The ground side is the other aspect of air passenger services. Ground side operations, which is what we are referring to in this legislation, is the part we consider could be better administered by local airport authorities in the communities in which we reside.

It must be understood that the way in which a new system will operate is to afford the local authority the flexibility to manage according to local needs as far as the terminal and ground side facilities are concerned. As I said previously, ground side services only. The operation of the airport proper, the operation of the concessions, the operations of the grounds surrounding the runways and the use of those grounds to the best advantage of the community are all ground side services. Up to this point in time maybe the community has not had a fair chance to direct its best ability toward running that operation. That is where the local group will place its emphasis.

Consequently, given the sensible rationale approach to airport management, local authorities will be able to effect the changes the community needs, effect the changes the community deserves, and effect the changes on a very cost efficient basic.

I am speaking of improving services. When we talk of local airport authorities, I am speaking of improving the services these local airports already enjoying, not denying them any services; attracting more passengers to the air industry; attracting more industry that is responsive to the needs of the air industry; attracting more jobs within the airport community than we heretofore have had; meeting all the needs of a region that an airport service requires; and operating these airports on a very cost effective basis.

Anyone should be able to see that these goals can best be met at the local level. I want to say at this time that in saying they can best be met at the local level, I am in no way insinuating or impugning any degree of not running these airports to the best of their ability by the present method of operation. They have done the best they can with the finances that they have had available to them and, as I say, the best they can not being part of the community. Being part of the community means they can offer better service.

As an example, if I can talk again about the community I represent and the airport, I think I can speak with a little authority on this because in one of my previous careers I spent several years working on airport property. There are several areas I have noticed that were perhaps not cost efficient and not properly administered mainly because of the absence of direct responsibility at that particular level.

Every major decision in the area that I represent was made 450–500 miles away from us. The decision affecting obligations in Ontario was made not in the province of Ontario but in another province. Perhaps these people who were making the decisions were not fully aware of the needs of Thunder Bay or north western Ontario; not only unaware of the needs, but these divisions operating under certain financial constraints which left the community, a smaller community like Thunder Bay, perhaps wanting because there were more important needs in other perhaps larger areas.

Let me perhaps give one example that I noticed when I was working at an airport. We are not talking a great deal of money. There was in the budgetary allotments for a period of time a request for security fencing around certain areas of the airport proper. I know this was on the expenditure side for several years and had been approved and taken out, approved and taken out. Then one day in the middle of winter, in fact it was toward the end of February, a construction firm moves into the local airport and starts to build the security fence around certain sections of the airport proper.

Building the fence is not an onerous job, but building a fence in the middle of February in Thunder Bay is not reasonable. We have a frost layer of approximately four feet. When they brought these huge machines in to dig holes to put the posts in, to dig through four feet of frost was next to impossible. The machines were there for about 30 days trying to get enough post holes dug through the frost layer in order to lay the fence.

After 30 days they gave up. They moved all of their equipment out of the community. To this day that fence has never been built. All I am saying is that if we had a proper airport authority on the site, first off we would not attempt to build a security fence and dig holes in the ground in the middle of February. We would do it on a more cost efficient basis and bring in contractors. Perhaps local contractors would be given the opportunity to come in and build that fence during the time it is conducive to do building of that type in the climate in which we live.

Another example that always caused me some concern in airports, not only in Thunder Bay but airports right across the country, was the methodology used in granting concessions on airport property.

I think we all know, those of us who live in smaller communities with airports, that the facilities provided at smaller airports are very, very important to the travelling public. During this period of time we have seen several concessions, especially the food concession, being administered and tendered out, and companies not from the community being involved in providing the service.

What eventually happens is that these companies find out that perhaps in smaller communities they do not have the volume of business they anticipated, that because of the fees charged for operating on airport property they are not doing as well as they expected. Then, several things happen: the service that is supposed to be provided starts to diminish, the facilities are not kept open during the time the travelling public requires those facilities, and the quality expected of an airport facility is not there. This is a trend that happens over a period of time.

What I have noticed is that when local concerns go into business enterprises at airports, they offer a good service and their reputation is involved. Just by way of example, the food service at the airport near where I live has had excellent service for the last 10 years, having taken over from a national company that could no longer provide the degree and the quality of service the people in our community expected. By bringing in a local restaurateur to supply those services, we have had magnificent service in that airport for the last 10 years. I hope that in whatever expansion programs are going ahead in our area, he will be given an extra added responsibility to continue the fine service that he has provided over the years.

Those are just a couple of examples where local airport authorities can make a real contribution to the services that are needed by the travelling public in Canada.

While we on this side of the House affirm our support for the policy in principle, we are concerned that the aims of the policy do not meet the obligations in a very sensible and fair manner.

We on this side of the House feel that the objectives of local airport authorities should be three-fold. I am hoping that we will monitor, and I am sure we will monitor, the transfer of local airport authorities, considering that their primary objectives would be, first, to serve the local community interests, second, to enhance economic development and, third, to operate airports in a cost-effective manner.

When we talk about serving local community interests, we can look at different airports in this country that provide air services, usually Toronto because it is a hub. All of us have gone to smaller airports and have seen the competitive airlines leaving the airport basically at the same time, within 10 or 15 minutes of each other, both leaving at seven o'clock in the morning or 7.15 in the morning, both leaving for the same destination and both travelling with less than a full load—sometimes less than 50 per cent, 60 per cent or 70 per cent of a load.

If we are really and truly interested in this country in cost saving and efficiency of fuel and in having our airports operate in an environment that allows them to produce a profit, perhaps the local airport authority could get involved in managing and assisting in the scheduling and providing of air services so that we would not see congestion at particular periods of time at airports, and then an absence of anybody at all waiting for the next aeroplane to arrive. This is clearly an area where the authority, operating on a local level, can serve a community.

I should also mention that I am very proud of a facility which happens to be in our airport, and is there because of the great generosity of a local family. The facility is for a search and rescue group which covers all of northern Ontario and parts of northern Manitoba searching for missing aircraft. With the combination of the tremendous volunteer involvement of a friend of mine, John Illingworth, who was the instrument that provided the leadership in this area, and the contribution of this very fine family in providing an airport facility which they were not using at that time, we have been able to establish one of the finest search and rescue units in all of Canada. This is something we are very proud of.

That is the type of local initiative which is needed and perhaps will be increased as each airport in this country becomes governed by people with a local concern.

Let me address the enhancement of economic development. As we travel with the transport committee, and through our responsibilities as critics, visiting most airports in the country, one of the things that comes to mind very clearly is that airports are surrounded by huge tracts of land. What we see in this land that is available for development is an almost instant industrial site that has all the services—water and sewage, and fire treatment facilities—that every industrial site in this country requires. With each local authority which takes over in its community, we have immediately another industrial site available for the community to develop. On these industrial sites I would envisage all services of an industrial nature that are required to be in the approximate vicinity of the airport proper.

The cargo industry, which is developing and increasing throughout the country, indicates that cargo facilities would be very important additions to airport properties. The packaging business, getting packages from point A to point B overnight, should be on airport properties. If an airport serves a large regional community, storage areas for goods before they are transferred either to the job site, a mining site, a forestry site, or any other economic area that requires that service would be useful.

These facilities are not now available at small airports throughout the country, but I am confident that if local authorities were to assess the needs of regional enterprise, they would begin to establish such facilities at all local airports.

This would also afford the opportunity to provide specialty services such as fire fighting, picture-taking facilities for designating areas for mining exploration, topography and cartography. Those facilities could be made available through the combined efforts of the authority and the local community.

Private recreational facilities which are growing by leaps and bounds in Canada can be further enhanced by local authorities in this country.

All of these ventures and initiatives taken by local authorities will enhance the cost-effectiveness of airports and perhaps create viable enterprise, the proceeds of which can be applied for the further benefit of the air-travelling public in Canada.

This legislation has only the bare bones of a policy which will become widespread throughout the country. It is so important that each community begins with good direction and guidance. Local airport management is in its infancy in Canada and this is a logical point to ensure that the policy gets off on the right foot, that mistakes are prevented, and that sound management principles are effected so that the community will benefit.

One of the very important considerations in this legislation is the fair treatment of personnel when authority is transferred from the Ministry of Transport to the local airport authority.

In my opinion, this bill does not go far enough in ensuring that Transport Canada employees will be totally protected during this transfer process.

I was surprised during the committee hearings, when we discussed this matter with the unions representing the employees working for Transport Canada, that there was no provision in their labour legislation that dealt with successor rights. Legislation like that should have a successor right provision in Canada, inasmuch as in the last four or five years we have seen a great change-over of Canadian ownership and businesses to private concerns. Without successor rights for the employees, it seems that there is some uncertainty with respect to employees' benefit packages and all of the obligations for which Transport Canada is responsible that have been negotiated over the years.

Successor rights in labour legislation simply mean that if someone takes over the operation of a business, leases a business or by any other means starts to run an enterprise that up to that time has been run by someone else, then every union agreement that was entered into by the previous owner, lessor, or whatever the case may be must be maintained by the business enterprise taking over the venture.

Without that in the legislation, I can see why the employees in these areas across Canada would have some degree of concern.

Successor rights provisions provide for the same union representing the same employees from the previous employer to the future employer. It says in the successor rights provisions that during the transfer of ownership there will be no raiding of employees by another union. That is forbidden in the successor rights provisions.

These provisions guaranteed the very same terms of employment, working conditions, grievance procedures, wage package and benefits for employees under a local airport authority that they experienced while working for Transport Canada.

We are going to be looking very closely at the progress of this government program. Inasmuch as it is selling off many of the Canadian assets, during the transition period we are going to recommend to the government that successor rights be included as a very important addition to the legislation that governs federal employees in federal ministries.

In the transition of authority from the Minister of Transport and the Department of Transport to the local airport authorities, even if successor rights are not in the contract or in the labour legislation, all successor rights provisions under the Canada Labour Code should be adhered to.

In this government's headlong rush to deregulate, privatize and sell off every institution we have in Canada, individuals have the right to be protected. There is no better way to protect those rights than invoking the successor rights provisions we have in other labour legislation in this country.

Another crucial area that we are concerned about as we start to transfer authority is the matter of safety and security from federal standards in our airports to local airport authority standards.

I have already gone through the process of stating the differences between air and terminal security. On the air side, there will be a continuation. On the terminal side, there will be additions to the ground security areas and the baggage claiming areas. We hope that we will be able to implement through local airport authorities security measures ensuring that every piece of luggage be subject to an X-ray and not only carry-on luggage, and that the owner of that luggage is responsible to fly with it.

Those are some of the safety items we can implement through the local level that up until this point we have not been able to implement because of some divisions across the country with respect to how we analyse the luggage that goes on to our aircraft.

With respect to carry-on luggage, it is getting to be a terrible consideration in Canada because of the spoke and hub concept. We in smaller communities are not getting on to DC-9s or 727s or 747s anymore. We are getting on 30 passenger aircraft and 40 passenger aircraft which do not allow the passenger to carry on the amount of luggage as do the larger aircraft. We have to come to grips in Canada with this program of carry-on luggage, especially at small airports.

I am sure that local airport authorities can come to grips with this issue and implement procedures which will be beneficial to all Canadian travellers.

I can see that my time is up. If I had had more time, I would have liked to discuss some of the recommendations we had put forward, some of the changes we had hoped for in the previous bill.

Let me close with a proposed amendment to the bill before the House. I move, seconded by the member for Kingston and the Islands:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the words "be now read a third time and do pass" and by substituting therefor the following:
> "be not read a third time, but be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport with instructions that the committee consider amending the bill in clause 2
> (a) by striking out lines 21 and 22 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:
> "body to which the minister is to transfer an airport by lease as a desig-"
> (b) by striking out lines 2 and 3 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:
> "ister is to transfer an airport by lease to a designated airport author-"

I thank the Chair for the opportunity to make those remarks with respect to the transition of responsibility to local airport authorities in Canada.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take under advisement the admissibility of the motion moved by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, looking at the clock, I am wondering whether there might be a disposition to call it one o'clock, that way I could start fresh at three.

An hon. member: We go right through.

Mr. Angus: My apologies for once again forgetting about the new rules and the new hours.

I am pleased to participate in the third reading debate of Bill C-15. I want to say at the outset that I do not support the concept of local airport authorities. I was surprised; I thought the Liberal Party did not support the concept of local airport authorities. From the speech by my neighbour to the north, it seems that has changed.

I want to explain why I do not support the concept. In part it is because of the work of the special committee on transport when we were examining the whole question of Open Skies.

Mr. Keyes (Hamilton West): I think just to clarify the confusion being put forward by my colleague from the NDP Party, the previous speaker from Thunder Bay—Nipigon did say that we, as a party on this side of the House, support in principle the airport authority and the idea of an airport authority. But those initiatives, and this is the point of order, and the transfer of the administration and management of airports to local authorities, meet certain criteria and certain conditions that we are very concerned about on this side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think this is a matter of opinion. I give the floor now to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the intervention of the member from one of the Hamilton ridings. One only has to look at the full text of the speech to see the amount of time spent glowing over the concept to appreciate what was being said.

Let me come back to the point I was making, why I oppose local airport authorities. One of the obstacles in the way of an agreement between Canada and the United States in a new bilateral air arrangement is the fact that the federal government of the United States no longer has control over its airports. They have local airport authorities. They have state authorities. They have airports that are run by airlines.

The federal government of the United States cannot go in and implement a bilateral agreement without first having to seek the approval of each and every one of those local airport authorities. Their system is fragmented.

Second, my preference as a Canadian is to have a national system owned and operated by the people of Canada. This system has been in place for years, ever since C. D. Howe started Trans-Canada Airlines and set up the airports across this country. If we allow the airports to run their own show, then no one can be assured of consistency of service from one end of this country, from coast to coast to coast, because each airport authority will do its own thing.

Nor can we be assured, and certainly this bill does not speak to it, that each and every airport authority will be selected in the same manner. During the legislative committee meetings, and we heard from a number of the local airport authorities which are up and running and ready to use this act, we heard some excellent examples of how they selected their people. It was not a bunch of boys in the back room who got together and said: "Let's take over the local airport", but it was municipal chambers of commerce, municipal councils, who together developed a process for selecting the members of the local airport authority.

In the area around Montreal, individual members of council from the participating municipalities all sent representatives. Others draw from a cross-section of the community but they do it in a public way, unlike the city of Thunder Bay, where a group of individuals decided on their own that they wanted to take over the local airport. There is no consistency and no protection for the public that have to use those facilities. That is where I am coming from in terms of the concept of local airport authorities.

Specifically, the purpose of the bill is to protect the collective bargaining rights, language rights and pension rights of federal public sector workers currently employed by Transport Canada during the transfer of airports from Transport Canada to local airport authorities. While we agree with the principle that the workers must be protected, we do not believe that this bill really does that. Certainly there is a lack of clarity in the bill, and in light of current worker-management relations, it does not provide the protection it purports to provide.

The union representing the workers, the Union of Transport Canada Employees, has cited several problems with this bill. Let me be specific. Workers or their representatives have not been a part of the process of negotiation and consultation that has gone on between Transport Canada and various local airport authorities. They are being presented with a take it or leave it option. This is not a good basis upon which to build good worker-employer relations. Second, the procedural and substantive rights of workers with regard to their existing pensions under the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act are not clear under this bill. It is being left up to Treasury Board to make regulations. Again, there has been no consultation on the development of these regulations with the workers involved.

Most importantly, the bill contemplates removing the workers from these plans. In the case of other privatizations of work places, workers have remained in these plans. This bill needs to incorporate the desires of workers to continue under these plans because it should be noted that the local airport authority in British Columbia is having difficulty finding an insurance company to take on the disability insurance plan currently provided workers. They have been told that it would be too expensive to continue this type of coverage. What are they to do? Third, the continuation of the bargaining agent is also a matter of great concern. The bill provides for the continuation of the terms and conditions of an existing collective agreement at the time of transfer. However, past experience with other privatizations is that the determination of the appropriate bargaining agent is a very long and disruptive process. This bill should incorporate provisions so that the existing bargaining agent remains in place for the period of one full collective agreement after the transfer in order to ensure the protection of workers' rights and the orderly determination of a bargaining agent.

The bill also fails in clause 4 to make clear that all services to the travelling public will continue to be provided in both official languages. Let me repeat that. The bill fails, in clause 4, to make clear that all services to the travelling public will continue to be provided in both official languages. We need to see in this bill provisions ensuring that third parties under contract to the local airport authority be required to provide their services under the linguistic terms currently set out in the Official Languages Act and any regulations made under that act.

The exclusion of those parts of the Official Languages Act dealing with services to the public and language of work are a serious undermining of the quasi-constitutional status of the Official Languages Act. According to the Official Languages Commissioner, any dismemberment of quasi-constitutional legislation can only be perceived as an erosion that is incompatible with the importance of its guarantees to Canada and Canadians. The commissioner recommended that all provisions of the Official Languages Act be incorporated by the local airport authorities.

That is something we attempted to do in committee. Both myself and the Liberal transport critic had identical motions which would have put back into the act certain sections, including Part V of the Official Languages Act, that would have provided protection for both language groups the ability to work in the language of their choice, the requirement to serve their customers in the language of the customer's choice.

The government said no. It said no to the English speaking minority in Montreal. It said no to the French speaking minority of Ottawa or any other community outside of Quebec that has a reasonably sized French speaking population. But the government has failed to protect the minority rights of the English speaking workers at the Montreal airport.

We made an attempt to change that. The two Liberal members on the committee, the critic, the associate critic, the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon and I all voted to put that clause back into the act. One of the amendments I had wanted to have debated today and would have argued to you that even though it had been defeated in committee it was of paramount importance for the matter to be seized again and debated here in this House.

Perhaps there will still be an opportunity should we, through our House leaders, reach some kind of agreement to revert to report stage at a later part today.

I want to say it is a fundamental issue that if we are going to take a federal service, a federal airport and turn it over to a local airport authority, then along with that transfer should be the transfer of obligations under the Official Languages Act. We should not have two different classes of airports in this country. What is next? Our train stations or perhaps, part of the House of Commons. Maybe we will have an English speaking wing, or a French speaking wing and we carve them out.

No, Mr. Speaker. I think the government has made a fundamental error in this particular bill, in the need to provide legislative protection for workers, at what will still be federal airports. They will have a local management, but they will still be federal airports and there is no reason on earth that I can find, that is acceptable to me, why they should be exempted.

This bill may not be the privatization of airports, but it is the privatization of the workplace. The government has a responsibility to ensure the rights of its workers are protected before, during and after the transfer. This bill gives only more uncertainty. If the purpose is to stabilize worker-management relations, then the workers must be consulted and their concerns heeded before this legislation is implemented. Given this government's current disdain for its own workers, how can it be trusted to act in their best interests when negotiating with local airport authorities? Clear legislation is needed, setting out the obligations of the government, the obligations of the local airport authority and the rights of workers.

Other instances of privatizing the workplace, for example, security services at airports, have been of questionable benefit. Let us not forget that one of the airports we are talking about devolving to a local airport authority is the Edmonton International Airport, which has just come through a strike by their security guards searching for a decent contract. What did this airport do? They laid off the workers while they were on strike. Is that the kind of labour-management relations we expect to see, by passing this kind of legislation and this kind of privatization of the workplace?

There have been ongoing discussions between the minister and his staff and my caucus colleague, the critic for labour, who has been handling this bill. There were some agreements. There was some willingness on the part of the government to, in fact, accept a provision for retroactive payment for employees who have left the Public Service.

In fact, the former Minister of Transport, Mr. Lewis, wrote back, as follows, with a suggested amendment.

> That Bill C-85 be amended by adding, immediately after line 26 on page 5, the following:
> 8. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority and, after the transfer date, a collective agreement or arbitral award under the Public Service Staff Relations Act provides for a retroactive increase in remuneration to a day before that date for employees in a bargaining unit in which designated employees for the airport were employed immediately before that date, the provisions of the collective agreement or arbitral award respecting retroactive increases in remuneration shall apply to those designated employees in respect of the retroactive period before that date.

The former minister was prepared to see this particular change made in the legislation. I understand that the government has other items it needs to incorporate into this legislation to ensure that this bill is workable, matters relating to taxation for one.

I would encourage the government to give serious consideration to reopening this bill today for clause by clause review at report stage. Both the Liberals and myself have given the Table the amendments so it will have had an opportunity to review them if this House decides, through unanimous consent, to revert.

I would like to spend the last couple of minutes going back over the philosophy of devolving to local airport authorities. It is not in the best interests of Canadians. There is a carrot out there that these local airport authorities believe, and I do not doubt their belief, that they can manage that building and those grounds in a way that is different from the way the local airport manager, under the policies of Transport Canada, can do.

I would suggest that if there are problems with the policies of Transport Canada, let us change those policies to provide the local manager with much more flexibility to use the capital funds available to enhance the operation, but let us not fool ourselves. In a lot of cases any wealth that is created at an airport will not necessarily be new wealth. It might be redirected wealth.

For example, in the city of Thunder Bay the proposal there, as I understand it, is that they are looking at more retail opportunities within the airport itself. Is that going to take away retail opportunities in the downtown core? Is that just going to rob Peter to pay Paul, with none of us really benefiting? If it is just aimed at the travelling public, then perhaps it might work from that point of view.

Will they be in competition with the city of Thunder Bay in terms of industrial land? Will they be taking needed revenue away from some of our light industrial areas and having them located at the airport and not contribute in the same way? We have to be careful that when we embrace these concepts we fully understand the impact on our communities.

Are people going to be happy finding different levels of services from airport to airport to airport? Some would say that is the case today and I would agree. However I think in the case of the Thunder Bay airport, which incidentally is in my riding of Thunder Bay—Atikokan, we work very closely with Transport Canada—we being the municipal politicians, myself, the Chamber of Commerce—to bring about improvements. We have a program under way this summer to do a temporary upgrade in the building.

We have on stream, on track, on time a major replacement of the airport terminal building, in time for the 1995 World Nordic Games, a commitment made by the former Minister of Transport to the people of Thunder Bay. We did not need a local airport authority to do that. We just needed a willingness to work toward an end.

One of the ironies is that the group that now wants to be this local airport authority were the backers of the previous government who made promise after promise after promise for a new terminal or for expansion that they never carried through with.

I know I have a few seconds left. I urge the government to reconsider the concept not to go forward with the devolution of airports to local airport authorities, but to enhance the operations, enhance the flexibility of the airport managers, some whom I have met. They are excellent representatives of the Crown and do a fantastic job, whether it is Thunder Bay, Toronto or elsewhere, in providing services to people because that is what it is all about.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I am intervening in this debate because this bill has serious implications for our official language policy in Canada. When our airports were owned and operated by the Government of Canada, they were fully subject to the provisions of the Official Languages Act.

That meant that all our airports under the ownership and control of the government had to respect the two official languages in Canada, had to provide services in the two official languages of Canada and had to respect employees who worked in those airports who were of one or the other official languages.

With this bill and the privatization of certain of our airports, the government is allowing these privatized airports to escape certain provisions of the Official Languages Act. For example, under the bill only Parts IV, VIII, IX and X of the Official Languages Act, 1988, will apply to privatized airports but not Parts V, VI and VII.

When Air Canada was privatized by this government a short while ago, the bill was changed or amended so that all provisions of the Official Languages Act would apply to the privatized Air Canada. So there seem to be some anomalies here. While the government agreed to the application of all provisions of the Official Languages Act to Air Canada for some reason or other, it is hesitant to go that distance in this bill dealing with the privatization of airports.

We are in a debate and we are hopeful that the arguments of opposition members and some others, one would hope some others on the government side, would convince the government that it should do the same for airports as it did for Air Canada.

The Commissioner of Official Languages, whose job it is to look out for the language rights of minorities in this country, appeared before the appropriate committee in the last session of Parliament when this bill's predecessor was going through the various stages. The Commissioner of Official Languages objected to those provisions in this bill which exempted the privatized airports from various sections of the Official Languages Act.

The commissioner said: "I therefore strongly recommend to the committee that section 4 of Bill C-85" which was what it was called at that time, "be amended to ensure that, as in the case of the decisions taken in the privatization of Air Canada, all the provisions of the Official Languages Act continue to apply to the designated airport authorities. Any weakening of this policy would seem to us to be unacceptable and an unjustified step backwards."

That is what was said by the Commissioner of Official Languages.

He was even concerned about those clauses that pretend to give service to the public in both official languages. He said, with respect to section 4: "I refer here to services provided by third parties under contract, specifically the various tenants and concessionaires in airport terminals concerning whom we have received more than 200 complaints in the past three years." He goes on to say that this section 4(2) is ambiguous and it does not clearly set out that service to the public must be provided, not only by the airport authorities, but by the concessionaires operating in those airports.

He said: "I therefore strongly recommend that the wording of subsection 4(2) be revised to ensure that third parties under contract are required to provide their services under the linguistic terms currently required by the Official Languages Act and the regulations made under it."

That is what was said by the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Strange as it may seem, those who manage the Montreal International Airport have approached myself and other members of Parliament objecting to the application of all the provisions of the Official Languages Act to the Montreal International Airport. The reasons given by the authorities in Montreal are that if the Montreal airport and other airports that are privatized must comply with all the provisions of the Official Languages Act, they will not be competitive with the airports in Boston and New York, or Terminal 3 in Toronto.

Let me deal first with Boston and New York. Of course the American airports have not provided bilingual services in English and French for any period of their history, as far as I know. However, that has not prevented us in Canada from providing services in both those languages because we have populations which speak those two languages. We have pilots who speak those two languages. We have employees working in the airport who speak those two languages. We have always thought, and so did the Conservative government in 1988 when it passed the new Official Languages act, that services to the public should be provided in two official languages.

It also thought that in federal institutions there should be equitable participation by both official language groups and that there should be fairness and justice with respect to the employees and their language of work in both official languages.

I find the argument of the authorities in Montreal rather strange because I was in this Parliament a few years ago when there was an attempt to make sure that air traffic control services in this country be in the two official languages. That received strong support from Montreal.

The people there who were air traffic controllers whose mother tongue was French and pilots who were French-speaking felt that air traffic control in this country should be in two official languages. We fought for that and put it into effect.

Despite the fears that were raised by certain opponents at the time, we have had bilingual air traffic control in several airports for many years now, and there has been no danger or great concern. It has worked very well.

Consequently, therefore, I cannot see why we, in order to compete with Boston and New York, should lessen our commitment to official languages. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that if Montreal was to operate totally in the two official languages, it would be more competitive because it would attract travellers, workers and employees who were competent in both languages. However, in Boston you are not assured that they can speak your language at all.

This is something that has to be examined more closely. For this reason, I am pleased that my colleague from Thunder Bay moved that this bill go back to committee so we can examine some of these issues.

I am not convinced that applying the provisions of the Official Languages Act, as we have for years to all our airports, will hurt our competitiveness with the airports in Boston and New York.

With respect to Terminal 3, the manager of the Montreal airport says this would also make the Montreal airport non-competitive with respect to Terminal 3 which he says is not subject to all the provisions of the Official Languages Act.

Terminal 3, which is a new terminal and was only opened recently, was built as a privatized airport from the beginning. It was never under government authority as were the other airports and it was built on a contract with a certain private firm. It is principally served by Canadian Airlines International.

I have looked at the contract between the Government of Canada and the Terminal 3 developers. It seems to me from reading the contract that Terminal 3 is subject to the Official Languages Act, but this requires some serious legal analysis.

This is another reason for this bill to go back to committee. If the government in the contract with the Terminal 3 developers did relax the provisions of the Official Languages Act with respect to airports even before this bill was passed, then I would say the government is speaking with a forked tongue.

On one hand, it is supporting an official languages policy such as it set out in the Official Languages Act of 1988 and on the other hand, it is already privatizing or setting up privatized airports which do not respect all the provisions of that law.

Either the Official Languages Act of 1988 means something or it means nothing. When the government put that bill before Parliament in the early months of 1988, the Prime Minister stood in his place and said that this policy was so important for Canada that if he had his way, Parliament would sit all night in order to have it passed.

We did pass the bill. It was passed with the support of the Liberal and the New Democratic Party opposition but the opposition came not from the opposition parties but from certain members of the government's own party who, at that time, were known as the dinosaurs. They sort of opposed the bill, held it up and so on, but the opposition did not come from the opposition parties.

Despite the words of the Prime Minister in 1988 when the bill was passed that it was so important to pass that revised bill on official languages, we still do not have the regulations for that bill. It is more than two years since the bill was passed. The government has presented to committee the draft regulations with respect to service to the public, but it has not yet presented the regulations which are required for the language of work or equitable participation or promotion or advancement of the official languages in Canada. One wonders about the commitment of the government to official languages.

The reason for the Official Languages Act and for an official languages policy is that we have in this country large numbers of people who speak both official languages. About one-third of the population of the country is French speaking. The other two-thirds are English speaking but come from many backgrounds.

There are some who would suggest that all of Quebec should perhaps be French speaking: we would allow those airports and those institutions to be unilingual French and in the other nine provinces everything would more or less operate in English.

That sort of suggestion forgets that there are almost one million Canadians who speak French, living outside the province of Quebec. Almost one million francophone Canadians are living outside Quebec who speak French and want to be served in their language and want to work in their language, where they are in sufficient numbers.

We are not talking about one employee in Vancouver in some particular office. We are talking about large numbers of employees and particularly when they are dealing with the travelling public. Very often businessmen from Montreal go to Winnipeg for conferences. They go to Halifax to deal with governmental matters and so on. That is the nature of our country.

When the government introduced and passed the Official Languages Act in 1988 it was committed to that policy. It was a good law. It had to be completed by regulations, but it was a good law. Now we are bit concerned that the government is backing off from that.

We say that this bill is defective in that it does not apply all the provisions of the Official Languages Act to the airports the government is attempting to privatize under this bill. We are asking the question: Why is it members of the government agreed to apply all the sections of the Official Languages Act to Air Canada when they privatized Air Canada, and rightly so? They should have done that. As I said, Air Canada is our major airline and it is dealing with the travelling public, both English and French speaking Canadians. If Air Canada is to follow all the provisions of the Official Languages Act, surely the airports where these Air Canada planes land, take off and work should also follow all the provisions of the Official Languages Act.

I fully support the amendment presented by my colleague from Thunder Bay, that this bill be sent back to committee where we can once again examine certain provisions, certain sections of it, and especially those sections that relate to official languages.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, I declare that the motion moved by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon is in order. Therefore debate is on the amendment.

• (1330)

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join the debate today, both on the amendment—

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Is it not the trend or the custom of the House of Commons to recognize two speakers from the Official Opposition before moving to the third party?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I ask for the co-operation of the member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, while confessing my rookie status and thus my lack of familiarity with all of the precedents and usages of this House, I must say at the outset that I know of no Standing Order providing for such. I know of no Speaker's ruling providing for such.

However, in the interest of amicability and goodwill in the House, in the interest of that non-partisan tradition that we are striving so mightily to create here, I will yield the floor to the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I realize there is no Standing Order of the House that says the Chair should recognize one member rather than another. The Chair must recognize the first person it sees, but there are some conventions. There is a certain practice in these matters.

We all know that the Official Opposition has 81 members and is therefore entitled to be heard more often than a third party that has only 42 members. In this particular case, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Edmonton East has the floor because he was recognized. But I would urge the Chair to give a little more consideration to the way the parties are represented in this House, when recognizing speakers in future. This is important to us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, an experienced member of this House, has made a very good point. However, the Chair recognized the hon. member for Edmonton East. In the circumstances, I would ask all members to cooperate. First, I will again recognize the hon. member for Edmonton East, and subsequently, I promise to follow the convention of respecting the ratio of members in this House.

The hon. member for Edmonton East, and then the hon. member for Hamilton West.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, might I preface my remarks on the bill and the amendment by noting, for the benefit of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, that our caucus is in fact composed of 44 members, not 42. There may be two who you would wish expelled, but that is not yet the case.

I would like in rising to speak on the amendment, and of course therefore on the bill as well, to note that I think there is considerable merit in the amendment. When the vote comes it is my intention to vote for it, as I believe is the case for all members of the caucus of which I am a member.

I cannot be quite so charitable in the instance of the bill itself. There are flaws with the bill, especially given that, ostensibly at least, the purpose of the bill is to protect the collective bargaining rights, the language rights, the pension rights—the workers' rights—of federal public sector workers currently employed by Transport Canada during the transfer of airports from the authority of Transport Canada to the so-called local airport authorities, the LAAs.

There are elements in this bill which make it very unlikely that that goal will be properly and fully effected. I would like to deal just briefly with two of those elements.

The first has to do with, generally, the rights of workers at what are now federal government airports. I should note that given this government's current disdain for its own workers, it is somewhat problematic that we accept the assertion that it can be trusted to act in their best interests when negotiating with local airport authorities. Clear legislation is needed setting out the obligations of the government, the obligations of the local airport authorities and the rights of the workers employed by either or both.

This was brought home forcefully to me in the past six months in consequence of the situation faced by the passenger screening guards at the Edmonton International Airport. The service provided by these guards was contracted out quite some significant time ago.

Whereas at one time they were like all other employees at the Edmonton International Airport, employees of Transport Canada, in consequence of the government's ongoing program of contracting out, deregulation and privatization—you know the litany, Mr.

Speaker—they ceased being Transport Canada employees some time ago. They remained, for the time being, members of the Union of Canadian Transport Employees, that union which represented them when they were Transport Canada employees. However, other than that, their formal ties as employees of Transport Canada were severed and they became employees of another company.

The company at the time was Canadian Protection Services. The contractual arrangement was one that saw Air Canada, as the lead airline using the Edmonton International Airport, contract for passenger screening, which is to say security services, with the private sector company, Canadian Protection Services. This was, I suppose, to start at least an agreeable contract for the signing parties, they being Air Canada on behalf of all airlines using the airport and Canadian Protection Services.

It was most clearly not terribly acceptable to the passenger screening guards, 66 of whom were employed at the airport by Canadian Protection Services, that is CPS, and all of whom were most desirous of improving the conditions of their work and the wages for which they worked.

Bargaining with CPS for a first collective agreement began in the spring of 1990, more than a year ago. At that time the union, the Union of Canadian Transport Employees, wished to have addressed several questions including the annual 200 per cent turnover rate among the employees retained as passenger screening guards by CPS at the Edmonton International Airport.

Number two was the fact that these employees were the only ones in the entire airport required to pay for their own parking, at a rate of $20 a month. Another was they were required to place $150 deposit on their uniforms. Of course, of key importance were the seriously low rates of pay. The union had hoped to raise the current levels of pay in the $6 to $6.49 an hour range to about $8 an hour, hardly a princely sum.

Unfortunately no agreement with CPS was reached. In November of last year the parties went to conciliation. This too proved fruitless. This left the employees in a no-win situation. They could strike but, if they struck, that would immediately create a situation in which their employer, CPS, was in violation of its contract with Air Canada. That being the case, the provision in that contract that allowed Air Canada then to cancel it would kick in, or they could simply knuckle under, as indeed CPS had to knuckle under, because CPS was not getting the money from Air Canada and the other airlines using the airport to pay the passenger screening guards a reasonable amount. In that sense, CPS too was also locked into a no-win situation.

The predictable happened. In March of this year the 66 passenger screening guards went on strike. After two weeks, Air Canada determined that in consequence of the strike CPS was no longer able to live up to its contract to supply passenger screening services at the airport and, accordingly, Air Canada cancelled that contract. This meant, of course, that in the twinkling of an eye those 66 passenger screening guards were not on strike; they were unemployed.

Air Canada quickly reached an agreement with another security company, Aeroguard, which itself is a union company.

• (1340)

Its employees are represented by the United Food and Commercial Workers. This company, Aeroguard, resumed passenger screening services at the airport.

Many of the 66 passenger screening guards who had previously worked for CPS in that capacity at the airport now signed on with Aeroguard. Several did not.

The point here is that in the context of a contracted out privatized service, the protections of the Canada Labour Act which otherwise would have been completely available for those passenger screening guards were not there.

They were treated with contempt by Air Canada and the other contracting airlines at that airport. There is nothing that they or anyone else could do about it.

I wrote two letters, on March 7 and on March 21, to the then Minister of Transport, now the Solicitor General. I noted in the second:

> For exercising their right to strike, these 66 workers have now lost their jobs. This is grotesquely unfair. If, as ought to be the case, these workers were employed by Transport Canada and thus afforded the coverage of the Canada Labour Code directly, such jack-boot union busting, strike breaking would be illegal. And that's as it should be.

I received a reply from the current Minister of Transport dated May 13 of this year. He writes in part: "Security screening guards are employed by private industry." True. "They are not contracted to or through the federal government and cannot be considered as contracted out employees." True. "Nor, in this instance, are they employed for the purpose of government agencies." True.

"Security guards are, like many Canadians, performing important jobs as employees of private industry in accordance with government regulations." Again, true.

"I must stress that they are not in any way denied rights or benefits to which they are entitled as a result of their status." Absolutely true, and that is precisely the problem. Their status is such that they are now denied the coverage of the Canada Labour Code.

I greatly fear that in the legislation we have before us today, we are setting the stage for hosts of other federal employees now employed at Canada's airports to join these unhappy passenger screening guards in that non-status situation.

For that reason, I find the bill inadequate. I would hope that when the amendment of the hon. member is passed by this House, as I hope, and the bill is therefore referred back to committee, these matters too will be addressed in committee at that time.

I say "these matters" because there is a second matter I would like to raise. It has to do with official languages.

I have, on numerous occasions in my home riding of Edmonton East and around Alberta, defended the Official Languages Act. I have defended the French language in Alberta. I have especially defended its general use in federal institutions in Alberta.

I believe that every Canadian has the right to deal with her or his federal government in the official language of their choice, regardless of where they are in this country. I will not abandon that position. I will continue to defend it in Edmonton, in Alberta and everywhere else in Canada where I can be allowed the privilege of raising my voice.

It is in this instance that I note with some dismay that portion of the bill which would exempt from the operations of the Official Languages Act the LAA airport in Montreal.

The bill would specifically omit that airport from the operations of Part V and Part VI of the Official Languages Act which provides, among other things, in Section 34 that:

> English and French are the languages of work in all federal institutions, and officers and employees of all federal institutions have the right to use either official language in accordance with this Part.

Which in section 36(2) reads:

> Every federal institution has the duty to ensure that, within the National Capital Region and in any part or region of Canada, or any place outside Canada, that is prescribed for the purpose of paragraph 35(1)(a), such measures are taken—to establish and maintain work environments of the institution that are conducive to the effective use of both official languages and accommodate the use of either official language by its officers and employees.

The effects of one of the main elements in this bill will be to remove that protection from the workers at the Montreal airport. This means that there is nothing to prevent the emergence at the Montreal airport, or at least those Montreal airports operated by what will be its local airport authority, of a strictly francophone language regime.

That is bad for two reasons. It is bad for the employees who work there, who require English as their first language to do their work. However, in some cases, more importantly, it is bad for the anglophone language minority in Montreal which may depend on the provision of anglophone services at its airports for their use of those airports. Again, this is not unreasonable. It is a keystone element of the Canadian Confederation that any citizen of this country may be able to deal with her or his government and its agencies and institutions in the official language of their choice.

To the degree that this bill detracts from that fundamental Canadian right, indeed detracts from that constitutional provision, the bill is flawed. Therefore, it is a second reason why I cannot, in conscience, fully and enthusiastically endorse this bill as it now stands.

Therefore, I would recommend to all members of this House, in the interest of equity and in the interest of prudence and, to hearken back to my first point, most of all in the interest of fairness for the workers at these airports, that this bill be referred back to the committee and that the hon. member's amendment be adopted.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to have the opportunity to rise on third reading debate of Bill C-15, the Airport Transfer Act, which was Bill C-85 in its previous incarnation before the government decided to prorogue, a government action which we, on this side of the House and probably most Canadians, are still puzzled about and are asking ourselves why.

The bill concentrates on some technical matters related to the transference of what are currently Transport Canada operated facilities and will become local airport authorities under negotiations with Transport Canada. There are currently four major airports entering final negotiations with the federal government. They are Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton and Montreal.

There are a number of other airports which are interested in becoming local authorities. This means that the control and direction of the facilities will be shared at the local level between business, local officials and public representation.

Bill C-15 falls short, however, in attempting to deal with the maintenance of certain aspects of the day-to-day operation of federally regulated institutions—namely the official language protection for services and workers, job security, pension benefits and labour relations. It is enough to send shivers down anyone's spine.

On the first point, I support the comments made by my colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, that the protection for both official languages in terms of services provided to the public and for job opportunities is, at best, weak. I am surprised that this government, which attempted to put a new face on the Official Languages Act, should now weaken its support with this bill.

The point is that the responsibility for these airports is federal until such time as it should be contracted away. All aspects pertaining to the Official Languages Act with respect to certain services are protected and should remain so once the facilities transfer over to local control.

In the case of Air Canada, for example, I am sure most Canadians would recognize the duality of Air Canada in its operations. It has a bilingual staff and there is equal opportunity for both language groups to advance within the corporation.

• (1350)

Once Air Canada was sold off, the government ensured that all aspects of the Official Languages Act remained intact.

In the case of these federally regulated facilities, regulated by the Canadian government, the same protection must apply. Services must be offered to all travelling Canadians in both official languages. In the same spirit, equal opportunity to both languages groups must be granted in hiring and advancement policies.

The second point of the bill essentially deals with labour relations. The bill as it stands does not satisfy this side of the House. At committee stage we tried to move several amendments which we thought would improve the bill, but were of course voted down by the Conservative majority on the committee.

Under this bill, job security for airport employees is not guaranteed. Airport managers will have full control over the work force of the airport and if management were to decide that 20 employees should be laid off to meet costs, a six month notice is all that would be required. That is shameful. Perhaps that may appear to be generous by others on the other side of this House, but the point is that it will severely undermine the collective bargaining process.

Airport employees at Transport Canada facilities have worked long and hard for their rights, which include job protection, among other things, and they should be protected under this privatization drive by the government and not sacrificed.

I heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport declare just this very morning that one of the blessings of this bill is that it will allow the local authorities to function on a non-profit basis. What that means is that yes, 20 or so employees who have worked for years to obtain their rights may be laid off in six months in order to meet costs, but the facilities must be self-supporting and the authorities will have to do what they must to operate on a non-profit basis.

An important point which I would like to take note of in relation to the non-profit basis of these authorities is that our party strongly opposes local taxes in municipalities considering these transfers being raised in order to finance the debt load of a local airport authority.

At this point I would also like to clarify a point that was made a little earlier in this debate with regard to Hamilton airport. Hamilton, interestingly enough, has witnessed a move not to a local airport authority but it is the creation of a regional airport management board. That is a wonderful blend of the private sector and government accountability. It is not becoming an independent authority. It still has the arrangement of a lease agreement between the management group at Hamilton airport and Transport Canada.

The regional airport management board at Hamilton is now in the process of selecting five community representatives. Six members of that management board will be selected from the regional council. There is that wonderful blend between business and what it has to offer and the government accountability.

We in Hamilton have to be cognizant of, and this relates back to taxes, the fact that Hamilton airport does receive $700,000 in subsidy money from the federal government every year. If we decided to move to a local airport authority, where is $700,000 going to originate from? We can guess that it will be saddled right back with the taxpayer.

I mentioned in this House last week that Transport Canada lacks a master plan for air traffic in southern Ontario. It also lacks a master plan for the entire country's air traffic system which consists of our airports.

While the government negotiates a variety of contracts with various Canadian cities in order for them to move to local airport authorities, there are a host of other airports which will remain in the hands of Transport Canada.

Communication is essential for the over all system to work. The lack of an over all vision in transportation has created what I like to refer to as a helter-skelter approach to air transportation in this country.

Just this very morning I drove to Pearson International Airport and boarded the Air Canada flight at seven o'clock and picked up the local Toronto newspaper. In the editorial was an example of why there should be some kind of an over all vision for transportation in this country.

We on this side of the House are appalled by the inconsistency of government action. Here in part is what the editorial had to say.

"It all began when Ottawa gave Terminal 3's private owners 'sole and absolute discretion' over cab licences at the new facility where—" —as we are all familiar—"one airline promises travellers 'the Dawn of Civilized Air Travel.' "

"Realizing its error in creating two different taxi systems at Canada's biggest airport, Ottawa bought back the licence rights for an undisclosed amount. To recoup its loss, the government hiked annual fees for Pearson taxis to $4,250 from $1,000; limo rates have gone to $6,000 from $1,000."

The ministers office still regards the payment to Terminal 3's owners as some kind of a state secret. We find that quite incredible. This piecemeal approach does little to address many issues of—you can put it under this title—"protection". We are talking about protection for the safety and security of the air travelling public. We are talking about protection for existing employees at our airports, protection for the physically challenged, protection of the Official Languages Act and protection against local taxes being increased to finance the debt load of a local authority.

These conditions can and would be addressed if, as so eloquently enunciated by my colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon, we consider his amendments to Bill C-15, put forward in this House, such as the amendment to return this debate to a committee where we can address these outstanding issues. These issues are of a vital concern, not only to this party, but to the New Democratic Party. It will stand today and say: "Yes, we oppose this legislation." What it is not saying is that this is an idea that can be flushed out and it can be done in a non-partisan way in a committee where it belongs. Let us take it back to committee, have another look at it, bring it back to the House and let us accomplish something here today.

Today we have established many reasons and conditions for the granting of our support to this bill. Especially, we focus and highlight official languages and job security. Those two are paramount.

I cannot understand why this government would transfer airports without justly guaranteeing full job security and fully protecting the linguistic rights of the employees at different airports in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

NATIONAL ENVIRONMENT WEEK

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, this week will be our twentieth National Environment Week, in as many years. Why not decide this week to act now?

I want to invite all municipalities in my riding and all my constituents to take an active part in National Environment Week. Plant a tree, sow flower seeds, hang flower pots from your balcony, clean up the yard, tune up your car's engine and especially, Mr. Speaker, think in terms of recycling and reducing the quantity of garbage we produce: those are a few of the things we can do to help the environment.

Mr. Speaker, cleaning up our environment is good for us and our quality of life, but it is even better for future generations to whom we want to leave a healthier environment and a better world.

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, as we begin Environment Week, Canadians across the country are questioning this government's commitment to a sustainable future.

Canadians are thinking globally and acting locally to protect our planet and are yearning for leadership from government.

Sadly, it is all too clear that the green plan is a whitewash and that no leadership is forthcoming from this government.

This past weekend, I proposed the creation of a biosphere reserve in the Gulf Islands of my constituency as a positive step toward preserving this pristine region and as a tool for economic development. This proposal meets community concerns, will prevent the further erosion of a delicate ecosystem and will lead to economic growth.

I challenge the government to show that it means what it says, to act to protect unique and threatened areas of Canada's coast, to establish a Gulf Islands' biosphere reserve for the benefit and interest of all Canadians.

I challenge the minister and this government to take some initiative, learn from the environmental activists they applaud and to act to fast-track environmental concerns for a change.

My constituents want to see jobs and a better environment. Now is the time for action.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a society composed of people from many different ethnic, regional, linguistic, religious and racial backgrounds. It is a nation whose very identity is defined by its diversity. Canada must not forget that the debate on national unity is not only one between English and French nor only one between Quebec and the rest of Canada, but is one for all Canadians. It is a quest for a national identity that includes Canadians of all backgrounds.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as you know, we can only build a strong united country if we do it together, a country that acknowledges that every person, whatever his ethnic origin, race or sex, is entitled to a good quality of life.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the throne speech made reference to changes the government is considering to give more independence and freedom to members of Parliament.

While this is being planned, I would like to let the government know what changes the member for Halton—Peel would like to see. The member would like to have more free votes in the House of Commons so the views of his constituents could be well represented. The member would like to have parliamentary committees empowered so that the government is under some obligation to act on all-party committee reports and recommendations.

The member for Halton—Peel would like to see more checks and balances with respect to cabinet appointments. They should be reviewed by members of Parliament sitting on committees. This member wants parliamentary reform with new mechanisms for public involvement and participation. This member never again wants his vote in the House of Commons wiped out, annulled by the vote of unelected and unaccountable senators.

The people want change. The government has indicated it is ready to listen and act. Freer MPs, Mr. Speaker, will make for freer Canadians.

GUN CONTROL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as soon as the new gun control bill was tabled in Parliament, the gun lobbies started their usual propaganda that the new bill will not reduce violent crime, but only interfere with legitimate gun owners.

This is total nonsense and it is the nonsense that has been repeated by the gun lobby every time we attempt to tighten our gun laws. As a matter of fact, each time we tightened our gun laws, the rate of crime with guns declined. Countries with stricter gun control have lower rates of crime with guns. In the United States, 70 per cent of homicides are committed with guns.

In Canada, due to stricter laws, only 30 per cent of homicides are committed with guns.

In the United States, the homicide rate is 10 per 100,000; in Canada, it is 2.2 per 100,000. While this bill on gun control is not perfect, there is no doubt that it will make it more difficult for irresponsible and dangerous persons to obtain and use guns.

This bill should be supported and, if possible, strengthened.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, after statements by some federal members of the Liberal party and members of the Bloc québécois, especially those from large urban areas who know nothing about regional development programs in Quebec's resource regions, I have a few comments to make.

Today, these opposition members are upset by the federal government's decision and especially by the effective work being done by the minister and member for Roberval, the hon. Benoît Bouchard, They should read the article by Gilles Normand, published in La Presse on May 31. Mr. Bouchard simply implemented an administrative change which does not in any way affect funding procedures, but will make it easier for companies to have access to the program, and Quebecers will benefit, all of which will be done in co-operation with the Government of Quebec.

I would urge those federal members to come to Abitibi—Témiscamingue today and tell residents that federal participation and co-operation with their communities has been cut off. Mr. Speaker, they will get a warm welcome!

CHINA

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, in China it is almost June 4. Two years ago began one of the most horrific incidents of bloody, violent massacres by a government against its own people.

The scene was Beijing's Tiananmen Square, and overnight the Chinese government chose to end a peaceful youth protest by opening tank and machine gun fire upon the crowd of pro-democracy demonstrators.

What were the youth asking? Freedom from totalitarianism through political reform, more opportunity and personal dignity. In return, they were murdered. Some survivors of that horrible night have subsequently been executed, incarcerated or, at the very minimum, stripped of basic human rights and dignity.

The repression continues. On the second anniversary of this massacre, I encourage the Secretary of State for External Affairs to take a look today at Canada's policy on China. Let us not follow the lead of the United States' by giving China most-favoured nation status.

The Canadian government has not followed through on its initial bold policy, and has changed little in Canada's relationship with the Government of China since the Tiananmen Square incident.

We must reaffirm our own commitment to democracy and freedom by standing with the Chinese people as they aspire to a way of life that Canadians take for granted.

CHILDREN AND THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, environmental degradation is killing children. According to the 1990 United Nations state of the environment report on children and the environment, every year 14 million children under the age of five die in the developing countries as a result of unsafe drinking water, poor sanitation, environmental pollution, common diseases and malnutrition. A further 3 million are seriously disabled.

In the industrialized countries, the main environmental source of death and disability among children is exposure to various forms of pollution and hazardous chemicals in the environment. Even the unborn are affected by chemicals in the air and toxic substances taken in through the mother's body.

As adults working together with the government and industry, we have both an opportunity and a responsibility to take advantage of current knowledge, technology and resources to improve the well-being of the world's children and the planet itself before it is too late.

Planet earth must be made a safe home for future generations.

NATIONAL UNITY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council met with members of Parliament to discuss their concerns for the future of Canada and the right of ethnocultural minorities to be directly represented in the process of constitutional reform.

National unity requires an affirmation that all Canadians from diverse backgrounds are equal in a multicultural, multiracial Canada.

New Democrats support the CEC in its request for a representative constituent assembly and the addition of a strong Canada clause to our Constitution.

We also must actively counteract racism in Canada. Public education on the values of immigration and more positive media race relations are a first step. Employment equity must be mandatory. We need increased funding, especially in western Canada for English language programs. There must be amnesty for refugee claimants who have waited years in the backlog.

The many issues raised today prove once again how essential advocacy groups like CEC are to make our democracy work for all Canadians.

PLEASANT VIEW JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, students at Pleasant View Junior High School in Don Valley North, North York, are taking an impressive leadership role in ensuring that citizens today and tomorrow will have a healthy planet. This Thursday, June 6, they will be having a conference to spread their message to their elected representatives and children and parents in the Pleasant View family of schools.

Since 1989 they have a long list of projects they have accomplished, including recycling in various ways and composting of waste. The one thing I particularly like is an environmental assessment of every student's home, followed by a letter to Mom and Dad advocating a family meeting. This meeting resulted in a family action plan to improve relations with the planet.

They are also looking internationally. They have bought 25 acres of rain forest through the World Wildlife Fund and have purchased shares in the World Wildlife Fund's endowment program.

Congratulations on your leadership, Pleasant View students. Together we can have a green world.

NATIONAL PEOPLE FIRST

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Last week was National Access Awareness Week, a time when this government should have been sending out positive messages of support to the disabled community. Actions, however, always speak louder than words.

The National People First project is a voice for developmentally handicapped people in this country. It is a self-help organization dedicated to the empowerment of developmentally handicapped persons to protect themselves against abuse and to assert their rights in the event that they have been abused.

National People First was funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare for six years, from 1984 to 1990. This funding has not been renewed for 1991 and the future of this movement looks bleak.

I call on the Minister of National Health and Welfare to live up to this government's commitment to support abuse prevention programs. I urge this government to allocate funds to this unique and invaluable organization so that the progress it has made will not be tragically lost.

FRASER RIVER

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, as one of the many British Columbians who live and work in the Fraser River watershed, I would like to commend the government for its $100 million commitment toward the cleanup of the Fraser. The Fraser is so much more than just a large river. It has become a barometer reflecting the state of British Columbia's environmental health.

This program, announced over the weekend, will be directed toward such high priorities as restored salmon populations, protection and restoration of fish and wildlife habitat, as well as monitoring and improvement of water quality.

The Fraser River is important to many British Columbians and they will recognize the significance of this initiative. But these same people are equally important to the health of the Fraser for it is their ideas and help that will ensure the effective and successful implementation of this plan to restore the Fraser River to its former greatness.

1991 CITATION FOR CITIZENSHIP AWARDS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, to be a citizen of Canada, whether by birth or by choice, involves the unwritten responsibility to contribute to the betterment of this country. Our society values freedom and participation and respects those who are willing to accept the responsibility of contributing.

Today, the 1991 Citation for Citizenship awards are being presented to 21 individuals and four organizations whose contributions to Canada merit national recognition. These people have given their time and energy to making Canada a better place in which to live. From health care to human rights, from education to multiculturalism, every aspect of our society has been touched in some way by these dedicated Canadians.

I am sure that I can speak for all members in this House when I express our congratulations to the people and organizations honoured today. A citation for citizenship is a symbol of the gratitude that we feel toward these people and others like them all across Canada.

THUNDER BAY—ATIKOKAN

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, this was one of those "good news, bad news" weekends in north-western Ontario. First, the good news: Thanks to the efforts of the Ontario NDP government in securing a strictly commercial solution to the shut down of Atikokan Forest Products sawmill, we were able to announce the mill's reopening and, in fact, some workers started today and the rest of the 160 will be due next week.

Thanks, Ontario.

In Thunder Bay, the news was not as good. Abitibi Price arbitrarily closed its Thunder Bay paper mill for two years, putting 400 people out of work directly, with considerably more out of work indirectly. Both the Sapawe sawmill and the Thunder Bay paper mill suffer from the same federal government policies, softwood lumber tax, high Canadian dollar and high interest rates.

The federal Conservative government did not help Atikokan during its crisis. Will it help Thunder Bay? It better help.

RAOUL WALLENBERG

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I remind all Canadians that the search for Raoul Wallenberg, one of Canada's two honorary citizens, goes on. This Swedish diplomat who disappeared in Hungary in 1945 saved as many as 20,000 Jews from Nazi death camps. Even though the Russians reported he died in 1947, Montreal lawyer Irwin Cotler of the International Commission searching for Wallenberg and members of the Wallenberg family itself still say there is no proof that he is dead.

Now highly supportive evidence says the Soviets offered to exchange Wallenberg for a Soviet spy jailed in Sweden in 1968, two decades after claiming he was dead. This only adds to reports of Wallenberg sightings in Soviet prisons in the 1980s and so we certainly hope that glasnost prevails as the search for clues in KGB files continues.

Luckily heroic efforts like Raoul Wallenberg's are remembered in the hearts of many for generations. I call on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to strongly urge Soviet co-operation in the search for Canada's honorary citizen whom we all admire.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAXATION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are delighted to see the Prime Minister is back in the House. Canadians will now be able to rest easier, and let's hope he will stay in the country from now on.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On Thursday of last week, the Minister of National Revenue said that the government has gone "too far", that Canadians are over-taxed and that the federal government should do something about it. On Friday, the Minister of Finance said Canadians are not over-taxed and so the government is not planning to do anything about it.

I ask the Prime Minister which minister is speaking for Canada on this issue, the Minister of National Revenue, who is right, or the Minister of Finance, who is wrong?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I guess I should start off by saying that nobody likes to pay taxes, but we must have taxes in this country to pay for the services that we all enjoy from being Canadians and living in this great country of ours.

If you compare Canada's taxes with those in the OECD, we are on average with them. Canada's tax burden today is about the same as it was in the early 1980s when the hon. Leader of the Opposition was the Minister of Finance. The tax burden is vis-à-vis the same for the taxpayers of this country. Personal and corporate income taxes are higher in Canada than on the OECD-wide basis. We will concede to that, but I can tell him that social security contributions by Canadians are less than half as burdensome in Canada than in other countries in the OECD.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance, the third Minister of Finance, or whatever he is, likes to compare Canada with other industrialized countries.

Today a study by Global Economics shows that taxes on individuals are higher in Canada than in any G-7 country. More than $1,500 in new taxex have been slapped on Canadian families since this government took office. The study concluded that today the system is more complicated than ever and less fair than ever.

When will the Prime Minister take the advice of his Minister of National Revenue and do something about it?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is right when he talks about personal income taxes.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McDermid: They are higher in Canada than in other countries in the OECD. Let us just take a look at some of the other things that are lower in Canada than the other countries, which he fails to talk about. Social security contributions are less than half of what they are in the OECD and sales tax is considerably lower in Canada than in other countries in the OECD. Taxes have to be paid to pay the bills.

• (1420)

The hon. member may remember very well, because he was one of the ministers of finance who rang up huge deficits. We now have to pay the bills for those deficits and we have to do it through taxes. That is the only way we will be able to do it, plus cost cutting in the federal government, which we have done a very good job at.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, for the minister's information, I had the privilege of bringing down two budgets during the only period in the past 20 years, excluding inflation, when there was no increase in government spending and when in fact, we managed to reduce the deficit.

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Canadian families are not the only ones to suffer as a result of this government's unfair and complex tax policies. Today we heard that public and private libraries will have to reduce their purchases of books, periodicals and newspapers by about 10 per cent annually, because of the GST.

I therefore want to ask the Prime Minister: Doesn't he realize that Canadians must read books, periodicals and newspapers to be competitive and aware of what goes on in the world? Why promote ignorance by taxing knowledge?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that that is not the case. Maybe I should explain the situation with libraries. Libraries pay GST, but they get rebates. If the library is owned by a municipality, it gets a 57 per cent rebate; if by a university, 67 per cent; and by schools, 68 per cent which, by the way, keeps them at exactly the same tax level they were under the manufacturers' sales tax. There is absolutely no change in tax levels for libraries, so the Leader of the Opposition is absolutely wrong.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns Canada-Mexico free trade.

Last Thursday, his minister for International Trade said, and I quote: "Canadian companies shouldn't even try to compete in the same areas as low-wage countries".

Mr. Speaker, how can we do otherwise, when all this government's policies are leading us straight towards a Third World economy: crushing interest rates and taxes and a high dollar, plus cuts in research and development? That is the kind of economic policy that will strangle us.

My question, Mr. Speaker, is this: What specific measures does the government intend to introduce and when, to prepare us for free trade with Mexico, something his government wants so desperately?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, we should probably put this in perspective. Our free trade agreement with the United States involves some $257 billion to $260 billion. We are talking about two-way trade with Mexico of $3 billion or $4 billion now. Most of the trade coming into Canada from Mexico today is tariff free.

What is happening is that Mexico is opening up its borders and it is giving Canadian businesses new opportunities to get into Mexico to sell their goods and services there. That is what we are interested in, creating more jobs in Canada through sales to other countries, and Mexico is no exception.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, this government is as thick as a brick. What the Minister for International Trade said was very clearly that we should not try to compete with Mexico in areas where Mexico produces products. Well, Mr. Speaker, from cars to computers, Mexico is already exporting fully integrated modern technology, and at the same time this government is allowing our manufacturing base to die.

The issue very clearly is not whether our modern economy can compete with Mexico's Third World economy, as the minister said last week.

The real question, and I put it to the Prime Minister is that, given the suicidal bent of his government's policies, which country, Canada or Mexico, is ultimately going to be the Third World economy?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The hon. member should know full well the results of the free trade agreement, and what has happened since it has come in, that are positive for Canada.

Pre-free trade in investment alone, there was an out-flow of $2.5 billion in 1988. In 1990, there was an in-flow of investment in Canada of $4.3 billion, which means increased investment in this country, increased employment, modernization of industrial plants, better productivity and more jobs in the long run for Canadians. That is what it is all about.

TAXATION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Last week we learned from the Minister of National Revenue—not that most of us had to learn it—that Canadians were unfairly taxed. Not only are they unfairly taxed, Canadians are over-taxed. When the Liberals were in power, of course, taxes on working Canadians increased and on corporations went down.

A new study indicates today that in fact this government has continued that system of taxation, and there is no question that the tax system is a mess. The tax system is unfair. The government in 1987, under the Minister of Finance, said it had three principles for taxpayers: equity, efficiency and simplicity. We do not have any of them.

Will the Prime Minister consider implementing a fair tax commission so that we can get public input and the experts' input and get a fair tax system in Canada.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the leader of the socialist party of Canada that if she took a look at the countries that we trade with and that we deal with, she would see there is a socialist government in France and its tax burden is 44 per cent. Canada's is 34 per cent.

There is a socialist government in Sweden. Its tax burden on its citizens is 55 per cent; Canada's is 34 per cent. We can compare it with other countries. Germany is 37 per cent; I will remind the hon. member that Canada's is 34 per cent. The United Kingdom is 37 per cent; Canada's is 34 per cent. The only two that are lower are the United States at 29.8 per cent, and Japan at 31.3 per cent.

Canadians are paying taxes, yes; fairly, fairly.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister.

Clearly, the Minister of National Revenue is saying the system is not fair and that Canadians are over-taxed. Canadians knew that. It is clear that the per capita Canada personal income tax rate is the highest of all G-7 countries.

The Prime Minister talks about competitiveness. Again, in 1987 this government said that the tax system should have a broader base and lower rates and that it should minimize the preferences to high income individuals and profitable corporations.

When is the government going to take its own advice from 1987, the advice of the Minister of National Revenue in 1991, bring in a fair tax system, and implement a fair tax commission?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): As the hon. member might know, in 1987 tax reform was brought about here in Canada by the Minister of Finance to improve the tax system, and has in fact made it more fair. Let me just point out that in corporate taxes alone, it is a much fairer, much simpler system and corporations today are paying $1 billion more in taxes than they were before tax reform because a lot of the write-offs have been taken out of there.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary for the Prime Minister, on the question of competitiveness.

[Translation]

This government's financial and economic policies are responsible for the declining competitive position of Canadian businesses, according to a report by a committee of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology.

The same report recommended creating a financial institution for businesses involved in technology. The government has had this report for more than three months.

Is the government prepared to act and implement some of the recommendations of this report on competitiveness?

• (1430)

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the work of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology has made a significant contribution to the whole concept of what is needed to make the country competitive.

We have the NABST reports and it is significant that if you look in the Speech from the Throne, the whole concept of an agenda for prosperity and consultation with Canadians is based, to a large extent, upon what NABST said, not only about the cost of capital, but about other things as well.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will now know that the government has provided several different versions of what happened in the Al-Mashat case.

On May 15 the Prime Minister told the House that he first became aware of this matter on April 30. We now know that senior officials in his office were informed on April 8, three weeks before the Prime Minister says he found out.

Is the Prime Minister in a position to revise his original version of what happened, or is he really trying to have Canadians believe that senior officials—

Mr. Speaker: There is a very fine line that has to be kept in mind in questions on this matter, especially now that it is in committee. I would ask hon. members not to put in preambles or at the end of preambles, suggestions of dishonesty, impropriety or imputation of motives.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago when the matter was raised, I provided the House with the information which is on the record. It will be sustained by evidence before the committee, which I understand began hearings last week.

I understand as well, that the committee is scheduled to take evidence this evening and tomorrow. Among those appearing before the committee will be the Clerk of the Privy Council and my chief of staff, who will deal with these matters, I am sure, to the satisfaction of my hon. friend.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the committee will not be in a position to question the Prime Minister.

I would like to put a supplementary to the Prime Minister. Public documents indicate that on April 8 his legislative assistant and his deputy press secretary were informed of this matter.

On May 15 the Prime Minister said in this House that he did not find out until April 30. That is some three weeks.

I put the question again to the Prime Minister. Is he saying to Canadians—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The hon. member can ask the Prime Minister whether he did or whether he did not know something. But that question is clearly designed to put in doubt the honesty of the Prime Minister. If it was put in plain language it would not be allowed. It ought not to be allowed if it is put in very careful language, if that is what the imputation is.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will now have had the opportunity to review the record again. The record that was made public last week, indicates that senior officials in his office were informed on April 8.

In view of the release of this new information, does the Prime Minister still maintain that he was first informed of this matter three weeks after senior officials in his office were told?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I have already indicated to the House. I have told my hon. friend that will be totally sustained by evidence before the committee.

Mr. Simmons: Or they will be fired, right?

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. Mulroney: Senior officials will be there this evening and tomorrow. My hon. friend can, I am sure, ask them any and all questions in regard to any concerns he may or may not have. I am sure he will be well satisfied with the responses.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister.

Last Thursday the minister of external affairs stated in a public document that ministers, "—are constitutionally responsible to the House of Commons for their actions and the actions of their officials". She also said that officials include staff and political appointees, as well as bureaucrats.

The question is simple. Will the Prime Minister agree that his minister's statement is a correct summary of the principle of ministerial responsibility and will he further agree that the principle applies equally to him as the highest minister in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I have some difficulty with the question. It may be asking for an opinion, but the right hon. Prime Minister might want to deal with it.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no problem in responding to my hon. friend.

Members from all sides of the House requested, given the nature of this matter, that a parliamentary inquiry be convened. That presupposes presumably that my hon. friend will want to participate in that parliamentary inquiry, adduce evidence in a conventional manner and on the basis of that evidence, and only on the basis of it, make his own value judgment. Then he may or may not want to put questions like that.

Why does he not wait until the parliamentary inquiry that he sought does its work?

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I was talking about ministerial responsibility and had not mentioned anything about any particular committee of this House. In any event, my supplementary is this.

In version B of the Al-Mashat saga we learn that Mr. Paul Tellier, Clerk of the Privy Council, sent a memo to the Prime Minister on April 30 indicating that ministers Valcourt and McDougall would respond to questions that Mr. Al-Mashat "was processed under normal standards and was not accorded preferential treatment". We know that this was false because he was fast-tracked in 28 days.

My question is again simple. Will the Prime Minister assume responsibility for this blatant falsehood and what is he prepared to do about his ministers being—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. That is as much an accusation as it is a question and the matter is in front of committee.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must respond on behalf of Mr. Tellier, given the very malicious slur on his reputation by the hon. member. Mr. Tellier will be before the committee tomorrow, I believe, and will provide, I am sure, answers that are full and honest, that inspired the confidence of the Leader of the Opposition when Mr. Tellier was his deputy minister in Indian Affairs in much the same way that he inspires the full confidence of me as Prime Minister of Canada.

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of health. I understand that the minister has invited the provincial ministers of health to a meeting in Toronto on June 19.

Can the minister say whether all provinces will be attending and most importantly, will he reassure this House that the meeting is not linked to the current round of constitutional bargaining and that the federal jurisdiction in maintaining national medicare standards will not be on the table and will not be bargained away?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will not deal with the hypothesis that the member has raised. First of all, I just want to say that I am not the one who makes the decision if the provinces will attend. They will do that themselves.

Second, I think my friend knows, because I told him personally, that I believe it is time for the federal minister of health to meet with the ministers from the provinces. At that time we will see exactly the concerns that the provinces have in terms of health. I do not want to presume what they will bring forward. Personally, I believe the meeting will be the time to do that. I believe that all the provinces will agree.

Will they be there? You should ask that question of the provinces.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. In his letter of Friday to the provincial ministers, the minister speaks of the need to discuss cost containment on the one hand and service expansion on the other.

How can the minister speak of service expansion when he has cut billions of dollars to medicare programs? Can the minister assure this House that as a cost containment measure, he will insist that no province violates the Canada Health Act by introducing user fees, a move that is now being initiated by the Liberal government of Quebec?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member should wait first of all to see what the province of Quebec will do.

The legislation is not passed yet. We will see.

Second, there is nothing wrong in looking at with the provinces the problem of the cost of services in Canada. All provinces agree that the costs are increasing. Usually we do not have all the same resources that the NDP have, but normally the provinces will say to my friend that they want to look at the way they could manage those services, keeping in mind—and I already committed myself—that the principles of accessibility and universality of the Canada Health Act are not at stake. He should know that because I already said that.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and it concerns the dockside monitoring program being imposed on fishermen in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

I have sent the minister a report which demonstrates that the user fee portion of this program is without legislative basis and, as such, these fees are illegal. In light of this information, will the minister today rescind these dockside fees and reimburse those fishermen who have been illegally and improperly forced to pay them.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we all know that lawyers have differing opinions. If that was not the case, I suppose we would never have court cases occurring at all.

The legal advice given to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is that the system in place is certainly not illegal or ultra vires. Apparently the hon. gentleman refers to another lawyer who believes that it is. However, I am acting in accordance with the legal advice given to me by the solicitors for the government.

With respect to this system, it is not a system imposed on fishermen, Mr. Speaker. It is a system that fishermen and fish processors and others who want an orderly fishery, a fishery where the rules are observed and obeyed, want instituted. This is a method of paying for that system which is for the benefit of all fishermen and women and processors in the industry generally and, therefore, the costs of it had to be met by the industry generally.

I am certainly prepared, of course, to keep revising it so as it is competitive and efficient as possible and as fair as possible.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): My supplementary is for the same minister. I find it surprising to say the least that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would not have secured a legal opinion before imposing a program that is so clearly out of his authority.

Will the minister undertake today to, first, make public his department's legal analysis of this issue and, second, rescind these offensive fees and reimburse the fishermen affected if, as I fully expect, the analysis confirms their illegality?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, naturally the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans received legal advise in this matter before the program was instituted and acted in accordance with the same.

That is not to say that the solicitors acting for the government are perfect. They have in fact from time to time been found to be incorrect in their opinions, or courts have held differently than the opinions which the government received. If that were not the case, we would not have some of the embarrassments that governments, no matter what their political stripe are, receive from time to time when judges have a different view than government lawyers.

I notice from the opinion that was done that the hon. member refers to that the author of that opinion said this: "It is my view that a court could very well find that the imposition of fees" and so on. Well, a court might very well find anything. I have been terribly surprised by what courts could very well find in the past and, doubtless, I will be very surprised by what they find in the future.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

We learned today from the National Aeronautics Space Agency that the ozone layer in southern Canada has thinned by 5 per cent. The medical profession is of the view that every percentage decrease in the ozone layer leads to an increase of 3 to 4 per cent in the incidence of skin cancer. Therefore, this becomes a matter of urgent public concern.

Will the minister indicate in the House whether he is willing to commit himself today to the deadline of 1995 for the date when chlorofluorocarbons and similar chemical substances will be fully phased out in Canada?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to say, first of all, that this government is, and has been for many years, very concerned with the issue of CFC emissions and their impact on the ozone layer, as the hon. member has just expressed.

I am very proud of the fact that this government has displayed a greater amount of leadership on this issues than many other countries in the world. In fact, as you know, the Montreal protocol talks in terms of the total elimination of the manufacture and import of CFCs by the year 2000. I am delighted that this government has already made a commitment to do that by the year 1997.

We have shown leadership in the past and we will continue to do so now and in the future. I am also pleased to say that almost 85 per cent, I believe, of the use of CFCs will be prohibited in this country by the year 1995.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the concept of leadership is only in the mind of the parliamentary secretary and his government.

Australia, Norway, Sweden and Germany have committed themselves to 1995. The question is this. Because the health of the public, and particularly of our younger people, is at stake as a result of the thinning of the ozone layer, will this government reconsider its deadline and move it from 1997 to 1995?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the sincerity with which the member approaches the issue of the environment. I am reminded that this member was a Minister of the Environment in a former government.

I am very proud of the fact that we have made tremendous accomplishments since we came to power because that administration was not doing so in the years up to 1984.

As I explained before, this is very much a moving issue. The government believes that any new targets that are put in place will have to be done in co-operation with other governments throughout the world. In the meantime, we are a leader despite what the hon. member has just said.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

On May 16, the Federal Court of Canada ruled that the Alcan project in northern British Columbia should be submitted to a full environmental assessment review. This is Environment Week. Will the government announce a full environmental assessment of this project?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted the hon. gentleman has given me a chance to recommend to members of the House that they look at the details of the program just announced for the Fraser River on Saturday by the Minister of the Environment and I, where $100 million is going to be spent on the Fraser River to ensure that over the next 20 years salmon stocks are doubled in their size and that the environmental and pollution problems of the whole Fraser River system are dealt with in a more than adequate manner.

With respect to the particular question he has asked about, that matter is under review by the three or four departments intimately concerned and an announcement will be made within a reasonable time as to what action we propose to take.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that the plans for the Fraser River are incomplete without the full environmental assessment of the Alcan project.

Alcan has said that it is business as usual and that construction on the project is continuing. In order to avoid a Rafferty situation, will the minister issue an order today to Alcan to immediately halt construction? Will the minister see that the Government of British Columbia also participates in a full environmental assessment review?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the matter that the hon. gentleman refers to certainly had an environmental review before any permission was given for Alcan to proceed with construction at all.

The question is whether or not it should have the kind of an environmental review that is dictated by the EARP process. That is the question that is now before the government as a result of the decision referred to the British Columbia courts. It is being given serious consideration and a decision will certainly be announced within a reasonable period of time as to whether or not we wish to go forward with that kind of a formal review. There certainly has been a great deal of review of this situation before.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, if he is a aware of this. In a press conference held in Montreal last Friday, the Quebec Manufacturers' Association has joined forces with the CNTU and the FTQ to denounce the federal government monetary policy, including the negative impact of the Free Trade Agreement. Is the government prepared today to consider the important demands of these three major organizations to allow the manufacturing industry to survive in Quebec and throughout Canada?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that, commenting before a committee of this House, on a proposal made by the hon. member's party to change the monetary policy, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association cautioned the Canadian people against reverting to the previous Liberal policy which gave us the extremely high interest rates that caused major problems in Canada and that we are only starting to recover from.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. After opening our borders under the Free Trade Agreement, why is the government monetary policy to maintain the Canadian dollar too high relative to the American dollar, which reduces our access to the American market? Can you explain that to the Canadian people?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the economic situation, especially the recession, of course has not been very favourable to implementing the Free Trade Agreement to the fullest. Nonetheless, I think that we should be happy that a country like ours, which depends more than any other on its exports not for little extras but to maintain its standard of living, has gained access to the American market. The economic situation may not be as great as it has been, but let me remind the hon. member the figures that were quoted in this House last week to illustrate the progress we have made in our trade relations with the United States since the Free Trade Agreement was signed.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, another week has passed and there is still no help from this government for the port of Halifax.

I appeal to the Prime Minister. Why will he not go after his Minister of Transport and make him make good on his promise of last week when he said he would do everything in his power for the port of Halifax and act to change the unfair tax structure?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, incredibly the Minister of Transport is away on government business. I will certainly take the representation of my hon. colleague and relay it to the Minister of Transport who, no doubt, in his usual efficient fashion will be right back as soon as he is able.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am really delighted to see that this government has such an interest in the ports on the east coast, particularly the port of Halifax. There is nobody on the government side who can give me an answer.

Freight rates have become a rallying cry in eastern Canada, a cry for thousands of Nova Scotians concerned over our historic port.

Why will this government not do something about unfair competition, particularly Canadian Pacific's Delaware and Hartford Railroad in the U.S., which is the main competition against CN's link from Halifax to Montreal. Doesn't anybody over there know?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been anything but acknowledgement of how important the port of Halifax is to Canada's future.

As the hon. member said, it was just last week—I think Thursday—that she raised the question. She is saying: "How come in the last three days there has not been something done about it?"

The fact of the matter is the Minister of Transport is seized with the problem. The hon. member has made a representation. She did ask for information and I indicated I would pass on that representation to the Minister of Transport. You can be sure that as was attempted by the current Deputy Prime Minister when he was Minister of Transport, we will continue to make every effort, in spite of some opposition from the hon. member's party, to get a level playing field of the type we sought but which was resisted by the Liberal Party when we tried to do it.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance. When the GST was being drafted, the government said it would be a flexible living tax which adapts itself to changing conditions.

There are real concerns right now as to how the tax applies to the sale of used cars. GST is applicable to the sale of used cars on dealers' lots but not on cars sold privately and that appears to be a real disadvantage for used car dealers.

Can the minister clarify for the House and for consumers exactly how the GST applies to the sale of used cars? Are dealers being put at a competitive disadvantage and, if so, what is the government going to do about it?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, unlike the provincial sales tax in Ontario where they tax the car every time it is sold, the federal sales tax only applies to the mark-up between the price that the used car dealer paid and the price he sells it for. GST is paid only on the service of the used car dealer.

It is interesting to note that before the goods and services tax, about 75 per cent of all used cars were sold privately. That has not changed dramatically since GST has come in.

EDUCATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration. As he knows, the meeting this morning with the Canadian Ethnocultural Council confirmed many concerns of ethnic minorities. Some of these involved immigration, of course.

Since racism is on the increase and this often results in the scapegoating of immigrants, what plans does the minister have for comprehensive public education programs on the benefits of immigration that will help people be more accepting and counteract their fears and prejudices?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a point that the Ethnocultural Council raised with me earlier today. The hon. member will remember that my predecessor brought in the five-year plan for immigration. Given the importance that this government attaches to public education on the question of immigration, it has been fully integrated into the plan. We are in the process of consulting with organizations across Canada, with provinces and with people to put in place this education campaign which the hon. member refers to. Over $8 million will be spent to try to raise the level of awareness to the benefits of immigration.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, another problem is that many immigrants simply are not getting adequate language training which is essential if they are going to adjust and contribute to Canada. This is largely because federal funds simply are not adequate. For example, Vancouver City College, in my riding, laid off 80 experienced language training teachers recently while they have a waiting list for 4,000 people. This is because they simply do not have funds.

Will the minister be increasing the amount of funding for language training? Will he find a fairer funding mechanism so that in particular western Canada will get their fair share of funds, and will he also look into this specific problem that I mentioned in Vancouver?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, recognizing the importance of language training and of integration of immigrants in our communities in Canada, the government has increased, as she may recall, the envelope to immigration by $315 million over the life of that plan.

She asks how that money will be divided up. It will be divided in accordance with the needs in the country and the region of B.C. I know will get increased funding for language training. As for the particular case of her own riding, I will look into it and get back to her.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

He must know that during his absence, members of his government made a number of statements and acted in a way calculated to provoke Quebec. The National Assembly went so far as to pass a resolution with 85 in favour and 3 against, condemning the government for its action with respect to education, and it wanted to table another resolution to condemn the government again.

