close up shop in rural Canada. What is particularly unacceptable is that the people living in these communities do not have any say in the matter. They cannot veto a decision by the corporation to close a post office. In April 1987, the second report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations recommended to the government that: "No closure of a post office or change in postal service be undertaken without meaningful consultation and the consent of the community affected". Obviously the government and Canada Post did not think much of this recommendation.

In the case of Avonmore, Canada Post sent a letter to the residents informing them in no uncertain terms that a traditional post office would not be maintained in Avonmore after June 27. It invited the people to attend a meeting with Canada Post and the community to discuss total service for Avonmore after the closure.

At this meeting the people were bluntly informed that their post office was going and there was nothing they could do to reverse the decision. The so-called 90-day consultation period with the community is a joke. How can you have reasonable consultation if one party is told what is going to happen and you must accept it? This is not constructive dialogue. This is dictatorship. The people of Avonmore left their meeting angry, upset, and naturally resolved to fight this closure every step of the way.

I have received numerous letters from the people of Avonmore on their meeting with Canada Post. Each one clearly outlines the disgust felt at the manner in which Canada Post conducted the meeting and their frustration and helplessness over the lack of participation in the decision to close their post office.

One of my constituents in Avonmore wrote me asking how in the world did these people get so much power. She went on to say: "I can appeal the decision of a judge. I can appeal the decision of Revenue Canada taxation, but Canada Post can tell me that is just how it is as they devastate my small community and I cannot appeal the decision taken by people who clearly know nothing at all about rural communities".

The people of Avonmore are steadfast in their resolve to save their post office because after it closes there will be no retail postal outlet to provide postal services to the community. There will be no conversion in Avonmore, just straightforward elimination. There is only a limited number of businesses in the community and no one wants to operate an RPO.

• (1310)

As a result, Canada Post has indicated that it will install mailboxes somewhere in Avonmore. However, to buy a stamp or register a letter, residents will have to travel 24 kilometres to the nearest available post office. Imagine, 24 kilometres to obtain such a basic service as purchasing a stamp.

This is outrageous in a country such as ours. There are a lot of elderly citizens in Avonmore. How are they going to get to the post office in Finch? What happens if they do not have transportation?

Is postal service in Canada going to be available to only those with a car? This is incredible. Rural Canadians are being made second-class citizens by a second-class Canada Post. We should be getting a rebate from Canada Post. It is not improving to meet the challenges of the next century, it is going back to the pony express and the people of rural Canada better own the pony.

Canada Post has promised to provide equal or better service to any community which loses its post office and where an RPO is established. However, the corporation is strangely silent about its promise when an RPO cannot be provided. Canada Post, like the government it represents, likes to brag about how successful and popular its RPOs are. It simply chooses to ignore the many cases across rural Canada where residents have no mail service beyond a mailbox by the side of the road.

In the Postal Services Review Committee's recommendations to Canada Post, in November 1989, the committee stated that some of the corporation's customers have been undeniably disadvantaged by the rural conversion program. The committee stated, and I quote: "There are households in small rural communities where a post office closure has resulted in a requirement for local residents to travel to a neighbourhood community, as much as 58 kilometres distant, in order to obtain counter service".

According to the committee, at the time some 66 communities representing 3,500 households were affected by this form of reduction in postal services.

The committee went on to state that this decline in service was in contravention of Canada Post's commitment to its rural customers. The committee stated that the corporation initiated the rural conversion program, in its own words to, and I quote: "increase in the most cost effective manner access by customers to services". In contrast to this declaration, postal services in 66 rural communities were dramatically reduced. This is not good enough.

The damage being inflicted on rural Canadians by Canada Post has not abated since 1989. Right now the residents of Mabou, Nova Scotia, are fighting alongside Avonmore and other communities to keep their post office open, thereby maintaining at the same time the single most important federal symbol in their community.

Mabou is located in the constituency of my colleague for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. The hon. member cannot be here today for this debate, but I know of his strong commitment to the efforts of his constituents in Mabou who are trying to save their post office.

Last Thursday, the people of Mabou expressed their solidarity with the people of Avonmore who had come to the steps of the House of Commons to protest the impending closure of their post office. It is rather ironic that the callous actions of Canada Post to close both of these post offices has forged a common bond between people in rural Nova Scotia and people hundreds of miles away in rural Ontario.

This is the unity Canada needs now. I am only sorry for the circumstances in which this friendship and common cause has been created. Why then has Canada Post refused to keep these post offices open?

One can only conclude that it is afraid it would set a precedent and the whole master plan of rural conversion would be ruined. If this were to occur, it would be difficult for the government to sell Canada Post to private interests. Like Air Canada and Petro-Canada, the government is trying to mould Canada Post into top financial health so it can sell it.

The government does not care about people. It does not care about rural Canada and it does not care about how it implements the master plan, as long as it is successful. Canada Post and the government should review its policy on the future of the corporation and its privatization.

I believe most Canadians would firmly support the comments made by Professors Brian Osborne and Robert Pike in the December 1990 issue of Policy Options. They adequately summarized the serious problem the privatization of Canada Post would create for Canada and our postal system. The professors stated, and I quote: "to delegate postal services to private sector actors—without any central control and direction—is to pose a major threat to the underpinnings of social and regional integration which are, after all, the foundation of a modern nation state".

To many rural Canadians, it will always be the quality of mail service they receive which will be the most primary concern. An RPO will not provide the mail with the priority that a post office does. The argument that RPOs are opened longer than post offices and, therefore, people are receiving better service just does not satisfy rural residents.

They are, however, concerned about the security of their mail. They are concerned about the dismissal of acting postmasters and postmistresses and the part-time staff of a post office and the lost jobs in rural regions that are already economically depressed. As well, the symbolic loss of a post office reinforces the alienation rural residents feel for a cold and distant federal government, a government which is ignoring rural Canada.

Finally, what of those 66 communities which had their postal services clearly downgraded when their post offices were closed, as a result of not being able or willing to provide an RPO. Canada Post is punishing them by still going ahead and closing their post offices. The traditional post offices in all these communities should be restored.

Even the postal review committee said that such a move would "not impinge negatively on the corporation's goal of financial self-sufficiency."

The people of Cornwall are also concerned about the fate of their own post office. The main post office is located in a building that requires considerable repairs. Rather than allocate the funds to fix it up, the Department of Public Works has declared the building surplus. As it appears Canada Post will have to vacate the building, a number of my constituents believe that the corporation will use this occasion to close down this post office. To do this would have a serious negative impact on the city of Cornwall and it will also eliminate several jobs.

Cornwall wants its post office and the postal employees want to stay at work in their own community.

I trust the minister responsible for Canada Post, the corporation and Public Works Canada will endeavour to provide a similar postal facility to that currently in Cornwall located in the downtown area.

Canada Post and the government have embarked on a carefully staged selling scheme which glosses over the flaws in the rural conversion program. The corporation and the minister responsible for Canada Post never miss an opportunity to sing the praises of RPOs and how its surveys show a 90 per cent approval rating from customers who have an RPO established in their community. I doubt the value of these surveys.

Canada Post refuses to divulge the questions on the surveys. In addition, how can we give credibility to surveys which ask postal customers questions when the customers are actually in or near the RPO? Not very many people in rural Canada will bad mouth their neighbourhood storekeeper, whom they have known for years, in front of a Canada Post pollster.

One thing I can definitely say about the results of these surveys is that the 90 per cent approval figure would be somewhat lower, I might add drastically lower, if the survey was conducted in Mabou or Avonmore.

I urge the government to take the initiative and put a stop to the rural conversion program and re-evaluate the direction it has set for Canada Post. The corporation does not need to be sold off and the people of Avonmore, Mabou and all of rural Canada do not want to be sold out.

In conclusion, I join with my colleagues in the Liberal Party in calling upon the government to support our motion that the government institute policies requiring that service to Canadians be the priority for Canada Post.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the member who just spoke. I think postal service to communities in Canada is very bad right now.

I would like to point out to the member that I made a statement in 1986 requesting a new postal station in Calgary Northeast. After a long study, which cost the postal service a lot of money, a service was established in the Marlboro shopping centre. At that time, I had received a letter from Mr. Lander, President and Chief Executive Officer of Canada Post, dated April 17, 1986. He said: "I am unable to give you a positive undertaking at this time. However, you will be interested to know that the Canada Post Corporation has contracted with Thorne, Stevenson and Kellogg to undertake a study of the postal network of the city of Calgary."

• (1320)

I have here that study. The study recommended that a postal station be established in Calgary Northeast in the Marlborough shopping centre. My constituents have written a petition and in answer to this petition, it was stated, and I quote: "As well, Canada Post is committed to opening 19 new direction outlets across the country as part of an experiment to improve customer access to retail postal service and to improve the quality of in-store service."

A site was chosen and an outlet was established in the Marlborough mall. This happened and everybody was quite happy. They spent $1 million to establish it.

Now they are closing it down and putting it again in a private store that cannot service that area. I would like the hon. member to comment on that.

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member from Calgary Northeast for his comment and question.

I think it just reminds us, once again, that the government is not listening to the people. Whether it is in rural or urban Canada, Canada Post is delivering a second-class service and making citizens second-class citizens. In communities like Mabou and Avonmore, we are not talking about a conversion, we are talking about the total elimination of a post office.

In urban centres such as Calgary, and other large centres across the country, some housing developments have door-to-door delivery, others have supermailboxes. There is just no consistency. There is no equity of service across the country.

I should have taken the time to add a few other comments with respect to the Avonmore post office. It sits physically at the centre of the village and, as such, has always been the focal point of the entire community. Now we are going to take the flag down. Not only that, the cenotaph is located on the same physical land as the post office in Avonmore. Now they are going to be asked to remove the cenotaph and put it elsewhere. I think it is a total disrespect to Canadian veterans who have served their country.

Last week we had the visit of 60 residents of Avonmore who presented me with over 700 names on petitions on a day they designated as "Avonmore's Drive for Dignity."

I hope the government, through the corporation, will re-evaluate its position.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I want to share with my colleague from Stormont—Dundas something that is very particular to my riding, a city riding in Scarborough.

The post office in my riding did a study and it wanted to take away something like 15 boxes. It did not notify the residents of the area. All of a sudden, one morning, those boxes vanished. These were boxes from in front of seniors' buildings, boxes from areas where the seniors cannot walk more than two blocks to deposit their mail. You know, Mr. Speaker—because I know you are reaching that golden age—it is very important for grandparents to communicate with their children and grandchildren. If they do not have the opportunity to go and deposit their letter in the mailbox, they lose that.

I presented to the corporation a petition of 400 signatures from the area in my riding of Pharmacy and Huntingwood asking it to bring back a very important mailbox.

My question is as follows. Does my colleague from Stormont—Dundas also realize that we in the city also face the same dilemma with the corporation and it is about time that the government stands up, the minister responsible for the corporation, and listens to the people of Canada? They are fed up with being second-rate citizens. They want the post office the way they used to know it.

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my colleague from Scarborough—Agincourt. I certainly want to detach myself from his introductory remarks. You look fine in your middle-age, sir.

I think the point should be made very briefly. I would say that profits are put ahead of people. These notices go out to every community and their citizens when finally Canada Post is going to take action. Here is the last paragraph, "We look forward to meeting and working with you on the changes to be made to your postal service". I wish they would start working with them and listening to them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Karygiannis: A point of Order, Mr. Speaker.

I just want to clarify very much that I hold you in great esteem and in great honour. I want to say, sir, that you are a fine individual and a good grandfather.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Well, I did not cut the hon. member off just because of his statement. His time did expire. Thank you very much for the comment.

The hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona and the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte will be splitting their time, 10 minutes each.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today on this motion.

Canada Post has come a long way since the days of the traditional post office. It has had to adapt to new methods of providing services in order to respond to the evolving needs of its customers. In other words, Canada Post has had to change, as Canada has changed, and the members opposite refuse to recognize that.

In order to meet these changing needs and expectations, Canada Post has worked hard to improve the reliability and accessibility of postal services in Canada, particularly as they have related to rural customers in rural areas. In fact, there are 4,000 more outlets today than there were when Canada Post became a corporation. Four thousand more outlets out there to serve Canadians.

It has had to manage the operations of its services in the most cost-effective way and the services must be managed effectively. At the same time, the corporation has the responsibility of eliminating postal deficits that have burdened the Canadian taxpayer in the past.

As you know, 10 years ago, all three federal parties agreed with the legislation to change government policy and make Canada Post into a postal corporation. There were a number of reasons for this.

Canada Post had been faced with a great number of debilitating strikes that had resulted in Canadians being denied postal services for periods of over 40 days, and there were many of these strikes.

The reputation for service and reliability had gone out the window. It had been lost. A department that had once achieved surpluses on a regular basis, was reaching annual deficits of more than $600 million. Some of these were threatening to reach $1 billion. A $1 billion deficit. Outrageous.

There was a new management team put in place and it began to operate the Canada Post Corporation on a model of efficiency and service to Canadians. It improved reliability, accessibility and affordability. Canada Post has met all of these services.

Uniform standards, systems and procedures were introduced to ensure that Canada Post operated as a fully integrated distribution system. It delivers an average of 34 million pieces of mail every day to almost 11 million addresses coast to coast. That is an enormous amount of mail it moves to a great number of addresses in a very short time.

It has established a national control centre which is linked by computer to airlines and trucking companies that carry the mail. It is also linked to the plants that process the mail.

• (1330)

This centre monitors the movement of mail 24 hours a day, seven days a week, so that situations that threaten the delivery of mail can be dealt with immediately. Because of this, the reliability of Canada Post has been much improved.

Canada Post also measures its performance. Ernst and Young sends 50,000 pieces of properly addressed mail through the system four times a year and publishes the results.

Today these reports show that Canada Post's on-time delivery performance is almost 97 per cent, compared with an average of below 85 per cent when monitoring began in the fall of 1987. In fact, other countries and other postal systems have emulated this model which Canada Post put in place.

Canada Post is working to make it more convenient for people to buy their products and access their services, whether they live in cities or in rural Canada. With the largest retail network in Canada, larger than all the banks and all the financial institutions together, in order to meet the needs of Canadians, they are making it even larger.

However, Canada Post must do this in a cost-effective manner in order to achieve the objective of affordability. If costs are high, then these costs are passed on to post office customers.

Canada Post is readjusting its retail network in urban Canada to ensure that customers have access to postal products and services at times and locations which reflect the changing shopping patterns of the majority of Canadians.

I would like to give you an example of what has happened in my own constituency of Edmonton—Strathcona. Two years ago, a person named Mr. Eugene Baravash took over the Maurice Pharmacy which housed the McKernon postal outlet in my constituency.

Canada Post soon approached him and said: "We would like to turn your post office from a post office outlet into a franchise." Mr. Baravash said: "I cannot do it now. I do not have the money to come up to buy a franchise. I would have to expand the space requirements in my pharmacy and I will not be able to do it."

Canada Post at that time was a little heavy handed. It threatened to close down and take out the postal outlet to put it somewhere else.

I intervened with the post office and I asked the post office to give him a bit of time, to wait a year or two until his cash flow became positive. He had just taken over this store. He had heavy debts and so on.

Canada Post sat down with him and came to an agreement that in a couple of years time they would review this.

Canada Post has now reviewed it and I understand that the Maurice Pharmacy which houses the McKernon postal outlet is on its way to becoming a full-fledged franchise. What this will mean is greater service, greater numbers of hours, and a greater number of services in the post office.

Canada Post, in order to meet its goals, has been sometimes a bit heavy handed in all members' eyes. Over all, Canadians are experiencing greater service, and this is very important.

One thing we have to realize is that, according to inflation, the price of postage stamps is a better deal today than it was before. I would like to give an example and compare basic letter rates of the major OECD countries.

To contrast the cost of a stamp with how long it takes to earn that stamp in minutes of labour: In the United States it takes 1.6 minutes of labour to buy a postage stamp; in Canada, it takes 1.68; in Sweden, 2.02 minutes of labour and so on down to France where it takes 3.09 minutes of labour to buy one postage stamp for an ordinary first class letter. In Italy it is 3.61 cents.

Canada is ahead of Sweden, Australia, the United Kingdom, Japan, West Germany, France and Italy.

Not only that, according to surveys of Canada Post many people are very satisfied with the service. On conversions that occurred between the years 1987 and 1989, there was a 91 per cent over-all satisfaction rate. Of course there has been an adjustment, and sometimes adjustment and change are uncomfortable, but once they have been made Canadians are generally satisfied.

I must commend Canada Post. There are glitches, yes, and there are complaints from time to time, as hon. members have mentioned. However, Canada Post is willing to work with members of Parliament. It is willing to work with Canadians. It is turning a profit now, two years in a row. It is taking this profit and reinvesting it into capital equipment, which is badly needed, and into mechanization. This is good for Canada Post, good for Canadians and good for Canada.

I would just like to close with one other statistic, which is that Canada Post has 97 per cent on-time delivery, 4,000 more outlets and, again, 90 per cent satisfaction. I believe that is very good.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the remarks of the member. I noticed that he of course quoted many statistics and I do not necessarily disagree with some or all of them.

However, I heard another speaker today talk about one of the decisions of Canada Post. I listened very carefully when he talked about the problem that his constituent had and the apparently heavy-handed approach that Canada Post had for this poor gentleman who was struggling in a business, like many people in Canada are struggling in business.

However, we heard another member raise the fact that this same corporation which is heavy-handed—and we all know of instances where it has been heavy-handed—apparently purchased—and I stand to be corrected, beg to be corrected, if I am wrong—a box at the Skydome in Toronto. Those things do not come cheaply.