Meanwhile, always in the absence of the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare appropriated the right to intervene unilaterally in the field of regional economic development, thus denying Quebec the right to be master of its own development.

My question for the Prime Minister is this: Since he is back, will he stop all this foolishness, rap the knuckles of his Minister of National Health and Welfare and finally show Quebec some respect?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will ignore the hon. member's comments. Everybody knows that if he were given the same treatment, he wouldn't last very long in this House.

That being said, I repeat what I said last week, which is that the federal government—and the hon. member for Shefford ought to know, since his party was once on this side of the House—and the provinces have always shared jurisdiction over regional development. Agreements were signed with the Government of Quebec in 1985 and 1988.

We operate within the framework of these agreements, and the responsibility I was given by the Prime Minister for regional development means that I must have the appropriate administrative structure. I can only confirm what I said last week, what I have repeated time and time again and what the people of Gaspe, for instance, were very relieved to hear, and that is that as long as the federal government has a responsibility for regional development, it will continue to shoulder its share of those responsibilities, for the benefit of Quebec and Quebecers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POSTAL SERVICES REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-217, an Act to provide for the review of postal rates and services and to implement certain Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to give the public the assurance that it plays a role in setting postal rates and establishing postal services. I may add, Mr. Speaker, that we had a similar system before, which was abolished by the government opposite.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[English]

NATIONAL CAPITAL ACT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-218, an act to amend the National Capital Act (description of National Capital Region).

He said: Mr. Speaker the purpose of this bill is to amend the territory of the National Capital Region easterly from Ottawa to a distance approximately as far as it extends west of Ottawa, namely to the region of Plantagenet, Ontario. This bill comes with the support of all municipalities in the area and the author of it locally was the mayor of Rockland, Mr. Jean-Marc Lalonde.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

HOLIDAYS ACT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-219, an act to amend the Holidays Act (Canada Day).

He said: The purpose of this bill is to repeat a section of the Holidays Act which states that when July 1 is a Sunday, July 2 is the legal holiday. What happens now is that some federal civil servants, namely post office employees, if they regularly work on July 1, are not eligible for overtime while those who work on Monday, July 2, are. It is clearly not the intent of the Holidays Act and this bill is a technical amendment, the purpose of which is to restore Canada Day for post office employees.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-220, an act to amend the Criminal Code (abortion).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a conscience clause. It would make it a criminal offence for anyone to reprimand or to dismiss an employee of a hospital or a physician who refused to participate in an abortion if that is against their will. The purpose of this bill is to protect the conscience of individuals working in hospitals who do not want to participate in this kind of a procedure.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-221, an act to amend the Criminal Code (destruction of the foetus).

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-223, an act to amend the Criminal Code (hate propaganda—age group).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide for a Criminal Code amendment respecting propaganda that advocates the physical destruction of persons as an identifiable group, particularly children.

This is the private member's bill that I proposed in the past to do away with a product known as Garbage Pail Kids, a most offensive product.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-224, an act to amend the Criminal Code (peeping Toms).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the present definition of a peeping Tom in the Criminal Code is someone who prowls in the dark upon someone else's property.

The purpose of this amendment is to make it unlawful to similarly prowl in the daylight. It has been brought to my attention by constituents, particularly women, that they were unable to have charges laid against peeping Toms when these individuals took part in those kind of unwanted activities in the daytime.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BEVERAGE CONTAINERS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-225, an Act respecting beverage containers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill I wish to introduce today is the same bill I introduced during this Parliament's last session.

[English]

The purpose of the bill is to require that all beverages sold in Canada, including alcoholic beverages, be sold in bottles upon which a deposit would be chargeable. The bill sets out the rate of deposit.

The bill would require that the deposit be charged by retailers upon sale and be refunded to a person returning the beverage container. It is clearly designed to clean up our environment and, accordingly, I hope it will commend itself to all environmentally minded members of this House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

RURAL CANADA

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present a petition to this House signed by several hundred people from 47 different communities in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick.

These people are protesting the systematic destruction of the infrastructure of rural Canada including cutbacks to VIA Rail, the abandonment of railways, neglect of the fisheries, forestry and agriculture, and the erosion of the postal system.

Therefore, these people call on the government to reverse these cutbacks, particularly to reverse its policy of closing rural post offices.

VIOLENT CRIMES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting to the House today a number of petitions signed by some 4,000 people mainly from the area of Windsor, Ontario.

In these petitions the petitioners call upon Parliament to pass legislation establishing mandatory minimum sentences for all violent crimes which would apply uniformly to all regions of Canada.

These petitions have been duly certified by the clerk and meet the requirements for tabling in this House, pursuant to our Standing Orders.

RAIN FORESTS

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present this petition on behalf of over 100 very young constituents of my riding.

As most members of this House are aware, the world's rain forests are used to regulate climate, control floods and conserve soil. Of course, over half of the world's known species of plant and animal life also live within the rain forests as do some 200 million native people.

Therefore, the petitioners request that no Canadian foreign aid be dispersed to projects which destroy rain forests and that the Canadian executive directors of multilateral development banks vote against projects which destroy rain forests.

Further, be it resolved that Canada ban the import of tropical timber which is logged in primary tropical rain forests.

I humbly submit this petition on their behalf.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my petition, which has been certified by the clerk to be in compliance with the standing orders, is on behalf a number of my constituents in Ottawa South who are expressing their concerns about the recent cuts to the budgets of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

In particular, my petitioners call upon Parliament to ensure that the CBC be strengthened rather than weakened to serve as a primary instrument of Canadian cultural sovereignty, providing high quality service to all Canadians.

I am proud to present this petition on their behalf.

PARENTAL LEAVE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have the honour to present a petition signed by Canadians living in Parkdale—High Park.

The petitioners humbly sheweth that whereas Bill C-21 has reduced adoptive parental leave from 15 weeks to 10 weeks, it has at the same time increased biological parental leave to 25 weeks: 15 weeks maternity and 10 weeks parental leave.

Bill C-21 is a discriminatory step backward from previous legislation in 1983 when the House of Commons amended the UIC Act explicitly to end discrimination of adoptive parents and recognize the need of adoptive parents.

The petitioners call upon this government to review Bill C-21 with regard to adoptive parental leave, considering the literature that deals with the adoptive process, the bonding process, the needs and rights of adoptive parents, proper terminology in adoption and discussion with adoptive parents and to change Bill C-21 so that all parents, whether biological or adoptive, receive the same paid leave of 25 weeks to spend time with their new children.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have before me a petition certified by the clerk of petitions and signed by residents of Kenora, Keewatin, Upsala, Thunder Bay and Graham, Ontario.

All of the petitioners have lost their rail passenger services. They call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore the VIA Rail service cut on January 15, 1990, to maintain and where appropriate upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely, to provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and to make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern, passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

In addition, the petitioners say they want to put Canada back on track.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition today signed by numerous residents of Kingston and the Islands who object to the fact that Canada has no law that makes it an offence to destroy or desecrate the Canadian flag.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to pass such a law.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today signed primarily by residents from the Prince George, Vanderhoof and the Fort St. James area of my riding.

The petitioners call on the government to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations. Certainly with the publication of the report on the weekend showing that Tory times are taxing times, I heartily endorse this petition.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of western Canadians who indicate that they support the New Democratic Party plan to restore VIA Rail service which was cut on January 15, 1990.

The petitioners want to maintain and where appropriate upgrade the remote services on which many Canadians rely. They want to provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail and make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C-15, an act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relationships in connection with the transfer of certain airports, as reported without amendment by a legislative committee, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we are at the—

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, just prior to the start of Question Period, if I am not mistaken, one of the hon. members from Hamilton had finished his speech. Some of us had certainly hoped to be able to ask questions of this member. He does not seem to be here at the moment, but—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. As the hon. member for Hamilton West is not in the house there will be no question or comment period. We will resume debate with the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on that same point, I take it that members of the House accept that we all have duties in committees and the member for Hamilton West is possibly preoccupied with his duties on committees. We sometimes fail to make that point in debate.

We are dealing with third reading of Bill C-15 and, more specifically, with an amendment put to the House by my colleague for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, Mr. Joe Comuzzi. The amendment in question is rather complicated so I will just address the amendment, as we should all do, and try to be relevant to the subject matter before us.

The purpose of the amendment is to delete from Bill C-15 any words which give the idea or the impression that the government intends to sell these airports either to meet with a hidden agenda of privatizing just about everything it can get its hands on, or to eventually privatize a national service that is and has been traditionally very useful and appreciated by Canadians.

In the bill we will find the word "sell" for example in the interpretation and application on page 1:

> (2) For the purpose of this Act, the Governor in Council may, by order,
> (a) designate any corporation or other body to which the Minister is to sell, lease or otherwise transfer an airport—

If one looks on the next page, page 2, the word "sell" appears again:

> —the minister is to sell, lease or otherwise transfer an airport to a designated airport authority as the transfer date for that airport.

All through that bill there are the words "sell" or "sold". Section 4, page 2 says: "Where the minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport—"

We want to clarify the bill. This is the purpose of the amendment. The Liberal caucus opposes the privatization by sale of Canadian airports. However, and we made this clear in debate, we support the initiatives to transfer the administration and management of airports to local authorities under certain conditions. In no way will we support a bill that sells airports. I think we made that point clear in committee. We asked the minister if he had a hidden agenda and if he had any intentions of selling these airports. He did not answer the questions.

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Gauthier: I hear a member on the government side say "no". If that is the case then take the word "sell" out of the bill. It is very simple. Take the word "sell" out of the bill and you will have a clear and concise bill.

Is the government trying to deceive Canadians once more with its obsession with privatization?

I would maintain that to keep the word "sell" in that bill is two faced and less than honest. If it has no intentions to do it then it should be taken out. It seems quite simple. I would hope that government members who are here today supporting the contention that the government does not intend to sell these airports would have the honesty to stand up in their places and vote for this amendment because that is all the amendment does. It takes the word "sell" from the main body of the bill and would therefore make it totally acceptable.

I have other comments on section 4 but I will wait until we get back to the main motion.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, what we have in front of us this afternoon is a bill which has some very serious dangers behind it, dangers which concern us as a party. It is clear to us that the question of transfer of airports to local authorities has not been thought through. It is clear that the tough questions about the national responsibility which has existed in the past for air transportation in this country and for facilities associated with air transportation have not been confronted by this government.

It seems to us that this is once more a question of an ideological commitment to doing away with as much community ownership as possible; control by society of elements which should be important parts of our communities' infrastructure.

Despite that sense of concern, that sense of real uncertainty about whether this government has thought this issue through, we are pleased to see a bill which does try to lay out ways in which the workers involved in such transfers will be protected.

• (1530)

One of the things which is most devastating is to see privatizations take place and shutdowns occur and to see not the people who are responsible for those decisions taking the brunt of the difficulties of adjustment but the workers who have had no say in the decision themselves.

We have seen that with so many things which this government has done. We have seen it with free trade in which the great adjustment problems that the workers in this country have experienced in the context of free trade have not been dealt with by the government. Workers instead have been forced to carry those responsibilities themselves.

We have seen it with the shutdown of VIA Rail facilities in different parts of the country. We have seen it with respect to the CBC. Many parts of the country have experienced loss of CBC services, and workers have found themselves faced with the loss of jobs which they thought were jobs which were serving the community and which would continue to serve the community.

Yet the adjustment process has not been considered as a responsibility by government. Therefore, it is good to see a piece of legislation come before us which provides for some consideration with respect to employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of some of the airports involved.

Nevertheless, even when we get to the question of how the workers affected in this case are themselves treated in this piece of legislation, there are some serious problems and some serious gaps which will lead us to vote for this referral back to committee. They will also lead us, assuming that vote is lost, to vote against third reading of this piece of legislation.

What is interesting is that there were some amendments that were suggested to this piece of legislation, some amendments which our labour critic, the member who sits beside me in the House here, put forward to the previous Minister of Transport, who is now the Solicitor General. One of those amendments suggested that in the event that employees are transferred to a designated airport authority prior to the negotiation of a new collective agreement on behalf of their previous bargaining unit, the government will ensure that they receive any retroactive remuneration that they would otherwise have received for the period commencing on the date of expiry of their previous collective agreement until the date of their transfer to the designated local airport authority.

This in fact was quite a sensible amendment which was put forward.

The government indicated—and I have here the letter in which the previous Minister of Transport made this commitment on April 9, 1991—that there would be a change made which would effectively introduce that concept into this bill.

Now, the Solicitor General says that this was part of a deal. Let me suggest that if this was a sensible amendment which should have been part of the legislation and the government was prepared to put it into the legislation as part of a deal, surely it makes sense to put it into the legislation at this stage.

So that the minister's comments can be put quite carefully, this is a letter which was written to my colleague and I quote:

> Dear Ms. Langan:
> I am writing to you with respect to possible amendments to Bill C-85—

Which is, of course, the new bill as it is now before us, Bill C-15.

> —which you are considering proposing for Third Reading debate. Departmental and Justice Canada officials have had an opportunity to review the various draft amendments which you have made available to us.

The minister then goes on to make his comments, and I hope that the minister would not suggest that I am misrepresenting the position which he took in this letter.

With respect to the second amendment which was put forward, our labour critic, on behalf of our party I might say, put forward the following suggestion that this should have an amendment with respect to clause 6 which would read as follows:

> (4) Where an airport has been sold, leased or otherwise transferred to a designated airport authority, any designated employee for the airport shall retain the same rights and benefits as the designated employee enjoyed in the position held by the designated employee in the Public Service on the transfer date.

(5) The rights and benefits of a designated employee referred to in subsection (4) may not be altered or abrogated except pursuant to a new collective agreement that is binding on the designated employee, or, in the absence of any collective agreement binding on the designated employee pursuant to a decision made by the designated airport authority with respect thereto.

The minister continues to discuss this particular amendment and suggests that there may be some problems with the wording in subsection (5) and for that reason, it would not be acceptable to the government to accept that particular amendment.

There is a further amendment suggested by my colleague which, again, was not accepted.

The key point, however, is that the government was quite prepared, as given in this commitment from last April from the then Minister of Transport, to make some changes in this bill which would provide more protection for workers affected by this bill. One would have thought that in bringing this legislation back before us the government would have seen fit to see to it that these extra protections, which they were prepared to commit themselves to back last April, would be part of the new legislation.

Unfortunately that is not the case. This is yet a further reason, from our perspective as a party, to see this piece of legislation sent back to committee to consider some of the points put forward in the amendment which the Liberal Party has moved, and also to put at least one change into this piece of legislation which the previous Minister of Transport said he was prepared to do in order to provide a further safeguard for workers affected by this bill.

Without such changes, we have before us a piece of legislation which is faulty on a number of levels. It is faulty, first, because workers have not been consulted with respect to the changes which they would like to see in the legislation. The bill is in front of us. There has been no consultation with the the union of Transport Canada employees. What possible recipe for disastrous labour regulations could be chosen but to bring forward a piece of legislation meant to supposedly serve workers and not even to consult the union representing those workers? What could possibly be achieved with that kind of approach?

What will be achieved will be a situation in which workers are affected by a bill and will feel aggrieved, almost regardless of what is in the legislation, because the bill has not been discussed with those workers.

Surely one thing we should have learned as members of Parliament trying to do something in this vast, difficult country is that no action is taken without consultation, without discussion.

I see the previous minister is here. I welcome him to participate in the debate, to stand up and explain why this particular piece of legislation was not discussed with the working people of the country. "Why were the working people affected by this bill not consulted", I ask the minister. If he says that the union of Transport Canada employees were in fact part of the process of negotiation and consultation that has taken place between Transport Canada and various local airport authorities, contrary to what I am told by our transport critic, I welcome the former minister to get up and make that point. I think it would be a valuable contribution. The procedural and substantive rights of workers with respect to their existing pensions are not clear under this bill.

That is not the first time we have seen this kind of reality emerge. We had to fight very hard to get pension rights established for workers when Canadian Arsenals, for instance, was privatized. We were successful in that case, but in this case the wording is not yet clear.

The bill needs to incorporate the desire of the workers to continue under the plans which they are presently part of as part of the Public Service. That is not just a sort of hypothetical question. The local airport authority in British Columbia is having difficulty finding an insurance company to take on the disability insurance plan which is currently provided to workers.

In short, we have a piece of legislation in front of us which, as usual with this government, betrays a lack of consultation, a lack of concern and a lack of responsibility to the working people of this country. For this reason, I hope very much that this House will accept the amendment which has been put before us to send this piece of legislation back to committee for certain types of review, and hopefully for other kinds of review as well.

If we do not do that, we will have broken faith with workers who have given many years to the airport authorities throughout this country.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, without wishing to delay the progress of this bill, I want to reiterate that it was quite clear in our introduction of the bill on third reading that the bill deals exclusively with employee related matters.

For the record, and for the hon. member who just spoke, I just want to note that the following parties were consulted in the preparation of this bill: the Alberta and Quebec provincial governments, the Edmonton, Montreal, Vancouver and Calgary airport authorities, Labour Canada, the Canadian Labour Relations Board, the Public Service Staff Relations Board, the Treasury Board Secretariat, the Union of Canadian Transport Employees, a component of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the Canadian Union of Public Employees representing the Edmonton municipal airport employees, the office of the Commissioner of Official Languages, the office of Privatization and Regulatory Affairs, and Public Works Canada,

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the information that the parliamentary secretary has put forward. I am not certain if that deals completely with the question of the process of negotiation and consultation which has taken place between Transport Canada and various local airport authorities.

If in fact the unions at the various airport authorities affected by this bill have been involved at each stage of negotiation and consultation, then I am quite prepared to withdraw any suggestions that I meant to the contrary.

As I say, that was certainly not the information which had been provided to us by the trade union which represents these workers.

I think it is also important in cases like this to ask what the nature and outcome of the negotiation and consultation actually was. In the case of the Official Languages Commissioner, for instance, to whom the parliamentary secretary made reference, the Official Languages Commissioner certainly has expressed some concern with respect to the bill which now stands in front of us.

The fact that consultation takes place does not necessarily mean that some kind of satisfactorily negotiated solution is the outcome of that consultation.

I suspect in this case that that is indeed the fact.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague with much interest. In fact, with regard to this amendment moved by another colleague, I would like to ask him what he thinks about this whole idea of privatization, because it seems that privatizing everything is very fashionable for this governement.

Now, I am sure that the governement is not looking for the complete privatization of airports, but maybe the privatization of the workplace. I would like to hear a bit more from my colleague about what he thinks are the pros and cons. Is there a positive side and, if so, it seems to me that we are trying to fix something that does not need fixing.

I would really want to know where the present system needs fixing, and if it does not, why are we trying to fix it?

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, it certainly is a guarantee of the usefulness of the process of transfer if it is made clear that the process is not a sale, if we are not talking about privatization in the usual sense of the word, of assets to a private corporation for purposes of operating that asset in order to generate profits.

It seems to me that there often can be advantages to the transfer of something like a local airport to a local community. I think, for instance, of the airport in our community in Windsor where the transfer of the airport is something that would make a good deal of sense because there is within the community itself very much a feeling that under the direction and operation of the federal government, the airport's capacities and potential have not been fully utilized.

There are a great many people in our community who say that if the community itself through a community board had the ability to direct the strategy of Windsor's airport, it would be able to market it as an airport much more successfully than the federal government has been able to do.

Frankly, I think that kind of transitional approach is what we should be looking at in this context. That is why I think the amendment which has been put forward here, which makes it clear that we are not talking about sales but instead are talking about transfers to community based boards and community based authorities, that kind of transfer, can make a good deal of sense.

Regardless, however, of how it is organized, there has to be ironclad protection for the workers involved. They have made commitments to their communities with the clear understanding that their work was part of the Public Service and part of everything that comes with the Public Service, both the downside, the fact that you get hit by governments like this that decide to treat you unfairly on wages, but also the upside, the fact that you are part of a public pension system which is indexed and which provides some security for the future.

It is the fact that those kinds of things are lost which is especially unfortunate about this piece of legislation.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-15. My intervention today is very timely in that my riding is an area that is very rural in nature and has small airports. I know that a lot of members who have entered the debate so far continue to focus on the larger airports in the country and probably the ones that have more opportunity to make money.

My colleague, the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, has made an amendment suggesting that we take a good look and make sure that the transfer of these particular facilities to airport commissions or to municipalities is not indeed privatization or selling of the facility.

That is a very important initiative. I think that if the intention of the government were to sell these facilities then truly there is an ulterior motive. There are some very grave difficulties with some of the airports in the areas that I am going to speak about.

One of the best ways I find to debate these issues is to pick a couple of examples and talk about those examples. That to me is an easier way of bringing the message across to our constituents and the people of Canada as to what the difficulties are out there as they relate to Transport Canada, and specifically to airports in rural Canada.

Before I get to those specific examples, I want to talk about some of the issues that I think have to be addressed before we get into transferring these particular facilities to municipalities or airport commissions. First of all I must emphasize that this government and Transport Canada itself have to set up some guidelines. They cannot just hocus-pocus or holus-bolus take these airports, depending on their condition—and I will talk about that in more detail later—and decide to transfer them to particular communities without having at least minimum standards.

The guidelines for the transfer of airports have to be maintained across the board and they have to be decided upon based on population and based on size of airport. I know people will argue this point, but I am a firm believer that airports are used almost as political tools, as a slush fund to give this member of Parliament a brand new terminal this week because an election is coming up. That terminal, even if it is way oversized for that community, will be put there anyway to make that particular member look good in the eyes of his constituents.

We have that all across the country now. It has become very obvious, as I travel around the country, that the airport facilities of some communities are much better than those of other communities almost identical in size. That is why I think it is very important. If we are going to get into transferring all these facilities to the communities, first of all they should only be transferred if they meet certain guidelines. Those guidelines should be standard and meet the safety purposes that we as parliamentarians would like to see for the future of those airports.

Second, I think we should look very seriously at the guidelines and make sure that when we do transfer these airports, the employees who are being transferred with the facility are looked after in a way that is compatible with what we think is fair. Those individuals were Transport Canada employees all along for many years and all of a sudden became employees of a different type.

We have to look at those very seriously. We also have to look at guidelines for capital improvements. It is very simple to transfer a facility, but not to discuss with Transport Canada the improvements of those facilities over a period of 5, 10, 15 and 20 years.

Without those kinds of guidelines, the community may be taking over a facility that is in good shape today but 10 years from now, when we want to improve our facility or to do some renovations, Transport Canada could easily say: "Well, we are sorry, we do not have the money any longer. You will have to go to the municipal taxpayer and get the dollars from them". That is a very sad and real issue that we will have to tackle before smaller communities would even consider taking on such an endeavour as running an airport.

We also need guidelines to make sure that we have increased funding for the maintenance agreements that we would be entering into.

One of the issues that hit home not too long ago in my riding was that Transport Canada put a freeze on the amount of dollars that it was going to allocate to the Dryden airport. The community said that it could not continue to run this facility with the amount of dollars being given to it. There has to be some sort of guideline or some sort of mechanism that would allow these communities, even though the airports are transferred, to be able to go to Transport Canada and the minister and suggest that because of some circumstances, there has to be an increase in funding in order to resolve those issues.

We are not all in the position, in these small airports in smaller towns and cities in Canada, to be able to make enough revenues from these particular facilities of not having to rely on the taxpayers of Canada, on Transport Canada, on the Ministry of Transportation in order to maintain these facilities in the way that we expect them to be maintained.

Those are a few guidelines that we have to set down if we are even going to consider transferring these facilities to smaller communities. If we are not going to put those kind of guidelines in place then this really is a scam. It is really saying to Canadians: "Listen, we do not want to be bothered any more with your airport facilities. We deregulated it for you. Told you that when we deregulated it the services would be better". That did not happen. "Well we deregulated this particular facility for you so that you would get lower fares". That did not happen. Now the government is saying: "Well, we cannot seem to run this facility very well as a government, we will give it to you at the local level and we are sure you can do a better job. But then again, do not come back to us at any time and suggest that we will protect you to a certain extent. You will just basically have to look after yourself."

That is not the kind of message I would hope that the government is sending to the small communities and the many, many small airports across this country.

Having said that, I want to give a few examples of some of the difficulties I see in transferring smaller rural airports. When I say smaller rural airports, I am talking about communities with 5,000 people, with 10,000 people and, in some cases, as in the one example I have in my hand, of a community of 22,000. Now this facility, when I describe what is wrong with it and the lack of guidelines and procedures that Transport Canada does not seem to have in place or, if it does, only in place where it feels that someone might be watching, it makes you kind of wonder just what the government has in mind.

Let me give an example of what is happening in a community of mine, Kenora, Ontario. Kenora has three communities in its area, Kenora, Keewatin and Jaffray-Melick. Those three communities have a population of roughly 22,000. You would think that there would be a pretty decent facility there with an area and a population of that size, not to mention that the population in the summertime blossoms to about 50,000 people. We are now talking about the tourism component of an area like Kenora—Rainy River, which is probably one of the most beautiful parts of Ontario and, indeed, probably one of the most beautiful parts of Canada.

This airport that I am talking about has a maintenance agreement with hours of operation of 42.5 hours per week. Everyone says: "Well, that is not too bad when you consider that roughly most airports run on a hundred hours a week" and people will ask: "Well, what seems to be the problem?"

Let me give an example. There are four other airports on my list and I will just list them: Dryden, Sioux Lookout, Red Lake and Fort Frances. Those are four other communities of my riding. All have smaller populations than the one I am talking about.

Sioux Lookout receives funding for 15 hours a day, seven days a week which works out to 105 hours per week. That is over double the amount of hours and maintenance dollars given to the community of Sioux Lookout compared to the community of Kenora.

Red Lake is funded for 12 hours a day from Monday to Friday which is 60 hours per week.

Fort Frances has a maintenance operating agreement for 14 hours a day, seven days a week, which is 98 hours per week.

Atikokan, which is another one I did not mention, has 84 hours per week.

Those four or five communities all have double and some almost triple amounts of hours per week in funding for maintenance agreements which are signed with different governments, not all federal, some provincial. They have different agreements with senior levels of government to operate their facilities.

I have difficulty understanding where Transport Canada is coming from when looking at the facilities, the population and the potential of these different communities and their maintenance agreements.

I am very pleased that a community like Dryden gets 105 hours per week of operation dollars in its maintenance agreement.

That kind of facility is necessary in a community like Dryden. However, then there is a community like Kenora which has double the population, almost triple the population of a community like Dryden but has half the maintenance agreement that this community has.

You say to yourself: "Well, what does that mean, operating cost?" Let me put it in dollars and cents. That is a good way to explain to our residents and constituents what it means. It is right here. I will just quickly grab it for you. It explains in detail the operating costs.

Kenora in 1988–89 had an operating cost, money that it was given by the federal government, of $204,000 and made revenues of roughly $131,000 for a cost recovery of 64.5 per cent.

Dryden had an operating cost of $897,000 from money that was given by the federal government with revenues of $308,000 for a recovery of 34.4 per cent.

Fort Frances had operating costs of $273,500 and revenues of $81,000 for a cost recovery of 29.8 per cent.

I guess you are sitting there thinking: "Well, what are you getting at?" Let me tell you what I am getting at. The fact remains is that, if you are familiar with the region, the community of Kenora and the airport is a very essential component of that community's long term goals and hopes and aspirations for the future. Now, Transport Canada in its wisdom treats that particular airport much differently than it treats the one down the road a hundred miles. We cannot understand for the life of us why that is.

There cannot be any reason other than there are political decisions being made as to whether to fund a particular airport or to not fund a particular airport. It cannot be used as an argument that this airport is any less important than the other, considering that the population is double the size of the other communities that I mentioned.

I want to switch to the other example because I know I will end up running out of time as I usually do. I want to talk a little bit about another airport, the Sioux Lookout airport.

• (1610)

In March 1990, the town of Sioux Lookout submitted an application under the Local/Local Commercial Airports Financial Assistance Program to the minister. This Local/Local Commercial Airports Financial Assistance Program is run directly through the Minister of Transport, which means that when you apply for this program, in order to get assistance to improve your airport, you have to convince the minister and not Transport Canada of the importance of this particular project and whether he should fund it.

The town of Sioux Lookout went to the minister for this application. It was the previous minister. I will explain why this community went for these improvements and I will give some statistics just to show what has happened, but before I do that, let me give the groundwork.

This is a community of about 5,000 people. Why would a community of 5,000 need a large airport? This particular community is the jump-off point to go up north, to northern Ontario and to all the isolated aboriginal communities of practically half of Ontario. People fly out of this particular airport and go to that region which has, roughly speaking, about 10,000 aboriginal people. They have no alternative but to go by air for medical purposes and to get to the outside world, unless you consider a canoe or a dog sled to be a good alternative. That is the only possible way to get to Thunder Bay or Winnipeg, to fly out of there over to Sioux Lookout and from there transfer and on to points west or east.

Let me show the traffic trends. This particular community has increased seven fold in traffic in the last 10 years. It is the busiest airport in north-western Ontario, next to Thunder Bay. Thunder Bay has a population of over 100,000 people and this particular community of 5,000 has a large amount of traffic coming out of it.

In 1977, 8,100 passengers used the airport. In 1988, the number almost reached 50,000 passengers. It is estimated that by the year 2001, more than 60,000 passengers will use the airport. When the airport was built in the early 1970s, it was built for 8,000 passengers, it is now almost at 50,000 passengers and is expected to see over 60,000 passengers by the year 2001.

What did the minister say? He said: "We do not have the funding right now. You are not high on the priority list, therefore maybe you can apply next year and you will have to live with the airport you have". We are not talking about service to one community. We are talking about people from 30 communities who come from the far north to this airport and we cannot even get it on the priority list so that somewhere down the line we can tell all those communities in north-western Ontario that they will have a decent airport facility.

In that airport there is not even a confectionery, there is not even a place to grab a sandwich. There is a bubble gum machine, a place where you can buy cigarettes—heaven forbid—and a place where you can buy chocolate bars and chips and that is all. There are almost 50,000 people using that facility already. There is a population explosion going on in the north and I am sure they will continue to use it.

The only alternative is for the Minister of Transport to build us a road up north.

Those are two examples that I think bring to light the issue of how important it is to understand where the Ministry of Transport is going, before we start transferring these airports to municipalities and to the individual communities. Is it suggesting that it does not want to get involved in the future of these particular communities and their airports? Is it suggesting that it cannot afford it at the federal level? Is it saying: "You look after it municipally or provincially, or to hell with you?" I get the impression that is the kind of scenario we are looking at.

I think we are quite prepared as communities to take over these airports.

If we are given the proper guidelines, if you are quite honest and frank with us and tell us just what you are proposing to do as far as a long term capital for the improvements of these facilities, and if you are prepared to give us the kind of guidelines to help with the employee transfers and make sure that they get the same kind of benefits they got before, then I think we as a party will be prepared to take a good look at it.

First of all I think we have to clear up the most important part of this whole bill, and I was so very impressed that the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon brought it up: We must make sure that this is not a privatization but a transfer of facilities, if the communities can come to some sort of understanding of just what the transfer means to them and if it is an improvement to them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. Before resuming debate it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Algoma, steel industry; the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, trucking industry; the hon. member for Scarborough West, immigration; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, the environment; the hon. member for Saint-Léonard, the economy.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this opportunity go by without saying a few words about this legislation. The reason why I do so is because Canadians must be wondering what is going on. Are we talking about taking all of our airports in Canada and passing them over to organizations?

I picked up a brochure which says "airport transfer." It shows a picture of an aeroplane leaving an airport, and in the middle of it is the Maple Leaf; "Airport transfer, Transport Canada". I read these words in this brochure and I want to put this on the record: "The broad objectives of the policy are (1) to allow national airport systems to operate in a more cost-efficient manner."

If that were not enough, further down it says: "Key elements of the policy specify that federal funding requirements will not increase."

Finally: "Each LAA (local airport authority) will be an independent, incorporated business entity and will finance its operating and capital needs without recourse to the federal government."

In other words, we have a bill being passed in this House right now that will pass Canada's airports over to local authorities which are supposed to find the money to operate them and the capital expenditures to build new runways without recourse to the federal government to pay the bills. It is an interesting proposition.

I looked at the bill a moment ago and it is rather a strange one. I have the secret copy here, that is, the copy that came out before the other copies, I suppose. It should be called "secret" because what is in the bill is really a secret. I cannot figure out what is in the bill. I have looked at it and I cannot figure out what is in it. It says here that it is an act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages. Official languages; I looked in the bill and in the section under "official languages" it says that parts 4, 8, 9 and 10 of the Official Languages Act apply. The really relevant parts in the Official Languages Act are parts 5 and 6. We assume from this legislation then that parts 5 and 6 do not apply. If the other parts are singled out as applying, then the other parts of the Official Languages Act do not apply to the transfer of airports.

If it is the law of the land that the Official Languages Act applies to all the airports in Canada then the bill has to be rewritten. Montreal is changing hands and is no longer being operated by the federal government. Vancouver, Edmonton and Calgary are changing and are no longer federal government airports. I believe the others are Edmonton and Calgary. Then there is a whole bunch of airports like Moncton and several others that are also going to be transferred from federal hands. The federal government will no longer be operating them.

This is certainly confusing here where it says an act respecting official languages and then it says employees' pensions. I looked up the clause affecting employees' pensions and it said in that regard: "The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the President of the Treasury Board", and the Governor in Council is what the layman would call the cabinet, "make regulations (a) respecting the manner in which" the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act will apply.

In other words, there is nothing at all in the bill that deals with employees' pensions. There is not a thing. It says that the government will make regulations after the bill is passed in relation to employees' pensions.

One might ask how an employee of an airport, who is no longer a public servant because it is now passed over to a public authority to operate it, can come under the Public Service Superannuation Act anyway. He is no longer a public servant. How can that individual come under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act when he is no longer a public servant?

The truth of the matter is that you need not be a public servant to come under the Public Service Superannuation Act. Petro-Canada employees are under that act. The post office is under that act. The Occupational Health and Safety Branch of the federal government is under that act. They are not really public servants and they need not be either.

I suppose it is rather confusing to the layman, but the Canadian Union of Public Employees and the Public Service Alliance of Canada can also represent them even though they are not public servants. It sounds strange, does it not, to have the Public Service Alliance of Canada represent somebody who is not a public servant? But that is the way it goes. It represents people in Crown corporations, for example. The Canadian Union of Public Employees represents employees who are not public employees.

Nowhere in the act does it talk about and spell out the employees' pensions. That is two gone now: an act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, but there is nothing in there to cover official languages, and then it says employees' pensions but there is nothing in there to cover employee pensions. There is a section that says the government may make regulations respecting employees' pensions.

The last part mentions labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports. I looked up the section under labour relations and it says that the whole matter will be passed over to the Canada Labour Relations Board. I can recall when the post office was passed over to the Canada Labour Relations Board. There were two years of status quo and then the Canada Labour Relations Board was supposed to determine the bargaining agents and the unions representing the employees. They have been at it now for nine years, and they still have not decided the question of bargaining units and bargaining agents.

I do not know why the government presented the bill to the House. What it means by official languages is confusing. It does not talk about employees' pensions and labour relations is left to the Canadian Labour Relations Board, so what is the purpose of the legislation?

To find the purpose of the legislation, of course, we can look at the brochure called "Airport Transfer". I asked for and received, a few moments ago, the outline of what is called the supplementary principles of airport transfer.

In other words, you have all of these airports in Canada now being passed over to local authorities. You have all of these employees in Canada who have families, who have been working for the federal government for years, wondering: "What is going to become of me and my job?", and then you have the travelling public who is landing at those airports. They are wondering: "Should I be landing at this airport? What kind of an airport is this? Does it have federal standards? If the plane catches fire, who is going to put out the fire? Whose standards are they? Are they good standards?" You have two of those concerns.

I had sent to me the actual list of supplementary principles which have now been sent to all of these airports. I want to put a couple of them on the record.

First of all, the federal government says that inspection agencies like customs and excise, immigration, health and welfare and agriculture will be provided free of charge to the Crown by the local airport authority. Then it says: "The local airport authority will provide at no cost to Transport Canada space requirements for such services as air navigation free of charge to the federal government."

It says that as far as the employees are concerned: "In any case, all terminated Transport Canada Public Service employees, whether or not they transfer to the LAA," that is the local airport authority, "have a right to have their name placed on the priority list for one year. More particularly, employees who were laid off by the LAA," local airport authority, "up to the end of the first year after the date of transfer would benefit from placement on the priority list."

In other words, Mr. Speaker, you could have an employee or employees terminated with no rights to any other job in the federal government, would lose his or her seniority rights, would lose all of their benefits, would have no more standing than a member of Parliament as an airport employee.

Then the ultimate of all of the regulations. I want to highlight this condition: "The LAA as operators," that is, the local airport authority, "will ensure the provision of crash, fire and rescue services at the airport." That is quite a statement. The local airport authority as operators will ensure the provision of crash, fire and rescue services. The LAA will development emergency and contingency plans, conduct exercises among the various jurisdictions and operating entities, for example, police, ambulance, hospitals and airlines.

The whole operation of the airport, including the fire department is being passed over to the local airport authority. Then it says the local airport authority will be responsible for dealing with air pollution, solid waste management and other airport related environmental issues. That is quite a change for Canadian airports. All airports in all of those communities across Canada will be passed from the federal government to a local authority and that local authority will ensure the safety of the travelling public. The only thing the federal government will do, according to these guidelines, is guard against terrorism and provide air traffic control services.

That is quite a change for Canada's airports, isn't it? That is quite a change. How do you provide, as a local airport authority, all of the policing that is required at international airports, for example? How do you provide for all of the environmental checks and balances that are required at every airport in this country?

The bottom line is that the federal government, in presenting the bill to this Chamber, and saying that it is a bill respecting employees' pensions and labour relations, and yet not having it in the bill what it is going to do, the federal government in passing over to local authorities responsibilities that should be nation wide and responsibilities by the Government of Canada.

Finally, the federal government is saying to every single airport employee in this country that the day is going to come for some of them immediately, when you will no longer be an employee of the federal government, when you will no longer have seniority rights, or sick leave, or vacation benefits. "We are going to transfer all of that", as the brochure says, "to operate in a more cost efficient manner", and then to say that "the LAA will be an independent incorporated business entity and will finance its operations and capital needs without recourse to the federal treasury". The bottom line is that the federal government is trying to get out of the business of transportation in this country.

The only thing that I can see moving this policy is the efforts of the Government of Canada to try to save money in every single area of responsibility that it presently has, and to pass all of that responsibility over on to someone else's shoulders. In the case of an environmental issue at one of our airports, say, with noise pollution, the federal government will very shortly say: "Too bad, but that is the responsibility of a group of businessmen in that community because they actually own the airport". If they do not own the airport, then why is it that they are responsible for environmental matters and noise pollution?

The government will be able to say to the Auditor General: "We are getting rid of thousands of employees next year. We have reduced the Public Service by thousands of people, because we erased all of those thousands of people working at airports in Canada". The travelling public, when they learn and when they hear on the news media about the firefighters at the airport saying: "We want to still stay in a federal system. We want to have our federal standards maintained". Someone will say: "Yes, they are still federal standards, it is just you are not a federal employee any more. You are operated by some incorporated body in the community of such and such".

The federal government should rethink this. I do not think they should bring a bill which does not guarantee a man his job after this is passed. I do not think we should allow them to pass a bill that does not guarantee a man or woman their pension after working at an airport in this country for the past 20 or 25 years. I do not think that we should allow the Government of Canada to cop out on its responsibility to provide security and environmental protection for the people of Canada at Canadian airports.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few brief words about Bill C-15, legislation introduced this past session. Before I start my comments, I would like to compliment the critic from our party, the member from Thunder Bay who, has led a lot of the debate on this particular legislation and to thank yourself, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to say a few words.

Bill C-15 is one of these interesting administrative pieces of legislation, I suppose. You look at the title and read through it and wonder exactly what is the purpose of the bill. You usually have to have a stack of other bills and information at hand to try and figure out what is happening. I guess as a short description of the legislation, the purpose of the bill is to protect essentially the collective bargaining rights, language rights and pension rights of federal public sector workers currently employed by Transport Canada during the transfer to airports from Transport Canada to local airport authorities, the LAAs that we have heard about.

You will be familiar with some of the attempts by this government to basically, privatize if you like, or localize the airport authority. The running and managing of a particular airport, is transferred to a local organization. I understand from some of the notes, in fact, it is being attempted for the first time in Edmonton.

In any case, this legislation attempts to ensure that when that is the case, that employees who will then start becoming employees of that local authority will be protected by some of the benefits they have now in their collective agreement under federal legislation.

While the general thrust of the bill is good, it suffers from a lack of clarity and in light of current worker–management relations, it does not provide the protection it purports to provide.

I would like to go through a couple of the points that have been raised by the union that represents the employees, the Union of Transport Canada Employees. They have cited a number of very important aspects of the bill that I think will obviously have to be addressed.

The first one is that workers or their representatives have not really been a part of the process of negotiation and consultation that has gone on between Transport Canada and various local airport authorities.

That has become an unfortunate aspect of legislation under this government. I think it is important that the government attempt to establish good employer–employee relationships, that the employees are taken into consideration and are given every opportunity to see in advance what is being planned in any particular legislation and especially a case that affects their future, their occupation, their livelihood and for many people, their pensions.

The procedural and substantive rights of workers with regard to their existing pensions under the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act are actually not clear under the bill. It is being left up to Treasury Board to make regulations. There has been no consultation on the development of these regulations.

I would hope that every effort is made, when new regulations are developed that the employees have ample opportunity to comment on that.

• (1640)

It is increasingly a part of legislation in our country that a bill gives a general mandate and instructions to government. However, in reality the real nitty–gritty of a law comes in the development of regulations which are developed by the department and eventually approved by the Governor in Council and by cabinet. I think it takes a generous government to give the people an opportunity for input. It also requires a vigilant public, employees group or union to see that when those proposed regulations come forward they are looked at, circulated and considered.

The bill needs to incorporate the desires of workers to continue under these plans. I mentioned earlier the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

We understand that the local authority in British Columbia is having some difficulty in trying to find an insurance company to take on the disability component and the plan that is currently provided workers. They have been told that it would be too expensive to continue this type of coverage.

Point number three. The continuation of the bargaining agent is also a matter of great concern. The bill provides for the continuation of the terms and conditions of an existing collective agreement at the time of transfer. However, past experience with other privatizations demonstrates that the determination of the appropriate bargaining agent is a very long and disruptive process.

The bill should incorporate provisions so that the existing bargaining agent remains in place for the period of one full collective agreement after the transfer, in order to ensure the protection of worker's rights and the orderly determination of a bargaining agent.

That sounds like a pretty logical way to approach this particular idea. It gives the workers and the employer a chance to know that there is a grace period prior to, likely, some initiatives from an employer. We would probably expect that. They might not be good initiatives, but under law employers certainly would be allowed to do that. Of course, the employees who have a new employer, obviously as time advances would be looking to approach that employer for new provisions in any collective agreement they have.

The bill fails to make clear that all services to the travelling public will continue to be provided in both official languages. One of the proposals is to ensure that any third parties who are under contract to the airport authority are required to provide their services under the linguistic terms currently set out the Official Languages Act and any regulations made under that act.

That is a matter of a great deal of concern for some of the members of the House who have pursued this particular issue a great deal. Obviously, when we travel a lot as most members do, we realize that it is important that standards developed from airport to airport should be the same. It makes for ease of travel and ensures that people travelling from one airport to another understand safety requirements and public notices, and the employees who provide that service can assist them the best they can.

Just as an aside, what bugs me is that there are different TV monitors in each airport. Trying to read the monitors in some of the airports, trying to figure out which airline and which aeroplane is landing at what time, is difficult. I know that is a fairly minor point, given the importance of this legislation. I suppose I will suffer along. However, it is obviously a small example of the kind of general services we would like to see from airport to airport.

The general theme of Bill C-15 is that this may not be the privatization of airports, but it is certainly privatization of the workplace. The government has a responsibility to ensure the rights of its workers are protected before and after the transfer.

In the United States, after its rush with deregulation, and now in Canada, we were told just a short time ago that with deregulation we would have all these new airlines and new services. Well, we are right down to two airlines now. Some are suggesting that we may end up with only one airline in the future. The point I am making is that there is no guarantee that once the local authority takes over and runs one of these facilities that it is actually going to do a good job of it.

We certainly hope it does, but as the public trustee of Canada's airports, obviously the federal government must have in the back of its mind at least a back-up plan to reassume control of a particular airport if it does not work. Then we would be looking at taking care of employees' various benefits and rights as well as if the government was to resume control.

The bill gives only more uncertainty. If the purpose is to stabilize worker-management relations, then the workers must be consulted and their concerns heeded. We have to underline that point. Too often when a number of these projects go ahead, we end up with bad labour relations. That is not going to be any help at all to our airports.

We are supporting the bill. We have some concerns, obviously, about what the government is planning to do. There are some very clear concerns that we have laid out and there have been comments made in the House by other members concerning employee relations. We feel that is important. We certainly hope the government will consider those in the future in the management of these airports. We respectfully ask these new authorities, when they are the employer, to treat their employees well.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to take part in the debate on Bill C-15, an Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-15 contains an issue which is of particular interest to me. I will focus my remarks on clause 4 of the bill, which deals with official languages.

Clause 4(1) states that:

> Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after and transfer date Parts IV, VIII, IX and X of the Official Languages Act apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if
> (a) the authority were a federal institution; and
> (b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

Mr. Speaker, subsection 4(2) also recalls that nothing in subsection 23(2) of the Official Languages Act shall, in relation to an airport transferred to a designated airport authority by the Minister, be construed or applied so as to impose a duty on any institution other than that authority.

[English]

Clause 4 is sufficiently ambiguous to bring into question whether official languages regulations will be fulfilled at any airport which has been transferred to a non-governmental authority.

In subclause (1) only parts 4, 8, 9 and 10 of the Official Languages Act will apply.

In subclause (2) one is left wondering if certain parts of the Official Languages Act will only apply to the airport authority itself and not to other aspects or other individuals involved with the operation of that airport after the transfer has occurred.

The Liberal Party opposes the privatization of Canadian airports. However, we do support initiatives to transfer the administration and management of airports to local authorities under certain conditions.

One of these conditions is that the Official Languages Act apply in full to the local authority and its employees, and as well to services provided at the airport which has been transferred.

Bill C-15 leaves too much doubt as to the full application of the Official Languages Act upon the local airport authority, the employees of that authority and to the various services that will be provided to the public at the airport. Section 10 of the Air Canada Public Participation Act clearly sets out that the entire Official Languages Act would continue to apply to Air Canada, its employees and the services it renders after its privatization.

Bill C-15 does not extend the same stipulation concerning the full involvement of the Official Languages Act as does the Air Canada Public Participation Act of 1988. As a result, one questions why this is the case.

The Official Languages Act has 12 parts, yet Bill C-15 only includes parts 4, 8, 9 and 10. Part 4 deals with communications with, and services to, the public. Part 8 involves responsibilities and duties of Treasury Board in relation to the Official Languages Act of Canada. Part 9 concerns the commission of official languages and part 10 provides for court remedy. It is understandable why all these parts are worthy of inclusion in Bill C-15.

Obviously, one can understand why certain parts of the Official Languages Act are not included in Bill C-15. Some, such as parts 1, 2, 3, 11 and 12 are non-applicable as they deal with such matters as the proceedings of Parliament and the administration of justice. However, it is not clear as to why parts 5, 6 and 7 have been excluded from this piece of legislation.

Each one of these three parts are important components in our official languages legislation. Part 5 deals with the language of work, part 6 concerns the participation of English and French speaking Canadians and part 7 concerns the advancement of English and French. Certainly these are important issues.

In addition, parts 5 and 6 are designed to protect workers of both linguistic groups. Part 5, as I have said, has the mandate to protect the language of work, while part 6 protects equal opportunity to gain employment.

It is very difficult to determine the reasons behind their exclusion from Bill C-15. Why, indeed, were they left out of this legislation, but included in the Air Canada bill? Why should workers at Air Canada be protected and not workers at Canada's airports? Both institutions offer somewhat similar services to the public across the country.

Furthermore, the removal of part 7 is of equal concern. The exclusion of this part removes the right of the Department of Secretary of State to encourage and co-operate with both the provinces and the public to accomplish the objectives given to it by the Official Languages Act. This mandate is to enhance the vitality of English and French linguistic minorities throughout Canada and foster the full recognition and use of both official languages in Canada. I cannot think of any worthy reason as to why the minister would omit such an important part of the Official Languages Act from Bill C-15.

I would like for the minister to inform this House why his government does not want parts 5, 6 and 7 of the Official Languages Act to apply to local airport authorities and their employees. Has the government taken a change in course concerning official bilingualism in this country? Are they prepared to safeguard and protect the federal principle of bilingualism in all of its relevant legislation or in just some?

These are very important questions and Canadians want the answers.

We have a case here in Bill C-15 where vital parts of Canada's Official Languages Act are being excluded from legislation which should contain them.

The fact that these three parts of the Official Languages Act are, indeed, excluded from Bill C-15 is even further cause for concern given the current constitutional climate in Canada. How can this government talk of fairness, equality and national identity one day and then turn around and introduce this legislation the next? The government cannot afford jeopardizing national reconciliation and preserving Canada's linguistic duality by watering down the objectives of the Official Languages Act.

The government cannot pick and choose which parts of the Official Languages Act it will include and what parts it will leave out of legislation, such as the one before this House today. The parts in question are not inconsequential, they are very important.

While there were obvious reasons for omitting certain parts of the Official Languages Act, as I have discussed earlier, there are no valid reasons I can think of to justify the removal of parts 5, 6 and 7 from Bill C-15.

I would like to conclude by quoting from the remarks made by the Commissioner of Official Languages when he appeared before the committee of the House of Commons responsible for examining Bill C-85, the designation given to Bill C-15 in the last session. At that meeting on March 7, 1991, the Commissioner said:

> That section 4 of Bill C-85 be amended to ensure that, as in the case of the decisions taken in the privatization of Air Canada, all the provisions of the Official Languages Act continue to apply to the designated airport authorities. Any weakening of this policy would seem to us to be an unacceptable and unjustified step backward.

I believe the Commissioner speaks for all Canadians on this issue and I fully concur with his recommendation.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to speak, and especially to support the hon. member's amendment regarding the sale of airports. I think this is an important issue because we are being asked to trust this government and go along with its claim that it does not want to sell airports.

I am not so sure about that, and that is why I support the hon. member's amendment concerning the sale of airports, and his proposal to remove the word "sell" from the bill, because in committee, the government had said constantly that it had no intention of selling airports. Since it has no intention of selling airports, why did it put this in the text of the bill?

So I am rather wary of this government when it puts a word in a bill that doesn't have to be there. And that is why I want to support the hon. member's amendment, and I don't think we are being overly suspicious when we simply ask this government to remove the word "sell".

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to speak on Bill C-15, which is the Airport Transfer Act. I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this particular bill. It has been one of considerable concern to me since I was elected.

I have been in constant pursuit of the three various ministers who have been appointed since the election in 1988, to discuss not only the transfer of airports but also a number of components that deal in particular with transportation in the north.

We have a government in the Northwest Territories that has quite handily carved out a fairly comprehensive transportation strategy that includes and probably compliments the whole issue of airport transfer. In fact they have gone one step further to deal not only with the transfer of airports but also with communications and the whole issue of safety.

In the north the majority of the population is highly dependent on air travel. Considering that particular concern, my constituents in the Northwest Territories have specific concerns that they want to share with the authorities that be. They want those concerns to be made known to the minister who has the authority and the department officials who have the responsibility.

In particular, there has been much concern with the transfer of airports that not only is there a priority list of communities that would have their airports upgraded before the transfer was made, but also that there are communities which need complete refurbishing or rebuilding of their airports.

An example—it is not only one—would be Fort Franklin which has its own airport located right at the end of the schoolyard. When you fly into the community of Fort Franklin, the minister should know that you fly over a schoolyard and a school. This is quite a dangerous situation if we talk about safety.

There has been much of a push over the last four or five years by this community to have a complete relocation.

This is not the only community. There are other communities that asked for a complete rebuilding mostly because of safety.

The other thing that the northerners, my constituents, would like the authorities to know is that we have currently the proposal to build a new terminal in the very busy community of Norman Wells.

A cost analysis team went in, but the cost analysis has not been returned to the community. In the greater scheme of things across Canada, on an economy of scale, the northerners feel they are not at the top of the list of priorities.

They feel they would not want to miss the opportunity for this proposal to go forward. That is one particular concern which they want to be made known.

When I am speaking about the transfer of airports, I also want to speak about the conditions of some of these airports. These responsibilities have been transferred but to the over all infrastructure, upkeep and refurbishing of this infrastructure, the costs are prohibitive.

It is very expensive in the north and the amount of use that these particular airports get is very high because many of these communities rely solely on air travel. They do not have highways or railways attaching them to the outer communities.

These are expressed concerns. With the main carriers that land in some of our main terminals throughout the Mackenzie Valley, specifically in my area, we find that on the whole issue of official bilingualism we have taken it one step further.

Canadian Airlines should be applauded for the steps it has taken by way of tapes and technology to serve the people in that area in various languages. It serves the people in Inuktitut, Chippewan and in all the Dene languages.

It has been quite innovative and quite ingenious in the way it has done that. I would like to take the opportunity to applaud this type of activity which has been undertaken by a particular carrier.

I have one other concern. If you are a northerner you may have had the opportunity for the government to have transferred the authority to the Northwest Territories for airports. We have little power when it comes to the kind of services we receive at those particular airports from the main carriers.

For instance, if you live in the Northwest Territories you will notice that when the schedules have changed through the two main airlines service is reduced. It is impossible for the working public in the north to get out of Yellowknife, the capital of the north, on a Sunday.

On a Sunday, a working individual travelling to the east must leave the Northwest Territories at 9 a.m. and arrive perhaps at a destination of Ottawa at 9 p.m. or 10 p.m. That is a complete day of travel.

If that is not your preferred choice, you could leave Yellowknife at 7.30 in the evening, wait in Edmonton until a quarter to or twenty to one the next morning, take the all night flight and travel from Edmonton to Ottawa to arrive 8.05 bleary eyed and ill prepared for a full day of work.

It has been extremely difficult for the working and travelling public to appreciate the kind of situations that have arisen every time the schedule is changed. We appreciate the service. We know it is far better than we had 10 or 20 years ago, but still we believe that every time the schedule is changed, service is reduced.

We want to say that we are appreciative that our government in the Northwest Territories has essentially taken on the responsibility. We have a lot of reservations about the prohibitive costs it entails when a program is transferred and the authority is taken over. It is one thing to have the authority, but it is quite another thing to have adequate resources, not only to upkeep, maintain and to refurbish, but to completely relocate for the purposes of safety.

Since we have a new minister, many of my constituents have urged me to welcome this minister to come to our communities and to have a look and see the conditions that exist there. We would like to extend an invitation to the minister and to the senior officials to come and meet with our chiefs and our people who have concerns, and to meet with the Government of the Northwest Territories, if it so desires.

I just want to take the opportunity with regard to National Access Awareness Week last week to raise an issue of particular concern. I was honorary chair for the disabled in my area and I believe that as much as possible, although we live in the remotest parts of Canada, we have to make accommodations for the disabled, we have to ensure that there is mobility where it is possible and if there are additional costs, that those have to be incurred. Those people have to be put on an equal level with everyone else in terms of mobility and accessibility.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak at the third reading stage of Bill C-15. I would like to focus on official languages and the application of the Official Languages Act in airports which, according to the bill, will be a municipal responsibility if they are leased or possibly sold to municipal or regional airport authorities.

Mr. Speaker, I have an abiding interest in the Official Languages Act and—

Mr. Prud'homme: Always did.

Mr. Gauthier: —this act will not have the kind of impact on municipal or regional airport authorities that one would like to see in this country, in relation to a service that we feel is an essential one for Canadian travellers. Clause 4 of Bill C-15 now before the House provides that only four of the twelve parts of the Official Languages Act will apply.

Mr. Speaker, I can understand why Parts I, II, III, XI and XII of the Official Languages Act do not apply but I find it hard to understand why Parts V, VI and VII do not, and I intend to explain to the House the impact of this oversight or this government decision not to include Parts V, VI and VII.

Mr. Speaker, Parts V and VI of the Official Languages Act are designed to protect employees belonging to the two language groups, in other words, to respect their legal right to work in the official language of their choice, which may be English in Montreal, where the majority official language might be French, and French in Winnipeg, for instance, when the majority official language is English.

Mr. Speaker, the idea is to allow any Canadian to work for an institution as important as a company dedicated to public transportation, and to obtain from that agency and its managers the right to work in the official language of their choice. Yet, there is no such guaranty in the legislation before us.

Part V protects the language in the workplace, whereas Part VI ensures equal employment opportunities. We have discussed this on second reading and in committee. Mr. Speaker, we have tried to convince the government of the importance of that issue, but our requests have fallen in deaf ears. That is why we are back, in third reading, after a rather short debate—let's face it—because the government has used a rather unusual procedure. The government has reinstated, so to speak, the bill in this third session of Parliament when, normally, this legislation, which was not passed during the second session of the House, should have died on the Order Paper after the House prorogued, and should therefore have followed the normal legislative process afterwards.

We now find ourselves in a somewhat exceptional situation. On Wednesday May 28, the government, using its majority, passed a bill reinstating former bill C-85, which is now bill C-15.

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that Parts V and VI are important to us because, in our opinion, they deal with the most fundamental issues, that is the rights of individual, the rights of Canadians to equal employment opportunities but also the right to work in federal institutions in the language of their choice. Mr. Speaker, if this policy applies to Air Canada which, as we know, must follow all the provisions of the Official Languages Act, I fail to see why an employee of Air Canada would be entitled to equal employment opportunities and would also be entitled to work in the language of his choice, whereas an employee of a local, regional or municipal authority in charge of an airport would not enjoy the same protection.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment was made at the committee stage. The government rejected it, so we are trying again. As regards Part VII of the Official Languages Act, the fact that this part is omitted deprives the Secretary of State of his right to support the public and to cooperate with the provinces in order to fulfill the mandate given to him in the Official Languages Act. The Secretary of State must foster the use of the official languages, promote the rights of the Francophone and Anglophone minorities, and ensure the full recognition and use of both the French and English language in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this omission is rather difficult to explain. Why is it that Parts V, VI and VII of the Official Languages Act are not integral parts of this legislation? This is beyond us and that is why we bring it up everytime we have a chance to do so.

Mr. Speaker, does bill C-85 give a measure of protection as regards the services that are presently provided in the airports affected? Such airports as in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, and Montreal. Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is no, and that is the cause of our concern.

Local airport authorities are free to choose the criteria, strategies and priorities they consider necessary to manage and operate the airports to be transferred.

Mr. Speaker, I will be brief, but I have to make myself clear again: All we, the Liberals, want is to be sure that Canadians can get from these airport authorities the same hiring and working conditions other companies, such as Air Canada, can offer them. No more, no less. We insist, because we have often seen this government forget extremely important matters, in its haste to privatize and transfer everything. That is why we are back with this motion to amend Bill C-15, which I want to introduce, Mr. Speaker.

Consequently, I move, seconded by my colleague from Saint-Denis:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the words "be read the third time and passed" and substituting the following therefor: "be not now read a third time but be referred back to the Legislative Committee for the purpose of reconsidering clause 4 of the Bill, by striking out line 17, at page 2, and substituting the following therefor: Parts IV, V, VI, VIII, IX and X of the Official Languages Act".

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I followed the debate this afternoon with considerable interest because I introduced the original bill in the House. That bill passed second reading and then went to committee where it was considered in depth, returned to the House and amendments at report stage were placed on the Order Paper by members of the House. The House then prorogued and those amendments were lost.

The bill was then reinstated at report stage by means of a motion along with other bills in an effort to not redo the work that the House and members had already done. Then I understand that a time limit was missed and there were no report stage amendments placed on the Order Paper for debate.

I would ask my hon. friend if he thinks that maybe the House and the Table should review the transcript of this afternoon's proceedings to see if we are not reinstituting report stage at third reading.

As a bill goes through the House, once it has passed second reading, it goes to committee where seven or eight members, including the chairman, can hear witnesses and consider the bill in depth. No member, except those eight people, can place an amendment at committee. That is the reason for report stage.

Report stage allows any member who was not on the committee to make an amendment. I think that process has served this House well.

I ask my hon. friend, who has served considerable time in the House, if he thinks we are using the time of the House properly if we allow a specific amendment, in other words, to send the bill back to committee with instructions to consider whether or not clause x should be amended by y.

• (1740)

I would submit to my hon. friend that obviously he does not want to quarrel with an opinion of the Chair. I would ask my hon. friend, without quarrelling with that opinion either, with the benefit of his experience around here, to comment on whether or not, by allowing this process to go on, we have not reinstituted report stage at third reading.

I know what Beauchesne reads because I took the time to read it, but I just wonder if Beauchesne should be interpreted that way, in light of our Standing Orders as they exist today and what we try to do with our Standing Orders in terms of committee consideration and report stage by the whole House.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I guess the answer to that question is very simple. The member is a former House leader and he knows that the opposition has a certain time to put amendments at report stage.

In this case, it is because of the exceptional measures the government used last week when they forced this House to adopt by closure a motion reinstating five bills. On Friday we had our amendments. We were ready to table them at report stage, but 2 p.m. is the deadline for tabling these amendments.

The government did not tell us they were going to call this bill today, but they knew, and on Friday afternoon after the deadline for report stage had been passed, they called the bill for today. Mr. Speaker, do you call that fair? Do you call that what I would call playing the game? Do you call that really being a good parliamentary organization. Do you call that leadership, Mr. Speaker? I said to the minister, with all due respect because I like the guy, he is barking up the wrong tree.

The question is well put, but the answer is that it was all planned by them to make us unable to present the amendments at that time. If they had not used that exceptional—exceptional I say, underlined—procedure of forcing their will on the House of Commons and then playing games with the rules as they know them and as we understand them, we would have had our motions by 2 p.m. on Friday. They would have been put within the 24-hour period which is, I think, 76.(2) unless I am mistaken here, which covers that 24-hour period, the time one requires to put amendments at report stage. If that is not the answer, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what is.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to say that the minister knows that this morning at the opening of government business at, I believe, 12 o'clock, there was a request made by the House leader for the New Democratic Party or the Whip to have unanimous consent of the House to put his amendments. We would have gone on the same basis, but Mr. Speaker, the government members denied unanimous consent to put these amendments at the report stage. Therefore, the only way we could have a decision of the House on these very important amendments was to move them in this way at third reading.

It is unusual, but then usually we get some co-operation from the government. It was not forthcoming.

Mr. Lewis: I always enjoy my hon. friend, who is usually very, very accurate with his facts. The suggestion was made that the opposition did not know what was going to be debated on Monday.

I refer the members of the opposition to page 826 of Hansard May 30, 1991. The words of their eminent House leader, Mr. Dingwall:

> Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to take the time of the House, but to be clear, we will be on C-6 this afternoon, Friday will be an allotted day, Monday is airport devolution.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The period for questions and comments has now expired. The Chair rules that the motion moved by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is in order.

[English]

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I am most reluctant to get involved in this discussion between two of my colleagues who are far more experienced than I am. I also took part in the discussions on Bill C-85, now Bill C-15.

We are faced with a fait accompli. We are faced with a bill this government wants to get through the House, over the reasonable objections of the Official Opposition and the NDP. We objected to several aspects of this bill. There is of course the issue of official languages, the Official Languages Act, and I have another objection, reflected in the motion we tabled which was voted down. In this motion we asked the government, quite appropriately, to remove that part of the bill concerning the sale of airports. I know this is all over and done with, but I was really very disappointed to see that the government was so emphatic about keeping the word "sell" in the bill.

Why? Because when I sat on the committee, the government said: We have no intention of selling. So why put this word in the bill? Are we being overcautious? I don't think so. Are we being overly suspicious of a government that told us the GST would be a visible tax and a revenue neutral? Are we too suspicious of this government when it says that we must stop selling arms outside the country while proposing a bill aimed at doing just that?

Are we too suspicious of this government, Mr. Speaker, when it says that we must sell Canada abroad, in the other countries, in order to present it in a flattering light, while the Prime Minister is a little too critical of Ontario following its last budget?

Are we too suspicious of this government when it speaks about reconciliation between provinces while trying to create a new department? I think it is about the fortieth department in charge of regional development in Quebec, created I might add without consulting the province.

So, I wonder, are we too suspicious of the government when it uses the expression "has sold—an airport", even though we are told today that it is not considering selling any airport?

I don't know whether or not we are too suspicious, but the government is neglecting a good opportunity to say: "Yes, you are right, we do not need to use the word "sold" in the bill, this is an oversight on our part." Well, I don't think it is an oversight, Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is all planned. We are not yet privatizing airports. For the time being it is only privatization of the workplace, of all services inside airports. However, with the word "sold" in the bill, privatization through sale of airports to private companies is only a question of time.

This is why I object to this bill and why I support the hon. member's motion. I think he is right to oppose the inclusion of the word "sold" in this bill.

I would like to talk about another objection I raised in the committee this bill was referred to and it concerns the official languages.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a slap in the face of all Canadians with regards to official languages. I have always maintained—and I know some hon. members opposite have come to the realization—that, wherever you are in Canada, whether you are francophone or anglophone, services have to be provided in both languages. This is, essentially, what I think tourists and Canadians alike see as typical of Canada. We have two languages. Why? Because there are two groups of taxpayers: the English-speaking taxpayers and the French-speaking taxpayers.

So, on the subject of official languages, we should have the right to be served in the language of our choice anywhere in Canada, without exception. As a Quebecer, I can tell you that I am proud because, in Quebec, we have always respected the other language. Yes, there were clashes here and there, but on the whole we show due consideration for the language of the minority, the English language. But when it comes to federal institutions, I find it very important to preserve the intent of the Official Languages Act and to keep the provisions of the said Act because, only through these provisions can the intent really be respected.

It is not the case here, Mr. Speaker. In this instance, and I am sure there was no mistake on the part of government, in the terms under which it can contract out services to a third party in an airport, the government did not make it mandatory to comply with the Official Languages Act. The Official Languages Commissioner had to criticize the government saying that it contravenes the intent of the Official Languages Act of Canada.

When I took part in the proceedings of the committee that examined this bill, I asked to what extent the government could enforce the Official Languages Act if it was not specified in the bill. The answer I got is that it cannot be enforced and that it is left to the good will—quite an interesting phrase—to the good will of companies or individuals who will get the airport management contracts.

You should be wary of good will, Mr. Speaker. I heard that authorities who will be in charge of the Dorval airport expressed the view that they would not be able to compete with airports in Boston or New York if they had to comply with the Official Languages Act. It is a shame because it will create a system whereby workers in Dorval will not know what to do and passengers will have problems obtaining services in their own language, be it English or French, because there will be no obligation to provide services in both languages.

It is a shame because, when we studied the bill in committee, we tried to define which services should be provided in both languages, under the Official Languages Act, and which services could be provided in one language or the other. They said before the committee, Mr. Speaker, that only those services related to the act of travelling should be provided in both languages. It means that, if you have to eat in a restaurant, yes, you can be served in both languages, but if you want to buy an apple or an orange or if you want to have a haircut, those services do not have to be provided in both languages.

Then, they talked about places where one can order a drink, among other things. In such places, services might have to be offered in both languages. In fact, a real—how would I say—cacophony was heard from the committee trying to describe the services or the products to be available for sale in both languages.

Mr. Speaker, when people like my hon. friend from Edmonton-East say they have stood up for French in Alberta and are sorry that the Official Languages Act has not been respected, I think it is important. If people from Alberta and from across the country are saying: "Listen, we would like that law to be enforced", I think it is important and that the government should have considered including in the bill the enforcement of the Official Languages Act. It should have been done and that would have had a very beneficial effect.

Who do governement MP's want to please? Who do you want to please? Certainly not Canadians who are proud of their language, be it English or French. We are proud of our Official Languages Act.

Thus, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that the governement has failed to understand that we, Canadians, are for the enforcement of the Official Languages Act. We believe it is part of Canada, part of our heritage, and it is unfortunate that the governement has but a short-sighted vision of Canada that only goes as far as the next election. I think they made a mistake and that, in fact, most Canadians are disappointed by this government's performance.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Riis: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. There have been discussions among the parties and I think you would find unanimous consent to pass the following motion at this point:

> That notwithstanding any standing or special order of the House:
> When the House adjourns on Thursday, June 6, 1991, it stands adjourned until 11 o'clock a.m. on Monday, June 10, 1991, provided that one allotted day for the current trimester be deemed to have been disposed of on the said Friday, and provided that one additional allotted day for the autumn trimester of 1991 be designated in the said autumn trimester.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct. There have been discussions among party representatives and we would concur with this motion, keeping in mind that Friday normally would have been an allotted opposition day for the New Democratic Party which will be postponed to a later date in accordance with the motion, as indicated by my colleague previously.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there have indeed been discussions. I thought the timing would be slightly different. I thought we would dispose of Bill C-15 with the voice vote and a deferred vote tomorrow night and then pass the motion, but I am quite prepared to see unanimous consent for the passage of this motion on the understanding that we will at least be through Bill C-15 in preparation for a vote before we leave here tonight.

That is my understanding and we will not see the clock until we are finished.

I see that members are agreeing to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil, and of the amendment of Mr. Gauthier (p. 940).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We are now considering motion of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, seconded by Mr. Prud'homme.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declared the motion lost, on division.

The motion is negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is now on the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The Government Whip, on a point of order.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Negatived on division.

• (1800)

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and we are all prepared to defer the vote until 6 p.m. tomorrow, so the bells can cease.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) I have been requested by the Chief Government Whip to defer the division until a later time. Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 6 p.m. tomorrow, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the short time I have today I would like to put on the record some important comments regarding questions I posed to the government specifically last Friday, and as well a similar question that

I put today by chance to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It relates specifically to a very important issue in northern British Columbia in my riding. It is the whole question of a major hydroelectric project in my area commonly referred to as the Alcan project.

The question I put on Friday to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment and today to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans concerned the government's intent as it relates to a very important court ruling on May 16 of this year regarding this particular project. The Federal Court ruled that the Government of Canada must have an environmental assessment review of this Alcan project in northern B.C.

It is a very important ruling. There is a newspaper article on the ruling which quotes the decision of the judge in this case. It is an incredible indictment of this government's environmental policy and an indictment of the policy that this government has had over the last number of years as it relates to this entire project and its subsequent impact on the Nechako and Fraser Rivers.

The judge in this particular case declared, and I am quoting from the article in the newspaper, that the former environment minister's decision at that time to exempt this particular project from the full environmental assessment review process was "a failure to undertake a legal obligation". The judge certainly slapped, if not the government's wrist, the government around a bit and rightfully so. To not have an environmental assessment of this very major project draws into question this government's intent and its concern for the environment. It is also inconsistent with the announcement over the weekend of this government's plans under the green plan to try to clean up the Fraser River.

No plan to clean up and protect the Fraser River will be complete without a full environmental assessment of the Alcan project.

Just briefly, there are a couple of concerns that have been raised about this project that we have to repeat time and time again so that this government understands what it is a partner in. It is a partner in destroying the recreational fish habitat in the area, lowering the river flows, and increasing the temperature of the river affecting the salmon stocks in that particular area. It is a massive project that the government has allowed to continue.

So far to date, as recently as this afternoon, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has yet to make a decision about an environmental assessment review process.

It is critical and important, given all the evidence and information that has been made public about this project.

Former fisheries officials have commented about the late night closed door decisions that have been made. It is clear to me that we need an environmental assessment review hearing process so that all the information can come out concerning this project.

We also must ensure that this government will follow the law as issued by the Federal Court to see that a decision is made. The right decision should be to have a full environmental review of the Alcan project in northern B.C.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to inform the House that the Kemano hydroelectric project near Kitimat, British Columbia, was subject to detailed examination related to fisheries and other environmental issues.

The 1987 settlement agreement among Alcan Aluminium, the province of British Columbia and the federal government was a unique agreement providing an excellent example of sustainable development allowing economic development to proceed with ongoing implementation of mitigative measures as required.

Mitigation measures identified during environmental studies and a scientific inquiry by 10 experts chaired by Dr. David Strangway, President of the University of British Columbia, are being implemented by Alcan.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans, the province and the company continue to work through the mechanisms established by the agreement, such as the technical and steering committees to ensure that fishery matters are dealt with satisfactorily with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans monitoring the fisheries' mitigative measures to ensure their success.

The agreement among the province, Alcan and the federal government was based on several environmental considerations. Alcan prepared an extensive environmental impact report to describe the potential impacts of the project.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans carried out consultations to determine public concerns for impacts on fish and fish habitat, and government decisions were taken only after consideration of these impacts.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to inform the House that Department of Justice officials are actively involved in analysing the complex and numerous legal issues raised by the recent Federal Court decision regarding Alcan's Kemano project.

I am also pleased to inform the House that a full and proper interdepartmental consultation process is well under way to ensure that the many legal and policy considerations arising from the court's decision are carefully and thoroughly addressed.

A decision on whether to appeal the court's ruling will be made in the near future following the completion of this analysis.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on May 28, I put a question to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and the Minister for International Trade concerning the very serious situation which faces the community of Sault Ste. Marie, and specifically the plan which has been made public in the past week concerning Algoma Steel.

I asked the Minister for International Trade what specific plans the federal government has to assist the city of Sault Ste Marie, Algoma Steel and most important the families and the workers who have not only been laid off, but the 1,300 who are on recall at the present time.

The plan that has been put before the public calls for the loss of some 3,500 additional jobs in the community. These are devastating proposals which have been made by the company.

The Minister for International Trade, in responding to my question, gave no real specifics. He got into the question of countervail and the difficulty of government making specific proposals or providing direct support.

In my supplementary question, I asked the Minister of Labour, who is responsible for older workers adjustment, if the Government of Canada was prepared to make a commitment right now to the program for older workers adjustment which provides up to $1,300 per month of assistance to workers in the age group from 55 to 64 when people, of course, would become eligible for old age pension, Canada Pension and other benefits.

The minister suggested that a committee made up of representatives from the Ontario government and the Government of Canada has been holding meetings, that they plan to make recommendations on this matter and that he hopes the recommendations will be favourable.

It would be really good to have more of the details because there are workers in Sault Ste. Marie who have been laid off for many months now, perhaps some for over a year. If this program is going to become available immediately that would be good to know.

Actually, it is necessary for a worker to have exhausted his severance pay and his unemployment insurance benefits in order to be eligible for the program for older workers' assistance, but I cannot think of any particular program that would be so important. I am told that of the people in the employ now. There are some 1,780 who would be in the age group of the proposal. It is slightly modified from the original plan, but then there are all those other workers who have been laid off during the last year or two.

Clearly, if there is an industry and a community where this program should be provided, it is to those workers who have been laid off by Algoma Steel in Sault Ste. Marie. Many of them are older workers who have very little chance or opportunity of being eligible for finding other jobs, especially in the current economic situation which faces us in Ontario, throughout Canada and certainly in the city of Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague is well aware, the federal government continues to have a strong interest in the situation at Algoma Steel. We are particularly concerned for the future of the company and its workers and the possible impact on the people of Sault Ste. Marie.

As the hon. member knows, in February of this year Dofasco announced that it was writing off its investment in Algoma and that the firm was on its own financially. At that time, Algoma announced that it would be meeting with its lenders to restructure its debts and begin operating under the company's Creditors Arrangements Act. This has afforded the company a measure of protection until July 31, 1991 to have financial arrangements worked out with all its lenders and creditors.

The federal government participated with the province of Ontario, Dofasco and the Royal Bank in providing Algoma with a $60 million loan guarantee. The federal government's share was $15 million. This guarantee, provided at commercial rates of interest, provided a bridge loan to allow the company to continue operating and meet its payroll and other financial obligations until it received the money for the sale of its coal mine properties in the United States. Before the end of March, Algoma had repaid this loan, and the federal government's financial commitment to the company ended.

The federal government is represented on the Algoma task force. It is composed of representatives of the federal government, the province, the banks, the employees, the suppliers and the community. While direct financial assistance to the contrary is not appropriate, the federal government will continue to work with Algoma and the other stakeholders to assist the firm in becoming more competitive.

In addition, federal efforts will include working with Algoma through External Affairs and International Trade Canada to develop new overseas markets for the company, identifying possible investors or partners for the company, and working with the community and the workers to help them adjust to the situation.

As to the employees of Algoma, the Canadian Steel Trade and Employment Congress has government funding and the mandate to assist laid off steel workers. In addition, the Community Futures Program of Employment and Immigration Canada has been operating successfully in the Soo since 1986.

The federal government has great interest in the Algoma situation and monitors the situation on a daily basis.

Adjournment Debate

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, you will remember that on May 23, I put a question to the Minister of Transport about three Montreal apartments leased by the National Transportation Agency. I have in hand a brochure describing the characteristics of these apartments located at 2000, Saint-Marc St., Montreal. And I see here a little map showing they are just one block from the Forum.

An hon. member: Coincidence.

Mr. Boudria: Of course.

Now, Mr. Speaker, according to the brochure, the Saint-Marc is located in the Montreal city centre. Be comfortable, relax, enjoy the pool. The magic of Montreal is within reach (Above all, at the taxpayers expenses.) Characteristics: air conditioned, colour TV, Cable TV, china cutlery, linen, large balcony, indoor swimming pool, sauna. There is almost everything in there, Mr. Speaker, except mirrors on the ceilings and, of course, padded toilet seats. All in all, there seems to be everything but that.

The National Transportation Agency has not rented only one such apartment in Montreal, Mr. Speaker, a mere block from the Forum—surely a coincidence—but three of them. And, Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you how devoted the people working for that transportation agency are, there are so hardworking that they always want to use the apartment located two blocks from the Forum on weekends.

An hon. member: Precisely on weekends.

Mr. Boudria: Precisely on weekends. Let me give you an example, Mr. Speaker. On the long weekend of September 1989, all there apartments were occupied. You see what I mean? It was a long weekend which indeed encouraged those people to work.

An hon. member: Was there a hockey game?

Mr. Boudria: We do not know whether there was a hockey game or any other activities. But, Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell you now about the long weekend in October, in the fall of 1989: it was a glorious weekend, with beautiful fall leaves on the trees in Mont Royal park and elsewhere— But I know that the people involved did not use the weekend for the purpose of admiring nature, Mr. Speaker, they were too devoted to their work. Every apartment was occupied of course at 200 Saint-Marc Street, in Montreal, two blocks from Forum Street, but it was sheer coincidence.

[English]

The government has a housing policy, we have now discovered. It has a housing policy for Erik Nielsen and his friends at the National Transportation Agency; such a good housing policy that they get free housing when they go to Montreal.

I have the booking list here. It apparently is every now and then registered to guests. Who are those guests? Guests of whom? Why does the National Transportation Agency have an apartment in Montreal? Why does it have three apartments in Montreal? What is the purpose of this exercise? What does it cost the taxpayers, in addition to the $31,000 every nine months that it costs to rent the place, to administer the program?

I even have a sample form here of how you apply to use the fancy digs in Montreal if you happen to work at the National Transportation Agency or a as member of the board of the agency or others. Here is a request form: "Form for booking Montreal apartments, Part 1, general information, date, request submitted, requested by" and so on, "authorization from director, Part 2, confirmation". This is for the boss to say whether you can have the apartment in Montreal and so on.

The minister told us in the House she would investigate this, but I want to know what the answer is. What is the excuse for this abuse of taxpayers' money?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that after that entertaining interlude all of us would want to have the answer. In response to the hon. member's question I would like to put some facts before the House.

The National Transportation Agency has advised that it did rent three apartments in July 1989 in Montreal. One of the three apartments was used on an interim basis for an employee who was relocating to Montreal. It was cancelled when no longer needed.

The other two apartments were used for auditors travelling on a regular basis to Montreal to audit the books of CN and CP. One of those apartments was let go in April 1990.

The decision to rent the apartments rather than use hotels was made for a combination of reasons. First, economically it would provide a cost benefit to the National Transportation Agency. Second, it would ensure availability of space in Montreal. The hon. member may know often hotel rooms are difficult to locate, particularly during the convention season. Third, the location: the apartment offered affordable access from both the headquarters of CN and CP to the Montreal offices of the agency.

The use of the apartments was carefully monitored for the first four months and it was shown to provide a positive cost savings to the agency.

The accusations of the hon. member as to the luxuriousness of the apartments are quite exaggerated. A comparison with other similar apartment hotels in the government directory shows that this one comes in at the low end of the scale.

As she indicated in her response, the Minister of State for Transportation asked for a full review of this matter. A cost analysis indicates that there are no longer cost savings and thus the agency advises that it has cancelled the rental effective June 19.

The decision by the agency to rent this apartment was made by employees who were seeking a better solution to management problems, which is very much in keeping with Public Service 2000 philosophy.

I think that rather than criticizing the agency for this initiative, the member should be complimenting its employees on trying an innovative approach to solve a management problem.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in the brief time that I have this evening, I want to expand a little bit on the question I posed to the minister of external affairs May 30.

At that time I was talking about the Al-Mashat affair and specifically about the differences between version a and version b. I want to go back briefly because I think it is important for the House to know that version a of the Al-Mashat affair was provided to us at a press conference with great fanfare by the minister of external affairs and the minister of immigration, at which time they assured us that the matter was full and complete.

This was a report which contained four pages plus one paragraph. Is it my wording that says that the report was full and complete? It is not. On May 15, the day after the report was submitted, the hon. minister said: "A report was made. It is as complete as it can be and it tells people what they need to know". Lo and behold, two weeks later on May 30, another report was released—version b.

The first report was four pages and one paragraph. The second report was 26 pages. It does not take a mental giant to realize that there are additions and amplifications in version b. Are there any discrepancies? There are.

I chose to ask the minister about one of those discrepancies on May 30. At that time I pointed out specifically that on page 11 of version b, the report makes specific mention of a written memorandum dated March 8 which was prepared by the enforcement branch of Employment and Immigration Canada. It was to go to the minister of immigration. To say what? To advise of what was happening with the Al-Mashat application.

Interestingly enough, if you looked at version a you would find absolutely nothing whatsoever about that memorandum. It is not even mentioned. It is not even brought to our attention and yet we were assured by the minister of external affairs that the report was as complete as it could be and it told people what they needed to know.

Two weeks later, it seemed we needed to know more and so we got a little bit more.

What is even more troubling is the response that I received to my question. My question, very simply, was: Why is there something in version b that is not in version a? What does the minister answer? I am quoting: "I am going to have all these documents in front of me before the committee. I will be very happy to answer all these questions, as I was this morning when—let the record show—this member" referring to me, "walked out too".

Let the record show that the minister did not have the documents when she appeared. Let the record show that at 6.25 today I still have not been provided with the documents.

I ask the question again: What is going on? Why is version a different from version b? Why are there documents mentioned in version b that are not mentioned in version a? Which is the true version or is there going to be a version c?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in releasing the report of the deputy ministers on May 14, which provided a chronology of events, every effort was made to provide as complete a record as possible concerning the arrival of Mr. Al-Mashat in Canada on the basis of information then available.

The question of differences between the report released on May 14 and the chronology tabled at the committee on May 30 was referred to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the Standing Committee meeting of May 30. At that time she responded that minor differences between the two documents were easily explained by a closer examination of events as time permitted and the coming forward of private citizens to reveal their involvement.

In particular, this resulted in clarification of some points regarding the source and timing of representations on Mr. Al-Mashat's behalf. It also allowed for further amplification of the information on the record.

The matter is still under examination before the standing committee where the government is making every effort to provide a complete and accurate account of the Al-Mashat case.

With regard to the particulars of the memorandum prepared for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, officials of that department will be appearing before the standing committee tomorrow.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, tonight I want to follow up on the question I raised on May 28, 1991, concerning the economy in the Gaspé and Magdalen Islands area.

The area, Mr. Speaker, is undoubtedly in deep economic trouble. its youths are discouraged and demoralized because the unemployment rate in Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands is over 27 per cent a figure matched in Canada only by one area in Newfoundland. If there is no change, the whole province of Quebec will soon have this record. That is why the level of self-confidence of the Gaspé people is at its lowest. These people wonder what the future holds for their children in terms of job opportunities.

We must avoid or prevent an exodus of residents in search of lasting jobs they cannot find in their region. Such an exodus, that we must prevent, explains why I raised the issue of the Gaspé economy last May 28.

I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare when his government would table economic policies that would give some hope and create employment for these people, so that they can work and raise their children in one of the most beautiful regions in Canada.

The minister did not answer my question. Instead, he told me to wait for an announcement he was going to make on his trip to the Gaspé region, on May 30. I listened carefully to what he said, and I must say I am very disappointed with the empty shell the minister unveiled to the people of the Gaspé region. He did not unveil a long-term plan to create long-lasting jobs. Instead, he chose to announce the creation of an Economic Development Agency for that region. The new Agency will receive a $1.7 million subsidy, over the next five years, from the federal minister of Quebec Economic Regional Development. The subsidy will cover the Agency's operational costs. Mr. Speaker, that may look like a considerable amount of money, but over five years, it only means $340,000 a year.

Does the minister really think this Agency will be able to promote the economic and industrial development of this region, as well as attract new investors, with only $340,000? Surely he must be dreaming. But the worst of it is that this subsidy is not new money. That amount had already been allocated by the Conservatives, before the last election, under the 1988 Canada-Quebec Agreement. Is it another election commitment? An old commitment with a new look? We do not know. I remember that, in 1988, before the election, they announced a Canada-Quebec Region Development Agreement worth $800 million.

After almost three years, Mr. Speaker, they are still left with $1.7 million to invest in the area where they did nothing since 1988. Are they recycling those promises? Are these new promises? It is definitely not fresh money and the Gaspé people are disappointed by this announcement, by this empty shell. They have not only put forward an empty shell, they have provoked everybody, every circle in Quebec have been incensed by this announcement.

So, Mr. Speaker, I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to provide me with more concrete answers than the ones the Minister gave me, either in this House or by his announcement.

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I will give some information to my hon. colleague. Gaspésie is a region I am particularly fond of. I was born there and I still have relatives on my father's and my mother's side living there, more precisely in the area of Sainte-Anne-des-Monts, Rivière-Madeleine and other villages in the same county.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member for Saint-Léonard that the Minister of National Health and Welfare said in this House last week that people in Gaspésie and îles-de-la-Madeleine would be quite happy with the announcements that would be made in the next few days.

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member and other members of this House read the documents prepared for the visit of the minister in Eastern Quebec, they know that the Minister did not announce only one measure but a whole series of concrete initiatives to promote development and job creation in that region.

The first concerns the creation of the Société de développement économique de la Gaspésie et des Îles-de-la-Madeleine. This agency will strive to develop the region, it will be active in economic prospecting, investment and promotion of industry and tourism in Canada and abroad.

Mr. Speaker, the government will support the operating costs of this agency for five years, by giving it $1.7 million in financial assistance. The Canadian government will also give $2 million in contribution to the new agency, so that it can take part, as a limited partner, in the new venture capital corporation called Investissement-Gaspésie—Les Îles-de-la-Madeleine Enr.

The minister also announced, Mr. Speaker, the creation of a new loan insurance program which will apply specifically to the Gaspe and Magdalen Island area. With this program, important initiatives will be realized in the area initiatives which would not otherwise get started for want of adequate financing.

I would like to add, Mr. Speaker, that, under this program, our government will be able to offer loan guarantees totalling $6.4 million for the period up to March 31, 1993.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, last week, the hon. minister had the pleasure to announce the extension of the industrial component of the business development program. The objective of this initiative is to make new activities related to the primary and tertiary sectors eligible for federal financial assistance.

If my hon. colleague calls that an empty shell, Mr. Speaker, I personally think that it is very substantial.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.33 p.m.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—MONTREAL ECONOMY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

That this House condemns the government for having abandoned the population of Montreal through its obvious lack of political will to provide jobs and economic opportunities to the people of this region.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the motion before the House today, we are condemning the government for having abandoned the population of Montreal through its obvious lack of political will to provide jobs and economic opportunities to the people of this region.

Mr. Speaker, the unemployment rate in Montreal has now reached 13.1 percent, the highest municipal rate in Canada. Moreover, 22 percent of Montrealers are living in such poverty that the municipal rate in that regard is also the highest in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this motion may sound severe but it is not an exaggeration. Let me say this at the beginning: I do not want this debate to be a contest of rhetoric or a contest of partisan political verbiage. I am trying to make an honest attempt to examine a serious situation, to analyze its causes and to find solutions. I note that the first ones to laugh and make jokes about the resolution were members on the governement side and I must say I am here today to let the facts speak for themselves.

If the government can put forward sound solutions, I would be the first to withdraw my motion of condemnation.

As I said at the beginning, Montreal has the highest urban unemployment rate in Canada. It has the highest urban poverty rate in Canada. Liberals did not create those facts or that situation. I am simply bringing it to the attention of the House as something that has to be dealt with.

There have been massive layoffs in Montreal, closures of factories and businesses, a high rate of bankruptcies. In Montreal at the present time there are over 188,000 individuals unemployed. Food banks are at their highest number and at their greatest demand. Last night I was at a meeting in my own constituency in Montreal, a district of Montreal that by some is considered a more prosperous area—which is not correct—but a report that I listened to last night with respect to the N.D.G. Food Depot showed that from 1990 to 1991 the increase in demand for persons served in that food bank went up by 218 per cent. In 1990 that food bank in N.D.G. served 7,600 persons and this year so far, 16,500 persons.

It has been estimated that in Montreal, there are 15,000 homeless people, people that are either sleeping on the street or sleeping in shelters, that have no home of their own.

I would like this debate to be a serious attempt to deal with a very sad and difficult situation. I want the facts to speak for themselves. Let me list the layoffs in Montreal which took place in 1990 and 1991.

I will only list those for the House that are over 100 persons: Valmet-Dominion in Lachine laid off 200; Black and Decker laid off 150; Marconi laid off 150; Bristol Myers Squibb in Candiac laid off 124; CBC laid off 160; Thibault in Pierreville laid off 150; General

Motors in Broisbriand laid off 1,700; Steinberg's laid off 150; Clairol in Knowlton, Quebec laid off 228; CN laid off 2,000 in the Montreal area; Miracle Food Mart, 350; Canadian Marconi, 13; Goodyear at Valleyfield, 890—

An hon. member: Is that in Montreal?

Mr. Allmand: Yes. The hon. member says: Is that Montreal, too? It is in the region of Montreal. Mr. Speaker, here we have a minister of the Crown and a member of the government side making light of the fact that over 800 people are laid off at Valleyfield, which is in the Montreal region. As a matter of fact, not only is it in the Montreal region from a demographic point of view, but it is served by offices of this government from the Montreal area.

Rolland Inc., 293 laid off. That is in 1990. In 1991: Eaton's, 190 laid off; Noranda, 125; Culinar, 256; Circo Craft, 211; Pratt & Whitney, 1,200; Air Canada, 2,900 across the country but the head office is in Montreal and a large number of those will be in the Montreal area; Primo Foods, 194; Télé-Métropole, 200; Goodyear, 145; and of course one of the largest layoffs of all, Pascal's hardware, a company that was in business in Montreal for 87 years, just in the last month closed 21 stores and laid off 1,600; and today it was announced in the Montreal newspapers that Pratt & Whitney have announced a lay-off of another 200 by June 21, making the total lay-offs at Pratt & Whitney of 1,000.

There have been many reports on this situation in Montreal and again I emphasize to the government these reports speak for themselves. It is not the Liberals speaking. It is not the New Democrats speaking. These are reports commissioned by the province of Quebec, the city of Montreal, and other social agencies in Montreal which state the facts with respect to the city.

There is a report by l'Office de planification et de développement du Québec from March 1991, indicating 188,000 Montrealers out of work by the end of 1990 and a report of May 1990 by Centraide de Montréal which shows deepening poverty and an expanding underclass of Montrealers without jobs, with substandard housing, and with poor health.

This report was completed by a 14-member committee headed by Paul Lacoste, former rector of the Université de Montréal. Its recommendations included protection for low-income individuals, equitable taxation, home nursing and care for the aged and handicapped, subsidized housing, massive training and literacy programs and incentives for employment. That is a report, I would like the government to note, not by Liberals or by opposition members but by a very responsible committee in Montreal.

The 1989 report by federal economist, Mr. Jules Leger, stated that the large number of low income families puts Montreal in the forefront in terms of poor compared to other areas of Canada. Montreal, he said, has 192,000 more poor people than all of the four Atlantic provinces.

In April 1990, le Regroupement des départements de santé communautaire du Montréal Métropolitain stated that one in four Montreal residents live below the poverty line. In May 1990, a report by the Ministère des Affaires sociales du Québec warned that Montreal is becoming impoverished faster than the rest of the province. The Canadian Apparel Manufacturers Institute expects the free trade agreement to kill fully one-third of 40,000 jobs in the Montreal region by the year 2000.

Finally, we have the Picard report from a commission which was appointed by this Conservative government to put forward a plan of action for Montreal to reinvigorate the city's economy and to create jobs. I will deal more with that report in a few minutes but that report made 84 recommendations, hardly any of which have been taken up by the government.

I would like to refer to a few of the clippings that have been put forward describing the situation in Montreal.

• (1020)

Bankruptcy jumped by 50 per cent in Quebec. Of course, a great majority of the businesses in Quebec are in Montreal.

Another clipping from April 1990 reads: "City Facing Unemployment Crisis, the Trade Unions Say in Montreal". Michel Bruillet, spokesman for Comité Régional de Syndicat de Montréal told reporters that there were 188,000 people without work in the Montreal employment pool.

He said action must be taken to deal with this very serious problem.

An article from the Southam newspapers of February 16, 1991: "Quebec Manufacturers Among the Hardest Hit Victims of the Free Trade Agreement."

An article from La Presse, December 1990:

[Translation]

"The level of activity in the manufacturing sector will decline unless there is a radical change in attitude". This is from the Montreal Board of Trade.

[English]

"Economic Outlook Worsens: A Report by the Conseil de Patrons du Quebec."

It goes on and on.

Another report was by Secor, an agency which was commissioned by the provincial government to study the situation in Montreal. It reported on March 28, 1991. La Presse of Montreal said the following:

"Poverty is spreading in the Montreal area. There are 615,000 people living in low-income households, half of them in Montreal proper".

[English]

There are other reports which show that, despite the fact that in Montreal many people gained economically during the period of 1985 to 1990, many people were big losers. That was principally the conclusion of the Centraide report, which I referred to already, under Paul Lacoste.

It said that Quebec went from having the fourth highest level of low-income households for families and individuals in 1979 to the highest rate in Canada for individuals, and the second highest after Newfoundland for families.

I spoke about food banks and the great proliferation of food banks in the Montreal area. Again, there is a report in this morning's paper with respect to the Sun Youth food bank in Montreal centre.

It said in the headline of The Gazette this morning: "Two Women Collapse, Two Men Fight in Food Line-up."

The Old Brewery Mission is another agency which provides food and shelter to homeless men.

An hon. member: It is known well by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Allmand: It is known well, as my colleague says, by the Prime Minister. Reverend McCarthy, who is an outstanding individual, has been helping these men for years.

After 28 years of running the Old Brewery Mission, Reverend McCarthy is "disturbed by the dramatic increase in numbers of men showing up, and especially in the number under 25 who used to be comparatively rare among the mission's clientele and now account for around 60 per cent."

With respect to welfare, it says that the Government of Quebec is anticipating that costs for welfare will rise this year by $200 million.

A report from Quebec City by the minister André Bourbeau says: "The recession has caused at least 15,000 households to join Quebec's welfare roles since early fall. The total number of Quebec households on welfare now stands at 355,000."

That is the situation. It does not make me happy to recount those figures to the House of Commons. I was born in Montreal. I love Montreal. It is my city. It was once the metropolis of Canada. It was the economic engine for the entire province of Quebec, and I think we must look at that situation seriously to try to determine the causes.

What are the causes of this deplorable situation? If we look at the Picard report, the Secor report and some of the other reports, they say part of it is historical and part of it is recent.

Historically, according to some of these experts, Montreal had too many old-line industrial plants with skills geared to the old technology. Of course, as the old technology became outdated, for one reason or another Montreal did not adapt quickly enough and did not receive support to adapt quickly enough. I am not only speaking of the machinery and technology, but also the manpower, the trained workers.

Recently, however, I think we have to say to the government that some of its policies have also impacted on the situation and made it considerably worse. The free trade agreement has no doubt encouraged several businesses to go to the United States. On the radio this morning I heard a report—it was not with respect to Montreal but with respect to Toronto—about an agency which stated that it worked with 86 industrial firms which have moved from Toronto to the Buffalo area. We have not heard a similar report with respect to Montreal, but we know that certain companies, consolidating under the free trade agreement, moved their subsidiaries to the United States. One example is the Gillette plant, which was a subsidiary of the American company. It closed the plant in Montreal and consolidated its operations in Boston.

The free trade agreement has had an impact on this situation, which has to be looked at seriously. So has the goods and services tax. Everyone said, even those who agreed with the goods and services tax, expert after expert said that it was the wrong time to bring in the goods and services tax. It increased prices at a time when people were being laid off, when jobs were going scarce and people had a hard time coping with their economic situation.

I would submit that the free trade agreement, combined with the goods and services tax, has certainly contributed to the massive increase in cross-border shopping because it has increased the difference in prices between retail goods in Canada and retail goods in the United States.

Not only the GST, but other taxes have contributed to this recession and made the situation even worse in Montreal. There was the report yesterday by the Ottawa-based firm, Global Economics, which pointed out that since 1984 all taxes have increased by $1,530 a year for middle-class taxpayers with a family of two.

Other things which might have been the cause and which require examination are the government's policies of deregulation and privatization, or one might say the dismantling of the infrastructure of Canada. Just a week or so ago we had the protest on Parliament Hill by the truckers. From time to time we have had other similar industries which have submitted that they have been extremely hurt by the policies of deregulation by the government. As for privatization, companies such as Air Canada and Petro-Canada also suffered from an employment point of view after privatization took place.

Put together all these policies, the policy for free trade with the United States, deregulation and privatization, and we see that we have had a dismantling of the Canadian economic infrastructure. I would submit that once we dismantle the Canadian economy and take away those things which made it a Canadian economy, sooner or later the political structure will disappear as well.

I could also refer to the high interest rates, which not only affect businesses in Montreal and employment in Montreal, but affect the situation right across the country.

One of the most important causes of this situation is the philosophy or policy of this government. If we look at the budgets of the government since 1984, we will see that it has adopted a series of policies which are more or less a doctrinaire commitment to a free market economy, a philosophy which says: "Let things be as they are, let the market operate as it will and everything will take care of itself". Government members continually rise in their places and condemn suggestions to spend money to stimulate the economy.

They describe that as throwing money at the problem. I think that where a country spends its money shows where its priorities are. There is no doubt that money has to be spent on certain items if we are going to reinvigorate the Montreal economy.

Mr. Speaker, you are indicating to me that I only have a minute left. I have enough material here to go on for a quite considerable length of time.

I am sure that in its response the government will refer to certain things it has done. It will refer to a contract to Canadair. It will refer to some things it did for the pharmaceutical industry. It will refer to the new agency that will be set up under the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It will refer to the program for older workers adjustment.

These things, while good in themselves, are isolated ad hoc policies which have not dealt with the problem that needs to be dealt with. If they had been successful, we would not have the situation I have described. These policies are not enough. Montreal needs much, much more.

I have a report here which says that the POWA program is a cruel lottery for the "laid off". It is underfunded, it does not have enough money.

My final remarks are that we need political will, political commitment to create jobs in the Montreal area. It can be done. It has been done in other countries. Liberals did it in the past. Between 1965 and 1980, there was a 5.6 per cent unemployment rate in Canada. That is because we believed in a mixed economy.

I encourage the government to look at the situation in Montreal once again and come forward with some positive policies. If it does so during the debate today, I will withdraw my motion and give it credit for doing so.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what my colleague had to say, especially about some programs the Conservative government implemented to protect workers living in the province of Quebec, and particularly in Montreal. I would like my colleague to give us more details about two programs that have had a negative impact on POWA a program for workers affected by changes in the industries and plant closings due to economic upheavals, or as some would say, due to the free trade deal. There is also the other program the hon. member has mentioned. I would like more information on that one, because as an member, I have received a lot of complaints from people who wanted to benefit from POWA and other programs put in place by the federal government to help workers when they lose their jobs. I do not think these programs are working at all. Like my colleague has just said, they have become more like a lottery for the laid off.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, for POWA, I do not have figures for the province of Quebec, but I do have overall statistics for Canada showing that the amount of money available is inadequate. For example, I have here an article published in the Winnipeg Free Press, on May 23, 1991, where it says:

[English]

Only $73 million of the promised $150 million was used in those first two years for the program for older worker adjustment, providing benefits to 2,244 ex-workers. That is for the entire country, 2,244 ex-workers. I already put on the record, and these were not my statistics, that in the Montreal region there are 188,000 workers who have been laid off in the last two years and are now out of work.

The article goes on to say that, despite the steady stream of plant closings and business bankruptcies, only a tiny fraction have been declared by POWA's joint federal-provincial labour department committee to meet the major layoff test, and therefore qualify for designation under the program.

In Ontario, only 39 qualified. I do not have the figures for Quebec. In answer to the hon. member, while the government has some programs which in theory look good on paper, they are drastically underfunded and do not meet the seriousness of the problem.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Montreal for bringing to the attention of the rest of the country the problems of Montreal.

I would like to refer him to the Question Period last week when different members were pursuing the question of the economic health of Montreal. The minister stood up and said that they were trying to develop a plan because of Montreal's poor health. When another member got up and asked him about the future of Winnipeg, the Minister of Finance stood up and said: "You do not need a plan because you have good macro policies".

I wanted to bring this to the attention of the member and ask a question. I think in previous governments, particularly in the Liberal government in the 1970s and 1980s, there was a good mix between federal activity and provincial and municipal activity in support of regional base plans. There was the Montreal base region, the Winnipeg base region and other parts of the country. In the absence of having coherent plans for these cities, you end up with the extreme opposite. You end up with people competing against each other and running the risk of having plans which are contrary to the interests of the country.

For example, there is the story both in Winnipeg and Montreal of the competition over the CF-18 plane. That was a debate which should not have taken place in this country, pitting one region against the other.

I would ask the member if he could perhaps elaborate on the need for city base plans, not only in Montreal but across the country. The federal government should show leadership financially, morally and with the expertise in the Public Service so that people appreciate the government's understanding of their needs in terms of unemployment, poverty, training and getting the proper businesses set up. This is a holistic approach which deserves the interest of the federal government. In fact, one of the big surprises that we have is the total absence of planning on the part of this government.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct. Liberal governments over the years believed in a mixed economy. We believed in the market system but we believed that in a country such as Canada where we have 25 million people dispersed over a large area, right up against the giant economy of the United States, it was necessary for us to have certain government support programs and certain government economic intervention. Over the years that approach worked. We had the greatest eras of prosperity in this country under Liberal governments in the fifties, sixties and seventies.

I pointed out that from 1965 to 1980 the average rate of employment was 5.6 per cent. The government always refers to the two years of 1981-82. We had a recession but it was no worse than the recession which is going on right now.

We believed in doing things to deal with recessions. We did not have this doctrinaire belief, this 19th century belief that the marketplace would take care of itself and all situations and that there would be a trickling down effect which would help small businesses and the economy generally.

In response to the member's question with respect to municipalities and planning, the Canadian Federation of Municipalities has for years recommended a joint federal, provincial and municipal program to reconstruct municipal infrastructure; roads, bridges, sewers, water systems, anti-pollution systems, ports, airports, transportation systems and power systems. The government has continually rejected the recommendations of the Canadian Federation of Municipalities.

Not only would that program provide employment, it would also provide the necessary infrastructure for business to invest in those municipalities and invest in an environment which would be more conducive to profit making, creation of jobs and economic growth.

This government has its philosophy. I must say that previous Conservative governments did not have that same philosophy. The government of Mr. Diefenbaker did not have this doctrinaire belief in the free market economy. It also believed in a mixed economy. The government of Mr. Clark did not have this doctrinaire approach.

It seems with the coming to power of the Conservatives in 1984 under the present Prime Minister they were wed to the policies of Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan, which are a disaster for this country and are not really in the tradition of political parties of all stripes in this country.

• (1040)

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the member could explain how he rationalizes the attitude of the province of Quebec. It is clear that the province is responsible for cities and municipalities within the province. How can he rationalize that view with his present view, apparently, of the Constitution that the Government of Canada should directly interfere with municipal financing and municipal activity?

Is it the policy of the Liberal Party that we should go right over the head of the province of Quebec and deal directly with the municipality so that the municipality would not have to worry about Quebec City? Should the federal government handle roads and subsidies for roads and direct where traffic ought to go?

Is it his view and that of his party that because there is unemployment in Montreal—there is in other cities in other parts of the country—and because of the incompetence of the Quebec government we ought to go at that problem and deal with that problem? Is that the view of the Liberal Party?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, not at all. That is not our view. When we were in power we had a department of housing and urban renewal which worked closely with the provinces and the municipalities but always recognized the principal jurisdiction of the provinces.

Right now there are several departments in the federal government: the Department of Transport which deals with railways, airports, ports, canals; the Department of the Environment; and the new agency being set up under the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The only complaint I have about that is that they did not consult close enough with Quebec. I am not suggesting that the federal government run roughshod over provincial jurisdiction. I am suggesting that they sit down with the province of Quebec in this case and the city of Montreal and develop a plan whereby those things which are under federal jurisdiction, such as transportation and certain types of housing, can be done in conjunction with the city. They have been done that way in the past in a very positive, effective way, and they can be done that way again.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Montrealers who were watching the first speaker this morning, the mover of the motion before the House today, must have noticed how good the opposition is at blaming the government and how little they have to offer in the way of solutions. Not a word, and I would be embarrassed if I were them, Mr. Speaker, not a word about their failure to deal with the situation in Montreal during the many years they were in power here in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, when we talk about Montreal and the economy of this major Canadian city, a number of factors should be put into perspective. Today, unfortunately, Montreal is faced with a number of economic problems. With 207,000 unemployed in April 1991, the Montreal metropolitan area has an unemployment rate of 13.1 per cent, which is unacceptable.

However, this situation did not arise in a matter of months or a few years, I think it is correct to say that Montreal's economy started to falter in the middle of the 1960s, and for the next ten years, it steadily declined.

As far as job creation is concerned, Montreal's performance has been lacklustre for the past 30 years. It ranks below Halifax, Mr. Speaker. It created one-third of the jobs created by Calgary. Toronto had about the same number of jobs in 1961. Today, Toronto has half a million more jobs than Montreal. The situation worsened at the beginning of the 80s. During the past ten years, Mr. Speaker, Montreal has ranked twenty-first among Canada's 25 metropolitan regions, on job creation.

What is the underlying cause of the economic malaise that has affected Montreal's economy for so many years? The cause is structural because, as was said earlier by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, historically, Montreal has specialized in producing consumer goods—mostly for the Canadian market—including food, beverages, tobacco, textiles, clothing, leather items and furniture. As international competition strengthened in these sectors, many jobs in Montreal were lost.

When our government was elected in 1984, it immediately addressed the task of turning the situation around. The point I want to make today, Mr. Speaker, is that our government is the first one since many years that did not remain indifferent to Montreal's problems. In fact, a lot has been done since this government came to power. However, we did not go in without a plan. No, Mr. Speaker, we wanted that every initiative bore fruit. So our interventions followed an approach favouring the development of Montreal based on its many strengths in areas such as high technology, for example, tourism and cultural activities, design, finance, commerce and international activities.

For we should not forget that Montreal does not only have problems. It has, for example, a modern manufacturing sector which, as a whole, made considerable progress during the last decades, whether it be in plastics, electronic products or transport equipment.

Montreal has many assets, and that is why we decided to rely on these strengths to revitalize its economy. That does not mean we should not do something for some less advantaged areas on its territory. In this regard, let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that in February 1988, this government set up a $35 million special program for the economic recovery of eastern Montreal. In May 1990, it was the turn of south western Montreal businesses to avail themselves of a similar program with a $15 million envelope.

To complement its action, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology announced that it would make available a $6.5 million funding for the implementation of special projects by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Later on today, we will be able to provide you with more details on those various initiatives that we can rightly be proud of.

As I mentioned a few moments ago, this government has been very active in Montreal since 1984. Our action took place in sectors considered a priority for the development of Montreal.

In the area of research and development, I want to remind honourable members that our government tried to pass as fast as it could Bill C-22 amending the Patents Act. This bill gave back to Montreal the level of research and development activity it lacked for so long and it encouraged several important drug companies to implement research and development programs totalling tens of millions of dollars.

Mr. Speaker, this government has invested more than 2.5 billion dollars in new money to support initiatives in science and technology. Through the Networks of Centres of Excellence Program, the Canadian government has been able to give real support to at least two Montreal networks. For example, the Institute for Robotics and Intelligent Systems will bring together the best Canadian scientists in research on expert systems and intelligent robots.

Through the same program, this government granted a 12.3 million dollars contribution for the respiratory diseases network which is based in Montreal, in order to find better treatment and better means of prevention. The work of both networks dovetails with that of other institutions and will contribute to the reputation and economic renewal of Montreal.

If there is another area where our government did not spare his efforts for Montreal, it is that of high technology. For example, it supported the creation of the Technoparc Montréal Métropolitain, which will facilitate the emergence of new businesses, the intensification, transfer and diffusion of high technology.

Mr. Speaker, our government has also not forgotten the aeronautical and aerospace industries. The aeronautical industry in Montreal creates jobs for more than 40,000 people, which makes it, by far, the single most important high technology sector in the area. Bombardier—Canadair, with which our government has cooperated on several occasions in recent years, particularly with a contribution of $43 million for the development of its regional transport jet, the famous stretched aircraft, should expand noticeably in the next few years.

The future of CAE Electronics, the world's number one builder of flight simulators for commercial aircraft, looks also very good, since the demand for this product should continue to grow in the years to come.

Mr. Speaker, as regards the aerospace industry, allow me to mention again that our government has established the Canadian Space Agency in the Montreal region. This initiative will have a positive effect in promoting space related activities in Quebec. Already, a great number of firms, under the umbrella of Spar Aerospace Limited, with whom our government signed, in 1986, a memorandum of understanding for $300 million, take an active part in the development of this important industry.

In Quebec, some 60 companies employing close to 7,000 workers build equipment or components used for transmitting and receiving voice, image and data communications. It is expected that the international market for telecommunication material will increase at an annual rate of 8 per cent between now and the year 2000. Mr. Speaker, when one considers that the companies of the telecommunication sector are almost all located in the Montreal area, it is easy to understand that their possibilities for growth are particularly good.

Mr. Speaker, our government recognizes the important role that the tourism and cultural industries can play in the development of Montreal. For that reason, those industries have benefited from important federal contributions in recent years.

Major facilities have been built and have helped Montreal become a world-class destination for tourists. Soon, the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts will have more than doubled its capacity for exhibits. The Montreal Botanical Garden, with its Japanese garden and its insectarium, has become one of Montreal's most important tourist attractions.

The old port area, where the Canadian government will have invested a total of $65 million by the end of 1992, will also become a major tourist attraction in North America.

The Lachine Canal, that will be opened to boaters after restoration work is completed, will be reconstructed according to the original course. The priming of the locks is scheduled for October 1991. In the east, Mr. Speaker, important developments are planned, including a basin, the Bonsecours basin, and a large multi-purpose area on the Jacques-Cartier pier. That area will be used to accommodate large crowds and to hold special events.

The Department of Industry, Science and Technology has also spent more than $2 million on various feasibility studies for the establishment of the Museum of Science and Technology.

Again near the St. Lawrence, the government is committed to spending more than $10 million to create a centre for archaeology and history at Pointe-à-Callière, to illustrate Montreal's evolution as a commercial city.

Just across the old port area, Mr. Speaker, our government has recently confirmed its commitment to invest nearly $40 million on Île Sainte-Hélène for the development of the "parc des Îles", which will become the biggest park in Montreal. In the biosphere will be the water and environment interpretation centre, and development costs will be paid by our government.

The "parc des Îles" will be inaugurated in 1992, the year in which Montreal will celebrate the 350th anniversary of its foundation. Moreover, in order to show how important that anniversary is to our government, we are committed to spending $10 million for the organization of major activities related to the 1992 celebrations.

In addition to museum equipments, large amounts of money have been invested, Mr. Speaker, in the renovation of theatres and music halls in Montreal, and financial assistance to major cultural events has helped maintain their attractiveness for Montreal's tourists.

Our government, Mr. Speaker, has strived to reaffirm Montreal's vocation as an international city. Even if one of my colleagues will speak on that aspect of our mandate later on today, I would like to take this opportunity to remind you that the federal government supported the Société du centre de conférences internationales de Montréal in order to conduct a feasibility study to create an international centre in Montreal and to promote concrete initiatives for the development of international activities in this city.

It is also with a $10 million grant that a United Nations organisation, the Multilateral Fund for the Montreal Protocol on the Ozone Layer, chose our city as the site of its permanent office.

Mr. Speaker, all these initiatives of our government show very well the development potential of Montreal. Moreover, different projects which are under way all over the city are an indication that the situation is changing in Montreal. These projects are also an eloquent proof of the interest that the government of Canada has taken in Montreal since 1984, and of the support it intends to bring in the coming years.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister mentioned that the government has introduced several programs for the Montreal region, but the situation has not improved. In Montreal, the economy is still in shambles. The minister said, for example, that the government has introduced a program for East Montreal. But what is the result? How many jobs were created with this program?

If this program was good for East Montreal why is it that we still find in this area an unemployment rate of 20 per cent and that 25 per cent of the population is on welfare? How can we explain this situation if the programs are so good and efficient?

The minister mentioned Canadair. We are very happy for Canadair and in this case, it is a success, but it is not enough for the Montreal region. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, why this government has chosen to ignore the Picard Report, a commission it created.

[English]

The things mentioned by the minister in his speech are truly an ad hoc band-aid approach. They remind me of the doctor, after his patient is dead, telling the family that he had given aspirin, Alka-Seltzer and such minor medications to the patient before he died.

This patient, the city of Montreal, requires something more than aspirin and band-aids. I ask the minister: When will the government finally announce a substantial, comprehensive response to the Picard commission, a commission that made 84 recommendations?

The government set up the commission and yet we have not had any response to the 84 recommendations.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce shoots from the hip—that is how he began his speech this morning—by quoting newspaper articles when we would have expected him, as the mover of today's motion, to give us examples of what his party would have done in previous years and what positive measures it would propose now to help Montreal.

It seems that he did not read the Picard Report, Mr. Speaker, that he is not giving any consideration to what we are achieving right now because the great majority of the programs I mentioned in my speech are directly derived from individual recommendations contained in the Picard Report.

In fact, that report recommended government intervention in areas of its jurisdiction and never proposed that the federal government should take responsibility for the economic recovery of the entire island of Montreal because it would have been totally ridiculous to propose such a thing. Essentially it would have been like saying that the federal government should submit itself to all provincial and municipal governments in Canada and carry out the responsibilities of all levels of government.

Because we are always in contact with the municipal authorities of Montreal and the suburbs and with the provincial government, I know that nobody wants the federal government to forcibly impose its way of doing things. The elected people at all levels expect the federal government to be a facilitator in the implementation of the programs and projects they propose. That is what we have been doing since 1984, Mr. Speaker, in the most complete harmony with the other levels of government.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was involved in the House when we had a massive debate, to a large extent led by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, on Bill C-22 involving the removal of patent protection. The minister alluded to the increase in employment as a result of that measure which was opposed by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

I was also in the House when the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce led the opposition against the sale of Canadair to Bombardier. That sale enabled Bombardier to become a leading manufacturer of aircraft. I was wondering if the minister could outline the exact numbers of additional people who are now working in Montreal in the high-tech aircraft industry as a result of that measure. In other words, outline the measures that this government has used, opposed by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, that have enabled more employment in Montreal.

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, the example just cited by my hon. colleague about Bombardier and Canadair is a perfect example of the proper application of privatization by this government.

Canadair was going nowhere when Bombardier took over its operations from the Government of Canada. Because of the knowledge and competence of the private sector which took over this company, it is now a viable business. At the time of the takeover, Canadair was reducing the number of its employees. On the day of the takeover, the employment at Canadair was less than 5,000 people. At the present time there are 7,500 people employed at Canadair. On the day of the launching of the new regional jet, the president of Canadair told me that within the next few months they expect to have over 10,000 people working at Canadair.

These are high-paying, high-tech jobs and are the type of jobs that this government wants to generate to really reinforce the economy of Montreal.

When this government took power in 1984, we decided that never again would we repeat the errors of the previous government who spent and indebted this country for generations to come by creating make-shift jobs that were very good for electoral purposes, but did absolutely nothing for the economy of Montreal.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport complained that the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce was quoting from newspapers. I would like to quote to him from the throne speech where in the conclusion the Prime Minister says:

> My government will work with Canadians to achieve its goals of unity, prosperity and responsive government so that all Canadians feel themselves a part of this country, so that all Canadians have an equal opportunity to share in its bounty, so that all can see themselves reflected in its constitution and so that all will find the fulfilment of their aspirations in its future.

I want to ask the minister, do the words in the throne speech "equal opportunity to share in its bounty" mean sharing this bounty by lining up at food banks where the lines are getting longer and longer? Does sharing this bounty mean that the Montreal school boards have to give free breakfasts to children before they can teach them? Is this what the throne speech means by sharing the bounty, the wealth, the prosperity of this country?

Very specifically, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister what concrete plans does his government have to reduce and finally eliminate the food banks in Montreal, Toronto, Windsor, and almost every major city in this country? What concrete plans does this government have so that the boards of education will not have to subsidize breakfasts and free milk to children before they can be taught in schools.

I asked the minister and this government following the last throne speech and I got no answer. I am giving this minister an opportunity on behalf of his government to give us some concrete plans and programs for eliminating food banks and subsidizing children's food.

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, I believe the members on the opposite side think that Montrealers have forgotten what their government has imposed on them over the years when they were in power.

They are the party that fought the adoption of Bill C-22 which was such a sweeping tool for the pharmaceutical industry to create more jobs. It is that government that fought the working and the action of la Caisse de dépôts in Montreal that was such a wonderful tool for helping the local industries.

It was that party that fought for two years, with the help of their Liberal friends in the Senate, to prevent the adoption of Bill C-21 which is now providing the necessary tools for people to move from low technology, low paying jobs, through training necessary to apply for the better paying jobs in high technology fields. They are the ones that are at fault for doing these things that have been such a detriment to the economy of the Montreal area.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say, in the spirit of this lack of partisanship, I think we have started off on a very bad foot this morning. It seems to me that this debate is going absolutely nowhere.

We have members on the government side saying it is not their fault that Montreal has a 25 per cent welfare roll, UIC roll; it is not their fault that unemployment is about 14 per cent in the city of Montreal.

On the other side we have our Liberal colleagues saying it is not their fault either, the deterioration of the city of Montreal has occurred under the present government.

I suppose for people who are listening and watching us on television it is hard to understand exactly where this debate is going. I think we should go back to the sense of the motion of my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and look at it as an opportunity for the government not to wash its hands of this affair and say look, it is your fault, you Liberals, because of C-22. It is your fault because of your so-called opposition to the élargissement des pouvoirs de la Caisse de dépôt du Québec.

We have right now, this morning, an excellent opportunity for the government side to say that they have made a few mistakes and there are some things they can do. "Yes, Mr. Deputy from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, you have some good points, but we do not accept all of them. We are all somewhat responsible for the mess we find ourselves in". That is what I would like to have heard listening for the past hour or so, but I have not heard it.

I am a Montrealer and I would like to give you first of all, some of what I have seen as a Montrealer. I live in downtown Montreal, and I also represent a number of cities on the south shore of Montreal, all of them having been affected by this downturn in the economy, this recession. First let me give you some statistics on the Montreal area.

First of all, 25 per cent of Montrealers receive unemployment insurance or welfare benefits. Let me talk about these people, because we have a strong tendency here in the House to quote figures, but 25 per cent of the people depend on unemployment insurance or welfare. That means that 175 persons per day must apply for unemployment insurance or welfare benefits, 175 persons per day.

As you know, much has been said about Argentina's foreign policy and disparecidos, those people who disappear. One day they are present, but the next, they are gone.

Well, that also happens in Canada, that happens in Montreal. We call them economic disparecidos, those who disappear from the economic picture. These people disappear when they lose their jobs. Losing your job sometimes means losing your house, your family, and finally, you end up losing hope. We have nearly reached that point, Mr. Speaker. People have practically no hope anymore. I do not mean—and I hope that the government will understand—that the government has done nothing. In fact, the government has tried to correct the situation, but the question asked by my hon. friend for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce is excellent, because he recognized that the government has made some efforts, but he wanted to know the results. Where is the beef? Where is the result? What are the results of your efforts in Montreal?

I think one must understand that Montrealers blame the federal government, among others, for not delivering results. It is obvious. The government cannot claim that it did everything it could.

Much was said about Laurent Picard's report. I read it and I found it excellent. It contained many recommendations, not 84, but 86, and those were good ones. But in an analysis of this government's behaviour, the editorial writer of The Gazette was saying in late February 1991: "The federal government ignored almost all of these 86 recommendations." This is not a New Democratic member or a Liberal member, but a non partisan editorial writer who said that the Picard report, sponsored by the government, was almost totally ignored by this government.

Mr. Speaker, there are things we can do and I want to take this opportunity today not to criticize this government—some have done it and others will—but to suggest some alternatives, to make some suggestions that the government can use and that are not new. I do not think these are new to the government, because it already heard several of the suggestions that I will make. But I think it is nevertheless an excellent opportunity to remind this government which actions it should take to specifically deal with this unemployment problem, with the deterioration of the social and local infrastructure in Montreal.

I saw very recently the request of the CSN in Montreal, and they gave me a number of actions that they thought were necessary to boost the economy in Montreal.

In going over their suggestions, I find they are quite sensible. Let me tell you what the CSN in Montreal is suggesting. In order to boost the economy in Montreal, we must deal with the issue of the interest rates, which are still too high. I know that the rates are down, and it is a good sign, but the problem with the interest rates in Canada is that they had remained high for so long because of this government's policies that now that they are down a little, companies which could normally invest money and help revive the economy are almost running out of it. We do not have what we call a big pool of risk capital, it is dry. The government needs to continue to intervene to lower interest rates, although up to now it did not do much to lower them. They have gone down despite government programs. A lowering of interest rates is vital, there is no doubt about it, because there won't be any economic recovery without it.

Now, I would like to talk about the POW. It was referred to briefly a short while ago, but I should say it is extremely important for Quebec and Montreal. Have you ever heard about the POW? This is a program which was established shortly before the signing of the free trade agreement. The government had said: "We know that people working in the clothing industry, for example, will be adversely affected by the FTA and that is why we will be setting up a program to help and retrain these people so they can find another job. Mr. Speaker, if there is an area about which I receive a lot of complaints, it is certainly the POW. This program is not working well. To be eligible, people must have worked a certain number of years in a soft sector of the industry. But what is a soft sector in Montreal? Most industries in that city are in a soft sector. So, how do we define a soft sector? People who believed the government when it was saying that the POW would protect workers affected by the free trade accord are in deep trouble.

I could mention a number of people I met who were working in the women's clothing industry. I remember very well Mrs. Lorraine Vaillancourt, a member of the FTQ. She is really concern about these workers, because they have very little protection, and that is why the POW needs to be improved. I hope the minister, when he comes back, will explain to us what he intends to do about this program.

When we talk about economic recovery in Montreal, we must also talk about taxes. Taxes are killing the middle class. Taxes are killing industries. And what about the GST? Frankly, that tax which was supposed to be visible, to be revenue neutral, is none of that. We know that it is a milking cow which is going to produce not the $18 billion forecasted, but up to $30 billion per year for the government, if my information is correct. That money comes from the taxpayer's pocket and that is the reason why people are going shopping elsewhere. Quebecers, and especially Montrealers, have to do their shopping outside Canada, in Plattsburg and Burlington, precisely to escape the clutches of this federal government which has taxed almost every product and service. Quebecers are trying to avoid this tax. They have become nomads, shoppers who have to seek out good deals wherever they are, even if it means shopping outside Canada.

Consequently, I think that GST must be abolished. It must go. It is an unfair tax, a tax which creates a lot more problems than it has solved and a tax which, even now, forces Quebecers to turn their backs on their own country. The real tragedy in this is that we are forced to turn our backs on our own workers in Montreal, on the lady who makes clothing in a Montreal plant because we can get them cheaper in States.

It is a fact. I think that this government can take some steps towards solving these problems, but I must add that as long as the GST remains, these problems will persist.

Another issue was raised by CNTU, that is tax reform in general. My colleague from Mississauga South, whose speech was excellent, wanted to know how we could settle Quebec's problems if we cannot deal directly with the municipalities, or if we must always work with the provincial level.

When we're talking about tax reform, nothing is more normal than to cooperate with the provinces. I am not aware of any circumstances when Quebec has refused to accept initiatives undertaken by the federal government. The question is about cooperation, not about forcing a measure nor presenting an ultimatum. It is all about cooperation. And herein lies one of this government's problems. We have seen an example of it when the minister wanted to create a department of regional development for Quebec. I think it's the fortieth federal department encroaching on Quebec's jurisdiction.

This is not what we would like to see the federal government do. We want the federal government to work with us, we don't want it to tell us what to do. I think there is enough room for manoeuvre. Quebec is always intelligent enough, I think, to accept a federal presence as long as the provincial jurisdiction is respected.

So, we are talking about tax reform. I was here, yesterday, when the leader of the official opposition and the leader of our party, the New Democratic Party, asked questions about tax reform and how Quebecers were taxed. The Prime Minister was laughing throughout those questions. He thought it was hilarious, and he was laughing in our faces. It's true. That is the picture that we get on the screen. Consumers can now see what the government is doing and how arrogant it is. I have seen such arrogant behavior on both sides of the House. I also remember how arrogant the previous government was.

But now the middle class is an endangered species because it is taxed too heavily. The minister recognized it yesterday, the one who is staring at me in amazement. He said people are taxed, overtaxed even, and he is right. Somebody has to pay taxes. But he was quoted in the press. Maybe he now wants to withdraw his words but he did say that someone had to pay taxes. He then admitted that the middle class was paying more and that as a member of that class he was also paying more and that it was necessary. I say that is not necessary for there are other ways of collecting taxes. Corporations can be taxed. I know that the U.S. have a minimum tax on corporations. I think it is 20 per cent. I believe business is working as well in the U.S. as it is in Canada, if not better. When we talk of boosting Montreal's economy, we cannot refuse to consider a major tax reform to create an environment that would allow such a recovery.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you why the CNTU has formulated a number of suggestions. I can also tell you that in my region, the UPA, Union des producteurs agricoles, has endorsed suggestions quite similar to that of the CNTU. This union and this group of farmers made these suggestions because they believe that there is still time for the governement to act. They believe they have solutions to propose. They believe that, with a minimum of good will, we can find solutions together, we can improve Montreal's economy as well as that of Quebec and of Canada as a whole.

So, even if we admit that the government has done a couple of things to offset the problems of Montreal and elsewhere, I repeat that what we saw is clearly too little and, unfortunately, too late. It is not what this government had promised us before signing the free trade agreement and certainly not what it had promised before being re-elected in 1988.

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member was putting words in my mouth I felt I should stand up and correct the impression that he left with the public. He was referring to a report that came out by Patrick Grady of a company here in Ottawa called Global Economics Ltd. which very correctly pointed out that the income tax level in Canada is higher than in other countries of the world. In the same report he also pointed out that we pay less than half the taxes for our social policy fields. We pay less sales tax than other countries and our corporate taxes are comparable to other countries.

Today we are talking about the economy in Montreal but the hon. member failed to mention this. Mr. Grady praises reform of the corporate taxation system saying, "changes have boosted investment in economic growth and in job creation". He also generally approves of the 7 per cent goods and services tax introduced in January: "The corporate tax changes are improving the economic efficiency by reducing the degree of tax induced distortion in investment, decision-making across industries, and acid types," he says in the report. "This leads to a pattern of investment and economic activity that is more productive and conducive to economic growth and employment criticism". Grady said: "The Tories have eliminated some tax incentives that had prompted companies to make the wrong investment decisions as well an over-all lowering of corporate tax rates has kept Canadian companies from moving operations to the United States".

The report that is quoted widely by both the opposition parties is not complete in its quotation by the opposition parties. I want to ask the hon. member whose party, the New Democratic Party, the socialist party of Canada, wants to increase taxes on corporations which in doing so would place them in an uncompetitive position with their neighbours, our competitors, not only to the south but internationally. If the hon. member looks at this report, and studies it carefully, he will see that our corporate tax rate is right in line with most other countries of the world. I think the only other country that taxes a much wider spread is Japan. I think Japan is the only one, and Japan has a lower income tax rate as well, but far greater productivity than we have here. It all has to be weighed.

When the hon. member is making his selective reports, why does he not come out and give the government credit where the report gave the government credit, that in fact tax reform has done a good job in making the tax system fairer for corporations? We are realizing $1 billion more in income from corporations. We have cut out a lot of the cute little deals that the Liberals put in the tax act, that you could write off. We have taken those out of there to make the tax system much fairer. Why does the hon. member not stand up and congratulate the government for those moves?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I started off this debate saying that there were things that this government has done. I would not stand here today and say that it was all white or all black. There have been some things, but I will be darned if I will be accused here in this House of saying that I have not given the government credit for some things. I have said that the government has done some things, but not enough.

When the minister talks to me about how the government has reined in the corporations as far as tax liability is concerned. I do not believe him. Canadians do not believe him. It is not fair for him to stand up here day in and day out to continually say: "These people are wrong and they are only right when they agree with us". That is wrong.

The point I am trying to make in this report is this: "PM laughs off attack on taxes". I was here and I saw it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to just mention to you, in the same report that we are talking about, we are talking about corporate taxes.

Mr. McDermid: That is nonsense.

Mr. Edmonston: You raised the subject, as far as corporate taxes are concerned. Let me speak to the Chair because I am just learning and I do not want to be direct to the minister.

Mr. McDermid: You've been here three years. What do you mean you're learning?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, this man says I have been here three years. I thank him for his compliment. I have been here exactly a year and three months.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to your attention that he brought up corporate taxes, I did not. I would like to refer to the same article. It says, and it is not difficult to understand.

Mr. McDermid: Are you quoting from the Sun?

Mr. Edmonston: I am quoting from the Ottawa Sun, Robert Fife, Parliamentary Bureau. As for corporate taxes, the tax load of corporate taxes, the tax load declined to 2.6 per cent of GDP in 1989, compared with 3.4 in 1984.

Mr. McDermid: But we took a lot of the write-offs out.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, whenever you bring up a point—and here you go— that the government does not agree with, it says: "Yes, but", or it will shoot the messenger, or it will say that was the other government, or it will say that minister is no longer here.

This is absolutely unreal. Canadians demand more of us than this. Mr. Speaker, let me ask you if I can do this. I have had my say. I am going to sit down. There is a little bit of time left. I am going to ask this of the people on the other side. We have talked about whose responsibility it is. We all realize that Montreal is in trouble. We all realize that there are some things to do. I am going to sit down right now. The government can have the rest of my time and it can tell me what it is going to do.

Mr. McDermid: I certainly cannot pass up an opportunity like that because we have done a tremendous amount of work, not only for Montreal but for everyone across this country.

Tax reform and the free trade agreement, which the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party have opposed all along, are going to bring benefits to this country for years and years to come. There is no question about it.

As a matter of fact, we have seen examples already where our exports are up in many areas of the economy. This helps the entire area. Montreal has had a tremendously difficult time, and nobody talks about it. Nobody stands up and talks about it.

I think the political atmosphere has had something to do with people making investment decisions in this country. If there is anything we can do in this country, it is to bring our country together in a unified, caring way for one another across this country. I think that will reap benefits for Montreal and the province of Quebec and all regions of this country.

For far too long we have tended in this country to point fingers instead of hold hands. We have been more apt to say goodbye instead of say hello to one another. I think one of the problems that the province of Quebec is experiencing is this political uncertainty.

Mr. Edmonston: It is our fault.

Mr. McDermid: No, it is not. It is all our faults. It is the fault of all Canadians. It is the problem of all Canadians. I do not think we know one another well enough. I think that is probably one of the biggest problems we have in this country. We do not know one another well enough. We in Ontario do not know the westerners well enough; the westerners do not know the Quebecers well enough. It can go right across, from coast to coast. This is a huge country. It is 5,000 miles wide. We have a small population. We do not have the same opportunities that smaller countries have to get to know one another. That is our problem. We have to get to know one another in this country.

I am going to tell you that part of the problem in Montreal is just the political uncertainty. I do not think there is any question about that. I think people making investment decisions and deciding to expand or establish businesses look at those things. I am sure they do. They look for political certainty.

There is a story this morning in The Financial Post of concern in Ontario now about investment decisions. A group has made a statement. I do not know if it is true or not, but its experience has been that people are taking a very close look at what the government in Ontario is doing now for investment decisions because of its political situation. So that comes into it. Nobody talks about that and I cannot understand why.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing an Official Opposition member, I would like to know if the next speaker wants to use his full 20 minutes, or only 10 minutes.

An hon. member: It will be 10 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard has the floor for 10 minutes.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to deal with an issue which is very dear to all of us, and certainly to us Liberals, namely Montreal's economical situation. I particularly want to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, supported by the hon. member for Saint-Denis, for attempting to force this recalcitrant government to recognize the slump my city of Montreal is in.

Our city, Mr. Speaker, is not about to regain its former status of Canadian metropolis, as Brian Mulroney had promised it would in 1984. A close look at its situation brings about this sudden realization. Let me mention a few data: in April 1991, unemployment stood at 13.6 per cent; no other major city in Canada shows such a pitiful record. There were 17.6 per cent unemployed among youths between the age of 20 and 24. Youths are our future. In southwestern Montreal which I represent with my colleague, the unemployment rate stands at 16.2 per cent; 17 per cent of young people drop out of high-school before graduating. The true unemployment figure is close to 30 per cent, 10 000 people, Mr. Speaker, have been victims of mass lay offs as in the case of Coleco, Simmons, Sidbec and VIA Rail. Come to my riding in the southwest of Montreal and you will see all the plants which have closed down. You will be in a position to understand the situation. For each plant which has closed down, there are thousands of employees who have lost their jobs and this puts stress on their families.

Montreal slump, Mr. Speaker, is a national disgrace for which this government must accept a large part of responsibility. It is under his administration that Montreal's economic erosion started.

• (1140)

The causes are obvious: devastating economic policies on the part of the Conservatives; the high level of our dollar, which closed at 87 cents yesterday. That is ridiculous, absolutely absurd and it is killing us! High interest rates. How could we develop industries in Montreal when we are crushed by interest rates 3 percent higher than in the United States? There were no adjustments made after the Free Trade Agreement was signed. This government and this minister had promised adjustment measures to help our industries and our workers who are the big loosers in this deal. What did we get? Absolutely nothing. Training and retraining? What for? It is ineffective, unproductive and redundant. Research and development? Shame on this government for slashing funding to nothing!

Mr. Speaker, this government simply lacks vision for Montreal. It is incapable of delivering the goods. The federal government is running a one man show. There is no coordination, no consultation with the people involved, no agreement with Quebec, no agreement with the city of Montreal. You have just heard the announcement made by the Health Minister concerning the regional development of Quebec. No consultations with the people involved and no intention of harmonizing their involvement. The government has no agenda, no vision and no political will to act. Here is the Conservative track record for you!

Mr. Speaker, Montreal is the driving force of the Quebec economy. Left unattended, the whole province stands to suffer. Fortunately, the slump Montreal is in is not irreversible. It can get out of it. Solutions do exist. The key is an expression of political will on the part of the federal government to work in concert with the city and the province. Unfortunately, the Tories are showing no such will. Brian Mulroney and his government never showed the will to do anything concrete and reasonable. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the Tories do not understand what Montreal needs. It is absolutely appalling that no Cabinet member from Quebec is taking part in this debate. They let a minister from Toronto defend Montreal. That goes to show how unreasonable the Tories are.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. First, it is traditional in this House that we do not talk about the presence or the absence of a minister. Second, the minister was in the House and delivered his speech. He had to leave on government business. He will be coming back. I think it is very unfair of the hon. member to take that kind of a shot at him. He asked to be excused and he will be back. I trust the hon. member will take that as advice.

[Translation]

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate a minister from Toronto who spoke out for Montreal.

[English]

I am quite sure when it comes time to talk about Toronto, the ministers from Montreal will be in this House and will defend Toronto. I am also sure that when we look at what this government does, the Montreal ministers must defend Toronto a great, great deal.

Mr. Speaker, what is the Conservative philosophy? Retire as soon as possible. Act only for political reasons. Forget sustained intervention. Forget consultation, in other words, laissez-faire.

Mr. Speaker, that won't work. So what will? I have a few suggestions. First, we must clearly identify the basic components of new industrial and scientific policies that will help us achieve our objectives. Second, we must provide leadership and the political will to achieve those objectives. How?

First, create an economic co-ordination and development board for the Montreal region: get all economic sectors together; define common objectives.

Second, create a cabinet committee responsible for the economic recovery of Montreal and the region.

Third, encourage the creation in Montreal of a consortium of big and small businesses; pools of risk capital; study and technical services; super-incubators.

Fourth, invest selectively but substantially, with research and development as the local point: develop high-tech niches; strengthen the aeronautics sector; scientific research parks; centres of excellence.

Fifth, ensure that Quebec and Montreal receive their fair share of funding for research and development, not the 13 per cent we are getting now.

Sixth, design manpower training and adjustment programs that consider Montreal's objectives for economic diversity. No more one-man shows by this government, Mr. Speaker!

And finally, leadership and political will are the basic prerequisites of this recovery.

I painted a gloomy picture of the current situation. Unfortunately, it is also an accurate picture. The situation in Montreal is as I described it, but I also want to show there is light at the end of the tunnel.

I just offered the House six proposals, six steps for recovery. The government must act now, it must act quickly and it must act on several levels at once. However, to be effective, the types of action taken must be complementary and not compete with each other. The federal government must demonstrate, through a variety of concrete achievements—we have had enough studies—its political will to give Montreal new hope for the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minutes for questions and comments.

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the hon. member's speech, primarily because he is the first who spoke today to come out with some positive suggestions. Everybody else got up and complained and moaned and groaned.

I am concerned about some of his suggestions, not all of them, and to this end I would like him to comment on them.

He is asking the federal government in many ways here to get extremely involved in one city, to have a cabinet committee, I think one of his suggestions was, for one city in this country. First, if the hon. member really means this, is he saying then that the federal government should become more directly involved in individual communities throughout this country?

Second, should we take a city and designate it the research centre for Canada or the specific area for certain whatever it may be?

How does that coincide with diversifying the economy of the west, for example, or diversifying the economy of the maritimes, and so on?

• (1150)

Is he suggesting that we have a cabinet committee on Halifax, St. John's and so on so that we could get involved in economic development in those cities? I understand his whole theme but I am not sure why he wants to involve the federal government so directly in the goings on of one city.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his interest and I thank him quite honestly as a representative of a city other than Montreal for the interest that he is showing in my city.

As you look at economic development you realize very quickly that it flows from major motors. There are locomotives. This is true in most of our major cities in terms of the hinterland and the periphery that is around.

Montreal is undoubtedly the major economic locomotive for the province of Quebec. As Montreal goes, so goes the province. There is no doubt about that. That is clear in terms of the development of almost any great city in relationship to the surrounding area anywhere in the world.

The sheer absolute number of unemployed in Montreal is greater than in a great number of the other regions of Canada which really do have a specific economic focus.

What I would say to the minister in response to his question is that if what you want to do is develop economic growth, you have to have regional development, you have to focus on the country as a whole and you cannot neglect your major motors.

The multiplier effect from those major motors is such that it is worthy of having a cabinet committee look at it, specifically at Montreal because of its importance in eastern Canada and in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to add my compliments to that expressed by the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization.

The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard, as always, does come out with very concrete suggestions. You can agree with them or not, but at least he does have something to offer.

I would like to ask the minister about the plant closings that he mentioned in his debate, displacing thousands of workers. We have the same thing happening in Toronto and in other parts of Ontario.

The difference between the plant closings today and the plant closings 10 years ago is that the ones which closed then were somehow revived or opened under another industry. Today in Ontario when they close they close permanently.

I would like to ask the member: What is the trend in Montreal and in Quebec? What solutions would he recommend for that?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the comments of my colleague from Parkdale—High Park are very well taken.

Exactly the difference in the plant closings today and the plant closings of 10 years ago is that we are not looking at temporary but permanent job loss.

These companies are either shutting down completely because of the economic policies of the government or they are moving away and going to what they feel are attractive climates.

This is why it is so important and why I put such emphasis in my speech on research and development and on the ability to reinvent our economy. We need this so that when companies close down on Monday there are new companies building their market share, ready to take their place.

What we must do is essentially reinvent the Canadian economy. Montreal and so many other areas are motors because they can be the locus of research and development.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to rise in this House to explain the economic situation in Montreal.

I am particularly concerned with the clothing industry in Montreal, simply because our family business, which is apparel retailing, is closely linked to that industry in Montreal. We have been involved in that business since 1912. It has been a while. Throughout the years, we have met clothing manufacturers from Montreal, but these last few years, we noticed that the industry, once a major industry in Montreal, is going downhill. That is a serious cause of concern for people whose livelihood depends on the clothing industry.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to give you a short history of that industry. At one point, a few years back, Montreal's clothing industry was booming. As the main clothing manufacturer in North America, Montreal was second only to New York City. It was a major industry in this country, and it was flourishing. I remember when Montreal's clothing industry was extremely busy in the mid-50s.

When we think that all across Canada, about 120,000 people used to earn a living working in the clothing industry and 57 per cent of those jobs were in Montreal. And that, Mr. Speaker, does not include another 20,000 people or so who were working at home. There were also some plants in the Beauce area, outside the Quebec region and there was another group in the eastern part of Quebec. So, it meant 90,000 jobs all across Quebec that were directly associated with the clothing industry.

Of course, one of the things that hurt us was the imports. If we take a look at the numbers—and they tend to increase—about 30 per cent of the clothing is imported and, sadly, that percentage is still increasing.

The federal government certainly failed in that area by not protecting the clothing industry, as it failed in many other areas. You know that much has been said about research and development. But what is still more important than that? It is the development of the existing technology and the implementation of the development. Research in that area is not as necessary as in the past.

Another factor that weakens the clothing industry in Montreal is the interest rates. In Montreal, the manufacturers needed to have access to capital, lots of it, in order to maintain their competitiveness. With high interest rates—I am aware of that, because I have been in contact with several organizations, the unions, the Guilds, as we call them, the Dress and Sportwear Manufacturers' Guild—so, they were explaining to me that it was extremely difficult for them to upgrade their equipment because of high interest rates. This is a suggestion that we could make to the federal government, that is to try, with a special program, to help the clothing industry, which is so important to the city of Montreal. If not, we could do as a number of organizations did, like the Canadian Manufacturers's Association, and reduce the interest rates.

However, if it is impossible to do so, we will have to set up a program for the clothing industry because of its importance. In the last year, and in the last months in particular, I was able to note the difficulties faced by the manufacturers in Montreal. Because of the 7 per cent GST they must add to the 8 per cent provincial tax, the clothing retailers whose products were not taxable before must now add 15.5 per cent to the bills they give to their customers. You can see how that has affected the retail sales of clothing in Quebec stores. Consumers found this price increase too hard to absorb and effectively there was a 25 to 30 per cent drop in sales.

Considering all these factors, it is no wonder that the clothing industry had such an important decline. We all know that it used to be a very flourishing industry in Quebec, but we are letting it slip right through our fingers. It is almost criminal to see that we cannot find solutions to the problems encountered by the manufacturers. Yet, they have stated time and time again that they want to meet with the federal and provincial authorities to find a solution for their industry. One must not forget that a great many women were employed in the clothing industry. I must say that, over the years, the average wage in this industry had a fairly normal growth and is now over 9 dollars. It is not much, but there has been over the years a fairly substantial increase.

Another element that concerned the manufacturing sector in Montreal is free trade. From the outset, they were against the free trade agreement, because they saw the difficulties it could bring to their industry. Now, they raise a cry of alarm. When they see that the central government wants to negotiate a free trade agreement with Mexico, knowing that the hourly wage in Mexico is far lower than ours, even ten times lower. In Montreal, they say: "We hardly had time to adjust." It has been very hard for them to adjust to free trade with United States and now we want to plunge them in a free trade with Mexico where the hourly wage is much lower.

So, you can imagine the anxiety prevailing in this sector. What are we asking of the central government? We implore you, this industry is very important to Quebec and to Montreal. You cannot leave this sector, this industry which means a lot to Montreal, at the mercy of free trade with the United States and Mexico. Moreover, interest rates are too high. You must realize that this industry used to be the pillar of the Montreal economy. But if you let it continue to be bloodied by free trade with the United States and Mexico, you will see that we will lose completely an industry that was and still is so important and that can be saved.

So, to wind up, I say to the government: The manufacturing sector in Montreal wants to speak to you, to have the opportunity to express its great concern and to propose alternatives, solutions to save this industry. They speak not only on their behalf but also on behalf of the 90,000 persons who earn their living from an industry which they see disappearing.

So, it cannot be stated more clearly. They want to have the opportunity to speak out and to express their concern.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly interested in the comments of the hon. member for Lasalle-Émard who suggested that Montreal be a high-tech area following along in the aerospace type work that has been done by the takeover by Bombardier of Canadair and the work done on Bill C-22 where we changed the patent law and allowed research and development in pharmaceuticals.

Is it the view of the Liberal Party that we should also be a country of high tariffs where we keep out the manufactured products of other countries, particularly clothing and footwear; that we should be a country where the import of those articles that can clearly be purchased in other countries cheaper be denied our citizens so that they pay higher prices for those articles; and that we allow no trade so our high technology cannot be sold in those other countries?

I was wondering if he could square the economic philosophy of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is making reference to the fact that we import 30 per cent, I never suggested that we should have additional tariffs. All I am saying is that the clothing manufacturing industry in Montreal was extremely important and there is no reason why we have to leave this industry open to the wind and allow it to disappear on us because of either free trade or high interest rates.

Montreal, with regard to the high tech and pharmaceuticals industries—obviously everybody promotes high tech in Montreal or elsewhere, but it does not mean we have to sacrifice a domain where we were once the champions.

All we are saying is if we had decent interest rates, if there was a reasonable amount of dialogue with these people to find alternatives so that they could modernize, we could compete with these imports. However, we seem to have shackled them with high interest rates and all kinds of disadvantages so they are having difficulty competing with the imports. These are artificial difficulties that the government has put on their backs.

We are not trying to trade off high tech for the clothing industry. It was a viable industry, we had the expertise and it was very labour-intensive, especially for women. Why should we sacrifice it when we do not have to? All they need is a little bit of dialogue and understanding and we can balance both of them easily.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, briefly.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned the free trade debate. Throughout that debate, I sat on the parliamentary committee studying the agreement. Each and every association representing the clothing and textile industries which came forward said they were against the free trade deal. They also said if the agreement was deemed necessary, we had to have adjustment programs. Now then, the prime minister promised adjustment programs for those grand industries, as recommended by the de Grandpré Commission, the Macdonald Commission and the Economic Council of Canada.

Since the hon. member knows the textile and clothing industries pretty well, can he tell us what adjustment programs have been planned for those industries affected by the Free Trade Agreement. I am not as familiar with those industries as the hon. member is.

Mr. Assad: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. I could quote the president of the Quebec division of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, Mr. Raymond LeHir, with whom I had a number of conversations, as well as with Mr. Dubuc, the president of the Parity Committee, and with all the people connected with the garment industry. They were very surprised to see there were no support programs, no retraining programs, no programs at all to help the garment industry in Montreal. They told me these programs were non-existent. What is going on here? The Prime Minister and some of his ministers announced a number of programs, but unfortunately, there are none and that is what has us puzzled. Who is telling the truth here?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back briefly to some comments that were made by the hon. member for LaSalle—Emard, when he mentioned that Montreal was the industrial centre of Quebec, and that if Montreal was doing well, industrially speaking, if there was industrial development in Montreal, it was the whole province which was benefitting, and that if Montreal was not developing, it was the province that was hurting.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments as a way of explanation in order to tell him that I do not agree entirely with that. I would like that the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard recognize that when there is development in the Quebec regions, whether in the field of natural resources or the development of primary industries, for example, the major aluminum projects in Becancour, Deschambault, Baie Comeau or Sept Îles, my hon. colleague should recognize that the engineering firms in Montreal are doing work on those sites. Lavallin and SNC are there. There are also manufacturing industries from the Montreal region which build industrial equipment that go into these new plants. If the forest industry is doing well in Abitibi, in Lac Saint Jean and on the North Shore, again, Mr. Speaker, it is the parts manufacturers, the equipment manufacturers of the Montreal region that benefit from it.

So I would like my colleagues from Montreal to admit that when the federal government takes part in the economic diversification of Quebec regions, Montreal also benefits from it. We should not think that because some Montreal areas are in trouble, the situation is catastrophic in the rest of the province.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I would like to underline that, in his speech, my friend the minister responsible for Montreal Island has described fully the federal government's initiatives in the Montreal region. We could conclude from his comments that this great metropolis is evolving, like other urban centers all over the world, and is about to take a new direction which will allow it to live a new age of prosperity. In fact, we intended pursuing the actions already undertaken to that end, particularly in matters of industrial development.

Historically, industrial development has always been the cornerstone of Montreal's economic prosperity. We just have to remember the many big companies located near Montreal's docks or the other main cross roads of the time. With the evolving means of communication, Montreal's industrial base has had to adapt and we saw the rise of new industries, with a bigger technological content.

While more efficient companies were created in new industrial areas, the more traditional industry also needed attention, in order to cope with international competition.

These are indicative of the two main thrusts of the federal government action to support and revitalize the industry in Montreal: first, rely heavily on the strengths of the Montreal economy and, second, help more traditional businesses still providing many jobs, to update and reinforce the expertise acquired over the past few decades.

When I am through, hon. members of this House will realize that the opposition motion disregards an entire set of measures that have been implemented by the government I have the honour to be a member of. As you all know, the Montreal economy is remarkably complex. Nonetheless, this government has managed to sucessfully implement a plan of action in which industrial development plays a major part.

The federal government's strategy is, first, to develop high technology sectors in Montreal, particularly in the following three industries: aeronautics/aerospace, electronics/telecommunications and pharmaceutical industry.

One of the main projects the federal government has carried out in these sectors in years is certainly the establishment of the Canadian Space Agency in the Montreal area. This decision unanimously added a major change in direction to strengthen and give a new start to this industry destined for a great future. Through its activities, the Space Agency has helped strenghen industries in related sectors and, above all, create new businesses attracted by the Space Agency. Furthermore, thanks to its research programs, the Space Agency has helped develop new industries in advanced sectors such as composite materials.

In fact, all parties with a stake in Montreal's economic future agree that the aeronautics industry is one of the city's major strengths. The federal government, through targeted support, has helped to ensure a bright future for this outstanding member of Montreal's industry.

The decision to privatize Canadair gave the internationally known company a second lease on life, as reflected in the recent success of the Challenger. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that not long ago, the Prime Minister helped launch the regional jet, which has caught the interest of a number of airlines, despite an economic climate that is not very conducive to investment.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government has provided significant support for research and development by all large companies in the Montreal region. Federal assistance has on untold occasions been instrumental in developing new products by companies that include Pratt & Whitney, Canadair, Spar Aerospace and Héroux. Thanks to federal support, these companies have been able to compete on world markets. The recent launching by Spar of a communications satellite is an eloquent case in point.

In electronics and telecommunications, many large companies have received federal support to develop new products and thus acquire a substantial share of the North American market. You will recall that Paramax in Montreal won the contract for all the electronics for the frigates, thus generating a significant subcontracting potential for a number of firms located in the Montreal region.

[English]

Moreover, it is important to stress the importance of the decision to privatize Teleglobe Canada for the development of a new leadership by the private sector in the field of satellite communications.

I would now like to talk about a sector that our government, by way of a courageous decision, has helped revitalize. All the members will remember that the pharmaceutical industry was once a major industry in the Montreal area. Indeed, one only had to drive along the TransCanada highway, between the Decarie expressway and Vaudreuil, to see the numerous pharmaceutical companies along this important stretch of highway.

The members of the House have often heard debates and speeches emphasizing the importance of putting a stop to the stagnation of that industry, a process which has started in the early 80's. The pharmaceutical companies had drastically reduced their investments in research and development because the results of their basic research were no longer protected.

The changes that we made to the Patent Act enabled us to completely reverse the situation. Indeed, without government aid of any kind, several big companies decided to invest in R&D, as well as to expand their research centers in Montreal, among others Merck Frosst, and Nordic laboratories.

Even though the Montreal region experiences problems that essentially arise out of certain economic conditions, that city possesses nevertheless many of the characteristics of a winner. The cities that attract businesses and companies all have something in common. In each of them the political and business leaders have cooperated to create a favourable environment for development. The leadership shown by the private sector is also particularly noticeable in those cities. By the way, the federal government supported a private sector initiative by helping with the establishment of a high technology park in the Montreal region. The interested firms will thus be able to concentrate their resources in an environment conducive to this high level activity.

The technology park will, in fact, act as a catalyst to improve liaison between universities, government research centres and business. This linkage between universities and business will have top priority in industrial sectors that the world over are the foundation of a flourishing industry: aeronautics, biotechnology, microelectronics and informatics.

Although federal support has tended to concentrate on the most advanced and most promising sectors, we have also included other industries that have always played an important role in to Montreal. For instance, the transportation equipment industry registered major investments in recent years that would have been impossible without direct government intervention. A recent announcement that Dowty would invest $90 million to manufacture landing gears has further consolidated Montreal's position as a major centre for aeronautics. In the automobile industry, Montupet has now located in the Montreal region to manufacture automobile parts, while 3,000 jobs were saved at Ste-Thérèse thanks to federal intervention. Without our support, the GM plant at Ste-Thérèse would now probably be a thing of the past.

I would now like consider another aspect of our integrated program for supporting industrial development in Montreal. As I said earlier, the Montreal area has always had a very diversified industrial structure, whose sectors have had their ups and downs, owing to various factors. With increased international competition has come the need to adjust to a new game plan. The free trade agreement has made it very important to help businesses update their plant, to be able to face the competition.

Bearing this in mind, our government designed a program that was tailored to meet the new challenge of a global market. The Manufacturing Productivity Improvement Program, which was an instant success, has now been in place for two and a half years. To be eligible for this program, businesses must meet very strict criteria. Nevertheless, the results have been most impressive. The program has received 250 applications for assistance, and sixty businesses have been able to benefit from government assistance, thanks to contributions totalling $14 million.

Similarly, it seemed important to us to get small businesses into new product lines. Just a few months ago, the minister responsible for Economic and Regional Development announced the creation of an innovation assistance program with a $3 million enveloppe. This program is only six months old, but over 30 requests have already been received and over half a million dollars in contributions. It is indeed off to a good start.

I would like, in closing, to mention two initiatives we are particularly proud of, which were very well received by the communities concerned. Over the years, some industries congregated in specific areas of Montreal had been deteriorating gradually. This was particularly true of eastern and southwestern Montreal. To overcome that situation, the Canadian government agreed to implement two programs suited to the needs of these disadvantaged areas.

In February 1988, minister Robert de Cotret announced the implementation of the Industrial Recovery Program for East Montreal (IRPEM). With a $35 million budget, this program resulted from the Picard report and the work of the Committee for the Economic Recovery and Revitalization of Employment in East-End Montreal. The IRPEM is designed to strenghten the local industrial structure, encourage the industrial diversification of that area and foster the establishment and development of new businesses, particularly small- and medium-sized businesses. The latest statistics show that the minister responsible for implementing this program had received 326 requests and that over $28 million had been spent to support recovery in this area of Montreal.

In May 1990, my colleague, minister Benoît Bouchard, announced a similar program for the south-western part of Montreal, the IRPSWM.

This program is intended to provide assistance for the design and construction of new facilities as well as for the extension and modernization of existing facilities. This all new program has already resulted in investments of almost $9 million.

A close look at federal government actions reveal that due to its flexibility our strategy fits the various capabilities offered by greater Montreal that were identified in the Picard report. This flexibility is particularly obvious in the case of industrial development, where we have put in place programs on a needs basis. In fact, that is the strategy we intend to follow in the months to come because we are convinced it is the best way to develop Montreal's potential while allowing the private sector to participate fully.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that regional development is crucial for the province of Quebec and for Canada. There is no doubt either that the entrepreneurial skills of Quebecers have their roots in the Beauce area, in Lac Saint-Jean, in the Eastern townships and in the Abitibi. That is why I absolutely cannot understand the fact that this government is abandoning the Gaspé and the Northshore regions. I cannot understand, for instance, his reluctance to push for flow-through shares, which are so important for the mining industry.

That being said, one must recognize that when the unemployment rate exceeds 15 per cent, as is the case in Montreal, you have a number of unemployed workers that far exceeds that of many regions of Canada. Montreal is the heart of the economy in Quebec. My question is this: Does the hon. member, the parliamentary secretary, think that Quebec, as a province, can possibly win if Montreal loses?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to answer the question asked by my honourable colleague from LaSalle—Émard. It is obvious that if the industrial structure of Montreal becomes more diversified, if the federal, provincial and municipal levels of government work together to attract new industries in Montreal, namely high technology industries which create new jobs, and if development and support programs can help reinforce existing industries, it is obvious that the economy of Montreal will contribute, and I think we agree on that, to the economy of Quebec as a province. But I want the hon. member to know that I find it very difficult to let someone claim that Montreal is the only place that counts in Quebec. The hon. member should look at the reality. The regions contribute to the development of Montreal in the same way that Montreal can provide expertise and specialized services for the development of the regions.

My honourable colleague claims that the federal government, that is the Progressive Conservative Party, has abandoned the Northshore and Gaspé regions in Quebec, but I would like to remind him that, since 1984, there have been more industrial investments on the Northshore, from Tadoussac to Havre-Saint-Pierre, then in the 25 years previous to that. Indeed, Reynolds, Quebec and Ontario Paper in Baie-Comeau, as well as Alouette in Sept-Îles, have all benefited from federal investments. Moreover, other investments in the private sector will also be announced shortly, thanks to the direct intervention of the federal government, through his regional development programs.

As regard the Gaspésie, some of our colleagues were in Gaspé last week to announce three important initiatives that will enable the Gaspé peninsula to benefit from industrial development as well as economic diversification based on initiatives taken by local people and entrepreneurs. Mr. Speaker, that is what we call a sound intervention in the field of regional development, and our government has been acting in that fashion since 1984, in Montreal as well as in the regions of Quebec.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I have had the pleasure to sit with my hon. friend on The Province of Quebec Chamber of Commerce. At the time, it seemed to me that the performance of a governement could be judged by its results. Well, the results that we can see in Quebec now are not very glorious for the party in office. In Montreal, the unemployment rate is 15 per cent. In Quebec remote areas, it can go up to 20 per cent, not taking into account the people who outlast their unemployment benefit period and are now on welfare.