Does the member know anything about the following? If it is a fact that Canada Post Corporation purchased a box at the Skydome, allegedly for the purpose of entertaining their clients, first of all, does he agree with it? Second, has his constituent been invited by Canada Post to attend a ball game in its skybox?

Mr. Thorkelson: Yes, I believe Canada Post did get involved in renting a skybox. That was raised in the House last week. At least 80 per cent of the mail, and it could be 85 per cent of the mail, delivered by Canada Post is business mail. There is a large volume of business users. Canada Post is like any other corporation that needs to keep good relations with businesses which provide it with the bulk of its mail and the bulk of its revenue. A large amount of this revenue which is obtained from business users is used to offset some of the services it provides to Canadians. I think that is important.

The corporation is involved in several major Canadian sporting and entertainment facilities, including the Toronto Skydome. It purchases tickets to sporting events in other parts of the country, not unlike businesses.

The member also mentioned heavy-handed. The corporation tries as best as it can to negotiate with Canadians and with businesses, and I applaud it for that. Sometimes for their own interests business, outlets or people are resistant to change. Canada Post at some point in time has to make a decision. We all realize that. It is just like in the House of Commons: we debate and we debate and debate, but the day comes when we have to make a decision. Canada Post is not inflexible. It will change its decisions. At the end of the day it must make a decision and it must move forward.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this debate. I welcome the opportunity to do so in response to the opposition day.

I guess some of the mistakes of Canada Post in the past are legend. There is no question that before it was made a Crown corporation by this government, the corporation was running into all kinds of difficulty. In fact when we took office in 1984, we made a commitment to the Canadian people that we were going to take the $500 million deficit and turn it around. Turn it around we did. We have taken that $500 million deficit and turned it into a $150 million profit. I do give the minister of the day responsible for Canada Post some credit for doing that.

The down side of that, and there is always a down side to any cost-cutting measure, is that rural Canada has paid the price for that turnaround. It is almost the story of the city mouse versus the country mouse. If you listen to all of the debate on Canada Post in this House, you will notice that most of the criticism of Canada Post is coming from rural members of Parliament like myself who have numerous communities within their rural ridings. That is where the heart of the problem lies with regard to Canada Post.

I want to give some examples. They are not exaggerations but facts. Drivers who drive their own vehicles to deliver mail to rural parts of my riding and many other ridings in this country are getting paid at a rate far less than the mail delivery service in cities. Where a letter carrier service is provided by Canada Post, the letter carriers have a contract, a fairly strong union, and are actually paid more to deliver mail in town without the cost of an automobile than these poor drivers in rural Canada. This is an example of the absurdity of situations within Canada Post.

Drivers in my riding have delivered the mail for years. In fact I was speaking to one of them yesterday. They have decided they are not going to go after the contract, in other words put a bid in or retain the contract to deliver mail in their particular area, because they can no longer afford to do it. It is as simple as that. They are working for less than minimum wage. It comes down to the absurdity within Canada Post of two different situations, two different unions, no union, one working for less than minimum wage, the other working at a far higher wage with fewer expenses.

It is the same with rural post offices. We have had numerous post office closings and conversions in my riding. Rural post offices were in themselves not totally responsible for that $500 million that we inherited when we took office and took over Canada Post. Far from it. The postmistress or the postmaster in those post offices in many cases is working for slightly above minimum wage. Compare their wage scales with the wage scales in the city post offices. There is a vast difference.

That is why members of Parliament on both sides of this House, like myself, get very irritated when they hear of the closing of some of these rural post offices. Granted, sometimes it makes sense and I am sure we can document that. If I have time I will document cases where conversions have worked. In many cases it does not work and it is not working. That is another example of some of the policies that Canada Post forced on the people with no discussion, no dialogue at all. They simply arbitrarily did it.

The best example I have of that is the mode of delivery. Each Canadian is entitled to one free mode of delivery in this country.

In rural areas it usually means a rural mailbox. If I have a rural mailbox, I am entitled to free delivery. For some reason, and it usually comes down to age and a problem of inaccessibility for a rural Canadian to actually walk to the end of the driveway—sometimes driveways in rural Canada are 200 feet long, 300 feet long and sometimes longer, sometimes shorter—but some Canadians, because of a handicap or whatever, cannot get to their mailboxes. They choose, instead of getting mail in a mailbox, to pick it up in town or have a relative pick it up.

Do you know what Canada Post did, Mr. Speaker? The rental of a box in a post office went from $26.50 to $50 in one year. Many residents phoned me about that, wondering why their rental fee went from $26.50 to $50 in one year. I could not explain it.

Name one corporation in this country that can raise prices by 100 per cent and get away with it, where the consumer would actually allow them to get away with it. I do not know of any. Canada Post did, as the member on the other side is nodding, and did get away with it.

Those are the types of things that just turn rural Canadians off when we are speaking of Canada Post. It is very negative. Canada Post has no thought at all for rural Canadians.

There is a little community in my riding called Fredericton Junction. This one is the most absurd case of all. There was a surplus of lock boxes in this particular post office in Fredericton Junction. Canada Post arbitrarily decided that anyone farther than .4 kilometres from this particular post office would be forced to erect a mailbox. In other words, they would be getting rural delivery once they were beyond the bounds of that post office by .4 kilometres, just a little less than half a kilometre. Many of the residents in that community are elderly. Many of them obviously are not. They are still working Canadians like you and I. They preferred to walk down to the post office and get their mail. Canada Post arbitrarily threw this decision at them. They are outside that .4 magic number that Canada Post invented. What they are forced to do now, if they want mail in that little post office, is pay the $50 to walk down to get their mail which yesterday was free. Absurd. To top it off, in this particular post office, most of the residents could not, even if they wanted to, erect a mailbox.

Some of the points I have raised have been taken care of by Canada Post, by just getting in there and fighting tooth and nail to make sure that some of these minor changes take place. Why does Canada Post not start listening?

Members of Parliament have just about zero clout when it comes to Canada Post, as everyone here will nod their head to just about zero, a big fat zero.

An hon. member: Some members.

Mr. Thompson: All members. The parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible for Canada Post might have some clout but the little country mouse in rural Canada does not have any clout with Canada Post, none at all. If you can embarrass it publicly, sometimes Canada Post will respond to complaints by members of Parliament. That is the only tool that I have, to stand up on my hind legs in this place and complain.

It is always the urban members of Parliament who get up and defend Canada Post, because no one from rural Canada in their right mind can get up in this House and defend it. Monday through Friday, there is not one who could get up on his or her hind legs in this House and defend Canada Post. Its decisions are mostly arbitrary. Canada Post has actually lied to members of Parliament.

This morning a senior member of Parliament told me of a situation in his town where a staff person at Canada Post simply fell asleep at the switch, did not inform his office as to what was going on and then attempted to cover up. That is a recurring theme with Canada Post. It is one that I do not want to see continued.

That is why I will stand up on my hind legs in this House any day of the week and defend my rural Canadians.

• (1350)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I have listened to a number of speakers who have been focusing on the plight of people in rural Canada as it relates to the post office and I wholeheartedly agree with them.

I want to say that the situations are no different in the metropolitan areas. I would like the member to comment on a couple of things that have been happening in the metropolitan areas.

For example, in my riding of Surrey North, there has been a privatization of post offices, particularly in the drugstores. We have had an incident where the corner drugstore had been running the post office for a number of years and a new owner came in. There were nine women working there, earning between $7 and $8 an hour doing the postal work. He immediately informed them that they were taking a reduction in pay, losing their seniority and that he was cutting back their hours. They finally formed a union and went on strike.

The post office assisted that employer every way it could to bust the union. It brought mail in. It kept the post office going, which was simply being run by the employer as a loss-leader. The community was disrupted. The people who had served that community well were out of work. Finally, the whole drugstore, because it was owned by a big chain and did not want to allow adequate wages in one store because it might have to have it in another store, shut it down. That is being repeated over and over in this whole thrust of privatization.

I would like the member to comment. I appreciate the difficulty in the rural, but what about us in the metropolitan areas?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment as effectively and as passionately on urban areas because I am not a member of an urban area and do not represent an urban area, but I know they are not without their difficulties.

I would like to point out something, although it is not directly answering the question: One of the things Canada Post does very effectively with regard to public relations is send out information notices to the communities. It does it through the community's member of Parliament as if the member could change it. Canada Post offers to meet with the mayor or the council in the cities and villages concerned and explain the process as to how the mode of delivery will be changed. Taking the post office out of that community would be a more accurate way of stating it.

It encourages the community to get involved. It will send out a questionnaire, which is a totally loaded questionnaire because it only gives three options. I mention this for a particular reason and I hope I have time to explain thoroughly.

Canada Post will give three options: a green box, rural delivery or a retail outlet. In most cases, if the communities had a choice it would be number four; maintain the service they presently have. That one certainly is not mentioned. The third one, the retail outlet, is sometimes not available.

It makes it sound as if in this vast country of ours there are retail stores in every community in Canada just waiting, begging to take over the post office. That is not the case in my riding. There are many communities in my riding that do not even have a store. They are very, very rural. The houses are five and six miles apart. I will finished in a moment Mr. Speaker.

In my community of Castalia and Grand Manan, there is a very good example of that. A business person went out and actually took over the old post office and put his own neck on the line simply to bring service to his own people, with a very strong chance of not succeeding in the marketplace. Rural Canadians deserve that service, one which Canada Post simply ignores.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have two further questions. Do I have unanimous consent for two small, short questions—Don Valley North and the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas?

Some hon. members: Agreed

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that there is a very large file in my office on postal complaints. I have had things happen such as Fairview Mall's only postal outlet being shut down with no alternative. I think there are 4,000 to 5,000 employees in that particular complex. In addition, there have been other areas in which postal outlets have been shut down without notice.

I also have letters to the minister and to the authorities with regard to a request for an inquiry into the post office's firing of an employee over an issue of drugs in the work place.

In terms of urban Canada the post office is a major issue. I think we all need to have more information and better service.

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I have a quick comment to the intervention by the member for Carleton—Charlotte. He repeatedly used the words "standing on his hind legs". In my books that member stands tall in this House and his frankness and candour will lead Canadians, not only rural Canadians but Canadians all across the country, to have some hope that members of this House will continue to give the best representation to all Canadians on postal and other matters.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think there is any reason for you to answer that. I think it is pretty well self-explanatory.

Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am quite delighted to join in this debate today and speak to the motion that was put by my colleague, the hon. member for Essex—Kent, who has really studied this dossier in a very thorough manner and has brought this to the attention of our caucus enabling us to have this discussion on the motion which reads:

> That this House call upon the government to institute policies that would require that service to Canadians be the priority for Canada Post.

I agree with that statement. I would personally like to add, not that it would have been acceptable in this kind of a motion, that service to Canadians be the priority not only for Canada Post but also for the government opposite.

The member for Essex—Kent worked very hard on the Canada Post file, ensuring that postal services are in the interest of all Canadians. I believe he has been quite instrumental in arranging to have some help extended through Canada Post and the Department of Communications to weekly newspapers for a short period of time, particularly in the code 2 category, which I will come to a little later on. I think we can all appreciate the Minister of Communications having extended this amount of money. I have the sense that it was the 13 weekly newspapers in his own riding which might have had some impact.

I suggest to all weekly newspaper owners and all citizens who live in all parts of Canada to go and talk to your member of Parliament. Bug them so that if they are on the government side, they will bug the minister and if they are on this side they will insist that the minister do something about it. Sometimes it works, not always.

The daily newspaper in your constituency is a very important asset to keeping you in touch with what is going on in the world around you. Putting that moratorium on for nine months may be fine right now, but how are we going to keep up to date and know what is going on in the future? I think we have some very short-sighted policies which do not take into account the nature of Canada, the fact that we are a country with enormous geography. This has to be thought about when we look at public policy.

Since this government has come to office it has done nothing but see to the dismantling of the ties that link Canadians across this land from coast to coast to coast and the national symbols that help us identify as Canadians. It seems to fail to understand that in order to develop this immense country, services were established to link the regions to create a sense of national unity. The need for transportation led to the birth of Air Canada and the railway.

• (1400)

As our fundamental communicating link, Canada Post was put into place to serve individuals, unite Canadians and enable businesses and communities to be helped nation-wide.

I know there is the argument that that continues under the privatized Canada Post. I would suggest that they did not have to privatize Canada Post in order to have an efficient service. Believe me, it is not only the private sector that is known to be efficient at all times.

I tell them to take a good look at Teleglobe under Jean-Claude Delorme and tell me that it was not functioning as well, if not better. If it was not, how come they named him to head the Caisse de dépôts. Don't give me the argument that only the private sector knows how to work, because it does not. There are plenty of fine public servants in the public sector. I can see one who was in the public sector before. They gave a great deal to their country and to their province and to the land internationally. They did not have to be in the private sector to be good. There is lots of reason to be very proud.

The need for transportation across this vast land, whether it was Air Canada, whether it was our bus transportation system, whether it was VIA Rail, was important to maintain that sense of Canadian identity, that linking of business and individuals across this land and to keep Canadians informed.

The CBC was also created to become a vital source of news, information and entertainment. That too was a celebrated cultural institution until this government started to cut it to pieces.

There are a lot of things government members have done that make me wonder if they really are Canadians. Canadians have long been associated with all these links. Therefore, the privatization, the closures and the downsizing that have taken place give everyone in this country a sense of abandonment, a sense of not belonging. As everybody knows, if we look at some of the cartoons, we need a sense of belonging. That loss of symbols, the loss of identity, the loss of national unity and the lack of sense of identification have led to and exacerbated the constitutional discussions we have had up till now.

I think one has to realize that in the privatization of Canada Post its business plan of action—the organ-o-gram and that it will do this, that and the other in these number of steps—may be fine and dandy, but it forgot a few human dimensions. One example is that we now have two classes of Canadian citizens: Canadian citizens who get door-to-door service and Canadian citizens who have to walk in snow, sleet, rain or ice; it does not matter what the temperature. It seems to forget that we live in the northern hemisphere. Senior citizens find it a little bit difficult to walk down to the corner or over the icy, bumpy street to their green postal boxes, those friendly little boxes that the dogs like but not people. I would also suggest that that was not taken into consideration.

Since 1986, Canada Post has been following its corporate plan to close or convert rural and small community post offices. In 1986 there were 5,221 such post offices employing 10,000 people. Today, more than 900 have been closed or have been converted, with over 3,000 jobs lost.

What is most interesting as we look at ghettos in which people work, is that most of the workers in these rural post offices were women—83 per cent. I wonder if that had anything to do with the corporate plan.

In the coming summer there will be 156 more post offices closed in rural Canada, 12 of them in Quebec. Cela ne fait aucune logique.

The government tells me that postal rates did not really go up. All I know is that when I speak to people in my riding, when I walk into the post office and there are people standing there buying stamps, they are complaining. They lay out 43 cents for the stamp. They are not standing there calculating that the stamp was 39 cents, which was exorbitant in the first place, and that the GST has added the additional amount. They now pay 43 cents, which is a 10.5 per cent increase.

All they know is that they are paying more money. I do know that the GST is something they hate. All I would have to do if I want to fan the flames and be very partisan—I often do—would be to say: "Just blame the GST and blame those Conservatives who had such a wonderful fiscal plan for Canada. They are bleeding us dry".

Last Saturday, The Toronto Star carried a story which led off with the following words: "Every 11 days since the beginning of 1990, a Canadian magazine has folded its covers and winked out of existence." In fact, here is the story. It did not have to be on the floor, but it sure floored a lot of people in the magazine industry.

The Great Depression, two world wars, a small, spread out population, recessions, inflation, overwhelming competition from the United States; none of these killed Canadian magazines in total, but this government's lack of action is going to do that.

Why is this happening? First, because the government cut $110 million from the traditional postal subsidy that was created at the time of Confederation. We created things in this country, and the first thing you did within eight years is that you killed it. What went on here is absolutely disgraceful. For more than 100 years, governments believed it was important for all Canadians to have access to magazines, books and newspapers. Why? Because I would suggest to you that words represent ideas, transmit values and are the cornerstone of democracy.

What have we done? We have cut the postal subsidies, we added GST and we are taxing knowledge. We are taxing brains, the Bible, the Koran—what does it matter—and we have added a postal subsidy that is just going to be the final straw on the camel's back.

Studies have demonstrated the necessity of postal subsidies over decades. From the 1961 Royal Commission on Publications which is often referred to as the O'Leary commission report, to the special Senate committee on the mass media to the government's own independent studies in the 1980s, they have come to the same conclusion, that Canadian magazines face harsh economic realities. They have a very small market and very stiff U.S. competition.

We know we do not own our cultural market, that which enables our children to grow and learn for the future and remain identified strongly as Canadians.

Second, they said Canadian magazines foster in Canadians a sense of themselves in a way quite different from other media. It is true that what you see on the television screen has great impact and that an image carries 1,000 words. If you want to have that integrated into your thought process, have food for thought or sort of mull matters over in your mind, when it says: "You do not have to do it, you have a choice," and things like that such as philosophic ideas too, you have to read it and be able to re-read it.

It was interesting to note that there is no concern on the part of this government about keeping its population educated and informed through the kind of reading material that often is easier than the thick tome book or no access to a public library. They got this through their magazines.

In the pre-election period, it is very interesting with this government. In 1988, the government sort of changed its mind. I would suggest that the former communications minister Flora MacDonald had finally to admit that postal subsidies had helped to develop the publishing business and she rightly argued for the maintenance of the postal subsidy. She acknowledged that the ultimate beneficiaries of magazines and newspapers, community newspapers, trade newspapers, those newspapers which touch on ethical values, religious values, all had a good Canadian readership and were especially important to readers of small publications, readers in remote areas and readers with little access to other means of distribution.