I remember, a few years back, when I was working pretty hard to get the Space Agency on the South Shore. We got the Space Agency, we were proud and boastful, and we kept repeating: "Now, we have the Space Agency." Time has gone by, but the Space Agency is not yet built. There might be a hundred employees in Montreal. At the same time, we launched the centres of excellence, and the University of Calgary obtained the contract for space research, while the Prime Minister said that aerospace research and development would take place in Montreal. We realize today that Pratt and Whitney has put nearly 1000 employees on unemployment.

Imagine, we boasted because we got the Space Agency, and I was so proud at the time. But there was no serious basis to all that. This plan to develop aerospace in the Montreal area, it was old rubbish. We realize today that approximatly 800 aerospace jobs have disappeared in the Montreal region, and that is counting only those at Pratt and Whitney, and the Space Agency.

The hon. member who has just delivered his speech is boasting about the help that the federal government has given Quebec. The fact is the federal government simply helps us pay for welfare and unemployment. It certainly is of no assistance to us in terms of economic development.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I was expecting a question from the hon. member from the South Shore of Montreal, with whom, of course, as he pointed out, I had the pleasure to be involved for some years in the activities of the Chambre de Commerce du Québec. It is obviously with great pleasure that I met him again in this House in 1988. I must say that the circumstances have changed and I am a little sorry to see him on the other side of the House. I think that the hon. member was doing an excellent job for his region and his riding when he was a member of the Conservative caucus, when he was on this side of the House. He decided to join the other side, sadly, to the detriment of his riding.

I should tell him, Mr. Speaker, and I think the facts speak for themselves, that the numbers I quoted earlier in my speech and the ministers, Mr. Corbeil and Mr. Bouchard quoted in theirs, show that the Conservative government is concerned with the development, not only of the Quebec regions, but also of the metropolitan area of Montreal. I would like to assure my colleague from the South Shore riding of Montreal that the Quebec caucus follows very closely the actions taken by the government for the economic development of Montreal, and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. member for Manicouagan who praised the government for what it has done in the last few years, and who quoted several figures. However, there are figures he forgot to mention. In this regard, I would like to point out to him that this debate, today, is about the unemployed in Montreal. I congratulate him for talking about all the jobs created outside of Montreal, but this is not today's subject. The question I would like to put to him is this: Given the fact that he seems to be provided with a lot of figures, could the hon. member for Manicouagan tell us what the figures are for the unemployed in Montreal and in the rest of the province of Quebec? Also, what is the number of welfare recipients in Montreal and in the remaining of Quebec, as these people are certainly unemployed?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, my colleague knows very well that those figures are public. Unfortunately, since I do not have them on hand today, it is impossible for me to be specific.

But, I can tell him that, for years, people from all regions of Quebec, in particular from the Gaspé Peninsula and the lower St. Lawrence region, came to Montreal because their was work to be found in the city. Is it so difficult to now leave Montreal for those Quebec regions where there is work to be found? I think that Quebecers, both men and women, are mobile and are able to adapt to changing situations. The fact of the matter is that there is development, there is construction with new jobs on the North Shore, in the Abitibi, in Saguenay–Lac–Saint–Jean and in the Center of Quebec, and that those jobs are available to all citizens, Mr. Speaker.

Of course, I encourage Montrealers who are in search of a new job, to take advantage of the training programs offered by the Department of Employment and Immigration to gain access to these new job opportunities.

So, Mr. Speaker, the economic development in Quebec will encompass the whole province. Some regions may have problems. The North Shore, which I represent, had tremendous difficulties at the end of the seventies and into the eighties. People had to leave their homes to find work somewhere else, but now, they are coming back, and I am very happy about it.

Mr. Speaker, that is the story on workforce mobility.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate with the hon. member for Saint–Laurent—Cartierville.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint–Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my colleague for Manicouagan to what jobs he is referring?

I rise today to spotlight the poor state of the Montreal region. This sad situation is due in good part to initiatives like the GST, as well as to a lack of initiatives like job creation, which was promised by the Conservative Government.

In Quebec, nearly 5,000 companies and 14,000 individuals have been forced into bankruptcy in 1990. Most of these cases were in Montreal. The level of unemployment is more than 14 per cent in Montreal and rises to 25 per cent east of Montreal; there are also those on welfare. The unemployment rate does not seem to be getting any lower. All those jobs could be lost forever.

Plants closings, commercial and personal bankruptcies, relocations do not bode well for the future. All these Quebecers who suddenly lose their jobs and are without hope of getting them back must rely on the unemployment insurance for their rent. How many of them will be forced to go on welfare?

According to action unemployed, the cuts and changes made to the unemployment insurance program have really hurt. In Quebec city, the situation is all the more serious since it is a region where employment is seasonal. Many peoples have to had to go on the dole, following the changes introduced by Bill C–21.

And what about immigrants? When a company must cut jobs, the first to go are very often the last ones hired, and most of the time, they are immigrants. Some welcome!

Mr. Speaker, Montreal has enormous potential but this government and its irresponsible department seem determined to check its development.

The GST is but one initiative affecting everyone and reducing consumer spending. When sales are down, so is spending and employees must be laid off. As a result, unemployment is sky high and welfare offices are sending an increasing number of cheques.

Montreal already has 14 per cent of its population who depend on welfare to survive and there seems to be no economic recovery in sight.

Food banks find it more and more difficult to help soup kitchens. Demand is rising instead of diminishing, it seems. It is not healthy to start the day on an empty stomach.

As for children, they cannot be expected to learn and retain what they are taught in school if they do not eat properly. That is not how they can be able to develop their potential and be alert.

• (1240)

[English]

I would like to cite a few facts on welfare and UIC in Montreal to give a better perspective to this problem.

Between March 1990 and March 1991, 65,400 jobs were lost, of which 17,500 were in the clothing industry, and 14,300 were in hotels and restaurant service industries.

The maximum amount of benefits a person could receive from UI was $480 a week. The welfare benefit being paid to a single person willing to participate in special government make-work programs is $587 per month and $486 per month if they are not willing to participate in these programs.

With this type of revenue, it is a miracle that anyone can survive in our society.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a society which cannot meet the basic needs of its citizens, making them completely dependent on the State, not by choice but out of necessity, is a society doomed to face a depression.

It is difficult to be optimistic, to create attainable dreams, to give growing children a vision of a better future when, as parents, the daily worries are as real as the rent payment which often takes more than 50 per cent of their meager income. How is it possible to give children nourishing meals and proper clothing when work becomes more and more scarce and is often limited to short periods?

Mr. Speaker, Montreal was, not so long ago, a major city where life was good. Today it holds the national record for bank robberies. It has a waiting list of 22,000 families who want low rental housing and 40 per cent of its people would need this type of housing.

[English]

When the federal government, which through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation was the main builder of subsidized housing in Canada, dropped its rental renovation program two years ago and in its recent budget announced cuts to social housing, it did nothing to remedy the situation.

The country is in crisis and Montreal seems to be going downhill at a very rapid rate. Without basic security like housing and food, how can people be expected to be in top shape, ready to learn new skills, on minimum revenues given by UIC, that could be out of date by the time the courses are finished.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is the early 90s and the future does look kind of gloomy for the Montreal residents. Crime and violence are on the rise, the cost of living is becoming more and more prohibitive for too many families, low-cost housing is rare and jobs are obsolete.

Since coming into office, this government has done nothing but overtax people, and they still do not understand why people cannot make ends meet!

Mr. Speaker, this government has no consideration whatsoever for the wellfare of Canadian men and women, who will take the opportunity, at the next election, to remind them of their existence.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I have to remind the House that when I put questions to the minister responsible for the Montreal area, he answers by wondering how I can be so bold as to mention these issues That is on record, it is published in Hansard. As far as I am concerned, that is unacceptable, and a government which is so bold as to keep a minister who gives little hope to the Montreal residents and does not care about them, does not deserve to govern this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. Five minutes.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the Progressive Conservative Party says they play a major role, but what the hon. member was mentioning a few moments ago are just a few projects he was blowing up out of proportion to show the people of Quebec that he was dealing with regional economic development, that he was dealing with the economy of Quebec. About two years ago, when I was a member of the Progressive Conservative Party, it was the party that was the most critical of the interest rates increase, and I recall very well—and that is on the record—that when

Mr. Crow, appearing before the Committee of Finance, told us that it was absolutely necessary to increase interest rates to curb inflation, I replied to him that he was doing everything to create a recession. I was right to tell Mr. Crow that he was creating one. I was also right to tell Mr. Wilson, who was then the Minister of Finance, that he too was creating a recession, and that he was doing everything to create one.

You know, I have been in business for more than 15 years. I know how difficult it is, particularly in Quebec, for small businesses, for men and women who have worked hard for five, ten, fifteen years, and for ten, twelve or fifteen hours a day, at building a business, to see the government decide out of capriciousness to increase interest rates and thus slow down the economic growth, which has been badly managed for the last decade. Bankruptcies are thus in fact created. I do not have the exact figure in mind, but we know there are bankruptcies in numbers large enough to realize how bad the situation is now, particularly in Montreal. The blame lies with this government which does not know how to manage economic growth. It is not by giving money, from time to time to this or that businesss, to show that you are doing something, that you control the economic system while having a stable economic system, a reasonable growth. That is not what has been done during the last few years. So, it is a shame to see these people who worked so hard be penniless again and without a job. These are entrepreneurs who had built firms and are now jobless. It's not only them, but all their employees who find themselves unemployed.

You know, with regard to the social problem the hon. member for Saint-Laurent spoke about a moment ago, it's a shame to see this large number of unemployed, these people who lose their jobs. When these people end up without a job, the spouse often says: "You're no good, you can't find a job, what's wrong with you?" Then the two start arguing and end up getting divorced. Then there is a problem with the children, with the families. It's a terrible social problem and we must be aware of it. It seems that this government is not aware of it. It is breaking up families and destroying the whole society and it will take 10 to 15 years to correct. That is where the misfortune of Montreal lies presently, there is a lot of unemployment and many people on social welfare.

The hon. member for Saint-Laurent is right when she says that crimes are rising in Montreal and that there is a terrible social disorder emerging. Yet, they want us to believe that they have helped Montreal economically. I was just telling the Conservative member: One judges businesses, and actually one talks about government; businesses are judged on results, not on what is perceived as being right or wrong; they are judged on results. Yet, results are that in Montreal the level of unemployment reaches 15 per cent and there are almost as many people on social welfare; in areas such as Lac-Saint-Jean and Gaspésie, unemployment reaches 17 per cent and even 20 per cent. It's appalling!

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part in this opposition day debate on the motion proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. I would like to read the motion before commenting on it, because what it says is important.

> That this House condemns the government for having abandoned the population of Montreal through its obvious lack of political will to provide jobs and economic opportunities to the people of this region.

Mr. Speaker, we have all accepted voluntarily to take ten minutes to speak to this question because we believe, as liberal members representing the region of Montreal, that it is very important. I have three points to make. When I say we have to give the opportunity to the people of Montreal to create jobs, to find jobs, I am not saying that the government should intervene everywhere. But, as politicians, we have the duty to create opportunities. As for the monetary policy, everybody agrees, in Quebec particularly, that this government's monetary policy is an incredible economic disaster. We cannot have a free-trade agreement with the United States and let our dollar go up while we implement this agreement. Because we automatically lose all the advantages that we had. Canada gave itself a social structure and priorized it and the human values going with it compared to the american economy having a totally different structure. By letting our dollar go up, we lose the little competitive edge that we had.

What is worse is that we have seen this government, through the Governor of the Bank of Canada, increase each week the interest rates and make the situation unbearable. We have then a high dollar and high interest rates. Mr. Speaker, we know that every company has a line of credit today. If interest rates go up, interest charges take up a larger portion of the operating budget.

Those are major policies which were disastrous for the economy, and that was a choice, Mr. Speaker. It was not due to international circumstances. The recession we are presently going through in Canada is a Canadian-made recession, triggered by the economic policies of this government. That is what we want to say in our motion today. The words are very clear. They relate specifically to the political will to provide jobs and economic opportunities for the people of that region. And then, how many times did the Quebec government, the Conseil du patronat, all the social and economic interest groups of the Montreal region and the whole province of Quebec say: "We call on the Conservative government in Ottawa to stop its high interest rates and high Canadian dollar policies because they are disastrous for our economy. We are not competitive on the American market"? During the electoral campaign in 1988, the Conservatives led everyone to believe that their policy would aim for a stable economic situation. We must admit that Quebec subscribed to that theory. It is the province of Quebec, especially Montreal, that pays the price for this same free trade policy, a policy that was not followed by an adequate monetary policy aimed at responding to the impact of the Free Trade Agreement.

When we say that this government has no policy, the evidence is there. One does not need to be a genius or some expert in economic or international affairs to see it. A dollar too high, plus high interest rates—

An hon. member: The high interest rates of 1982.

Mr. Gagliano: The hon. member mentioned the interest rates in 1982, and he is right, but we should compare to the situation in the United States and in Europe. At that time it was an international situation, while in 1990 and 1991 the high interest rates were made in Ottawa, the situation was created by the government. So, we have to compare with the rest of the world.

When interest rates are high in Canada, but high also in the United States, we are competitive, as problems are the same on both sides of the border. However, when we create our own problems— Here, Mr. Speaker, I just woke up the Conservatives. That's it, I woke them up.

An hon. member: They are shocked by the truth.

Mr. Gagliano: No doubt about it. What I was saying when my friend interrupted is that we had high interest rates, a high dollar and, on top of that, Mr. Speaker, the famous GST. This government said that it had to slow down the economy, that Canadians were spending too much and that was creating inflation. To that end it raised the interest rates, to prevent Canadians from spending. Then there was the new tax on goods and services applied to everything.

When we talk about inflation, we should not forget the taxes. Everything we pay to governments are taxes, whether they are federal taxes, provincial taxes, municipal taxes, school taxes, building permits, licence plates, etc. If we add all these taxes—and they keep increasing—we see what is responsible for the rise in inflation.

On the one hand, the government tried to control inflation with the interest rates, but on the other, it imposed the GST. Now we see the result. The inflation rate rose from 4 to 6 per cent. So, this government does not know exactly what it is doing. On the one hand, it says that it wants to reduce inflation, but on the other, it increases taxes.

Mr. Speaker, these words are not mine. The government members will deny it. This morning, I heard the minister responsible for the Montreal area say that the Liberals were to blame, after seven years of conservative rule.

But Mr. Speaker, these words are not mine. Let me quote from an article I read:

[English]

"One in four Montrealers lives in poverty, starving. City population getting older and poorer, Health department finds. Montreal's population is growing older and poorer and one in four of the city's residents is below the poverty line." It is not new, says The Gazette on April 18, 1990.

[Translation]

Poverty is gaining ground in the Montreal region: 615,000 people live in poor families, and 50 per cent of these are in Montreal, in the metropolitan area. As for the recession in Quebec: the situation will be worse than expected. It's Quebec and Montreal again, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday, we heard about an important study on taxes.

[English]

"Tax up $1,530 a year during Tory rule."

Because of this government's policies since 1984, a family today pays $1,530 more in taxes than it did in 1984.

In 1984, the Conservatives were in power, not the Liberals. So if they want to blame someone, they should start with themselves, especially considering that from month to month, they have remained steady at 14 per cent in the polls because people have finally understood.

More news: a 70 per cent increase in bankruptcies in April; in Quebec, 2,097 bankruptcies were filed in April 1991, 72 per cent more than April last year.

Earlier, I heard the parliamentary secretary talking about government policies, and he said that everything was fine. If everything is fine, why does Montreal have an unemployment rate of 15 per cent and up? Why are there so many bankruptcies? Why is one Montrealer out of four living under the poverty line? Look at the economic policies the leader of the Tory government, Brian Mulroney, announced at Place Ville-Marie in 1984—happiness for everyone—and look at where we are now.

I see you are signalling that my time is up. Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time allowed the hon. member for Saint-Léonard has now expired.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

The House took recess at 1.00 p.m.

1991 CENSUS

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, today is census day in Canada, the day for all Canadians to stand up and be counted by 38,000 census representatives whom the federal government has hired and equipped at a cost of $9.24 per Canadian.

Canadian census representatives will be counting us with 38,000 freshly sharpened pencils taken from their 38,000 census satchels adorned with the Canadian census logo.

That is right, the Canadian government is spending $253 million to conduct the census, while equipping the census takers with pencils manufactured in Turkey and satchels manufactured in China.

Surely, if the government is going to count Canadians at a cost of $23.98 per household, it could do it with 38,000 pencils that were made in Canada and 38,000 satchels that were made in Canada, providing jobs for Canadians.

The Canadian census is made in Canada, so should the equipment.

NATIONAL ENVIRONMENT WEEK

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, this is our twentieth National Environment Week. Environment Canada's Green Plan has a budget of $3 billion and urges Canadians to play a role, both individually and as a group, in cleaning up and protecting their environment. Some of the Green Plan's initiatives have already started across this country. The Canadian government has announced programs to clean up the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence. Canadians are working on action plans for cleaning up eleven critical areas in ports and coastal areas on the Atlantic.

Furthermore, an unprecedented air quality agreement was signed with the United States to deal with the problem of acid rain and other types of trans-border air pollution.

Mr. Speaker, this summer, new programs for the environment, backed by funding of over $1 billion, will be introduced in Canada.

[English]

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, on March 31, the federal-provincial forest agreement between Nova Scotia and the federal government expired. Both governments have been dragging their feet and have not yet renewed the agreement. Done properly, these agreements can be used to develop forest management initiatives involving forest research and wood lot management.

The forest minister told the forestry committee on March 25 that he had the funds identified for a "generous and ambitious" agreement.

Concerns have also been expressed that a new agreement must be signed for longer than the previous two-year bridging period. The government should get on with it and sign an agreement immediately.

LESTER B. PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, in last week's debate over Bill C-5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act, discussion about Lester B. Pearson International Airport and the effects on surrounding communities was once again front and centre.

My constituents and I appreciate the co-operation that is being shown by all sides of the House in encouraging the speedy passage of this legislation.

However, my constituents and I wish to make clear certain misconceptions that were presented by the opposition.

Residents who live in the communities surrounding the airport are being presented as airport haters unable to tolerate disturbance of any kind. At best this is an oversimplification of the position my constituents have about Pearson. At worst the proliferation of this misconception means we jeopardize our ability to work toward a rewarding partnership between the airport and its surrounding communities.

My constituents wish it to be known that they appreciate the benefits the airport can provide and that, as long as the airport plays fair and accepts its responsibility toward the community, they will work with the airport to foster a productive and equally beneficial relationship.

JUSTICE

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, last week a very sad incident occurred in Winnipeg. We watched on national news as a young Indian man asked for justice and understanding from the Canadian people and their governments on Winnipeg's radio airwaves.

Mr. Cameron Kerley Antoine was sent out of the province of Manitoba as a young child to the United States where he was adopted by a non-Indian bachelor. He was beaten and sexually abused by his adoptive father for years until he killed him. Originally sentenced to 15 years to life, this sentence was reduced in 1986 to 20 years on compassionate grounds by the Governor of Kansas.

Now serving his sentence in Canada, Mr. Kerley Antoine deserves compassion from the Canadian government.

I urge the government to review his incarceration in light of his own victimization, in light of some previous acquittals of victims of spousal violence who killed their spouses, and in light of the years he has already served in prison.

TAXATION

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, this House, and the media were filled yesterday with charges that the Conservative government had increased middle-class taxes dramatically.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is essentially right, but as the author of the report stated on The Journal last night, if the Conservatives had not inherited a huge debt, right now the government would have a multi-billion dollar surplus.

However, while high taxes may be understandable, governments at all levels could be doing a better job in treating taxpayers. There ought to be more co-operation between various levels of governments so overlap and duplication are eliminated, so we can work toward the integration of local, provincial and federal taxes, so tax forms can be simplified, so taxpayers can see exactly how much taxes they pay and so that we can put an end to hidden taxes.

I hope the Economic Council of Canada can explore these areas as it conducts the Prime Minister's study on competitiveness. I hope we can achieve what is really needed, a total reform of the tax system.

HEALTH CARE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, as the dust from this government's budget of last February begins to settle, the ramifications of the government's lack of commitment to education and health are beginning to be felt by Canadians from coast to coast.

According to the president of the Canadian Medical Association, Dr. Lavoie, Canada's medicare system will be in ruins within the next 10 years if this government continues its present policies.

In my province of Prince Edward Island, the $2.3 billion cut in provincial transfer payments is now affecting the ability of the province and the hospitals themselves to maintain their health care services.

Queen Elizabeth Hospital will be closing 25 per cent of its beds for the month of July and 22 beds for the rest of the year. Our other main hospital, Prince County, will be closing almost 10 per cent of its beds for the rest of the year.

The other hospitals in my province are being affected as well.

I urge the federal government to recognize how the policies are hurting Canadians and to rectify the damage it has done to our health care system.

S. O. 31

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, how are we going to resolve the fundamental conflict that haunts our country, a conflict between two very different visions of Canada: the equality of all versus the distinct society?

In 1867 we found the answer by adopting a federal rather than a unitary system of government. In 1991 we may find the answer by giving every province exclusive jurisdiction over language, culture and communications. Language rights would be attached to places and not to people. This would give Quebec full control over matters it considers essential for its survival. It would also give the nine other provinces the right to have unilingual traffic tickets or cereal boxes if they wished. That could substantially reduce the support for Quebec independence and allow other differences to be settled by common sense rather than by emotion.

CHINA

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, Amnesty International's detailed report today begins: "Nearly two years after the suppression of peaceful pro-democracy protests, which resulted in the massacre of hundreds of civilians in Beijing on June 4, 1989, human rights violations continue to be widespread in China".

China refuses to answer inquiries by Amnesty or by members of this Parliament, arguing that human rights are internal matters only.

Nevertheless, since China shares international trade and credit and responsibility for the U.S. led UN invasion of Iraq, China cannot ignore the UN declaration of human rights. Although it upholds the right to work and fair pay, to health care and to education, it must also uphold the rights to life, liberty and security of person, to freedom of peaceful assembly, and to being presumed innocent until proved guilty in a lawful public trial.

NATIONAL ENVIRONMENT WEEK

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, as we begin Environment Week in Canada, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the most important anniversary we will be celebrating this time next year, namely the 20th anniversary of the Stockhom Conference on the Environment. At that time, heads of state will have gathered in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, for the June 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development.

Mr. Speaker, we are proud of the spirit of consultation Canada has displayed on the international scene. We recognize the need for Canada and the other industrialized nations to help developing countries meet their needs for sustainable growth.

All Canadians will benefit from Canada achieving its goals and contributing to setting a new course worldwide. So, they can start by setting an example at home. During Environment Week, I encourage everyone to make a special effort to preserve and clean up the environment. Let us all be active partners in this nation-wide endeavour. The future of Canada depends on it!

CANADA POST

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the people of Scoudouc, in my riding of Beauséjour, have just sustained a loss they would rather have been spared. The fact is that Canada Post has decided to close their post office. This decision came as a surprise to everyone.

In the letter announcing the closure, Canada Post refers to communications between municipal authorities. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that had the corporation been in touch with the president of the local service district of Scoudouc and myself, there would still be a post office in Scoudouc.

The post office played a major role in the economy of this community. All the businesses established in the industrial park as well as the people of Scoudouc use this local service and they want to keep on using it. So, I urge Canada Post to reconsider and to keep the very busy post office of Scoudouc open.

AMHERST AEROSPACE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the volunteer members of the community transitional board for Amherst Aerospace who are working diligently and tirelessly in the interests of securing a lasting future for this major employer in Cumberland county.

This board is made up of volunteer professionals from the area working closely with members of the staff and the union in an effort to protect one of the area's largest employers. The board was formed when it became clear that the owners and financiers of the business had lost interest in the business at a time when in fact it needed the total attention of all concerned.

The board has worked seven days a week since its inception and has been successful in identifying future prospective owners and determining the actions required to make the business viable.

Part of the goal has been to secure community ownership interest, and the board has already been successful in raising a substantial amount of money. The problems are not solved yet. However, this board and its actions are examples of how a community can pull together when given a challenge, and they are to be commended for it.

CITATION FOR CITIZENSHIP

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, many Canadian men and women are committed to promoting, through their actions, the fundamental values of our society.

Yesterday, 21 individuals and 4 organizations were honoured during a special ceremony in recognition of their remarkable contribution to communities across the country and received the Citation for Citizenship which is awarded every year.

All over the country, Canadian men and women are working behind the scenes towards a better and fairer future. I think that the energy, determination and dedication of these individuals are what make changes happen. To recognize their work and their contribution to the Canadian society is truly an honour and a pleasure for a government.

Liberty, justice, equality and respect for diversity will continue to prevail in this country as long as we believe in these values and all work for them.

Let us applaud the winners of the Citation for Citizenship who have demonstrated an examplary commitment in promoting the values that Canadian citizenship stands for.

QUEBEC SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, for over 30 years, Quebecers have been demanding the political autonomy they need to grow.

The Meech Lake Accord was the latest attempt to negotiate a new agreement. It failed. Since then, the people of Quebec have started demanding self-government again in order to grow as a mature and distinct society.

So, what does the federal government do? It infringes upon Quebec jurisdictions: education, economic and regional development and health. The federal government has become an "agent provocateur".

That worries me, Mr. Speaker. We Quebecers want to have a cordial relationship with Canada, but that cannot be done in a climate of provocation.

1991 CENSUS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw attention to and take issue with the 1991 census form. I agree with my many constituents who have called to label the long version as sexist and racist.

Females are asked whether they have had children while men, married or single, are not. Housework is considered a non-occupation. Questions of this nature merely perpetuate the stereotypes we are trying to eradicate.

To add insult to injury, never in the history of our census has "Canadian" been accepted as a valid ethnic origin. This is a disgrace. Are we trying to entrench hyphenated Canadianism in our national psyche?

This can only foster continued divisiveness. The hyphen must be laid to rest. Canadians want the right to be addressed as Canadians. We may not all have come over on the same ship, but we are all in the same boat now.

On census day, count me Canadian.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAXATION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, a new study revealed that since this government came to power, our tax system has become more complex and less equitable. Today, we hear that 70 per cent of Canadian businesses made mistakes in their GST returns, this after the government had promised and guaranteed the tax would be easy to administer.

Our question to the Prime Minister is this: How can he claim the GST is easy to administer when 70 per cent of our businesses don't seem to be able to manage?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, even the hon. Leader of the Opposition will admit that the changeover from the old flawed manufacturers' sales tax to the GST went far more smoothly than anyone had anticipated.

Even the Leader of the Opposition—I see him nodding his head—agrees with that.

It is true that in the quarterly filers, which represent small businesses, there were an estimated 50 or 60 per cent of returns that had some slight errors.

Let me point out to the Leader of the Opposition and to the House that 90 per cent of those errors were fixed and taken care of by the systems that this government put in place in consultation with the private sector prior to the implementation of the GST. All of those teething problems, in fact 90 per cent of them, have been able to be corrected as a result of the systems that were put in place in consultation with the private sector.

I believe that as we move into the second quarter, the situation will improve even more considerably.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): After the way that the minister was shot down by the Minister of Finance last week following his statement about taxes in Canada, instead of trying to lecture us, he should lecture his own minister and tell him what he should do.

Mr. Speaker, my question is again to the Prime Minister. The government keeps trying to say that the GST has not hurt the economy. But Manpower Temporary Services, a major forecaster of the job market, called 1991 the "slowest employment year in memory". It said today that the net hiring strength is now only one-third of what it was a year ago.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: When will we see policies that will give some hope to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who want to work now, not next year?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, we have seen interest rates drop over 5 per cent in the last year, which is helping businesses recover from a recessionary period that we are going through.

We are on target. We expect recovery to start in earnest later this year and we will be back to a very sizeable growth rate next year. We are on target on that. We have confidence in that and we know the Canadian people will respond.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is at this moment, for this summer that students all the across the country are finding it almost impossible to find jobs.

• (1420)

Talk with students from New Brunswick, Quebec, southern Ontario or western Canada and you will find that they are all desperate.

The recession created by this government is not only denying them their jobs, it is denying them their future.

Does the Prime Minister not realize the desperate situation that is facing students who need summer jobs? Will the government commit additional resources to put Canada's young people back to work? They need jobs this summer. They want to go back to school come September.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, we are going through a recessionary period. There is no question about that.

We are coming out of it now. The latest report from businesses say that they expect the growth to start mid-summer and it will grow. We are confident that that is going to happen. We are confident that young people will be able to find opportunities for work this summer, maybe not as plentiful as in the past because we are coming out of a tough economic period.

There will be jobs available for them. If they look hard for them, they will find them.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue who the other day admitted that this government has been clobbering Canadian taxpayers.

Yesterday, Global Economics, a private firm, underscored that admission and statistics from his own Department of National Revenue pointed out that personal income taxes have risen by 66 per cent since 1984 for a total of $25.5 billion.

During the same period, corporate taxes have been allowed to be reduced by 34 per cent. How can this minister justify his government's assault on individual Canadian taxpayers?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the latter part of the hon. member's question was answered earlier as well as yesterday by my colleague, the Minister of State.

The beginning of the hon. member's question suggested that I was quoted as saying that Canadians are over-taxed.

Let me take this opportunity to make it very clear that at no time did I ever use the word "over-tax"—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: I am not backtracking.

When I said that governments have gone about as far as they can go in taxation, I was referring to certain commodities, specifically gasoline as it relates to cross-border shopping.

I went on to say it is true that taxes on tobacco, booze and gasoline are the major culprit on those products and these are going to have to be dealt with by all levels of government.

That is what I said and that is what I stand by.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, what Canadians took from the statement is that in fact they are over-taxed.

The Global Economics Review pointed out that fairness in taxation is equated with simplicity. Corporate taxes have become more simple. They have been reduced. Personal income taxes have increased. They have gone up.

Since the minister acknowledged that his government has moved too far in the area of taxation, and given the fundamental disagreement expressed by his cabinet colleagues, will he tell this House which taxes he is reviewing? What proposals are his cabinet colleagues putting forward that will make taxation more fair for Canadians?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, any transcripts of my comments in Winnipeg last week will prove that there was no word such as "over-taxed" used by myself.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: What I did say that the government is reviewing are the over-all problems of cross-border shopping. I went on to say that taxation by all levels is just one very small problem in a very complex situation, which includes a variety of problems, including a lack of aggressive marketing, higher labour costs and distribution costs, and higher transportation costs.

As I have travelled across the country, I have had the majority of provinces support the leadership that this government has taken in trying to deal with—

HEALTH

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

At a time when we are looking for a consensus on what it means to be a Canadian, what it is this country offers to Canadians, we really need look no further than the medicare system that so many Canadians are proud of.

However, this week two different organizations made absolutely scathing attacks on this government's policies on health services. The first one was from the National Council of Welfare which said that if the current trend continues in funding for medical services, medicare will effectively be dead as a national health insurance system. The president of the Canadian Medical Association says that under the present formula, health care system in this country is "doomed" as a national system.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. Will he show real commitment to Canadian medicare by doing two things: first, restore federal funding for the health care system across this country to provinces and territories, and second, ensure that during the constitutional talks the government also discusses and makes sure there is a Canadian discussion on those values, such as medicare, which are a part of the character of this country.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, over the last number of years, instead of cash payments to provinces for shared cost responsibilities, there have been tax points given to provinces.

In the February budget the Minister of Finance made a commitment that he would review all transfer programs to provinces, in co-operation with the provinces. That commitment is being kept. We are looking at that to ensure that the very good medicare system that we have in this country is sustained. That is one of the reasons for this, but we are looking at all transfer payments, including post-secondary education and social services, to ensure that we have the best system in this country, to maintain it and to make it even better.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to ensure that we have the best system, restore the federal funding and we will have the best system.

I would suggest that the Prime Minister ask the people of Newfoundland, where they have had 20 per cent of their acute care beds cut back in health care, where 300 nurses have been laid off; in Nova Scotia, where funding for nursing homes is being cut, and in New Brunswick, where funding is being rolled back. That is where health care really counts, right there in the communities.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: The principle of universally accessible, publicly funded health care is a basic principle of Canadian character and living in this country. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether in the constitutional talks he will take the suggestions of my party for a social charter where we can ensure that future generations of Canadians will have the kind of health care that we have been able to have.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party asked whether the discussions on the Constitution would deal with Canadian values. I think all of us recognize that in a country like ours, at a time like this, one cannot consider a constitution without dealing with the basic values of this country.

I personally think that would be a very useful dimension to the discussions which we have to undertake. She has made specific reference to a social charter and, naturally, we are prepared to consider her proposals for a social charter and, indeed, consider other constructive proposals by others in this House and in the country.

As the Prime Minister has made clear, while we have a duty which we intend to carry out to put forward specific proposals and clear options for constitutional change, we certainly anticipate that there will be amendments in the process because we do not want to have a situation which has either a closed process or results in closed minds on basic questions that the country has to deal with.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear that the government is considering a social charter. I think it is a very important part of what will form the foundation of our country. At the same time it is necessary to have funding for the essential services.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my question is again directed to the Prime Minister. The government's cutbacks in medicare have led to user fees and deterrent fees.

Last April, the minister responsible for National Health and Welfare at the time stated that user fees were a concept that deserved consideration. My question to the Prime Minister is this: Does he endorse user fees? And if not, how does he intend to stop this trend?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the user fee issue was raised, if I am not mistaken, by the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs. The Minister of National Health and Welfare responded several days or several weeks later.

In fact, we are all in favour of having the most advanced, most modern and most generous medicare plan in the world. However, we have to pay for it. We will have to find the money, and that money comes from Canadian taxpayers. The NDP is asking us to lower taxes, but on the other hand, it is also asking us to upgrade services. You can't have both. The two will have to be reconciled at the national level and in the hon. member's mind as well.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the Canada-Mexico treaty.

On May 22, the Minister of the Environment said that the government would not make an environmental assessment until after an agreement was signed. Mr. Speaker, it will be far too late. The environment and the economy must be integrated from the very beginning.

My question is this: Can the Prime Minister give us the assurance that non-governmental environmental experts will be included on the negotiating committee, from the very beginning?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that this issue, which is fundamentally a trade discussion, is going to include other issues and of course some environmentalists will be there and consultation will take place.

The hon. member asks for what I would argue is a structure which would be totally unwieldly for us to conduct these negotiations.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister. If that structure is unwieldly then somebody better tell George Bush.

What is this government afraid of? The Americans have committed to appointing environmental activists to six trade policy committees. Furthermore they have detailed the exact agenda and the exact process by which environmental concerns are going to be set out. The Canadian public on the other hand has been given no such details. We have not even been given the terms of reference of the environmental impact assessment.

Why is this government not prepared to provide Canadians with the same set of standards of public disclosure and involvement as the American government is prepared to provide the American citizenry? This government may be a lame duck, but the Canadian people are not.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): From one old duck to another let me try and answer that, Mr. Speaker.

My hon. friend can be given the assurance that all of the required standards will be observed for the President to achieve the requirement of fast-tracking from the Congress. Certain commitments were required and the President made those to various Congressmen and Senators to be assured of their support in regard to the fast-tracking. In respect of Mexico, the United States has in the Texas panhandle some specific problems that have given rise to requirements that are more demanding of the United States in that area than they are of Canada. That being said, Canada will provide when the negotiations begin all of the safeguards in every jurisdiction to be undertaken for scrutiny, all of the safeguards.

An hon. member: Give us the same thing as the Americans.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says: "Give us the same thing as the Americans". We are different from the Americans. We are going to give Canadians a Canadian solution.

GREAT LAKES

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the government's failure to reach an agreement with the United States to stop polluting the Great Lakes.

After months of delays and stalling by Canada, the Americans finally gave up on this government and announced their own action plan to stop poisoning the Great Lakes.

Why did the government back out of an agreement with the States to finally do something about cleaning up the Great Lakes?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I think most hon. members in this House know, the Canadian government has been working very closely with the American government and with the appropriate provincial and municipal governments, going back as far as 1972, to ensure that good progress is being made with respect to the clean up of the Great Lakes.

The problem, of course, is an immense one. It is a type of problem which has been accumulating in Canada and the Great Lakes as a result of economic activity for decades and decades. Anyone in this House or anyone in the country who thinks that the messes of the past can be cleaned up overnight is wrong.

I think we have made good progress. Most recently, as you know, Mr. Speaker, because you follow these issues very closely, we announced the establishment not so long ago of a $25 million Great Lakes Action Program. I think it is well under way to determining a pollution centre to be established.

We on this side of the House understand that there are no quick fixes to problems which have been building for decades and decades, but we as a government are very committed to ensuring that we proceed thoroughly and in an efficient manner to make sure that the problem is addressed now and in the future.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want water they can drink, swim in, fish and eat without getting sick, not pious pronouncements, promises and procrastination.

In the United States national leadership has got five states and private industry together on an action plan for the Great Lakes, while this government cannot even get together with one province.

Why did the government let its own instrument on the Great Lakes, its agreement with Ontario, lapse in March? Why has it done absolutely nothing to get a new agreement and get some action going again?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the House that in fact it is not accurate to say that this government is not proceeding in its consultations with the province of Ontario. It has been and continues to be so.

In the meantime, the announcement to which I have already referred, which was made in the presence of the minister from Ontario and which was the precursor to very intensive negotiations with the province of Ontario, will indeed lead to the kind of action the hon. member is seeking.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

On May 15, the Prime Minister told the House, in response to questions concerning the admission of former Iraqi Ambassador Al-Mashat to Canada, that the Clerk of the Privy Council, Paul Tellier, speaking for the Privy Council Office said, and I quote the Prime Minister who said: "Do not admit him". Notwithstanding that, he was admitted.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this: In view of the fact that documents made available to the committee studying this question last night now reveal that there is absolute—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I indicated yesterday that there is a very difficult line to be drawn in questions arising out of a committee. There are comments, of course, in Beauchesne's that the proceedings of the committee ought not to be referred to.

There is other procedural law, especially from Great Britain, that may be able to assist this House. However, it seems to me that what the hon. member is asking is something which is immediately, right now, before the committee and that it is not appropriate to pursue the same subject here in Question Period.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can put the question directly to the Prime Minister.

Does the Prime Minister stand by his statement of May 15 that Paul Tellier, Clerk of the Privy Council, instructed that Al-Mashat not be admitted to Canada? Does he stand by that statement?

• (1440)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the dilemmas—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put a question relating to a statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister, not in front of committee, but some time ago in the House.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could resolve the dilemma by telling my hon. friend that what I indicated in the House will, if he waits 15 or 20 minutes and goes to the committee that he has been attending, Mr. Tellier will be there this afternoon. I am sure all of the information will be provided and validated to his satisfaction.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, indeed we will be putting that question to Mr. Tellier this afternoon.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps under the circumstances the hon. member could put his question and I will listen very carefully to it.

Mr. Robinson: My supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is responsible for the appointment of ministerial chiefs of staff. I want to ask the Prime Minister—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robinson: This is a question relating directly to the responsibility of the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the chief of staff to the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, David Daubney, has indicated that a memo was brought before him in which reference was made to the admission of ambassador—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may or may not have a question relating to the appointment of chiefs of staff, but I have to ask the hon. member to keep in mind that under the present circumstances, with all of these proceedings taking place last night, this morning, again as I am told this afternoon, it seems to me that it is bringing into the Chamber the very things that are being dealt with on the floor of the committee.

If the hon. member has a question for the right hon. Prime Minister as to chiefs of staff, in general or in particular, I would like to hear it. But at least for the moment I do not want references to what is taking place in front of the committee being used as the preamble to or part of the question.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, without in any way referring to what took place in committee yesterday, is the Prime Minister prepared to demand the resignation of the chief of staff to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, David Daubney, given the incredible incompetence he displayed yesterday?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has just chosen another way to do exactly what I asked him to refrain from doing.

HEALTH

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The National Council on Welfare reported today that federal cash payments for medicare and university education will soon end. The council asks for a new deal with the provinces before it is too late. As the Prime Minister knows, an attack on these transfer payments is in reality an attack on Canada's poor. The cry is genuine, the cry for help is real.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Is it not time that this government renewed its national responsibility and helped in the fight against poverty throughout all of Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Certainly, Mr. Speaker. I guess one of the first things we can do to help the poor of this country is to get the deficit down and be able to lower taxes once we get the debts of the past paid. I think there is no question about that.

I answered this question a little earlier in Question Period in a question by the leader of the New Democratic Party. I said that the Minister of Finance in his February budget said he would be consulting, would be meeting and examining all transfer programs with the provinces, with a view to maintaining and in fact enhancing the program so that we can assure the people of Canada the best of health care and the best of social services and the best of post-secondary education.

That commitment was made in the budget in February and we are going to carry it out.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. The National Council of Welfare projects that federal cash payments to Quebec will end by 1995-96, less than five years from now.

Given our attempt on new constitutional arrangements, is this the right signal to be sending Quebec?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that statement is inaccurate and my hon. friend will see that the numbers mentioned today are not at all justified by government projections.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

On March 19, this government exposed its true intentions when its members unanimously voted against a renewed commitment to medicare. True to form, the proportion of total health care costs paid by this government has declined by more than 6 per cent since 1987.

I would like very much to give the Prime Minister a second chance to answer a question he ignored.

Mr. Mulroney: Thanks.

Ms. Guarnieri: Your welcome. Is the Prime Minister courageous enough to abandon his government's tax point camouflaged cutbacks and restore federal health care contributions to traditional and necessary levels?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the hon. member should understand that provinces will be receiving more money this year than they did last year for health care costs. They have not increased at the rate the provinces would like to see them increase, but they are getting an increase in funding. Provinces will be receiving more money this year for health care than last.

Let us set the record straight. I will repeat to her exactly what I said earlier in answer to questions from her colleague and from the leader of the New Democratic Party. A commitment was made by this government in the February budget, which we plan to carry out, to have a complete study of transfer payments to the provinces. That will be carried out by the ministers of finance of the provinces and the Government of Canada.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, as the American Congress looks north to improve its medicare system, this government is looking south for ways to destroy ours.

My supplementary is for the Prime Minister. The president of the Canadian Medical Association does not agree with his minister's viewpoint. The president tells us that if this government does not change its course, our medicare system will be in ruins within 10 years.

I ask the Prime Minister if his government will recognize that Canadians want the Tory fiscal knife out of the operating rooms of this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I read with interest today the headline: "United States urged to adopt Canada's health system". It must think we have a pretty good health system if it wants to adopt it.

I will repeat to the hon. member again, because I know I have to say things two or three times to sink into the Liberals, we are studying the transfer payments in co-operation with the provinces to assure the maintenance and the improvement of our services we provide to the people of Canada. That is a commitment and we are going to keep it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

I would like to ask the minister if he would confirm that for the first time ever Canada has formally agreed to allow the regular transit of Trident nuclear submarines through internal sovereign Canadian waters at Dixon Entrance northwest of Prince Rupert?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not entirely accurate in his statement about the Dixon Entrance and the submarines. What the Americans want to set up on their territory is a base for testing submarine communication/detection, not a submarine base as such.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I confirmed it this morning with people in the Department of External Affairs. I assume people working in the departments are working under government minister's supervision, but I confirmed that External Affairs and other departmental officials are working on the final wording for the agreement for the first time in Canadian history, to allow Trident nuclear submarines to come through internal sovereign Canadian waters. I would like the minister to understand that the Canadians I know are very much opposed to this. The Americans have claimed up until now that they have an all-American route to get to Back Island base, so would the minister confirm that this agreement has been agreed to by he and other ministers and by cabinet?

• (1450)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first, when the agreements already negotiated or now in negotiation with the Americans are implemented, the hon. member will realize that his fears are unfounded. At that time, I will be glad to discuss those agreements thoroughly with him.

[English]

TRADE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. This is the second anniversary of China's Tiananmen massacre. The Prime Minister will recall the words of his former Secretary of State for External Affairs when he said with outrage in June of 1989: "Tiananmen Square and the subsequent campaign of repression has changed the relationship between Canada and China. The Chinese authorities have called for business as usual. This cannot be accepted".

Does the Prime Minister still stand by that commitment?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, not only do we stand by that commitment but we have conveyed the views of the Government of Canada in the strongest terms.

The South China Post in an editorial by Anthony Polski, who was the former New York Times correspondent and editor at Far East Economic Review, made the following comment that I think will interest my hon. friend on May 26: "—referred to speeches of unique historical and contemporary importance for the future of Hong Kong as related to Beijing. The speeches unequivocally affirmed the importance of human rights and a variety of other economic freedoms in Hong Kong, linked these freedoms inextricably with the economic prosperity of the territory and future healthy growth and sent a clear message to Beijing of its guarantees and responsibilities to affirm and preserve Hong Kong's unique system after the territory reverts in 1997.

The Prime Minister of Canada became one of the few heads of government or heads of state to visit Hong Kong as a principal destination. His visit was intended to affirm Canadian support for Hong Kong's autonomy as promised in the joint declaration of '84 and the visit reiterated Canada's strong historical commitments to Hong Kong".

In the process of doing that, I used the occasion of that visit and that series of speeches to respond in particular to the question raised by my hon. friend, and to convey very strongly the dismay of the Government of Canada in regard to developments in Beijing and to insist on the respect of human rights at all times as a fundamental of Canadian foreign policy.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago to a previous questioner, we heard the former Secretary of State for External Affairs refer to basic Canadian values that we value so much in this country. Yet the numbers speak louder than words.

Canada's imports with China increased by 17.7 per cent from 1989 to 1990 and our exports jumped by 44.4 per cent for the same period.

Will the Prime Minister not agree that Canada's substantial growth in trade with China last year is inconsistent with its claim that China must redress its abysmal record on human rights? Will he set specific human rights conditions for China to meet before continuing business as usual? Could we have that commitment?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raises very specifically the question of the tie-in of human rights to the attitude of the Government of Canada. In a lead editorial in the South China Morning Post entitled "A friend in time of need", the editorialist said: "The Prime Minister did not need to mention Beijing by name when he said that any country which tried to achieve economic progress without recognizing human rights was doomed to mediocrity".

I find it passing strange, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberals raise an important question and then some of the members are disinclined to listen to the answer to the very important question raised by the hon. member.

We are seeking not only to enforce the linkage between human rights and economic association, but also to state directly to the Government of Beijing that that has been and will be the policy of the Government of Canada.

We have stipulated it very carefully and have conveyed it to the Government of Beijing. When I was as close to Chinese territory as one can come without being on the mainland last week, I conveyed unequivocally in a way that I think my hon. friend would approve, the indispensable relationship that Canadians make to democratic rights and freedoms, in the evolution of the PRC, the respect for those and economic co-operation for Canada.

TRADE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister.

Before he went away on his trip to the Orient, he said that one of the goals of the trip was to press for the elimination or reduction of the Japanese 8 per cent tariff on Canadian pine, spruce and fir.

This tariff continues to hurt the producers in my riding in the province of British Columbia. It appears that the Japanese have not agreed to the elimination or reduction of the tariff.

Can the Prime Minister tell us today whether there was any progress made at all on this important issue?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a most important question in British Columbia.

I pressed the Japanese government for the complete elimination of the 8 per cent tariff on certain Canadian wood products. The Prime Minister gave me the assurance of movement, which the Government of Canada did not accept at that time, but which we have moved to the MTN with a view to seeking the complete removal of what we view as a fundamentally discriminatory tax against Canadian producers.

Similar products from the United States enter Japan without this 8 per cent surcharge, and we want it eliminated for Canadian products.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Minister of National Health and Welfare took advantage of the absence of the Prime Minister to proceed to an in-house cabinet shuffle and give himself a new department that he called the Quebec regional development department. However, yesterday, in Quebec City, the minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs said that there would be no new department but only a new title for the minister. So I ask the Prime Minister who should arbitrate differences of opinions between ministers and which minister tells the truth? Is it only a new title or is there a new department?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): There is no need for an arbitrator, Mr. Speaker, because the positions of my friend and colleague and myself are the same.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister refused yesterday by his silence to denounce and condemn this unacceptable action taken in his absence by the Minister of Health, which was to intrude brutally upon Quebec's jurisdiction. Can the Prime Minister tell us that he will denounce and condemn this action?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): As I recall, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean was not the least shocked when federal funds were spent in his riding.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, the World University Service of Canada is an important partner in international development. Since last December, this non-governmental organization has serious financial problems. We know the Canadian International Development Agency is presently studying a proposal aimed at putting it back on track. My question is for the minister for External Relations. Could she tell us the situation in this regard and if she intends taking steps to clarify it?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question which is certainly of interest for many members of this House, since WUSC has been for years an international development agency contributing to our excellent reputation and has been working in close collaboration with the CIDA. Since WUSC was placed under receivership last December, CIDA spared no effort to find a solution with its board of directors. I am pleased to announce today that I signed this morning an agreement for a redeemable contribution of $1.8 million that will allow WUSC to reclaim its position.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Universality of health care is a stated government policy and promise' but what does it mean to natives and immigrants? For native youth it means the suicide rate is five to six times higher than for non–natives' and climbing. Suicide counselling is virtually non–existent.

Yesterday the Canadian Ethnocultural Council reminded MPs of the need for mental health programs for immigrants and refugees. Native leaders have asked for an inquiry on the issue of suicide among their people.

Can the minister explain why his government has omitted our first peoples and our newcomers from badly needed mental health programs, or is it merely a government oversight? Shall we see more deaths before the government acts?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Health, is away today on government business. In view of the seriousness of the question I will transmit the question to my hon. colleague who, I am sure, will get back to the hon. member as quickly as possible.

POINT OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make my standard point of order about private members on this side not having a fair opportunity to ask questions.

All members are not created equal. Canadians are asking us to speak up on behalf of our constituents and we need the opportunity to do so. I just wanted to express that.

Point of Order

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in response to the intervention by my hon. friend, I once again want to offer to the government House leader a willingness on behalf of the New Democratic Party to add half an hour to Question Period each day to allow more members to participate in questioning the government.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is not the first time that this issue is raised. The Chair has taken note of the concerns expressed by both sides of the House and will continue to closely follow and study the issue and the situation.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, during our discussions last year, I had offered an extra 15 minutes a day. The opposition turned it down.

More significantly, the fundamental question that has to be asked is: are members of Parliament equal in this House or are some more equal than others? The member of Parliament who raised the point of order said he felt like he should have an equal opportunity to question the government as any other ordinary member. That is the practice in the Mother of Parliaments. It is a practice I think we should look into. It can be achieved by having shorter questions, shorter answers, going back and forth from one side to the other as they do in the United Kingdom, and through other procedures.

The question is not whether there is enough time for Question Period, the question is: is there a fairness in the way questions are distributed between the two sides and in the way they are asked?

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the hon. House leader is somewhat selective in his memory in terms of bringing facts to the floor of the House of Commons with regard to Question Period.

My colleague to the left has made two proposals on two separate days to extend the length of Question Period. I wish the record to show, on the Point of Order, that we would be more than willing to extend the hours of Question Period today in order to accommodate all members of Parliament on all sides of the House.

The hon. member opposite keeps referring to other Parliaments which have various question periods and procedures on question periods. I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. member opposite the words of a former very distinguished Speaker of this House, the Hon. James Jerome, where he said on April 14, 1975, with regard to Question Period:

> The question period is a unique feature of the Canadian House of Commons where the ministry is required to be accountable to the House on a daily basis without advance notice. It is an excellent feature of our parliament, and while we have much to learn from other governmental systems, the question period is one area in which we are in the forefront of the responsible government, and every effort must be made to preserve the excellence of this practice.

I remind the hon. member opposite that he ought not to try to intimidate members of Parliament, particularly members who sit in the Chair. That is unacceptable conduct for the government House leader.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! since the hon. members seems to be willing to discuss this question, I am ready to show some tolerance. I recognize the hon. member for Kamloops and then the Government House leader.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend the Official Opposition House leader has indicated, the government House leader's memory is somewhat selective. On no occasion did he singularly offer to extend Question Period. If he had, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, we would have enthusiastically responded favourably. Once again I want to make it very clear that I think almost all of the opposition parties represented in the House have indicated a willingness to extend Question Period for half an hour every day to allow more members to participate.

I think we also have to recognize that backbenchers on the government side have an opportunity every week during caucus meetings to question cabinet ministers directly. We do not have that opportunity. We do not sit in the government's caucus. On a weekly basis they have an opportunity to raise questions, enter into discussions and so on. When we talk about equality of opportunity let us recognize that government backbenchers have an advantage that members of the opposition simply do not have.

Mr. Andre: I just want to respond very quickly. The hon. House leader of the Liberal Party read from Mr. James Jerome's description of Question Period. I was disappointed that he stopped before he read the rest of the declaration, because Mr. Jerome said: "It is inappropriate for questions to contain accusations or to be shouted. It is inappropriate to yell in the House. It is appropriate to ask questions seeking information and not to make representations or accusations".

Quoting Mr. Jerome is appropriate. I wish he would have quoted him completely and I wish we would return to that practice.

If Question Period were just the seeking of information, there might be some validity to the suggestion that backbenchers in the government have other opportunities. Question Period is the opportunity for making representations on behalf of constituents. The hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party will recognize that caucus is an inappropriate mechanism and is unfair in terms of backbenchers.

Again, the issue is not how long Question Period is, the issue is how fair Question Period is.

It has been suggested in the past by the House leader of the Liberal Party and by the House leader of the New Democratic Party that perhaps we need changes. I would welcome their active participation in the House committee on management so that we can incorporate the rules that Mr. Justice Jerome talked about, quite properly, and maybe we can make them the practice in this House as they have been in the past. We could have more than enough time for members on our side as well as for members on that side to have a fair and even chance. Perhaps we can do it in a way that is free of some of the excessive partisanship, the shouting, the screaming, the accusations and so on which bring this whole institution in disrepute to those who are watching.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I see that the Government House leader has made his statement and is leaving right away. For the information of those who are listening to us, I think it is important to mention that a committee was commissioned by this Parliament to study parliamentary reform. The McGrath Committee, of which I had the honour to be a member, has made specific recommendations about the possibility for government backbenchers to speak in the House. And it was recommended at that time to allow shorter speeches in the first 15 minutes devoted to members' statements where precisely government members are recognized more often than opposition members. It is then that government backbenchers have the opportunity to express their points of view. The McGrath Committee has fully acknowledged that question periode is traditionnally reserved for opposition members. It is the only time when opposition members can just question to ministers.

Over time the Chair has shown a certain tolerance in exceptionally recognizing a few governement backbenchers. Now until the Tories came into office, this prerogative was always left to the sole discretion of Speaker who, would occasionnally recognize some governement backbenchers. Now, what has happened over time? Since the Conservatives came into office, all that was changed. Nowadays, the government whip or his delegate hand to the Speaker a list of government backbenchers who must be recognized during question period, or even during the 15-minute period for statements pursuant to S.O. 21.

With all due respect, I submit that this practice originated under this government, in an effort to control question period. It is a complete departure from our previous parliamentary practice, where question period was for opposition members who used that opportunity to question ministers. If the government whip decides that, from now on, this or that hon. member will be allowed to put questions to the ministers, obviously we will not have a question period anymore, but a big show half-orchestrated by the government. We think this already infringes upon the rights of opposition members. It limits in some ways the 45-minute question period available to us for questioning the government.

So, I respectfully submit that, every time the Speaker recognizes a government backbencher, he goes against this long-established parliamentary tradition, according to which question period is for opposition members only.

[English]

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address this as a government private member. My constituents would like to see me ask and be able to ask questions in this House. According to Beauchesne's we may have one short sentence prior to the question and during a supplementary there will be no preamble. Adding another half hour to the time for Question Period is not going to address the rules and procedures that are in Beauchesne's. If we kept to those rules we would all have an opportunity to speak in this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I ask for the cooperation of both sides of the House. The management committee would seem to be a more appropriate forum to further discuss opinions that have been expressed this afternoon and that the Chair will take into account, obviously.

You know that the Speaker is the servant of the House and tries to accommodate the wishes and suggestions of all members regardless of who they are and which titles they have in this House.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand (p. 1111).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When our proceedings were suspended at one o'clock, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard had just completed his remarks and we were about to start questions and comments.

The hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of listening to this debate on a very important question since it started this morning. I listened to the remarks of the hon. member who, as usual, was able to describe in a few minutes the problems we encounter.

In the four minutes left to him, could the hon. member be kind enough to explain what difficulties people in Montreal had with two programs that are often mentioned but may not be as interesting as they are said to be, namely POWA and RRAP. I would like him to explain clearly for our listeners what those two acronyms mean.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I will begin with the RRAP, the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. That program was designed to help owners renovate houses without rent increases, so we could have more rental units for low-income people.

That program was funded by all levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal. The federal government, under the previous Minister of Finance, cut funding under that program, and the provincial government followed suit. So, what is left of Montreal's municipal program is not enough, of course, and there is a serious housing problem in that city, specially with regard to low-cost housing.

Montreal was affected by the elimination of the RRAP because it was the only city which participated financially in that program. It is also a city where there were a lot of old apartments in need of repairs, particularly in the south-centre area and the east area.

So, if there is one city that was penalized when the Minister of Finance decided to eliminate that program, it is Montreal.

The POWA is another program that was cancelled. It was designed to help older workers who were losing their jobs because of plant closures in the shoe and clothing industry. That program was reintroduced in a different form, and that is where the problem comes from, Mr. Speaker.

The Program for Older Worker Adjusment must help older workers. In this particular case, namely the Montreal region—and I am pleased that the Minister of Transport, who implemented this program, is with us today—there is a rule according to which there must generally be more than 100 employees in a region of 500,000 people. It goes without saying that Montreal has a population in the millions, but the problem has to do with the fact that the majority of businesses that shut down employ less than 100 people, and that is where the problem lies for the majority of workers over 55 years of age who have worked in the industry for a number of years. Those people are therefore penalized. They receive no benefit through the POWA program. I do not want to make this a partisan issue, but I am confronted with this problem in my riding of Saint-Léonard and I am convinced that the hon. member for Saint-Denis also faces the same problem. Every day, there are constituents that urge us to change the regulations. I have submitted petitions to the House, among which 5,000 signatures from my riding alone, to have that section modified, because here in Canada, there are large as well as small businesses. When we talk about a minimum of 100 jobs, that means that only a few factories would qualified under that program.

• (1520)

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate today.

Some might wonder why a member from the maritimes would wish to participate in a debate on Montreal. The problems that are raised by my hon. friends opposite are not dissimilar to the ones we have in Atlantic Canada.

I want to compliment the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for bringing forward this issue with respect to the economic problems and unemployment in Montreal. However, I must confess that—notwithstanding the fact that he has devoted many, many years of service to the people of NDG and, indeed, to the city of Montreal—I really believe his motion, in which he suggested the government had abandoned the population through the obvious lack of political will to provide jobs and economic opportunities, et cetera, is quite misguided.

What he really means is that he regrets the government has not been sufficiently irresponsible as to spend endless amounts of money to create make-work jobs in the city of Montreal or anywhere else. What the motion says to me is that there is really a philosophical difference between this government and the government of which the hon. member was a very distinguished minister. This government is governing fiscally more responsibly than that which preceded it.

This government believes that the secret to prosperity is through economic strength. Indeed, what we have realized is the fact that the world is changing. Canada could bury its head in the sand and pretend that the world is not out there, or we can get with it. We can attempt to get on board with the economic changes that are happening, the changes in the global world and the economic interdependence of the various countries of the world. Canada is either going to be a part of that or is going to hide its head in the sand and miss out on the opportunities for true long-term prosperity, which includes long-term employment.

Look at what is happening with the unification of Germany and how quickly it has happened. Look at what is happening in Europe as we move, not only to 1992, but indeed to the years beyond. I do not believe that Canada can hide from that. I do not believe the solution to that problem is to do what the previous government did and say: "Spend, spend, spend, get everyone back on a payroll. It does not matter if there is a level of productivity associated with that, it does not matter if we have economic growth and change to meet the new demands of the world, but rather that we simply keep everybody on the payroll and we will not worry about who is going to pay the bills".

Unfortunately, we are now the inheritors of the bills left from years and years of that kind of approach.

We built a high standard of living in this country by doing three things. We artificially propped up our economy through tariffs and subsidies, subsidies that we are now paying for, through the interest on the debt. Second, we were able, for many, many years to benefit from our rich natural resources and the exploitation of those resources without necessarily learning to make the most effective use of those resources in terms of value-added activity. Third, as I have implied, we suffer from years of irresponsible governments which simply tried to keep the cycle moving by spending, whether or not we had the money to pay the bills. That has left us with an extraordinary deficit situation from which we are now burdened with a tremendous national debt.

We have to try to get things in line. We have to look to government to show true leadership in assessing our future strengths through accessing markets. That is why this government has shown such tremendous leaderships in terms of trade policy. It has recognized that if we can have access to the larger markets of the world, it will provide an opportunity for our manufacturing sectors to develop those markets which in turn will create more jobs for Canadians which will be substantive in the long term.

That does not come easy. We get access to the markets but then we also have to improve our own productivity. There is a job to be done at all levels, both in terms of management and indeed of the workers. Productivity is a key and it is critically important.

Perhaps one of the things we need to do is go back to some of the old values, values that I do not hear talked about a great deal in this House. However, they are values basic to life in Atlantic Canada. They are basic to the part of Atlantic Canada that I have the honour to represent in this House. I am talking about values like the belief that a person has to give a day's work if they want a day's pay. I am talking about values like self-reliance. Whatever happened to the day when people felt that if they had a problem it was their problem and they ought to do something? Every time a plant closes in this country people say: "Oh, what is the government going to do about it?" Or they say: "I don't have a job, why doesn't the government find me a job?"

Government has the responsibility to create a climate to assist in times of difficulty, and so on and so forth, but goodness gracious, at what point do we become the masters of our own destiny? At what point do we say that there is an incumbency upon us to be the ones who are prepared to do what we need to do for ourselves, to show initiative, to show energy, to show entrepreneurialism? On the other side that seems to be a dirty word, but on this side it is a very important one.

There is a role for government in achieving this competitiveness, which is the key to economic prosperity for the future. Obviously, as I have mentioned, the government has to provide access to markets through trade agreements. That is what we are doing. We have done that with the free trade agreement. It is not going to yield its effects in 24 hours or 36 hours, but rather is something that gives us the opportunity, which means that the doors are open. Obviously there are going to have to be adjustments in our manufacturing sector because, whether we like it or not, in some aspects we simply are not competitive. Therefore, we have to move in the directions where we can be competitive.

We have to improve our research and development, our science and our technology capabilities, one of the areas where we have fallen down. Government has done its share in many respects, but the private sector has not. The government has to show leadership in encouraging the private sector to do its share with respect to research and development.

Third, we have to develop a highly skilled labour force. This has to be a focus. I was very encouraged by the remarks in the Speech from the Throne and their thrust on literacy and the relationship between skill levels in individuals and their ability to seek and achieve satisfactory employment. That is where this government, in my judgment, has shown excellent leadership.

I recall that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce was a member of the C-21 committee. He had some reservations about the fact that the thrust of Bill C-21 was that there is a relationship between unemployment and returning fully and properly to the work force so that workers have the skills that enable them to do more than simply get a job that will tide them through to the next unemployment period, so they can find long-term opportunities, opportunities that will come as a result of the competitiveness approach of this government.

Of course, government has to create a good climate for business. It has to have a climate that makes it attractive for investment and, generally speaking, it has to give businesses the impression that they are welcome and that they are wanted and that the kind of long-term stability that comes from solid blue chip industries is something that makes our country an attractive one. This is one of the things that causes me great nervousness about the recent budget in Ontario, which is the height of irresponsibility, in my opinion. It seems to have been observed in that regard, indeed right around the globe one might say. So I think there is a role for government.

Finally, government has a responsibility to see that the infrastructure is there to make it possible for companies to do business coast to coast in this country. I am talking about communications and transportation infrastructure. I find it intriguing to see members from Montreal expressing some concerns in this regard because, quite frankly, in Atlantic Canada we have a lot of reservations about the quality of the infrastructure and the transportation infrastructure that exists for our benefit vis-à-vis the apparent national interest in ensuring the viability of the port of Montreal and the transportation systems that serve Montreal. I find it intriguing that people from Montreal would have reservations about that when we in Atlantic Canada have probably been stifled more by this single fact than anything else throughout history since Confederation.

However, the debate today is not on Atlantic Canada, it is on Montreal. Montreal, in my judgment, has excellent prospects. Now, there is one big cloud on the horizon. Let us face it, nothing will discourage investment—and it is investment that leads to jobs, not just government spending—like a sense of political instability. That is the cloud in my judgment that is hanging over the head not only of Montreal, not only of Quebec, but indeed the whole of Canada.

I think all members of this House have to stand together in recognizing that the key to our future prosperity in Montreal, Quebec, Atlantic Canada—throughout Canada—lies in having a government that shows sound financial management and the courage and economic vision to lead this country into the 21st century. Also it should have the ability and the courage to reunify our country as we work toward a renewed confederation that will be caring and will value self-reliance among its citizens, a confederation that will show respect for the people of all regions, all linguistic groups, all races of this country. It must be a system of government that will show regional balance, will not pit one region against the other and will give all equal opportunity to participate: quite simply a Canada that has room for all Canadians.

That kind of Canada under the leadership this government has provided will not only lead to economic prosperity for that great city of Montreal, but indeed for all parts of Canada.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was not present when I gave my speech this morning. It was obvious from his remarks that at no time did I suggest in support of the motion that the answer to the problems of Montreal were to spend, spend, spend, and that my only interest was in spending.

The hon. member himself says that he is against the spend, spend, spend solution and that he and his government are interested in bringing about an economic climate that will attract investment. That is interesting because that is exactly what I said in the House.

If he thinks that the economic climate is so important, why did he support his government in bringing in the GST, one of the greatest tax grabs in Canadian history, at a time when the country was going into a serious recession? If there is anything that has to do with economic climate, that is it.

Every economist in the country who had any sense condemned that move at that time, and so did I this morning in my speech. If he is interested in climate, how does he explain bringing in the GST at a time when the country was moving into a serious recession and we had over one million unemployed? The rate of unemployment was over 10 per cent and in Montreal it was near 15 per cent. That is one thing.

Then he says he is interested in creating infrastructures. So did I in my speech this morning. Year after year the Canadian Federation of Municipalities proposed a program to reinvigorate urban infrastructure, municipal infrastructure, with a tripartite federal-provincial-municipal program to rebuild sewers, roads, bridges and transportation facilities which we supported but that government over there turned down. It turned it down over and over again. So much for supporting infrastructure.

Finally, I want to ask the hon. member this. He condemns us for suggesting that jobs should be created, but in the Speech from the Throne given a few weeks ago his government promises 2.5 million jobs by the year 2000. It is interested in creating jobs too. The only odd thing about the Speech from the Throne is that it has a plan for the year 2000 and nothing for the years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994 or 1995 when the recession is on now and people are interested in solutions now.

There are three questions I would like the hon. member to deal with.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friend from NDG has left me enough time to deal with these issues. Needless to say, they are ones that I would be delighted to comment on. I will try to be brief, although I am not sure how much time is available.

First of all on the subject of GST and the recession, I find it extraordinary that my hon. friend along with his colleagues remain mired in this concept of a value added tax—something that exists in virtually every industrialized country of the world except the United States—as a basis for international competitiveness. They are still standing against that. They are opposing it.

I wonder, I wonder. We will never find out. They will not be on these benches in the near future.

It would be interesting to know if they would still stand by what they said during the debate, that they would abolish it. With respect to the concept that it was introduced at a time of recession, this is absolute nonsense.

This concept was introduced two or three years ago. The legislation came forth some time long before the recession began. I am sure my hon. friend opposite is not so naive as to think that you could put in place a massive tax reform and then, with the snap of your fingers, stop it.

On the idea of infrastructure, I was talking about the infrastructure of our national transportation system.

I have to tell you that I have 12 municipalities in my constituency and I would like nothing better than to have access to massive federal funds to assist them with their roads and sewers. But, guess what? The cupboard is bare. Why are the cupboards bare? Because from 1974 to 1984 we had a government that increased spending annually by 13.8 per cent. You cannot spend what you have not got.

My hon. friend ought to take a little lesson in history. He would find out that when this government gets things back under control, together with its sound economic planning, we are going to have jobs, 2.5 million of them as the Speech from the Throne said by the year 2000. It will be there. You wait for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Shore is a great preacher. He speaks loud and clear. He thinks people understand him well. As for me, I would like to ask him a question: What does he think of his government's economic policies? Because we must look at the results. And the results of his government's policies, my friend, are that in Montreal the unemployment rate is at 15 per cent; in the Maritimes, it is between 15 to 20 per cent; in the Gaspé Peninsula, it is close to 20 per cent, and in the Lac Saint-Jean area, it is 17 per cent. Is that what you call good economic policies? That is what I would like to know. How can you boast of your economic policies when the unemployment rate has never been so high in the last five years?

[English]

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I know the time is short, but I must say the economic policies of this government were good enough to get my hon. friend from Longueuil re-elected in 1988, something he seems to have forgotten.

Nevertheless, I am sure he recalls in the early 1980s when the Liberals were in power. The world goes through cycles of recession and boom. When the recession hit and they tried to spend their way out of it, we had interest rates of 20 per cent, an extraordinary inflation rate and a very high unemployment rate.

It is interesting to note two things about this recession. First, it has lasted a shorter time than the one did then. Second, we were not crushed with the interest rates and the inflation rates that were delivered to us by the approach taken by my friends opposite in 1982.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the member for South Shore said that are philosophical differences between his party and our party. There sure are.

Our philosophy is that we help those Canadians who need help the most. His party's philosophy is if someone is down and out, you kick him further in the gutter. That is his party's philosophy.

He talks about German unification, that it is not going as smoothly as he said in this House, and this is just from speaking to members of Parliament from Germany a week ago. I do not know what German unification has to do with the starving and hungry people in Montreal who we are debating here today.

The honeymoon is over. After seven years in government, after seven budgets and countless throne speeches, that party can no longer blame previous governments for the people who are hungry, the unemployed, et cetera. We do not buy that any more and Canadians are not buying that.

He knows, and I remind him again, that when his party took over the coffers had $177 billion in public debt. Today it is close to $400 billion. That was not created by the Liberals. That was created by his party.

I would like to ask him about the food banks. I just talked to Gerard Kennedy this morning, director of the Daily Bread food bank in my riding. He is also the national spokesperson of the Canadian Association of Food Banks.

I will share this. On a national basis, in 1990 the Canadian Association of Food Banks statistics reveal that 496,000 people per month were using food banks; half a million people per month. In 1989 this figure was only 378,000. Can he blame that on the Liberals? He cannot blame that on the Liberals. That is happening on an annual basis while his party is in power. He should analyse his government's programs. Why are they not working? I wanted him to answer that but he shouted, he ranted, he raved and then he left the House. That is how the Tories do business. That is how the Tories care for the hungry in Montreal, in Vancouver, in Toronto and across this land.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is sad to have to face a debate like this in Canada in 1991. We have in this country tremendous resources. We have tremendous skills and tremendous capacity. We have people throughout our country who want to make a contribution to Canada and yet in many of our major cities and small towns we see people at the start of this decade facing poverty, experiencing unemployment and who consequently have a tremendous sense of despair and anger in many cases. I hope people have not entirely given up hope for their future and for the future of their country.

It is very easy as we look at the city of Montreal to see why people at this time might be losing hope. In our party we have had an economic recovery group which has been touring the country and visiting various parts of Canada, various communities across the country. The most recent place we visited was Montreal. I know Montreal as a place of joy, happiness and excitement because it is a place from which my wife comes. It is a place I know personally. It is a place with a joie de vivre that one cannot help but be impressed by.

I found that day of listening to social groups and popular groups in Montreal to be one of the saddest in our cross country tour because despite the magnificent buildings and the proud history of that city there is a devastating reality which many people in Montreal are feeling today.

It is a reality which they should not have to feel. It is a reality which should not be acceptable to us in this House of Commons. It should not be acceptable to government ministers or to members of the governing party who come from the city of Montreal. There should be a sense of crisis, a sense of response and a sense of caring. It is very, very difficult to feel.

[Translation]

There is in Montreal, Mr. Speaker, an organization called Sun Youth. Its role is to provide some $50 worth of food per month to seniors. Every Monday morning, more than 1,000 men and women stand in line to receive a meagre food surplus. For them it is enormous.

Two classes of seniors benefit from the help of Sun Youth. First, the over 65 who receive the income supplement given by the federal government. To get this supplement, they must be single and their income must be less than $10,000 a year. If they are married, the combined income should not exceed $13,500 a year. The Conservative government is really generous.

The other class of people helped by Sun Youth is the 60-65 who are on welfare. They are often poorer than the other ones. For them, there is no federal income supplement.

Yesterday, says The Gazette, some people fought and others fainted when standing in line. Sun Youth rents 200 chairs to sit people. Others must wait outside, standing. These are old and often sick men and women.

In the province of Quebec, 360,000 people receive a guaranteed income supplement. The vast majority of them live in Montreal.

Moreover, in some areas, like South Center, for example, South West, the Mont-Royal Plateau, Saint-Michel and Villeray, unemployment reaches more than 20 per cent. Some Montrealers describe the situation as similar in many ways to the economy of developing countries. It is not rosy.

Montreal has 374 food help organizations.

• (1550)

Less than half of these organizations existed 20 years ago. Their number has increased steadily. Before, they were limited to Montreal, but gradually they are moving to the suburbs, Laval in particular.

Unemployment in Montreal has increased by five points since last year. The manufacturing sector has been especially hard hit.

The Conservative government is telling us that it is generous in its assistance to Quebec and that it is looking after Montreal properly. The province of Quebec has a quarter of the Canadian population, yet it has also 32 per cent of its poor people!

The Quebec government was saying in its last budget that the cuts in established programs financing made by the Conservative government will cost the province $1.7 billion. The same is true for Ontario. Next year, it will be $2 billion more for Quebec. Cuts bring cuts. Provincial subsidies to municipal government must be reduced.

The debt of the City of Montreal has increased substantially this year, partly because of the recession. The main contributors to that debt are the subway extension and the building of water treatment facilities. The budget for green spaces has also been increased. All that is the bread and butter of Quebecers. The madness of the Conservative government is threatening such essential spending.

Meanwhile, the City of Montreal and its people are working as hard as they can to revitalize their economy and to find solutions to their problems. Several neighbourhoods that are quite affected by the economic downslide have created committees striving for economic recovery. Budgets are used to the maximum. Advertizing campaigns praise the very real assets of Montreal. But those incredible efforts will have been in vain if the federal government keeps on frustrating them and making believe, as it did recently in the Gaspé Peninsula, that it is helping the disadvantaged areas.

I have recently gone to Montreal with the NDP tour for economic recovery. I have met many individuals and groups. The CNTU handed me an analytical document explaining the solutions to the problems resulting from the recession. In that document, the CNTU states that the government and I quote: "has no real political will to build on the dynamism of the regions" in spite of the local initiatives undertaken.

Clearly the conservative government is not listening to the people. Otherwise, it would understand that real solutions exist. Montreal will soon celebrate its 350th anniversary. It will take a lot more than fine words like those expressed in the Speech from the Throne to help Montreal men and women in their efforts to boost their economy.

[English]

One has to take steps that are concrete. One has to do more than talk. One has to recognize the reality of the problems that face the city of Montreal. These problems were pointed out by André McNicholl, the Superintendent of Welfare Services for the city of Montreal last month, when he indicated that no less than 13.2 per cent of all Montreal residents now depend on welfare assistance. That means at least one-quarter of the city's residents are either living on welfare or unemployment insurance.

That is shameful in Canada in 1991. And yet the reality is, as we can see from the figures which deal with investment for Montreal, that its investment has fallen significantly in the aftermath of the free trade deal.

The Minister of Finance likes to get up and talk about how foreign investment has increased in 1990. What he does not indicate is that in Canada, in Quebec and specifically in Montreal, over-all investment has decreased. In the greater Montreal area, for instance, construction investment has decreased from approximately $3.4 billion in 1989 to $2.75 billion in 1990. That is the reality; decreases in investment and increases in unemployment. The only expanding sectors in the city of Montreal are food banks. That is where the expansion is taking place.

This is a sad commentary, not just on the failure of this government, but on the unfairness which this government and previous governments have built into the structure of our society, that the largest city in the province of Quebec should be suffering this double dilemma of increased poverty and increased unemployment. This is what is likely to condemn our country in the future to constitutional crisis after crisis because these crises do not just come about because of constitutional concerns, they have their roots in the fact that 25 per cent of Montrealers are either on welfare or unemployment insurance.

The only way that we will put this country right, put this country back together again, is to address these problems, to act concretely, to listen to the local solutions which the many popular groups are putting forward, to provide funding for those solutions at the national level and by showing that we in all of Canada care about Montreal and its reality. We must be able to demonstrate to all Quebecers that our country is going to be a united and fair country in the future.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by congratulating the member on his fine speech. As a Montrealer I want to say that I appreciate his comments with respect to our city.

I want to ask him this. For several years the Canadian Federation of Municipalities has suggested a tripartite program, a fund which would be contributed to by the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities to renew decaying urban infrastructure. I think they started to recommend such a program as far back as 1985.

The purpose of the recommendation was to renew decaying urban infrastructure, such things as roads, sewage systems, water treatment systems, anti-pollution systems, garbage treatment programs in cities, ports, airports, public transportations systems and so on, but also to create a lot of jobs.

When I raised this today in the debate one of the Conservative members who spoke accused me of simply putting forward suggestions that involve spend, spend, spend, throwing money at problems. It seems to me that when you spend money in this way you are renewing the infrastructure of a city which in turn provides a climate for investment and for economic growth.

I served with the hon. member on the committee looking at the free trade agreement and other committees that deal with economic matters, and he has a reputation on economic matters. What is his view? It seems to me that such a program would be extremely helpful to Montreal.

Montreal is a city with many decaying aspects in its infrastructure. It just cannot afford to go ahead without the help of the provincial and federal governments. Not only would we create a lot of jobs, but we would help Montreal renew itself and provide an environment and a climate for further investment.

By the way, the government has rejected that program time and time again. However, I do not think it is fair to simply describe it as another suggestion of throwing money at a problem. I would like to have the hon. member's assessment and the assessment of his party with respect to such a program to help our cities in this country.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, this suggestion of infrastructure renewal is something which we took very seriously when it was first put forward by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. It was something which we endorsed as part of our platform during the last election campaign.

At this stage, with over 10 per cent unemployment, it makes tremendous sense to undertake that kind of investment in our future economic growth. That is the key point. What we are talking about here is not expenditure in the sense of money which goes out and leaves nothing behind. Instead, we are talking about expenditure which is really an investment in future economic growth.

When a large company makes such an investment, for instance, in a new factory, or a new port facility or something like that, new transportation items which it is going to utilize, we do not say to that company: "You're being wasteful. You're spending". We say to that company: "Well, of course, that makes sense. If you are going to get an economic benefit out of that, this makes sense". And this is what will come.

One of the most noted economists in the United States, Robert Reich, has recently written in The Atlantic an answer to the question: "How do you become competitive in the future global economy?" You do it by investing in things that will help your future growth, such as investment in infrastructure.

This is what the New Democratic Party government in Ontario has been doing with its new policy of investment in infrastructure to fight the recession. I think it will benefit Ontario. It could certainly benefit Montreal as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for his excellent speech. I think he understands well the situation of Montreal. I would like to know what he thinks of what the mayor of that city suggested in his submission, on behalf of the city of Montreal, during the hearings of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. The mayor proposed "a way to the future for all of Quebec and also for Montreal, in which certain tools should be totally and exclusively in the hands of the state of Quebec". The tools and the skills that the mayor of Montreal favours are the following: education, manpower, professional training, immigration, language, culture, health, social services, environment and urban development.