On April 14, the minister announced: "My cabinet colleagues agreed with me that the postal subsidy is well worth preserving. Therefore, I am pleased to announce today that, for at least the next five years, the program's funding will be maintained at approximately its current level of $220 million annually."

But with the election won and the free trade agreement passed, the government broke its promise and axed the historic over-100-year-old subsidy by $110 million.

Add to this the drop in demand because of the government's 7 per cent goods and services tax. Just imagine the damage on an industry that had never been taxed before and which only had a 2 per cent profit margin. Magazines were exempt from federal manufacturers' sales tax, which the GST supposedly replaced. Therefore, there was no trade-off for the magazine industry, it was just a new tax. It was a fresh tax burden on an industry that only works on a 2 per cent profit margin.

Canadian magazine editor Doug Bennett says that the impact of this has been "the folding of 47 magazines". The industry has predicted that as the pre-GST subscriptions expire, the picture will get much worse.

You can add to that, as the article says so eloquently, the other threat that is posed by the GST, says Mrs. Keechy who is a director in the magazine industry, the inadvertent advantage it gives to the American magazines which dominate the Canadian market. Strictly speaking, American publishers are supposed to collect the GST from Canadian subscribers and then remit that sum to the Canadian government. In the case of large magazines that are well known, I am sure they are doing that. But for hundreds and hundreds of smaller foreign publishers, the GST is something they just ignore and government enforcement is a complete joke. The net effect is that the Canadian magazines pay the GST while many American magazines get around it and can do business much more cheaply than we can. That certainly has not helped the industry.

With the closing of post offices, with the cutting of the postal subsidy, our cultural industries have been impacted in a very negative way. The O'Leary Royal Commission on Publications observed in 1961 that periodicals can provide "the critical analysis, the informed discourse and dialogue which are indispensable in a sovereign society". Other support mechanisms were also created.

Bill C-58 amended the Income Tax Act to encourage advertisers to use Canadian media to reach the Canadian public. Its intent is to encourage advertisers to use the Canadian media to reach that Canadian public. As a result, the measure discourages foreign ownership in Canadian periodical and newspaper publishing. To be defined as Canadian, a publication must have at least 75 per cent Canadian ownership, and 80 per cent of its material must originate in Canada. That is very helpful for our artists and our creators and many other industries in Canada. Canadian publications attribute a great deal of their success to the effects of this legislation.

There have been rumours of late from American trade officials that they would like to see the removal of Bill C-58. They find it an irritant. Well, there are so many irritants going on here that we don't need the Americans to add to the irritants, so the Americans should stay at home, mind their own business, and we will do what we need to do here, which includes putting back the postal subsidy. Mr. Treasury Board, Mr. Finance, Mr. Dollar Bills; put some money back in, and take the tax off books.

My conclusion, with respect to this whole issue and situation, Mr. Speaker, is the following: When you have postal rates that have gone up—just let me put this into the hopper—for the average newspaper weighing 107 grams, the yearly average postage costs were $2,000 up to June of this year. Costs after June will jump to $10,500 from $2,000. That is this government's wonderful way of encouraging our community newspapers, our weekly newspapers, the ethnic papers, the church papers, the trade papers, the small daily papers. Enough is enough! Put the post offices back in rural Canada. Allow the people to have equal service. There are not two sets of citizens in this country. And, for goodness sakes, reinstate their postal service.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Mount Royal, on her excellent speech. For years, she has looked after communications and cultural issues on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, and she does an outstanding job. She understands the real problem Canadians have at this important time in our history.

But I would like to raise a question. In her speech, she referred to the closing of rural post offices. Yesterday, my colleague from Papineau—Saint-Michel presented petitions here. I still have a whole packet of them—they will be presented during the week. What happened in February to the people of Sainte-Blandine in the Rimouski region, Mr. Speaker? They learned that Canada Post Corporation had decided to close their post office. We well know how Canada Post consults. I was postal critic before the last federal election and if we had not had that whole debate on free trade, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Canadians would have taken account of the bad job this government was doing.

But let us get back to the situation in Sainte-Blandine and the whole Rimouski area, Mr. Speaker. They made representations to the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration and the Minister of State for Seniors, who is their member of Parliament.

I even have a letter here from the Archbishop of Rimouski. The hon. member opposite just accused us in the opposition of creating the myth that closing a rural postal office kills the rural way of life. It is not a myth we are creating. I would like to read a letter that the Archbishop of Rimouski wrote to the government member, the MP for Matapédia—Matane. It reads as follows: "Dear Sir, You are no doubt aware of the concern raised by the Canada Post Corporation's decision to close its facilities in three of our rural parishes. With your deep knowledge of the area, you certainly realize the implications of such a decision. Our rural communities have over the years been built around three main institutions: the church, the school and the post office. Each of them gives its identity to the community it serves. Needless to say, eliminating a post office, even if comparable services are provided, is a significant loss for the community's identity. Having a post office in each of our rural communities is an immediately visible sign of the federal government's presence."

Mr. Speaker, it is not a myth of the opposition's making. Msgr. Gilles Ouellet, Archbishop of Rimouski, says the same thing. In that same region, the television station in Matane was closed, while yesterday, the new minister of regional development in Quebec created an economic development agency.

Mr. Speaker, this government is destroying the country. I will leave my colleague time to answer how she sees this situation in which the country is being shut down, while in this important debate on national unity. We need means of communications that do not exist now. They close post offices and we cannot go on that way.

I would like to hear what my colleague has to say.

[English]

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I think that the Archbishop spoke eloquently about the post offices. I know my colleague, Madam Côté, when I joined her in Rimouski to talk about the closing of Rimouski and Matane speaks very eloquently and so did the 5,000 people, who talked about the cutting of the CBC stations.

This government has done nothing but destroy the infrastructure. I was on the VIA Rail train. I saw what it meant to close down the trains too. The post office, the train, the plane, everything, the government has closed them all down. Why does it not just close down the government and let us go to the people and see if they want to be shut down?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if we had continued with the previous government, the country would have been shut down by now with their free spending ways.

• (1420)

I am grateful for the speech of the hon. member for Mount Royal because she is usually so responsible and articulate in her comments, but I think she would want to give some credit to the new Minister of Communications with respect to publication mail. I think she is aware that through her efforts and those of a number of members on this side that the Minister of Communications did announce an extension to May 1, 1992, for the rate implementation for small community weekly newspapers.

In addition, they continue to have the first 2,500 copies delivered free. That is exactly what the Canadian Community Newspaper Association was asking for and the Minister of Communications and the government responded. I think it is fair to say that even the Canadian Community Newspaper Association, with whom I met several times—I know that the hon. member who just spoke has met with them as well—understood that the government cannot continue to give free postage services to all the newspapers in the country. They understand and they have asked for a transition period. The minister has responded to those requests with $3.8 million available to help offset those rates and to maintain the 1990 levels for another year.

I just wanted to point that out, but I am sure the member is aware of it.

Mrs. Finestone: First of all, I am really very pleased to respond to the hon. member's question. You may not have been in the room when I first mentioned the fact that the minister had been very open-minded, I thought, somewhat influenced, perhaps, by the 13 newspapers that are in his own riding, and that is the way it should be. I am glad to hear that he listens and that he responds.

I also got carried away and became so partisan, it is so nice to do that occasionally when you get upset.

Mr. Richardson: But unusual.

Mrs. Finestone: But unusual? Well, I do not know whether to take that as a compliment or if my leader will take that into consideration in a negative way. But be that as it may, I do really believe it is important to remove anything that is in the way to access to reading material. It is so important for a country. If we were a small country it would not matter but because of our geography, because of the distribution of our population, we really do not have much choice but to be sensitive to the reasoning behind a public policy. If a public policy no longer needs to be in place, then change it.

The hon. member mentioned that we were bad managers. I would find it very interesting, if we were such bad managers, how Canada did so well over a 20-year period that this government, when it came to office in 1984, kept the budget that had been developed by the Liberal Party. My final comment is that we have a deficit that is somewhat higher than when you took office, like double.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to express my views on the services provided by Canada Post in my riding. I will also let you know what I think of the remarkable progress this corporation has made since 1984.

While supporting the overall plan of Canada Post, I agree that, as a government agency, it has social responsibilities of a nature other than philanthropic, cultural or sports related. Canada Post could, for instance, offer very special rates to community newspapers delivered by mail to their suscribers so that people living is remote rural areas have access to quality information at a reasonable cost.

Of course, I was very happy to hear that the subsidy has been reinstated until 1992 to allow the Community Newspapers Association to determine with Canada Post how to ensure that they can go on mail delivering their weekly newspapers at a low cost. In my riding, in Lachute in particular, it was a question of life or death for the Watchman, a newspaper serving the anglophone community.

With the assistance of the Revue de la Petite-Nation, in the regional county municipality of Papineau, we were able to prove, through a rather elaborate process, Mr. Speaker, that the service was too slow in our area because of transfers made at the sorting stations. So, the Papineau area was particularly disadvantaged by this. It is much better than it was, but there is still room for improvement there. Unjustifiable delays can still be experienced, Mr. Speaker, as I did myself last week. A letter took 10 days to get from Lachute to Mirabel.

Mr. Speaker, another major change took place. The sorting that used to be done in Lachute is now done in Saint-Jerome and Montreal, not without some backlash. I was told once again that this was a further step towards improving the service. This is a new policy. People expect mail to be delivered very quickly. Users are no longer concerned about where the sorting is handled. What they are concerned about is the cheques and letters they are expecting and they want to get them quickly.

Mr. Speaker, Canada Post is supposedly making profits now. It should consider reinvesting some of this in mail boxes. The green boxes are pretty ugly. As I was travelling through my riding I noticed, particularly in the Huberdeau area, in Harrington, these horrible green boxes on the side of the road. I think that, if Canada Post is serious about wanting to keep improving its image, that is definitely something that should be changed. Some changes are expected and more money should be put in there. Initially, the super boxes were unpopular, but I think that since people started using them the demand has grown.

Mr. Speaker, we have been advised that the Pointe-Calumet post office will close down. It was built in 1985. I think it is slightly premature to close it, considering it has just been built. However, I know the local people are working on it, and I personally advised Canada Post of my concern about this transfer which I don't think is necessary.

On the the other hand, in Saint-Colomban, things went according to plan; the office is now operating very well.

Before discussing the many improvements Canada Post has introduced, I would like to again state my support for the Association des éditeurs de la press hebdomadaire régional et francophone and its fight against Admail. The association claims that Canada Post is competing unfairly with Quebec's weeklies, because Canada Post has access to over 10 million addresses across Canada, has direct access to the mailboxes of private citizens, uses its own facilities for delivery and makes a substantial profit in areas where it has a monopoly.

Personally, I think the director of the federal Bureau of Competition Policy should deal with this matter once and for all and conduct an investigation to see whether this Crown corporation is unlawfully competing with regional weekly newspapers.

Perhaps we could now look at the progress made by this corporation which today has annual revenues of nearly $4 billion. Every day, about 40 million items deposited at 750,000 points of mailing are processed and then delivered to any of more than 11 million addresses in this country or sent to countries all over the world.

Contrary to what is commonly thought, Canada Post does not have a monopoly on mail delivery in Canada. Letter mail, which is only 50 per cent of its business, is the only area over which it has a monopoly, by law. Even in that market, Canada Post has to compete with fax machines which have now become a direct and very effective means of communication. You get your mail in minutes, not days. So the fax machine has become a serious competitor for Canada Post. There is also electronic information and fund transfer networks and, of course, the telephone.

Other products and services, like priority post and parcel delivery, are areas where competition by courier firms, bus or truck companies, airlines, advertising media and other businesses involved in delivery of communications is very fierce. However, that is how the free enterprise system works, and Canada Post is now part of that system. So now they have to act like a company, and not like a Crown corporation that can knock on the door of the Minister of Finance to get some money because it didn't make enough the year before. It cannot operate like that anymore. So, the company has to make its products competitive and meet the market demands.

• (1430)

Canada Post also has to fight every inch of the way to keep its share of the market and it may be that, in part, that irritates and brings opposition from the community newspapers. On the other hand, it must be said in its defence that Canada Post is a company and must act as such.

At the Ottawa headquarters, a national control centre was set up to ensure the proper operation of the entire system and monitor the daily mail flow. It is from that centre that Canada Post coordinates the activities of its 57,000 employees and 12,000 suppliers with those of the contract carriers, large volume mailers, small businesses it deals with as well as all its clients.

In that centre, screens allow the continual monitoring of air transportation and weather conditions throughout the country. In fact, all members of this House and anyone interested to see how it works should go and visit the center. It is great to see how mail flow is controlled in Canada. Other terminals are used to analyse the volume of mail entering or leaving of the system. On another wall, twelve screens provide an up-to-the-minute picture of the progress of mail through the company's network of handling plants.

The national centre is linked to nine regional control centre from coast to coast by state-of-the-art telecommunication and data processing systems. There, a Canada Post senior management team meets every morning and, there also, inquiries regarding the operation of the network are relayed instantly for the appropriate person to respond to immediately.

The history of the modern-day Canada Post Corporation started in 1981. So, when we hear the Liberals and their great philosophies, we must remember it started under them. They know very well that, were they sitting on this side of the House, they would be saying the exact same things as I do today. That is the beauty of the parliamentary system. Because they are sitting on the other side, we can do nothing right; but if they were sitting on this side, then I would be in the opposition and perhaps I would be doing the same thing. The fact remains that they started this in 1981. Because we set up the new postal corporation, it does not work since the Liberals did not do it. Anyway, things are much better when the Conservatives do it. Is that not so, Mr. Speaker?

Postal service had become less and less reliable. Strikes deprived Canadians of postal service for weeks; the deficit had grown to $600 million a year and was on its way to $1 billion. Listen, a deficit of $1 billion in 1981! Imagine how much it would cost to mail a letter today if we had done nothing. It would be frightful!

It was a completely unacceptable burden for taxpayers. I hope that those listening to us today agree with me. Many postal establishments were inefficient and much of the equipment was becoming obsolete. Obviously, with a billion-dollar deficit, how can you buy new equipment? It is impossible, is it not? You have to pay back the deficit. But successive governments had other more urgent needs to meet with their limited resources than investing in capital equipment for the Post Office.

In that context, a quarter of the Public Service suddenly became a commercial business. What a change! The new corporation had more than 63,000 full-and part-time employees, but no infrastructure like labour relations, legal services, finance, purchasing and so on—indeed, everything that a normal business or any company needs to run properly.

All those functions were performed by all kinds of other departments. The new company had an annual volume of over $1.5 billion, but—get this—no bank account! It carried on its activities all across Canada but it had no control over them. The nine years since that shaky start are divided into three phases: in the first phase, from 1981 to 1985, the corporation built up the infrastructure essential for any business. Just to let my colleague on the other side know, we were elected in 1984. Things had begun to deteriorate four years earlier, even if you would want us to believe otherwise. Canada Post was restructured according to business management principles. Of course, they had to get competent people from the private sector. Financial statements had to be prepared and all the support services a big business would need had to be put in place. New goals were defined, resources were assessed, prepared, and a five-year plan established, just to name a few innovations.

In 1985, we were in office when Canada Post management realized they were dead wrong in believing they knew how to operate a postal service. After all, that is what they had been doing for over a hundred years. They were wrong, Mr. Speaker. That year, they lost control and did not know how to react. Consequently, the second stage of the restructurization was never planned, it just happened out of necessity. Between 1986 and 1989, Canada Post did not release any public statement. They closed down their marketing service. What they wanted was to start to standardize their operations throughout the country. That is when they implemented a systemized process, with national standards of service they could control and measure.

To regain some of their credibility and prove their reliability, they made some fundamental changes in their system, Mr. Speaker, and I insist on the word "fundamental". First, they eliminated their first-class, second-class, and third-class mail service, as if there could be different classes of customers. They are all first-class users. A business must have only first-class products.

The corporation negotiated some flexibility in its collective agreements, to improve service efficiency. I believe that most of the people now working for the Canada Post Corporation are proud of what has been accomplished and I am not sure that, should you ask them, Mr. Speaker, they would agree to return to the old Post Office Department.

Productivity has improved greatly. The Corporation asked for guarantees of performance from its suppliers of air and road transportation. It was an obvious choice. It is not insignificant, since Canada Post is the largest buyer of transportation services in Canada. It is perfectly logical to ask for quality service. It put in place preferred rates for large volume customers who agree to prepare their mail and deliver it to the carrier. It invested in the best equipment and technological system. It consistently sought to integrate this system with the ones used by companies, since 80 per cent of the mail it processes comes from corporate customers.

Mr. Speaker, Canada Post is the first postal administration in the world to have its productivity measured by an independent auditor and to make public the results of such an exercise. The quarterly reports show a constant improvement in the performance of the corporation from an average of less than 85 per cent, according to the first reports issued back in 1987.

I regret that my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, just the other side of the bridge from my riding— Usually, when I speak, he is in the House. I wish he were here for I could have given him the results of a mini poll carried out in Hawkesbury. People in Hawkesbury were asked: Is the mail service any better? I said it in English, because that is the way it was reported in the paper. One person answered:

[English]

"I am happy with the mail delivery here in Hawkesbury. I have not noticed much of a change. It is always the same. The service is good."

Another wrote: "Yes, the service has definitely improved. I use the post office quite a lot and I am pleased with the service. I think they are doing a fine job".

[Translation]

And I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker.

So, about three years ago, Canada Post Corporation turned a profit in accordance, of course, with its corporate plans. Any business who does not turn a profit has to close shop. It's a fact. Since becoming a business concern, the corporation must show a profit. There's no getting around it. Only the New Democrats do not understand that a business must earn money.