These requests were made by the mayor of Montreal after extensive consultation with public interest groups, groups from Montreal and, I believe, active at the local level, and which have examined all of these issues. Therefore, I would like to know what the hon. member thinks of the proposal made by the mayor which has, of course, been approved by the city council, and also by the main interest groups in Montreal.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I think that those areas underlined by the mayor are doubtless important to the future of a city like Montreal. I think it must also be recognized that Mr. Doré made a real effort to consult public interest groups, community groups and local organizations.

I think this may be the problem with this government, the fact that it does not listen to public groups, to local organizations, and to community organizations because those groups that we met in Montreal two weeks ago have talked to us about education, training and environmental projects, as well as projects aimed at improving the infrastructure of the city of Montreal. Those are projects which can create jobs for Montrealers, and which represent an investment in the future of Montreal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The honourable Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first, I must say that I am very happy to take part in this debate, today. As a former businessman, I know Montreal, even if I come from a rural area, Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues described to you the strategies adopted by the government to develop the economic potential of the Montreal area. As for me, I would like to draw your attention on the measures taken by the government to develop international activities in Montreal.

The government believes that the development of international activities in Montreal is an excellent way to revitalize the regional economy. According to this logic, the government has decided to establish in Montreal the headquarters of the Canadian Space Agency to increase the stimulation of the existing potential, both in the related industrial activities and in the presence of Montreal in international networks.

Already, in 1986, the Picard Report had stressed that Montreal had the required qualifications to become an international city, including its bilingual and bicultural character. Montreal was at that time home for two prestigious international organizations, the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) and the International Air Transport Association (IATA). Since then, it welcomed the International Society of Aeronautical Telecommunications (ISAT). Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the Picard Report mentioned a positive factor for Montreal, and that is Canada's membership in organizations such as the Commonwealth and La Francophonie, which has helped several companies reach out to the world.

Mr. Speaker, the Picard Report recommended that all levels of government recognize the importance of international organizations and facilitate their establishment in Montreal. The Canadian government recognized this objective and committed itself to making Montreal an important world centre which would have branches of governmental and non-governmental organizations dealing with international affairs, as well as to developing and promoting other international activities in Montreal. To this end, the government worked on devising incentives which would attract such organisations and facilitate their operations.

As a first step, the government, jointly with the Quebec government and the City of Montreal, is helping the Société du centre de conférences internationales, a non-profit organization, to conduct studies on the feasibility of creating an international city and to make concrete proposals for the development of international activities in Montreal. The international city would bring together, under one roof, the ICAO headquarters, an international conference centre and other international activities or organizations.

Mr. Speaker, the government is waiting for a report on these studies before announcing a final decision about this project. The ICAO will decide on a possible move at its next plenary session in September 1992.

I would like to stress, Mr. Speaker, that the government signed last year an agreement with the ICAO in which we committed ourselves to providing better working conditions to this organization and its employees.

The federal government has recently contributed to the installation of three international organizations in Montreal. Last year, it created the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, which it put in Montreal and provided with a $15 million budget over 5 years. Under the direction of Mr. Ed Broadbent, whom hon. members know well, this organisation will contribute to the strengthening of democratic institutions and programs in the world by promoting research, sponsoring conferences and bringing technical assistance and financial help to local initiatives in the Third World.

It has also contributed $10 million to the establishment in Montreal of the permanent secretary of the Multilateral Fund of the Montreal Protocol on the Ozone Layer. This is the second United Nations organization, after the ICAO, to establish in Canada. It is an office composed of approximately twenty persons; its task is to administer an international fund which could grow to $240 millions in the next three years.

It also contributed financially to the establishment in Montreal of the head office of the International Centre of Films for Children and Young People (ICFCYP). This is an international association created under the United Nations auspices. It produces and distributes films which can promote a better understanding among nations.

As in the case of projects developed jointly by the private sector and the federal and other governments, the government supports a joint initiative of the Metropolitan Montreal Chamber of Commerce and the EDI Council of Canada. This initiative concerns the establishment of an office in Montreal for the realization of a program for the promotion and training on EDI and the management of activities pertaining to the creation of an EDI international agency. EDI is a process of electronic data exchange which helps firms to save a lot of money and to be more efficient and faster in their exchanges. In this matter, like England and the Netherlands, the government supports the development of these kinds of activities in Montreal. It helped establish a non-profit corporation, under a board of directors whose members are prominent in the trade and transportation sector in Montreal, including the Port of Montreal and shipping, railway and trucking companies, for the purpose of introducing an EDI system that will meet the needs of the transportation industry and related sectors. The results of this initiative will be an important part of the process of setting up the EDI Institute.

Although the list of federal initiatives in the international field in Montreal is a long one, there are four more measures I must mention:

First, support for establishing an institute for creativity and design research will promote, stimulate and enhance the development of skills Canadian and excellence of international calibre in various design disciplines.

Second, support for institutions specializing training such as the Telecommunications Executive Management Institute of Canada (TEMIC), established in Montreal in 1986. The institute has attracted over 200 managers from 70 countries who acquired telecommunications skills, thanks to co-operation between the private sector, including Bell Canada, Teleglobe, Northern Telecom, and the government.

Third, support for the International Aviation Management Training Institute (IAMTI) which after four years has 1,200 graduates in 120 countries.

Fourth, the patent legislation (Bill C-22) passed by Parliament to promote research and development in the pharmaceutical industry. As a result of this legislation, many pharmaceutical companies located in Montreal have started to expand their facilities.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that these examples have demonstrated the Canadian government's commitment to implementing a concrete policy for developing and promoting international activities in Montreal. In fact, the government is very much aware of the need to include both business, educational institutions, and international governmental and non-governmental organizations in these activities. Only by fostering joint action by both the private and public sectors, Mr. Speaker, can the government contribute to the long-term economic development in the Montreal area.

Today, Mr. Speaker, Montreal should be able to develop adequately its high-technology sector and to strengthen its traditional industry. The most frequent issues preventing Montreal from reaching these objectives without the governement intervention are, among others, the shortage of a highly skilled work force, the lack of investment in research and development, the absence of risk capital to start up small high-technology businesses and a weak partnership from universities, industries, financial institutions in particular. Various governments have already recognized the weaknesses of Montreal, particularly in the east and the south-west of the city, where special programs have been implemented. It is the reason why, in concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform my colleagues of the official opposition and the others members of this Parliament that, on my suggestion, the Quebec Conservative caucus will be held in Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, in the beautiful city of Rivière-du-Loup, in August. I asked the executive of the Quebec caucus to put on the agenda a discussion of Montreal and its regions, not only by the members from Montreal and the surrounding areas, but also by all the members from the province of Quebec. With my background as a businessman, I consider Montreal to be the heart and the engine of the economy of the province of Quebec.

Starting from there, Mr. Speaker, if we are able to find solutions that will help Montreal create jobs, then we will also get into the context of the rural world symposium that was held in Montreal in the beginning of February. We will then keep our youth from leaving for Montreal. We will be able to keep them in the regions.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I really appreciated the hon. member's comments. I know his intentions are good, and I have no doubts about the Ministers' intents and that of the Government, but unfortunately the programs under way are not working. That is why Montreal has the highest unemployment rate of all Canadian cities. That is why the number of Montrealers living in poverty is also the highest in Canada. So there are good programs. The minister mentioned Canadair. It is working very well, but in East-Montreal, as well as in the southwestern part, the unemployment rate is up to 25 per cent. We have to try something else.

Even in the Speech from the Throne, the government promised to create jobs for of the year 2000. I suggest the development of a program creating jobs for 1991 and 1992, and I wish the government will be able to do it, to move forward on the program mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I ask the member to tell me this: Does he not agree that we should try something else, new things, for Montreal, because the situation is very bad. Morale is very bad right now in Montreal and we ought to use our imaginations to develop programs which will really change the situation.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-grâce. I know he too believe in the economic development of Montreal and I know he knows that if the city's economic development is successful the province as a whole will benefit from it. But I would also like to remind him of this last week, the Minister of Health, who is also responsible for economic development in Quebec, was accused of creating a department for Economic Development in Quebec. That is when this House became a proper madhouse. The federal governement was occured of trying to interfere in Quebec's affairs.

And I know that my honourable colleague for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce knows full well that in June of 1988, the Quebec Premier, Robert Bourassa, and the Prime Minister, Brian Mulroney, signed in the City of Montreal an economic development agreement 850 million dollars over five years, not to mention programs from other departments as well, Mr. Speaker. It was strictly for economic development. As an ex-Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, I can tell you that the federal funds are but not those of Quebec as yet.

So we want something new. Yes, something different will have to be done. We do not want the federal government to interfere anymore in the affairs of the Quebec government, whether it is education, industry, immigration or what have you. I have nothing against the Constitution, but I am fed up with hearing about it, Mr. Speaker.

When I decided to campaign in 1984, I wanted to be a member of the House of Commons in order to talk about the construction sector. That is what I told my constituents. We are now in 1991, and we are still discussing the Constitution. I keep on saying to the people in my riding that other members are there for that job and that I personally talk about construction. And for as long as I will be here, that is what I will do. If, in the fall of 1992, the province of Quebec decides to part from Canada and opts for sovereignty, by way of a referendum or another process, or if Quebec decides to accept the offers that the federal government or the other provinces will have made to it and if it is decided that responsibility for economic development must remain in Quebec, then, Mr. Speaker, I will respect that decision.

But right now, in 1991, on June 4 to be more precise, I would like to have the support of the official opposition to say that, as far as Quebec's economic development is concerned, the money available must be spent as soon as possible.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup for his excellent speech. My friend—at least, he used to be and I still consider him as such—dealing mainly with international trade, of course he praised the federal government efforts in obtaining international recognition for Montreal. But, as we know, what we find the most in Montreal are service industries which do not generate many jobs. Manufacturing companies, on the other hand, provide a lot of employment. That is where we are up against serious problems.

A typical example of this can be found in my riding, with Pratt & Whitney. It has laid off about 1,000 workers so far. While the federal government is boasting and saying that it wants to develop the aeronautical and aerospace industry in Montreal, it appears that the Industrial Development Fund for Western Canada is negotiating arrangements with the federal government and Pratt & Whitney to relocate Montreal plants in Western Canada.

So, when they try and make us believe that they are serious about wanting Montreal to become a development is centre in the field of aeronautics and aerospace technology, believe me, it is a load of rubbish. In fact, it is quite a different story. All that kind of work is being shipped out of the greater Montreal area. That is what is really happening! Check it out for yourselves.

Another big problem is lack of consultation. Here is another striking example. When the former Minister of Transport decided to apply the axe to VIA Rail—and I was not against that—many jobs were lost in the Montreal region due to the way it was done. The Quebec government and the city of Montreal should have been consulted first to find out what they thought of VIA Rail. I might have been interested to involve some commuter trains. The Quebec government also should have been involved because when you unilaterally decide to close down a business of that significance for the transport industry while ignoring Quebec and the municipality, well, you may well destroy what could have been built. Everybody could have been involved in this decision, which would have probably saved billions of dollars and also jobs in the Montreal region.

Now, what the government is doing basically is to act on its own, as the NDP member was saying earlier. And every time the federal government is taking some action there is no consultation process. Therefore, because of this lack of consultation Montreal has now a 15 per cent level of unemployment.

A little money now and then for the sake of showing that things are being done for regional development does not mean that real action is being taken. It is by consulting—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but in all fairness, I have to interrupt the hon. member in order to allow his colleague to answer.

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Longueuil, talks a lot about consultation and seems to be very familiar with that matter. I have just made an announcement in this House regarding the Quebec summer caucus meeting of the Conservative Party, to be held in Rivière-du-Loup, August 23, 24 and 25 and I have invited all opposition members to present us with some suggestions. That is what consultation is all about.

If he wants to help Montreal and the surrounding area, well, he should let us know what needs to be done. We have ideas of our own, but we would also welcome theirs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Mount Royal has ten minutes.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member read Hansard. He will find some wonderful ideas for his caucus meeting.

I am really quite pleased to speak to a very important proceeding put forward by my colleague from NDG. I thank him most sincerely for having brought to light a serious situation in Canada, in particular in the capital of unemployment in this country, Montreal. I would suggest that people read the enlightened debate that he has made. It is fulsome and carries much important information in that regard.

It is a sad time as well for me because I would like to have had the time to address both the failure of this government's general economic thrust and its national outlook, as well as the situation in the riding of Mount Royal to give the local picture. While these situations may be seen as separate, the experience directly translates from one level to the other.

I do welcome, however, the opportunity to reflect the concerns and the anxieties being felt by my constituents in Mount Royal about the sad state of the country, about the sad state of the economy, about how it is affecting them wherever they live, whatever their businesses are, no matter what their background, the economic status, the level of education, their mother tongue, their country of origin, no matter what they look like, no matter where they live in their homes, in their apartment buildings, and in the worst case, in the street.

They are seeing reality every day on the streets of Mount Royal riding, in community centres and in the food banks. They are seeing images of hunger, of tremendous social needs going unmet. I would like to present some very interesting, yet disturbing statistics in a few moments.

Meanwhile, this very insensitive government, concerned only with the bottom line of its economic budget, moves uncaringly along and says: "We can do no more. Our hands are tied. The deficit is too important. We just can't afford it". I say the question now has become: "We just can't afford not to help".

National problems are also local problems. The people of Mount Royal riding, like the people of all of Canada, know that this government has an economic performance record that is very sad. They know that old saying: "Tory times are tough times".

If we look at what the headlines have been in the last few days—

—they say that "Ottawa has taken out of the pockets of families $1,530 more since 1980". The Conservative government got that money from the pockets of the average Canadian family through new taxes since 1984, which represents a more rapid increase than in any other large developed country, according to the data from a new study.

Since 1984, the growth of the net share of federal taxes has represented a draw of $1,530 for an average family of 2.3 persons. This growth is due to the increase in income taxes, the surtaxes, the sales and excise taxes, to the rise of premiums for the Unemployment Insurance and the Pension Plans, and to the lowering of family allowances and old age pensions. These numbers take into account the federal sales tax refunds and the individual child tax credits. And I point out that even Otto Jelinek, the Minister of National Revenue, has suggested that high taxes are one of the reasons Canadians go shopping in the United States, whereas Mr. Mazankowski, the Minister of Finance, denied that Canadians are overtaxed and warned taxpayers that they better not expect any tax decreases as long as the government do not succeed in curbing the deficit. But they had much time to curb that deficit during the good years, from 1984 to 1990.

[English]

The worst recession in the industrial world is taking place and it has been a made-in-Canada recession. The national debt has been doubled and, of course, it is our fault. The middle class is suffering from higher taxes, including the GST, while the government somehow claims that the GST has saved them money. Well, I know what it saves them. Headlines and research have shown us that it saves them on paper clips and mascara—not exactly bread and butter. What the government did at the time it did it was absolutely unconscionable. That is what brought on an increased recession.

As I have said, we are living in a made-in-Canada recession with high interest rates and a high dollar causing more plants to close or to move south. All the plant closures leave even more people inadequately trained for new jobs with no government plans for retraining. Unemployment is inordinately high, particularly among the youth. More families are being turned into the streets every day because they cannot make mortgage payments or even rent their own apartments. Food for many families is becoming a luxury. Food banks are busier than they should ever be, I spoke to the issue of the food banks in my own riding.

Official unemployment is over 14 per cent in Montreal in 1991, up from 10.4 per cent in 1990. This comes from the CSN findings taken in May 1991. With respect to people looking for work, the unemployed have increased from 346,000 in March 1990 to 486,000 people in Quebec in March 1991, and 250,000 in the city of Montreal alone.

It is an absolutely unconscionable critique of this government which is well founded and well documented.

Tens of thousands are on social welfare in the city of Montreal and in my own riding. Yet there has been no talk from this government of job creation, of an industrial strategy, of child care, of regional development, of any new partnership, or of any programs that would renew the municipal infrastructure and make Montreal more liveable in many ways and create more jobs.

The members opposite continue to support this government which calls itself a successful financial manager. It is certainly not a very successful human manager, if it cares to target itself in any way.

The situation in my own riding is very desperate. This is a valuable opportunity to let people know some of the realities being faced every day in the Mount Royal riding in our province of Quebec which the conference board says has been the hardest hit of any province in this recession. Headlines have proclaimed Montreal the unemployment capital of Canada.

Let me first highlight some of the characteristics of my riding which, by no means, fits the image many people have, and certainly does not fit the Quebec or Canadian averages in terms of population make-up, or its socio-economic structure. I am talking about a population of close to 100,000 which includes a significant immigration population from the world over: southeast Asia, Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, the Caribbean, Africa, Europe, the Middle East, Eastern Europe, seniors, single parent families, two parent families, employed and unemployed.

It is very interesting. We have a very skewed riding population.

[Translation]

The group of 65 and more represents 17.4 per cent in Côte-des-Neiges, 18.4 per cent in Snowdon, 24 per cent in Côte-Saint-Luc—Hampstead, and 10 per cent in the whole province of Quebec. That should be taken into consideration.

Single parent families headed by a woman represent 18 per cent in Côte-des-Neiges, 19 per cent in Snowdon, 11 per cent in Côte-Saint-Luc—Hampstead, 16 per cent in Mount Royal and 14,4 per cent in the province of Quebec.

[English]

I go on and these are the findings of DSC, Département de santé communautaire de l'Hôpital Sainte-Justine which have just been deposited in April of this year.

If you look at:

[Translation]

—ethnic origin other than French and British, it is 44,3 per cent in Côte-des-Neiges, 61.7 per cent in Snowdon, 70.7 per cent in Côte-Saint-Luc—Hampstead, 31.6 per cent in Outremont—Mount Royal and 10.5 per cent in Quebec. Does that tell you something?

The proportion of immigrant population born outside Montreal and outside Quebec, is 41 per cent in Côte-des Neiges, 53 per cent in Snowdon, 37 per cent in Côte-Saint-Luc—Hampstead and 25 per cent in Mount Royal. It is 8.2 per cent for the province of Quebec.

The distribution of people who did not complete their ninth year as follows: 14 per cent in Côte-des Neiges, 19.4 per cent in Snowdon, 14 per cent in Côte-Saint-Luc—Hampstead and 8 per cent in Mount Royal. It is 23 per cent for the province of Quebec.

Unemployment figures are really incredible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! I have to remind the hon. member that she has had the floor for ten minutes. Unless her party indicates to me that she has twenty minutes, I will have to interrupt her at this point.

Questions and comments. The hon. member for Longueuil has the floor.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I started earlier to talk about consultation. You know, the lack of consultation is the biggest problem that businesses have in Quebec.

At the provincial level, we have the Department of Industry and Trade, the CRIQ and the QIDC. At the federal level, we have the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, the Federal Business Development Bank and numerous other programs. Provincial programs do not apply the same criteria as federal programs. From a federal point of view, the regions are Quebec, Ontario, Western Canada and the Maritimes. From a provincial point of view, the regions are Gaspésie, Lac Saint-Jean, etc.

Because of that, business people looking for help encounter serious difficulties, to a point where they finally get discouraged. This is one of the main reasons why Montreal cannot develop itself. It is one of the reasons why small and medium firms in Montreal eventually give up, in the first place—

Mr. Corbeil: We need to discuss,—

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Yes, as the Minister of Transport just said, we need to discuss, but he was among those who refused—it is a well known fact—when I was a member of the Conservative Party, to organize in Metropolitan Montreal a caucus which task would have been to hold consultations on the city's development. He refused to do that. Why? Because he wanted to be the only one able to make gifts to firms. That is what happened then.

It is today's Minister of Transport who is responsible for the area, and it is the same minister who refused that Conservatives meet together in a caucus in Montreal to work with the Metropolitan Montreal Chamber of Commerce and others. This is why I had to ask a question—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I certainly want to be tolerant but I must remind the hon. members that when they have the floor in a questions and comments period, they must ask questions to the previous speaker or make comments on his or her speech. Please keep that rule in mind. I'm sorry but I must add that it is not the time to make a speech. It is a period for questions or comments. You have taken two minutes, almost three, out of a period of five. If you want an answer, please ask the question.

Does the hon. member for Mount Royal have any comment in reply to the hon. member for Longueuil?

[English]

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I find that the inappropriate intervention of this member also indicates his inappropriate understanding of the city of Montreal, of the ethnic origin of many of our people and of the problems that we live with on a daily basis. He is only concerned about the state of the nation, not the state of the people.

I would like to point out to him that I have 10,156 beneficiaries on social welfare in my area. The level of poverty of children is one out of five. They are hungry. We have food banks that feed them. The unemployment level for the young people is inordinately high, at 25 per cent. With respect to the age spectrum in my riding, with the large number of children who are a part of the social welfare and benefit package and the number of elderly in my province, the housing policy that this government has put into place is totally disgraceful. Only 17 per cent of the people in the Montreal area can afford to buy a home on their own.

Fifty per cent has been cut by this government to the co-op program; 40 per cent has been cut to social housing for the elderly; 40 per cent has been cut for single parents and for families. There have been cuts to the CMHC that are totally unconscionable. CHIP is gone, COSP is gone and rental rehabilitation housing programs are gone. In my area we had to close down four huge apartment buildings because they were full of cockroaches and rats and the toilet bowls were broken. We have crack shops where the young people are now being exposed to drugs. Juvenile crime is up.

Why is it? It is because you have not put money into infrastructure or into rebuilding the housing in the area and we have a huge immigrant population still flowing in: 35,000 Vietnamese now live in this area and more and more are coming. Do you think they want to live in such a dangerous environment?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I am puzzled, because, from what I hear from government members, the situation is very cheerful. So, tell me, if things go so well, why is everything so bad?

Last Friday, May 24, I think, members from my caucus and myself had an excellent meeting in Montreal with our friends—and I call them my friends—, from the Conseil central de Montréal of the Confédération des syndicats nationaux. We enjoyed a warm welcome. Regardless of our political ideas about the future of the Confederation and other matters, we met with reprentatives from a dozen unions. They pointed very clearly to us that they were planning a meeting with members of the provincial Parti Québécois, with members of the Quebec Liberal Party and, give the devil his due, with a few friends from the Bloc, but they were still waiting for an answer from the Quebec Conservative caucus.

• (1650)

Because I like accuracy I just double-checked with our same friends of the Conseil central de Montreal, who told us—I will be courteous, I will not give the names of the hon. members, but I think you take my word, these were a few names—"Yes, yes, plan it for next fall, we will see what we can do at that time." These are the people who set up a very important organization called L'offensive contre la récession, to fight against poverty in same areas of Montreal.

I look at the minister responsible for the Montreal area and I will never forget the very wise words uttered, when I was a young parliamentarian, by Jean Marchand, a great trade unionist who had a thorough understanding of Quebec, who was not from Montreal and who kept saying all the time: "Montreal is the engine of Quebec." Some parts of Montreal are even worse off than the City as a whole. They are the parts we should think about in particular.

In keeping with the high level of the debate I would like to see, if my colleagues allow, I must say that I had the impression of hearing the same thing from the previous speaker. He is not from Quebec City, he is from Rivière-du-Loup—Kamouraska. Here is a man, a Conservative member, who is going to organize a caucus meeting of Conservative members from Quebec, where you will be, Mr. Speaker, in Rivière-du-Loup—an area which I invite people to visit—and who says he thought it would be a good thing to have a special workshop on Montreal, in fact he demanded it. This is unbelievable, it takes someone from Rivière-du-Loup—Kamouraska to make up members from Montreal. He understood that when Montreal is not doing well, the whole of Quebec isn't either.

It somewhat reminds me of a very popular folksong that we used to sing in Quebec when I was young: "Tout va très bien, madame la marquise, tout va très bien, tout va très bien." Don't worry, everything is fine, except that I should tell you that there is 13.1 per cent unemployment in Montreal, the highest unemployment rate in all the Canadian cities. Everything is fine, seems to be saying the minister responsible. Everything is fine, Madam, don't worry. Except that there is another small fire: 22 per cent of the people live in poverty in some part of Montreal. But, don't worry, Madam, everything is fine!

Well, it is not what the people of the Conseil central des syndicats nationaux de Montréal told us. It is not what they experience every day. It is not, Mr. Minister-in-charge, what I see in my riding. In the municipality of Saint-Jean-de-la-Croix, people are now saying: "We live in Saint-Jean-de-la-Misère." I say: "Listen, we have had enough of this depression, this discouragement." But it is not easy to go and tell that to people who are losing their jobs and who are saying: "I heard the minister say: 'Don't worry, we have great big plans for high technology projects, jobs that will pay well." But how do you help these people, who cannot even apply for the POWA, the Program for Older Worker Adjustment, and who are probably undergoing a painful experience because they are too old and uneducated. So it is very difficult to put them back in the workforce, when they were looking for assistance programs, for ways to help the company they were working for.

And people are asking: What do you want from us with those high interest rates? Those are not my words, they are the words of our friends from the CNTU and the Conseil central des syndicats nationaux de Montréal, which are complaining bout high interest rates, unemployment, POWA, unemployment insurance reform and tax reform. They are saying that even if they would like to believe in what the Canada-United States agreement brought or could bring, the only thing they have noticed, despite their competent statisticians and researchers, was that thousands of jobs have been directly lost because of the Free Trade Agreement. The agreement has not yet been absorbed, and already it is evident that they are trying to put at risk the manufacturing industry, which is to be found in the poorer areas of Montreal. They are not the most lucrative jobs, but try telling that to the people of Saint-Édouard, Sainte-Cécile, Parc Extension, in Montreal. Try telling that to the new immigrants who work from early in the morning through late at night in small plants just because they want to work—I say that for those who form the majority in Quebec—and they now see these plants closing one after the other.

I can see the other Minister, the Minister of Multiculturalism. I know he is sensitive to these matters, to the needs of these new immigrants who do not hold the better jobs and who have no education. It is not enough to say: "Not to worry, everything is fine, because some high technology jobs have been created." We clearly need these jobs, but what of all those who are discouraged and who, day by day, are moving nearer to family separation?

The minister should come and visit Montreal because some parts of the city have no idea of what is going on elsewhere in Montreal. The Petite patrie is not Ville d'Anjou. It is not, with all due respect to some of my colleagues, the district of Saint-Léonard, that of my collegue, the Chief Opposition Whip, the member for Saint-Léonard.

In some neighbourhoods, even if you announce big new and important programs, it is so sad! The minister should go there to really feel the pulse.

But first of all, to be more down-to-earth, you should force your Montreal and provincial caucus to meet our friends from the CNTU. The last caucus did not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must interrupt the hon. member for Saint-Denis unless there is unanimous consent of the House.

Questions and comments for a period of five minutes. The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

[English]

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I recall back in the late 1960s when the hon. member was the parliamentary secretary to the then federal minister of regional economic expansion, or I think perhaps it was the department of economic expansion for Canada, the Hon. Don Jamieson. I am wondering what advice the hon. member would have for the Government of Canada, or for anyone who is trying to tackle this incredibly big problem experienced in his riding and in the city of Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): I thank my colleague first, for his good memory and second, for his question.

As we say, critics are easy when they are not followed by positive suggestions. Now, I will give you a brief example. Then I will leave it for the minister to reflect upon. It is a bit in answer to your question.

• (1700)

In my constituency, we have tried something that exists nowhere else. It fulfills a dream I always had. I realized that after all, federal, provincial as well as municipal representatives are all elected by the same people. So, we created what is called a consultation committee. Its the in thing nowadays. Two of our members are provincial ministers, two are federal MPs, three are municipal councillors—those are the only ones I will name, that is Mr. Bielo, Mrs. Blanc, Mr. Berthelet, who is President of the Montreal Municipal Council, Minister Sirros, Minister Trépanier, my colleague André Ouellet and myself. We get together and we talk of what happened to RRAP projects.

So we do work here and we try to ask questions. It is up to the local government first to show that the various levels of government can work together. It was in a way Don Jamieson's approach. He never undertook anything before making sure first and foremost that he had the full, total and complete cooperation of the members opposite. When there were some problems, Don would say: we are going to try to do something by phone. I wonder how often people are on the phone. They must not be on the phone often, since I am told that now in Quebec city everybody is tearing up its clothes at the national assembly since Mr. Benoît Bouchard has announced the establishment of a new department. This is a rather unexpected statement, probably to tell people from Gaspe: I am going to pay you a visit but, please do not throw rocks at me, I have great news for you. Then instead of some concrete announcement, they get a new minister! Well it was not the way Don Jamieson used to do things, nor was it Otto Lang's way although he was a tough and disciplined man. But it was probably what I call——the golden age of what Canada knows. I must recognize that it is more difficult today.

[English]

[Translation]

But there is one thing I have to acknowledge: there has not been, first and foremost, that kind of consultation— I see people smiling on the other side. Let me tell you something, Mr. Speaker. You first have to be able to recognize that there is a problem, you cannot spend all your time saying: There is no problem, just a few poor people here and there, but look at what the future holds for us, with all that high technology, et cetera. Yes, that is true. We do need well-paid jobs for our young people. But what do we do in the meantime? You simply refuse to admit that there is a problem out there.

The minister keeps talking about when the Liberals were in office. I challenge anyone of those who will speak after me to stop using that phrase. Let me tell you what I hear in my riding, and I will conclude with these words. Each time you use that argument, if I could rise, I would prove to you that sincerity still does pay in politics. Stop saying: "In the days of the Liberals!" I see my leader who will take part in the debate. Well, he too can show humility when people keep telling him: "Yes, but in the days of the Liberals." We have been judged in 1984 by a team saying that they could do better. It is a difficult admission to make for a politician, is it not?

And we have been judged again in 1988. So, stop using this argument that is not a valid one, that makes yourself ridiculous when you say—

An hon. member: You are a former serviceman!

Mr. Prud'homme: Yes, I am a former serviceman. I am a man of discipline. But then, you were supposed— Here comes the minister with his tired old refrain— He is not able to recognize that there is a problem, so he will keep singing: "Don't worry, be happy. The situation is disastrous in Montreal, but don't worry, except for that everything is fine, I keep an eye open for problems with the new minister" who is not really a minister, who appointed himself but will get demoted—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis.

[English]

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join in this debate to discuss the economic development challenge in Montreal, and to join the other speakers who have recorded the concerns we all have for a full and equal share on the part of Montrealais in this economic recovery program.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce asks this government to create jobs in Montreal. Here is our response. Mr. Speaker, this government spent more than $32 million during the last year to do precisely that. Did my colleague mention it in his motion? I do not think so.

It bears repeating that between April 1, 1990 and March 31, 1991, this government spent more than $32 million, $32,076,850 to be specific, in order to create jobs in the city of Montreal, and 7,925 people benefitted from this help. Part of this money was used to protect jobs, which is more or less like creating new ones. If a job is at risk and the government steps in to protect it, it is like job creation.

[English]

Work sharing is a godsend for a company that is staring disaster in the face and will have to lay off and thus lose valued skilled workers in order to survive. The work sharing program, by shortening the work week by one to three days, lets workers keep their jobs, thereby keeping up their skills.

I can speak from personal experience in the riding of Lachine that the work sharing program is working. With the aid of the Government of Canada two of our major corporations, Jenkins Incorporated and one other, have applied for and received the support they needed to keep those jobs alive.

Job creation, as any employer knows, always happens when there are workers around with the right skills or people with the ability to learn the job quickly and then relearn it when some new technology or method comes along that radically changes the nature of the job, rendering the old skills obsolete.

[Translation]

I am talking about people who can adjust, Mr. Speaker, people who can read, count and understand a manual or remember complex instructions, people who are part of today's culture and who can learn the required skills when they are needed. Those are the people who would really create jobs, people who can adjust. The 8,000 Montrealers or so who got help from the government last year all have skills or had to learn some in order to play an active role in the work force.

Those who had practically no useful skills were registered in a government job training program. Now, thanks to training funded by our government, those Montrealers are on their way to self-sufficiency again.

[English]

The training costs for about 100 unemployed, unskilled people anywhere in the country can run close to $1 million, or on a per capita basis roughly $8,500 to $10,000 per individual trainee. I mention this to point out how much it costs to properly train an unskilled, unemployed person for work. In fact, re-employment training is so expensive that it requires the involvement of many partners to make it viable.

The government funds skills training programs for the unemployed.

• (1710)

The government also wants to encourage employers to fund training and retraining for their workers who may be at risk or falling behind in productivity.

This morning in Lachine, I learned that there was a meeting of some 80 employers, industrial and commercial companies, with the school authority, together with the support of the Government of Canada, for the very purpose of organizing these very courses to bring those basic skills into the work place.

I am proud that there is this initiative, and I am sure it is being repeated and will be repeated right across the country. The government wants to encourage employers to fund training and retraining for their workers who may be at risk of falling behind in productivity.

That is why in the Speech from the Throne the government vowed to begin the effort now to quadruple the training provided by employers to their employees.

[Translation]

Our training programs help the unemployed to acquire basic and vocational skills which they need to find a job. Employers can also help their staff to keep their skills up to date and prevent them from loosing their job.

[English]

Survival skills include communication, mathematics and job search techniques, basic skills that you and I acquired long ago and now take for granted. Deprived of these basic skills, one is bound to lose his or her self-esteem. We have a particular example of this among the management and executive professional class in the west of Montreal.

There is a self-help program, Executives Available, which has put together the self-assistance and encouragement that allows those people who have been without work and losing confidence to come back into the work force with a new sense of confidence.

As all of us know, the loss of self-esteem usually cancels or depreciates one's ability and desire to compete in today's fast changing job market.

Basic training skills therefore start the unemployed person back on the road to recovery. That is why this training is so vital to our re-employment strategy. That is why re-employment training can cost $10,000 per trainee.

The re-learning of basic survival skills is often slow and time consuming, eating up training dollars before the occupational training takes place. It is why we made the unemployment insurance system more flexible and why we are using UI moneys to help claimants require skills through training and get back to work faster.

Our reform of the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C-21, so actively resisted by opposition members has become an integral part of our effort to create jobs through training. That is what Canadians say they want, work and not welfare.

[Translation]

Bill C-21 was generally perceived as a measure intended to change the rules governing benefits. That is only half the truth. The bill really contained provisions to eliminate certain factors likely to deter the unemployed to go back to work. It did justice to families whose parents are working, to older workers and others, by giving them access to unemployment benefits.

[English]

Equally important are measures that brought the UI program into line with the labour market of the 1990s, a labour market which is very different from the one that existed when UI was first set up.

The nature of and causes of unemployment today are very different from those of 10, 20 and 30 years ago. At one time, temporary passive income support made sense for someone out of work because unemployment was something they could simply wait out.

Today, that passive approach can easily be a ticket to permanent unemployment.

Today people are out of work even when jobs are available because their skills just do not match the demands of the marketplace. No amount of waiting will change that.

If UI is to continue to function effectively as a safety net, people need to be able to use it more constructively as a tool for re-employment through training and counselling that will help them re-enter a changing workplace.

The Labour Force Development Strategy announced in 1989 is a strategy that places a major emphasis on skills development, counselling and employment training. It designates some $550 million a year for 60,000 UI recipients who previously were not eligible for job training.

The LFDS is an internationally proven formula for strengthening a country's labour force and contains measures geared specifically to help communities such as the one the hon. member represents. These measures include strengthening the Community Futures Program and the Industrial Adjustment Service.

Both programs are receiving additional funding under LFDS. Community Futures Program will see its 1991 budget increased from $50 million to $198 million, while Industrial Adjustment Service's allocation is being doubled from $15 million to $30 million.

These programs cost a lot of money but in human terms, skills training for the unemployed appears on the credit side of any social ledger, yielding benefits not in dollars, but in human achievement.

[Translation]

If it were possible to represent the well-being using a balance sheet, the lack of retraining would surely appear under the liabilities, because it results in prolonged unemployment, in lost productivity, in increasing dissatisfaction, and in the wasting of human resources.

That is a terrible perspective for our fragile economy, which is already undermined by the shortages of manpower and by the very limited training possibilities offered by the private sector.

[English]

We must improve the climate of the labour market by building a stronger learning culture and providing more training opportunities for those who need it most. The training of workers helps Canada's economy by easing skills shortages. Training the unemployed offsets the costly side effects of unemployment, such as crime, disease, substance abuse and family and mental breakdown.

With respect to training workers, Canada needs a training compact between workers and employers. The private sector knows better than government where and how training should be provided and yet formal training is currently offered by only one quarter of Canada's businesses.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is why we have devoted more money to vocational training and development than any other Canadian government before us. We did so when we became aware of the difficult economic climate in the world.

[English]

I am confident that the training and adjustment programs this government is delivering in Montreal and across the country will be of long-term benefit to Montrealers and Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to put a question to the hon. member, especially since he was a minister in 1986, when the Conservative government set up a committee to study the economic development of Montreal.

• (1720)

I have here an article from The Gazette of Montreal, dated November 25, 1986. A group, known as the Consultative Committee on the Development of the Montreal Region, made up of members of the city, business, labour, art and the administrative circle selected by the Progressive Conservative government, were told to prepare a strategic blueprint for development of the regional economy. It came up with 86 recommendations for the ten cabinet ministerial mandate to come up with solutions to Montreal's economic woes.

Obviously, those ten ministers that were supposed to be in charge of the economic development of Montreal did not do their job since Montrealers are poorer and poorer everyday. You only have to take a look at press clippings from newspapers like La Presse, The Gazette and Le Journal de Montréal that talk about 188 000 unemployed in Montreal, that talk about 615 000 people linving in poor households, that talk about an economic slump in the Montreal area, and especially in the city of Montreal.

I ask the hon. member: Why didn't this government implement the recommandations contained in the Picard Report? Secondly, why did the Conservative government put an end to the cooperative housing assistance program? If there is one area where it is important to help the poor people, the low income families, the senior citizens looking for an affordable housing, it is certainly in East Montreal. But the Conservative government completely gave up the social housing construction, completely gave up the co-operative housing program. Why this lack of concern from the Conservative government?

[English]

Mr. Layton: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague raises the question of the ministerial committee that was formed by our government to look at the problems which developed in Montreal when the recovery economically in the Montreal region did not match what was happening in other provinces across the country. It was quite readily recognized that Montreal was losing its lead role in a number of sectors.

I was proud to be part of that ministerial committee. I know that the council we asked for advice, under Mr. Picard, performed a very special service to the city of Montreal with its many recommendations. Its primary theme was that we had at least four or five pillars on which we should continue to build Montreal's vocation, the international role of Montreal being the first. Montreal, including the nearby communities, should be recognized as an access to the international world with the many international institutions which exist there already. We should be recognized without question.

Second, I represent a community that is very much a part of the transportation activities which centre in Canada. Whether it be by air, by rail or by road, Montreal is and will continue to be the centre and the source of leadership in this field.

Third, the communications sector. Major telephone, radio and other activities centre in Montreal. Fourth, the biotechnological field. Montreal was recognized as having a basic force in all of these sectors and our government has reinforced this with many initiatives.

In a review in which I participated in Montreal some months ago, many if not almost all of the recommendations of the Picard commission had been put into effect. As to the suggestion made by my colleague in his second question that Montreal is not responding to the needs in housing to the limit that a government in association with the provincial governments and the municipal government should, this government has worked to assure the development of all kinds of housing accommodations. It is never as much as a society needs but it is a long step in that direction.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun—Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, just a comment on what the hon. member for Lachine—Lac Saint-Louis said. You know, people say that you cannot always blame the Liberal Party for its past wrongdoings and that is why people changed governments. But that fellow who was there in the 1970, with all the programs that he set up for Montreal and the Quebec region, did nothing more than put plasters on wounds, because he said: "It is good for elections. Once we win seats in Montreal, all will be forgotten.

Suddenly, we realize, in Montreal, that people lack training and need special programs for economic development—

Now, I hear the hon. member for Saint-Denis. He is like his friend, the president of the CNTU. He had better sit with his friends of the Bloc québécois, with the extremists, because, you know, there is a hot line between the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie and the CNTU. So, the member for Saint-Denis, instead of shouting and getting elected on promises that will never be kept, could perhaps sit with them and have a hot line and find himself a job for the future.

But you know, Mr. Speaker, what we want to do is to train people and help them to pull through by themselves. It is not the government, we cannot perform miracles. I look at the Liberal Party members in front of us who just applauded their leader. They believe that spending millions of dollars will solve the problem. The hon. member from Lachine could tell us that, as a government, what we are doing is using money for training, and we can make it available to the regions, Montreal as well as the others, and that is what we are going to do.

It is so easy to say: "It's Mulroney's fault, it's all his fault". But for once there is a prime minister who has the guts to stand up. In the hardest of times, he dared stand up and show the people in Quebec, especially the Montreal area, that the government was ready to help, but first of all they had to help themselves. This is what we have been doing for seven years, and what we will continue to do in the years to come.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleagues from Montreal and those from the Quebec caucus who have taken the initiative in this debate, which I consider to be very important at this point in time.

The economic situation in Quebec, particularly in Montreal, is utterly disastrous, since Montreal is the engine of economic development in Quebec. And the situation there is getting worse and worse. Presently, the unemployment rate in Montreal is quite unacceptable. It's no joke to realize that there are proportionally more unemployed in Montreal than in any other town in Quebec. And, relatively speaking, there are more unemployed persons in Montreal, than there are in St. John's, Halifax, Moncton or in Saint John. There is more unemployment in Montreal than in any other Canadian city which has a relatively big population.

Unemployment is not the only concern in Montreal. For many years, the social climate has been deteriorating at a tremendous speed. In Montreal only, more that 615,000 persons are living under the poverty line, 200,000 more than in the Atlantic provinces. But nothing is done about it.

This afternoon, the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel was talking about a committee chaired by Mr. Picard a couple of years ago. There was a lot said about it. No decision was ever taken to really try to find a solution to the problem. Montreal, which was about the most interesting city in Canada just under a generation ago is losing ground every day. It is disastrous for the country as a whole because if Montreal becomes a disaster zone, what will happen with the rest of the province? When there is unemployment elsewhere, one goes to Montreal to find a job. That is the last hope of the unemployed. When Montreal has nothing to offer, especially for French-speaking people, they are forced to go elsewhere in the country. And the proportion of francophones in Quebec could be lowered.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I really wanted to speak on the subject today because we must get very serious about this problem. There is an extremely important problem with Montreal's infrastructures. We must solve them now, at least partly. All the old part and the east side of Montreal should still benefit from home renovation programs. These investments are made by simple people, people who are quite modest. If the government is there to help them, they buy materials, they hire plumbers and carpenters and they restore a house that may be 50 or 75 years old. They put it back in shape while preserving Montreal's very special character.

The present government has completely suspended these programs, giving as an excuse that it must save money. Community-based housing programs have been dropped altogether. And we forget that these are decisions which, in the short term, are appalling and which will also have impacts in the long term. Because it will no longer exist, that which is the heart of Montreal will disappear and only the suburbs will remain. The special character of Montreal will also disappear, and the only thing left will be the suburbs. The city that Canadians looked at enviously will exist no more.

Today, what was Canada's metropolis has become it's unemployment metropolis. Consequently, my party thinks that we must shake up the government. The situation has never been as bad and it has never aroused so little interest.

The federal Liberals are always blamed, even if the Conservative government came into office seven years ago. When we formed the government, there were programs to ensure that Montreal had its place in Canada.

An hon. member: Go tell that to the Montrealers!

Mr. Chrétien: I certainly will tell them, and with pleasure. Members rise today to talk about Canadair! How many of them were on this side, on the opposition side, when we decided to get Canadair back? How many of them then said that we would be destroying the private sector if we nationalized Canadair? What have we done for Canadair? Yes, we acquired Canadair when it had only 1,500 employees left. The government bought it because the private sector was getting out of the Canadian aeronautics in Canada. We not only had to buy Canadair but also De Havilland in Toronto because the private sector was getting out. That cost us enormous amounts of money.

At Canadair, we spent one billion on research and development for the sole development of the Challenger. Now, the Conservatives are taking the credit because—

Mr. Prud'homme: They are boasting!

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, they are boasting about it, as the hon. member for Saint-Denis instead of said, recognizing that if the Liberal governement had not saved

Canadair a few years back, they would have nothing to announce.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: The high technology industry as well as the whole aeronautical industry would have disappeared from Montreal and all of Canada.

We are happy today that Canadair is still around but we must plan ahead. Back then, those same hon. members who were in the opposition were saying that communists were taking over because we were interfering in the economy to try to save for Canadians and especially a high technology industry for Montreal. That has allowed us to preserve all those industries in Montreal-West that today win contracts all over the world because we have kept an aeronautical industry in Canada. And those were decisions for Canada and especially for Montreal.

It has been the same thing for Canadair. Today we would like the government to take an interest in another project as we have. The transport industry has always been the key to Montreal's development. Today, efforts are being made to bring into Canada and into America a new technology to link cities with high-speed trains but, the government is not lifting a finger to try and help what could become a high-tech industry in America.

I call up on the government to deal with this problem seriously and without delay because if Bombardier could become— the one to introduce in America this intercity high speed fast transportation system. It could be the kind of development the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal should have. Of course it might cost money, but if we are unable to choose high-tech sectors and to promote them for the benefit of the Canadian, Quebec and Montreal économies then things will go down hill in Montreal. And that is why today we decided to intervene and attract the government's attention. Who do they have on the other side to speak for Montreal? They have a minister from Montreal who keeps saying there is no problem at all. As the hon. member for Saint-Denis said earlier: Don't worry, be happy.

Unemployment like we never saw before. Poverty— those government members do not look very comfortable, and they have every reason to feel that way.

Take last weekend. Quebec members met people from the CNTU and other unions. They aren't afraid of meeting people who are not necessarily our political friends. I don't think Gérard Larose is one of my political friends. However, when it's time to think about the workers and to think about dealing with poverty, we must get together with the people who want to change things in Montreal.

Today, people realize that this government's policies have been absolutely devastating for Montreal and the province of Quebec. High interest rates and a high dollar.

An hon. member: Remember 1982!

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member has 1982 on the brain.

In 1982, Montreal was not Canada's unemployment capital. In 1982, we had members and ministers who were strong and worthy representatives of Montreal. Not the silent types they have now on the other side.

[English]

In 1982, here in this House when there was a problem for Montreal, it was not the trained seals that were getting up. It was competent members and ministers who had at heart the best interests of Montreal. They were under Trudeau.

The people are leaving Montreal because this government has absolutely no policy for Montreal.

Now, what we see in Canada—Montreal used to be a proud city—

[Translation]

A city with pride—that was Montreal. Today, there is—

[English]

—there is more unemployment in St. John's, Newfoundland, Saint John, New Brunswick, Halifax, Moncton, Winnipeg and in every city of Canada. It is not the time for us to get up and speak about that problem.

It is not the time to tell this government it is going down. It says it is nice to Quebecers, and so on. Where is the beef?

[Translation]

Premier Bourassa himself said at the last economic conference he attended that since the Conservatives came to power, Quebec's percentage of economic development funding had dropped. They make good speeches in which they tell Quebec: We love you. When are the Tory members and ministers going to put their money where their mouth is? When?

Today, in Montreal, 20,000 school children go to school every morning without breakfast. When will the government deal with this problem and try to find a solution? The minister has breakfast every morning. That is pretty obvious.

There are students who won't have jobs this summer, and our members say this will be disastrous. We know what a summer job means to a student. If he doesn't have one, he will join the ranks of the unemployed, not just for the summer but for years, maybe. If he can't find a job this summer in Montreal or somewhere else, what will happen? He won't go back to university in the fall. And what will happen to us when we have to deal with the increasing problems of the twenty-first century, if we don't have a population that is well educated and prepared to compete?

I want the government to realize there are thousands of opportunities in Montreal for investment by the public sector. In government we have to be able to take the long view, not just consider short-term gain. Why not create the kind of programs municipalities have been asking for? One-third federal, one-third provincial and one-third municipal. This is investment, and investment creates jobs.

There are in Montreal areas that need to be developed. Why should we give up these home renovation programs or senior citizen's housing programs.

An hon. member: The cooperation with the provincial government!

Mr. Chrétien: The provincial government is ready to participate in these programs. Everybody but the Conservative government wants to do his part.

Mr. Speaker, the situation in Montreal is disastrous. There will not be a lot of members of your party coming back here after the next election, because you didn't do your homework as you should have. You made a lot of empty promises, but you forgot about the most important thing for the people of the City of Montreal and the region: the bread and butter.

That is why, we are here Mr. Speaker, and why with this motion we are voicing the disastrous policies of the Conservatives who have created this situation in Montreal.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I have just heard the eloquent speech made by the leader of the opposition who has given us his point of view concerning the economic development of Montreal. Yet, if past deeds foretell what is to come, he could perhaps try to explain to the people of Montreal his own record as hon. member for Saint-Maurice.

In 1963, the present leader of the opposition was elected as hon. member for Saint-Maurice. At that time, Shawinigan, which is the heart of the county, was one of the most prosperous towns in Canada. It was a rich city with several multinationals and many jobs.

In 1986, Mr. Speaker, 23 years later, when the leader of the opposition resigned as hon. member for Saint-Maurice, Shawinigan had become one of the poorest towns in Quebec and in Canada. How can he justify his work as member for Saint-Maurice and come here today lecture us on the art of solving the economic problems of Montreal? Mr. Speaker, I believe that the citizens of Canada have the right to know that the member for Saint-Maurice, during all those years from 1963 to 1986, brought the economy of Shawinigan crashing down, and the town has never recovered since. How can he tell us today that he will solve the problems of Montreal, when he not only was unable to solve those of Shawinigan, but also left the economic fabric of that town in tatters?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): First of all the first thing we have to fix is the fiddle of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice; we'll do that at the next election.

Second, he talks about Schefferville which the Prime Minister has completely shut down, but he doesn't talk about Shawinigan.

Third, I must admit that the population of Shawinigan has diminished because people have moved to the outskirts, though the population of the riding has continued to rise. But if the hon. member has one ounce of—, he will know there are economic difficulties in that area, because petrochemicals have replaced electrochemistry, and that causes a problem. But let us not forget the jobs that were created in Shawinigan and Shawinigan South with the establishment of the Taxation Data Centre, where 1,500 people work today. If the federal government had not been there to step in, there would be no Centre, no national parks, none of the other programs which were established when the hon. member, who was one of my organizers at the time, used to travel round the riding praising the good work of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Denis has 30 seconds left.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Could the hon. leader of the Opposition repeat to the minister who claims to be the minister responsible for Montreal that the first prerequisite when you want to solve a problem is to recognize that there is a problem. Yet the minister insists that there is none. There is no solution because there is no problem. Would the hon. leader of the Opposition care to comment?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I recognize the leader of the opposition so he can conclude briefly.

Mr. Chrétien: I think the hon. member for Saint-Denis is absolutely right, the biggest problem the city of Montreal seems to have right now in Ottawa is the minister himself. He does not even want to meet with people from Montreal—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being 5.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the Business of Supply pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

Government Orders

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, June 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C–15, an act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relationships in connection with the transfer of certain airports, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. If you would seek it, I am sure you would find unanimous consent that the vote we just took be applied in reverse to the next vote.

[Translation]

I will repeat it in French, Mr. Speaker, to make sure that my idea is properly conveyed. If there is unanimous consent, the result of the vote which has taken place will be applied to the next one, but in the reverse order.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We won't give our consent because we intend to vote with the government on the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since there is no unanimous consent, we will proceed with the vote.

The House divided on the motion, which was adopted on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 37, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business, as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS MOTIONS

COAT OF ARMS OF CANADA

AMENDMENT TO MOTTO

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moves:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of sending a petition to Her Majesty the Queen for a grant of arms to amend the motto on the Coat of Arms of Canada to read: A Mari usque ad Mare usque ad Mare.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for letting me the first one to discuss the motion that I have moved.

Before starting my speech, I would like to bring to your attention a spelling mistake in the wording of the motion in the Order Paper, as well as in the Projected Order of Business. Indeed, in the new motto that I propose A Mari usque ad Mare usque ad Mare, the second and third "Mare" should be spelled M-A-R-E and not M-A-R-I.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, the coat of arms of Canada bear the motto A Mari usque ad Mare, which symbolizes the vastness of our country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Since its adoption in 1921, this motto has been a reminder to all Canadians that the vastness of their country is truly remarkable and that even if our country is so large, it is united through a single and unique nation called Canada.

However, if this motto was meant to establish a symbolic link between all Canadians, and if it was meant to be a reflection of our geography, it nevertheless as one serious flaw, in that it ignores the geography and the residents of the North.

[English]

What I want to do today is give some background information on the motto, my reasons for presenting this motion and a few other supporting points.

The first official use came in 1906 when the phrase was engraved on the head of the mace of the legislative assembly of the new province of Saskatchewan. At that time Under-Secretary of State Joseph Pope became familiar with the future motto and took a liking to it.

In 1919 Pope was named to a committee appointed by the federal government to recommend a new design for the arms of Canada. Although no motto was included on the old shield, one was to be included in the new arms. The coat of arms and the motto were approved by Order in Council on April 21, 1921, and by Royal proclamation on November 21, 1921.

The territorial evolution of Canada helps us to understand the origins of the motto and, let us hope, will provide a harbinger of a new motto. Obviously the present motto reflects an east-west bias which tends to ignore Canada's north. However, an overview of the territorial evolution of the north reveals that continual changes were made to boundaries before 1912 and may help explain why a more accurate motto was not devised sooner.

Given the state of flux of the boundaries and the area's relative state of isolation and sparse population, it probably was not politically expedient to adopt the motto which is truly reflective of our country's history and geography.

The coat of arms and the motto recognize Canada's evolution to a certain point. The shield of the coat of arms displays the arms of England, Scotland, Ireland and France and to symbolize the nation's founding races, underneath the four quarters on a white field is a sprig of three maple leafs to indicate the new nation of many peoples.

There is one very noticeable exception, the first nations. Neither the shield nor the motto directly refer to them. Why not accept the motion proposed as a sign of recognition of Canada's first nations.

You may say that sums up in a nutshell why we should accept this motion, but I want to explain why I presented the motion in particular. My background as a teacher of Canadian history in the secondary school system in the province of New Brunswick has given me an insight into some of the problems we face here in Canada.

I also have an aboriginal population in my riding and there are a number of native reserves throughout New Brunswick. I have had the occasion of meeting with those groups time and time again.

In my background as a history teacher I have come to the conclusion that, and in many discussions in class with students from my region, from the riding of Restigouche—Chaleur, it has also been pointed out, it seemed to be an oversight. We have a coat of arms, a Canadian motto that says from sea to sea only.

Basically, it was meetings in the classroom, meetings with native groups in New Brunswick, in my riding more specifically, that brought this to a point. As a history teacher I didn't expect to be a member of Parliament some day and be in a position to maybe influence the changing of this motto, but here I am. That is one of the promises that I made to myself. If ever I got into a position to be able to influence such a change, then I would bring it up. This is why I have decided to present this motion today.

With regard to the changing of the motto, since becoming a member of Parliament I have noticed that the Prime Minister of Canada, the right hon. Brian Mulroney, has made a number of speeches in the House where he has, and rightly so, a number of times referred to the phrase: "from coast to coast to coast", again re-emphasizing the current use.

I have noticed the Leader of the Opposition has used it and the leader of the third party has used it. I have noticed that it has become common practice for ministers of the Crown to use it. What I am trying to do today is perhaps make it legal to a certain extent. In some respects it could be seen as a matter of housekeeping.

I think it is more important than that. The implementation of this new motto would send a positive message to northern residents at little or no cost to the federal government, and would help foster national unity. When we look at the question of national unity, specifically the question of the aboriginals, the question of aboriginals in respect to last summer even, we know that they have many problems which have never been addressed properly. It would at least be a gesture of good faith to approve this change in the motto.

I believe that it would also be a psychological link, a symbol similar to some of the symbols we have had in the past, symbols such as John A. Macdonald's national policy. The Broadcast Act for a while talked about Canadian unity, so there was that linkage. There is the Official Languages Act and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. These have all become very important symbolic and psychological links binding Canadians from all regions.

I would hope that acceptance of this motion would be considered as very important, would be considered as sending a message to the north that: "You are part of this great country". We want that fact to be legally recognized.

It has certainly become common practice for members in their speeches to use "from sea to sea to sea" or "from coast to coast to coast". I would hope that the members on the other side and the members of the third party would see fit to recognize that.

I would say, because of its common use and because of the influence of the north now, our great country, that it would certainly be unacceptable to keep the status quo. We should recognize the geographical reality of the north, as well as the members of our first nations and other northern residents. In fact, if we were not to recognize this fact it might send a negative message to them.

I think it is very important that we do recognize that a change in our motto is necessary.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that the adoption of a new motto would obviously be perceived as a recognition of the importance of the Canadian North and of the First Nations, as well as of all the residents of that region. I believe that the government should spare no efforts to give to Canadians a motto that is a true reflection of the country and of its regions.

At a time when Canada faces a serious identity crisis, this initiative could help in a significant way to preserve national unity. A Mari Usque Ad Mare Usque Ad Mare.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to speak to this motion put forward by my hon. colleague. I think it is something that needs to be recognized within this House of Commons and within this great country.

Very often the people today in this House, as my colleague stated earlier, have been saying "from coast to coast to coast"—whether it is the right hon. Prime Minister or other members of his government or our illustrious Leader of the Official Opposition or the Leader of the New Democratic Party. So, I think it is incumbent upon all members of this House to use either "from sea to sea to sea" or "coast to coast to coast" because it has to be recognized that Canada is surrounded by three oceans—the Pacific Ocean, the Arctic Ocean and the Atlantic Ocean, of which the Arctic coast has the longest shoreline. Surely that alone should be enough to make people realize that there are three coasts to recognize.

Often when I am listening or watching CBC Radio or CBC Television I get bothered when the commentator says: "from coast to coast". I always want to phone and remind them that they have to mention the third coast. Now, it may very well be that they are talking about the Atlantic coast and the Arctic coast, or the Pacific coast and the Arctic coast, but I think it would be even better if they said: "coast to coast to coast".

When "from sea to sea" was first used it may have indeed been accurate, but it is no longer. In 1898 Yukon was carved out of the Northwest Territories. After the creation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1905, the present boundaries of the Northwest Territories were finalized. So it was not until 1905 that we could start using "coast to coast to coast".

Canada's Arctic territory is second only in size to that of the U.S.S.R. Together, Yukon and the Northwest Territories comprise 40 per cent of the area of Canada. Almost half of the population of Canada's northern region are aboriginal people, and more in the Northwest Territories where roughly 50 per cent in the Western Arctic and about 85 per cent in the Eastern Arctic are aboriginal people, and fewer in the Yukon.

When my colleague was talking about the founding nations, the first nations, he was indeed right in saying that the area that is occupied by the majority of aboriginal people—in this case the Northwest Territories—should be recognized as a very real part of Canada. The north is unique and everybody has to recognize this. It is a unique and distinct region of Canada, politically, socially, culturally and economically.

It is always offensive to those of us who come from the north when we are forgotten in Canada's national symbols. In this case again it may have been accurate back in 1898 to say "coast to coast", but it is not the case any more. Therefore, we should be recognized as part of the great country of Canada.

As well as my colleague from the Western Arctic, I am constantly trying to remind members of this House of Commons and the rest of Canada about the existence of the north, of the Inuit, the Dene or other people who occupy the Northwest Territories as well as Yukon.

Canada's north has always occupied a strategic military position. Northerners and particularly aboriginal people, by virtue of their residency in the north, have proved and sustained Canada's sovereignty in the Arctic. Recently the significance of Arctic and global environmental issues have been recognized.

Over the past few years scientific, social, cultural and political exchanges have multiplied between Canada's northern territories and other circumpolar nations. A circumpolar environmental protection agreement will be signed in Finland later this month.

The circumpolar dimension of Canada's foreign policy is becoming increasingly important. It is extremely important that Canada's symbols recognize all of Canada's component parts and peoples. The northern territories and the Arctic Ocean are integral parts of Canada; the northern residents are a very real part of Canada and consider themselves very Canadian. We deserve to be acknowledged in this great country.

It is time to change our motto. It is appropriate at this important stage of Canadian constitutional renewal to embrace all parts of this country and all Canadians. Supporting the motion of my hon. colleague would be a significant national reconciliation initiative by this federal Parliament.

This is not a partisan issue. What is under discussion here is the recognition of a simple geographic and political fact as well as a symbolic one.

I ask hon. members on all sides to support this motion and to recognize the north and the Arctic Ocean, and I urge the House to acknowledge that Canada stretches from sea to sea to sea.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise in this afternoon's debate on Motion No. 387, a motion by our hon. colleague for Restigouche which asks this House to affirm its intention to alter the motto of the Coat of Arms of Canada from A Mari usque ad Mare to A Mari usque ad Mare usque ad Mare.

First of all I want to thank the member for Restigouche for bringing to my attention the coat of arms, which perhaps I had not recognized as often as I should. Now that I have become involved with this, I see it on your chair, on our money, on our letterheads and almost everywhere we look here. I do compliment the member for that and thank him.

I view this debate as an opportunity, not only to discuss the merits of my hon. colleague's proposal, but also an opportunity for the House early in a new session of Parliament where the very future of Canada will be shaped to discuss the symbols of the country, the symbols which are common to all Canadians.

Let me turn specifically to the motion. Our colleague would wish to alter the motto of Canada. Our colleague would wish to alter that motto to reflect our geographic reality, the reality of which every member in this House is justifiably proud. This great land of ours runs from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the 49th parallel to the North Pole, and the waters of three of the world's great oceans wash on our shores.

There are very few nations in the world, very few, that can claim the geographic bounty and beauty of Canada. There are very few nations that can claim the richness brought on by the very size of the land mass of our Canada. There are even fewer nations that can claim the richness of a population whose origins stem from virtually every corner of the globe.

Canada is truly a blessed land. Those who would say we are not, the nay sayers who say this country should be torn asunder fail to acknowledge the bounty, the richness, the prosperity and the promise that has been, that is and that will be our Canada.

Our hon. colleague from Restigouche asked us to change a motto which we have had formally since November 21, 1921. Those words in English, "from sea to sea", are inextricably linked.

Not only is the motto of Canada on our coat of arms, it is also linked to the vision of the Fathers of Confederation in the 1860s.

We take for granted many things about our country. That seems to be a characteristic of the way we see ourselves. We do have a motto. It is "from sea to sea", but do we know its roots? We must understand that it is not a statement of just geography but a statement of promise and hope.

The motto which we celebrate is not just a series of words. The motto "from sea to sea" is derived from the 72nd Psalm, A Song for Solomon.

Something else is derived from that 72nd Psalm, and is the very title of our country. We are the Dominion of Canada and when the Fathers of Confederation were grappling with what to call the very first British colonies to achieve true, responsible self-determination, there were many problems.

Some wished to call it the kingdom of Canada. Others did not know what we should be called, but clearly not "a republic" or "a kingdom".

In those days inspiration was found in Psalm 72. I will read from it: "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth."

The 72nd Psalm speaks about the righteousness of rulers and Divine Province's guidance of rulers. The 72nd Psalm speaks about the beauty of the earth, its majesty, its wealth and how it sustains us.

Let me quote from the third verse: "The mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills, by righteousness." The 72nd Psalm speaks of hope of a people in other lands.

When my hon. colleague wishes to change our motto on the crest of our coat of arms by adding a third "sea" in order to express a geographic reality, he is proposing to not only alter words, but to alter the deep-seated thoughts and principles.

He proposes to alter the very idea of our name and of our title as a land.

There is a very clear relationship between our title, the Dominion of Canada, and the motto "from sea to sea". We should not alter it. I find it particularly apt that the Fathers of Confederation would have gone to the 72nd Psalm.

In 1867, we were a land of just one sea. We were a small country. We were made up of four, small, isolated colonies huddling on the North American land mass confronting a powerful neighbour, the United States of America in its most expansionist era.

Canada was made up of four small colonies without even a railroad linking them; four colonies which stopped at what is today Thunder Bay; four colonies which were 200 or 300 miles from the St. Lawrence watershed.

Yet the promise and hope of the Fathers of Confederation, Macdonald, Cartier and Tupper was the future of Canada. Those leaders, from the day of Confederation, strove without rest to shape what I proudly say is the world's greatest country.

Those leaders dared to think larger. Those leaders, within three years, dared to acquire responsibility for virtually all of what would become the land mass of Canada. From four isolated colonies our Fathers of Confederation dared to shape Canada.

I know that there are many in society today who think that history is bunk. I certainly do not believe that. I do not believe a people can know where they wish to go until they know where they have been.

I think we need to know more about the symbols of Canada. I think we need to know more about the things which tie us together. We should not think of them merely as conveniences, as a trademark or as a commercial brand name that we can change from time to time.

Our coat of arms, our motto, is not a brand name. It is not a commercial logo. It is one of the proudest symbols of one of the world's proudest countries.

My hon. colleague from Restigouche feels that we must reflect the north of our country, and I respect that but we must reflect our diversity. We do not extend just from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Our country is larger than that, but our motto is not derived from a mere Latin Translation of a geography. It is derived from a biblical text which speaks about a people and their aspirations.

That is why I feel it is not a simple matter of changing a few words. I am not even going to discuss the costs in doing that, but there are obvious costs.

I do not feel comfortable in supporting the motion of my colleague from Restigouche. I think he has missed the mark about what this motto is about and what Canadian symbols are about.

• (1850)

These are difficult times in Canada. We need to look back and look forward at the same time, to benefit and build on what we do the best and to rectify that which may have kept us apart.

I think symbols like our flag, our motto, our coat of arms and our basic parliamentary system of government are things which are special to all Canadians and I do not think we should tinker with them on the spur of the moment. We should think very seriously about their origins and their meaning before we do anything to change our symbols. I know this proposal to change the motto has been made before. I have heard leaders from our north make similar statements and I really understand and appreciate their concerns. They think that too many Canadians only think in terms of that narrow band where most of us live, which runs east to west.

That may be so in some instances but there are so many other ways to recognize the importance of the north; to recognize the majesty, the grandeur of all of Canada, its riches and prosperity. Our motto is not a statement of geography alone. It is a statement of commitment and what our hon. friend from Restigouche proposes would mean changing for the wrong reason that statement of promising commitment.

It has been a great pleasure this afternoon to participate in this debate on an important symbol of Canada and I only hope that the spirit of co-operation and fair debate that we are seeing will transfer into our work this autumn on reshaping our Canadian federation for the next century.

I think we are like the Fathers of Confederation. We are our heirs Parents of Confederation. The challenge of the past is handed to us. It is now for us to take up the torch and to shape the Canada for our children and for our children's children.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to take part in the debate today on the motion of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur in which he asks the House to change the Canadian motto which is now "from sea to sea" to "from sea to sea to sea".

Mr. Speaker, I have here the Projected Order of Business for today and I read motion M-387. Being of Italian origin, I would like to correct a small error that has been bothering me and, unless I am mistaken, that would improve the Latin version. You will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, as you are well informed in this matter, it is: ad Mare and not ad Mari. I would appreciate to see the correction. It should read: ad Mare ad Mare and not ad Mari, unless my colleague has made the correction, because it is difficult to pick up visually. Mare also comes both from Latin and Italian, it is the same. We all know it translates the word ocean.

So, thank you, Mr. Speaker, I find the whole thing perfectly acceptable if the member has made the correction, but I might have missed this part of his speech.

Mr. Speaker, it seems appropriate, at the beginning of this new session of Parliament, to have the opportunity to debate a motion concerning such a fundamental point in a country as its motto.

During the last few weeks, my colleague the right hon. member for Yellowhead, who was here a few minutes ago, has been criss-crossing the country to try to establish a consensus among its citizens and its leaders, a consensus on the need to build a new Canada, a Canada of the 21th century, a Canada corresponding to the demands and aspirations of today's generation.

Mr. Speaker, 125 years ago, the Fathers of Confederation were almost in the same situation thus we are now. They were the leaders of four little colonies of British North America, four little colonies who banded together because they realized that this way, they could prosper, develop and build the society they were dreaming of. We are facing the same challenges today, Mr. Speaker. We must get together in order to shape our country for tomorrow. We must get together to shape a country united, strong and free. Mr. Speaker, what our hon. colleague for Restigouche—Chaleur wants is to change something that is fundamental to our country since we became the Dominion of Canada.

The motto of our country and its name come from the seventy-second psalm, the psalm of Salomon. They are taken from the eight verse that says: "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth". Mr. Speaker, that verse is so full of promises and hope.

"Dominion", Mr. Speaker, is such a noble word. Through its roots, it brings us dignity and legitimacy. In that verse, we see all the great hopes the Fathers of Confederation shared. To them, the phrase "from sea to sea" was a metaphor for their dreams and their hopes, not only a geographic description.

They had settled along the Atlantic coast and on both sides of the St. Lawrence River. However, Mr. Speaker, the Fathers of Confederation dreamt of a country extending from coast to coast and lived in the land of the Great River. They wanted a country that stretched to the furthest shores.

Such was, Mr. Speaker, the challenge facing the Fathers of Confederation: to give shape to a huge country in the northern part of this continent.

I do not think that we should change our motto simply because this huge country of ours has three oceans off its shores instead of two. This is not the place to discuss such trivial issues, nor is this is the way to go about it.

What we are talking about here, Mr. Speaker, is the reason why we, in this House, would want to change the motto of this great country, the reason why we would want to change our Coat of Arms.

This brings me to raise a very important question in the context of today's debate. Our motto is neither a brand name nor a slogan a cereal company tested on consumers. Our motto reflects the image we have of ourselves. Our Coat of Arms reflects who we are and where we come from. Let me tell you a few things about the Coat of Arms of Canada, Mr. Speaker. We do not have to go out of this Chamber to look at it. It is all around us. There is even one right above your head. It is everywhere in this room.

Some argue that our Coat of Arms is outdated, a survival from the past. I disagree. I think that our Coat of Arms is as current today as it was on that day, in November 1921, when the late King George V proclaimed the Coat of Arms of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, our Coat of Arms shows our main roots. There is the fleur-de-lis from France, the royal heart from Ireland, the unicorn from Scotland, the lion from England and, in a conspicuous place, three maples leaves on a white field. Only a few Canadians probably know that when our Coat of Arms was proclaimed in 1921, red and white were proclaimed to be the colours of Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me extremely accurate and appropriate that the flag of our great country, our Maple Leaf, be red and white. Those are our historical colours, the colours of Canada.

I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that all Canadians understand the origin of our motto and what inspired it. I am not sure either that they understand the symbolic nature of our flag.

That is rather disturbing. When I go to the United States, I am immediately amazed at how Americans, young and old, readily understand the symbols of their great republic. Almost everyone understand their motto E Pluribus Unum—Out of many, one. Most of them could tell you the story of Betsy Ross, and of the designing of their beautiful star-spangled banner.

Mr. Speaker, Americans do know about E pluribus unum. In Canada, it seems that we have been somewhat reluctant to instill in our children and citizens a deep understanding and appreciation of Canada and a sense of patriotism.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should change our fundamental symbols without giving the matter proper consideration. Before we change them, we should first learn to know them.

• (1900)

Mr. Speaker, we did not get a truly Canadian flag until 1965. The quest for a Canadian flag started in 1925, 40 years before we finally got our flag. In 1946, the hon. Paul Martin, was Secretary of State when the first bill on Canadian citizenship making us real Canadian citizens was presented. Mr. Martin, whose son sits in front of me, promised a Canadian flag and a national anthem. But we had to wait 20 more years to have a flag that would be really ours.

Mr. Speaker, we now have all of that, a flag, a national anthem, our Canadian citizenship, a Coat of Arms and a motto. All members of this House are proud of those symbols. I am not at all convinced that the time has come for us to change something as fundamental as our motto.

Mr. Speaker, I know that I have only one minute left. I will try to be brief. I know that many people have proposed a new motto, "from coast to coast to coast", to reflect Canada's geographic reality. Northerners think that our motto does not take into account their beautiful Arctic Ocean. There are many other ways, besides changing our proud motto on the Coat of Arms of Canada, to recognize the geographic majesty of this country of ours, to make Canadians better understand what we have in common, what keeps us together. We are all proud, Mr. Speaker, of our Coat of Arms and, above all, we are proud to be Canadians.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for the opportunity to speak to the private member's bill brought forward by my colleague from Restigouche to have the coat of arms changed.

I see this particular private member's bill as one being very useful and very valuable in bringing to the Canadian conscience the fact that there is a third sea and that sea is one that is actualized by the people that live there and the diversity that exists there. It is recognition that the north is a growing, viable, political, constitutional entity, that it is not just an extension of the federal government of Canada. It is not just an extension that could be considered a colony and a distant land in the years leading to the year 2000; it is in fact an area of Canada that is to be admired for its very difficult climate at times, but also for its diversity and the people who live there.

In reference to my hon. colleague from Restigouche's private member's bill, the change would be stated as sea, to sea, to sea, or, as many others would put it, coast to coast to coast. If you include the third coast, you are doing what we want to do in Canada these days, which is to express equality and inclusiveness in our efforts to bring this country together.

We are not excluded. It is known that Her Majesty has been to that sea and visited the people in the early 1970s. I am sure that when the petition is brought to Her Majesty, she will recognize the viability of this particular private member's bill and because she has been there and shaken hands and looked into the faces of these people, she will know that this is something that needs to be done.

This particular coat of arms has not been in existence since the beginning of Confederation but only since 1921. Had we not taken the steps to change the previous flag, we would still be in a rather static state of having the old flag. But we endured a tremendous amount of debate and friction and we now have the new maple leaf Canada flag, which is something of which we are very proud.

In fact, there is room for improvement, there is room for change and I do not see why not.

In 1974 I went as a young person to that particular sea. I went as a young person with three children. I went to teach in the community of Tuktoyaktut which is a predominantly Inuvialuit community. I thought I would never see the sun again. It was the longest winter of my life but I learned to love that land. Every day, that I taught in that school I looked out the window and what did I see? I saw the Arctic Ocean from my classroom. In the fall, what did I see? I saw the beluga whale when I was standing on top of a Bombardier with my three children. I could see the beluga whale swimming in that see.

What did I see in the early seventies? I saw the first ship pull into the Beaufort Sea for Dome Petroleum, which created a great amount of activity. What else did I see? I experienced in that community on the third sea the first Inuit circumpolar meeting in that area which was attended by many prominent Canadians, including Justice Berger. It was there in 1974 that, in my aboriginal language, I made my presentation on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline hearings to Mr. Berger.

The third sea is a reality to me. It is not a distant land. It is not a foreign colony. It is not something that I just talk about or read about in purple prose. It has the leadership.

We also have the Inuvialuit who settled their land claims. The Inuvialuit land claims agreement has allowed those people a certain amount of autonomy. It has allowed them to build institutions for the future. It has allowed them the opportunities for investment. It has allowed them some degree of autonomy with regard to the land they operate on and the kind of activities they engage in.

Mr. Speaker, if you look at that land and see it every day, this motion is not just changing a particular motto. It is reflecting in the symbols of this country a reality. What are symbols for? Symbols are to reflect and represent something that is true, something that represents this country, like the Constitution.

I have said many times that the Constitution is like a mirror. If we look into it we should be able to see ourselves. If we look at the symbols of our country, including this particular motto, and see "sea to sea", we do not just see the word "sea" but the reality of those people who live there, the people who have stood on those shores, the traders and the whalers who came there decades ago, centuries ago and mixed with the aboriginal people who live there, who worked and lived with those people and traded with those people and knew that particular sea.

It is not just a word. It is in fact a reality. It is something more than just words on a piece of paper. The symbolism placed on things that represent Canada, our country, are important for all of its people.

We have to look at a renewal. We talk about restructuring federalism. If we can restructure federalism why can we not restructure the symbols of this country? This is one of them.

Have those who oppose changing this motto stood on the shores of that sea? Have they shaken the hands of those people as Her Majesty has done herself, as the governor generals of the past have also done? That brings a completely different perspective to the whole thing.

I spent three years of my working life in that community on the shores of that sea with those people. I watched the beluga whales swimming in that particular place. I watched the harvesting of the beluga by the Inuvialuit people. I taught their children. I know their culture and I know their reality and the pride they have in belonging to this country.

What about Arctic sovereignty? We talk about it as if it is a concept. It was a reality for the high Arctic exiles. Those are the people that were relocated from Kuujjuaq up to Grise Fiord to maintain Arctic sovereignty. This is the debate that is much disputed on the shores of the seas. Think of the polar expedition and where it goes. It crosses that sea. That is the reality.

When you think about Canada, you perhaps think about the area below the 49th parallel.

Well, the reality for those of us who live in the north is that we recognize that sea, we recognize the reality of that sea. We who are from the north feel that we are off the national grid when it comes to transportation, when it comes to many forms of communications and when it comes to the constitutional grid. We have to beg for a place at the table, for constitutional consultation.

However, if we do take a conscious step, as my colleague has, to make the difference, to say that the symbols of Canada are inclusive, that they are not exclusive, they do not alienate, they do not isolate, they include people. The people of that third sea need that recognition. It is the recognition of the north and recognition of the people who are there.

If laws were made not to be changed we would not be here. This is part of what we do. That is the reality of our lot in life. We amend laws because with the changing of time we need to do that, with the changing of needs we need to do that. That is the reality of what we do.

I hope it would be to the benefit of all. We live in a shrinking world which has to express and accommodate the cultural diversity of different peoples. This is the reality of Canada. We have many peoples, we have a beautiful country that is worth preserving.

I have travelled almost every part of this country and when I go home, when I fly over the delta which is part of my constituency, it is an overwhelming feeling that I have for my people and for that land. It is the love of the land which is inextricably intertwined with who we are. That is the way the people on the third sea live and realize their goals and aspirations.

I pay tribute to those people. They have lived under the most adverse climate throughout the years. They have had aspirations like every other Canadian. However, it is more expensive to live in the north. If we can change one symbol to reflect a reality, a beautiful reality, then we will be doing something to unite this country.

Mr. Speaker, if you would allow me, I would like unanimous consent to have the question now put to this particular private member's bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House give unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There not being unanimous consent, and since there are no further members who wish to speak, the time set aside for private members' business has now expired. Therefore, pursuant to Standing Order 95(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being 7.12 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

KOREAN WAR VETERANS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian men and women who represented Canada so well in the Persian Gulf war will receive their volunteer service medals from the Canadian government on June 22, 1991.

These well-deserved medals will be presented the day before the Canadian Korean Veterans Day celebrations on June 23. This year's celebration will commemorate the 41st anniversary of the Korean war.

When is the Canadian government going to present distinctly Canadian medals to the men and women from every Canadian province and every territory who served voluntarily on behalf of Canada in the Korean war?

NATIONAL ENVIRONMENT WEEK

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Environment Week across Canada.

I would like to quote from Canada's Green Plan for a healthy environment, which says that although the environment is every individual's responsibility, this responsibility should be reflected in concerted efforts at all levels of society.

National Environment Week emphasizes the partnership concept, and this year more than ever before, groups at every level of our society have joined the government in a nation-wide campaign for commitment and action.

By working together with our partners to make every week environment week, we can build a healthy and prosperous future for this country, Mr. Speaker.

In Quebec and Beauce, people are becoming more and more environment-conscious. This government's efforts are admirable, but every individual must be committed to protecting the environment.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce says that on employment equity the government should first get its own House in order.

The case in point remains Dr. Chander Grover who was fired because he dared to file a complaint of discrimination against the National Research Council.

After dragging out the ordeal to inflict the most damaging psychological and financial punishment possible, the NRC reversed Grover's dismissal when the outcry from the visible minority community became too loud to ignore. However, there was no repentance and no victory because NRC still had many weapons in its bureaucratic armoury.

Grover is now a technician supervised by a boss lacking his international prestige while another less qualified than he does what was Grover's life work.

To challenge this would be insubordination; to accept would be to capitulate to racism.

For the Public Service, that is good enough for government. The Chamber of Commerce has a point.

CANADIAN SCOUT PARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, to millions of people around the world scouting represents a movement which has improved their way of life.

Scouting, rooted in the belief in God and in one's own country, teaches young people everywhere to do their best and always be prepared.

As a former Queen's Scout, I am delighted to announce the formation of the Canadian Scout Parliamentary Union, thanks to an initiative which began with our colleagues in Korea, and other Parliaments across this world that have joined together.

I would like to urge my colleagues from both sides of the House to join those founding members from Peterborough, Okanagan Centre, Fraser Valley West and London—Middlesex by stepping forward to assist in the formation of this union.

Some 265,000 Canadians involved in scouting will enjoy and need the support of this Parliament in what is going to happen in the future of scouting in the world.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the environment is important to you and it is important to me. No doubt you would agree that Canadians must be concerned about the environmental and social implications of large energy projects not only in this country, but everywhere in our global community.

One large project currently planned is in Thailand. This project proposes the construction of a hydroelectric dam on the Mun River, the largest tributary of the Mekong River.

The Thai public has demanded by way of petition and personal representation to World Bank officials in its country, that a moratorium be put on this project. The numbers of people to be displaced and resettled are in dispute. Basic data and analysis by the Electrical Generating Authority of Thailand have not been released, despite repeated requests by villagers, citizen's groups and concerned academics.

Fertile land and fishing will be destroyed. I call on our Minister of Finance, as Canada's Governor to the World Bank, to vote against extending a loan to Thailand for this project until the public in Thailand has had its concerns met.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I respectfully request and urge the Standing Committee on House Management review the Question Period process. Canadians are sending a message loud and clear that they want the politicians to change. They are demanding that private members speak out on behalf of their constituents and no longer act in a strict partisan fashion, and that includes during Question Period.

We take pride in the fact that we are a democratic country of equal opportunity and access, but our own House of Commons Question Period is undemocratic and not all MPs enjoy equal opportunity. A minority of members have a better opportunity to represent their constituents than others.

The Canadians I represent deserve the same opportunity to be represented as any other Canadians. Just because I sit on this side of the House does not mean my constituents do not have problems and concerns they want addressed, but it does not mean that I always agree with the government.

As usual, the Canadian people are ahead of the politicians. All I ask the committee to do is to ensure that all members of the House of Commons have an equal opportunity to represent their constituents.

HONG KONG VETERANS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of the House concerns over the Prime Minister's recent statements regarding compensation for Hong Kong prisoners of war.

Despite the Prime Minister's announcement that Canada extinguished its rights to any further claims to compensation, I wish to draw to the attention of the House, sections 130 and 131 of the Third Geneva Convention which specifically prohibit one government from entering into an agreement with another government that would wilfully deprive its citizens of the rights to undertake legal action for liability pursuant to the terms of the Geneva Convention.

The Prime Minister's statement is in no way consistent with the tenets of international law or Canada's position on human rights. The Prime Minister should understand that Japan's apology for its violations of the Geneva Convention has only added legitimacy to support the claims of the Hong Kong war veterans of Canada, and that his unfounded statements in regard to the matter have done a great disservice to those veterans who suffered the brutal atrocities of war in the service of their country.

TRIBUTE TO PIERRE FOURNELLE

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday, I attended a ceremony to name a municipal park in honour of Mr. Pierre Fournelle, a resident of Sainte-Agathe-des-Monts.

Mr. Fournelle has done volunteer work for 34 years in the riding of Laurentides, mostly in the field of amateur sport. His excellent work and endless dedication are impressive.

The fact that so many sports, including baseball and minor hockey, are popular in our region is largely due to the activities of Mr. Fournelle.

And, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Fournelle's commitment reaches above and beyond the boundaries of the riding of Laurentides, since he is also involved in a number of sports federations at the regional and provincial level.

I want to offer my sincere thanks to Mr. Fournelle for the many years he has dedicated his fellow citizens. He truly deserves to be held in high esteem.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, 50,000 Canadians will die from heart attacks this year. CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, Canada Customs: A Pivotal Role at the Border headlines the second edition of the cross-border report.

Canada Customs officials, our front line troops, assume a pivotal role in the cross-border shopping puzzle. First, there is the role of protection: protecting our interests through their enforcement and border control activities.

However, Canada Customs are asked to balance security with efficiency, the support of national priorities, the facilitation of trade activities, and the movement of travellers. In particular, what this means is the collection of the applicable duties and taxes from all citizens re-entering Canada with purchases and, at the same time, moving the traffic through the border points.

In the end, all members will agree that Canada cannot afford long line-ups at the border. We are losing valuable American tourist revenue, as well as duty and taxes through wave-throughs.

This may mean more efficient use of technology and current work forces, more personnel, the trial of express lanes, and/or something else.

The objective must be the collection of all applicable duties and taxes in the absence of excessive line-ups at the border.

Our Canada Custom officials are a valuable front line force in our efforts to address cross-border traffic volume. We need new initiatives to help them make headway on this matter.

Stay tuned, Mr. Speaker and colleagues, for the next edition of the cross-border report.

WORLD ENVIRONMENT DAY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, today is World Environment Day, a date on the calendar first proclaimed by the United Nations in 1972 and celebrated each subsequent year since on June 5.

World Environment Day not only highlights the many necessary and essential works undertaken by the United Nations in the area of environment but also reminds us that all peoples of the world share a common home and a responsibility for its healthy upkeep.

It is no coincidence that Canadians observe National Environment Week in the same time frame. Not only does our National Environment Week focus on promoting environmental awareness among Canadians and an appreciation of our unique and beautiful country, but it also serves as a vivid reminder that we are all accountable stewards of the earth.

While there is still much work to be done in dealing with the world's serious environmental problems, let us take advantage of World Environment Day and National Environment Week to celebrate what we have accomplished so far and reflect on what we can do in the future to make Canada the most environmentally friendly place on the planet.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WELFARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the National Council of Welfare issued a report on the financing of medicare and post-secondary education in Canada. The report did not mince words.

It said that if federal funding cuts were allowed to stand, medicare would be effectively dead as a national health care system. What could be clearer than that statement? Certainly not the Prime Minister's response that the report was inaccurate and the numbers mentioned were not justified by government projections, and certainly not the Prime Minister's waffling on the introduction of user fees.

The Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada, the Canadian Council on Social Development and the Canadian Medical Association have all stated that medicare is threatened by these unilateral funding cuts which will amount to $62.4 billion by the end of this century.

Canadians are greatly concerned about medicare and its future.

At the provincial health ministers' meeting on June 19 the government must announce two actions: first, the unilateral federal funding cuts to medicare will be reversed and, second, the federal government will ensure that neither user fees nor extra billings will be introduced in any province.

INGLEWOOD LIBRARY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, in 1891 in the community of Inglewood, Ontario a public library opened. The Inglewood Mechanics Institute Library that year had 178 volumes and 104 members.

Over the years the number of books grew as the library changed locations from a public hall to a hardware store, to a church, to an ice cream parlour. Today, the library is part of the town of Caledon library system and it gives me great pleasure to rise in my place and salute a hundred years of learning, literature, knowledge and progress in this community in my riding.

It is also an honour to thank a century of people who volunteered their time and energy to see that the printed word in Inglewood, Ontario was treasured and shared.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENT WEEK

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, Canadian Environment Week from June 2 to June 8 is a time for optimism. This is because it involves partnerships among government, industry, environmental groups, labour, health, youth, native groups, church organizations, and many others.

At the community level and at the national level all these partners work toward the common goal of increasing Canada's year-round involvement in safeguarding our environment.

On June 7, the Minister of Environment Canada will be presenting environmental achievement awards that celebrate the effort and commitment of Canadians from all walks of life who work to protect and restore our environment. These groups and individuals remind us of our responsibility to care for our environment, and indeed for our planet. These achievements prove that as individuals and as groups we can make a difference, and the awards that they receive confirm that Canada values the health of its environment.

Let us hope that these award winners will be an inspiration for others to join the environmental team. They symbolize both our national commitment to a sustainable environment and the esteem in which this nation holds those Canadians who lead us toward achieving that commitment.

I also want to mention the thousands of other unsung heroes and heroines—

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the hon. member's time has expired.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise in this House to plead for assistance to the port of Halifax.

For months, ever since the cancellation of the At and East subsidy in 1989, I and my colleagues have been begging the government to help this once great port to survive.

Two weeks ago the Minister of Transport told me that he would see that CN did "what was right". One week ago the minister told me he would do everything in his power to alleviate Halifax's problem.

It took nearly two years to get any response to our questions at all. How much longer must we wait for action?

Essentially the problems for the port are twofold: uncompetitive freight rates and an unfair tax structure. Halifax had been a thriving port since its founding 242 years ago. It has taken this government a scant seven years to put the port in jeopardy.

Why will the government not act and act now?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday Uniroyal-Goodrich said it was making fast tracks for the United States. We are about to lose another 2,000 good manufacturing jobs in Canada.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: When will he realize the damage that the free trade agreement, an agreement without safeguards, is causing to the manufacturing sector in Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member relates directly the Uniroyal potential closure to the free trade agreement.

Two months ago Uniroyal closed a tire plant in Wisconsin with 1,300 jobs. Was that because of the free trade agreement?

An hon. member: No, of course not. It is world-wide overcapacity.

Mr. Hockin: We have in Canada $600 million worth of new investment in tire manufacturing in Napanee. We have further new investments in CAMI in Ingersoll. We have further investments in Chrysler. We have Freightliner. We are getting our fair share of the automotive business and the tire business.

However, in this particular case overcapacity had to lead to that announcement yesterday.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat my question. It seems the Prime Minister isn't interested in these problems, so we will ask others to respond.

Yesterday, we had a debate on the truly critical economic crisis Montreal is facing. Today, we realize the situation is critical all across Canada, but the government doesn't seem to realize this. The Prime Minister doesn't even bother to answer our questions, but we will keep on asking them, Mr. Speaker.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: When will he acknowledge that this agreement is a disaster for Canada? And when will he announce the workers adjustment program which he promised during the 1988 election campaign?

• (1420)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly wait to respond to the hon. member.

Last year, Canada's balance of trade with the United States was at $17 billion, compared to the year before the trade agreement at $14 billion.

In fact, our balance of trade has improved as a result of the free trade agreement. It has not declined.

Another figure the hon. member should realize—this affects Montreal, Ontario and the manufacturing heartland of central Canada—is that in 1982 when his government, a government of which he was a part, was in power we had 97,000 jobs in the automotive sector.

Today, at the end of the last fiscal year, December 1990, we had 143,000 jobs in the automotive sector. The free trade agreement is helping maintain jobs even in difficult, recessionary times.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, one Uniroyal worker with 16 years of experience said: "The words I have for the Prime Minister, you could not print in the paper."

These people are skilled workers. They are men and women with experience who face a desperate situation today. The Prime Minister does not dare to get up in the House to give them—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. Leader of the Opposition would not want to make personal imputations respecting the right hon. Prime Minister or anybody else.

The Leader of the Opposition will put his question.

Mr. Chrétien: I would like to know when the government will announce the programs of adjustment that was promised to the Canadian people in 1988, or are we to expect from the government the same type of answer that we got yesterday from the Minister of State for Privatization who, when talking to the students, said: "If they look hard for jobs, they will find them."

Is that the type of government that unemployed people are looking for in Canada today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for the question.

In view of the seriousness of it, he will I am sure be delighted to read the headline in the Financial Post which says: "Housing sales—"

Mr. Ouellet: Why didn't you answer the first question?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, can the Liberals make up their minds?

They ask a question. I am ready to answer and they heckle because they do not want to hear good news. I have good news.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister will finish his answer.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, it is generally agreed that housing starts are an important indicator of economic growth. The Financial Post reported, on the front page, that housing sales surged ahead for the fourth month in a row in April, prompting an industry official to proclaim that the economic recovery is here to stay. Canada's rejuvenated housing market chalked up 65.4 per cent sales last month, the biggest annual jump and the most units sold in the National Real Estate Board's 35 year history. That is important economic news.

A final point that will interest my friend, reported a few hours ago, is that manufacturing plants increased their shipments in March. That news, along with the report by Informetrica, adds evidence that the year long recession is losing steam. Economic researchers at Informetrica say the chances of a—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

STUDENT EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment.

In the Speech from the Throne, this government spoke at length to the realization of a learning society, a globally competitive society. However, because of this government's mismanagement of the economy, this summer students are being denied a rightful opportunity to a summer job, that very important first chance.

Why does the minister and his government believe that a globally competitive society is achieved by having thousands of young people sitting at home all summer?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague knows, the programs for summer employment that were in place last year are still in place this year. Budgets have been increased and employment centres for students have been re-opened again this summer, 409 of them. I am informed that the offers of employment and the responses to employment are comparable to that of last year at the moment.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The answer offers no consolation to the thousands of unemployed Canadians who already face, with increasing tuition fees and spiralling education costs, an increasing debt load, and now the frightening unemployment rate.

Can this minister tell Canadians why this government chose to decrease funding to the seed program at a time when students desperately need this government's help? Why do the minister and this government continue to frustrate and demoralize young Canadians, this generation?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if anybody is trying to demoralize anybody, it is the hon. member by the bias of his questions.

The Challenge program has not been decreased, it has been increased. To quote Tom Sampson, Co-ordinator of Student Services for the Canada Employment Centre, he said: "Considering the depth of the recession, the unemployment situation is not as bad as predicted." The jobs are there, the offers are there and the centres are meeting the demand in a comparable way to last year.

ARCTIC SOVEREIGNTY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

For a number of years now we have been discussing in the Arctic the infringement on Canadian territory by the United States in terms of issuing oil and gas drilling leases on Canadian territory.

Once again, this year, May 20, 1991, the Department of the Interior says that under sale 124, it is going to issue oil and gas drilling licences in the Beaufort Sea in Canadian territory.

Just four years ago. in 1987, this same issue arose. What has this government done in four years to establish Canadian sovereignty in the Arctic north?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to the Leader of the NDP that there were issues relating to two proposals: one, the drilling in the Beaufort, and, two, ANWR. She will know from the presentation made by President Bush regarding the National Energy Strategy that those issues are included within the NES.

I want to indicate to her that as recently as two days ago I was able to speak to Secretary Watkins at the International Energy Agency and raise these issues with him directly.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. Just a few years ago this government was prepared to spend billions of dollars on nuclear submarines to protect Arctic sovereignty. Rather than just speaking to people, when is the government going to stand up for the interests of Canada?

This report from the Department of the Interior of the United States says that it will issue leases in Canadian waters, if it is in the U.S. interest. What about the Canadian interest and what is this government doing specifically to stand up to the U.S. government and say that this is unacceptable and Canadian sovereignty is just that, it is Canadian sovereignty.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the NDP asks what will we do directly. I have already indicated to her how direct we had been. Additionally, I can point out to her that through the Canadian Embassy and directly through Ambassador Burney these issues have been raised, and also directly with various officials in the United States regarding both Canada's position on the Beaufort as well as the position that we have taken on ANWR.

I say to the hon. member that our position from 1987 has not changed. Canada's position on sovereignty has not changed. The United States government can have whatever position it wants. Our position has not changed on that sovereignty question.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister. Clearly there are serious issues. These are not new issues. They did not arise on May 20 of this year. These issues have been going on for years, and what gains have Canadians made.

The Canadian interests are being threatened by exactly the topic that the minister raised, and that is ANWR, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, where the Senate just two weeks ago voted to allow drilling in that Arctic refuge. This will mean that the 200,000 Porcupine caribou herd will be jeopardized for 200 days of oil, as will the lives of the Gwitch'in people of Yukon and Alaska.

I ask the Prime Minister: Is he willing to intervene directly to protect Canadian sovereignty in this issue, to speak to President Bush and say this is unacceptable to Canada, to have drilling in ANWR, and it is unacceptable to Canada for the United States to sell off bits of Canada piece by piece?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the question of ANWR came forward when the United States government asked a number of both its oil companies and American citizens as to the future of their energy policy, which came forward then in what is known as the national energy strategy for the United States. In it was the ANWR proposal.

The hon. Leader of the NDP should know what the Canadian position has been on ANWR. She should also know, for example with respect to the Porcupine herd that Canada has been protective of that herd. Having said that, Canada as well has given, for example, export licences in the Beaufort and the very area of which she speaks. We are obviously trying to develop a regime whereby Canada's interests are protected and also where proper oil and gas exploration and development can take place.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. On May 15 the Prime Minister said in this House in response to questions concerning his office's involvement in the Al-Mashat case, and I would like to quote: "Mr. Tellier, speaking for the Privy Council Office, said do not admit him".

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Does he still stand by that statement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was asked the question on May 15. I responded to two different questions on May 15, I believe.

Yesterday Mr. Tellier was interrogated by members of the opposition when he appeared before the committee. His response to that question was: "There is absolutely nothing wrong with the Prime Minister's statement. The Prime Minister's statement—"

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question was in order. I am concerned about where the answer was going because I did the very best I could yesterday to indicate that we ought not to be debating in this place what is actually being debated in the committee. I think I have to say to the right hon. Prime Minister that the position I took with members of the opposition yesterday will have to apply to the right hon. Prime Minister today.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre may have a supplementary. I hope that he will be as careful in phrasing it as he was the first question.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, considering that I did not receive an answer from the Prime Minister, I will repeat it.

On May 15, he made a statement—

Mr. Speaker: I think, in fairness, the hon. member will want to remember that it was the Speaker who interrupted the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister was trying to give an answer. I did not allow him to give the answer he was wanting to give.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, if there is no answer to that question, may I ask a supplementary?

In interviews given to journalists, the Clerk of the Privy Council said that there was never any decision not to admit Mr. Al-Mashat, but simply a decision not to fast-track Mr. Al-Mashat. That is in direct contradiction to the statement made on May 15, when the Prime Minister said: "Do not admit him".

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has just referred to what he says is a comment made to journalists.

Mr. Tobin: Outside the committee room.

Mr. Speaker: However, the hon. member has also described the statement as opposed to another statement made on May 15 in the House.

Mr. Tobin: In the House.

Mr. Speaker: I will allow the hon. member to say: "In view of the statement made outside the House" and ask if the Prime Minister has any comment. The Prime Minister can comment if he wishes. But it is not appropriate for the hon. member to prejudge what the statement outside the House and in the House amounted to.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to follow the guidelines you have just established.

I will ask the Prime Minister this. On May 15, and I would like to quote directly from Hansard of that day, he said:

> Mr. Tellier, speaking for the Privy Council Office, said: "do not admit him". Notwithstanding that, he was admitted. That was in violation of the procedures of the Government of Canada.

In view of what was said yesterday, does the Prime Minister now withdraw that statement, or do we have to assume there is an inherent contradiction between himself and the Clerk of the Privy Council?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, why would my hon. friend say that when, if he read the transcript a few pages later—

Mr. Ouellet: He was there.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says that he was there. In fairness, if he was there, he should then report to the House that when Mr. Tellier was asked whether the statement made by the Prime Minister on May 15 was accurate, he said: "It is 100 per cent accurate".

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and his ministers have repeatedly assured Canadians that all of the facts about the Al-Mashat case would be made public. Does the Prime Minister still stand by those assurances?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, under the rules, that is repeating a question that was answered, and answered in the affirmative. The answer still stands.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have a supplementary.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, since the answer was in the affirmative, and we know that a group of ministers met on May 13 to discuss the Al-Mashat matter, but ministers and public servants alike refuse to discuss what occurred, citing cabinet secrecy—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking what took place in conversations between cabinet ministers. It has always been the rule that that question is out of order.

Mr. Wappel: My question is not what took place. Will the Prime Minister please fulfil his government's promise and instruct his ministers and public servants to publicly discuss the details of the May 13 meeting.

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: I have to commend the hon. member for imagination, but it is still out of order.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on May 15 in this House the Prime Minister said that the Clerk of the Privy Council, Paul Tellier, speaking for the Privy Council Office, said, "do not admit Al-Mashat. Notwithstanding that, he was admitted. The visa ought not to have been issued".

Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that yesterday the same Clerk of the Privy Council said—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway has heard my concerns about this line of questioning. I am trying to do everything I can to ensure that an appropriate question can be asked, but the hon. member is now reaching right back into the committee.

I will hear the question and I will listen to it carefully.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the Clerk of the Privy Council yesterday stated outside the committee that in fact neither he nor anybody in the Privy Council Office at any point said that a visa should not be issued to Al-Mashat.

My question to the Prime Minister is straightforward. Who was telling the truth, the Prime Minister or the Clerk of the Privy—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Next question.

Mr. Speaker: That question is an allegation of dishonesty by one person or another and I am not going to allow it. The hon. member may have a supplementary and I would ask again that the hon. member be careful.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the two statements are on the record. I want to ask the Prime Minister this. In view of the clear contradiction, is the Prime Minister prepared to appear before the standing committee on external affairs and come clean with Canadians about his involvement in this matter.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: That question is a clear accusation and I am not allowing it.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I must say on behalf of the opposition, it puzzles us that we cannot ask specific questions about statements made by the Prime Minister in the House which appear to be at odds with the truth.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I would say to the hon. member for Hamilton East that that is completely improper. I know that given her experience in the House she would not want to proceed in that way. If the hon. member has a question I will listen to it.

MEDICARE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is on another matter.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would put her question.

Ms. Copps: While the American Congress is promoting the potential benefits of medicare, the Canadian government is in the process of destroying it.

My question is for the Prime Minister. As a result of cuts in transfer payments to the provinces, the death of medicare is being forecast by groups such as the National Council of Welfare.

Is he aware that as a result of his government's cuts this year, the provinces will be deprived of financing equivalent to 10,000 hospital beds across the country? Is he aware of the fact that at least 10,000 Canadians will be made to wait this year for health care because of his government's cutbacks to the provinces?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as usual the member for Hamilton East is wrong.

An hon. member: Again.

An hon. member: Her record is unbroken.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Money given to the provinces this year is more than it was last year, except that the way we provide the money could be different. We have less money in terms of cash payments and more money in transfer payments. I believe the National Council has not emphasized this enough in terms of the tax transfers.

This began in 1977 when guess who was in power?

An hon. member: Tell us.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): That government decided at that time to give more flexibility to the provinces by transferring more tax payments to the provinces rather than cash money.

That is exactly what we do. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will not change his mind today as he did yesterday or last week.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the National Council of Welfare was created by this government, and it has clearly proved that you are going to cut $7 billion at the expense of the patients of this country.

I have a question for this minister: Will he acknowledge that starting this year, 10,000 hospital beds will be cut in Canada because of his policies? Can he go on claiming he supports universality of health care, when he knows his own government is undermining that principle?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I find it very difficult to make sense of this question but I will try.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps everybody could put clear questions and the ministers will, of course, try to answer them directly.

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton East ought to know that as far as health services are concerned, the number of beds in our hospitals is the exclusive responsibility of the provinces and is determined by the provinces.

This year, the federal government will provide more funding than it did last year. Once again, I want to hear the hon. member for Hamilton East say she is against Quebec exercising its own jurisdiction over this area.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

At a time when 825,000 Quebecers are out of work, 500,000 draw unemployment insurance and 325,000 are on welfare, is the minister aware that the Conseil des affaires sociales du Québec has just made specific recommendations to the Government of Quebec and his own government, the Canadian government? And what kind of concrete action does he intend to take within the next few weeks to get Quebec out of his critical economic situation caused by his government's ill-conceived economic policies?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it takes a lot of nerve to rise in the House and point an accusing finger at a government that has to spend literally tens of billions of dollars just to pay off the interest on a debt that the hon. member and his Liberal colleagues left us. It takes a lot of nerve!

Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member look at the last Budget very carefully. He will find in that Budget, brought down by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, a prescription for the economic ills of Quebec and the entire country. Let him read the Budget! I am sure he will learn something.

• (1450)

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, it is not important for me to read this budget, but for the Canadian people to do so. As a matter of fact, the Quebec Social Affairs Council read the budget and so did the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU). Both disagree totally with this government's economic policies.

I am going to put the question again to the minister. He knows the CNTU has made seven concrete proposals to undo the economic damage done by this government. The last time I brought this up, he replied he had not read the document. I hope he has read it now. So, which of the CNTU's recommendations is he prepared to implement immediately?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if I could get the attention of the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel. The Liberals' logic is hard to follow, but we will give it a try. Last week, the hon. member accused the federal government of interference in provincial matters. And the last I heard, social affairs came under the Quebec government's jurisdiction. That is the "snowplough" principle in action, Mr. Speaker: a step forward and a step backward.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of trade I would like to address this question to the Prime Minister.

This morning I had occasion to speak to Mr. Lloyd Spalter who is the executive vice president of Uniroyal Goodrich in Akron, Ohio about the closure planned at the Kitchener plant. I find it interesting I have to phone the United States about Canadian jobs. In my conversation with the executive vice-president, he informed me that one of the plants will close for sure and another one may close. He also informed me that during the 1989 strike at this plant, Uniroyal Goodrich had no problem at all in supplying the Canadian market under another brand name of American manufacture.

What is the Prime Minister going to do to save Canadian jobs and protect us from rapacious practices by Americans who, under the free trade agreement, can do anything they want with the Canadian market whether they are on strike or not?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, one thing the Prime Minister of this country is going to do is keep the auto pact in place and keep the free trade agreement in place.

I would suggest to the hon. member that he should read the press release issued in Canada by the president, Mr. Schaub, who says that there is over-capacity in the industry of about 30 per cent—

Mr. Tobin: What the hell does that have to do with it?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member want to listen to the answer?

An hon. member: No, he doesn't. He wants to bash the Americans.

Mr. Hockin: The Canadian president said there is 30 per cent over-capacity in the industry. He has a plant which was built in 1913 and what he wants to do is take this plant and see if it can be rationalized. He is not sure it can. Therefore he made the announcement yesterday.

This country has been witness to a tremendous increase in investments in the last two years as a result of the free trade agreement. We have gone from a $2.5 billion deficit to a $4 billion surplus in terms of net investment. That is what the trade agreement will bring. That is why the tire industry and the auto industry will improve and it is already improving.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, let us look at what else this Canadian president said in the past when Michelin bought out Uniroyal Goodrich in 1989. Uniroyal promised that there would be no jobs lost in the Kitchener operations. Now Michelin is clearly shutting down competition after this merger.

Will the government launch an investigation under the competition bureau of this elimination of competition and of this broken promise that no jobs would be lost.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the workers in that plant do not want an inquiry, what they want are the jobs.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister could reply to the question.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, now that the hon. member agrees that there should not be an inquiry, let me address exactly what is going to happen.

We have spoken to the president of that company. We are going to work with him in co-operation with Employment and Immigration and put together an adjustment package. We are also going to see if we can help in any way to consolidate the operations and see if it can have a longer life. At present in the tire industry there are production lines seven days a week, three shifts a day. This particular operation was five days a week and was not operating at full capacity.

As a result, we are going to see if we can put together one line which would be three shifts, seven days, and see if we can continue even with that plant. But if there is downsizing, we have the best—

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

I have talked to several business leaders in Markham who are very concerned about the delay they are experiencing in receiving their GST refunds. Arthur Boas of Cabletest International of Markham finally received his January cheque just a few days ago.

When the GST was introduced, the minister made a commitment to send the refund within 21 days. Revenue Canada officials have said they are short of staff and that business owners should phone their MPs. This is ridiculous.

Does the minister realize how this backlog of refunds is really hurting many small businesses? What specific plans does he have to clear up this situation?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member bringing these specific problems to my attention. I will instruct my officials to immediately look into the matter and investigate the specific allegations if they are proven to be correct. I can assure the hon. member that it is not acceptable for Revenue Canada employees to tell businesses to call members of Parliament.

Further to that, as I have said in this House on previous occasions, in the early stages we had problems with the rebate program. We have taken corrective action in bringing in a streamlined process. I can assure the House and announce to this House that as of May 30, the vast majority of all rebates and refunds have taken place.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, with over 13 per cent unemployment in Kitchener-Waterloo, the area is reeling after the announcement yesterday that Uniroyal Goodrich was going to lay off 2,100 workers.

It was just last year that Michelin took over Uniroyal Goodrich for $1.5 billion.

Why did this government not act at that time, to ensure that Canadian production and Canadian workers would not be the first victims of this takeover?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been watching television last night when they were interviewing workers as they left the Uniroyal plant, virtually every worker said that this 1913 plant did not have a long life and they were not totally surprised by this answer.

• (1500)

We must not just complain about history. We must put in place a good worker adjustment program. Worker adjustment programs can work in Kitchener. I have in my hand investments in 10 different operations in Kitchener alone which are planned in the next six months. The economy in Kitchener will be affected by this closure. There is no doubt about that. We are going to work with them in retraining.

A great many openings will be coming. I have 10 construction projects alone which I would like the hon. member to take a look at. More important, when Michelin took over this operation, it closed two Michelin tire plants in France a year ago. In other words, there is huge over capacity. The workers at Uniroyal realize that and we are going to be there to help them as they go through this transition.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, this minister is standing here applauding or at least not opposing the shutting down of plants and the loss of jobs for Canadian workers. Canadian workers are fed up with being the first ones to be fired.

Mr. Mulroney: Come on, come on.

Mr. Peterson: The Prime Minister says: "Come on". This government did not act at the time of the takeover to protect Canadian jobs. Furthermore, its policies of high interest rates and high dollar and its made-in-Canada recession are helping to drive these jobs south.

Are these jobs just part of the government's plan to deindustrialize Canada? Will the minister please assume his responsibilities for these lost jobs, ensure the retraining of these workers and assure them new jobs?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I cannot really discern a question in that oration, but let me just tell the hon. member that manufacturing shipments are up in Canada, automobile sales are up, housing starts are up. The economy is coming back. We have a new huge investment in Chrysler, a new huge investment in CAMI and a new huge investment in Freightliner. We have job opportunities for those workers. We believe in looking to the future and helping them adjust for the future.

Mr. Speaker: I have a question of privilege from the hon. member for Scarborough West.

PRIVILEGE

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning my question in the Question Period and the outcome of your ruling on that matter. I do so with some trepidation because of the respect I have for the Chair and the knowledge that the Chair has about the rules.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to hear the hon. member and I understand perfectly that the matter is not raised with any disrespect to the Chair. The hon. member will also know that it is a difficult point of procedural law. I shall hear the hon. member.

Mr. Wappel: It is precisely for that reason that I raise it; that I may have guidance in the future for my conduct in Question Period.

I know the Speaker will review the "blues", but I think he will find that what I said in the preamble to my supplementary was, and I quote: "We know that a group of ministers met on May 13 to discuss the Al-Mashat matter". I did not say that it was a cabinet meeting.

I may be wrong but I do not believe that every time cabinet ministers get together, shall we say, to have a cup of coffee, walk their dogs or play a game of racket ball, it constitutes a cabinet meeting.

My question was very specific because of the difficulties this House is having vis-à-vis the committee hearings. It was about a meeting that cabinet ministers had. I went on then to point out that certain people were claiming cabinet secrecy. It may very well be that if the government wished to stand up—I am not going to give the answer—and say something about that meeting and explain it, that is fine.

I think a check in Hansard will show that there is no evidence before the House and no statement in Hansard that any particular meeting on May 13 was a cabinet meeting.

Accordingly, since there is no evidence to that effect, I would respectfully suggest that I should have been allowed to complete the question and therefore my privileges as a member were impugned.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on the same point.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important for you to render a ruling with regard to the issue of cabinet secrecy or cabinet confidentiality.

Must the privilege be claimed before it becomes effective? Is it up to the Speaker of the House to determine when the privilege should attach, or is there a pre-set of guidelines or criteria to determine when cabinet confidentiality or cabinet secrecy applies?

The reason why this issue becomes relevant is with regard to the Al-Mashat matter. It has been established that on May 13 there was a meeting and at that meeting there were a number of civil servants. There were also a number of cabinet ministers present at that particular meeting. They discussed the Al-Mashat matter.

Does the mere fact of a gathering or a meeting of cabinet ministers lead to the notion of cabinet confidentiality or cabinet secrecy? Was it a meeting of cabinet? Was it a subcommittee of cabinet? Does the mere meeting of two or more ministers constitute a cabinet meeting and therefore allow the claim of privilege?

I believe it is an important issue. When my hon. friend and colleague put the question, the privilege was not claimed. The Speaker appeared to conclude that cabinet confidentiality or secrecy would apply because there was a meeting of cabinet ministers. I would seek direction on that point because it is urgent as far as the Al-Mashat hearings are concerned.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway in just a moment. I am expecting to hear some arguments from him.

First of all, I want to thank the hon. member for Scarborough West and the hon. member for York South—Weston for being specific and explicit in this matter. I assure you the Chair is aware of the importance of the matter to all members of the House. I will consider very carefully the representations that have been made. I think I have the point clearly and I will try to get back and report to the House very quickly, as soon as I possibly can.

The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order of which I gave the Chair notice immediately following the exchange with the Prime Minister during Question Period.

I want to raise the following point of order with respect to that exchange in yesterday's proceedings as well.

I am very concerned that the Speaker appears to be suggesting that matters which have been raised in a parliamentary committee, no matter how important the issues are or what issues are raised which directly affect Canadians, cannot be pursued in this House.

I want to ask the Chair to reflect very carefully and to provide guidance to this House on the implications of what appears to be that ruling. If that is the case, it would mean that a whole range of issues which members explore in considerable detail, in some cases with witnesses before committee, could not in fact be pursued in this place.

They are reported on widely. Yesterday's proceedings of the Standing Committee on External Affairs were reported on extensively concerning the item which I wish to address to the Prime Minister. The suggestion was made that in this House on May 15 the Prime Minister had made certain statements. The Prime Minister yesterday said in response to a question: "Well, go to the committee and the Clerk of the Privy Council will pursue that issue and will, I am sure, back me up."

I went to the committee. I asked the questions in the committee of the Clerk of the Privy Council and he said—

Mr. Speaker: Let us not get into the context of what happened in the committee at the moment. It is not necessary.

Point of Order

I have the hon. member's point. It is a serious question and I accept it as such. I would ask the hon. member to let me look at the "blues" for today and as soon as I have them, I will come back and let the hon. member, who will then also have the "blues", perhaps address me further and I will try to give some guidance.

I appreciate the reason for putting the question and I accept fully that it is a serious one.

• (1510)

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the only caveat is that I certainly will come back at the earliest possible occasion to pursue this matter. I may not be in the House tomorrow, but I will certainly pursue it at the earliest possible occasion. It is an important and serious issue.

Mr. Speaker: I want it made very clear to all hon. members that I take the matters raised as serious.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order with a great deal of hesitation this afternoon. I do believe the government House leader acted inappropriately during Question Period.

Mr. Speaker, I want to draw your attention and the House's attention to Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 369. It says:

> —point of order raised during the oral Question Period ought to be taken up after the oral Question Period, unless the Speaker considers it to be an extremely grave matter.

I think we would all agree that this is the usual approach that we have all followed, that when we have a concern on a point of order which ought to be raised during Question Period, we hold off until after.

Today, under the guise of responding to a question, the government House Leader said: "Under the rules, that has been answered." That is obviously a point of order that ought to have been raised at the appropriate time. Perhaps you, Mr. Speaker, and the government House leader could have a chat about that so he would act appropriately during Question Period.

Mr. Speaker: I will take a look at the exchange. The government House leader was the only minister rising in response to questions. However, I will look at the exchange and consider what the hon. member has said.

The hon. government House leader may wish to address me.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party reading Beauchesne's concerning Question Period. I hope he reads it all and counsels his members accordingly in terms of what is a proper question and what is not.

Clearly, one of the citations state that questions should not be repeated. I was simply making the point that it was a repetition of the question and I repeated the answer. The answer was "yes" as it was the previous time it was asked.

Mr. Speaker, your comments in terms of the other two points of order are appropriate and I agree with those comments. I think they need to be looked into.

I would just like to, very briefly, make a couple of points. One concerns what constitutes a question. Citation 411(2) in Beauchesne's sixth edition says:

> A question may not:
> (2) seek information about matters which are in their nature secret, such as decisions of proceedings of Cabinet—

Discussions between cabinet ministers are by their nature secret and discussions between ministers and officials are by their nature secret. I think it is in keeping with the citation to suggest that those questions ought not to be asked. Mr. Speaker, you can appreciate the difficulty it creates if members are going to stand up and ask: "Now what did you discuss with your colleagues at this meeting and that meeting and so on?" They are by their nature secret, as are formal cabinet meetings. However, any time one of my colleagues discusses matters within our administrative responsibility, we are discussing matters which are by their nature secret and ought not to be questions, according to Beauchesne's—which, I repeat, should be enforced.

As for the question of whether the proceedings of a committee should be a matter for questions in the House, raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Kingsway on a point of order, 411(3) says:

> A question may not:
> (3) seek information about proceedings in a committee which has not yet made its report to the House.

The reason for that citation should obviously be clear. This matter is fairly complex. There are a number of documents and people involved and so on. In committee the complexity can be explored. At the end of the day, when all the information has been deduced before committee, conclusions can be reached. That is the appropriate forum. To extract out of context one or two items to bring forward to the House is certainly not to serve the purposes of elucidation and clarity for the benefit of the public, but rather to serve other purposes.

In that context, that is a very good explanation of why this citation is in Beauchesne's and why it was entirely appropriate that the citation be enforced in this instance. Members should not use this forum as a mechanism for extracting from the committee those items they find to be to their partisan advantage to be brought forward in the House.

I do not think that serves the public purpose or the public's ability to know the true situation or the facts. It is also not in keeping with what Question Period is supposed to be, namely the opportunity for the opposition to seek information that cannot be obtained in other more appropriate mechanisms such as letter writing, proceedings in committee and so on.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the points of order which have been raised by both my colleague from Burnaby and the government House leader.

The government House leader suggested to the House that when cabinet ministers have discussions, by their very nature they are secret. That, in my view, is somewhat absurd.

There is a big distinction to be made between cabinet ministers meeting and discussing certain points and a cabinet meeting being struck for the purposes of making the decision.

At a cabinet meeting there is a secretary, there are minutes and there are copies of the decisions that have been reached at that particular meeting.

To suggest to the House that each and every conversation between two cabinet ministers, whatever it may be, is somehow sacred is absolutely absurd and I believe should not be found by the Chair or by anyone to be an appropriate point of order.

Second, with regard to the point of order raised by my colleague from Burnaby concerning proceedings at committee not being allowed to be raised on the floor of the House of Commons for Question Period, Mr. Speaker, you have given an undertaking to that member and I believe through him to the House that you will reflect on the "blues".

I would simply ask you, Mr. Speaker, prior to making any adjudication to give due notice to the various political parties so that we will have an opportunity to make additional representations to you. While you are reflecting on that, let us draw the distinction that the hon. member has made.

I am looking at the fifth edition of Beauchesne's. My sixth edition is not with me today, but I am sure members will bear with me.

I refer to paragraph 360(3) which talks about seeking information about proceedings in a committee which has not yet made its report to the House.

Let us be very clear. The wording says: "proceedings". It does not say: "subject matter". There is quite a distinction to be made between proceedings on one hand and subject matter on the other.

My second point is the following. We have in the rules in Beauchesne's a rule which has been tradition through the years, which I know my colleague in the New Democratic Party and the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader will probably want to speak to if not today, later in the debate. That is the sub judice rule.

That specifically refers to subject matter before a court. It says: "subject matter".

This citation concerns proceedings. It does not concern subject matter. If it was to have been subject matter, the rule would have been clear. It would have been spelled out that subject matter is not to be raised on the floor in Question Period.

Finally, it must be understood—the Chair is well aware of this and I am sure the Table is also—that there are numerous agencies of the Government of Canada which are obligated by statute to file statutory reports to various standing committees of the House of Commons.

Today, we have some 40 federal departments, 40 different ministries and there are numerous reports that are filed with the Clerk and are automatically referred. There is no debate. They are automatically referred to standing committees. Is the Chair going to say to members of Parliament that because that subject matter has been referred to a standing committee that this particular body has no right, no authority whatsoever to examine the subject matter and to raise questions? It is absolutely absurd to suggest that.

Finally, in terms of the distinction, standing committees of the House are not independent, quasi or judicial bodies of the House. They are creatures of the House. It is Parliament, I suggest, through the Chair to hon. members, that is the final authority, and you, Mr. Speaker, the final arbitrator in terms of what is acceptable or not acceptable.

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will reflect on those comments. But I wish to make the caveat, that before any adjudication is made with regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Burnaby that all members—myself, my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier, my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, and I am sure more members—would want to have the opportunity to make interventions.

I make those general comments for the Chair so that the Chair might reflect on the absurdity that is being promoted by the government House leader with regard to that point of order; and, second, his point of order that cabinet ministers when they meet on the street and talk, their conversations somehow are secret, is absolutely and unequivocally nonsense.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Just on a very short point of order to complement the point being made by my hon. friend, the House leader for the Official Opposition.

I refer to "we cannot comment on the proceedings of committee in the House". I think we all understand that. I want to draw the House's attention to the fact that on the agendas for the committees we talk about the "Minutes, Proceedings and Evidence". Obviously when we talk about proceedings we are not referring to the subject matter being discussed in committee.

I want to draw the House's attention and yours, Mr. Speaker, to Erskine May, 12th edition. On page 92 it says:

The meaning of the term 'proceedings' in Parliament: The primary meaning, as a technical parliamentary term of proceedings, is some formal action, usually a decision.

I think that summarizes it. In other words, we are looking at some course of action. It is an action, it is not the subject material, it is not the evidence being presented; it is simply some action, something being tabled, a vote being taken, or whatever.

I do believe that these are useful interventions. I want to support the points made by the previous speaker by suggesting that to say we ought not raise any issue that is before a committee would almost prohibit the House of Commons from functioning on many days. We have so many committees, they are very active, they cover so many various areas, that I think when we refer to page 92 of Erskine May we appreciate that unless it is a formal action being taken, subject matter is something that we can in fact bring up in the House of Commons.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I want to make two or three comments.

First of all, as I understood your rulings during Question Period, they were not relating specifically to the fact that this particular issue was before the committee. In one case, you were dealing with a question concerning a conversation between ministers, supposedly a cabinet meeting. That was the first ruling. The second one, as I recall it, concerned the question, who is telling the truth? In other words, it was an accusation or a declaration of motivation by members. Those were the specific issues.

I think when it comes to the issue of questions before this House regarding committee activity, the Standing Order which I think is the most relevant and the one that the Speaker must take into account in any ruling that he may be considering, is citation 359, clause 5, "where the matter ought to be of some urgency".

I think the whole thrust of that is to say that the reason we don't have a committee hearing and then an hour or two later the same issue heard a second time in the House of Commons is, as the House leader pointed out earlier, that we would be taking the same issue into two completely different forums, one where you have the opportunity to explore in detail and have rebuttal. The other is where there is simply to be a quick question and a quick answer.

If there is another forum where the issue can be better dealt with, as in this case the House decided that the Al-Mashat affair should be dealt with in committee, then as long as those committee hearings continue to provide that forum, I would argue that clearly in accordance with this particular section of Beauchesne's, questions should not be considered on that issue in this House.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, the same things were said by members opposite in 1988 and you know who became extinct in the national election after that date.

With respect to the point of order relating to the remarks made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons relevant to the Al-Mashat affair, as a member of the House and of the standing committee on external affairs I was privy to all the remarks made.

What I want to say, Mr. Speaker, and I hope you will take it into account when rendering your decision, is this. It is trite law that when words are uttered in the House of Commons or anywhere else, the meaning and interpretation to be given to those words is a matter of debate. It is not a matter of judgmental decision. One argues one way. One argues another.

When you take that into account, Mr. Speaker, you will find that as high an official of this government as Mr. Paul Tellier has said that the remarks made by the Prime Minister of Canada are 100 per cent accurate. Those words are on record. They are in the public domain. The public can judge the accuracy of the words.

Mr. Speaker: I am certainly prepared to accept, and I do accept the argument of the hon. member, but this is not the place for us to be judging the testimony heard in the committee.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I know you do not wish to have this matter go on and on, but hon. members are going to have to bear with me. The fact of the matter is that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader has made specific references to Beauchesne's citation 359, subsection 5, when he talks about whether or not the matter is of some urgency.

The hon. member, maybe in his own mind—and I could use adjectives to describe "mind" but I will not—may feel sincerely that the subject matter being raised is not of sufficient urgency. But I suggest that the matter is of paramount urgency.

The Prime Minister of this country has made a statement on the floor of the House of Commons on May 15, 1991. Our colleagues have expressed certain concerns with regard to the validity of that statement. I think the Prime Minister ought to be given every opportunity to clarify, if they need clarifying, those particular statements. To suggest that somehow the subject matter of the evidence on the record of the senior public servant of this country seems to be quite different from what was said in this Chamber—

An hon. member: That is debate.

Mr. Dingwall: No, no. It is not debate, Mr. Speaker. It is not debate. The hon. member has said the subject matter is not of great urgency. What I am doing is rebutting that argument and saying that it is urgent. It depends upon your definition of urgency, and I suggest that the hon. member is taking a very subjective view as to what is the definition of urgency and it is a very self-serving one. I am suggesting through the Chair to the hon. member that if the objective test was taken in this particular instance, particularly with the Prime Minister and his chief public servant being at odds, then hon. members would readily recognize that it indeed is an urgent matter.

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member would like to contribute to this discussion.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, if the government House leader was to read out all of the tests for a question in Question Period from Beauchesne's or from Erskine May, I am afraid we would not have any questions qualifying under those standards in Beauchesne's. Of course, the reason is that those guidelines for questions were devised a few hundred years ago and one of the chief rules is of course, as you know, that under those rules you are not allowed to ask the government questions concerning government policy.

The Chair has to make a decision when you have rules that really no longer apply to today. When the rules that are in the official rule book are there with the rules that your seats must be two sword lengths apart. Our rules evolve according to what is common sense.

I think that the judgments made by the Chair should reflect what would make common sense today. What would be the judgment of the ordinary person?

We would submit that the entire purpose of Question Period is, if you wanted a broad definition, to make the government accountable to the people of Canada for its actions. That should be the guiding rule that determines questions in the House of Commons, the accountability of the government.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to remind you that the accountability of government through the House of Commons has changed drastically over the years. A cabinet minister is no longer, according to our customs, held accountable at times for things that happened in a department. Any restrictions on Question Period, the types of questions that can be asked or the subject matter of those questions, would seriously impair the little accountability we still do have in the procedure of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank hon. members and the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, the hon. member for Kamloops and the other members who have taken part in this debate. I will, of course, examine the "blues". I think all of the matters that have been raised are worthy of consideration and I shall try to give the best guidance I can.

I might say to hon. members that I also take into account the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond's request, which I accept, and that is to not report back to the House without adequate opportunity to discuss the matter further if that is necessary.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the pleasure to present to the House, in both official languages, the Second Report of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

Routine Proceedings

AUTOMOTIVE POLLUTION REDUCTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex) moved for leave to introduce Bill C- 226, an act to reduce automotive pollution.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present during Environmental Week in Canada a bill to reduce automotive pollution in Canada.

This bill provides the means to reduce automotive pollution by requiring that automotive gasolines contain at least 3.2 per cent oxygen and that methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl be banned in Canada. Ethanol blended gasolines labelled as an environmentally friendly fuel will cut carbon dioxide emissions by 5.9 per cent, carbon monoxide emissions by 25 per cent, volatile organic compounds by 8.5 per cent, nitrous oxide by 5.7 per cent and urban ozone by 5.3 per cent.

With a hot summer ahead of us and the increased threat of global warming with increased auto emissions, I am moving this bill that will improve the environment, remove a health risk, especially for urban areas, and provide a market for millions of bushels of Canadian grain.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL

REVIEW OF PAROLE AND PENITENTIARY ACTS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find consent for the following motion:

That pursuant to subsection 14(1) of an Act to amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act, Chapter 34, Second Supplement, Revised Statutes of Canada 1985, the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General be the committee to undertake a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of section 21.2 to 21.6 of the Parole Act and the Schedule thereto in subsections 25(5) to 7 and section 26.1 of the Penitentiary Act, and that the said committee report no later than Monday, July 22, 1991.

That the evidence adduced by the committee on the said subject in the Second Session of the present Parliament be deemed to have been referred to the committee.

And that notwithstanding the usual practices of the House, if the House is not sitting when the report of the committee is completed, the committee may report its findings by depositing its report with the Clerk of the House and the report shall have been deemed to have been presented.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

MMT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. One petition is signed by a number of constituents of the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who are supporting the initiative so eloquently placed in this House by my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex to encourage Canadians to utilize a mixture of ethanol in fuel for automobile use and to eliminate at the same time the product known as MMT.

That is an excellent petition, of course.

VETERANS BENEFITS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition. This one is signed by a number of people from Alexandria, Ontario, in Glengarry of course. These fine constituents and Canadians are wanting to alert the government to the fact that they are most upset with the federal government's decision to cut back on benefits to veterans in this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have a whole series of petitions from Canadians virtually everywhere, thousands of them, who again want to remind the government that they do not like the goods and services tax any more now than they did before the government put it in place.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition signed by over 400 residents of my own constituency of Beaches—Woodbine who state that the government has cut CBC funding by $140 million over the next four years, resulting in 1,200 job losses and the closing of 10 regional stations.

These petitioners urge the government to restore proper funding to the CBC so it can fulfil its mandate and role as the heartbeat of Canada.

• (1540)

RCMP

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present to the House today, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first one comes on the back of the announcement by the Solicitor General that the contract for RCMP services throughout Canada will be continued for one year.

However, these people in various areas of British Columbia point out that the cutbacks recently in the RCMP services have hurt small communities within Canada.

The petitioners urge the government to restore proper funding to the RCMP so that it can fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia.

UNITEL

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): My second petition urges the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service.

It further urges the Minister of Communications to consult with all affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside Canada's urban areas who will be impacted severely by deregulation.

It further urges the Minister of Communications to hold local hearings in our communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

RURAL CANADA

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here that is signed by people from 21 Saskatchewan communities, including the communities of Oxbow, Cut Knife, Maidstone, Spy Hill and Lone Rock.

These people are protesting the cutbacks in the infrastructure of rural Canada by this government, including cuts to VIA Rail service, abandonment of rail lines, neglect of fishery, forestry and agriculture, erosion of rural postal service and particularly closure of rural post offices.

These people are calling on the government to turn back from its abandonment of rural Canada and especially to support the rural post office system, which is in fact the lifeline of rural Canada.

UNITEL

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present to the House today, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition concerns the Minister of Communications. It is to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service.

As has been pointed out earlier today, this threat is most pervasive in the non-urban areas and particularly on the Gulf Islands where it is necessary to have long distance charges.

As is well known, competition in telephone services increases rather than decreases costs.

I urge the Minister of Communications to listen to those petitioners.

RCMP

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): My second petition is in relation to the RCMP.

The Solicitor General has acted to extend the contract for one further year. We are very glad for that, but for long-term planning for the municipalities of my area, assurance is needed that funding for the RCMP will be extended longer than one year.

The RCMP is a force which Canadians are proud of and which is a symbol for national unity at this important time.

I urge the government to listen to these petitioners.

UNITEL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and indeed a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a large number of people from western Canada who have concerns regarding Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service.

The petitioners point out that if this is permitted to proceed, the effect would be that local telephone rates will escalate and add a lot of additional cost to people who use the telephone.

The petitioners are asking the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service. They are urging the Minister of Communications to consult with all the affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside Canada's urban areas who will be impacted most severely by this deregulation.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by some 58 petitioners who are mostly from my own riding of Kootenay West—Revelstoke, the communities of Slocan, Johnsons Landing, Argenta, the cities of Revelstoke, Castlegar, Trail, and outside from Salmon Arm, Vancouver and Sparwood, British Columbia.

The petitioners ask Parliament to give serious consideration to the matter of Petro-Canada and Bill C-84, to take into consideration matters of price stability and energy security.

For a number of environmental reasons, they call upon Parliament to defeat or repeal Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the National Petroleum Company of Canada and to keep Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation acting in the best interest of all Canadians.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 42 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 42 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PROCEEDS OF CRIME (MONEY LAUNDERING) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): moved that Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill we have before us, Bill C-9, entitled an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, is part of Canada's national drug strategy. As such, it builds on and complements other legislation that Canada has introduced in this area, most notably Bill C-58 which was designed to enhance international law enforcement co-operation and Bill C-61 which made money laundering a criminal offence.

Its purpose is to discourage the use of Canada's financial system by criminals and to ensure that there is an adequate paper trail for our law enforcement authorities to carry out money laundering investigations.

The bill is consistent with the recommendations of the G-7 financial action task force on money laundering and consistent with those of the advisory committee on money laundering, a joint, private-public sector group which I chair.

The bill also has the support of Canada's financial community and a cross-section of senior officials from that community are members of the advisory committee.

Before I turn briefly to the specific measures in the bill, I would like to outline the setting in which the bill was developed.

As you know, drug trafficking, unfortunately, is something which plagues all modern societies. Familiarity, however, should not breed complacency. The destruction that drug trafficking renders is a tragedy of gigantic proportion. Individual lives, families and communities can and are being destroyed in Canada and elsewhere.

Drug trafficking generates large volumes of cash and therein lies both its attraction and its vulnerability. The proceeds of crime, particularly from drug trafficking, must be converted in other seemingly legitimate forms. The act of doing so is of course called "money laundering".

Without money laundering, drug trafficking would be less profitable and, therefore, less attractive to the criminal element in society.

[Translation]

In July 1989, the leaders of the G-7 countries announced the establishment of a Financial Action Task Force to study and make recommendations on measures to combat money laundering. The Task Force's first report was released in April, 1990. It contains 40 recommendations for action. At the Economic Summit in Houston in July 1990 the Prime Minister and the other G-7 leaders made clear their intention to fully implement the Task Force's recommendations quickly.

I think that we all can feel some measure of satisfaction in that Canada is in substantial compliance with the Task Force's recommendations. One area where we fall short, however, is in ensuring that our financial institutions, other businesses and professionals who handle large volumes of cash maintain adequate records. This brings me back to Bill C-9, which is designed to fill this gap.

• (1550)

The bill, the short title of which is the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, is linked to the criminal offence of money laundering as defined in the Criminal Code, the Narcotics Control Act and the Food and Drug Act.

It is important to note that the provisions of the legislation focus on record keeping, not on reporting. The specific details relating to the keeping of records will be established by regulation. The records in question are limited to those which have been determined to be useful in the prevention, investigation and prosecution of money laundering.

This approach allows us to be flexible so that as the channels by which money is laundered change, the methods used to combat it can be adjusted. The bill is similar in most respects, Mr. Speaker, to Bill C-89, which we introduced in the last Parliament. However, the current bill calls for a consultation period of at least 90 days between the time of publication of regulations issued under the bill and their finalization.

In addition, the wording of certain sections of the bill has been made more precise. The revised bill makes it clear that intent is required before penalties apply. In addition, the regulation-making power of the government, with regard to determining the accuracy of information contained in records, only applies to the identification of clients.

The bill, I can assure you, will not reduce the traditional safeguards with respect to access to these records.

Finally, the bill imposes penalties in accordance with the seriousness of the situation. In closing, I do not need to remind the House that drug trafficking and money laundering pose major challenges to society.

Bill C-9 is an important bill for Canadians. It is designed to strike at these social ills but in a way which is not intrusive. It is in the interests of all of us to ensure that Canada does not become a haven for money launderers. I would welcome your support for this bill.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak on this particular bill, Bill C-9, otherwise known as the money laundering bill.

Bill C-9 appeared in the last session as Bill C-89 and it was lost when the House was prorogued. It is probably a good thing that it was because there were some flaws in that particular legislation. We are very pleased to see that the government has responded and made some changes in the legislation that make it a little more workable.

It seems to us that there are still a few things we should take a look at. We understand that everyone is in agreement that this bill be sent off to committee, and that is positive.

The drug war, as we hear it called from time to time, is a major problem in the world. There is absolutely no question about that. Canada has in part been considered a bit of a haven as far as the drug situation is concerned. Because of our close proximity to major drug routes, because we border on the United States and in part because we have lax financial reporting laws, Canada is one of the areas in which we see the drug trade moving. I know I can speak with some knowledge as far as New Brunswick is concerned.

There have been a number of cases where planes containing large amounts of drugs have landed on rural runways. Also, certain people have arrived in the New Brunswick area and deposited guns and everything else to try to free some of the people who have already been incarcerated by our efficient police force.

We know there is a drug problem in New Brunswick. We know there is a drug problem in Canada and this bill will help, in part, to solve the problem. Obviously, the problem has to be attacked on many levels. It has to be attacked where the drugs are being produced. It also has to be attacked at the means of delivery. Third, the criminals who are making a profit on the sale of drugs have to be attacked. I think, in large measure too, consumption also has to be attacked.

There is no question that this particular bill is aimed at one aspect. That is the profits which are associated with drugs and how those get into our community and become legitimate.

The bill builds on the so-called freeze and seize legislation, C-61, which in effect created the offence of money laundering. Money laundering is described as a process by which illegitimate dollars are transformed through the financial markets into legitimate funds. The purpose is to hide the identity of the real owners of the funds and give them the appearance of being legitimate.

[Translation]

There is no question that there is a problem and it is a world-wide problem. The question is whether this legislation goes far enough. We support the bill being considered in committee, but we hope that it will be improved upon thereafter.

[English]

There is no question that it is an international problem, and that is really what has forced this matter on this House. It is the United States and the G-7 which have said that all of the nations facing this problem have to become involved. This legislation when it was first presented had to be returned to the drawing boards because it did reflect an American slant. Their laws, as they deal with barristers, solicitors and other professionals, are different than ours so it was necessary for some of the legislation to be redrafted.

The other thing we have to look at is the area of regulation. A lot of this particular legislation is aimed at allowing the law to really develop through regulation. In some senses that is good but in others it is bad because the regulations do not have the control that Parliament has over intrusions into peoples' lives. We have to remember that is the effect of this legislation.

Any transaction over $10,000 is going to be subject to an intrusion by government, in effect through the reporting of those transactions in financial institutions. On the face of it that is good. There is no question, that is the only way we are going to track this situation. At the same time, it is an intrusion into peoples' lives and we have to make sure there is a balance and that we are going to benefit.

There is no assurance yet, nor have we seen any of the necessary money placed on the table to ensure it, that the government, the RCMP and the crime enforcement agencies are going to use this information. We have to be assured that when the information is sent from the financial institutions to the law enforcement agencies that they are going to have the resources and people and the money, all of the things that are necessary, to ensure that something good will come from this legislation. It does no one any good for this information to end up on a shelf in some RCMP office without being utilized. Therefore, that becomes a major concern.

As well, with respect to the regulations, there is a concern among many that the regulations will be proclaimed, and that the different professions and different institutions which are affected will not be fully aware and not have the input that they would have if it was an actual bill that came through Parliament.

We are hopeful that in the long run there will be more control over the regulations so that the adverse effects of regulations which slip through will not be felt. We are pleased that the government at least is going to have a three-month consultation process prior to the regulations coming into effect.

There is also protection for lawyers, as far as solicitor-client privilege is concerned, as that is the other problem and is where we differ a little bit from the American system. Lawyers were faced with the conundrum of not being able to divulge information given to them by their client while, at the same time, having to face a penalty for not giving out that information. There is an attempt to clean up that particular problem.

We also see that the government is going to define "cash" and say what that term really means. That is a loose end that certain criminal elements could hide behind.

The other broad aspect of this bill is that we are going to see an attempt to close some of the borders as far as Canada is concerned. One of the mechanisms to be closed is using Canada's financial system to legitimize illegitimate money.

However, the critical aspect and something that will become interesting once the committee meets is how effective the other countries are going to be. If we do not have connections between all of the other countries then it is not going to work. The other thing we have to be aware of is that the information gathered on Canadians will be available to other countries and other law enforcement agencies. That is a good point and a bad point, as it is an intrusion into the privacy of Canadians. We have to do a cost benefit analysis to ensure that there are not adverse effects on Canadians.

The Liberal Party is prepared to support this bill at this particular stage. We are excited that it will go to committee and that we will have before us all the different interest groups involved, such as the bar society and the bankers' society. We do not know which committee, but it will be one of the very important committees of this House I am sure, perhaps the one which the hon. member chairs.

In any event, the fact that it goes to committee and that we can have submissions from those different interest groups is important. In addition to the involvement of the barristers, the chartered accountants and the bankers' associations, a good idea that has been suggested—perhaps by the chairman of that committee—is that the RCMP be involved in advising us as to what the status of things is.

Second, it probably would not hurt for us to have someone from one of the civil liberties organizations appear to talk about the cost benefits of these intrusions. Let it be perfectly clear that the Liberal Party is fully supportive of the efforts to fight the drug situation in our country and on our streets. We are prepared to go to most levels in order to have legislation which will assist law enforcement agencies in achieving that goal. However, we are not prepared to go to the extent of a complete denial of civil liberties and individual Canadians' rights.

That is why this committee is important. That is why we want to see it at committee. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the time to give comments on this particular bill.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Occasionally there is a piece of legislation which comes before the House and receives the unanimous support of all parties, and which has reached the House through a process of negotiation and discussion, which helps to explain that unanimous support. In the case of this piece of legislation, that is very much the reality.

This legislation is a result of the decisions of the G-7 countries to, quite rightly, attempt to ensure that what we assume to be tremendous monetary flows taking place as a consequence of the illicit drug trade are made easier to track and easier to police. As my colleagues in the Liberal Party have suggested this is not for purposes of trying, to somehow hurt the privacy of people, but instead of suggesting ways for our financial institutions in this country to help control more effectively this large scale flow of illicit funds.

We are talking about the flow of illicit funds which is especially important to track. If it is not possible to do so then these illicit funds become the basis on which legal activities are established within this country. This in turn permits further profit making on the basis of what was originally an illicit sale of drugs with subsequent flow of illicit money.

From our perspective as a party we strongly share the basic purposes and goals which lie behind this legislation, and that is to try to see to it that the flow of illicit funds does not become possible in our country. It is not a secret that Canada has been seen as a relatively easy country through which money laundering can take place. This is not a reputation that any of us in this House would want this country to have, and I am certain everybody in the House will support tightening up the situation.

Our concerns however with the original bill, which came before us in a previous session of this Parliament, were that in the process of attempting to deal with a serious problem the government had established a number of clauses as part of the legislation, a number of regulations as part of the draft regulations prepared to support the legislation which frankly represented certain dangers. These dangers could conceivably penetrate for instance the relationship between a lawyer and a lawyer's clients. That penetration could begin through the search for a monetary trail based on money exchanges, but it would have the effect of leading from the purely financial considerations involved into a detailed probing, we feared and the Canadian Bar Association feared, of the lawyer-client relationship which existed in a number of situations.

It is for that reason that the original version of this legislation was very strongly condemned by the Canadian Bar Association.

The Canadian Bar Association is not an organization which ordinarily takes strong positions on pieces of federal government legislation. Yet, the Canadian Bar Association did take the highly unusual step of passing a motion at the national level, condemning this piece of legislation as it was originally drafted.

We talked about this piece of legislation with members from the opposite side, the government side. They assured us that at the time the previous legislation was in front of us, there were no problems.

We however checked to see if this were the case with a number of associations such as the Canadian Bar Association. It indicated to us that unfortunately, contrary to what we have been told, there were serious problems which led them to pass this national resolution.

Subsequently, we indicated that we would not be prepared to co-operate with the passage of this legislation. It was after this, as I understand it, that the government finally entered into serious discussion with the Canadian Bar Association and came to conclusions which now resolve the problems that were in the previous piece of legislation.

We have discussed the new piece of legislation with the Canadian Bar Association. We have discussed it with the body that represents the Canadian Chartered Accountants. We are assured by both that they see no problems with the bill as it presently stands.

We have talked with representatives of the chartered banks who have also indicated that there should be no problem from their perspective with the period of time for which financial records are required to be kept under the legislation.

I think, as a consequence of further consultation, we have a much better piece of legislation in front of us now than we had in the previous session of Parliament.

For this reason we are prepared as a party to support the legislation because, as I say, we strongly agree with the principle. Our concern was with some of the details.

Those details have now been worked through with some of the bodies that previously expressed concern.

We would still hope that when this bill goes to committee, whether it is a legislative committee or a specific standing committee, it will call before it some of those organizations which expressed concern in the past so that those concerns will in fact be overcome by the changes which have taken place.

We have heard from such organizations. We take their word, but I think it is important to see that this is explored at committee.

I have had some discussions with the parliamentary secretary to the minister. I think there is widespread agreement with respect to the three or four groups that we would want to see come before the committee.

I hope that speedy passage through the committee will therefore be assured. I am pleased to say that as far as we are concerned, we are very pleased to see speedy passage at second reading of a significant piece of legislation.

It will not in any sense be a comprehensive response, but it will be a significant part of the response to try to deal with the illicit flow of funds associated with the drug trade in our country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, May 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this legislation with a great deal of mixed feelings. Canada has had a history of being a nation which, on the whole, has worked for peace. It has been in the forefront of attempting to limit the proliferation of nuclear weapons and to provide peacekeeping forces within the United Nations.

Within my own family there is a long and strong tradition of working for peace. My father grew up in Russia belonging to a group called the Molokans, whose members are much like the Quakers; pacifists. He was fortunate enough to be able to leave Russia when he became draft age and he chose to come to Canada because he knew that Canada allowed for religious and political freedom. He was involved in some of the first peace movements in Canada including, I am proud to say, leading some of the first demonstrations and marches against the bomb in 1946 and 1947.

He spoke about many things in the late forties and early fifties and at that time, particularly if you had a Russian name, it was not easy to stand up and advocate peace initiatives. Many years later, when it became more acceptable, many of the things that he suggested, the total community adopted and realized that they only made sense in a modern society.

What we have here is the start of a new government initiative to get Canada farther into the area of arms sales. It is one of these things that becomes a treadmill. The farther you get into it, the more difficult it is to get out.

It is based on a number of very shaky premises. Under the present export control policy, Canada has agreed to a number of things. I think it is worth while looking at what they are. Basically Canada agreed to four things: it would not export military goods to countries that pose a threat to Canada or its allies; it would not export military goods to countries that are involved in or under imminent threat of hostility; it would not export military goods to countries under United Nations Security Council sanctions; it would not export military goods to countries whose governments have a persistent record of serious violation of human rights of their citizens.

Some of the current proposals would fail on two of these grounds. The current proposals are designed to start and dump back military armaments into the mid-east, including Saudi Arabia. If anyone looks at the history of the mid-east in the last four years, or 10 years, it would be very difficult to say who are our allies are and who are our enemies.

We have decided at various times that Iran is our enemy. During the war, maybe Iran was our ally. We armed Iraq because we decided Iraq was our ally when it was involved in the war with Iran. Where do nations like Syria, Saudi Arabia, some of the other gulf states and even Kuwait stand?

Certainly neither Saudi Arabia nor Kuwait would stand the last test of countries whose governments have a persistent record of serious violations of human rights of their citizens and yet we are prepared to start re-arming undemocratic regimes.

There are many other mid-east countries that I get very concerned about, such as United Arab Emerates in which I had the pleasure of spending two weeks. At this point it is a peaceful country. It is under no threat internally or from any of its neighbours, but it is ruled by one family and one family only, with no pretence of democracy or freedom and with dictatorial policies along religious lines. Yet I see this morning that the United States has just decided to sell it 12 military attack helicopters and 6 to Bahrain.

What are they going to do with those? One becomes suspicious as there is a new birth of democracy sweeping through some of these countries, making sure that they have the means of ensuring their own continued survival.

The whole experience within the war in the gulf should have taught us something. It should have taught us that Iraq would have been militarily incapable of violating the sovereignty of its fellow nations. It would have been militarily incapable of perpetuating the war with its mass destruction. Hussein would have not been able to maintain his dictatorship had it not been for the arms supplied to him and Iraq by the five permanent members of the UN Security Council; Britain, France, China, U.S.S.R and the United States.

It seems to me that Canada was involved in testing weapons that ended up in Iraq. Now we want to get involved in the actual sale of arms to countries that are involved in conflict and in violation of civil rights.

All this does is detract dramatically from Canada's ability to be a peace negotiator in this world. Our whole credibility as a peacekeeping nation and a peace negotiator was trampled on dramatically during the gulf war.

We rushed in and backed the United States in a military operation that turned out to be an environmental disaster with a huge loss of life. At least 100,000, 150,000 or 200,000 people died in that war.

The Kurds have been totally disrupted. The environment in the gulf has been totally wiped out for 50 or 100 years, or maybe forever. Canada blindly went along.

Now we have the government saying that for the sake of a few jobs we will sacrifice another piece of our prestige, integrity, neutrality, and our ability to act as a peace negotiator and peacekeeper in this world. We will do so being blind to the history since the Second World War. If there were somebody on Mars to look down at us, they would ask: "What is this race of creatures down there doing? It looks like a football scrum has picked up and that they change sides every weekend and have another go at it".

Our strong ally right now is Japan. It was our enemy less than 40 years ago. Less than five years ago, our worst enemy was the Soviet Union. Now it is considered our ally.

We have even been involved in conflicts in the mid-east on both sides of the argument and in other areas. Think back to the Falklands war between Argentina and Britain in which the British were being fired upon by French weapons.

We always make the assumption that we know who our friends are, our loyal friends. Particularly in the mid-east the situation is volatile. No one can guarantee that countries which pose a threat to Canada or to its allies are countries that are involved in or are under imminent threat of hostilities. All of those countries are involved in an ongoing regional war in which the western and Soviet bloc powers have armed them in order to escalate arms sales.

Military spending in this world is out of control. It is $1,000 billion a year, $1,000 billion a year. That is a figure that is totally incomprehensible to most Canadians and to most people in this world. Yet we persist. This bill does not say: "Look, we want to see military spending in the world go down so that it can be directed to positive uses". It simply says: "We want a piece of the pie".

We want to be able to say that there is this military spending and we want to get in on the action because it is good for business and profit making.

It is funny how very quickly people's attitudes change. When the gulf war was at its height, we heard from the government some very encouraging speeches. For a moment, I was almost proud of a government that was speaking on my behalf.

The minister of external affairs spoke out clearly saying: "The world cannot let a victory become a truce, an occasion for nations to rearm, to regroup and return to battle". That was a statement that clearly said we have to put an end to this type of arms trade.

The Prime Minister made very, very high sounding statements. He talked about the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, the arms trade and the constant chasing of spheres of influence. He said: "We could be big arms merchants. We chose not to be, although it is a very lucrative business. We chose not to be, because it is fundamentally inconsistent with our policy to develop it, to peddle it, to finance it and then to deplore its use".

If only the Prime Minister really believed what he was saying at that time, if only he had been willing to commit his government to that type of policy and to say: "Not only have we chosen not to, we will not be involved in developing it. We will not be involved in peddling it. We will not be involved in financing it". All we have left, I guess, is that we will be deploring the use of arms when they start again.

The government tries to indicate that in this time of recession we cannot afford to miss an opportunity for a few jobs. I say to the members on the government side, this is like saying we will keep capital punishment because it makes work for the hangman.

Mr. Hockin: What does the CAW say to that?

Mr. Karpoff: I feel for the members within the CAW. I will tell you, most of the CAW people want work that is not based on the arms industry. This government has the responsibility to provide work that is not based on transitory jobs and arms production. There is no justification for an employment policy based on the peddling of arms that are going to be destructive to this world. That is the hollowness of the government, if all it can do is provide jobs that are based on perpetuating military conflict in the world.

Mr. Hockin: You are calling the CAW workers hangmen. That is what you are doing.

Mr. Karpoff: I am saying that the government is so short-sighted that it cannot look at anything but the employment advantages. It has no ability to say: "Look, we have a moral obligation to the men and women in those factories to find them alternative employment. To shut them down today and find positive, alternative types of employment".

This government has done such a flip-flop. Where are the statements that the Prime Minister made less than three or four months ago, when he said: "We could be big arms merchants. We chose not to"? Now it is choosing to be when he says: "It is fundamentally inconsistent". Well, now the government has chosen to be inconsistent.

It is almost pathetic that this is one of the first bills to be brought before the House in this new session. What does that say about Canada and Canada's priorities?

We talk about economies and military spending. One begins to wonder whether the economic success of West Germany and Japan was not based in large part on the fact that after World War II, they were in no position to plough their financial resources into rearmament. Instead, they ploughed them into industrial development. They ploughed them into human resources, technology, education and training. I think that is a lesson the rest of the countries, particularly Canada, should learn.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to add my voice to those across this House who are scratching their heads at this moment and asking themselves why the government has chosen this moment, in a very fragile period, just after we have been embroiled in a situation of war in the Persian Gulf, to introduce legislation which sends a confusing and contradictory message to the international community.

Specifically, the confusion revolves around the fact that at the height of the hostilities, the Prime Minister of Canada made great efforts and great pains to suggest that in the post-war period Canada should take charge and be a leader in the area of arms reduction. He made a statement in February in which he said: "Left to proliferate, arms seriously threaten peace around the world". He also said, in a number of post-war initiatives: "This problem must be brought under control and the time to act is now". In fact, he offered to host an international summit aimed at curbing the world arms trade.

We know the difficulty Canada's reputation suffered, specifically as a result of our involvement in hostilities which left us abandoning our historical role as a peacekeeper. But we believed that the initiatives announced by the Prime Minister were a possible ray of hope in a world that clings to the idea that we have in fact embraced a new world order.

However, with the specifics of this legislation and contrary to the position taken by the New Democratic Party, we believe that there is a place in legislation for export and import control. In fact, for many years we have called for specific legislation to permit the arms business, which has existed for many decades in Canada, to be a matter of the public record.

As the Speaker will now know, most exporting of arms is carried out by Order in Council and very specific legislation directed toward friendly countries could be a benefit because it would lay bare the facts surrounding Canada's role in the arms race.

Most people who have involved themselves in the issue of arms control were not surprised to discover, during the height of the Persian Gulf hostilities, that mercenary activity such as gun running and illegally supplying arms, for example to Iraq, was carried on through Canada. We were not surprised either to realize that the arms, in large measure, that were subsequently used to attack the forces of the United Nations were sold to Iraq legitimately by countries in the United Nations, and most specifically by the United States.

While it is true that the elements of the military equation are constantly changing and very fluid, in this party we do believe that a very specific law governing the publication of export orders would be, in effect, a positive step in terms of exposing and highlighting just where we are going on the issue of arms control.

However, we are most concerned that the specifics of this legislation will lead to a wide open sale of arms to countries that are not on the list of friendly countries. I refer specifically to the legislation as presented to the House by the Minister for International Trade in which he spoke about the role played by the Governor in Council in terms of establishing a list of countries. We feel that this is key to the debate. He says: "According to the legislation, the Governor in Council may establish a list of countries to be called an automatic firearms country control list, including therein any country with which Canada has an intergovernmental defence, research, development and production arrangement".

However, Mr. Speaker, the word "may", as you know, is not an exclusive but rather a general wording which would in fact permit the Governor in Council to extend the list to countries beyond those which are considered friendly countries to Canada.

We know, for example, that one of the specific contracts which this particular piece of legislation was allegedly introduced to support was the sale to Saudi Arabia. We also know that notwithstanding the elements of progress we saw in the relationship as the Persian Gulf events unfolded, Saudi Arabia is still at war with the State of Israel. Saudi Arabia has not denounced the state of war with Israel and, as such, certainly is not one of the countries which would legitimately be included on the list of countries which the Governor in Council is called upon to establish by way of this legislation.

Unlike the NDP, which basically has taken the position that all current arms activity in Canada should be banned forthwith and for which it has absolutely no support in the union movement, we do not believe as a party that we can move as of this date to ban the sale of all arms, in particular to countries which are using those arms in a supportive and a defensive role.

However, we believe that the sale of arms should be public by way of very specific legislation and that the control order should be very tight. It should not be left up to the Governor in Council by way of regulation to play with the list as he or she sees fit.

In that context, what we are proposing are some very specific amendments which would in fact tighten the legislation to make it very clear that countries like Saudi Arabia would not be the legitimate recipients of defensive arms from Canada.

An argument was put forward by the Minister for International Trade. He argued here in this House that his particular government was not abandoning its role of arms reduction because in fact the weapons it was talking about were not weapons of mass destruction. You can be killed singly or you can be killed collectively. If you are dead you have still been hit by a weapon of destruction.

I dare say the Canadian public finds that argument rather weak, recognizing that it is the intention of the minister to basically liberalize an activity which has gone on for very many years in Canada but which clearly should be in the sunset and not the sunrise of its activity.

We agree that the Canadian economy over the next decade should not be dependent upon growth from the defence industry. But we also recognize that in the current world order we have not reached the stage of peace and stability where no arms are needed anywhere. In that context, we want to see very specific, well articulated, thoughtful legislation which lays out in the Parliament of Canada just who can receive arms from our country. That is clearly not present in this particular legislation.

Clearly the proposal of the Minister for International Trade that he is only talking about small weapons and not weapons of mass destruction, and the contradictory comments of the Prime Minister that he wants to see Canada as a country that will be leading the way in terms of arms control, simply do not come together.

[Translation]

The public perception is that this is a confusing policy, because, at one time, toward the end of the Persian Gulf war in February, the Prime Minister himself announced a peace plan in which he said he was prepared to preside over a disarmament summit aimed specifically at encouraging arms reduction in the Middle East. However, this legislation, as it stands, does exactly the opposite.

We suggest, Mr. Speaker, that with the proposal put forward by the Minister for International Trade, arms could even be sold directly to Saudi Arabia while it is still at war with the State of Israël.

The problem is that you cannot claim to want arms reduction while, at the same time, introducing a bill liberalizing our capacity to sell arms to any country.

Some Canadians were shocked to hear that the arms used to kill great numbers of people, including allied troops in the coalition, had indeed been sold to Iraq by the United States and other UN member countries when Iraq was at war with Iran, our alleged enemy.

We saw how quickly things changed, Mr. Speaker. That is why we are calling, first of all, for very specific legislation. It is important that exporting of arms be not carried out by a mere Order in Council, as it has been the practice for many years. At the same time, the legislation should be very specific as to which countries should be listed on the Control List and those that should not.

We know that, notwithstanding the NDP policy to the effect that no arms are sold in Canada, arms sales do take place in Canada. We have been selling arms for years. One thing is sure, if we are planning to introduce a disarmament policy, the first thing to do is to find alternate jobs for the workers in that industry.

We also know, Mr. Speaker, that the situation in the Middle East is still volatile and, with the China's policy setback reflected in the Tiananmen Square massacre, the new world order is not quite established.

Earlier, my hon. colleague from the NDP referred to Canada's neutrality. We are not a neutral country. As a member of an alliance, we share certain defensive responsibilities, not offensive ones, Mr. Speaker. But how are we to be expected to defend ourselves if we cannot even arm ourselves? So we do not understand the somewhat hypocritical position taken by the New Democratic Party, by those people who walk around union halls and say they are working for the unions. However, when they come here—and as far as I can see, there have not been a lot of members from Ontario who spoke to this issue—they certainly don't show a lot of courage when we discuss these issues.

Mr. Speaker, I am from Ontario—you may have forgotten that—but I am from an area where steel is the main industry. I am certainly not ashamed to say we want a clear policy, because this one is not clear. It is confusing, and it sends the wrong message to Canadians. We also want some specific amendments concerning the lists, those so-called lists drawn up by the minister. We do not want Canada to be able to sell arms to countries that are still at war with our allies.

That is why we intend to propose some specific amendments. We are going to do what we have to do, and one thing is certain: the bill as drafted could never be supported by the Liberal Party.

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, on the subject of Saudi Arabia and Israel, does the hon. member realize that when it comes to the light armoured vehicle implication of this export permit act, these are wheeled vehicles and therefore they could not be carried over the desert and therefore they are only defensive weapons with regard to Israel?

Is the hon. member aware that the member for London East, in whose riding the LAV plant is situated, very much supports this bill? Is the hon. member aware of those two points?