It was the first year in the black, and the first time that Canada Post made a profit in 30 years. With that started Phase III. The corporation was now able to show a different image to Canadians. So, in 1989, it had its first profit of $96 million dollars. The corporation had gone from a $600 million deficit, almost one billion, to a $96 million profit. They must have thought: Good, now we can buy ourselves some machinery.

The next year, the corporation did even better: profits of $149 million, at the same time as it improved service, let us not forget! Surveys were done. People do not complain about the service. When a change is made, it takes two or three weeks. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are always attached to our services and reluctant to change—that is quite normal. But after three weeks or a month, people realize that it is not so bad. People go to pick up their mail at any time of the day. People work today, both partners in a couple work and it is not always convenient to go to the post office by one o'clock or between three and four— Today, they can pick up their mail much longer and take advantage of the services.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker—this must be horrible for any socialist—Canada Post Corporation paid the federal government a $60-million dividend! You, ladies and gentlemen, you taxpayers, after paying through your taxes for years to subsidize a deficit, received a $60-million dividend paid to the government! The corporation invests $400 million a year on average in equipment, training, new technology to improve services and Canada Post has thus become a world leader in postal high technology. This is possible because the corporation is profitable; if it were not, it could not invest in new technologies.

The new postal system comes into play from the very beginning of the development of a marketing or billing concept in any of the businesses which provide Canada Post with 80 percent of the volume of mail it handles over the year.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt about it—I have encountered it myself, as all members of this House have, I am sure; I encounter it every day in my riding—there is a normal resistance to change in services from our constituents. Just a little while ago, a meeting was held in Pointe-Calumet and people went and said maybe we should have done things this way or another way. At least, Canada Post takes the time to consult the people and to listen to them. There is a 90-day period set aside for consultation. In the end, the people come to realize that the corporation's plans are not all that bad. It takes a little time, but in the end they are satisfied. And the superboxes, Mr. Speaker, they are just great!

I would like to say, in closing, that I too, as a taxpayer and a member of Parliament, am happy to see the corporation paying us dividends, allowing us thereby to improve services and, of course, to apply that money toward the reduction of the deficit and finally to increase the services provided to Canadians.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I found the hon. member's speech somewhat confusing, because at first she said she supported and agreed with Canada Post's corporate plan. That she started to say: You know, this doesn't work very well, and that service could be improved— Although she agreed with this plan, she was against letting Canada Post operate in areas where it would be competing with private businesses, such as regional weeklies.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not understand the real problem. Today, we are talking about Canada Post, but we could just as well be talking about Air Canada, the CBC, VIA Rail— It's the whole philosophy of a government that says the market is always right. It is a matter of making money, making a profit, and the government isn't interested in the citizens of this country or in providing a service for Canadians. Earlier, the hon. member mentioned auditors who were supposed to measure the performance of our postal services. We all know about the surveys at Canada Post, Mr. Speaker. I was a critic for two years.

Mr. Prud'homme: And a very good critic!

Mr. Gagliano: Every time we took a closer look at the figures, we realized it was all planned so they could say: We conducted a survey, the people agree, and now we can close the post office in their community.

Mr. Speaker, I think we should look at the real story. In 1984, when this government came to power, the first thing the Minister of Finance told Canada Post was: As of 1985, you will have to balance your books, but you can't compete with private enterprise. Now listen, it doesn't take a genius to realize that the only thing they could do was cut services.

So they went and closed a whole bunch of post offices in rural areas. They installed superboxes before they put up the green boxes, and now, of course, as the hon. member said, people prefer the superboxes. Mr. Speaker, of course they are better than the green boxes, which are a real disgrace, as the hon. member said.

However, in urban areas, people keep asking us for home delivery, not those superboxes. Mr. Speaker, I live here in Gatineau and I have a superbox. Every morning when I open my box, it's full of junk mail. That is what we have now, Mr. Speaker!

We have a mailbox for all the advertising they sent us. And what do people want? They want service. The government can talk about money and profits—of course Canada Post is making a profit. The government also says everyone is satisfied with the service, but, Mr. Speaker—and I refer now to the Rimouski area—I could show the hon. member hundreds of thousands of petitions these people are sending in. If you want to see people who are against Canada Post— Earlier I mentioned the Archbishop of Rimouski, and I could read a few more names: I have here Father Pascal Parent, the parish priest; the parish of Sainte-Blandine; the Association féminine d'éducation d'action sociale— You want to hear some more names of people who don't agree? Gilles Roy, vice-president of the Urgence rurale coalition. You want more names? Well, I will give you some more: the Ficelle organization, MPPs, Mayor Daniel Côté, MPP Michel Tremblay, all from a rural area around Rimouski.

Thousands of people are up in arms, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member says everybody is happy with the service they are getting. Mr. Speaker, the truth is, we are not getting any service in this country. Everything has been cut.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the archbishop of Rimouski is interested in what is going on in his community, but I am also sure that the archbishop would be the first to realize that Canada Post must ensure that the customer who wants service has to be dealt with efficiently.

They say that post offices have been shut down. Granted, some post offices have been shut down, but service was transferred to small businesses in the same community. Yes, the post office has been closed, but the service was transferred elsewere. The guy to whom you address a letter as "John Doe, St. Blandine, County of Rimouski" will get his letter, his mail.

Mr. Prud'homme: At the archbishop's palace!

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if it is going to be the archbishop who will receive it, but, as the member for Saint-Denis said, Joe Blow, Sainte-Blandine, Rimouski County will get his mail.

So, when they say that post offices were closed, they are exaggerating a little. The services were transferred, and I can tell you that in several small communities, there are businesses like convenience stores that are open until 11 at night where many constituents go to get their mail and buy a few things at the same time to encourage those small shopkeepers.

Sure, before that, we used to have post offices with postmasters and all that in every community. You know, Mr. Speaker, in some municipalities, when the Liberals formed the government, post offices were built everywhere. There was one on this side of the road, and another on the other side. The postmaster on one side said hello to the one on the other side. They even asked questions of each other to know at what time they would—That really happened in a community, the name of which I have forgotten.

If it was politically rewarding, post offices were built. It was like during the Duplessis days, bridges were built where there was no water. So, let us not exaggerate. The service was upgraded. I understand people who are against it, but, once again, everyone gets his mail, though in different ways.

• (1450)

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member says that everything is fine today, I cannot help thinking about my responsabilities towards my riding. I want to tell her, for example, that in the new modern life, perhaps in the new big developments, and I say only perhaps—But she knows my riding very well, since, under the previous government, from 1984 to 1988, she was the hon. member responsible for the riding of Saint-Denis, to see who could defeat the member for Saint-Denis. But I must admit that she is an excellent friend.

It is absurd to see that in the Bois-de-Boulogne, which is very well known, in Montreal—I am not talking about the Bois-de-Boulogne in Paris, but the one in Montreal, which is a residential area—there are people in the north, the east, the west and the south; so they are completely surrounded, but there are also a few developments in some streets. For example, I am thinking of Marcellin-Wilson Street. I am thinking of a whole new estate belonging to Mr. Fiori. I am thinking of the new estate of the people she knows well, like Mr. Musto. In the heart of the city of Montreal, new streets were built to connect with others, and superboxes were installed. In the winter, there is a lot a snow and ice. Older people are now scared to go there. Well, it is the people who bought estates at $400,000 or $500,000 who get all the promotional mail that they do not want. This is the new way for Canada Post to manage a good department, always in the name of sound management! I find it is sad. I must admit—this is a rare occurence and I want to soothe my colleague, Mr. Cooper, with whom I had an exchange that I regret a bit—that there were some exaggerations. Il you tell me that everything is fine, I think that you do not believe it. I point out that the member seems to be of the same opinion. But there were some unfortunate incidents.

As the member for Saint-Denis, I simply wanted to submit a case that happened in my riding, in one of the completely or almost completely built areas where, between two streets, they built a half-street on which people cannot even find the services that are available to their neighbours.

So, it is not a new area, a new development, a new city, or a new village. It is right in the middle of Montréal between two streets, because it was built later.

Therefore, I would hope that she joins with me to make representations to Canada Post to begin correcting what appears to me to be great anomalies.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I did say at the outset that I do not agree completely with all the corporation's restructuring plans. Clearly, a major change cannot come about without a few ups and downs and I fully understand the problems that the residents of the area may have since there is also a problem where I myself live, that is Lachute. The postman goes only so far even if he could have gone a few steps further to deliver my mail, but the corporation decided to draw the line there. Certainly, residents have a problem. I understand very well what my friend is saying but the corporation must go through a complete restructuring process. Now that it is making money it may be able to do it.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. The parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, earlier today I asked for unanimous consent to revert to committee reports so I could table the fourth report of the management committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there might also be unanimous consent to concur in the third report, which we tabled on Wednesday.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—CANADA POST

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pickard (p. 863).

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have a chance to join in some debate today on this very important motion that we have before us regarding postal service in Canada, dealing with Canada Post.

I just want to read the motion into the record:

> That this House call upon the government to institute policies that would require that service to Canadians be the priority for Canada Post.

That is a very important motion for us to be debating today. As is evidenced by the debate we have had in this chamber today, there are members on all sides of this House, on this side and on the government side as well, who have some very specific and important concerns about the way Canada Post is operating.

There is, as well, a particular interest among those members who represent rural ridings about some of the problems that we have had in our dealings with Canada Post in those communities.

Before I start my comments, I would just like to say a couple of things. First, I would like to pay credit to two of my colleagues who have done a considerable amount of work in this particular area.

Our previous post office critic, the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, did a great deal of work in this area. He gained some recognition by producing a major report for our caucus. The member for Churchill, who is our current postal critic—I thank him for providing some notes—is unable to be with us in the debate today. Given the size of his riding, he also has some particular concerns about Canada Post.

There are two other groups of people who I hope are watching and listening to the debate today. The first is ordinary Canadians. Almost all Canadians have the opportunity to interface with Canada Post and to deal with that Crown corporation. I hope Canadians are listening today to see some of the concerns being raised by members of Parliament and to see, as well, that even on the government backbenches there is concern about how the corporation is running.

There is one other group, too, that I hope is paying attention. These are the people who are watching in the control room at Canada Post headquarters right now. I hope they are watching this debate, that they are taking notes on all of the concerns that have been raised here.

I trust that as a responsible Crown corporation Canada Post will take the effort to follow up on those concerns that were raised and attempt to address them and help us to assist our constituents.

I would like to take a brief look and make some comments about what this government has allowed Canada Post to do nationally and the direction in which it is going. Then I would like to make some comments about my dealings with Canada Post in my riding and, to conclude, make some comments on some of the recommendations that the New Democratic Party caucus has made and some that I have made, to ensure that Canada Post is a successful Crown corporation.

Clearly, the record speaks for itself; the main focus of Canada Post under the Conservative government has been to close or to turn over and privatize retail postal outlets and post offices in Canada.

In fact, a lot of the information that I have been provided with comes from an organization that has arisen in the past couple of years and which deserves some credit from this House. It is an organization called Rural Dignity. It has done an outstanding job across Canada raising concerns, primarily about post offices, but as well about VIA Rail and other services as it impacts on small communities.

I did not bring it with me today—I should have—but Rural Dignity is raising funds by selling a poster depicting a rural scene. That is a plug for anyone who is interested in picking up one of those posters. I have ordered one. I think the importance and contribution that rural Canada makes is an important part of Canada and one that we have often missed in this debate in this Chamber.

The figures are incredible. Over 1,000 rural post offices have been closed or privatized since 1986 and some 3,000 full-and part-time jobs have been lost. Over 200 communities are now without any kind of replacement postal service. In many cases, this has meant a reduction of the federal presence in Canada.

Many in my province of British Columbia are familiar with a position called "the government agent", someone who in a smaller community is really a catch-all for provincial government services and a very important person. Often in many small communities that was what the post office was. It was the federal government agent, the place people could go to get their income tax forms, GRIP forms and other paperwork when people need it from the federal government. The closing of these post offices has meant that we have lost that.

That is not even to mention the economic impact these closures have had on many small communities. Magazines and other publications have commented on the large number of people who are now running small businesses out of their basements on the side, who quite often depend on the post office to deliver their product or service. We are seeing a great deal of that now and the loss of many of these rural post offices has really hurt them.

As well, there is the absolute lack of consultation with those communities by Canada Post. One example that struck me, which was an important one, and it goes back, if I have my timing right, to last summer to a major debate in, I believe, the Westwold area of British Columbia. Canada Post usually moves pretty fast if a postmaster dies or retires. I hope the postmasters in my riding do not choose to pass on soon. Then you can really get the mail moving fast, because Canada Post moves like greased lightning as soon as a postmaster dies or retires. It moves in very quickly, either to close the operation down or to try and privatize it.

A revealing comment was made in a discussion I had with Canada Post officials in Vancouver—and I am not suggesting in this case that they lied to me, but it is as bad as if they had. I phoned and this person said: "Well, since we"—meaning Canada Post—"eventually won this battle with the community of Westwold"—where they chained up the Canada Post vehicle, wrote letters and raised a great deal of concern, with the help of the member for Kamloops—"since the management of our corporation did not back down and since the government did not step in to make a decision, we figure we can go ahead and do anything we want and we know we have the backing of our management". It was a very revealing comment. It says that in many cases, when these staff members are doing what they are told, which is to close or privatize a post office, they are likely to go all the way.

I know in talking to my colleague, our previous postal critic, that you win a few but you wonder just how much you have won.

In today's paper there is a report of many letters that we have received from people of Mabou, Cape Breton who feel they have won an interim victory in getting the post office to back down. I hope that is right. I hope they have won a victory over Canada Post. If they have, I think we should circulate their letters and these articles in the newspapers to everybody so that all members of Parliament, when Canada Post is moving in to close down a service, can use the experience of these courageous people in Cape Breton, who have fought and, so far, have won. I suppose we will have to wait and see just what the final outcome of this particular fight will be.

The final outcome may be the next federal election, when we get rid of the Conservatives and elect the New Democrats and bring in a postal policy that will be relevant in this country.

One of the problems that has arisen in the postal service as it is being run by Canada Post now, with the turnover to the retail postal outlets, is that they say: "We are not closing the post office, we are going to turn it over to an entrepreneur to run in their drugstore or their motel, or what have you". That has resulted in problems. A woman phoned my office this morning, knowing I would be rising in debate today on the post office, just commenting on a few things such as the lack of universal hours, something we know we need when dealing with the post office, and different advice on mailing. This woman was particularly upset. She wanted to write a letter to the Prime Minister to complain about the Prime Minister's partisan attitude while abroad. The person to whom she went to mail her letter did not know that one could still mail letters free of charge to the Prime Minister and other members of Parliament.

It is an inconsistent service that we have. The need for a professional service has been one of the most important messages that I have received from officials in Canada Post when I travelled throughout my riding. I have done that as I am sure have many other members of Parliament.

As a new member I have visited just about all of the postal outlets in Prince George—Bulkley Valley, talked to staff, management, employees and others to get a sense of where they are going and to introduce myself. It has been a learning experience because in most cases the staff in the postal outlets are dedicated people, especially in the rural communities. They are dedicated to their jobs. They want to provide good service, but they certainly wonder what the control room in head office is doing. I wonder what the control room in the cabinet offices and the Government of Canada are doing right now.

I told the letter carriers and the inside workers that I would be going on a postal walk with a letter carrier this summer and doing a bit of work inside the post office to get a better understanding of what they have to deal with. That is important, I have learned from some of my discussions with postmasters and postal employees. In particular, I discussed this with some postal workers last night, knowing I would be speaking today.

One example in Prince George is a new program Canada Post is bringing in called the "Lead Hand Program". It will essentially take out the management and supervisory person and generally turn over the paperwork which always has to be done to the lead hand person. Such persons also have a job at the counter or the wicket. They should be spending a third or half of their day at the wicket serving customers, but they will have to sit down, fill out and complete all the paperwork.

It is my view, which I think is shared by a lot of people, that it is a deliberate move by Canada Post, especially in my case in Prince George, Station A, Fifth Avenue, to have the service deteriorate to the point where Canada Post will have to say that it has many complaints, that service has gone down hill, and that there is nothing to be done except either privatize or close the post office and let the drug store nearby serve the area.

There is an overtime ban now so that the mail which should go out that day does not always do so. It gets bumped to the next day or perhaps even to the following day. There is a good deal of concern when people do not get their mail on time. That is another reason why that would happen.

There are around a hundred grievances alone out of the Prince George area. I get anonymous letters about once a month from staff who work in that area and are concerned. Of course I pass these on to both management and union for them to pursue.

I have had my own experience in my riding with the closing of post offices in two cases. First, the community of Endako assumed it was going to happen and there was not much it could do. The second was the community of Longworth where I met with a number of residents very concerned about losing their postal service. That community does not have phones either, and in this case I offered to try at least to pass some information on to Canada Post so that it would know where Longworth was. We did not suspect that anyone from Canada Post had ever actually been to Longworth. With no telephones, we also told Canada Post that if it is going to have its community meeting, it is going to have to write a letter to tell the community when it is going to come, because Canada Post does not know that community very well. It is someone in Vancouver who is making the decision to close this outlet, because a postmaster in that particular postal service is retiring. As I said, if you are a postmaster and you die in office or you retire in office, you can be assured that Canada Post will move with lightning speed.

• (1510)

What should be done? We have to maintain Canada Post as a public Crown corporation at the very least. I have a great deal of fear, and I think a lot of Canadians do, that this government is fattening up Canada Post so it can privatize the whole operation.

Then you will see how much it costs to mail a letter from Granisle to Vancouver. You are going to be charged about $5 just to mail a letter if it is privatized under the Conservatives.

We want to make sure that we do not exclude letter carrier service from recently developed communities, in particular older areas that are being rebuilt. Canada Post moves very quickly. You get a superbox thrown up in your face as soon as a new area is developed so that it trims back the letter carrier service.

In Britain, I understand the post office has had a different history. It has provided many more services. Our Canada Post has experimented with some services with, I believe, some degree of success, and not so with others. I think it could do a great deal more in terms of not just its fax business, where you fax something and it gets mailed the next day, but in terms of becoming much more of a business-type centre, and most important, in terms of maintaining the full kind of postal service to all Canadians that we have come to expect and deserve.

Some have alleged that the profit figures for Canada Post are bogus profit figures. It we are to take at face value that they are honest figures, I think it is important for Canada Post to perhaps rebuild some of the infrastructure that it has allowed to be destroyed and to return some of the integrity to the system.

I visited a motel operation which is now the postal outlet in Topley. I do know that Canada Post pays $100 or $200 a month and then a commission on stamps and postage. But I felt bad when I was leaving their little operation. I felt I should come and buy all my stamps at this location because of the meagre amount of commission the postmaster in Topley was likely to get. It was the usual case of the postmaster retiring: "Do we give it to this other business?" "No, it is not worth my while", so someone picks it up and eventually it is going to get to the point where as an entrepreneur they cannot continue and they are going to have to close.

Certainly a review of the return of the benefits to some of these smaller outlets is one of the important things that Canada Post should do when it is reviewing the service. How do we get Canada Post to make these changes? One of the government members made the point that it is very independent now as a Crown corporation. It takes a lot to move it.

I would say that if Canada Post is not interested in returning the kind of rural service that we need in Canada, we should fire the president of Canada Post. If need be, I think we should renationalize Canada Post and bring back the kind of post office we need in Canada.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague, the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, for his address and the particular concerns that he has outlined regarding the situation with Canada Post.

As B.C. members, my colleague and I have talked about the issue of Canada Post closures.

He is also well aware of the fact that there are postal closures occurring not only in his riding but in many ridings and constituencies throughout Canada. One of the more recent closures occurred in the town of Enderby in my constituency.

I should point out that Enderby is actually one of the largest of rural postal closures to date. There have been hundreds of rural post offices closed. If the government continues to get its way, eventually all post offices will be closed and privatized. The one in Enderby is of particular interest because of the fact that it is a very large one.

I want to address my comments to my colleague to see if he would support me in my request to the government. When the initial news of this closure came down, I wrote to the post office to request whether it would consider holding a public meeting with the residents of the Enderby area in the Okanagan—Shuswap and consider the various options.

I was really surprised, quite flabbergasted by the return comments made by Mr. Doug McClelland, Manager of Media and Community Services out of Vancouver. He essentially said: "We are not interested in the views of the community; we will make the decision and then tell the community afterward what that decision has been."

It did make a decision: close the post office. It came up and held a public meeting. It was interesting that one of the suggestions that came out of the meeting, which was strongly supported by the community of Enderby as well as the retail community and the residents, was that a couple of Enderby residents would take over the retail operation of the post office in its present location and would continue the operations in the building which people have come to know and trust as the centre for postal services in Enderby. This was an option that Canada Post had not even thought about. I am hoping it is still pursuing that option because it makes sense to the city of Enderby in terms of the availability of service.

I am just asking if my colleague will support me in my request to the government that it seriously consider this request coming from me as well as from the residents of the community of Enderby.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the question or comment from the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap. My grandparents lived there for a while and so I know Enderby a bit.

It came as a surprise when he mentioned that Canada Post was trying to close an outlet there, a standard post office, because it is not the size of community in which you would expect Canada Post do something like that.

It seems to me it is a bit of a hidden agenda that Canada Post has. It goes through the routine, it is pro forma: "have a community meeting, yes, yes, we will listen to you. Say your bit and we will consult and figure out what we want to do." We know what it is going to do anyway, so it is a bit of a phoney dance we go through.

Perhaps what we have to do is try and make that phoney dance a little more real. Perhaps we should have the president of Canada Post attend these community meetings where it is closing post offices so that he would get a real example of just what these communities have to go through.

If the member is asking for support for a backup plan which the community might have for running a retail outlet in the post office building, I would endorse it. Canada Post has an obligation to run that service. It would seem to me that given the comments of the corporation in the past, this is something it would and should consider. I would be quite surprised and disappointed if the corporation were not prepared to do that.

I would certainly support the member. I know he has done a great deal of work in his riding, in Vernon, in Enderby and in other areas on the postal service. I would support whatever efforts he has made in that area and we hope that Canada Post will listen intently to the needs of the residents of his community.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it has been an interesting debate this afternoon on the pros and cons. It is clear that the postal service in this country is changing and meeting new demands across the country and trying to stay within the bounds of regional economics rather than create enormous government debt in the post office.

It gives me pleasure to speak in the House today about the Canada Post Corporation and how it is changing to better serve Canadians to meet the challenges of the globally competitive world evolving around us.

I think the members opposite would agree that the business challenges facing Canada Post are monumental. Here is a quick overview of the corporation today and how it is adapting to meet these challenges. In terms of annual revenues, it is a $4 billion operation. With approximately 57,000 employees, it is also one of the largest employers in the country. It processes 10 billion pieces of mail a year and delivers to over 11 million addresses.

Through links with other postal administrations, it keeps Canadians in touch with every country in the world.

Over the past 10 years, this corporation has learned a lot about corporate reshaping. Its management took the government department it inherited, stripped it down to basics and rebuilt it.

This government believes Canada needs and deserves a strong postal communications system as part of its basic economic infrastructure to compete successfully domestically and globally. Equally important, we believe it must provide the Canadian public with the most reliable, cost-efficient postal communications possible.

The modern Canada Post Corporation began in 1981, when the government took some 63,000 employees—one quarter of the Canadian Public Service—and said: "Okay, post office, you are a business. Act like a commercial corporation."

The mail had become increasingly unreliable. Strikes denied Canadians their postal service for weeks at a time. Annual deficits had reached $600 million, which in today's dollars would be close to $1 billion.

Its plants were inefficient, with outdated, if not obsolete equipment. Previous governments had found more pressing needs for their limited resources than investing in capital assets for the post office.

This new Crown corporation had annual revenues of more than $1.5 billion but no bank account. It operated from one end of the country to another but no one knew where the mail was at any given time.

In order to meet the enormous task that lay ahead, Canada Post began thinking like a business. It began to emphasize a corporate culture, stressing such values as customer sensitivity, quality and reliability. These values were not easily instilled but the corporation has worked over the years to ensure that these will be values which its employees live by, day to day.

By 1986, the corporation was ready to regain credibility by providing its service reliably. It standardized operations across the country. It developed a mail processing system that had performance standards which would be monitored and measured on a real time basis.

Effectively, this made everyone accountable so that they all knew when they were doing a good job and when they were not. For the first time, it was able to thank employees for a job well done, or, conversely, talk about the need for improvement. All this was done in the name of providing better service for Canadians.

The corporation also began to demand that all suppliers and contractors meet its new business standards. The corporation now negotiates contracts with its suppliers and contractors that ensure they recognize the importance of meeting the needs and requirements of the corporation's customers.

The corporation has also hired outside auditors to measure delivery performance, the first postal administration in the world to do so. As mentioned previously by my hon. colleague, the most recent report by these auditors indicates it is now at 97 per cent efficiency.

It is no exaggeration to say that changes the corporation has undergone are staggering. It stood everything on its head, examined every process and questioned every assumption. It has had to challenge its people every day. It demanded their creativity and a complete commitment. The process was tough on everyone, from the executive offices to the plant floors. Some left, but most have soldiered on. This is a tribute to the quality of these people and they have done a fine job.

The changes have been equally tough on the unions which have had to recognize that they are in business with Canada Post. If the business fails then they both fail, but if the corporation wins as a company so does its employees and the unions who represent it. I believe union leaders must recognize that global competition applies to them too. This puts their own attitudes and productivity against those of the unions around the world.

As such, Canada Post has had to negotiate flexibility in its union contracts to increase their efficiency and re-establish management's right to manage the business. That did not come easily.

Clear evidence that the corporation's efforts were beginning to bear fruit appeared in 1988-89 when, as my hon. colleague who spoke previously mentioned, the corporation turned a profit for the first time in 30 years. This point bears repeating as taxpayers are no longer forced to pay for their postal service twice: once when they paid for their stamps and again when they paid their taxes.

This year, total mail volumes will hit some 10 billion pieces of mail. That is an increase of 38 per cent since the first full year of incorporation, and half of that was achieved in the last two years alone. Yet, Canada Post is doing all this with 6,000 fewer employees. Its mail processing efficiency also increased by approximately 6 per cent last year. That compares with the Canadian manufacturing productivity increases of less than one per cent last year.

It has been through changes such as those outlined above that Canada Post Corporation has held increases in the basic mail rate for Canadians to less than the rate of inflation since 1982-83.

Yes, Canada Post has made progress over the past 10 years, but they can feel their competitors breathing down their necks every day, not just in Canada but from around the world.

Their sales force is slugging it out with the courier businesses and the telecommunications companies. Even the basic letter mail is under threat from fax machines and new technologies such as electronic data transfer. If you have paid any bills lately using your bank machine, Mr. Speaker, you will know what I am speaking about.

To help them successfully compete, Canada Post has invested more than a billion dollars in the company in the last three years. Some of this has gone into new trucks and street letter boxes. About a quarter billion is going into new-generation sorting equipment that is faster, more accurate and more versatile, replacing equipment that is 20 years old. Some of the new equipment can process mail up to 50 per cent faster than its predecessors.

Instead of equipping the Canadian postal system with off-the-shelf technology, as occurred 20 years ago, the corporation went to the manufacturers and told them to adapt their technology to Canada Post's specifications.

For example, they built a national control centre, linked with control centres in nine divisions across the country. These control centres are equipped with the latest computer-based technology. They monitor the collection, processing and delivery networks, transportation carriers, and even the national weather office; they then can pinpoint the movement of mail anywhere in Canada, 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and ensure that it moves to meet service standards.

Competition is getting tougher, not only in Canada but globally as well. Although opportunities abound out there, the business streets of the world are getting mean. All businesses have to be globally street smart if they are to prosper. As such, Canada Post has gone global in a couple of ways. The president and chief executive officer of Canada Post is also currently the chairman of the board of the International Post Corporation, which was formed three years ago.

The corporate headquarters and operational centre for the International Post Corporation is in Brussels. It groups 23 of the world's leading postal administrations, all of whom own shares. Its primary objective is to ensure competitive service standards are met in the distribution of parcels and courier products among Europe, North America and the Pacific Rim. Even the post office can no longer be restricted by national barriers. Its competitors, the multinational courier companies, certainly are not. As such, when word about the new Canadian postal system got around to other postal administrations, they came to see how we did it. So did dozens of Canadian companies, including Canadian Airlines International, Domtar, Bell Canada, Xerox, Sears, MacLeans magazine and the Aerospace Industries Association of Canada, as well as 23 chief executive officers from major foreign companies.

In an effort to meet the growing world-wide demand for Canada Post expertise, the corporation has created a new subsidiary called Canada Post Systems Management Ltd., which has been tasked with selling its technology and management systems world-wide. I am pleased to say that it has discovered a growing market out there for the systems it put into place in Canada to get operations under control. Indeed, it has already closed a multi-million dollar deal with New Zealand Post and is implementing control systems there.

Canada Post's international reputation is such that it was recently recommended by the World Bank to Venezuela, which had approached the bank seeking assistance in upgrading its postal system. This sort of recognition by a major multinational organization like the World Bank sends a pretty clear message of the high regard in which the corporation is held internationally.

• (1530)

I should also add that proposals worth more than $40 million have been issued to postal administrations in Europe and Central America. This international consulting promises to be a profitable sideline, not only for Canada Post, but for many of their Canadian suppliers and partners as well.

I would like to present just one example of this. A few years ago, the corporation decided it needed a way to track and trace its priority courier parcels and envelopes through the postal system to ensure they did not go astray.

The corporation turned to SHL Systemhouse, a Canadian systems integrator. They delivered a track and trace system on time and on budget, a system that helps Priority Courier achieve its close to 100 per cent reliability for next day delivery.

Systemhouse then used its experience with Canada Post to bid on a trace system for the United States postal service. It won a $270 million U.S. contract, the largest ever won by the company. I am pleased that, through its involvement with Canada Post, this wholly-owned Canadian company was able to win such a lucrative and significant contract in the United States.

This is the sort of success story that could only be possible due to the success of the free trade agreement. It is an example of how the use of new technology by Canada Post and other Canadian companies is helping Canada win new business in information age markets.

Now, and most important, I would like to address how the corporation has been improving the products and services it provides to the Canadian public.

It moves letter mail, advertising mail, publications, courier documents and parcels. It moves facsimiles, electronic messages, or a combination of hard copy and electronic messages called hybrid mail.

It has restructured its products to meet customers' requirements for cost efficiency and reliability. It provides different speeds of delivery on a time-price scale, with add-on options such as insurance and tracing. Customers now have the ability to pick the speed and options needed, and pay accordingly.

The corporation's parcel services are now geared to the just-in-time delivery disciplines of its industrial customers, so it can minimize the capital that is tied up in inventory. It is also working with large volume mailers to show how to save money and ensure timely delivery by presorting their mail and by scheduling its arrival at its mail processing plants.

Canada Post has made these changes because business provides over 80 per cent of Canada Post's volumes and revenues. In meeting the needs of businesses, the corporation is able to generate the volumes needed to support its extensive operations network. This enables the corporation to provide all Canadians with a basic letter mail rate that remains the second lowest, in terms of minutes of labour required to earn the price of a stamp, in the western industrialized world. Indeed, since incorporation 10 years go, the actual price of a stamp has decreased relative to inflation.

When Canada Post became a Crown corporation 10 years ago, it faced many problems that some people regarded as being impossible to resolve. It has not settled all of them, but it has achieved a fair measure of success. Direct Marketing Magazine, an American publication, recently stated: "Canada Post emerges as the model for postal services around the world. You would be astounded to see the space age technology in Ottawa which controls the flow of mail throughout Canada and beyond its borders".

Canadian Business magazine recently called the turnaround "a management miracle".

Canada Post is striving to create the best postal system in the world. Its goal is to provide Canadians and Canadian businesses with a postal system that will take it into the 21st century. In the last 10 years, it has developed into an internationally recognized leader in the communications field.

Yet, it has not done all this simply for the sake of international acclaim. It has made these changes and improvements to the Canadian postal system because it wants to provide Canadians with the best postal service in the world.

The opposition would have the government return Canada Post to the days of the pony express. I urge the members opposite to take a closer look at the new Canada Post.

What we have here is a made-in-Canada success story. Canada Post has won international acclaim and respect for what it has achieved over the past 10 years. The new Canada Post is providing Canadians with a postal service for the 21st century. Through experience gained by their involvement with Canada Post, Canadian businesses are winning lucrative contracts abroad. Yet the members opposite appear to be either unwilling or unable to recognize these accomplishments.

I would suggest the opposition stop dwelling on its outdated views of postal service in Canada and recognize what this government, fellow Canadians and the international community already know.

The members opposite cannot accept that Canadians and Canada Post can be world leaders in their field. This government has known it all along.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the comments made by my colleague from the government side indicate the direction the government is taking in terms of trying to put Canada Post into a more profitable situation. Quite frankly, the situation has turned around in terms of Canada Post's legacy of deficit. In fact, Canada Post made a reasonably healthy profit last year of some $149 million.

I have to ask the member whether or not the decision Canada Post has made, this decision of closing and privatizing the retail postal outlets in virtually every rural community across Canada, is really in the best interests of those communities and the people living in them. It might very well reflect a better bottom line on Canada Post's corporate balance sheet, but what has it done to the nature of those communities?

I mentioned a few moments ago in the House the situation in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap, the town of Enderby which is losing its post office and how that has affected the nature of community life in that area. Certainly Enderby is not the only situation in my riding, nor is it the only situation in British Columbia; hundreds of communities have lost their post offices. If left unchecked, I am certain that it is the strategy of this government to close all rural and urban postal outlets and basically, sell them off to the private sector.

The real essence of the question is not whether it has improved the bottom line in Canada Post's balance sheet, but what it has done to those communities. It has irreparably damaged some of our communities. In some cases it may have been the right decision to make. I am not questioning the fact that every time a post office was closed, there was perhaps some justification.

I would suggest that Canada Post has been, shall we say, not open to suggestions for alternatives, to comments from the community. It has gone in time after time and has made the decision to close post offices without contacting or consulting the people who will be affected. It is only afterwards that those communities have been consulted.

Now we do have an opportunity to reflect on the comments I made earlier, where there is an alternative which has been suggested. For example, in the post office in Enderby, two individual members of the community have suggested that they would like to entertain the challenge of taking on the responsibility of the postal service in the same facility it now holds, rather than closing down the facility and moving it out to the retail sector. They want to be given that chance, and the community is certainly supportive of their suggestion.

I have written a letter in support of this suggestion. I wonder if the member opposite would provide his views on whether this is a viable alternative, because it does keep the post office in the community where it has been, yet it does allow a certain amount of entrepreneurial spirit to enter. These individuals want to take up the challenge. I want to support their efforts in that regard, and I would hope the government would also support those efforts.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, while many other service industries have left rural Canada altogether, Canada Post has introduced a business formula that allows them to remain in rural areas and usually improve service accessibility at the same time.

The facts speak for themselves. Since April 1, 1989, Canada Post has added in excess of 1.1 million hours of postal access to the rural postal retail network. During 1989–1990 alone, there was a net increase of 320 full service retail outlets in rural Canada.