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly aware of the position of the member for London East who certainly has been most vocal on this particular issue. I am also aware that obviously the minister requires certain changes of legislation to facilitate this sale. Otherwise we would not be having this discussion in the House. If there is no problem with the sale of the armoured vehicles with wheels as they now exist, obviously there would be no need to be here in the House. There is a problem and we do not want to see a control order list including sale of arms by way of a vehicle where the gun will in fact be put on in another country.

• (1650)

We do not want to see the sale of arms to countries that are currently not on the acceptable list, because that sets the stage for the kind of situation we saw in Iraq, where the Canadian government, and other governments, saw our own allies being attacked by weapons which were sold to the Iraqis by the Americans and other allies. It was a ridiculous situation that left Canadians scratching their heads.

That is why we want to bring to bear amendments which will very specifically deal with who is on the control order list and why and ensure that that will be available public information.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in my brief time here I have found that when the hon. member for Hamilton East begins to accuse the New Democratic Party of hypocrisy, quite often it is by way of mirror reflection.

I would like to investigate that just briefly, if I may, with specific regard to one of the most potent weapons of destruction in the Iran–Iraq war, the Cruise missile used in Baghdad and other major centres in the festival of the slaughter of the innocents in which we engaged.

Most Canadians will recall that the guidance system of the Cruise missile was manufactured and designed by Litton Industries, a subsidiary of an American parent, in Toronto, Ontario, and was done with the active approval of the former Liberal government of the Right Hon. Pierre Trudeau. The testing—at least the beginning of the testing—of that same guidance system over Canadian territory was also approved enthusiastically by the Liberal government of Pierre Elliot Trudeau.

I would just like to ask the hon. member if—

Mr. Horner: No lover's quarrel.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Oh, there are no lovers here to have a quarrel, sir, I can assure you.

I would like to ask the hon. member how she squares her apparent distaste for certain elements in the arms trade now, with her party's enthusiastic endorsement of the development and testing of what everyone has agreed was in fact a destabilizing weapon that has come to be among the most terrible on the face of the planet.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, maybe the member did not hear the point I was making. The point I was making was the fact that while we get a very spirited condemnation of all sales of arms from the New Democratic Party, as articulated by the member opposite from Alberta, there has not been a member of the NDP from the province of Ontario who has opened his or her mouth to speak. The reason is because they are quite aware of the fact that the CAW very specifically has come out publicly in support of this particular legislation.

I am suggesting that we should put a realistic policy forward. Yes, for many years in Canada there have been arms sold and arms will continue to be sold as long as we live in a world where we are not neutral. We are not neutral at the moment and we need certain weapons of defence. But let us make sure that the control order put forth by the government specifies exactly to whom those arms are being sold and under what conditions. Those are the amendments that we are putting forward.

I do not like to have my colleague in the House stand up and decry the sale of all arms when his colleague in the riding in which they are selling the arms goes to his local union meeting and supports it. That is what I do not like and that is what I call hypocrisy.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I want to make clear to my good friend from Hamilton East that I intend to speak next in this debate, unless the Conservatives are drawn into the debate. I want to raise a question with respect to that extraordinary final statement she made, which suggested that there were members of this House from the New Democratic Party who in fact had gone to labour councils—

Ms. Copps: You are going to be sorry, Steven.

Mr. Langdon: No, I am quite interested if some evidence can be brought forward of this, because certainly it is not something of which I am aware. I am not aware of my colleagues in this House having engaged in something like this.

If, in fact, any of my colleagues from the House have spoken out to local labour councils in favour of this piece of legislation, I would be very interested to hear the member provide evidence. If however there is no such evidence, I would expect the member to withdraw her statement.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, an NDPer is an NDPer. The member should be aware of the fact that the member from London Centre, a minister in his friend Bob Rae's government, has spoken in favour of the legislation, as well as another member of the NDP who is sitting in Queen's Park in Toronto. Clearly with the close ties that this member has with Bob Rae and his team at Queen's Park, I am sure he should know the position being taken by the cabinet of Bob Rae.

Mr. Langdon: To make it clear, Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary question, there is of course no connection between the provincial government and its policies and the federal caucus of the New Democratic Party so far.

I put the question once more to the member. She has suggested that there are members of this caucus who have spoken in favour of this piece of legislation to labour councils. There is to my knowledge no such evidence any place in the province of Ontario. If she has evidence of members of this caucus having made such statements, I would ask her to document them to the House or else to withdraw a statement which clearly is not correct.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. member reviews Hansard he will realize that I said NDP members. The last time I looked the minister from London Centre was an NDP member of the Legislative Assembly in the province of Ontario to which the member has associated himself on many occasions. I am sure he will reflect on the fact that at least two members of the NDP party—of which he is a member in the province of Ontario—now sitting in the Legislative Assembly at Queen's Park are in favour of this bill and speak in favour of it.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to follow my friend from Hamilton East who, as usual, has straddled the fence magnificently with respect to a difficult issue of principle. In other words, she made a speech which took the classic Liberal position of saying that: "If it is necessary to have legislation, well we would have better legislation than this but of course we would not want to give the impression that we were in favour of encouraging world arms trade", when in fact what this piece of legislation is about is precisely encouraging the world arms trade and perhaps most unfortunately, encouraging Canada's participation in that world arms trade.

I think that we should not have illusions or permit illusions to be put forward to people across this country about what this particular piece of legislation is about. It is not a piece of legislation which is designed, as the member for Hamilton East would suggest, to set up some kind of system of regulation, some system to let us see what is actually happening because we do not know what is actually happening. In fact, it is a piece of legislation which amends laws which already exist in this country, which prohibit the export of various weapons to countries around the world. It is not that we do not have, at the moment, ways of seeing to it that we have a record of what takes place with respect to imports and exports of arms. We have such records. What we do not have, up to this point, is the possibility of getting around those constraints as a country.

Perhaps the most telling part of this piece of legislation is clause 8. This particular clause amends the previous legislation which deals with imports and export permits. Let me just read from the present legislation:

> Every one who imports, buys, sells, barters, gives, lends, transfers or delivers a prohibited weapon or any component or part designed exclusively for use in the manufacture or assembly of a prohibited weapon
> (a) is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years; or
> (b) is guilty of an offence punishable in summary conviction.

That is what the present law says. It prohibits certain weapons from being exported or delivered from this country.

What does this new piece of legislation do? It basically repeats that existing commitment, but then it adds to that which is described in this legislation as a saving provision, "Notwithstanding subsection (1)", which is the subsection that I just quoted. It continues:

> —a person who carries on a business described in paragraph 105(1)(b) may export or import for a purpose that the Governor in Council prescribes by regulation to be an industrial purpose a prohibited weapon described in paragraph (c) or (e)— if that person does so under and in accordance with an export permit or an import permit, as the case may be, issued under the Export and Import Permits Act.

In short, what we have is the provision of a new loophole which makes it possible for the government to export what had previously been prohibited weapons under the present Import and Export Permits Act. That is at the heart of this legislation. It has nothing to do, as the member for Hamilton East suggested, with whether or not we produce arms in this country.

Of course, it is important for us in this country to continue to produce the arms of which our armed forces make use. Nobody in this party is suggesting that the arms which are produced for our armed forces should cease to be produced in this country. Nobody is suggesting that we should abolish the armed forces of Canada or that we should rely on imported weapons for those armed forces. Such nonsense.

The whole issue which the member for Hamilton East so successfully, unfortunately, tried to avoid is the question of whether we are going to permit prohibited weapons from being exported in the future. That is the issue. The Liberal Party is supporting this legislation, for what reason I cannot understand, but it is legislation which will have the effect of putting Canada in the centre of the world arms trade, as opposed to the not insignificant, but nevertheless fairly marginal position which we have had in that trade in the past.

The Liberal Party is in favour of us, as a country, being part, to a much greater extent, of the world arms trade and we in the New Democratic Party are proud to say that we are not in favour of that kind of expansion of Canada's participation in the world arms trade.

In my view, and I speak as a member from Ontario, as somebody from a constituency with many members from the Canadian Auto Workers, it would be a serious mistake for this country to move in that direction.

There are at least four reasons that I want to talk about that convince me that this would be a serious mistake. First, if we look at many of the Third World countries to which we provide billions of dollars of aid, which is often felt by many people in our country to be desperately needed here at home, but aid which is, nevertheless, provided by Canada and which we support providing, because it will help poor people in the Third World and give them some sense of hope for the future.

The reality is that much of that aid at the moment ends up providing foreign exchange to those Third World countries which is wasted on the build-up of huge armies, which is wasted on the destruction of neighbouring countries and which is wasted in civil wars. It just does not make sense for us as a country to, on the one hand, be providing help to Third World countries for water supplies, for housing and for food assistance and, on the other hand, to be increasing this world arms trade which is so destructive to many people and many regimes in Third World countries.

Second, our movement as a country into more involvement in the international arms trade contradicts completely the statements and commitments which this government made in the aftermath of the Persian Gulf war.

Some of my colleagues have quoted from some of those commitments. I do not want to simply reproduce some of the government's statements, but I cannot help but point out what the previous minister of external affairs said on March 8. He said: "We cannot let a victory become a truce, an occasion for nations to re-arm, re-group and return to battle." For that reason, he suggested that there should be action to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, the arms trade, the constant chase for spheres of influence.

This piece of legislation before us directly contradicts what the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested at that time in those statements. The Prime Minister was even more straightforward. He said: "We have all the technology in the world. We have all the resources we need. We could be big arms merchants. We chose not to be, although it is a very lucrative business. We have chosen not to be because it is fundamentally inconsistent with our policy to develop it, to peddle it, to finance it and then to deplore its use".

All I can hope is that members on the government side will listen this time to their Prime Minister. They will recognize that those words, which were said on March 13 by the Prime Minister of this country, require them to vote against a piece of legislation which takes us directly and deeply into the world arms trade.

I also want to point out that when we get into providing arms to Third World countries, arms to countries in the Middle East—and the suggestion here is that this is going to permit arms sales to Saudi Arabia—we open ourselves up to the possibility of providing arms that prop up regimes which often have human rights records which are absolutely deplorable.

Let me quote, for instance, from Amnesty International's report from 1990 with respect to Saudi Arabia. It says:

> At least 27 prisoners of conscience were imprisoned and other prisoners of conscience may have been among more than 70 detainees held without charge or trial. Some political detainees were held without trial in prolonged incommunicado detention. Torture was reportedly common and one death in custody may have been caused by torture or ill-treatment. Sentences of amputation and flogging continued to be imposed and carried out. At least 111 persons were executed, 16 of them for political offences.

Those are the people to whom we are going to provide Canadian arms? That is shameful.

Finally, I want to point out, as a representative of an industrial constituency in Ontario, that in fact the money which is spent on the arms industry provides far less in the way of jobs than money which is spent in other sectors of our economy. For instance, a study which was done in the late 1970s indicated that at that time a billion dollars worth of spending on the military industry would create just under 45,000 jobs, while the same amount of money spent on the medicare industry, with respect to nurses, would create 85,000 jobs. That is almost twice as many.

That has changed even since that time in a way that has made the provision of money for the arms trade and for the military industry even less able to produce jobs than was the case in the late 1970s.

We have to begin to explore the conversion of our industries from arms production and arms export to the production of military related goods for our own country, yes, but more important to the production of industrial commodities and other commodities and services which serve our country and which serve people and people's needs rather than kill people and help to suppress human rights, as the comments with respect to Saudi Arabia indicate.

That is the direction we have to take. It is a direction which many countries in western Europe are taking. Companies in Britain and in other parts of western Europe have explored ways of converting their industries from arms production, military hardware and involvement in the international arms trade, to the production of items which are important to people's social and human needs.

That is the direction we must take in this country. It is not a direction which means that we intend to eliminate arms production for our Armed Forces. It is not a direction which is going to eliminate jobs in London or in Kitchener overnight. In that sense, it is not like the free trade deal, which has had such effects in London, in Kitchener, in Windsor and in hundreds of other communities throughout Ontario.

Instead, what we are looking for is an approach which will stop us from becoming part of the problem of the international arms trade, providing jobs for Canadians by meeting human needs instead of killing human beings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

AUTHORIZATION TO AUDIO TAPE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but there have been discussions among the three parties, and I believe that you will find unanimous consent for the following motion, Mr. Speaker:

> That, notwithstanding Standing Order 119.1(2), the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade be authorized to permit audio tape recording, by the broadcast media, for the duration of its order of reference under Standing Order 108(2) respecting consideration of the immigration to Canada of Mohamed Al-Mashat.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt the word of the parliamentary secretary but we have attempted to verify this with the opposition House leader who I understand will be here momentarily. I am just wondering if the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader would not mind waiting to put the motion perhaps after the next speaker terminates in 10 minutes or so. I understand we are on to 10 minute speeches.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, perhaps what we could do is indicate that the House supports the motion, subject to the approval of the House leader who would come in at a later time if he objected. I have no problem with that. It is just that my schedule pulls me away from here now so I do not want to tie up the House.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that on behalf of the New Democratic Party we certainly support this motion in an effort to clarify some of the proceedings that are taking place in that committee.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I attended the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade where this subject matter was discussed. I believe there is unanimous consent from all parties, particularly from this party.

Perhaps, while I am on my feet, the parliamentary secretary might indicate whether he is in a position today to tell us whether the television broadcasting of those particular hearings is a matter which can be adjudicated with the same speed with which this particular matter has been resolved. Can he give us any indication with regards to television?

Mr. Cooper: I thank the hon. member for his representation. I can inform him that at the House management committee we have begun discussions relating to the whole question of the televising of committees. We are presently seized with the report of the previous Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee, I hope in the very near future, will be developing the necessary guidelines.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since there were no questions or comments. Debate.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am naturally delighted to participate in this debate. I wanted to begin with a quote from the book of Isaiah regarding the changing of weapons into ploughshares. I will do that later if time permits.

I want to quote from a past President of the United States, Dwight D. Eisenhower. Many years ago he made the following comment: "Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket fired, signifies in this final scene, a theft from those who hunger and are not fed; those who are cold and are not clothed.

This world in arms is not spending money alone, it is spending the sweat of its labourers, the genius of its scientists, the houses of its children. This is not a way of life. Under the cloud of war, it is humanity hanging on a cross of iron".

What we are discussing today is nothing short of sinister. What we are discussing is really a complete reversal of what I think most Canadians believe to be one of the very fundamental theses of Canadian society, and that is that we are a peaceful country. We believe in peacekeeping. We believe in promoting peace in whatever way possible. This government is asking the House of Commons to permit Canada to enter the arms race in a serious way.

I think what we are being asked to do today is absolutely disgusting. I think it is absolutely incredible that the government is now taking this particular action after the comments of some of the critical spokespersons for the government. I want to quote from a speech made by the Prime Minister in this city on February 8, this year, referring to the gulf war: "One of the main lessons to be learned from the war is the danger to us all of the proliferation of both conventional and non-conventional weapons".

He went on to say:

"The major arms exporting firms and nations have contributed to the current crisis. The great majority of weapons in Iraq's arsenal came from suppliers in the countries of the five permanent members of the Security Council. This problem must be brought under control and the time to act is now".

We all thought the Prime Minister meant that the world would be moved to get out of the arms race, to start de-escalating the arms race. We thought that was what he meant. He went on to say: "When the war is over, the world community must co-operate to prevent the proliferation of these weapons and to roll back that proliferation which has already occurred".

The people of Canada thought the Prime Minister said that Canada ought to play some leadership role in the de-escalation of the arms race. On February 20 of this year, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, and I quote from a speech that he made in London, England: "I believe it is imperative that the world declare that there be no Middle East arms bazaar. Ninety-five per cent of the weapons in the hands of Saddam Hussein came from the five permanent members of the Security Council". He goes on and on to say that Canada ought to be playing a leadership role.

Again, we thought the leadership role was to take Canada in positions in which we de-escalate. What we have is the spectacle, in spite of the comments of the Prime Minister of Canada and the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, the hon. member from Alberta, of the government introducing legislation to encourage the sale of arms to Saudi Arabia.

Not hundreds of vehicles but nearly one thousand vehicles, mounted with automatic weapons, were negotiated on a government to government basis from the kingdom of Saudi Arabia to the Government of Canada to enable General Motors of Canada to get into the arms race in a major way.

Another deal is to encourage automatic weapons sales to the Netherlands. It goes on and on and on. If I had time I would read into the record pages and pages from this armaments book from Canada which lists all of the various technologies, all of the weapons that Canada produces for sale abroad. There is this sort of attitude on the part of most Canadians that Canada is not participating in this activity.

Year after year in the city of Ottawa we have the ARMX bazaar. This is the arms bazaar to which weapons' buyers come from all over the world to look at all the displays. I have been there myself and I could not believe what I was seeing. There were all kinds of machine guns, tanks, rocket systems, explosives, things that you can throw, things that you can shoot and it goes on and on and on. In other words, it is a whole bazaar of weapons of destruction sponsored and encouraged, in part, by the Canadian government. It happens right here in the capital city and arms merchants from around the world come here to shop.

At Suffield, Alberta, we have ongoing research into chemical warfare, but today while the government on one hand is bringing in legislation to restrict Canadian ownership of shotguns and rifles, it is bringing in legislation to encourage Canadian firms to get into the arms exportation business. There is a certain element of conflict here and a certain element of hypocrisy.

When we listen to the statements by the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs condemning the arms race and at the same time slipping in, via the other hand, legislation to encourage arms exports, it is no wonder the people of Canada wonder what on earth this government is up to.

Last year Canada's arms export was worth nearly $2 billion. This places Canada in the top 15 arms exporting countries of the world. I do not think Canadians know this. I do not think Canadians want to know this.

I know that the explanation by the minister, who sponsors this piece of peculiar and odd legislation, is that it will create jobs. I suppose, using that argument, we can get into the heroin business, we can get into the prostitution business and we can get into the drug dealing business. They all produce jobs, if that is the motive. Surely to goodness there is not a single member of Parliament who is not aware that a dollar invested in education, in construction of housing, in child care or in hospitals is a dollar that will create a lot more jobs than a dollar going into the arms industry. We all know that. If we want jobs, well then let us invest more into housing which Canadians need, and let us invest more into education and hospital care which Canadians need. If that is our motive we should be doing that.

The argument that we need this to create jobs is a bogus argument. If we permit this legislation, and this is why I oppose it so strongly as do all of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, then what is next? This is a sale of troop vehicles, with automatic weapons attached to them, to Saudi Arabia. All right, the kingdom of Saudi Arabia is going to get hundreds of these vehicles from Canada indirectly through the United States.

What else do we get into? In other words, what we are saying is that if this passes the door is open to get into the arms export business in whatever way Canadian firms wish.

I want to say that it was one of the saddest days of my life when we decided to discuss legislation here to privatize Canadian Arsenals. You remember that day, Mr. Speaker, you were here. We wanted a Crown corporation in place to facilitate the development of military equipment and so on when Canada needed it.

• (1730)

It was a Crown corporation that permitted us in the threat of war or allowed us very quickly to mobilize an industry that could expand to fulfil and support Canada in its obligations. But when the threat of war was over and when the need was over, it could shrink up very quickly and those people could find jobs elsewhere. That was the theory of that Crown corporation.

It was in the ammunition business as well, and for us it made a lot of sense.

Now, of course, we have increasing numbers of private sector firms in the arms business. Their motive is one thing only: not the protection of Canada, not the protection of our sovereignty, but to maximize profits for their firms. That is the legitimate motive.

Once we get into that business of encouraging firms to get into the arms business, we are not just going to encourage them to keep expanding their businesses, which means expanding more and more into the arms production industry.

Is this what Canadians want? Is this the kind of country we want? No, it is not.

I see that my time is very limited. I simply want to say that we are speaking today on the principle of the bill. The principle is: Do we as a country wish to get into the arms export business? Do we as a country want to have legislation to facilitate private sector firms getting into the exporting of arms and weaponry throughout the world?

That is the question. That is the principle we are debating. I say no, we do not. I am extremely proud to say that the party with which I am associated says no, we do not want Canada to become a major arms player in the world.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to another quote from the former President of the United States, as referred to by the previous speaker.

I would also like to congratulate the previous speaker on a very fine speech and for so succinctly assessing the situation as we found it.

President Eisenhower referred to one of the major threats to democracy, to the United States and to the freedom thereof. I am paraphrasing. We all know that he was referring to the military industrial complex.

I do not think there is anything to be gained by Canada in the expansion of the military industrial complex in this country as certainly this legislation would do. For that reason alone—a good enough reason and there are others—I stand here very proud to be opposing this legislation.

I guess it is impossible to address the matter of arms so soon after the conflict we have had in the gulf without somehow or another putting that conflict into the discussion.

I have a list here. There have been references made to the five permanent members of the Security Council of the United Nations having sold arms to Iraq, but there are others as well. I would be a bit repetitive in mentioning that the United States has sold weapons to Iraq. We are still referring to the gulf conflict.

Egypt sold weapons to the country of Iraq. Kuwait sold weapons to Iraq, as did China and the Soviet Union. Italy and Great Britain did the same. This is not an exhaustive list of those who sold, but the point is that certainly the United States, Egypt, and the United Kingdom were directly involved in the confrontation in the gulf.

If there is anything that can come out of the gulf that we should be grateful for, it is that the devastation of lives was not more extensive than it was. It was bad enough.

If you look at the state of Kuwait, one cannot help but notice that it suffered the greatest devastation of all outside the country of Iraq itself.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the joy—we can hardly call it that—which must today be felt by the citizens of Kuwait as they realize that they themselves helped to arm the very country which has wrought such destruction upon the country of Kuwait? To a greater or lesser extent that is the kind of situation which any country gets itself involved in whenever there is selling of arms.

There have been references made previously to Canada and the arms industry here. There have been references to what my party has said in relation to the production of arms. I would like to reiterate, as one of the previous members of my party has already said, that of course there is no question Canada should not have Armed Forces. There is no question that the armaments for the most part and to whatever extent is possible, should be manufactured in Canada.

What we are saying is that we are not interested in expanding the military industrial complex in this country to the point where we are arming other nations and the very weapons we sell are used against us. Hopefully our peacekeeping capability and integrity will be restored.

The present legislation as it refers to the sale of arms from Canada is predicated on four different things: that there be no threat of selling arms from Canada to our allies; that we not sell arms to a country that is involved or is in imminent threat of becoming involved in hostilities, to a country that is under UN sanctions, or to a country where violations of human rights are occurring in any way.

I do not think there is any point in singling out Saudi Arabia, which happens to be the country most directly involved in this arms sale. I would not suggest for a moment that there is anyone here who would possibly believe an assurance that this legislation was brought in only for the sale of arms to Saudi Arabia. This legislation is just the opening of the door for the sale of Canadian arms, wherever possible the expanded military industrial complex can sell them.

I think in the immediate context it should be pointed out and reiterated that Saudi Arabia has been cited by Amnesty International. This is the same Amnesty International which the government quoted extensively, pointing out how vicious the Iraqi government was and using Amnesty International records to show that.

If we are going to stand in a debate in this House and cite Amnesty International in one context where hostilities are occurring, we have to do it in all cases.

I realize I only have 10 minutes to speak, but I would like to perhaps summarize a little bit later on. I only have two minutes left.

I have to point out now that Saudi Arabia has also been cited by Amnesty International for violations of human rights. This is something that I think should be emphasized as strongly as possible.

There are alternatives to the manufacture of arms. For years and years, if anyone cared to listen, such imaginative people, inventors, philosophers, whatever, such as Buckminster Fuller, have proposed alternate uses of the facilities for the production of destruction, ways to be able to turn them into peaceful uses.

There are alternatives.

For a member of the government to sit there and say that because we take this stand on this legislation that we are somehow calling the United Auto Workers murderers, for God's sake, is to lower the level of this debate to something which we on this side of the House have become accustomed to, I grant you, but certainly takes it to a lower level than we have ever had in a debate in this House before.

There are alternatives. I would suggest that rather than trying to sell more arms, what this country ought to be doing is showing leadership within the United Nations, where I would suggest we should be saying: "Listen, world, this situation has gone far too far; we have to start, for example, paying attention to what Amnesty International is saying". We should be saying to the world that we are willing to let the United Nations become involved in our internal affairs. That could be dangerous for us as well, but we should also be saying that if we are in a new world order, then the United Nations has to be able to become involved in the internal affairs of all nations. Perhaps we can do a lot toward eliminating the need for even the manufacture of arms itself.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am just trying to put my hands on the quotes from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I will do that in a minute.

I just want to make a few remarks on this bill. I am very interested in the issue of arms exports. I have been in this House of Commons some 12 years and I have constantly raised the issue of the transport of arms, especially to the Third World.

I raised the subject before in the context of "Irangate" where Trans-World Arms of Montreal was right in the thick of sending arms both to the Contras in Nicaragua and to Iran. Quite frankly, it was quite hard to get the Canadian House of Commons or the Canadian media, and consequently the Canadian people, interested in this issue until the issue finally appeared in the American nightly news with Dan Rather, and when people found out that in Ollie North's safe in the White House there was evidence that a Canadian company was deeply involved in the illegal transport of arms.

It has been an issue that I am particularly interested in. I raised it again here in the House of Commons with respect to this particular deal, that is, the export of light armoured vehicles to Saudi Arabia, about an $800 million contract, and the other $100 million or so contract for the sale of guns, ammunition and so on to the Netherlands.

I had a press conference and no one came to it. No one seemed to be interested until the government brought forward a bill and now they are really interested. I think there has been some really interesting debate on this issue in the House of Commons.

It is not an easy question; it is a sad question, and it is a difficult question. It is easy to give rhetoric to it and one can shout about it from both sides, but I would just like to spend my short period here in this debate on a couple of points.

One of the points is a small but important point that was emphasized by the member for Kamloops a few minutes ago. That was the point of privatization. What happens when you privatize Canadian Arsenals, for example, and make it a private company? What can happen?. When we had a company like Canadian Arsenals, we could build it up when we needed it in the second world war or the Korean war and we could employ more people and make more guns and ammunition for the Canadian Armed Forces. Then, when we were a country at peace again, we could phase it down, because it was a matter of government policy. It was a Crown corporation and we could make other jobs for the workers. We could move them around to other jobs in the civil service or we could make sure they were looked after properly.

By and large, that worked. Once you privatized it, you got Diemaco of Kitchener. In order to survive, it has to go farther than the Canadian government contract for the armed forces and it has to export arms.

Once again, then, Canada becomes like many other countries in the business of exporting arms.

In a way, I have some sympathy. I will be frank and honest with General Motors in this particular contract. After all, it was the Department of External Affairs that went out and helped it get this contract with Saudi Arabia and promoted these contracts.

That seems to be the new role of External Affairs. It used to be that it was Canadian foreign policy. It used to be that it helped Canadian citizens when they were in trouble abroad or when they needed help as they went to a foreign country.

Now, its major role seems to be as a big trade department to promote sales of Canadian goods. Of course, one of the Canadian goods is arms. It leaves the government in contradictory situations making contradictory statements.

I was just examining the exchange in the House of Commons that I took part in on May 23 of this year. I cited the previous minister of external affairs, the right hon. Joe Clark. He said: "If there is one lesson which the world must learn from this war, it is that an unrestricted arms trade in this region, the Middle East, is no longer acceptable and constitutes a threat to the security of all members of the United Nations".

Of course, it looks contradictory to the average Canadian when the government then brings in this bill saying: "All right, let's export arms to the Middle East."

I asked this question of the Minister for International Trade in the House of Commons.

An hon. member: What did he say?

Mr. Waddell: He tried to weasel out of it, quite frankly, by saying: "Mr. Clark meant restricted weapons".

Examine the phrase: "Unrestricted arms trade in this region". We are restricting the arms trade to this region. Who is he trying to kid? The fact is that the government has this contract. It has to change the law, and it is doing that.

It puts the government in a contradictory situation. The Prime Minister and the former minister of external affairs said: "Look, the Middle East is a dangerous area". There have been 26 wars since 1945 and there is only one peace treaty, which is between Israel and Egypt.

Everybody knows what kind of area it is and that there can be other wars there. The Prime Minister was right and the minister of external affairs was right. Now, there is a contradiction here.

We cannot be holier than thou in this matter, and we should not pretend to be. Sweden has a socialist government. France has a socialist government. Name some other countries with socialist governments that export arms.

The late Rajiv Gandhi got into trouble when he was Prime Minister because of contracts with Sweden involving kickbacks and so on. This arms industry is a cancer in the world, and we have to blot it out. It takes political courage to do it.

One person who had some real political courage was the head of the machinists' union in the United States. He is now retired. His name was William Wimpensinger. They used to call him "Wimpy". He was no wimp, this man.

He went around to the machinists in the States and said: "I know we are going to lose some jobs if we cut back the arms industry, but by God, we have to do it or we are going to kill this world. We can find better jobs, brothers and sisters, outside the arms industry." That took political courage.

It is not easy for our party, quite frankly, to get up and oppose this bill.

I want to conclude by saying that it is easy to make a buck off arms, and we are starting to do that. However, we know that disarmament is tied into world development. Both of them are related. There are really two steps to the development of the Third World in the 21st century.

One is that the major powers give up making those weapons, and put some of that money into development. There is another aspect. This is where the Minister for International Trade missed again in the House of Commons when he said to me in his reply: "We were talking about weapons of mass destruction, and not about guns and light-armoured vehicles".

A weapon is a weapon is a weapon. If someone is killed by a bullet, they still are killed. If they are killed by a nuclear bomb, they are killed. If they are killed by a light-armoured vehicle and a bullet, whether in the townships of South Africa, in Central America or in the Middle East and so on, they still die.

More important, we keep sending these weapons—they are small weapons it could be argued—to Third World governments and governments throughout the world which use them on their own people, which use this kind of police force and this kind of anti-democratic system of government. This keeps down development.

There are two steps to development. One is eliminating the big weapons to have a peace dividend and the other is stopping the distribution of smaller weapons.

It would take political courage for a government to say we are not going to do it, we are not going to get into the international arms trade.

I sometimes think it might be nice to be an American congressman. They have a lot of power, a lot more power than we have as members of Parliament. Sometimes I really feel sorry for the American congressmen in many ways. They constantly have to defend weapons and defence contracts in their own constituencies and they cannot eliminate that cancer or oppose it. We are lucky here. We can oppose it. We can say to our union brothers and sisters: "Sorry, but the principle is more important. We can't get into this international arms trade".

The government is inconsistent. The government is wrong. It is so ironic that tomorrow we are going to debate gun control in Canada and today we are debating gun export to the world. It is wrong. It is simply wrong.

My friend, the member for Kamloops, was going to quote the Bible and I think he had to finish before he could do that. That is appropriate. In the past there have been numerous politicians from Kamloops who have been very good at quoting the Bible but he is right on this. The biblical quote was essentially the one about turning your swords into ploughshares.

One of the great times of my life was when as a young student I went to the United Nations for the first time and saw that great statue in front of the United Nations which is literally a picture of a sword being turned into a ploughshare. This government is not doing that. It is turning ploughshares into swords. That is shameful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to the legislative committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Chartrand: Mr. Speaker, I did not arrive in time for the vote, but if I had been here, I would have voted with the government.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Point of order. There have been some informal consultations and I think you would find a consensus in the House to call it seven o'clock, which would enable us to move immediately to private members' hour.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being seven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30 the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

REQUEST FOR BILL OF ENVIRONMENTAL RIGHTS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should establish a Bill of Environmental Rights to empower Canadians to fight polluters and guarantee all Canadians the right to live in a healthy environment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the importance of this motion to all Canadians could never be over-stated and it is most important that I am presenting this motion on World Environment Day during Environment Week, 1991.

Canadians from coast to coast to coast are all too aware that our environment teeters on the brink of irreparable destruction. Cynical attempts by governments to buffer big businesses' continued practice of sacrificing our land, our air and our water to cheap and easy profits do nothing but sell off our childrens' right to a healthful future.

Tracts of forests one-third the size of Japan are sold to Japanese industry while our Prime Minister travels to that country and cosies up to their top big business executives to encourage more selling of our deteriorating forest. Our forest is shrinking. It is not being regenerated at the same rate that it is being removed. These forests are our lungs and home to countless disappearing species with which we share our country. We should be stewards of wild life, not executioners. Much of our disappearing forest will simply not be there for our children.

Water, air and land pollution continues to fume, spout and pour forth from industry and communities at an ever-increasing rate. Our fragile ecosystems cannot cope with the ravaging of violent toxins slathered across our environment. Government continues to support businesses' efforts to avoid often costly cleanups and environment impact studies of projects. Northern and remote residents, cottagers and tourists alike watch with frustration, shame and disbelief as acid rain continues to kill our lakes and rivers. The government's refusal to accept plans to phase in a long-term strategy of zero discharge for toxic effluents confound increasing attempts by individuals and communities to combat toxic biocide.

But our laws have not kept pace with the times. During the 1960s and 1970s, more and more Canadians raised their voices against environmental destruction and more and more of these people spoke with one voice. DDT, destruction of farm land and mercury poisoning were but a few of the key issues of the time. But our legal system still favours the polluter and environmentally hazardous developers over those who would give of their time and energy to protect, not to destroy, our environment.

Our citizens do not currently have the right to take sufficient action to protect the environment. The government's refusal to proceed with a serious environmental assessment bill serves only to underscore the unwillingness of cabinet to protect our nation's skin and tissue from pollution by eager developers who would sacrifice not only our environment but entire cultures, like the Cree facing the James Bay II project. The solution is no mystery. The collective expertise and experience of environmentalists and environmental organizations have produced reports which lay the basis for a very clear and effective environmental assessment bill, but the government instead, turned the volume up on big business opposition to effective environmental assessment and refused to listen to what environmentalists had to say.

Our government may have the power to stop these acts, but as is the case, time after time after time, with Point Aconi, Kemano James Bay, Rafferty-Alameda and so on, our government has not the will or the backbone to listen to Canadians and put a stop to treating the environment like a sacrificial lamb on the altar of quick profit.

In fact, just last week the government had the opportunity to demonstrate a real commitment to the environment, but they chose not to do so.

All previous parliamentary business died when the House began a new session with a new throne speech on May 13. The government's then C-78 legislation, an act to establish an environmental assessment process had not passed and all testimony heard by the legislative committee studying that bill suggested that this was the best thing to happen to C-78, that it should have been put aside and the bill rewritten.

The government was given the opportunity to bring in new legislation which reflected an understanding of the need for a sound, well designed assessment process. But instead, they chose to reintroduce C-78, as if it had never died. C-78 is now C-13, a bad news number for a bad news bill. C-13 is the same old flawed and unsatisfactory bill that C-78 was, and it should not be that way.

The new Minister of the Environment had a golden opportunity to demonstrate that he had a real commitment to the environment and that he had listened to the experts on this bill. Instead, the new minister has taken up where the old minister left off and none of us are any better off. There is still no environmental assessment legislation in place in Canada.

I remain committed to developing a better assessment bill, and will continue to work to secure one for Canadians and their children who will inherit this mess that we are leaving behind.

The green plan had also presented the perfect window of opportunity to turn the corner away from continued escalation of pollution. But the government chose to turn this window of opportunity for positive change into a door to the trough for the friends of government. Green plan moneys are being squandered on pre-election ploys and we all lose because of it.

According to information gained through Freedom of Information requests, the federal government has spent more than $7 million on advertising and public relations exercises around the green plan. To me, if the green plan was as good as the government says it is, no selling job would have been required, nor would the government have had to spend $12,000 on picture frames, $10,000 on lapel pins or $150,000 on communications advice from a private consulting firm.

Canadians already know that they want their government to work on the environment. The polls tell us that the environment rates high on Canadians' list of priority issues. Canadians are willing to support action on the environment. But $10,000 for lapel pins does nothing for the environment.

Obviously the sales job was not for the environment, it was for the Conservative party whose free trade agreement and goods and services tax have angered Canadians from coast to coast. Seven million dollars in taxpayers' money on the green plan should not have been directed for this clearly partisan purpose. The Tories should have used their own money in this shameful promotion.

It is equally shameful that we still have no measures to ensure that such a basic right as safe drinking water for all Canadians, a disgrace made absurd by the amount of fresh water available within our borders and made criminal due to the government's trade deal and the move to export more water to the United States industry, while so many Canadian citizens are denied fresh water to drink.

The current round of constitutional talks provides an opportunity to renew the values upon which our nation is founded, values of environmental respect and stewardship. I am proud that the leader of our party has called for an environmental accord to protect not only our resources, but our jobs as well. Any new constitutional accord must include a stronger recognition of environmental as well as social and economic rights.

What better measure to unite Canadians from coast to coast to coast? Polls and simple logic both show that our environment, the world in which we live, work and play, is a top priority for Canadians. This tremendous will to do something before it is too late should be harnessed to build a strong Canada. Pollution does not respect boundaries, it is a preventable disease which knows no borders.

A bill of rights would go a long way to dealing with these issues for many, many years to come. It would be central to the much needed integration of economic planning, social considerations and environmental protection. Instead the government continues daily to push changes which make environmental matters worse.

The Mexican trade deal is a case in point. Our government has mouthed the words of United States government and business by refusing to integrate environmental concerns into the trade negotiations. What shameful and backward thinking.

A bill of rights is the step that is needed to bring our laws into the last decade of the 20th century. A bill of rights would guarantee: "That people have the right to clean air, pure water and the preservation of natural, scenic, historical and aesthetic values of the environment."

Those words were from a private members' bill introduced some time ago by Ruth Grier, a member of the Ontario legislature and now the new Ontario Minister of the Environment. As minister, Ms. Grier has begun a process which will see the province of Ontario try to fill the gap created by this federal government as Ontario moves towards its own environmental bill of rights.

I have just returned from the Yukon where another NDP government, led by Premier Tony Penikett has introduced its own environmental bill. Here too we see that the territory is enshrining the right to a healthful, natural environment in their legislation and is therefore a leader among all legislators in this marvellous land we call Canada.

The federal government, in turn, has the obligation to conserve and maintain our environment for future generations. This is not a new idea. The Canadian Environmental Law Association has been pushing for an environmental bill of rights since at least 1970.

Any one person, or group of persons, who believe that a polluter is contaminating or degrading our environment, deserves the right to know the minister responsible will proceed in a serious way to determine the extent and nature of the problem, and be supported by legislation to give the government the power to stop, alter or otherwise change any existing or proposed project. Such a bill of rights would shift the burden of proof to the polluter, after establishing that environmental damage is the likely result of their action or their proposed project.

Such a bill of rights would give people the right to sue polluters, thrusting us finally into the role of nurturing stewards of our land. In this way we have much to learn from our indigenous people, who for so many years have tended and respected our environment.

It reminds me of a meeting this afternoon of the environment committee of this House where the Minister of the Environment told the members of the committee that he would like to see, through the green plan, the empowering of people on the environment. Nothing would empower the people more than a bill of rights. Such a bill of rights would ensure whistle blowing protection so that any worker has protection of the law in blowing the whistle on an employer who causes serious pollution, excessive waste of energy or deliberate or accidental contamination or degradation of our land, air or water. Workers deserve this right because not only will that go a long way toward preventing pollution at the source, but these workers who see big business pollution going on, know full well it is their children who will suffer from the effect of this environmental damage. Buyers and users of land have the right to be protected from buying polluted tracts of land, and consumers have the right to be able to choose and expect increasingly environmentally friendly products and packaging when there must be any packaging at all.

The people of our communities across this country deserve the right to sue the government and ensure that laws are enforced. There have been hundreds of cases in the United States where the Environmental Protection Agency has been sued on this basis. The majority of cases has been successful.

A bill of rights must also deal with the issue of compensation for workers who lose or must alter their livelihood because of essential environmental protection measures. Of course, workers through their organizations must be central to the decision-making process which concerns all dealings with the environment and particularly those which impact on industry and their jobs. Most importantly, all citizens must have the right to be directly involved in this process through tribunals and panels.

Community based input is essential to ensure community based support for serious long-term environmental protection. People in communities deserve to be involved in all aspects of environmental decision making, the setting of standards and controls, the review of permits and regulations. They should receive adequate notice about all orders and regulations relating to control standards and public participation in decisions.

All members of this House should support this bill. Our environment is not something which we can leave until another time. There is no other time. Environmental organizations and community groups have made it all too clear to each and every member of Parliament in this House.

Today is the day to act. Today is the day to become a government with a commitment to the environment, a commitment to our children's future and our planet's future. Tomorrow is far, far too late.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, first I want to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, for introducing this bill which, I must say, I fully support.

[English]

I want to congratulate my colleague. He and I sat on the committee on Bill C-78 together. I know the environment is something he takes very much to heart. I support the bill. I support the initiative.

That being said, there are certain nuances that I would like to draw in the differences of opinion between him and me, and then there are certain fundamental differences which I would also like to bring to the attention of this House.

In terms of the nuances, the smaller differences, I do not believe that it was necessary in presenting this bill, which as he so properly said should involve all members of this House and indeed all of the Canadian people, for him to engage in a particularly blanket and vicious attack on Canadian entrepreneurs. It is not fair and it is not appropriate.

I am sure that if he were to review his remarks, he would really understand that it is not all business, not all of the private sector that engages in unlawful pollution. Yes, there are some businesses which do so and they should indeed suffer penalties. Let us not engage in universal condemnation.

At the same time I am sure that the member would want to recognize that there are other bodies who pollute, governments for instance, and municipalities that are not prepared to clean up their act. I am sure that the member, again if he were to go through his remarks, would not be so fulsome in his praise of the NDP government of Ontario. Indeed, the major environmental thrust in Ontario was due to the hon. James Bradley, the Liberal minister of the environment in that province. I am sure he would share again with me, if he were to review what he had said, the deep disappointment of the people of Ontario with the fact that the NDP government which did not expect to take power simply engaged in a lot of promises and has let the environmental community down very badly.

Let us go now to some of the more substantive differences of opinion between myself and this member, whom I admire greatly, and his legislation which indeed I ultimately support.

There is no doubt that the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake is right when he says that the purpose of this legislation is to empower people to force governments to obey their laws.

He is also right when he examines the evolution of the EARP guidelines brought in by a federal Liberal government. Those guidelines, which were meant to bring polluters to heel by this unfortunate Conservative government, were simply regarded as guidelines. It has been successive court decisions which have forced the government to live up to its responsibility.

The member is right as well when he says that what is now happening is that we have guidelines that have the force of law. This government with C-78, now C-13, is attempting to bring in legislation which would only have the force of guidelines.

An environmental bill of rights is necessary to empower people.

Where I would disagree, with the member however, is how to empower people. It is not sufficient to only bring in an environmental bill of rights. That bill of rights must have certain teeth. There are two suggestions that I would make to the member, within the context of the goodwill that exists and my support for his bill. The first is the absolute need for third party intervenor funding. It is not enough to simply empower people if, as a result of empowering them, we are ultimately going to bankrupt them as they begin the lengthy degree of court cases in an attempt to force government to live up to its own legislation.

Third party funding, which the current government has refused in the case of C-78, now C-13, on any kind of a reasonable level in virtually every court case, is essential if the Canadian people are to be allowed to expand democracy in the way that we all believe should happen. It would allow the Canadian people, not only to decide after the fact, but to have input into decisions as they are in the process of being made.

The second suggestion that I would make to the member in beefing up his bill is the necessity, within this House, of having an environmental auditor who would—and I have heard the member speak about this and he is nodding his agreement and we obviously share that view—have the same power as the Auditor General. He would report to Parliament whether the government was obeying its legislation and what progress the government had made on its commitment. He would be an environmental auditor who would really empower the people of Canada through their elected representatives.

I support the philosophy behind the member's bill and I would hope that this government would take the member's speech into account.

[Translation]

I would also like, Mr. Speaker, to ask the government, when it accepts the member's request which was so well formulated, to agree also to my suggestions regarding an environmental Auditor as well as third party intervenor funding. And I would also like, Mr. Speaker, to see the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, give up his attacks against the private sector and not indulge in his desire which is quite understandable to praise the outdated NDP Ontario government.

I hope the government is really going to tackle the basic issues we are considering. I am sure, because I know the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Environment very well who is a man of high calibre and who shares our philosophy, that the government is going to accept these issues in an effort to really help the hon.

member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake win acceptance for his vision.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, once again I am happy to participate in a debate and particularly a debate on the environment, like the one called for by the motion of the New Democratic Party.

This motion is asking the House to endorse the establishment by the government of a Bill of Environmental Rights. Such a Bill would give Canadians a chance to fight polluters and guarantee them the right to live in a healthy environment.

I must state, Mr. Speaker, that protection of the environment and improvement of its quality are amongst the top priorities of this government. Our track record clearly shows to what extent we are determined to work to that end. On December 11, 1990, we made public our environment action plan entitled "Canada's Green Plan". The basic principle of this plan is shared by all Canadians: To guarantee to the present and future generations a healthy and safe environment and a strong and thriving economy. The best way to guarantee to the citizens of this country a clean environment is to set ourselves very definite goals and keep people abreast of the progress we are making toward them. This, Mr. Speaker, is the essence of the Green Plan. It contains specific objectives and timetables. It provides for regular consultations and detailed reporting on the environment, to allow the public to follow closely the progress being made.

Mr. Speaker, the commitment made by the government to improve the environment will be enshrined in the legislation. The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, which establishes the federal environmental assessment process, states, in its preamble, that the government seeks to achieve an appropriate balance between economic development and the preservation and enhancement of environmental quality.

Mr. Speaker, impact studies were done in my riding concerning the completion of highway 50 between Lachute and Mirabel. Of course, these studies have held up for quite some time, the construction of that highway which is necessary, if not essential to the development of the large region of Argenteuil. And I can tell you that the people of my riding were very aware of the quality of the environment. They, of course, wanted to preserve the environment, but not by having to go through red tape and additional delays. The latter are often welcomed by the government's financing the construction of those highways, who end up making commitments over several years, but which in fact are detrimental to regional development. A balance must therefore be found and I certainly agree with the government's objective of achieving an appropriate balance between economic development and the environment.

That bill also provides that all departments and federal agencies must make an environmental assessment for all the projects concerning which they have a decision making power. The legislation also gives far reaching powers to the Minister of Environment, so that he can ensure that the process is applied fairly, efficiently and openly. Moreover, and this is a very important aspect, those powers will ensure that the public can contribute to a large extent to the decision making process regarding projects which may have serious consequences on the environment.

Over and beyond this legislation, the Prime Minister has pledged unequivocally, on behalf of the government, that the environment would be a priority in all the decisions concerning policies and programs. Mr. Speaker, the government realizes that the Prime Minister's actions have a bearing on the life of the Canadian population in ways that are not always directly linked to his projects. That is why the government now requires that policy and program proposals submitted to Cabinet which may have a substantial impact on Canada's environment, must be accompanied by a statement of their environmental impact.

Thanks to the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act and the policies of the Canadian government, almost every important measure contemplated by the government will be examined from the environmental perspective. Canadians will have the right to be directly involved in the process or at least have access to the results.

The Minister of the Environment is responsible for implementing the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. This legislation confers very broad powers on the minister for issuing regulations to protect air, water and soil quality in Canada. Furthermore, the legislation requires the minister to report regularly to Canadians on the state of the Canadian environment.

Thanks to this legislation, the public can be actively involved in decisions that have an environmental impact. The legislation also gives the public the might to prosecute polluters who violate the Act.

The government is also very much aware of the importance of providing information on the environment, Mr. Speaker. In the course of consultations with Canadians as the government was developing its Green Plan, it was often said that the government should set a very high priority on regular dissemination, on a broad scale, of easily understood information on the state of the environment and any changes that have been corded.

Canadians also told us, Mr. Speaker, that they wanted to be able to base their environmental decisions on solid ground. They wanted good, solid information to determine whether their individual actions would help reduce the deterioration of the environment. They also wanted to be able to judge whether the government was also doing its share to leave a healthy and sustainable environment for future generations, and to be able to make an informed assessment of the performance of industry with respect to the environment.

To provide regularly quality information on the environment is one of the principal commitments made in the Green Plan. Although much remains to be done in this very complex field, the government is committed to providing Canadians with the information they need to make enlightened decisions regarding their own activities and those of others—including governments and industry—as they affect the quality of the environment.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the government feels that the steps we have already taken are indeed the best way for the Canadian people to fight polluters and for the government to fulfill its commitments. We have already taken the necessary steps to ensure that all Canadians have the right to live in a healthy environment. I think this Bill of Environmental Rights would duplicate many existing provisions. It would be better to let the voters concerned about the environment be the judge of the government's performance. That is true accountability! The Canadian people will decide if we have not achieved our goals regarding the environment.

In my riding as in others, Mr. Speaker, I think that most of the people involved and active in local environmental associations know very well that, while working towards a healthy and sustainable environment, they have to bear in mind that economic development must go on. We cannot stop the march of time unduly and prevent the implementation of an industrial project designed to provide employment for fear that a bee will not be gathering nectar.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I hope that my constituents will take part in the green plan implementation process. There will be programs to encourage participation in special projects. Being a member yourself, you know very well, Mr. Speaker, that people interested in doing various things, be it recycling bottles, newspapers, whatever, are coming to see us regularly in our ridings. For years now, one of my constituents has been wishing that the government would come up with a little program to finance the purchase of a vehicle, allowing him to expand his business and gather more cardboard for recycling and resale to companies prepared to buy it from him.

So, I am convinced that the green plan will give my constituents the opportunity, or so I wish, to be more directly involved in the protection of our environment.

Mrs. Finestone: Happy birthday, Lise! You turned 41 today, did you not?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to take part in this debate and support the motion moved by my colleague, who calls for the government to establish a Bill of Environmental Rights to empower Canadians to fight polluters.

• (1910)

I listened carefully to what the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau had to say. Of course, she praised the green plan introduced by her government, but, at the same time, she opposed the motion before the House asking the government to establish a Bill of Environmental Rights to empower Canadians to fight polluters and everyone who is destroying our country's environment.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have some difficulty understanding the arguments put forward by my colleague from Argenteuil—Papineau. I also have trouble figuring out why she is against this Bill, or should we say this initiative, since it is not even a Bill.

[English]

With this motion, the government itself would still be drafting the bill along with its content. If there are concerns on the part of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment or anyone else across the way, and if they fear that the bill would be too strict and would stop the economy from functioning, or if they have some other morbid fear which they may be motivated to use as an excuse, then I say to them: Draft your bill in such a way as to provide the equilibrium that you say is necessary. I say that if that is their position.

They are taking the position that the bill the government would produce would be wrong. From time to time I am partisan and do not always support the government across the way, but not even I would accuse this government of being so incompetent that it could not possibly propose a bill such as the one requested here.

I would say that this government probably is able to draft such a bill. We should allow it the opportunity to do so. Here I am supporting giving the government the power to propose such a bill.

Let us assume, for instance, that this government is totally incompetent. I know it is not beyond possibility, but we on this side of the House will help the government to produce such legislation.

My colleague from LaSalle—Émard would be more than pleased I am sure to assist the government and the parliamentary secretary in preparing the kind of legislation that we need in the event that the government is as incompetent as some of the Tories across the way think it is.

The Tories were talking about the green plan. I can think of two reasons why it is called the green plan: the environment is green, and it is a green slush fund. The only thing green is the money coming into the government advertising agencies which are benefiting from the green plan.

I say to the government across the way that if its green plan is going to mean anything, the government will have to stop using the money for its advertising—

Mr. Stevenson: Are you not in favour of cleaning up the Fraser River?

Mr. Boudria: I am not in favour of cleaning out the taxpayers' pockets to reward the friends of the Tories across the way in government advertising agencies.

What I am in favour of is taking the money to clean up the environment, not to clean out the taxpayers' wallets. That is what I am favour of.

If the members across the way think differently, if they think instead that we should reward the friends of the Tories, they have a right to think that. I suppose they have a right to be wrong and they can continue being wrong if they wish to do so.

They now have the popular support of a very large proportion of the population, somewhere in the area of 13 or 14 per cent, but that is okay. If they want to continue along that line, they can do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my colleague from LaSalle—Émard has shown today that the government's Green Plan is clearly not enough. What we need are specific initiatives to protect Canadians. Today, we are asking this House to approve a motion authorizing the government to propose legislation, which of course we could accept or reject, or improve, once we get it. If the government feel they are unable to propose such legislation they just have to step aside, Mr. Speaker, and we on this side of the House will be ready to move over to the other side and we will be ready to provide real, specific initiatives to protect the environment of this country.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to address the House on what is a very interesting proposal, one for which I am afraid there may be excessive expectations. Those are the kinds of issues which I would like to address during the next few minutes.

All members of this House irrespective of party share a very common and strong desire to protect the environment. As a result of an enhanced amount of environmental awareness over the last perhaps five to ten years, I think there is a widespread realization not only in this House but throughout the country that Canada's environment, the environment of other nations, and indeed the global environment is very much under attack.

While some individual members may have led in the forefront in their efforts in this House to increase awareness, I think it is true to say that at this time there is not a single member in the House who is not in broad agreement that an immense amount of work needs to be done in order to undo many of the mistakes of the past.

A question which is uppermost in my mind is how we should go about addressing what is obviously a very monumental problem, a problem which faces us as a federal government, a problem which faces each of the provincial governments throughout the country, a problem which faces the municipal governments as well, faces us as individuals and within the international community.

At first blush the thought of an environmental bill of rights is certainly an attractive one, and I would congratulate the hon. member for making sure that it is a point of debate in this House. I would encourage him to continue with a suggestion that even if he is not successful on this particular occasion, it may well be that the idea with the passage of time will develop to the point of a broader degree of understanding.

It seems to me that what we must address right now is the question of what we would expect of an environmental bill of rights and how we would best go about achieving those several objectives. I believe what we are looking for as Canadians and as parliamentarians is some sort of assurance that the various levels of government will work together among themselves, with the environmental groups, with the business community, and with citizens at large in order to ensure there is a broad framework in place to try and protect the environment in the future from some of the ravages of the past.

I see this broad framework including many facets. I see it including federal legislation. I think of the Canadian Environment Protection Act which is already law. I see it including many regulations, many of which will emanate from that Canadian Environment Protection Act, and I am very conscious in my responsibilities as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment that we still have a significant distance to go in the establishment of those regulations.

As I say that, I am also conscious that government alone will not accomplish a great deal if it simply passes regulations without working in close consultation with other jurisdictions of government and with those whose actions should be regulated. Very often that is, but not solely, the business community, the industrial community. Of course individuals must be a part of that process as well.

I believe that the provincial governments' jurisdictions must be a part of this process, part of this multi-faceted approach to achieve the over-all objective which we are pursuing. I am very conscious of the constitutional fact that the provincial governments are largely responsible for the control of natural resources within the Confederation of Canada. To be frank, many provincial governments today are fearful that the federal government either is or may be on the verge of intruding upon what it perceives to be its jurisdiction.

In my own mind I am very clear on the fact that I believe Canadians are asking this federal government to accept a major role of leadership and I believe it is appropriate it should do so. But I also believe it will be more effective if we can work in co-operation with the provinces rather than confrontation with the provinces. They are a very important part of the multi-facet approach.

I would like to say that I believe the NGOs, the environmental non-governmental organizations, have a major role to play in this process. To me they bring a wealth of experience, a vast amount of knowledge and as well some very obvious, sincere convictions on the need for the environment to be protected. I see them as partners in the process, just as I do individuals who are becoming increasingly conscious of the need to protect the environment.

I spoke once before in this House about an individual constituent who wrote to me some time ago. I would like to remind the House of that one single letter because the message, I thought, was so meaningful, somewhat symtomatic of what I see happening in Canada. She was an older woman, according to her letter, living alone in a very small community within my constituency of Brandon—Souris. She wrote to say that she was concerned about the manner in which she was heating her house and whether or not in using the fuel oil which was available to her she was in any way endangering the environment. She sought advice as to what she should do as a result of that.

I was very touched by that letter because here was evidence of an individual Canadian, perhaps without substantial monetary means, who was clearly prepared to make some sort of sacrifice in order to do her part in what she perceived to be a Canadian struggle in order to protect the environment.

I guess what impressed me about that particular letter was that she wrote out of a genuine sense of concern and conviction. She did not write as a result of regulations requiring her to do so. She did not write because of a particular piece of legislation on which she based her concerns. She wrote as an individual who had grown aware of certain dangers and she was willing to do her part and respond.

I think what I see right now in this country, and elsewhere in the world, is a tremendous need for the development of partnerships in which all people will understand—perhaps to say all would be naive—but a vast majority of Canadians and citizens throughout the world would understand that we have a common responsibility to address the problems which face us in a co-operative and partnership manner.

One of the reasons why I am hesitant to see an environmental bill of rights as being some sort of solution to the challenge which is before us right now is that I fear it would suggest that somehow or other we could depend upon a particular piece of legislation, and the courts, which would presumably be an important partner in the process, to absolve ourselves of any other responsibilities and to be some sort of panacea in itself.

I accept the fact that legislation and courts may be an essential part of the over-all process of protecting the environment. I am sometimes as frustrated as other members are when I see that sentences levied against polluters are not as severe as I would wish them to be. I really believe that the best guarantee for a safe environmental future lies in a widespread determination to accept our responsibilities as individuals and whatever level of government we may be a part of, or whatever role we play in society, rather than put all of our hopes in a single piece of legislation or in the courts and ask them to enforce them.

We must work together and by working together we can succeed.

I was struck during the course of the green plan consultations how many hundreds, indeed thousands of Canadians who came forth, even though they came with a great deal of scepticism at the start, willing to be a part of the process. I would suggest that it is out of that sort of search for solutions that will come the strategies of tomorrow.

It may well be some time into the future that the environmental bill of rights will fit in perhaps to a multi-faceted approach as the hon. member wishes, but I believe right now the priority of this government, other governments and Canadians wherever they may be, whether individually or collectively, should be in trying to form the kind of partnerships the green plan is addressing.

While I congratulate the hon. member for ensuring that this issue is very much an issue to be debated now and again in the future, I would suggest perhaps that there are other issues and other solutions that are more important at this point in time. I look forward to that debate continuing on into the future.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to talk to the member's motion. The motion, as others have said, would have the government consider the creation of an environmental bill of rights to empower Canadians—and I think we should remember those two words clearly, empower Canadians—to fight polluters and guarantee all Canadians the right to live in a healthy environment.

I am sure very few of us would quarrel with the member's objectives on this issue. Certainly I would not and I know few people in my constituency would quarrel with that concept. We want a clean, healthy and productive environment for ourselves, for our children and certainly for future generations.

Let us not choose a means of questionable effectiveness to achieve an end which we can all support. The creation of an environmental bill of rights is an appealing notion, but is it in reality the best way to achieve the goals?

I would like to reflect just for a moment on our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Certainly it provides Canadians with individual rights beyond those of most nations. Many people of the world would consider our Charter of Rights and Freedoms a model for their countries. Yet sometimes, when it is taken to an extreme, one really wonders if, in certain aspects, it is in the best public interest.

I will give an example of one of those extremes, what I think of as an extreme. I look at the situation of criminals in this country who are here claiming refugee status to evade punishment in other countries. I see how they use our laws, or maybe I should say abuse our laws, and I wonder whether this is in the best public interest of Canadians in general.

Sometimes one wonders if we have not taken individual rights a step too far in certain situations. Sometimes I wonder, when I think of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, if we should not have brought along a charter of responsibility, or maybe a charter of responsibility and opportunity to go along with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In drafting an environmental bill, again I am going to purposely use an extreme, one might very well draft around the sort of issue that I am going to bring up. Certainly one can look at the automobile. The automobile certainly pollutes the atmosphere. If a bill of rights for the environment were drafted in a fairly broad way, an individual could bring action against neighbours and against the public in general on the use of the automobile, a polluting device in our environment. Could the banning of the automobile result from that sort of action?

Again, that is an extreme, but certainly one has to be careful when one looks at what exactly pollution is and how it affects us as individuals.

I did not mean to be partisan in this talk today. The opposition took a few definite shots. I suppose one should reflect on the situation and I suppose, to a certain extent, I will be partisan in my next couple of comments.

I used to be a member of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario. It was interesting that during my years there, two members of the Liberal party had Private Members' Bills—actual bills, not just motions—suggesting that the government bring forward a bill of environmental rights. Interestingly enough, both of those members ended up in the Liberal cabinet later in the 1980s and neither one of them ever brought forward a bill of rights for the environment.

Subsequently, just a year or two later, the NDP critic for the environment brought in a Private Members' Bill almost identical to the bills that the two members I referred to previously had introduced to the Ontario legislature. Once again, now that the NDP is in power its promise of a bill of rights on the environment is at least delayed, and quite possibly we will not see it forthcoming.

Again, I think the problem is that while the concept is good and everybody generally supports the idea and individuals want more power to deal with environmental issues, when it comes to actually writing a bill, it is rather difficult to word it in a proper way so that it is not taken to an extreme.

Therefore, let us look at some of the possibilities of empowering people, giving them more ability to react and help in the improvement of our environment.

I am not going to talk at great length about the green plan because other members have done so. Certainly, the green plan is based on a vision which all Canadians will share in. When one looks at the individual programs in the green plan, a few of which have been announced and many more will be announced over the next six years, there are many areas where individual Canadians can take a very active involvement.

Just to briefly mention two. There can be individual attempts to reduce solid waste—whether by a family or a business—through recycling, judicious purchasing and reducing the amount of packaging in the products we purchase and the use of composting. There are a great many areas where an individual can take action, and very distinct action, to assist in saving our environment.

Another opportunity to assist in the environment is the community tree planting program. That will be announced soon, I hope. That will allow individual Canadians and local organizations to get very much involved in planting trees across Canada.

The other piece of legislation I had hoped to talk about is the Environmental Assessment Act but I see my time is rather limited. There certainly will be opportunities for Canadians to be involved in that. The one I wish to mention at the end is the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. That gives extensive rights to public participation and decision making affecting the environment. It also confers upon the public the power to take court action when an activity contravenes the act. I think, to a significant degree, the empowerment within the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, and the new assessment act when it passes, will go a long way toward giving individual Canadians the thrust that they wish to have to improve our environment.

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take the couple of minutes I have remaining to say a few words about Motion M-217 brought forward by my colleague from Saskatchewan.

The hon. member's riding is just west of where my riding is in western Manitoba. When you speak of the environment, if you come out to my part of Manitoba you can look up and see the clear blue sky, and about 300 yards away from my home in Swan River, Manitoba you see nature at its best. We have small mountain ranges with the grass and trees growing. People in the urban centres of Canada cannot appreciate the type of environment that we are able to live in. But, of course, if things keep going the way they have been going over the recent past, that is very much at risk.

I will give one example specific to my part of Manitoba. Back in 1989 the Repap Corporation purchased a large pulp mill in La Pas, Manitoba, and in doing so acquired the cutting rights to a major portion of Manitoba, including the area around where I live in Swan River. Included in the purchase were plans of major expansions, both in La Pas and a chipping plant in Swan River. They had planned to follow up on several other areas. What has come to pass since that time is that Repap is subject to several environmental studies to enable the corporation to expand. So even in the pristine part of Manitoba and areas in western Canada, the governments and citizens involved are very very sensitive to the environment and are making sure that these projects are subject to environmental studies before they go forward.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business is now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being 7.38 o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

TABLING OF TWENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE CANADA-FRANCE INTER-PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the report of the official parliamentary delegation that represented Canada at the twenty-fourth meeting of the Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Association, held in Paris, Calais, Lyon and the Alps from April 5 to April 15, 1991.

BILL C-202

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of legislative committee A on Bill C-202, an act respecting a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, without amendment.

I might say that this is the first committee I have ever sat on in which all the members were on one side of the table. The members of each party spoke strongly in favour of the bill, expressing their support for the concept and the idea.

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-227, an act to amend the Criminal Code (desecration of the flag).

He said: As we have heard, this is a bill making it an offence under the Criminal Code of Canada to desecrate the flag.

I think all members of the House will remember that this legislation was chosen as a votable item by the elections and privileges committee during the last session of Parliament, but did not have the opportunity to proceed to debate and a vote because Parliament prorogued.

I must say that I have been very pleased with the tremendous support since this bill was introduced in the summer of 1990. There has been support from all across Canada. I have been on national television and radio talk shows. Some of the strongest endorsements came from the Royal Canadian Naval Association and the National Council of Veterans Association, representing 19 varied associations.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a number of petitions from constituents in my riding. These particular constituents reside in the communities of Lumby, Salmon Arm, Sicamous and Enderby.

These petitioners are calling upon the government to reconsider its decision to force the provinces to either increase funding for the RCMP, in many cases far greater than the municipalities can afford, or to decrease services and close detachments.

We recognize that a decision has been made recently in this regard.

These petitioners had signed these beforehand, but I think the petitioners are still relevant in presenting their case that RCMP services should be maintained at their current level, with the current levels of funding by the federal government.

On behalf of these petitioners, I present these to the House today.

CANADA POST

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by quite a number of my constituents in the riding of Timmins—Chapleau, and in particular in South Porcupine.

The petitioners are calling on Parliament to support the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services. They also call on Parliament to reject the Conservative agenda to cut back and close these post offices.

TAXATION

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House a petition from people in the riding of Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, the communities of Stratford, Mitchell and Shakespeare.

The petitioners consider the Income Tax Act discriminatory against the people who choose to stay home and look after their children as compared to buying child care services.

They believe the credits and allowances make it more advantageous for people with families to live together in an unmarried rather than a married state. They believe the system is cumbersome.

The petitioners pray that the House will amend the Income Tax Act to make it fair and equitable for all family arrangements that are available.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today to present two petitions on behalf of my constituents, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition deals with the goods and services tax, the tax that was supposed to be so simple and so effective. It was supposed to be revenue neutral.

My constituents from the communities of Rainy River, Emo, and Fort Frances ask that this particular tax be rescinded. They humbly petition this place, this House of Parliament, to rescind the goods and services tax and find a simple, fair and efficient means to levy taxes in Canada.

WAGE CONTROLS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I also have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which deals with the government's large tax increases and its belief that in order to get its house in order, it would discriminate against working men and women in this country by freezing their wages in the public sector, and by doing so, enabling itself to get out of the mess that it put itself in.

Again, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the imposition of wage controls and reaffirm support for free collective bargaining in this country for Canadian workers.

MERCHANT NAVY

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I have a petition today signed by the residents of Saskatchewan, some from my riding and some neighbouring my riding in the communities of Debden and Big River, rural Saskatoon and Shelbrooke.

The petitioners state that 12,000 Canadian members of our merchant navy served their country during the Second World War, 1,259 of whom died in combat.

The petitioners state that the United States and the United Kingdom have recognized that merchant seamen are veterans, and they state that approximately 3,500 Canadians served in dangerous waters during the last war and seek what they sought since the end of the war: equal recognition, entitlement and benefits, a position supported by the Royal Canadian Legion.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to pass legislation that would confer veteran status to those who served in Canada's merchant navy during the Second World War.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

• (1020)

Mr. Dingwall: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. There have been some discussions among the three political parties. I am not seeking unanimous consent. I just wish to inform the House that there will be one speaker for the government, one speaker for the Official Opposition and, I believe, one speaker for the New Democratic Party.

Then, when that debate collapses, which we would presume would be prior to one o'clock, it would go on division. Thereafter at three o'clock we would proceed with the discussion of Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act, post-Question Period.

I believe the parliamentary secretary is aware of that, and I apprise my colleagues in the New Democratic Party as well.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I can confirm that these are the discussions and that we on this side are certainly pleased to co-operate with that.

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, speaking on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic caucus, I just want to say that we concur with that decision.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to have this opportunity to speak on Bill C-17 which amends Part III of the Criminal Code dealing with firearms and other weapons.

All Canadians are aware of the need for changes to Canada's gun control system. This government is committed to the reduction of crime, and effective gun control measures are an important part of Canada's criminal law. The time is right for this House to respond to the concerns of all Canadians. Four out of five Canadians support stronger gun control and with good reason. Most important, Canadians are becoming increasingly concerned about the increase of firearms violence.

The ownership of firearms of all kinds is increasing and Canadian police forces are becoming increasingly concerned about the frequency with which they are being used in crimes of all kinds, ranging from domestic violence to armed robbery and even mass murder.

There is some misunderstanding about the nature of the issue and the nature of firearms related violence or homicides with respect to urban and rural Canadians. In fact, public opinion polls show that the concern for stronger gun control is shared by Canadians who live in communities of less than 10,000 people as much as by Canadians who live in large urban centres.

In addition, according to the Canadian justice statistics, homicide rates caused by firearms are just as high per capita in small communities under 10,000 as in large communities. In fact, they are greater per capita in communities under 10,000 than in communities of greater than 500,000 and are only exceeded by communities from 100,000 to 250,000.

The concern for firearms related homicides and the concern to have effective and sensible gun control is a concern that is shared by Canadians all across this country in communities of all sizes in urban and rural areas.

The existing gun control law has not changed significantly since January 1, 1978 and changes are needed. This government is being asked to take strong and effective measures to control firearms. As the hon. members of this House are aware, on June 26, 1990, I introduced Bill C-80 which contained a number of new gun control proposals. This bill was studied by a special committee of members of this House which produced a report containing a total of 32 recommendations for changes in the legislation.

Many of these recommendations make a contribution to stronger controls and have been taken into account in revising the legislation. Bill C-17 is the government's response to the special committee report.

I am grateful for the hard work and support of the committee members, and I would like to thank them for their contribution to the new legislation.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-80 was to provide better protection for all Canadians against firearms violence, while avoiding undue or unnecessary interference in the activities of Canadians who use guns legally, responsibly, and safely.

The legislation now before this House contains a number of modifications to Bill C-80, but the fundamental purpose remains the same. I believe that the modifications that have been made contribute to the achievement of a safer, more balanced, and more effective gun control system.

The measures contained in this Bill will improve Canada's gun control system in many different ways. Taken together, they comprises a package that will help to ensure that those who should not have guns do not have guns.

They will take the wrong guns out of all hands, and all guns out of the wrong hands. They will result in better screening of gun buyers, and they will limit access to the most dangerous types of firearms. They will reduce the accidental misuse of guns. They will encourage the responsible ownership and use of guns by all Canadians. They will help to keep firearms out of the hands of those who should not have them or who might use them for criminal purposes. And finally, they will increase deterrence for those who may use guns criminally or negligently.

I believe that these measures, with your strong support, will help alleviate the personal sense of fear and vulnerability that many people experience in today's society.

[English]

Under the new proposals deterrence of firearms crime will be increased by raising the maximum sentences for some of the offences created by the gun control law. Witnesses who appeared before the Reimer committee, the special committee of the House of Commons, including police and customs officers, suggested that one major source of illegal firearms is illegal imports. To respond to this, the maximum sentences for importing, possessing or selling prohibited weapons will all increase from five to ten years.

Another major concern expressed by the police community has been the association of firearms with specific areas of criminal activity. In response to this, the legislation will also extend the use of prohibition orders to offences of drug trafficking as a bail condition and upon conviction.

To supplement this, the sentence for possessing any firearm while under a court prohibition order will also increase from five to ten years.

Canadians are very concerned about problems of violence against women and violence in domestic situations, and I share these concerns. All members of this House will realize that this is not just a gun control problem, but clearly firearms are a factor in many situations and the gun control law must recognize this. The presence of firearms in many homes raises grave concerns when domestic disputes occur. Too many of the domestic homicides that occur in Canada each year involve a firearm: easy access to a gun in a domestic dispute is an invitation to tragedy.

An important difference between gun control and other elements of Canada's criminal law and justice system is that gun control seeks to prevent as well as deter firearms incidents. Several elements of this bill will address concerns about domestic violence by helping the justice system to remove guns from potentially violent situations at the earliest possible time.

The present law provides for mandatory or discretionary firearms prohibition orders where there is a conviction for a violent offence. The new legislation will require the courts to consider firearms prohibition orders before conviction in some cases. When an accused person has been charged with an offence in which violence was used, threatened, or attempted, the court will be required to consider whether to make prohibition or other conditions a part of the bail order if the safety of any person might be jeopardized by not doing so.

A similar process will apply to peace bond applications which often arise during domestic disputes. This measure is intended to encourage the police and the courts to remove firearms from potentially violent situations before tragedy can occur. Where a person is convicted of a violent offence that carries a maximum sentence of 10 years or more, a five-year firearms prohibition order is already mandatory. This legislation will increase the prohibition to 10 years, with a lifetime prohibition for any repeat offence. Where the sentence available is less than 10 years, the courts currently have the discretion to prohibit for up to five years; but there are concerns that prohibitions are underused.

Under the proposed amendments the court will retain this discretion but will be required by law to consider prohibition even where the matter is not raised by counsel.

Under the present law police may also make an application to a court where they have reasonable grounds to believe that allowing a person to keep a firearm or acquisition certificate would endanger the safety of any person. This provision is an important one for domestic violent situations and will be kept unchanged.

I will be asking my provincial counterparts to encourage police officers across Canada to use it wherever possible to remove firearms from dangerous situations before they can cause harm.

• (1030)

Taken in combination, I believe that these changes should substantially increase the use of firearms prohibitions as a means of removing firearms from potentially dangerous situations, many of them domestic disputes, both before and after a conviction for any offence.

I might add that certainly one of the concerns that has been raised by lawful and responsible firearms users in Canada is the notion that the law must be enforced adequately and must address the criminal and misuse of firearms. I think that message was very well received and I think that these additions to the legislation that came as a result of the consultation surrounding Bill C-80 strengthen it and really make a significant and helpful addition to the over all legislative framework.

For those who are concerned that the law is not enforced strictly enough with respect to firearms offences, two other approaches I wish to take, which are not inherent in the legislation are, first of all, to draft prosecutorial guidelines for my own prosecutors in the territories. I am the prosecutor for the criminal law only in the territories of Canada. I think the public would like to ensure that these offences are dealt with seriously and that Crown counsel does not plea bargain away such offences. I will provide my own guidelines for consultation with my provincial counterparts in September when we meet to encourage them to perhaps develop the same ones.

In addition, I have had discussions with the Director of the Canadian Judicial Centre about the possibility in the course of the judicial education programs provided to judges to provide some component that would sensitize members of our judiciary to the seriousness with which Canadians view offences related to firearms and their concern that these laws be carefully enforced. I have had a very positive response to that. It is a broadly based initiative to try and ensure that the misuse of firearms is the major focus of our criminal activity.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the proposed legislation also contains a number of improvements to the screening system for those who request permission to acquire firearms. The firearms acquisition certificate system is at the heart of Canadian gun control.

By controlling the acquisition certificate, we insure that anyone who wants to obtain a gun must first be screened. Members will recall that this certificate is necessary to acquire a gun in any fashion, whether by purchase, gift, or loan.

The system only requires that those who want to keep a FAC be re-screened every five years to be sure that they are still suitable.

The screening system is a key element of our gun control proposals, and the legislation I have placed before this House contains many proposed changes to it. It will require all applicants to furnish two personal references who can assist those conducting the screening check. It will require a minimum 28 day waiting period during which that check will be carried out.

To prevent use by unauthorized persons, it will require the new FAC document to include a photograh of the holder. Finally, it will require FAC applicants to pass a firearms safety course or test.

[English]

Many concerns have been raised about the safety training requirement, especially on behalf of those Canadians for whom such a requirement might present an unnecessary or undue hardship. The new proposals will authorize local firearms officers who accept an FAC application to certify competence and knowledge without a formal test.

Regulations will be enacted to guide this discretion and to ensure that the exception is applied fairly and consistently. I anticipate that it may be used where the applicant can provide some other evidence of competence or where he or she is not able to complete a formal written examination.

It is difficult in this enormous country of ours with enormous regional variations to legislate fairly for all Canadians. We have to recognize that we have many Canadians who live in very remote areas. We have many Canadians who, unfortunately, are not literate and it is important to ensure that the standard is met but at the same time that the implementation is sufficiently flexible so as not to exclude Canadians who would otherwise be able to establish their competence.

A national safety education program is now being developed in consultation with my advisory council and provincial authorities. This provision will be proclaimed in force as soon as it can be implemented.

Concerns have also been raised about the possible liability of those who act as references. It has been suggested that the possibility of being held responsible for the applicant's use of firearms would effectively deter most potential references. It has also been suggested that the fear of liability might deter references from being candid about the applicant's suitability.

To address this problem, the law will make clear that a reference cannot be held civilly or criminally liable unless there has been a deliberate attempt to mislead the police, either by providing false information or deliberately failing to reveal significant information when it is requested.

I want to make it absolutely clear that references are only expected to assist the authorities to ensure that only those who do not represent a danger to the safety of themselves or anyone else are given access to firearms. Provided this basic standard is met, there will be no liability of any kind.

Concerns have also been raised that young people have access to firearms with too few restrictions. The new legislation will require FAC applicants between 16 and 18 years of age to obtain parental consent.

[Translation]

In many areas of Canada, the use of firearms by young persons is an important, and even an essential part of daily life. The law must provide for this, but it must also be sure that young persons are subject to appropriate supervision and controls.

In addition to requiring parental consent for a FAC application, the amendments will also give parents the option of consenting to a minors' permit up to age 18.

The minors' permit allows limited access to young people, and may have special conditions placed on it for supervision.

[English]

The fee charged for an acquisition certificate is currently $10. This is far below the cost of the screening process. The level is fixed by the statute and has not been changed since the last amendments were made in 1978. The new legislation will make it possible to set the fee by regulation which will allow for periodic adjustments to reflect changes in the cost of running the screening system.

There is no intention to use high fees to deter legitimate gun owners, but the taxpayers have been heavily subsidizing the current system. This government is committed to the principle of cost recovery and the firearms community agrees with us. Most of those who appeared on behalf of firearms groups before the special committee on gun control indicated that they believe that firearms owners should pay reasonable screening costs.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, it has been suggested that the focus of Canada's gun control system be changed from screening FAC applicants to registering all firearms.

The present system requires a screening check before a person can acquire a gun of any kind. Those firearms that represent a greater risk are designated as restricted weapons, and these must be registered. The owners are recorded by the RCMP, and transfers must be reported.

The combination of these two systems allows us to focus the additional resources needed to register and track firearms on those types of guns associated with additional risk. Mandatory registration of all firearms would place much greater demands on the existing system.

It would require trained police officers to spend more time reviewing gun registrations, and less time screening the people who will possess the guns they are registered.

Registering firearms would tell us how many legal guns there are in Canada, Madam Speaker, but it would have little effect on their use in crime, or on the number of deaths and injuries caused by suicides and accidents each year.

In a time of fiscal restraint, this government prefers to concentrate the available gun control resources in those areas of the system that will provide real benefits to firearms users and to the public safety.

• (1040)

[English]

It has also been suggested that the expiry time for acquisition certificates be changed. Gun owners would like to see a longer term or easier renewals. Those on the other side of the issue would like to see FAC holders required to re-apply after only two years. The present five year period strikes an effective balance between rescreening too often and not often enough. To reduce this period to two or three years would increase screening costs without any benefit to public safety. To increase it beyond five years or to reduce the screening process would be to compromise public safety. This government will not compromise the safety of the Canadian public.

The amendments I am proposing have been carefully considered with a view to protecting all Canadians from firearms violence. They are also intended to regulate the possession and use of firearms in ways which make it possible for those who require them to obtain and use them with a minimum of unnecessary interference.

One way of doing this is to focus the regulatory system, as much as possible, on types of firearms associated with the greatest risk to public safety, and relatively few, if any, legitimate sporting uses.

There have been concerns raised about the increasing prevalence of military and high fire-power firearms in Canada since the law was last amended in 1978. Hon. members will recall that effective controls on fire-power were a major component of my earlier legislative proposals.

There are still serious concerns about these firearms that this House must address and they remain a key element of the current proposals. These firearms represent a much greater danger to the public than others and they are dealt with accordingly.

Those who own military or paramilitary firearms, fully automatic or converted fully automatic firearms face a much greater degree of restriction than others because their guns are much more dangerous. They are designed and intended for military, not sporting uses.