Canada Post delivers mail to approximately 11 million addresses in Canada every business day. Just under half receive door-to-door delivery. The rest receive other forms of delivery, such as rural route service, post box and community mailbox service. Door-to-door delivery by letter carrier has never been the norm in Canada. In fact, never in our history has everyone received the same method of mail delivery. The diversity is the natural result of the geography and demographics of our country. By providing different types of service, we simply recognize the realities of our nation.

M. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to take part in the debate on the future of the Canadian postal system.

But first, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Essex—Kent, who moved this excellent motion today on the future of this country's postal system.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will remember that in April 1990 the consumer and corporate affairs and government operations committee of the House of Commons issued a report entitled "Moving the Mail—Canada's Postal Service in the 1990s." This was the report of our committee on what to do to improve postal service in Canada.

As an addendum to that report there is a Liberal Party minority report, and I would like to share some of it with you. The fact that I was the author of the report means that I happen to like the conclusions, obviously, but I think that once I read some of these conclusions to you you will like them too, Mr. Speaker.

The government across the way approved the corporate plan of Canada Post. The corporate plan we are operating under right now was approved by cabinet. Therefore, when the government says that it is not their fault if Canada Post privatizes the post office in my colleague's riding of Stormont—Dundas in Avonmore, Ontario, or the one in my riding, or the one in Enderby, or the one anywhere else; it is not so simply because the corporate plan was approved by the government, by cabinet. I mention this to my colleague across the way, the member for Calgary Southeast. The corporate plan that was approved calls for the privatization and/or elimination of each one of the 5,221 rural post offices in Canada over 10 years.

Apart from everything else wrong with that crazy scheme, 83 per cent of all the people who work in rural post offices in Canada are women. Ten thousand people work there. That means that once this process is over, the minister responsible for Canada Post will have been responsible, together with his colleague, for the dismissal of 8,300 women in Canada. Not a bad exercise for a government that pretends to want to improve the lot of women in the country.

In fact that minister alone will be responsible for the largest firing of women employees of any corporation in the history of our country. That is the record of the government across the way.

That is only the first thing that is wrong with the scheme in question. What is wrong further is the way they are going about doing this. I am not one to say that there are not post offices in rural areas that should not be shut down. Perhaps there are some that should not be there any longer. I think all parties have agreed with that. I can remember instances where a rural community has gradually lost its residents, and there are only a few dozen of them left, or something like that, and a full-time post office is no longer necessary. Maybe there is some merit in reviewing the situation in those cases.

But that is not what is happening. What Canada Post does is close down post offices based on what it calls—and watch this for "newspeak" —natural opportunity. Natural opportunity works this way: If the postmaster dies or retires—I suppose growing old is natural and dying is similarly natural—that constitutes a natural opportunity. When a natural opportunity occurs—and these are not my words, they are words in the corporate plan of Canada Post—the government or rather Canada Post may shut down the post office. Of course it shuts down every single one of them. That is just coincidence, mind you, but they may shut down the post office.

What happens then? You could have a community with only 10 people left in it but if the postmaster is not retiring the post office is not shut down. There could be a community of 1,000 people with a post office that is used extensively by a whole group of businesses and they will shut it down anyway just because the postmaster retired.

Mr. Speaker, if you are having a hard time understanding the logic of this, so am I, and so are the majority of Canadians.

[Translation]

But the Conservatives across the floor feel that it is absolutely logical. I see that members opposite agree with this government policy of closing rural post offices.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell you that several post offices have closed in my constituency, again according to this Canada Post criterion.

[English]

Recently Canada Post shut down the post office in Dalkeith, Ontario in my constituency. There was no natural opportunity in that case. Do you know what Canada Post did? They naturalized an opportunity. There was not one, they just made one up. They are very creative people at Canada Post. The postmistress had not reached the age of retirement. What did they do? They went to see the postmistress and said: "Postmistress, you have been around here a long time. How would you like to retire prematurely for a bonus, a golden handshake?". The postmistress said: "Yes, you are right. I would like to stay at home", and so on. They offered her a sum and the postmistress accepted. I do not blame the postmistress. Of course, she has every right to retire. That is her business.

My criticism is with Canada Post inventing a natural opportunity when it did not have one in order to shut down the post offices faster. Canada Post got greedy with this scheme. They had naturalized this opportunity, as I said previously. Not content with that, after they had done this a few times, they got a little greedier again. They said to themselves: "Selves, we can do better than that".

The following is what they came up with. They decided that some 294 postmasters in Canada had been there for different periods of time, and in some cases for years, but they had never been named official postmasters. When is a postmaster an official postmaster as opposed to a postmaster who is not an official postmaster? I am glad you asked, Mr. Speaker. When the post office says there is a difference. That is the way it works.

They have identified some people as being term employees. In some cases they just had not got around to calling them anything else. Let me describe an instance. The post office in Glen Robertson, Ontario, obviously in Glengarry, had a postmistress who was probably at the ripe old age of 35 or so, if that. She had not quite reached retirement age yet, so there was no occasion to buy her off to make the post office shut down early. They said: "Postmistress, you have been with us six years. Six years working in the same place is temporary". The postmistress shook her head and said: "Six years is temporary?" How many people do you know that work six years in the same place and are still called temporary?

Canada Post said: "Oh, yes, but we never decided that you were permanent. Therefore, because we failed to decide that you were permanent, that means you are not. And if you are not, you are temporary, and if you are temporary, that means we can fire you at will". That is really naturalizing an opportunity.

This all makes sense if you work for Canada Post. For most of us, this would be hard to understand. I guess for Canada Post you can do almost anything. There is a certain element of "newspeak" in all of this, this kind of Orwellian mentality of Canada Post.

Canada Post wrote to me recently. As a matter of fact I got the letter today, and I will share it with you, Mr. Speaker. It is on the closing of the Glen Robertson post office in Glengarry. Here is what Canada Post says:

> I am writing in response to your letter of April 5 to the Honourable Harvie Andre, Minister responsible for Canada Post, which was forwarded to the Corporation, regarding postal services in Glen Robertson.

Translation: The minister did not want to reply to your letter so he asked me to do it for him.

• (1550)

Next paragraph:

> As you know, Canada Post is using the resources and expertise of local business in rural and urban areas in order to make postal products and services more accessible.

Translation: Canada Post is shutting down post offices and allowing private businesses to sell stamps on the pretext that it is better.

Next sentence:

> Retail postal outlets offer more convenient locations—

Translation: "A more convenient location" is driving 10 miles to pick up your mail.

Let me continue.

> —more convenient hours, often including evenings and weekends, and an expanded range of products and services.

"Expanded range of products and services"? That means that you do not have to walk inside the post office and open your box to get the mail, you can stand outside in the rain and blizzard and try with your key to unlock the mechanism to get your mail. That is an "expanded service".

Now, let me continue with "newspeak" from Canada Post.

> Providing postal services in partnership with other businesses is not a new concept—

That means they have done this kind of thing before.

> —the post office has been doing so since it was first established; in fact, 68 per cent of our postal outlets operate under contract.

They are trying to tell us here that contract employees working for Canada Post is the same situation as is giving stamps to a store to sell.

> Our future as a viable business depends on our ability to co-operate with other businesses in serving the Canadian public.

Translation: Canada Post from now on is no longer a service, but it is deemed to be a business and the government is going to privatize the whole thing eventually.

It gets better, Mr. Speaker, as you go along, I want you to know. I continue.

> Some communities are also seeing increased participation from local businesses in the provision of postal service when natural occasions for change arise, such as the resignation, retirement, or promotion of the postmaster.

They forgot about death here. They just forgot about that one.

This means that if the postmaster dies or is promoted or is sent someplace else, Canada Post then has the justification to shut down the post office. Let me continue.

> I would like to emphasize that the hiring of a temporary postmaster in a community to provide a continuation of postal service should not be interpreted as an intention to maintain indefinitely the type of service already in place.

That really means that even if your postmaster has been there for a decade, if Canada Post did not call him permanent that means he is temporary and it can fire him or her at any time.

Next sentence:

> Indeed, no promise of permanent employment is ever given to any term employees.

That means that a term employee is different than a permanent one if Canada Post has failed to indicate otherwise.

Now, we have two pages of that kind of rhetoric from Canada Post. I would like to know how much it cost those people to provide those kinds of excuses, to invent the kinds of words they use on the people of Canada and the constituents of my riding.

A few weeks ago, some wizard at Canada Post decided that it was time to remove the Queen's picture from the post office at Vankleek Hill. Out went a memo to Vankleek Hill, Ontario, to Hawkesbury, Ontario, to L'Orignal, Ontario and other communities, directing the postmaster to remove the Queen's picture. The postmaster removes the picture in front of a group of constituents, who are all irate, wondering what on earth is going on here, who concocted this scheme? The postmaster says: "Well, they are directives from head office." The constituents phoned me and asked me who gave this kind of an order.

We could debate the rest of the day whether our head of state is the head of state we should have, but that is not the point. The point is that the day we decide to change our parliamentary institution—because our parliamentary institution is composed of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons in Parliament assembled— I would like to think that it is the elected people of Canada who will make that decision, not some flunkey at the post office who is going to decide who the head of my country and your country is.

That took a few days and finally the pictures went back up in the post office. How much did that cost? How much nonsense went on there to make that kind of a ridiculous decision which had to be reversed?

What is even more interesting is the justification.

Canada Post has these people who are supposed to be media experts. Their job is to tell the right thing. Whenever a media contact phones them and asks them the tough questions that the press asks, this person is supposed to answer the right thing.

One of these people is called Laszlo Szabo. I never met Laszlo Szabo, but it does not matter. Mr. Szabo was contacted by one of the local newspapers in my riding, The Hawkesbury Express, and asked: "Mr. Szabo, why are you doing this? Why are you removing the Queen's picture from the Vankleek Hill post office?"

Here is his answer. I paraphrase here, but it is quite close to what was said. He said: "As we move from a medieval institution to a modern business, we must modernize and therefore remove the Queen's picture". This is from an expert who is always supposed to say the right thing.

Imagine, if this person had been a dumb ordinary mortal like everyone else, what he would have come up with for an excuse. My colleague from Prince Edward—Hastings quite appropriately said: "What if this person had been loose-lipped?"

He could not have possibly done much worse than he did.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the point that I want to emphasize this afternoon for my colleagues is that one must not listen to the rhetoric of Canada Post and then claim that this is the truth. The people who live in rural areas in my riding, in the riding of Argenteuil—Papineau, and elsewhere, know the truth. Mr. Speaker, they know what is a post office in a rural area; they know what it means to see a building where it says—or used to say—"Canada", with the Canadian flag and armories, the only building in the community where the presence of the federal government could be felt. They also know that all this is about to change. Why? The word "Canada" has completely disappeared from the logo of Canada Post. Now, it says: "Post—Mail—Post", or something like that.

The Canadian flag has been removed, because the post office has been privatized and the postal services are now provided in a drugstore or just about anywhere else. The postmaster is also gone.

[English]

The other thing we have to remember about postmasters and the whole institution of the postmaster is that they do not just sell stamps. They provide forms for senior citizens' pensions. They sign their names on passports. They swear in people on these kinds of documents, and they have all kinds of other functions in the community.

The postal institution is such that in rural Canada it is a form of a hub in our community. It is important for us to keep our post office.

I say to the government across the way: Put an end now to the plan of privatizing post offices. Let us keep the post offices in the community or at the very least let us give a right of veto to the communities to keep the post offices when they want them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being four o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) proceedings on the motion have expired.

Therefore, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

NATIONAL DAY OF REMEMBRANCE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby) moved that Bill C-202, an act respecting a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to rise and speak to my private member's bill which would establish a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, and which has received all party support in this House of Commons.

This bill is being co-sponsored by the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and also by my colleague, the member for Halifax.

An official day of remembrance and action on violence against women to be commemorated every December 6 is an appropriate, meaningful and positive memorial to the 14 young women who were so tragically killed in Montreal on December 6, 1989.

I am pleased to have the support also of Suzanne Edwards, the mother of one of the victims of the massacre, who herself is now very active on the issue of gun control. She serves as an inspiration to all Canadians to first mourn and then to work for change in our society.

The man who murdered the 14 young women separated the women from the men in the classroom and systematically shot the women. He believed that because they were engineering students they were feminists, and he saw them as women who had stepped outside of their rightful place. He put an end to young promising lives, lives filled with hard work, joy and plans for the future. He did not see these young women as human beings. All he saw was that they were women and that they had stepped out of what he considered to be their traditional role.

Unfortunately, there are people in Canada who share that outlook on life. There are people who see rape victims not as people who are suffering from a trauma, but as women who "deserved it". There are people who think that wife beating is something to laugh at or nothing to be concerned about. Some believe that the woman deserved it, like 25 per cent of the children who lived at a shelter and said it was appropriate for a man to hit a woman if the house were messy.

There is a deep and serious problem in our society, one that I do think Canadians are slowly starting to come to terms with. Women are now reporting violent crimes to police more often than they did in the past. Some people in our society think violence is increasing, but I do not think so. I remember 20 years ago when a badly beaten woman appeared on my doorstep with two very small children, looking for a safe haven. At that time there were no shelters for battered women. Our society did not acknowledge wife battering as a problem. The police did not charge husbands with any crime. Before that, wife beating was a perfectly legal activity; women could not get a divorce on the grounds of assault or because their husbands had beaten them to a pulp. That was not considered a good enough reason. It was a private shame to be hidden, lied about and suffered in silence.

These attitudes still run through our society as an undercurrent in the 1990s but committed groups of people have set up shelters. They are talking about the issues. They are making educational videos and anti-violence television commercials. They are protesting against unfair court decisions.

This bill is designed to help that work by focusing attention on the facts of violence against women. I hope that the media will participate by having special issues of newspapers and magazines or TV and radio programs on violence against women at least on that day.

The more we talk about it, learn the facts and teach our children and society that violence against women is wrong and never justifiable, the more progress we will make as a society toward a fair and equitable community in Canada.

The national day of remembrance and action could be a day on which people are encouraged to donate time or money to shelters for battered women and to rape relief centres, and to talk about the attitudes and circumstances that allow violence against women to continue.

We should be aware of violence against women every day of the year, but at least we can start with one day.

One hundred women a year are killed as a result of domestic violence and a woman is raped every 17 minutes in Canada. This horrible situation warrants at least one day of prevention and education.

One in 10 women is or has been battered by the man with whom she lives or did live. Every 17 minutes a sexual assault is committed in Canada and 90 per cent of the victims are female.

Between 63 and 83 per cent of female victims are assaulted by someone they know and trust. Incidence of assault is far greater for aboriginal women and disabled women. Forty-eight per cent of Canadians reported that they personally knew of situations in which women were physically assaulted.

A Canada-wide survey in 1985 found that fewer than 40 per cent of female sexual assault victims and less than half of wife assault victims had made a police report. Studies show that women's reluctance to report violent attacks against them is related to the fear of retaliation that would result in further violence or death. It is also related to a lack of confidence in the police and the courts, and to feelings of shame and embarrassment. The more we talk about violence and its causes, the more confidence it will give women who have been assaulted to report it to the police and to take action.

The physical effects of this violence include broken bones, internal injuries, bruises, black eyes, burns, bites, lacerations, knife wounds, gun wounds and death. The psychological effects are low self-esteem, constant fear for her own safety and the safety of her children, loss of control and isolation.

Women who have been sexually assaulted are approximately five times more likely to have a nervous breakdown, six times more likely to attempt suicide and eight times as likely to commit suicide or die prematurely. Physical and sexual abuse may lead to drug and alcohol abuse.

The sheer volume of female victimization makes it unlikely that these incidents are independent of our system of values and attitudes or that the perpetrators are all aberrant or insane individuals. Perpetrators overwhelmingly hold views about sex roles of male authority and female compliance, and believe they have the right to control persons with less status than themselves. Our society is not telling them that they are wrong.

We live in a society which has tolerated incest, sexual assault and wife beating for centuries.

It is a problem of global proportions. Sexual assault and wife beating have been used to control the behaviour and the sexuality of women not only by the men who resort to violence, but by the society which ignores it.

Rape victims are still raked over the coals not only by the courts but often by the families and by their own friends: "What were you wearing? Why were you out so late? Why did you trust him? Could you not see it coming? But he is your husband, you owe it to him." It is as if human rights are suspended if a person is wearing a particular piece of clothing.

Nowhere in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms have I seen a clause that says one's right to security of the person is suspended based on the article of clothing one is wearing. This argument seeks to make women responsible for the violent acts of others. Sexual assault is not about sex; it is not about sexual desirability; it is about power. It is about a man believing he has the right to force something on a woman against her will. It has happened to women of all ages, from babies of three weeks of age to 96 year-old women. Women with little or no power are especially targeted. Disabled women and aboriginal women, the women whom our society allows to be discriminated against, are at a special risk of violence.

It happens in war time, it happens in peace time. People have said there is a war being waged against women all the time. Racism, discrimination against the disabled and all forms of discrimination and oppression merge with the sickness of sexism to intensify the hatred and violence against disadvantaged women.

Women in all strata of society are abused. Why should we be afraid on our own streets, the streets for which we pay taxes? Why should we be afraid in our own homes? We are most likely to be assaulted in our own homes by someone whom we know and trust.

Studies of male college students in Canada and the U.S. show that one third of these students said they would rape a woman if they thought they could get away with it. In the U.S., 15 per cent of college women had been raped within the legal definition of rape.

Research shows that the public perceives physical and sexual assault against women to take place mainly among the poor and among those with little formal education, and committed by deviant individuals. Unless grievous bodily injury results, these injuries are not regarded as causing long term harm to the victim. Many of these victims are seen to be the authors of their own attack because they are seen as too provocative, too sexy, too angry or too imprudent.

We lack an understanding of the social and economic circumstances and of the threats of more violence or death that keep battered women from leaving abusive situations. Most people do not realize that many of the women killed are murdered by former husbands and lovers after the women have left the abusive situation. All of our society must take responsibility to help women in crisis.

Some people even believe violence against women is natural because men tend to be stronger than women. I think this takes a very dim view of men. If one in ten women is battered, then nine out of ten men do not batter.

Most men are responsible and caring. Violence against women is a learned and an unnatural behaviour. It is based upon the premise that men should be able to control the lives of the women with whom they are intimate. An example of this is Jean-Guy Tremblay who tried to force Chantal Daigle to bear his child and was violent and abusive toward her. It is worth noting that this man continued his violent behaviour toward other women who came into his life after Chantal Daigle refused to see him any longer.

• (1120)

Men who are violent most often do not stop simply at physical abuse. They may burn or destroy a favourite picture or possession, kill the woman's pets, or threaten violence toward her children. Battered women may live with psychological terror, never knowing when the next outbreak will be, or for what inane reason.

The man often makes her quit her job or gets her fired by harassing her at work. He isolates her from her workplace, her family and her friends. He tries to have complete control over her life and thoughts.

Similarly, sexual assault is a matter of control.

The woman's will is overrun, what she wants does not count and she is humiliated and violated in a way that is unmatched by any other experience.

People have talked about having their homes, their territory, robbed and the violation that they feel as a person when this happens. Can you imagine what it is like when it is your own body rather than your home and your possessions?

The lack of understanding many Canadians have about this issue makes me want to weep. But instead of, or maybe in addition to, weeping, I want to do something concrete about it.

My bill is non-partisan, one of the very few bills of this nature ever to reach the House of Commons. We have left the days when politicians simply joked about this issue. Today, most of us can co-operate on an issue as serious as this.

All of society pays for violence against women. We pay in health bills, in the court system and in penal institutions. Studies show that 80 per cent of women in Canadian jails are victims of sexual and physical abuse. Half of young offenders were exposed to domestic violence.

With few economic options, women who leave abusive situations often end up on social assistance.

How long are we going to put up with the violent abuse of our mothers, sisters, and daughters? It is wrong. It must change. The time for change is long past due. We must join together, men and women, to prevent this violence.

As the Church Council on Justice and Corrections and the Canadian Council on Social Development have stated in their document "Family Violence in a Patriarchal Culture", family violence does not happen in a vacuum. Social circumstances support it and allow it to continue.

I urge men to participate in social change by speaking out when they hear others make derogatory comments about women, comments which rob women of their dignity and their humanity.

We can all help our neighbour who is being abused. We can give our time and money to groups and organizations which help survivors of violence. We can educate our society. We can make change.

We can press for policies that give women economic options so that they can achieve meaningful equality. Once all of society accepts women and men as equal human beings, that the place of women and men is where they want to be and not some role simply designated to them at birth, that is when violence against women will no longer be tolerated and may no longer occur.

Judy Chicago, a well known feminist artist, expressed her vision of a future without violence, a world in which both female and male are valued and respected. She said:

> And then all that has divided us will merge
> And then compassion will be wedded to power
> And then softness will come to a world that is harsh and unkind
> And then both men and women will be gentle
> And then both women and men will be strong
> And then no person will be subject to another's will.

I want to thank the House for its support of this bill. I want to thank Suzanne Edward, the mother of Anne Marie Edward who was killed in the massacre, and I want to thank women's organizations and groups in every region of this country which have supported this effort.

Together I know that we can make a difference. We can do no less.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to say I support this bill designate a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, to be held on December 6 of each year, the anniversary of the slaughter of 14 young women at the University of Montreal in 1989.

Members of all parties have acknowledged the significance of this tragic event in the lives of Canada's men and women. Every year on December 6, we will think back to that sad day in our history and we will remember the victims. Those who experienced the events of that day will relive the shock, horror and anger that they felt. We will remember the candlelight vigil in the snow for 14 young women who were killed simply because they were women. We will remember the grief and sympathy we felt for their families and friends.

This bill guarantees that future generations will also remember. It ensures that the memory of 14 brave women will always remain with us. In fact, their spirit lives on, if we consider what has been done since the tragedy at the École polytechnique to eliminate violence against women. Everywhere in Canada, the initial shock was followed by an increased awareness of the constant threat of violence against women in our society.

People are now determined to act. The loss of these young women has made people realize there is a need for accelerating and co-ordinating efforts to eliminate violence against women.

As we become more aware of the extent of the problem, we realize this is not an easy task. Violence against women is deeply rooted in a social process that stresses the traditional roles of men and women, the so-called stereotypes. These stereotypes can become apparent in many ways, ranging from sexual harassment to mental cruelty, from sexual assault to murder.

Attempts to deal with the problem of violence against women must consider the social, economic and political structures that today confine women in a position of inequality. At the same time, we must keep looking for ways to increase the opportunities and choices open to women.

I think that if we want to deal with or try to deal with the problem of violence against women, we must base our efforts on four principles.

First, we must take a co-ordinated, many-facetted approach. This approach is reflected in the $136 million initiative on family violence announced by this government in February. It establishes a partnership between six federal departments and agencies with common concerns in this area.

But there is more. No single government can deal effectively with the problem of violence against women without the co-operation of other levels of government, without the interest and expertise of other parties, including those who work directly with the victims as well as the researchers, women's groups, service clubs, educators, unions and professional associations. Creating and strengthening alliances between these parties is one of the objectives of the family violence initiative.

The provinces and territories play a key role in our efforts to combat violence against women. Last year, federal, provincial and territorial ministers responsible for the status of women issued a declaration on violence against women at Lake Louise in Alberta. At their annual meeting, to be held two weeks from now in Newfoundland, the ministers will discuss the strategies designed by their respective governments following this declaration. They will seek ways to integrate and co-ordinate their activities and those of municipalities, the private sector and non-governmental organizations.

The second principle is the need for examining the underlying causes of violence against women. Causes are deeply rooted and the solutions are complex. Yet, little research was done on the underlying causes of violence against women. Before we can find effective long term solutions, we must determine the underlying cause of violent behaviour.

• (1130)

Professional organizations such as the Canadian Association of university teachers (CAUT) are among those which have been spearheading the action. Our government is presently working with CAUT to set up centres of excellence to promote research on the underlying causes of violence against women.

Better data and better research will help develop effective solutions relating to prevention, which I consider as the third component in this approach.

While it is important to help those who are presently victims of violence, more needs to be done yet to protect would-be victims. More needs to be done to fight the widespread attitudes that perpetuate violence against women. More needs to be done in the way of channeling our innovative imagination and our resources towards durable long term solutions.

One thing we could do to start with is change attitudes in our families and schools. In a number of schools, the approach used to tackle the problem of violence against women is to teach children some conflict resolution skills as an alternative to violence. Also, the Canadian Teachers' Federation has launched the "Thumb" project with the financial assistance of the Family Violence Prevention Division of Health and Welfare Canada to encourage discussion in the classroom as well as activities aimed at preventing violence.

Fourth, we must consider the challenge of preventing violence against women in the broader context of a program to empower women.

As long as women remain afraid of violence, they cannot become fully equal. As long as there are women beaten up by their spouses, women sexually assaulted on dates and women harassed at the workplace, women will be deprived of the fundamental right to personal safety.

Mr. Speaker, our government is trying to free women from violence and the fear of violence. Last month, in the Speech from the Throne, this government announced the appointment of a blue ribbon panel of Canadian men and women to inquire into the various dimensions of the problem of violence against women and suggest innovative solutions.

This announcement provides an opportunity to put in place an innovative, responsive and flexible system to try and find solutions. The Minister responsible for the Status of Women, the hon. Mary Collins, asked women's organizations across the country as well as the provinces and territories to make suggestions on what the mandate and membership of this committee should be.

The committee will also benefit from the invaluable recommendations contained in the soon to be tabled report from the sub-committee on the Status of Women. As you will know, the sub-committee has heard, over the past six months, the testimonies of about 35 groups representing a wide cross-section of Canadian men and women concerned about violence against women.

Mr. Speaker, this government is determined to act on this. Things will not change overnight, not even within a week or a year. While I fully support this bill, I have to say, that I hope this national day of remembrance can be taken off our calendars in the future and that the day will come when there is no need for a day dedicated to action on violence against women. I am convinced that, with the help and cooperation of the thousands of Canadian men and women who have voiced their determination to eradicate this plague from our society, some day this problem will disappear.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure I stand today to support this private member's bill initiated by the member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

I want to take a moment to pay a tribute to the member for New Westminster—Burnaby and say that in our time here in this Chamber, over the last two and a half years, in spite of political differences and differences in political philosophy, I can truly say that one of the people who has taught me that sisterhood is powerful is the member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

I give this bill very strong support. To say that it is an idea whose time has come is to understate the case. None of us who lived through that terrible night, December 6, 1989, will ever forget the horror of the deaths of those young women in the prime of life, cut down because they were women. None of us will forget the shock we felt at the fact that this kind of senseless atrocity could take place in a country which, in spite of all its difficulties, we all felt somehow was better than that. None of us will every forget the numbness and then the pain that followed when we realized that this terrible incident had, indeed, taken place and that those young lives had been snuffed out.

One of the things we can do to put some meaning into that senseless atrocity is to support this bill. I am delighted that we have put down the cudgels of partisanship on this matter and that all parties are supporting this bill, and its quick passage.

I spoke some weeks ago with Madam Susanne Edward, mentioned by my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby. She spoke of the necessity to give meaning to what had happened, to give meaning to those lives being cut off in their prime. Nothing could be more essential to this meaning than bringing the issue of violence against women into the national spotlight.

We all lived through the horror of December 6, 1989, but horror is a daily occurrence for literally thousands of Canadian women. Every day begins with the anticipation of an attack, the fear of an attack, the worry that an attack may take place, and often that attack will come from the person closest to her.

We have talked a lot about the causes and the reasons for the increasing violence against women in our own society and in western society in general. The hon. parliamentary secretary, and I compliment her as well on her speech on this bill, talked about the fact that we do not have the empirical data, the research that we need to tell us what the reasons and the causes are for this horror that takes place.

What we do have is something that is actually also rooted in women's experience, and it is what we call anecdotal evidence, of women talking to each other in their homes, in women's centres, in classrooms. Not that this is not valid evidence, but we need hard scientific proof to show us what the different causes are. We all know, through this anecdotal evidence, that a cause of some of the violence against women is alcoholism. We all know that a cause is bad economic circumstances. We all know that a cause is the cycle of violence. In other words, someone who was abused as a child or saw his mother being abused or saw women being abused has a very strong chance of growing up to be an abuser himself.

These are not the only causes. There are other causes that we know little or nothing about. We also do not know the intertwining linkages of these causes, the tinderbox effect which sets it off.

Just this past weekend, yesterday as a matter of fact, I was in my apartment in Halifax.

• (1140)

My telephone rang. It was a woman who had been a client of mine. She had experienced an outbreak of violence by her partner on Saturday night. She was upset, she was still in a certain amount of pain—both physical pain and emotional pain—and most particularly, she was ashamed.

I became angry on the telephone, trying very carefully to make her understand that I was not angry with her but angry at the situation where the victim bears the shame for someone else's act.

All women are aware of this whole aura of "victimology" that violence against women has set up, whether that violence is abusive in the non-sexual sense or abusive in the sexual sense. We are all aware that the general accepted theory in our society for hundreds of years has been that if a woman is assaulted, somehow it is her fault.

This has become so ingrained in our society that women themselves believe it. It was that belief that I could hear in her voice that set off a chain reaction in me, and I got a little bit preachy, I am afraid, and said: "Look, stop thinking that it is your fault. It is not your fault. It does not matter what you did, no one has the right to hit you".

No matter how many times we say that, no matter how many times counsellors in transition houses and social workers and doctors and all of the various professionals and experts who work in this field say that, deep down in every abused woman's heart and mind is the belief that: "Yes, it is my fault".

Again, we have to get at the root causes that take a woman's self-image and drive it down to the level where she can be convinced to believe that canard.

Another of the reasons that I support this bill so strongly is that it is another spotlight on the question of violence bringing the issue into the public forum of discussion. As a result of this, people will finally be made to understand that this is not something that happens to some fringe group, that it is not something that happens to some under-class of society, that violence against women takes place at every level, in every economic bracket, in every social strata, in every educational strata in our country. No woman is free from fear of violence in Canada, and if she thinks she is I can only say she is misguided. Every woman sitting in this House today knows that and knows it viscerally.

I am happy to say that I think a great many of the men sitting in this House at least acknowledge it intellectually.

There is a continuum of violence against women. It begins in some cases with sexual harassment, with demeaning cracks, with jokes that we are supposed to accept and take in good spirit, and runs the gamut to actual physical beating and death. We have seen too much of this in this country. We have sacrificed hundreds of women as we refused to face this question head on and deal with it.

I hope and I pray, along with all of my female colleagues in this House and my male colleagues as well, that taking this day, December 6, and making it a day of remembrance but even more a day of action will start the kind of action that we need, that we must have in this country to ensure that women, and most particularly our daughters, will be able to walk out of their homes and into their classrooms and into their jobs without fear.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to support the motion of the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

No member of this House will ever forget the day we received the tragic news from École Polytechnique. None of us will ever forget the wave of grief and anger that swept the country when we learned that a lone gunman had brutally taken the lives of 14 young women engineering students.

All members of this House were united in expressing our profound sense of loss and horror and in extending our condolences to the families and loved ones of those women whose lives, which had shown such promise, were exterminated without any provocation by a young man insanely jealous of the achievement of women in a non-traditional field.

December 6, 1989, is a day that many Canadians, and particularly women in Canada, will recall vividly for all their lives. It was one of those searing events when a story we hear on the news manages to hit home with a sense of personal loss and tragedy.

For all Canadians, women and men, who had believed that we lived in a progressive society, a society of compassion and the pursuit of equality, the event has been a reminder of how far we have yet to go.

For women across Canada who saw, in the brutal slaying, an extreme example of the terror and violence inflicted on women every day, often in more subtle ways but sometimes with blood and death, the event has left deep wounds.

For those who lived through the terror, for those who knew the young women personally, the event has also left deep wounds. This legislation is about healing those wounds.

We cannot bring back to life those 14 young women, but we can ensure that their deaths will not be forgotten. In our remembrance we can ensure that their loss will continue to call us to action. Our remembrance will rally us to renew our efforts to eradicate violence against women in this country. We will vow to rededicate our efforts to ensure that violence against women will not be tolerated.

Let no one forget that the capacity for such brutal misogyny exists in our society. Let no one forget that acts of violence, less sensational, less publicized, but every bit as pernicious, occur every day in our streets and even in our homes.

In the same year that these 14 lost their lives, another 100 women in Canada were murdered by their partners. These deaths are part of a much larger phenomenon that covers a range of violence: murder, physical assault, sexual assault, psychological abuse and emotional abuse. These are all examples of violence against women and we are just beginning to acknowledge the enormous scope of this violence in our society.

We know, from a 1981 Winnipeg study, that more than 6 in 10 female victims will be assaulted by someone they know. We know from Battered but not Beaten—Preventing Wife Abuse in Canada, a 1987 publication of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, that at least one woman in 10 is battered by her male partner.

These tragic statistics are available to us, but one of the most serious problems when dealing with violence against women is that there is so much we do not know. Much of the violence goes unrecorded, much of the data is incomplete. Some victims fear the consequences of continuing to live in their homes after reporting a family member who has abused them. Some victims think they would do best to forget. They try to bury the violence deep in their thoughts and deny its existence. They do not fully understand the deep-seated trauma that such violence inflicts and that will, in all likelihood, stay with them the rest of their lives.

By recognizing December 6 as a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, Parliament will send a signal to those women. As members of this House, we will be telling them that we know such violence takes place, that we know of their trauma and that they are not alone in their suffering. We will be inviting them to join us as we move forward together to eradicate violence against women from Canadian society.

We will be sending a signal to all Canadians through our solidarity of purpose in ensuring that violence against women shall not be ignored. We will be helping to create a social environment in which attitudes toward women which promote such violence must wither and die.

The idea of designating the date of the École Polytechnique disaster as a day of remembrance and action has wide support. It is being supported by members from all sides of the House and it responds to recommendations that have come from women's groups across the country, as well as from the many individuals who were touched by the tragedy.

The National Council of Women of Canada and a number of other national women's groups recommended December 6 be proclaimed a national day of mourning.

• (1150)

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women proposed that the day be set aside as a day of recognition of women victims at the hands of male violence.

I commend the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby for tabling a bill that is not content to let December 6 be solely a day of remembrance. It will also be a day of constructive action. Already we have seen many examples of how the tragedy has galvanized Canadians to act.

At universities and colleges across Canada students and faculty are speaking out against practices that contribute to the sexist environment in which violence against women festers. We are seeing the establishment of sexual harassment policies and committees, as well as status of women offices and women's centres.

The federal government has shown leadership and vision through its commitment to Canada's first national inquiry into violence against women and its $136 million renewal of the family violence initiative.

The tragedy of December 6 has also led to action by fostering a renewed commitment to opening career opportunities to women, particularly with respect to science and engineering.

The Canadian Federation of University Women, the Canadian Council of Engineers Memorial Foundation, Société Alfred Dallaire, and École Polytechnique are among the organizations, institutions and corporations that have established scholarships in memory of the victims.

Many of these scholarships are designed to encourage women to pursue careers in engineering, the discipline studied by 12 of the École Polytechnique victims. These scholarships will help to break down the barriers that have prevented women from assuming full equality in our society.

When we break down the stereotypes and open non-traditional careers to women, we undermine the attitudes of sexism that can give rise to violence.

Our efforts to eradicate violence against women cannot be separated from our concern for economic equality of women. The two are bound together.

When we provide women with economic freedom through employment equity and measures to integrate work and family responsibilities, we provide women with the freedom to leave abusive situations. We again contribute to breaking down the stereotypes.

At the same time, we will never fully succeed in removing the obstacles to full equality so long as violence against women continues to plague our society.

When the basic right to security of the person is denied, no one can participate as an equal. Violence and the fear of violence are depriving women in Canada and around the world of their ability to achieve equality.

No one can doubt the persistence of violence against women, but at the same time no one should doubt our determination to eliminate it.

By setting aside December 6, we will have occasion each year in Canada to pause and consider what we have done to eradicate this evil, and what remains to be done.

We will have occasion to mourn those whom we have lost to violence, and honour those who show their determination to work toward equality for women.

One example of that determination came to light this past year when one of the prestigious Canada Scholarships was awarded to Nathalie Provost.

Nathalie was among the women wounded by the gunman at École Polytechnique. At the Canada Scholarship Assembly at École Polytechnique, she declared: "He did not win."

Determined words. They are words that speak on behalf of the women engineering students at École Polytechnique. A year after the tragedy, a record 222 women, a quarter of the class, enrolled as first-year engineering students.

The words "he did not win" are a call to action as much as they are a declaration of how women have overcome the Montreal tragedy. They are words that speak for women everywhere, women who face the threat of violence in their lives, on the streets and even in their homes every day of the year.

It is a fitting memorial, a day to assess and remember and look at the issue of violence against women. It is a particularly fitting memorial because these young women were the victims of a young man, himself a twisted product of a violent father whose attitudes affected his son.

Such sick attitudes and actions should not be tolerated in our society. Their consequences are terrible.

As members of Parliament, it is our duty to ensure that the declaration of Nathalie Provost rings true for all women.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find the House disposed to complete this matter and put it to a vote.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that I fully support the bill. We are looking forward to its passage with the agreement of all parties in the House of Commons.

We need to see more of this in Private Members' Business. We need to see more opportunities where members of Parliament from all political parties can stand in their places and speak their minds on matters of interest and concern to them. It serves as part of the policy of trying to reform Parliament so that it becomes more creditable with the Canadian people.

I am pleased to put my support behind this bill. I hope it can be used as an example of what members of Parliament can do if they decide to work together as backbenchers, not always looking to government or party position on private members' initiative.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I don't want to prolong the debate unnecessarily, because this is a very important bill.

[English]

In addition to what the member for Peterborough said, it is very important to point out that the concerns raised by this Private Member's Business are shared by many in the House of Commons as well as by women. I think there will be unanimous support from all parties and from both genders in supporting this initiative.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

[English]

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I just want to take a quick moment to thank all of the members in the House of Commons, regardless of their political affiliation, for the support that they have shown me in this Private Member's Bill. I would particularly mention the minister responsible for the status of women and my colleague from Halifax, but more than that there has been support in all political parties for this private member's bill. I want to thank all members who spoke today and those who have not had an opportunity to speak for their support as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Would the House agree to let the Chair call it twelve o'clock, so that we can proceed with Government Orders?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–15, an act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions, and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

• (1200)

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning some difficulty on my part, and I believe the Official Opposition as well, of adapting to the new rules. The new rules that this House approved required any motions to have been in by 2 p.m. on Friday. Unfortunately, we got our amendments in at 2.15 p.m. They are fairly similar to the motions that were placed before the committee itself and rejected by the committee so, therefore, there is another aspect of it. But I am wondering, in the interests of trying to make a bill better, whether there would be a disposition in the House to allow us to waive that particular rule and have the motions tabled.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there are obvious precedent setting and other consequences to such a request. It might be appropriate to have discussions between House leaders to reach a conclusion to it, but certainly on the spur of the moment it would not be a wise precedent, particularly given the two sides to the issue. It is not simply a timing issue, but there is also a substantive issue buried there.

If he and his party want to pursue it with the House leaders, as we move through the debate, I think that might be appropriate. But at this point it would not be appropriate to simply, on the spur of the moment, give that kind of permission.

Mr. Angus: I appreciate the comments of the chief government whip. However, there is another reality. There are no motions before us at report stage, so my understanding is that all we can do is pass judgment on the bill and then move on to third reading immediately. The only way we could do it is if there would be agreement at some point. I agree that reverting back to report stage should be done by the House leaders, assuming that we don't complete third reading today.

Mr. Hawkes: One of our long-established traditions in the House is the tradition of unanimous consent for the House to do what the House chooses to do, and that would be available to us today. It would take that kind of consent at this moment to do what the hon. member is suggesting. It will take that kind of consent if, in fact, there is an agreement reached to seek it.

By refusing unanimous consent at this point we are essentially in the same position in terms of what he would like to do as I described earlier.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair is somewhat at a loss, since there is no minister of the Crown present. Do I hear a response from the government Whip?

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: There are some cabinet meetings going on and with the transition at 12 o'clock, they have gone by their intended termination time, and I think we will have a minister in the House in the not too distant future. If we would care to just simply suspend for a moment or two, we will be able to meet that technical requirement.

Mr. Boudria: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, since we do have a moment because no minister is here.

I want to take the opportunity to raise this matter with the government whip. If there is an agreement to recognize amendments, as was suggested a few moments ago, I want to indicate to the House and to the government whip that my colleagues would also like to move amendments as well. Perhaps in a discussion among House leaders there would be consideration to that particular proposal as well as the acceptance of amendments coming from our colleagues in the New Democratic Party. I just wanted to take this opportunity to so inform the government whip.

No, I am not admitting that we have missed on something. It is nothing of the sort. It is simply that if this courtesy is extended to one opposition party, I cannot see why the other opposition party could not similarly avail itself of the same opportunity. That is basically the request I am not formulating, not in anticipation of receiving an answer right now, but one in the future.

With that, I see a minister coming into the House and the government has just resolved the embarrassment that it had put itself in.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, it would indeed, be a surprise if we moved into a negotiating session that there were not comments and requests to come from all corners of the House. Indeed, we might expect that to be part of the conversation as well.

[Translation]

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the report stage of the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

[English]

Mr. McDermid (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read a third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I had assumed that the government was going to lead off as usual, so I would like to give the normal courtesy.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today for third reading of Bill C-15, an act to provide for certain matter respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports.

Bill C–15 will allow the government to proceed with negotiations that are under way, to effect those transfers and fulfil the objectives of the government's policy in this matter, keeping in mind that this bill deals exclusively with employee related matters.

As all members are aware, the government's objectives from the beginning were to allow the airports to better serve local community interests, to enhance regional economic development potential, and to permit the national airport system to operate in a more cost–effective and commercial manner.

This policy aims to enhance the efficient commercial operation of federal airports through a more locally responsive management structure.

This government's vision is that this new structure will allow airports to respond quickly to changing needs and market forces with innovative ideas.

The local airport authorities, or LAAs will benefit from increased flexibility that will enable them to take advantage of the entrepreneurial opportunities that present themselves. They will be in a positive position to directly contribute to regional development initiatives.

The government set out very clear principles for these transfers in the original policy statement and the supplementary principles which set out the conditions under which airports would be transferred to local authorities.

It might be worth repeating that under the government's principles, permanent employees must be offered work by the local airport authorities in a job with pay and benefits comparable to what they received while employed by Transport Canada. Airport employees will be properly looked after.

Airport staff are dedicated and skilled professionals. This bill, along with the principles of the transfer process, will ensure that they are treated fairly and equally.

These local airport authorities will be non–profit organizations. Current and forecast net revenue generated by the airport must be guaranteed to the government, along with a share of the increased revenue produced by the local airport authority.

• (1210)

Passage of this bill should greatly contribute to allaying any concerns that affected airport site employees may have by dealing with their major questions concerning pensions, benefits, and collective agreements.

This airport transfer legislation would also ensure that the LAAs continue to provide bilingual services to the public at former federal airports.

Negotiations are well advanced with local airport authorities in Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and Montreal. The signature of former transfers in these communities could take place as early as this fall. This House may already be aware that serious interest in airport transfers is also evident in such communities as Moncton, Quebec City, St. Foy, Windsor, Thunder Bay, Winnipeg, and Kamloops.

In summary, this bill, which will allow the government to proceed with the transfer of airports to locally established airport authorities, will allow Transport Canada to be in an even better position to focus its energies and resources on the vital aspects of transportation in Canada.

In closing, I just want to thank all hon. members for their interest in this bill and in this process.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to address this legislation before the House at third reading. It is the bill which will transfer the authority of airports in Canada to the local community groups that have shown interest in developing programs and business plans to take over the operation of airports throughout these communities.

Let me say at the outset that the comments I intend to make today are much the same as the comments I made when we went through committee and second reading in the House. We on this side agree in principle on the initiative of transferring the authority for the management of airports in Canada to local and community groups.

During the implementation of this program, though, we have some very vital concerns with respect to how this transfer of authority will take place, and those are the areas I wish to address today. I hope our colleagues on the other side of the House will take some interest in these remarks because it will mean a smooth and easy transition from Department of Transport administration to that of local airport authorities.

What we will see here in the transition period is a similarity in Canada developing with what we already have seen in the United States where most of the airports are already operated by what is termed the local authority or a local management group. They have a far-reaching input into the affairs of airport management in their country, and we would hope it would be something analogous to what we will have here in Canada.

I cannot emphasize strongly enough that unlike the government's ill-conceived policy of deregulation in the transport industry the concept of local airport authority means better service to the communities we represent, and not less. Mainly for this reason we support in principle the idea and the thought of local airport authorities.

Local airport authorities are proceeding across Canada. Already, as we have heard, large communities are preparing to implement this policy. During the debate, as we crossed Canada on the Open Skies inquiry into getting better service between the United States and Canada, we heard very many vigorous approaches from people who had done a great deal to put themselves in place for the eventual taking over of the airports in their communities.

We were impressed with were the representations made by the airport authorities of the communities of Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver. I am told, but I am not sure at this stage, that there is an airport authority or steering group in the process of trying to bring local management in at Dorval airport.

It was interesting to hear these representations because the provincial governments in these three areas, Edmonton, Calgary, and Vancouver, were playing a very strong role in financing the local airports' initiatives. They are playing a strong role in fostering the idea that the area of responsibility should be at the local level.

Our cause for concern is simply—and I hope that this government would address this issue—the local airport authority act is dealing with every major airport in Canada and with smaller airports throughout the communities, but it is not addressing itself to the city of Toronto. One asks oneself: if local airport authorities are good for the rest of Canada, why have we got a different plan for Lester B. Pearson Airport in Toronto?

Toronto is becoming the hub of Canada. It is not the hub of Ontario; it is the hub of Canada. This is the paradox and the dilemma we on this side find ourselves in. If government members are proposing local airport authorities, why are they not proposing the same administration for Lester B. Pearson Airport as they are for other regions in Canada? Why are they so intent on local airport authorities, with which we agree in principle, but not intent on establishing a local airport authority for Lester B. Pearson in Toronto?

As we know, the Lester B. Pearson Airport in Toronto has already proceeded on a mode of privatization. They have already privatized Terminal 3, Trillium Airport. They are in the process of asking for requests for the privatization of Terminal 2, which is the terminal Air Canada mainly uses. Since most of the international lines have moved out of Terminal 1, there is a refurbishing of that terminal and there will be a proposal to ask for its privatization.

Any of us who have travelled through Terminal 2 in the recent past since the refurbishing program has started know full well that Terminal 2 is becoming one of the fine airports not only in Canada but in North America. With limited resources—I think the spending estimates are somewhere around $57 million—they have done some magnificent work in Terminal 2. They have opened up the sides to let the people look at the aircraft and loading zones, improved the loading zones, increased the ability to walk that long corridor with raised stairways and stairwells and assisted the handicapped in that airport. It is much easier to use that facility now than what we have experienced in the past.

What I am saying is that an expenditure of $57 million is a lot of money. When we start talking about airports, $57 million does not go that far when we consider that Trillium cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $500 million to build.

What I am trying to say is: Why would we want to privatize a very functional airport such as Terminal 2 and lose control of those very important areas that bring some form of regulation back to the airline industry? I am talking particularly of the gates and the slots, the two most important elements in the administration of an airline carrier within an airport proper. We all know that at times when we land on an Air Canada flight at Pearson Airport, and we are waiting to get into a slot and a gate at Terminal 2, we can look over at Trillium, Terminal 3, and find empty slots. The airline we may be using cannot get into that gate because it is not part of its system.

• (1220)

What I am saying is: Why should we be on a program to privatize Terminal 2 and take it out of public control or of local airport authorities whose main interest is supplying a good basis of airline traffic and control in the country?

I have nothing against private enterprise, but we know it has to pay $500 million or $600 million to recapture their investment in airline travel. I think the privatization concept, especially now with what Air Canada has done in Terminal 2, is something that I would wish and advise this government to reconsider. It should think of the consequences of totally privatizing the most important airport in Canada, while on the other hand we are asking to bring all other airports in Canada under local authority.

It is a paradox. It does not make sense. Why do we not just try to use one system throughout the country? The best system we see is a local airport authority. We on this side of the House think that Pearson International Airport with Terminals 1 and 2 should be considered for the local airport authority program—I see my colleague from Hamilton nodding her head—as well as what will happen under a local airport authority in Hamilton, to enhance the service to the travelling public.

I am sure this is not of prime consideration when privatization will cost upward of $1 billion for Terminals 1 and 2. We know that money, although the facilities at Terminals 1 and 2 are already very adequate, will just add to the cost to the air travelling public in Canada. It is something now that we should be looking at to try to defray the cost and keep the costs in line rather than let them expand.

I hope in the debate today as we discuss this bill that we get some response from our friends across to give us their idea of why on the one hand Terminals 1 and 2 in Toronto are not subject to the local airport authority as are all other airports in Canada.

As we talk about Pearson International Airport, we all know that the airlines in the United States have gone into what is called the hub and spoke operation, where they develop hubs throughout certain sections of the country. Then all the spokes of all the smaller airlines feed into this hub.

One of the unfortunate occurrences that we have seen in air travel in Canada is that when the hub does not operate the spoke cannot operate. If we continue to want to privatize Lester B. Pearson Airport in Toronto and for some reason that hub does not work, it affects all air travel. All the spokes across this country coming into Toronto Pearson are then inoperative because of the events and the weather that could affect the operation of that main hub in the Canadian air system.

I often think of an analogy when we talk about hub and spoke. When we were kids we had bicycles, and the most important part of that bicycle was the rear hub. If that did not operate, you had tremendous problems. All the spokes that would lead out into this wheel would cause tire repairs. You just could not operate your bicycle.

When we take that analogy into consideration, if that hub at Lester B. Pearson is not going to be operative, the spokes are going to be inoperative. That is not good for the air travellers in Canada.

I would like to suggest—and I hope I get some comments from our friends on the other side in the interests of air travellers, air cargo, special services and all other incidental items that are involved in the vital transportation industry in Canada—that we retain some degree of control.

When I say "we", I mean Canadians through the ability of local airport authorities should maintain some degree of control through Terminals 1 and 2 in Toronto. We could ensure that not only those who are using that facility but all other travellers from across Canada will have public input into the continued operation of that important hub at Lester B. Pearson Airport.

I would like to be parochial for a moment. In my own riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon, a committee has already been in place for well over 18 months and is preparing with great enthusiasm and great energy to meet the challenge of what local airports can bring and mean to our community.

The steering committee is a very competent group of people who have been gathered together and who welcome the chance to meet the needs of the community and run an airport authority in very cost efficient manner which because of bigness in our transportation system in this country leaves somewhat to be desired.

In establishing local airport authorities in general, efforts must be made to convince municipalities that this is not just another attempt by the government to divest itself of yet another financial burden. It was our concern in committee, it is our concern at second reading, and it is our concern today that as we transfer the authority to local airports we must ensure to every community in this country that the financial burden, if any, placed upon the operation of those airports will not result in the municipal taxpayer in every area of this country from being burdened with the operation of air services. That is not the intent. Members on this side of House would have nothing to do nor would we agree in any way with participating in this bill if it meant that the financial burdens of operating an airport would finally find their way into the local or municipal level. That is not the intent.

We on this side will always be on guard to make sure that the municipal taxpayer in Canada will not be forced or obligated to pay for air services in their own communities. It has always been a federal responsibility. It should continue to be a federal responsibility. What we are saying is that with the local airport authority we think and we trust that it will be an enterprise that can be self-paying.

Let me say, again with emphasis, that it is not our intention on this side of the House to place the financial burden of these airports on municipalities. It is an opportunity for municipalities to decentralize from Ottawa and other regional transportation offices so that the control of the airports themselves will become part of the local concern.

We must bear in mind that the intent of the legislation is to make airport management more responsive to the needs of any given community in Canada. At the same time it is imperative that Transport Canada remains responsible for all air side operations of the airport. Another cause of concern on this side of the House as we went through committee hearings was that an airport has two components: it has an air side and it has a ground side.

The air side is not in any part negotiable in this agreement. The air side is responsible for the safety of air traffic in Canada, and I am talking about air traffic controllers and the training of air traffic controllers, their work schedules, the climate control and the atmospheric control. All those areas and all those government agencies are responsible for ensuring good, safe quality of air transportation in Canada. It is not part of this legislation and it shall remain intact for the safety of all air travellers in Canada.

We have a record in Canada with respect to air safety that is the envy of every country in the world. It is not our position on this side of the House that any of those safety features which respect air side be part of this. It should remain under the management and under the control of Transport Canada.