The laws dealing with these types of firearms are tough, and I make no apology for that. Many other countries have already prohibited machine guns and other military firearms and more will almost certainly do so in the future.

These amendments will make it clear that these guns have no place in Canada. In 1978 machine guns were made prohibited weapons. There are now large numbers of machine guns in Canada that have been converted to comply with the 1978 law but which still pose a serious threat. They cannot fire automatically but they have other characteristics such as military design and large magazine capacities which make them a problem. In many cases they can be reconverted to machine guns without great difficulty.

The amendments will allow those who now own such firearms to keep their guns, subject to restrictions on transfers to others. The only legitimate reason for wanting a converted machine gun is for a gun collection, and the amendments will only permit collectors who already own them to register them.

The amendments also include a definition of a genuine gun collector and will establish quite significant criteria and standards which must be met before someone can qualify for that category.

Before registering such a firearm, the police would ensure that it has been converted satisfactorily. I recognize that these individuals have obtained their guns legally and will now, in some cases, be unable to sell them. What the law will do is allow those who have these guns to keep them and to sell them to others who also already own similar ones. As these owners die or lose interest in their firearms, the guns will be forced out of circulation so that future generations of Canadians will not be faced with them.

These proposals are the best possible solution. I might add that this was the approach to grandfathering that was taken in 1978 with respect to automatic firearms and it has worked well, because in order to retain those firearms people have had to be brought into the system to be registered. They are known to the policing authorities and it gives us a much better handle on what firearms are there. Standards can be imposed for safe storage and safe handling and that, I think, has worked very well with respect to those firearms. That is a closed class. Those firearms will go out of circulation as will the converted automatics.

These proposals take into account the property interests of present owners who obtained the guns legally, but most important, the interests of all Canadians which require that they be taken out of circulation entirely.

[Translation]

When I initially introduced Bill C-80, I indicated that it was also my intention to designate other types of military or paramilitary firearms as restricted or prohibited weapons.

This is intended to restrict the availability of the most dangerous firearms, and at the same time, underscore the traditional Canadian idea that firearms in society are more properly regarded as tools for hunting or sporting purposes and not weapons for personal or civil defence. These roles are very capably performed by the police and the armed forces of Canada, and should not serve as a justification for the private ownership of firearms.

It is not my intention, however, to restrict or prohibit every single type of firearm that has ever seen military service. I recognize that many older-style military guns have seen valuable service as hunting firearms.

What I am concerned about, and what the legislation seeks to control, are modern military firearms that contain high firepower, fast-firing mechanisms, large capacity cartridge magazines, and other characteristics that make them very dangerous weapons, and have little or no place in legitimate sporting activities. Where there are relatively few legitimate uses for these firearms, they would be prohibited altogether.

Where they are used for some forms of legitimate target shooting activity, they may be designated as restricted weapons, which would allow the activity to continue, but protect the public by registering and tracking the guns and their owners.

[English]

I want to reassure those who own obsolete military firearms such as the Lee Enfield that this proposal is intended to reduce access to the most modern semi-automatic military assault weapons.

Older models do not differ significantly from many common hunting rifles. There would be no point prohibiting or restricting these firearms and this government has no intention of doing so.

The Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms, which combines expertise and viewpoints from all sides of the firearms issue, is currently considering criteria for identifying military type firearms and will be reporting to me in the near future.

A number of the members of the advisory council, as firearms users themselves, have already pointed out the sporting applications of older military surplus guns. While I cannot predict the criteria the council will put forward, I am sure that it will reflect the necessary balance.

I would also point out that the final decision will be that of the government. The council is advisory, but the final decision will be made by the government. Those regulations will have the opportunity to be reviewed by this House.

There are many similarities and differences between military and sporting firearms. In trying to identify military guns, the law will have to pay close attention to the differences. Those guns that are clearly of a military nature will be dealt with as I have explained.

The most critical difference is the capacity of the cartridge magazine. The addition of a large magazine can convert almost any ordinary semi-automatic hunting rifle into an assault weapon. This legislation will designate large capacity magazines to be prohibited weapons.

It will also allow the Governor in Council to specify the types of magazine that will be limited and the capacity limits to be applied.

Limiting the size of magazines will supplement the other measures by placing effective limits on the fire-power of guns that are on the borderline between military and sporting applications.

The previous proposals would have placed controls on magazine capacity, and the same limitations will also be imposed under the legislation now before this House.

If these amendments become law, I will be developing regulations that will limit the capacity of magazines for semi-automatic handguns to 10 shots, and will limit the capacity of magazines for centrefire semi-automatic rifles to five shots, exactly as I proposed in the context of Bill C-80.

The fire-power of non semi-automatics and rim-fire .22 calibre rifles does not represent a problem. Magazines for these firearms would not be limited at all.

I also recognize that there are those who engage in legitimate target shooting competitions which normally use magazines that would become prohibited under the proposal. Where involvement in such an activity is established, these persons will be permitted to retain their magazines for competitive purposes. The controls will be strict, however.

Competition activities must be sanctioned and those who take part will only be permitted to keep magazines that are required for suitable types of firearms and firearms which they actually own and possess.

I also recognize that many semi-automatic firearms cannot be used without the magazines designed for them. Collectors and other persons who have large magazines will be permitted to keep them provided that they are modified in an approved manner to reduce capacity to an acceptable limit. The regulations will be worded in such a way as to make this a practical option.

This is similar to the requirements in some provinces to limit semi-automatic hunting rifles to three shots under the terms of a hunting licence. In other words, the practice of blocking off some of the chambers in a magazine to comply with a legal limitation on a number of shots is well established already in Canadian society. We will try to establish standards of conversion that are both effective but also practical to implement.

• (1050)

[Translation]

The gun control system treats all handguns as restricted weapons, and requires that they be registered individually. The present system of permits for possession and use has proven effective at reducing handgun shootings, but it does create obstacles for legitimate shooters.

Some degree of inconvenience is inevitable, if gun control is to be effective at all, but I have attempted to remove unnecessary red tape wherever possible.

The bill will address some of the administrative concerns of handgun shooters by creating three new permits for restricted weapons.

[English]

The permit to carry, which is required to take a handgun to shoot at a range, will be expanded to allow more than one permit to be used for the same gun so that more than one shooter may share it. The holder of the second permit would be allowed to take the gun to a shooting range without having the registered owner present.

Competition organizers have raised concerns about the obstacles facing foreign shooters coming to Canada to take part in sanctioned competitions here. A new temporary carry permit will be created to allow these shooters to bring their handguns into Canada in order to attend sanctioned Canadian shooting competitions and to transport the guns to and from the point of entry.

A new temporary storage permit will also be created to allow a gun owner to store his or her handguns with another owner temporarily where it is unsafe or not practicable to store the gun at home, as is normally required. This will allow persons going on vacation, for example, to store their guns with a friend while they are away and is consistent with our emphasis on higher standards of safe storage.

As Canadian firearms owners are aware, a portion of the gun control system is enacted by a combination of regulations and Orders in Council made under the legislative authority of the Criminal Code. This combined approach makes for a better system for all concerned because it allows for flexibility and clarity which would not be possible using the statute alone.

I appreciate that this causes some concerns and the new legislation contains several safeguards for developing Orders in Council and regulations in the future. New Orders in Council and proposed regulations will be tabled in this House for consideration. When I referred the subject matter of Bill C–80 to the special committee, I suggested that it may want to consider putting some of the features that I proposed for regulation into the statute itself, but on careful consideration of the use of those two devices the recommendation was to continue with the proposed plan to use the regulations in addition to the statute in order to provide for specificity, clarity and some flexibility.

If a sufficient number of members of Parliament wish to do so, a resolution to revoke the order or proposed regulation may be put forward. All regulations and Orders in Council under Part III of the Criminal Code will be subject to this procedure. In the near future regulations or Orders in Council for a large number of important gun control matters will be reviewed in this way.

In particular, regulations or orders will be used to prohibit large magazines and designate some military firearms as prohibited or restricted weapons, to set new fees for firearms acquisition certificates and to establish clear, safe storage standards for all firearms owners. These are intended and will be used to create additional certainty and clarity in the interpretation and application of the gun control laws and amendments.

I am strongly committed to developing a stricter and more effective gun control system, but I also recognize that the process must be as open and as accessible as possible. This is an essential part of any democratic society, but it is also good common sense. Some members of this House have suggested that a parliamentary review of regulations will weaken the gun control system. However, the right of review is not open ended, but must be exercised within a particular period of time.

This government is committed to developing tough but workable controls. This requires public scrutiny of the process. The changes I am proposing are too important not to receive public and parliamentary review. Rejection of a regulation or Order in Council will require a majority vote of this House.

I am confident that the parliamentary review created by the new amendments will ensure that any proposed regulations help to create reasonable and workable safeguards within the general gun control system and I have confidence in the good sense of the majority members of this House.

Some Canadians have criticized these amendments. They have suggested that the proposals rely too heavily on regulations and Orders in Council and not enough on the statute itself.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the fundamental goal of gun control in Canada is to protect the public from firearms violence, while at the same time preserving the interests of legitimate firearms owners and users as much as possible. Regulatory powers are an important tool for this task.

The use of regulations allows the law to focus closely on the firearms, individuals, and situations that raise public safety concerns.

Regulations allow for flexibility in the law to achieve effective gun control in ways that can still permit legitimate activities to continue.

Statutory powers are much broader. Attempting to use them to accomplish regulatory controls on firearms would result in a much less responsive and effective gun control system.

This is why a number of elements of Bill C-17 combine statutory and regulatory components.

The essential elements of the gun control changes I am proposing today are in the legislation, not in the supplementary regulations.

Parental consent, references, and the 28-day waiting period for acquisition certificates are all in the Bill itself. The requirement for a safety course or test is not, because it is already in the Criminal Code. In fact, it has been since 1978.

The prohibitions of converted fully-automatic firearms and large capacity magazines are also in the Bill.

The prohibition or restriction of military or paramilitary firearms is not in the Bill. This is because the power to do this by order in council already exists in the statute itself. No statutory amendment was necessary.

[English]

Provisions in the bill will also increase sentences for firearms offences and will increase the use of court prohibitions to include bail and peace bond applications.

I consider all of these things to be key elements of the total package of changes I am proposing today and all of them are included in the bill itself. The other elements, some of which will be the subject of new regulations, are being developed and will be brought forward as soon as possible.

I have already stated the specific details of the types and capacities of cartridge magazines that will become prohibited weapons by regulation. I have already indicated that the regulations will specify a new FAC fee of $50. Regulations dealing with safe storage of firearms and criteria for identifying military or paramilitary firearms are being developed by the Canadian Advisory Council and I expect to have its proposals in the near future. Some of the questions raised are complicated. I want to be sure that the regulations are going to work before they are implemented. They must fit together into a comprehensive and effective package and this will require careful preparation and drafting.

I share the concerns of many members of this House that Canadians expect and deserve improvements of the gun control system as soon as possible. We must also be sure that the job is done properly. Hastily prepared regulations will benefit no one. My commitment is a matter of public record on which I expect to be held accountable. Provisions in a statute may languish for lack of proclamation as have the requirements for training prior to obtaining an FAC. Regulations have the same legal force as statutes and are the essential partners of legislation in a well structured regulatory scheme.

Gun control works. It is probably the oldest and most effective form of crime prevention law, not just here in Canada where it dates back to the last century, but in many other countries as well. It works by ensuring that only those who actually require guns for legitimate purposes can obtain them. Any Canadian who really wants or needs a firearm is free to obtain one provided that he or she can comply with the screening measures. These create some inconvenience for firearms users, but this is a small price to pay in exchange for protecting all Canadians from firearms violence.

Bill C-17 is the product of a long process. It is the product of many contributions from those concerned about gun control and public safety, from those who administer the present gun control system, from previous Ministers of Justice, from other parliamentarians and from those great many Canadians to whom firearms are an important part of their way of life.

[Translation]

It reflects a tough approach to gun control because this is necessary for gun control to be effective.

It reflects compromise and consensus because this, also, is necessary for gun control to be effective.

Gun control is, ultimately, the responsability of government. We in this House have an obligation to ensure that all Canadians have the best possible protection under the law.

• (1100)

But the firearms community must have some of the responsibility as well, and I am convinced that it can and will help us to ensure that we have the best possible system.

I am therefore pleased to be able to bring this legislation before this house, and I am grateful to all of those who have contributed to its development.

It is good, effective, workable, and balanced legislation, and I urge all members of this House to give it the support it deserves.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for bringing this legislation before the House in a reasonably quick period of time after the commencement of the new session. When asked when she was going to table the legislation, she said: "As soon as possible in the new session", and I think she has done that.

This bill before us is of tremendous importance to Canadians, certainly to the 80 per cent of Canadians who want stronger gun control and of course to those who do not feel we need stronger gun control.

It has been almost a year now since the minister first introduced the predecessor bill, Bill C-80, which did not have second reading in this House but instead had its contents referred to a special committee. At that time, I and other members of Parliament expressed our disapproval of this process. We felt Bill C-80 should be proceeded with, with the utmost dispatch, and that we needed in this country new gun control legislation as soon as possible.

That was not the case. We went to the special committee, and whether one would say that that was an improvement or not is history. I think what we have to look at, and certainly what we in the Liberal Party are looking at, is whether this legislation is an improvement over the legislation that exists at the present time. We feel that it is and, as such, we will be supporting this bill.

However, I do want to make a few comments that have been of great interest to me, of great concern to me. I will start of course with the special committee.

I would like to say, first and foremost, that at the least it was an interesting experience being a member of that special committee. I think that all members of the committee worked diligently in trying to put forward the best package possible. Certainly it was a compromise. We all knew it was going to be a compromise when we started. Nevertheless, it does not take away from the good faith of the members who participated in that committee.

While I want to thank all members of this House for their participation and their contribution, I particularly want to thank my colleague, the member of Parliament for Kenora—Rainy River, who I think did a tremendous job. He has a vast knowledge of firearms. He stated his opinions very clearly and concisely and without any hesitation. Through the contribution of that hon. member and other hon. members I think the report was generally well accepted. Certainly it was not considered the result that most people wanted, because some people thought it was too strong and others thought it was too weak. Then again, as a friend of mine who is a labour negotiator said, when you have an agreement in a labour dispute where both sides are not pleased, that is when you have a good agreement. Maybe this was a good report, in spite of what many would have us believe.

I do not feel that any Canadian should be threatened by gun control. I say that more now than I would have said before the meeting of the special committee. The objective of this legislation is to control access to firearms and ammunition in Canada and not to place excessive or undue restrictions on responsible gun owners. I think that has been achieved. The special committee addressed a lot of the concerns of gun owners, and the work of members of the committee such as my colleague and friend from Kenora—Rainy River indicates that.

For one thing, in Bill C-80 there was a lot of concern about the term device, that this was unduly restrictive, that this gave the government too much power over a person's rights, and that a device could be termed to be practically anything.

In fact, the Canadian Bar Association objected to that, and I think with a good deal of reason. It said that it was too broad, that a government should not have that kind of a broad scope within legislation and certainly within a legislative framework. The association said that it should be narrowed in scope so that we would have a better idea of what was intended and what was to be brought forward.

This point was studied by the committee, and I think the minister has made an improvement in Bill C-17 by restricting the scope of that to the actual aspect of the firearm itself. I think we have a better idea of what is intended and the actual freedom of rights of Canadians is respected by that change.

We heard from responsible gun owners and gun enthusiasts, be they hunters or collectors, that there was a concern about politicians not knowing enough about firearms. Of course, I felt they were immediately speaking to me because that could be very applicable. However, not only members of Parliament, but bureaucrats and people in particularly the Department of Justice who were framing these laws and who framing these regulations, wondered what right they had to say anything about my use of firearms. How do they know my responsibility? How do they know the intricacies of a particular firearm to say that it should be prohibited or it should be accepted?

That was considered by the committee and it was termed that the advisory board should be given more powers. I do not necessarily say as many powers as it has been given, but more powers to put at ease the concerns of people by having in its hands, the hands of the advisory committee, people knowledgeable in firearms. Not all of them—some of them come from every aspect of society—but many of these people have a vast knowledge of firearms. The concerns of people interested in firearms and the rights of firearms owners and users has to be respected by the vast authority given to the advisory board in this country.

We have heard from many people before the committee who said: "Look, you are punishing gun owners, but the real culprits are the criminals, and they are getting away scot-free. There should be stricter penalties for criminals". I think that was generally accepted as being the case by pretty well everyone in the committee and those who appeared before the committee.

The minister has increased the penalties in this legislation. We do have stiffer penalties and I think that is warranted. The use of firearms in a crime is a completely unacceptable activity, be it considered social or criminal or whatever; but this is totally unacceptable in our Canadian society at the present time. Crime is unacceptable, but certainly crime with the use of a firearm is even more unacceptable.

We also heard about the concerns of gun collectors. I will get to that more fully at a later period in my speech. However, certainly gun collectors felt that their rights were being abused; that we did not understand the significance of gun collectors; that this was a business; that these were people who knew guns, knew firearms, bought firearms, sold firearms not only in Canada but in the United States as well. They made their point and our report reflected that. The new legislation reflects it, but I am not completely in agreement with that reflection. I would like to say, as I said, more about that later.

There is a misunderstanding, to a certain degree, about young people and firearms, that young people in rural Canada in many cases use firearms from the time they are old enough to know right from wrong, and that they are instructed in the use of these firearms by their parents and friends. In most cases these young people are very responsible and use firearms to an excellent degree.

However, when dealing with young people there is still the questions: Do you really understand the full ramification of what you are doing and of what you have? There was a belief among many people that we would try to take firearms away from young Canadians. We said that if the parents are in agreement with their young people having firearms, then certainly the parents know the children much better than the committee does. This is the reason for the Firearms Acquisition Certificate for young people between 16 and 18 with parental consent.

We also discussed references. People do not like the idea of references. They feel they are an infringement, that people had to comment on their competency, their state of mind and their value as a human being or as a citizen, father or husband. Many people are reluctant to act as references because of this and because of the fact that by giving an opinion on somebody, and it is stated to be an approval and subsequently this person commits a crime, a homicide, more particularly, then this person could be considered as being liable because they gave a reference to this alleged misuser of firearms.

That position certainly warranted consideration by the committee. The minister, I am glad to see, has included this in the bill by making it non-culpable and these people will not be subject to charge under criminal proceedings for giving an opinion that turned out to be wrong. Presumably they did it in the best interest of serving the process and what they believed was the actual state of the person to whom the reference was given, and one could never prove anything else.

There is also the problem of recreational shooters. Canadians would no longer be able to compete in particular competitions because we were reducing the size of the clip to an unwarranted small number of cartridges so that they could not fire successively in the number that was needed to compete in particular competitions. By limiting the use of particular firearms, they could not compete, because some of the firearms they were using would be termed prohibited or ones that were completely frowned upon by society and ultimately would be termed prohibited by a further deliberation of the advisory board. The interests of the recreational shooters have been looked at.

Really, gun users in this country do not need to be concerned about their rights. I have heard it said that it would be ideal to do away with all semi-automatics. There was never, certainly in my party, the consideration that we would ban completely all semi-automatics. It is a simplistic solution to say that is what is going to be done. Certainly the question is going to be with the advisory committee. This party's position very strongly is that we are opposed to the use of military and paramilitary semi-automatic weapons. But that is not all semi-automatic weapons. Sometimes the line is very blurred between what is a paramilitary semi-automatic weapon and the other semi-automatic weapons. Sometimes it is just a matter of design. This is why the advisory committee is going to be looking into this question.

I can assure Canadians that this party is not going to be in any way negligent and will be diligent in following the regulations and deliberations of the advisory committee to determine what the response is going to be and to assure everyone that those military and paramilitary weapons which we feel are not useful for hunting, other than just as a fancy of a particular hunter, but no more useful to a hunter than any other semi-automatic weapon and that semi-automatic weapons, military, paramilitary, be prohibited weapons. I think that is in the interests of all Canadians.

Whether you can say that is in the interests of all hunters is another question. This is where we really have to look into this whole question. There are going to be weapons that are going to be considered prohibited. Certainly the bill talks about the automatic being converted to a semi-automatic mode. These will be prohibited weapons. They will join fully automatic weapons on the prohibited list. Also we hope to have military and paramilitary weapons prohibited.

The question is that there will certainly be a restriction on the use of particular firearms. That is not something that anyone would ask for unless there was a reason for doing so. The reason has to be in the consideration of the national interest of this country and to say that it is an infringement perhaps on the type of firearm that somebody may have at the present time, there is a need in this country to be responsive to the needs of Canada as a whole and to deal with this in the general interest.

In 1978 my colleague and friend, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce was the minister responsible for passing the gun control legislation in force at the present time. At that time it was an excellent piece of legislation. He received a lot of criticism that he was introducing a bill that would infringe on the rights of Canadians, that the Liberal government at the time was going to infringe on the rights of Canadians.

I think we have seen that this bill has been effective. This bill has reduced the number of homicides, accidental deaths, and suicides up to a period. Now we are seeing that violent crimes are on the increase and we are saying that the legislation that is in force at the present time, as good a legislation as it was in 1978, needs to be strengthened. The member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has been a very strong proponent of the strengthening of this legislation and I want to thank him for his contribution and his work on behalf of gun control in this country.

There is no question that firearm restrictions work and no one who is capable and responsible enough to own a firearm needs to be worried about excessive restrictions.

I do not feel that responsible gun users in this country have anything about which they should be concerned. I think that their rights as recreational shooters, as hunters, as gun owners will be respected. There will be a reduction in the type of firearms they can use. It is important in the interest of Canadians as a whole that this be done.

In 1989, I believe, there were 1,400 gun related deaths of which 1,100 were suicides. Homicides constitute about 15 per cent of all firearms deaths each year. A significant proportion of these deaths are the result of domestic disputes and crimes of passion. The minister has said quite honestly, forthrightly, and correctly that violent deaths and homicides are as much a part of rural Canada as they are of urban Canada, and the percentage of these deaths and homicides that are crimes of passion are in equal ratio in rural Canada as in urban Canada.

We were told in the special committee that as committee members we were bringing forward this legislation as a reflex action of the tragedy of École Polytechnique in December 1989. I will say to any Canadian that there cannot possibly be any member of Parliament who was not influenced by that tragedy; of course we were influenced by it. We were influenced by the tragedy of those young lives ending, of the trauma of those young people coming to a complete halt as a result of this completely incomprehensible action. We could not possibly be insensitive to the families who have lost these wonderful young women, to the community that could have benefited from the lifetime they could have given to the community and to this country as a whole. It is not something any of us in this House of Commons will ever forget, the senselessness, the tragedy, the loss.

I can honestly say, and I think I am speaking for all members of the committee, that what we formulated in the special committee was not just as a result of that. What that tragedy did do was to highlight the possibility of the misuse of firearms. We are not, even with this legislation, or stronger legislation, going to erase the misuse of firearms. We are not going to stop homicides, family disputes, crimes of passion completely, but I think we are going to reduce them. We are going to reduce them in number.

I use as an example the way these crimes and these activities were reduced after the passage of the existing legislation presented by my colleague, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. I think that we have to look at that. We have to say that all Canadians are concerned about firearms. Some who use firearms on a regular basis are not as concerned as others. There is one very large segment of this country that is concerned and that segment is the women of Canada.

I do not have to tell you, Madam Speaker, the fear that women in this country feel, that men cannot possibly understand. We hear about it. We have got to start listening. We have got to start listening to the women of this country and the concern that they have; women in this country who are petrified when they step off of a bus and have to walk a distance of maybe only one or two blocks to their apartment building; women who are petrified when they get into an elevator alone not knowing who is going to be on the elevator or who is going to be at the floor they want to reach.

This is something that most men cannot possibly understand, but it is a way of life for many women in this country, day after day after day. If they feel that their safety and the rights of Canadians and the general benefit of all of Canada is going to be strengthened by this bill, then I think this is something of which we have to be very cognizant.

However, I think that we could say that good gun control is all that is needed. A recent poll by Allan Gregg and Decima Research has shown that Canadians are very concerned about the increase of crime in this country. I think that gun control is important.

Other areas are very important. We have to look at the question of violence in the family; we have to look at violence against women; we have to look at the question of young offenders and their rights; and crime prevention in the communities. All this comprises a package which is of great concern to Canadians. Gun control is a large part, but we have to look at the whole subject. I am not sure that that is being done in a comprehensive manner.

We need also to erase the fears as much as we can. There are going to continue to be fears. A mark of a good government and a dedicated parliamentary body is that we do what we can to reduce the fears that exist as much as we possibly can.

I do not think these fears are being reduced as much as we possibly can. I do not think for instance in the bill—I think it is Bill C-12 now in its new incarnation—the young offenders, provides that. I agree with longer periods of incarceration but incarcerating young offenders with adult criminals is to me a barbaric situation. I do not want to get into that bill, but I do want to say that if we do not look at the whole picture of crime prevention in this country, we are not doing our job as parliamentarians.

I would also like to state that I feel that a great deal, too much frankly, is being left to the Advisory Council on Firearms. I think it is important that it use every discretion.

The reason I am concerned is because of the 15 who are appointed, probably 10 would be considered as more sympathetic to the use of firearms than the other five. I think there has to be a balance, and I would hope that the minister would keep this in mind.

We have to reassure the users of firearms that their rights are being protected. We also have to respect the rights of all Canadians, particularly the citizens of this country who are concerned about the increasing crime rate in Canada.

I would ask the minister to look at this and ensure that this advisory committee will reflect the needs of this country.

I would also like to ask the minister to present the regulations to the committee when this bill gets to the legislative committee.

She may not have them all completed, but I would like to see the regulations that have been completed and formulated so I can give consideration to these regulations.

I am very concerned about shell legislation. I am not saying this piece of legislation is a shell legislation. However, we have to watch out for the tendency to have just the absolute minimum in a piece of legislation and to put as much as we can into the regulations, so that they can be changed by Order in Council and do not have to come back to Parliament.

I do not say that this is the case here because, for one thing the regulations are going to be referred back to the House of Commons for consideration. I think that is very important.

I do not feel, as the minister does not feel, that this is a threat to anybody because I feel that most members of Parliament reflect the opinion of Canadians in general.

That is, 80 per cent of Canadians favour stronger gun control. Whether they favour stronger gun control than they are going to get in this legislation, the poll did not answer that. They wanted stronger gun control compared to the gun control legislation that existed at the present time. This, of course, is stronger.

My own personal feeling is that there are things that could be changed. It is not the intention of this party to ask for a two-year firearms acquisition certificate.

As the minister has said, we can get too bound up in the paperwork and the actual bookkeeping and not leave time for other very important supervisory and research ideas, regulations and requirements in the issuance of the firearms acquisition certificate.

I also say that the $50 fee does not represent merely a sum of $50. It was determined when we were in the special committee that this is what we believe the cost of supervising the review process, the FACs and related activity will be.

If the advisory committee feels that this process can be carried on for less than $5 per person, then fine. I have no objection—nor does my party—to a reduction. However, the question of this being a figure which is reasonable to pay for the process is important.

Unfortunately the minister has relaxed the requirement of the training provision to too large an extent.

Page 22 of the bill goes on in the first part about the successfully completed process. In the second section it states:

> (ii) been certified by a firearms officer as meeting the criteria of competence in the safe handling and use of firearms and the laws relating to firearms prescribed by regulations.

This means that if a firearms officer feels that this person is certified and does not need the training program he or she can give an exemption.

• (1130)

It does not say that this is somebody who has owned a firearm for a certain period of time. It does not say that this is a person who is going for a second FAC. It could be somebody who is just applying for the first time. It is far too broad.

The training program is something that everybody who appeared before the committee and everyone to whom I have spoken feels is a very worth-while thing. We need to train the users of firearms. This has received almost universal approval and I think the minister has to make changes to strengthen this program, to ensure that this training takes place, except in strictly defined areas where the minister feels there should be an exception. What those exceptions are is open to question. Certainly the exceptions should not be as broad as this act allows.

It is vital that the minister use every bit of influence and persuasion on the provinces that she possibly can to implement these courses as soon as possible. I realize it is a provincial jurisdiction, but it is in the interests of all Canadians and all governments, be it federal or provincial governments, that this whole question be looked at. We should have a training program implemented from coast to coast to coast in this country as soon as possible.

If we do not have suitable training programs, not only do the applicants lose the instruction and the knowledge they would gain from that program, but the instructor will not have the ability to weed out somebody that he or she feels should not own a firearm. It is very important that not only is there an instruction consideration but there is also the consideration of the person who will be the possessor of a firearms acquisition certificate.

Safe storage is important. The minister considers this in the bill and that is very important. The problem, of course, is enforcement of safe storage. That is going to be difficult generally because a lot of the firearms are not registered and it will be difficult to know who has them. Also, there is the question of somebody who has a firearm which is not registered having a regular visit from an official to check as to whether his or her firearm meets the criteria. I certainly hope that one of the criteria will be a trigger lock on all firearms. That would be helpful.

It is also helpful that, whether or not safe storage can be monitored and inspected at all, there still be penalties for breach of safe storage. However, it is going to be awfully hard to implement, awfully hard to prove.

This brings me to the other consideration, the genuine gun collector. Now, it was the intention—as I understand it, my intention—that a gun collector be defined as a specific group of people who understand firearms, buy firearms, sell firearms and deal with them in a responsible way. For many people it is a business. They have invested a good deal of money in their collections. A definition of a gun collector to me has those connotations.

To be even more specific, the term genuine gun collector was used so there would not be any doubt as to the type of person to whom we were referring. This is my own subjective perception of what went on in the committee. There may be others, of course, who disagree but that is my own understanding, the reason being that we wanted the prohibited firearms to be restricted. We wanted the restricted firearms not to exist in every home where they are at the present time, but to be restricted, to be restricted in use and as to where they could be located.

We wanted a particular level of safe storage for gun collectors. The way this definition is set forward, it states that this could be an owner of one or more related firearms, or one person who intends to buy related firearms. This means that a person can own one firearm and be a genuine gun collector. If you go to the post office and buy a stamp, that does not make you a stamp collector. This is a very vital distinction. This definition is too broad. We want, through the gun collectors who will sell these prohibited firearms to other gun collectors, there to be a certain restricted number. We also hope that they will take these prohibited weapons into the United States to gun shows and sell them there, and then they will be out of the country.

I think it is important to make that distinction. I would ask the minister to consider a change to this definition to make it a stricter definition.

I would also like to speak to the minister on amnesty. I think these periods of amnesty that the minister brings forward in the act are very important. There should be an amnesty after this legislation comes into effect. There should also be an amnesty after the advisory board states that certain military and paramilitary firearms are prohibited. I also feel that there has to be consideration to financial compensation for some of the firearms that are turned in.

A lot of these firearms, except for the case of automatic weapons which have been prohibited since 1978, are owned completely legally at the present time. If they are $500, $600 or $700 apiece, then we are asking the individual to come forward with a donation of $600 or $700. There are a lot of people who say that the people who own these firearms should not be compensated, that they should not have these firearms. However, it comes to the question of rights of Canadians. Whether you like these people or whether you like their firearms, they are abiding by the law. If you say retroactively that they are criminals, then I think this is an infringement of their rights.

The amnesty may see a lot of these automatics, converted automatics and subsequently military and paramilitary weapons being brought forward, but it may not as well. What will happen? A lot of these prohibited weapons will not be registered. They will merely be kept in the homes of Canadians and we will not know about them.

What we want to do is get these firearms in. We do not want them left. We want to give owners an opportunity, if we can. I would ask the minister to consider that possibility because we do want to make this bill as effective as it possibly can be. To be effective, we have to look at what we feel are going to be the results.

This is human nature, and I think it is a reality to think about and to look at this aspect. I would, as I say, ask the government to look at this.

My major concern with this legislation is something the minister mentioned, but not in the context that I feel it needs to be mentioned at the present time. She talked about customs and having stricter penalties for those who illegally bring firearms into the country and sell firearms. I think that is important and necessary as far as it goes, but within this country there is a large problem at border crossings as the minister will know. Each year we import about 130,000 firearms and about an equal number come into this country unlawfully. Unless we do something to curtail the illegal importation of firearms into this country, we are not going to have effective legislation. There have to be new enforcement procedures at border crossings and there has to be more attention paid to the unlawful importation of firearms into Canada.

I would ask the minister, when she speaks to the legislative committee on this, whether she can help the committee understand if this is in fact going to be a concern of government and if government is going to turn its attention to this problem. I think it will.

While this bill is not everything I would like to see, I do feel it is an improvement over the legislation we have at the present time.

I commend the minister once again for bringing it forward. It was not brought forward too soon and it cannot be passed too soon. Those who want to appear before the legislative committee will have every consideration, as far as I am concerned. I hope it is the minister's intention to allow large numbers of people, not unduly large, but a large cross section of this country to come before the legislative committee to testify. I think that is important. That voice is necessary. That is why we in this party are agreeing to pass this legislation on second reading as quickly as possible.

To Canadians, whether they are in favour of gun control or not, I would like to say that there is not going to be any legislation which is going to be weaker on gun control than this brought before this House. I would say that there is no threat to responsible gun users. It meets in a minimum way the requirements of Canada for the safety of the Canadian public and the needs of all aspects of our society. We in this party will support this legislation.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, just before I begin, I wonder if I could have the indulgence of the House. I have 20 minutes to speak, but I may go over for a few minutes, not much more. I would like to ask that at the outset. I will not abuse that.

We in the New Democratic Party welcome this debate. For some time we have been pressuring the government to bring in effective and fair gun control legislation. We regularly demanded a second reading of Bill C–80, which is the predecessor of this bill. Even though, in our view, this Bill C–17 is at best a modest proposal, it is something to build on and it can be improved as it goes through the legislative process.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, Canadians generally want to reinforce our present gun control system. Unlike the American, the Canadian frontier was not opened with a gun.

In the Canadian West and the North, you checked your guns with the RCMP, and even the police were under orders not to draw their weapons unless absolutely necessary. Canadians do not believe that the gun solves all problems. Our people want stricter and more effective control of firearms.

[English]

The Canadian approach to the role of firearms and the use of violence is a fundamentally different approach than that found in the United States. This is a real cultural characteristic of Canada and something we can be proud of.

In the United States the use of guns is widely seen as a right. In Canada gun ownership has long been considered a privilege. The history of the Canadian system of gun control dates back not just to 1977-78 but to 1877 when a law was introduced to prohibit the carrying of handguns where there was no reasonable cause to use them for self defence.

As I said a moment ago in French, the west and north were settled peacefully in Canada without the use, by and large, of weapons.

During the debate in the United States on the Brady bill, some very interesting facts were revealed. In the United States, 23,000 people were killed by handguns alone last year. That is 64 people a day. Every day in the United States there are three accidental deaths from handguns alone.

In short, I think Canadians are right to think that our gun control system has made our society less violent. Gun control works and the reasonable extension of gun control without the creation of needless bureaucracy for hunters and trappers is our goal in this debate.

I believe that Canadians want effective gun control. I believe there is a consensus from all sides in this country for effective gun control.

I just want to say something about the chronology of this debate over the last few years, because it helps us to understand where we are at and where we are going.

In 1978 the current gun control law was passed in the House of Commons. I see the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who was the minister at the time, is here today. Without going on too much about it, he is one of the members of this House that I very much look up to. He has made an enormous contribution to this House and this country and it is very interesting that he is here today.

An hon. member: He is not a bad hockey player.

Mr. Waddell: My friend says he is not a bad hockey player, too.

That bill is worth looking at. It is the present law. The provisions enforcing mandatory firearms training in that bill, I point out, have not been affected. That is a part of the bill I would still like to see come into force. However, let us look at the bill and the present law.

The 1978 law prohibits automatic weapons. The 1978 law restricts some weapons, including hand guns. The 1978 law makes it mandatory to have a firearms acquisitions certificate and to meet certain criteria to get that certificate, although rather weak criteria I must say. There is a theory stated in the bill that there should be mandatory training before buying a gun. That has not been enacted yet. It really is basically an acquisition system. People who had a gun before 1978 are not involved and people can still get, after 1978, as many guns as they want. Less than 1 per cent of the firearms acquisition certificate applications are turned down. It costs you 10 bucks for a certificate for five years. So, it in itself is a very modest system.

In January, 1989, about a decade later, in Stockton, California a man who said he had a "military hang-up", armed with an AK-47 semi-automatic assault rifle and two pistols, fired 110 rounds from the rifle and killed five children and injured 29 others. This was an indication, it seems to me, of the more and more violent society we have in North America. The state of California responded to the tragedy by banning the sale, possession or manufacture of some semi-automatic weapons. On March 14, 1989, President Bush announced a suspension of the importation of assault weapons. The United States, in some aspects, back in 1989 had a law more advanced than we had with respect to these kind of semi-automatic weapons. That was the impetus for new tougher laws in Canada and was the beginning of the government's commitment, through the previous Minister of Justice, to a tougher gun control law.

In June 1989 the government indicated its intention to introduce fall legislation controlling the importation, possession and sale of semi-automatic and automatic weapons. It received agreement at the federal-provincial ministers' meeting to do that. Then, in December 1989 we had the terrible tragedy at École Polytechnique in Montreal in which 14 young women needlessly lost their lives. In April 1990 a petition was presented to the minister by the students at the École Polytechnique with 516,487 names on it. That total would reach 700,000.

On June 17, 1990, the minister introduced Bill C-80. She announced her firm intention to push the bill through. The intention was not as firm as all that because the bill came to second reading in the House and the bill was diverted to a committee for further study. I will not say any more about that. The fact is that we have the bill back before us.

The committee met and produced a report under the chairmanship of the member for Kitchener. I was proud to be a member of that committee and I would like to acknowledge the work of fellow members on that committee, all of whom did an outstanding job. The member for Rosemont from the Bloc Québécois also attended the committee and contributed as much as he could to that committee, not being an official member. However, he did show up and contribute and I would like to acknowledge that and the efforts of other members as well.

The committee produced legislation which is now Bill C-17.

Let me deal with Bill C-17 which I have called a modest proposal. Bill C-17 is a somewhat complex proposal. All of us in the debate have received a large number of letters of concern. Many people have really misunderstood the legislation. They think their gun is going to be taken away or they are going to be more affected than they really are. I will give an example.

I had a letter from one of my constituents saying "I am going to be affected". I called the person and found out that he had in fact a non-semi-automatic gun with a bolt action. He was concerned about the magazine size under the regulations in this bill and he felt he would have to dismantle his gun. It was not true. That was not part of the bill. The magazine size only applies to semi-automatics. It seems to me that we all have a job to do in this House to explain to Canadians just exactly what is in the bill and what is controlled.

First of all, the bill prohibits automatic weapons that have been converted to fire in a semi-automatic mode. These machine guns—and basically they are machine guns—have been brought into Canada in large numbers. The estimate is 15,000 to 50,000 guns in Canada at present. The existing weapons are grandfathered to the present owners. I am glad the minister did not accept the recommendations of the committee. In fact, the department accepted the minority report of the committee not to extend that grandfather. It is bad enough that there is a grandfather provision, but at least it was not extended as the committee wanted to do. There is the first thing: a prohibition of automatic weapons that have been converted to fire in semi-automatic form.

Second, it prohibits a semi-automatic military assault weapon. This is done by regulation and it is not dependent on the bill. As a matter of fact, the minister has the power to do that, I think, under the 1978 law, the old law, and we are still waiting for that.

The problem is this Rambo culture that is growing in the United States where these military assault weapons were produced in surplus by the war machine industries in the United States. Some of them are flowing across the Canadian border. This is what we are aiming at, not at ordinary hunters and trappers in Canada but at this kind of Rambo culture industry that is flooding these weapons into Canada. This is what we should focus on.

There is a real question, however, even after this bill about the Rugez Mini-14. That is a high-powered rapid fire gun. It was used by Marc Lépine, incidentally, in the Montreal massacre. Will it in fact be restricted? Will it be prohibited under this bill?

It will depend on the regulations. We will have to wait. However, the point I am making is that—and I want to repeat it—these are the only firearms whose status is affected by this law. These are the only firearms. It is only the future firearms that are imported. The present ones will be grandfathered and one will be able to sell them to genuine gun collectors. This is a very modest proposal indeed. It is a modest bill. I suggest the minister have a look at the bill. She will see it is a very modest proposal.

Third, there is a prohibition on large capacity magazines. That is the other area people are concerned about. There has been more confusion about this proposal than anything else. Again, it is going to be done by regulation with the enabling power of this bill. The limits are as follows: all semi-automatic handguns, a 10-shot limit. This is what the minister has proposed. All centre fire semi-automatic rifles and shotguns, five shots; 22 rim fire rifles, no limit. All bolt, pump or leverage action firearms, no limit.

Therefore, it seems to me that only semi-automatics are affected by this provision. I say to the people who are writing us: "Have a look at actually what is in the bill".

There was a concern expressed by several firearms groups that this proposal would lead to the destruction of thousands of rifles with built-in magazines. However, evidence presented to the special committee shows that of 2,600 makes and models of shotguns and rifles on the market, only 28 are directly affected by the limits. Of these, 26 are military style semi-automatics such as an AK-47. These are precisely the kinds of weapons the limits are supposed to target. Only two weapons, versions of the Marlin Camp carbine, would require modified magazines.

This proposal is an alternative to a ban on all semi-automatics. That is what some groups were advocating. It is a means of limiting fire power.

I remind you, Madam Speaker, that Marc Lépine had a 30-round magazine. The feeling is if that at least could have been limited it might have saved more lives.

There is an exemption here for competition shooters. I have flagged that to have a look at that exemption in committee, again the point being that this is a very modest proposal.

Fourth, in the bill there are changes to the FAC, the firearms acquisition certificate screening process to improve screening: two references, a photograph, a $50 fee, a 28-day cooling off period, and a mandatory training program.

Fifth, safe storage is to be applied to all firearm owners. A genuine gun collector is defined. It seems to me that the genuine gun collector may be a major loophole in the system today. We will have to look at that proposed definition in committee to ensure that it is sufficient. It is a possible area for amendment. I would like also to flag the storage problem. We have got to be flexible on this, deal with it in committee and define it better.

Sixth, there are tougher penalties for firearm usage, although there is not, as the committee recommended, a section 85. That would mean higher minimum sentences for criminals using guns in the course of an offence and, if there is plea bargaining, would ensure that the Attorney General actually does not make it easier for someone who used a gun in a criminal offence. That was not accepted in the bill, although it is in the committee's report.

Finally, there is a parliamentary review of the regulations.

I think it is a modest proposal. The FAC process is strengthened, but no one I think can really call it onerous. There are two types of Rambo weapons which will be prohibited, but only in the future, and the existing weapons will stay. Fire power on semi-automatic weapons will be limited somewhat, so I think it is a modest proposal.

If we were really serious about gun control, really serious, the government would go after all those machine guns, semi-automatic guns and military style weapons, and would really nail them and get them out of this country. There is a lot of wrapping ourselves in good intentions and a little bit of posturing on this. We should really look at this bill again as to how modest it is. We could have gone further.

It was proposed, for example, that there be a registration system and that every gun control supporting group, including the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Police Association, the Caucus of Big City Mayors, the Coalition for Gun Control, the students at Polytechnique, hospital associations and so on. They came before the special committee. The minister's officials said that such a system of actually registering all the guns that are in Canada would not be worth the effort. I find that rather incredible.

[Translation]

Personally, I made the following proposal in my report on gun control. Since the restriction on semi-automatic weapons under the present law would effectively prohibit hunting activities, I recommend that all unrestricted, semi-automatic weapons be registered as a separate class of firearms. All future firearms obtained using the FAC, would also be registered at the time of purchase.

Finally, every applicant for a FAC would be required to list all their firearms on the application. This would not place any additional bureaucratic burdens on firearms owners with non semi-automatic rifles who do not need a FAC at present.

This would move us toward a long term goal of a full National Registry System.

[English]

There are other weaknesses in the bill, but my time is limited.

I would just like to read a quote from Mr. Lorne Newson, the chief provincial firearms officer in British Columbia. I would like to quote from what he told the special committee: "In the first place, these people were very much aware that they were skirting the law by buying superficially modified machine guns. They are deserving of no sympathy." "I am concerned that grandfathering these weapons may overturn the present case law. Presently these guns are declared illegal by law and this bill may actually weaken them."

I want to conclude by saying that we have to look at gun control from differing perspectives. The gun debate is seen as a polarized one. You are either right or wrong, yet it seems to me that there are a number of different points of view. I want to underline three, just briefly.

First of all, I think women have a profoundly different attitude toward guns than men do. Women own only a small percentage of guns in Canada and commit only a tiny percentage of firearms related criminal offences. While women commit less than 5 per cent of firearms homicides, they are the victims of 30 to 40 per cent of such cases.

[Translation]

The massacre at the École Polytechnique focused public attention on the issue of firearms and violence against women. These are issues that have been around for some time.

Sixty per cent of all homicide victims are killed within a family context, and most often, rifles shotguns were used.

[English]

I said in my minority report on gun control that no one believes gun control alone is the solution to the problem of violence against women in our society. I think it is part of the solution.

Second, there is a distinct view in rural Canada. One of my members from the Kootenays put it very well. He said: "If a pick-up truck drove up Wellington Street outside the Parliament Buildings and had a shotgun or a rifle in the back, we would freak out. We would be asking, what is going on?" In rural areas of Canada that is quite normal and we must recognize that distinction. We must recognize that people use guns as part of their livelihood. We must recognize that bureaucracy does not work as well in rural areas, so in committee we have to look at safe storage, as well as other provisions.

We helped a little bit in the committee report giving some discretion to rural firearms officers to help rural people, and I think we have to have a further look at that.

I will point out that in rural Canada, a public opinion poll said that three-quarters of the people did support stronger gun control as long as it is effective and fair.

Third, aboriginal concerns. I draw the minister's attention to my minority report. I believe that the federal government is constitutionally bound to consult native people with respect to gun control.

In view of the Sparrow case, the Sioui case and other cases, it may well be that constitutionally and legally this bill and this regime may not apply to native people. This is a debatable question, but there should be concerns not only with the constitutional position of native people but at a minimum, native leadership and native people should be consulted, especially natives living in northern areas.

Finally, I have some other concerns which I will flag at committee. For example, I would like to make sure that the film industry in British Columbia is protected and we do not needlessly harm them with needless bureaucracy. That can be raised in the committee because they do use blank, automatic and semi-automatic guns.

I would like to give credit to the Coalition for Gun Control and the work that they have been putting out. That is the group led by Suzanne Edwards, Heidi Rathjen and Wendy Cukier.

I want to say that this debate is changing. If you read the editorials, you will see a lot of support for gun control. You will see them sharing the feeling that I enunciated that the bill is very modest, perhaps too modest. It is not a partisan issue and we have to deal with this.

When you see today: "Gun permits jump by 28 per cent in Toronto," our society unfortunately appears to be becoming more violent.

I want to tell the minister that what we have seen in the course of this debate and in the committee reports is that the people who want gun control, the lobby if you like, for that particular point of view has grown and matured very much. Traditionally there was a view that those who supported gun control were well intentioned but misinformed people. Those who were for less gun control, the gun lobby if you like, would try to bury you with so-called facts.

Now it seems to me that the gun lobby in many ways is sounding emotional and the people who want more gun control are sticking to their facts, are exploring the myths about gun control. Myths like, "guns do not kill people; people kill people". In fact, people without guns injure, people with guns kill. Myths like, "gun control legislation does not reduce gun violence". The fact is that gun control legislation saves lives. The myth that, "what is needed is crime control, not gun control". The fact is that easy access to guns contributes to crime. Look at the studies of Seattle versus Vancouver. Look at the statistics on homicides in Canada.

The myth that people need guns for protection seems to be growing in Canada. The fact is that a home is safer without a gun. These are the debates we are going to hear in the future. This issue is not dead. This issue is just beginning.

Let me conclude by saying that I believe that all Canadians want effective and fair gun control. At the committee stage we are going to make sure this is a workable bill for all segments of the country. We are supporting the bill at second reading. We put the minister on notice that we intend to improve the legislation in committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, this new gun control bill is very disappointing, and I think it shows a clear lack of political courage on the part of the Minister of Justice.

Nearly all legitimate requests from individuals and groups who support gun control were turned down, and most of the proposed measures will be very difficult to enforce. This bill seems more designed to soothe public opinion than to provide effective gun control.

The groups in question estimate that 90 per cent of the bill is about concessions to gun lobbies and only 10 per cent is about improving control measures as demanded by the vast majority of the public.

We were particularly disappointed in the refusal to introduce a firearms ownership licence that would make routine registration of firearms compulsory. We all know that this type of measure is absolutely necessary for genuine gun control.

How many firearms are there in this country? Today, no one can answer that question, and there is nothing in this bill to help provide the answer in the future. Who uses the firearms in this country? Today, no one can answer that question either, and there is nothing in the bill that will provide us with an answer in the future.

The minister expects us to believe the bill will improve gun control. She says quite candidly that she also wants to protect the interests of legitimate firearms users. Would registration unduly restrict their privileges?

The minister knows perfectly well that hunters, for instance, must meet far stricter criteria to exercise their hunting privileges. They have to get an annual licence and conform to very strict wildlife protection regulations.

For instance, in many parts of the country, there is a draw for moose licences. Every year, hundreds of thousands of hunters whose names are not selected are deprived of the privilege of hunting. However, hunters accept this practice because our wildlife must be protected.

One wonders why the minister is so timid about protecting public health. Practically all firearms owners I know would be perfectly willing to have firearms licensing and registration, and to pay the requisite fees.

• (1210)

The Minister of Justice knows perfectly well that this type of measure is badly needed. She has implied that the House will probably be asked to pass such a measure in the future. Why not do it now? Just because there is a very small but effective lobby of sellers and owners of firearms who consider that owning a weapon is not a privilege but a right. These people will not tolerate having this privilege subject to a minimum amount of regulation. They are a minority howerever, and this is unacceptable in any civilized society.

Another deplorable aspect of this bill is the procedure selected to exclude weapons we want to prohibit. There is always a risk that regulations are unable to keep up with the latest developments in technology, and they are difficult to enforce, especially for customs officers.

As the hon. member pointed out earlier, why is the weapon used by Marc Lépine at the Polytechnique still not prohibited, eighteen months after this tragic event? How can we tolerate this any longer, especially since this paramilitary weapon is already prohibited elsewhere, even in the United States, for instance in New Jersey?

There is a simple and effective method for changing all this. We must decide that from now on, only legal firearms may be sold in or imported into Canada. Any administrative delay would actually reinforce controls, and when in doubt, customs and the police could refer cases to the appropriate authorities.

Some people will say this will require creating an additional and costly bureaucracy, but why is it easier to import firearms from the United States than to import beer from Belgium? Why are there fewer controls on the purchase and use of firearms in this country than on the purchase and use of sleeping pills? It doesn't make sense.

As for the costs involved, they must of course be kept to a minimum, but not at the expense of public health. In fact, gun control lends itself admirably to the "user pays" principle. Incredibly, the bill fails to prescribe an additional fee for issuing licences and monitoring restricted weapons permits. Why should all taxpayers have to pay for these administration costs? Clearly this is something that will have to be remedied in committee.

Several other aspects of the bill will also have to be thoroughly reviewed. For example, the new regulatory powers regarding safe storage might seem adequate, but how could the minister argue that such regulations will be effective when we won't even know who owns firearms? The fact that there will be storage requirements might make people more careful about the way they store their guns, it would be a kind of education, but it is not, in any way, a real prevention policy.

This bill contains an insidious clause that should be denounced. The whole process of preparing regulations under this act will be done according to an exceptional procedure, which might limit greatly the scope of the act by opening the door to continuing pressure from the gun lobby. As a matter of fact, any proposed regulation or order in Council under this act could be challenged by 20 members or 15 senators who could force a debate and a vote to cancel the said regulation. Such a clause is an open invitation to the gun lobby to pursue its action with a minority of members and senators who oppose gun control.

The minister and the cabinet will hesitate for a long time before introducing regulations or orders in Council which could solidify this opposition to gun control and force a debate in the House. Consequently, this bill imposes self-censorship system on the cabinet which is totally unacceptable and which will lead to a continuing watering down of the required regulations. These clauses must be withdrawn from the bill.

In fact, the bill that is before us and that deals with arms exports and will enable Cabinet to decide to export arms to one country or another, contains no clause enabling members of Parliament to invalidate such provisions. It must be understood that this provision is unique in Canadian laws. I think that the legislative committee will have to ask the minister to backtrack on this issue.

Finally, this bill is an unacceptable step back, particularly as regards the prohibition of military or para-military firearms, since it provides for grandfather's rights in the case of present owners. The legislative committee will therefore have to undertake an in depth study in order to transform this rough draft into a real bill providing a legitimate and necessary control of firearms.

In concluding, I would like to mention that the only provision in this bill that deserves unanimous support is the one which provides that, from now on, courts will have to consider issuing prohibition orders regarding the release, on bail or temporary, when the offence was committed by using, attempting to use or threatening to use violence, and when a request is made for an order not to disturb the public peace.

This provision is a real improvement towards real prevention and one that would justify supporting this bill if the other provisions can be improved, notably the withdrawal of the power of revocation in the legislation.

It is still possible for this government to show political will by agreeing on legitimate amendments. I hope that the government will clearly demonstrate this will at the legislative committee. That is why I reserve my judgment until the vote on the committee report.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, if you would call the yeas and nays again I think some members were thinking of other things.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is possible that the Speaker was not speaking as loudly as I thought, as I was told earlier this day.

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been advised by the government whip that the vote is now postponed until Monday at six o'clock p.m.

Mr. Hawkes: Point of order. Is it the disposition of the House to call it one o'clock?

Mr. Nault: On the same point of order, it is my understanding that you had already called the members in. Are you deciding now to change your mind after you have already called the members in?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may answer the hon. member's question? If the hon. member checks the rules of the House, he will see that once the bells have started to ring the whip from the government or the whip from the Official Opposition can come to the Chair and ask that the vote be deferred. This is part of our rules.

Once the whip of either the government or the Official Opposition makes that request of the Chair, the Chair has no recourse in the matter but must defer to the request of either of the whips. At this time both the government and the opposition whips came to the Chair and asked me to postpone the vote until Monday at six o'clock p.m. So I do not have the choice. Those are our rules.

I think there had been agreement earlier that should we be finished with this business before one o'clock we would call it one o'clock and then come back at two o'clock. Is there agreement on that?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, the House will now be recessed until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 12.23 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

D-DAY ANNIVERSARY

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, today marks the 47th anniversary of D-Day: June 6, 1944, the day when the Third Canadian Infantry Division and the Second Canadian Armoured Brigade went ashore on Juno Beach to participate in the invasion which would achieve the liberation of western Europe from Nazi tyranny.

Canadians take pride in knowing that our troops were a major part of this armada. Over 15,000 Canadians, one-fifth of the total allied invasion force, established themselves on the Normandy beaches that day. Our army, navy and air force all played notable roles in the invasion.

Let us bless the memory of those Canadians who fought in this invasion. Let us bless those who did not make it home and were buried in Europe. Let us also bless those who went on to liberate the Netherlands less than a year later. All of them helped to restore freedom.

Mr. Speaker, 47 years ago the prospect of freedom came ashore in Normandy. Let us never forget those who were there for us on that day, and let us never forget those who died for our freedom on D-Day, June 6, 1944.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, the following statement was made by convicted murderer, Allan George Foster, after sentencing for the murder of three women while on parole. He said: "There is only one thing crazier than me and that is the system that allows me to do what I do".

Many Canadians have become terrified as a result of violent crimes not only by adults but by young offenders. Whether in a mall, a poorly lit street or a parking lot, women are worried about their safety.

One of the root causes of these violent crimes is our justice system, which either renders an all too short prison sentence or grants a too lenient parole.

I call upon the Minister of Justice to address this issue. Let us restore law and order in this country.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, today is the 100th anniversary of the death of Canada's first Prime Minister and first member of Parliament from Kingston, the Rt. Hon. Sir John. A. Macdonald, who is also being recognized at his grave site today in Kingston.

Perhaps, more than any figure in our history, Sir John A. Macdonald is recognized as the driving force behind Confederation. His unwavering conviction that Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia could become prosperous and strong by forming a political union under one flag, serves as a guide for us today as we review our constitutional agreements.

During his political career he was elected to the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada seven times and was Prime Minister for 19 years. He is truly the Father of Canada.

On the 100th anniversary of his death, I urge all Canadians to reflect on the trials and obstacles he overcame in order to forge a nation which today is one of the wealthiest in the world.

By capturing the spirit and confidence he held in Canada, we can continue to make our country prosperous and continue to uphold the proud legacy he left behind.

CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, according to a recent public opinion poll, 68 per cent of Canadians outside Quebec and 57 per cent of Canadians in Quebec favour holding a constituent assembly to resolve our national unity crisis.

Yet, at the same time, the Minister of Constitutional Affairs was quoted as saying: "The federal government has considered this and now, for several reasons, we have rejected the pure and simple option of a constituent assembly. We have reason to believe it would not be acceptable to Quebec".

Is it any wonder, then, that Canadians feel politicians are not responsive to their wishes and that they have lost faith in the political system and its leadership. If the Prime Minister is really looking for ways to restore the faith of Canadians in this House and in his leadership, he can start by establishing a constituent assembly as favoured by a majority of Canadians, both inside and outside Quebec.

REVENUE CANADA

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention that Revenue Canada is now withholding the goods and services tax credits from persons who qualified for the full GST rebate because they owe back taxes. It is my understanding that Revenue Canada is going back to collect 1986 taxes in order to receive back taxes of lower income Canadians who qualify for the full GST tax rebate. In other words, they are offsetting the GST rebate against back taxes that low income earners owe the government. And when I say low income earners, they are the ones who have the right to the full goods and services tax credit owed.

I don't know how many thousands of low income Canadians have had their rebates taken back to pay back taxes. Usually the rebate would only cover the interest on these back taxes. I think the Minister of National Revenue should spend the weekend and report to the House as to how many people are in involved in the taking away from Canadians of their GST credits.

QUEBEC'S REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, last week, the Liberal Party of Canada and the Bloc Québécois condemned the minister and member for Roberval, the Hon. Benoît Bouchard, and Conservative members for the Conservative government's involvement in regional development in Quebec's resource areas. Today, after abandoning Abitibi—Témiscamingue, lac Saint-Jean, the North shore and the Gaspé, those same opposition members are asking Ottawa for greater federal involvement in the economic development of the Montreal region.

Since 1985, the Conservative government has been constantly involved in regional development in Quebec and has implemented programs to improve the economic situation of Quebecers.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): One hundred years ago today a young Canada mourned the death of a political giant. Sir John A. Macdonald, Canada's first Prime Minister and a Father of Confederation, worked tirelessly to weave the fabric of a young land. From his dream of a national rail link to his battle against the veiled threat of treason of unrestricted reciprocity, Sir John A. shepherded a design for confederation that has held fast for over a century. "Whatever you do, adhere to the union", he stated, "We are a great country and shall become one of the greatest if we preserve it. We shall sink into insignificance if we suffer it to be broken."

Well, look around, Sir John A., wherever you are. Your contemporary successor is flouting your vision. When today's Prime Minister was first elected he trumpeted "Give us 20 years and you will not recognize this country". Sir John, seven years later we are at the brink of becoming, in your own words, "a country broken". I know, sir, you will agree when you look at your political contemporaries that they have no vision, and when there is no vision the people perish.

CANADA POST

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, now, more than ever, national symbols are vital to our Canadian identity. One such symbol, the heritage post office in Mossley, Ontario, is in imminent danger of disappearing. I was shocked to learn that at least 12 post offices of similar size to Mossley's have advertised recently for postmaster positions in Quebec and in other regions of Canada, as opposed to converting to a retail outlet.

Does Canada Post have different policies for the regions of our country? If so, why? Is that fair, Mr. Speaker?

Last year Canada Post amassed a profit of over $149 million. Does Canada Post really need to shut down the fourth-oldest post office in our country to improve its balance sheet? Don't the residents of Mossley deserve to keep their own Canadian national symbol, their piece of Canadiana, which they want to share with future generations of Canadians?

Will the minister change his decision?

MIDDLE EAST

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, as all people of good will seek justice and peace in the Middle East, we are shocked to learn that once again violence and conflict have erupted in the Middle East. This time the conflagration occurs between the old arch rivals, Lebanon, Syria and Israel. Questionable alliances have occurred between Syria and Lebanon during the last months, but now, seemingly unprovoked, Israel this week has launched air raid attacks on southern Lebanon. For more than a year, the UN has verified that no raids have emanated from the internationally recognized Lebanese border. Yet, in the Israeli attacks, Lebanese civilians and children have been left dead. In fact, it appears that the magnitude of these attacks surpass those of Israel's notorious 1982 attack.

• (1410)

In view of the very tense and fragile peace that is being sought in the whole of the Middle East, I ask our government to condemn these raids and to call upon the United Nations to intervene to prevent even greater tragedy from occurring.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe Environment Week is the right time to send a signal to Canadian industry that we support greater production and use of ethanol from renewable resources in gasoline blends.

This government can help create new domestic markets for this product by encouraging the use of Gasohol in federal government vehicles wherever it is available in Canada.

In so doing, we would also show our support for the recommendations of the recent report of the Standing Committee on the Environment.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, the Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights has published a document which reveals that children from Haiti are brought illegally and deceptively into the Dominican Republic to work on sugar cane plantations.

These children are promised high wages. Once they arrive they are forced to work as slaves, receiving low wages, working under inhumane conditions, and most shocking of all, they are prevented from returning to their homes in Haiti.

The International Labour Organization has been denouncing this blatant abuse of human rights since 1983.

This is nothing less than the trafficking of children. Worse still, according to the report, the Dominican Republic is involved in this through a state-owned sugar producer. This same government also ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child in January, 1990.

The Dominican Republic should respect its own law and convention. I ask the Government of Canada, in any deliberations with the Dominican Republic, to bring all influence to bear in having this monstrous system of child trafficking dismantled.

As a fellow signatory of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, we can do nothing less.

NATIONAL ENVIRONMENT WEEK

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, this is the twentieth anniversary of National Environment Week, and this year the theme is: "A Time for Action".

This week, many Canadians will take part in more than 800 activities across this country.

I take great pride in drawing your attention to the official opening of the first Canadian arboretum for rare species on June 9 in Joliette.

This initiative by the Association québécoise de lutte contre les pluies acides, in co-operation with the town of Joliette, will provide a major conservation park for tree species that are rare or on the endangered list. This unique concept reflects the commitment of the people of my riding to protecting our environmental heritage.

On this occasion, 1,000 Norway Spruce seedlings will be distributed to the public, I hope that the many activities organized, for instance, by the CARA and by the ACEF in Lanaudière will be a tremendous success.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the riding of Joliette have once again shown that they know how to organize and how to act.

D-DAY ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, 47 years ago today, freedom returned to the shores of Europe. June 6, 1944, D-Day, still rates as one of the most famous days in history. It marked the beginning of the end of Nazism and the brutality it represented.

Canadians can certainly look back to D-Day with considerable pride. All three of our services were involved in the masterly-planned invasion. Our seamen steered the landing craft and our naval gunners pummelled the enemy's beach defences. Our pilots helped to ensure that the allies had overwhelming air superiority when it really mattered.

Over 15,000 Canadian soldiers waded ashore on Juno Beach that morning, just one-fifth of the total allied invasion force.

By the end of the day most of them had reached their objectives, overcoming a combination of mines, booby traps, barbed wire, machine guns and hand grenades.

Over 350 Canadians were killed trying to reach their D-Day objectives.

Let us never forget that they forfeited their futures so that others would no longer be captives in their own lands.

Europeans have never forgotten D-day, neither should we.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I want to also add my voice to those who have brought before us the memory of the passing of Sir John A. Macdonald 100 years ago.

John A. would have been proud and delighted to see how much Canada has grown and prospered in those 100 years, to know that 100 years later, Canada, as judged by a recent United Nations study, is considered the second best country in the world to live in.

It was 130 years ago, in a speech delivered in 1861 that Macdonald cautioned: "Whatever you do adhere to the union. We are a great country, and shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it. We shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken."

Canadians have a great deal to be thankful for. We have accomplished much. This country united can accomplish a great deal more. There is, after all, first place and John A. liked being number one.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Today, when giving an interview to the press, the minister said: "Mr. Raymond Chrétien believes he is due for an apology. He shall let me know, and I will respond."

Is this minister, with this offer of an apology, saying that he has made serious errors in the handling of this case?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, specifically, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs a few weeks back made a statement on national television that he had received an apology from the senior public servant, Raymond Chrétien.

Will the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs do the honourable thing and take this opportunity in the House to correct this statement which he now knows is clearly untrue?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that matter was dealt with completely in committee this morning.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, it is not being dealt with publicly which is the place where that apology should be made.

I would go back to a final supplementary to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Again, in speaking to the press this morning, he said: "I regret all aspects of this matter," referring to the Al-Mashat affair. With the minister acknowledging these regrets, will this lead to an apology of all the ministers who are involved in unfairly blaming public servants, while taking no responsibility themselves for this very sorry affair that has been so bothersome to the Canadian people and to this government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to that question is no.

I want also to add another point, that is, I think the behaviour of members in this House in this matter has not led to a greater esteem for Parliament among the people of this country.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister.

On May 15 in this House, the Prime Minister said: "There were administrative errors made in the system for which apologies have been conveyed."

In view of the fact that Raymond Chrétien denies conveying an apology, will the Acting Prime Minister now on behalf of the Government of Canada acknowledge that that statement made by the Prime Minister on May 15 was inaccurate and misleading? Will he, on behalf of the Government of Canada and this House convey an apology to Raymond Chrétien?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, both my former answers apply.

That was dealt with in the House and in committee: no.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, in a report that was made public on May 15, it says: "Mr. Chrétien has apologized."

The Acting Prime Minister, on television, referring to Raymond Chrétien, said: "He obviously very much regrets what happened. He apologized to me."

These statements are misstatements. They are false. They are misleading.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I want it made very clear the questions that have just been asked by the hon. member's colleague have been allowed because they were in order. The question that the hon. member wants to pose may very well be in order. What is not in order are the accusatory words that have just been used in the preamble. The hon. member may want to put his question, and I will listen carefully to it.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, this government has made public certain statements that are inaccurate, according to Mr. Raymond Chrétien, the person who was accused of making or conveying an apology.

I am asking the government today in the House of Commons in a public way to convey an apology to a civil servant who has served this country for the last 25 years. In view of the inaccuracies in those statements by the Government of Canada, will it now have the decency and apologize to Raymond Chrétien?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question was answered earlier this day.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on March 12, Paul Tellier, the Clerk of the Privy Council, knew that former Iraqi Ambassador Al-Mashat had jumped to the front of the queue and was provisionally accepted as a retiree immigrant to Canada.

On April 8, Mr. Tellier learned Mr. Al-Mashat had in fact arrived in Canada, yet he did not tell the Prime Minister until April 30. In view of the fact that this minister blamed Raymond Chrétien and, for symmetry, David Daubney for not having alerted their bosses to Al-Mashat's possible presence in Canada, how can the minister explain this very clear double standard?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): What requires explanation are the leaks in logic and the very creative interpretation of other people's language used with some consistency by my colleague who has put the question. He knows that Mr. Tellier was before the committee, answered questions put to him when he was allowed to respond and that closes that matter.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it certainly does not close that matter at all.

I want to ask a question about another official of the Privy Council to the minister in his capacity as President of the Privy Council. The minister's Chief of Staff, David Daubney, said: "I was told that my name was put in for reasons of symmetry. I think essentially it was that given the surname of the official involved and his relationship to the Leader of the Opposition that they felt a political staffer should be offered".

I want to ask the minister: Does the minister stand by the statement of his Chief of Staff that they felt, they, the lynch-mob cabinet committee, should in fact be offering up a political staffer for symmetry?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there was no cabinet committee that acted in that way.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the minister is now saying that his Chief of Staff did not tell the truth.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Svend baby.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I have to remind the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, as I have had to remind other members on both sides of the House, including yesterday the right hon. Prime Minister, that this line of questioning is not easy for the Speaker, nor is it easy for hon. members.

The hon. member may have a question which is acceptable. But what is not acceptable are preambles which are hurling accusations that are improper either against anybody in this place or anybody outside of it. I ask the hon. member to be very careful and put his question and I will listen to it.

Mr. Robinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will put my question to Joe baby—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel.

Ms. Copps: He called him Svend baby.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Last night at a press conference, the minister's chief of staff, Mr. Daubney, indicated that he and Mr. Raymond Chrétien had been blamed in the Al-Mashat affair for reasons of symmetry. Why would the government want to blame two senior officials for reasons of symmetry? We know a minister or ministers made the decision.

Could the minister tell us which minister made such a stupid decision? Second, the minister knows that in all parliamentary systems like ours, in a case like this the honourable thing to do for a minister is to offer his resignation. Why has no minister in this government done the honourable thing so far?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the government's position was made quite clear in a paper tabled a few months ago about the issue of ministerial responsibility. A minister cannot be held responsible for matters that concern him if he was not informed. That is the case here. What we have here is a case of human error, errors of judgment and mistakes in the system. That is why the Parliament of Canada has formed a parliamentary committee to consider this matter, and I think the committee is still looking into this question—

I apologize for speaking French to my friend, Mr. Nunziata, but it is one of the official languages in this House, and I intend to speak French, even if they don't like it.

Ms. Copps: He should not use the French language like that!

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): I would like to give the minister another opportunity to speak French. But I think that he is going to be just as embarrassed whatever the language he uses.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know why Mr. Chrétien's name was added to that of Mr. Daubney. For reasons of symmetry?

Why do the government and the ministers, after stating publicly that errors were made by certain civil servants for which apologies were conveyed, when in fact none were conveyed, keep giving the impression that a civil servant made a mistake? They know full well that those responsible for this mistake did not convey any apologies or admit they did wrong.

Can the minister tell me, just for symmetry, if there should not be two ministers blamed for their incompetence, the same way the government tried to put the blame on two civil servants?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, these two individuals were mentioned because they were the two senior civil servants who were in charge, in this case, in the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Daubney was my chief of staff at the time at External Affairs and the mistake he made was to read and deliver a memorandum intented for the eyes of the then Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As for Mr. Chrétien, the Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, his was an error of judgement. He has let his minister travel to the Middle East while there was a controversy about Iraq. Although he was fully aware of what was going on concerning Mr. Al-Mashat, he did not breathe a word to his minister. He put the minister representing Canada in a situation where he could not be apprised of the case.

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

On May 14, at page 51 of Hansard the minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, this morning I made public a chronology of events explaining how this decision came about—The facts were disclosed this morning and we have been quite transparent about it all.

Mr. Speaker, we now know that material facts in the possession of the minister were omitted from the May 14 statement. Does the minister still stand by his statement of May 14 in the House?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thought these people were interested in finding out what happened but I have found out differently. The display of the opposition members both in committee and in this House reminds me of the days of the kazoo's in the Senate. I am not surprised.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. The minister has admitted participating in a meeting on May 13 which we know decided to omit certain facts and blame two individuals while ignoring the inaction of others and of ministers.

Surely the minister must see that this was wrong. Will he do the honourable thing and apologize to this House and Canadians?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, never will I apologize for having Canadians know what really happened.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. During the Canada-U.S. free trade talks, Canadians were fearful that the United States was after our fresh water and today our fears have been realized. A firm with United States links called Multinational Resources has announced today its intention to divert water from the North Thompson River, a major tributary of the Fraser, into the United States to serve the San Diego market. The governor of California days ago said that he was keen on buying Canadian fresh water.

Will the Acting Prime Minister stand in his place today and say to Canadians, and indeed to Americans, that this country will not divert its rivers wholly or partially into the United States, that Canadian rivers are simply not for sale.

An hon. member: Another alarmist in the NDP.

An hon. member: That is a Reform Party policy, not ours.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member never ceases to come in with a question about this every two months, usually quoting some American wish list which will go nowhere. In fact, the free trade agreement made it clear that bulk exports of water are not part of the agreement and will not be part of the agreement.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question concerning another free trade related issue is for the Minister of Communications. Traditionally, Canada and the U.S. have enjoyed relatively free movement of performing artists across our borders. Now the United States has imposed a barrier to Canadian artists performing in the United States as a protectionist lever in the upcoming trade negotiations.

I want to ask the minister whether he will acknowledge that such actions amount to a pre-emptive strike against Canadian cultural industries? Will he advise what remedy he has sought? Will he assure us that Canadian culture will not be used as a bargaining chip to be bargained away in the upcoming trilateral negotiations?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should remember that the Minister for International Trade already said that just a few days ago.

More important, I am very interested to hear the NDP now talking about the value of free movement of people back and forth across the border as a result of the free trade agreement.

I have been concerned, as indeed my colleagues have been concerned, about the lack of free movement in the past for performing artists into the United States from Canada. It is a concern. We have expressed that concern and are continuing to work on it, but we also will make sure we keep in place the free movement of people and of businesses under the free trade agreement.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. On May 14 the Acting Prime Minister said on national television, speaking of Raymond Chrétien, the following: "He obviously very much regrets what happened. He has apologized to me and I say that ends the matter."

It does not end the matter because we know that the minister and Raymond Chrétien have not spoken together even to this day. Therefore it is impossible that Raymond Chrétien apologized to the minister.

My question is the following. Will the minister not take advantage of this opportunity now in Parliament and before the people of Canada to set the record straight, to indicate there was no apology, personally or indirectly to the minister and that to the extent the minister inadvertently, or any other way, misled the people of Canada, inadvertently or any other way maligned Mr. Chrétien, he apologizes for that. Do the decent thing, Joe.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question was raised and answered in committee this morning.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister this question, given that his statement of May 14 was made on national television potentially to millions of Canadians. The statement claimed an apology that never happened, a conversation that never took place. Given the importance of the credibility of this minister, the integrity of this minister, will he not now clear the air for his own sake and for the sake of decency for Raymond Chrétien?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Chrétien knows, because I am sure he was paying attention to the testimony in committee this morning, that if he has a request to make of me he has only to make it. He has not made it.

With respect to the committee in which these questions were first posed today, I remind the House that that committee was established at the explicit desire of this House to provide a parliamentary opportunity so that the facts could be known.

I think what is becoming increasingly clear is that while it is possible for the facts to be known in that committee, it is not possible for dramatic and sometimes misleading statements to be made on television, which is why the opposition keeps repeating these questions here in the House. They are interested in a sound bite, they are not interested in the facts.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council.

This morning he told the press that he would be reviewing the transcripts of Mr. Shortliffe's statement about Mr. Chrétien's unsubstantiated apology. Has the minister spoken to Mr. Shortliffe since making this commitment? When will he review the transcripts?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have done both.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Will he review carefully the statement of ministers of May 14, which makes public an apology to ministers on the part of Mr. Chrétien and Mr. Daubney? Does it make a difference to this minister that this statement of apology on the part of Mr. Chrétien was made public in spite of the fact that Raymond Chrétien says he did not apologize.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): I do not want to stray into the area of testimony in committee, but I think the hon. member was there. She will know that Mr. Shortliffe, when faced with questions of this kind, indicated that Mr. Chrétien knew what would be in the statement issued the next day.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Business people across the country have pointed out yet another problem with the goods and services tax. When customers charge the purchase of a product to their credit card, the fee which the merchants must pay to the bank is calculated after the GST is added. This means that the banks will earn income in excess of $60 million this year at the expense of the merchant, as a result of the GST.

Will the minister justify this added expense to small business people? Why should small business be shoring up the profits of banks at this time of high business failures?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, they used to do that on 13.5 per cent, now they are doing it on 7 per cent. But we will be happy to look at it.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, my supplemental. This government has stated an interest in assisting small business, yet is again helping its banking friends reap profits at merchants' expense.

• (1440)

Will the Minister of State for Small Businesses meet his responsibility and exert pressure on his banking friends to charge the merchant fee on the actual price of the items exclusive of the tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that banks pay taxes just like anybody else—

Some hon. members: Come on, come on.

Mr. Jelinek: A billion dollars. We know where the New Democrats stand on—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: In any event, my answer to the hon. member's second question is the same as the first one. This is constant policy of the government.

We have brought in a new tax which is going to benefit the competitiveness of Canadians. There is no question in anyone's mind that the old manufacturers' sales tax was an impediment, an albatross around the necks of Canadian businesses, manufacturers and exporters, small and large, and the elimination of that tax and its replacement with a modern value-added tax like the GST, used in 48 other countries around the world, is going to benefit businesses and, therefore, all Canadians.

JUSTICE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

I believe that Canadians are becoming impatient with our government's failure to introduce legislation to streamline and, indeed, speed up our extradition process. Therefore, my question to the minister is this. When will the minister address this problem to reduce the number of appeals open to fugitives such as Charles Ng and, in so doing, send a message that Canada is not a safe haven for fugitives?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interest of the hon. member and a number of my colleagues in the House on this particular issue.

The government is undertaking a complete review of the extradition law. I am happy to report that I have asked my department to fast-track this. I expect to be able to introduce amendments to the provisions of the Extradition Act relating to appeal that address the concerns raised by the hon. member, namely the speed with which these issues can be dealt with prior to the rising of the House before the summer.

So, within this sitting, I will be introducing those amendments.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works, about the lease his department signed with Transport Canada. After two years, we finally got a copy of the lease and it confirms what the opposition and myself were suspecting, namely that Public Works paid more to renew the lease with Campeau, at Place de Ville, than it would have cost to have a new tower built in the Outaouais. I would like the Minister of Public Works, who signed the lease for the government, to apologize for misleading the House in 1989?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the member, in bringing this matter up, gives me an opportunity to remind colleagues that this project was one of several capital projects that were cancelled in the name of budgetary restraint.

In saying that extra cost or an apology is in order, he ignores the fact that the lease is renewed at $35 per square metre less than the previous lease that was signed years ago by the Liberal government.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to say to the minister that, under the present lease, it costs $250 per square meter, a lot more than what would have cost a 20-year lease in the Outaouais. I want to ask the minister why he changed the allocation rules for leases, by establishing criteria which do not take into account the situation in the Outaouais?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there were no rules changed. The project was terminated and there were many arguments that could be placed both ways.

Many public servants were pleased that this was cancelled. There was a substantial saving in terms of relocation, infrastructure demands and many colleagues in this House were very pleased that the government had followed this policy.

We have discussed this before and we can argue about it again, but the fact is that this project was one of several that were cancelled and, on a net basis, the renewal has not been a bad deal for the taxpayers of Canada.

NOISE POLLUTION

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

I am very glad to acknowledge the progress made by the minister in proposing amendments to the Aeronautics Act. It will impose a significant fine on violators of noise regulations at our airports. A $10,000 fine against corporations should successfully deter violators, much to the relief of my constituents.

Could the minister please give consideration, when this bill is before the Standing Committee on Transport, to including an equally significant minimum fine for violators so that airports will be obliged to enforce a significant fine and not the token fines presently being levied?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I know, over the many years, that he has taken the concerns of his constituents in the area of the airport at Toronto very seriously, and worked hard on their behalf.

As he knows, the bill is now before committee, which will be looking at all the options. This is an amendment that I am sure will come up for debate and one that can be dealt with in the committee.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Public Works and it concerns the mother of all boondoggles, the lease on the Transport Canada building.

How can the minister justify the cancellation of the 1989 construction of the Transport Canada building at a cost of $200 million over 20 years, and instead grant a sweetheart deal of at least three times the cost to Campeau Corporation now led by the former chief of staff to the Prime Minister, Stanley Hartt?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, because he is an objective and knowledgeable critic, that the sweetheart deal was the one I referred to when Judd Buchanan and Arthur Laing entered into the original lease many years ago at a cost much in excess of the one we are able to renegotiate the new lease.

He also knows that he is trying to compare apples and oranges. He is trying to compare a 20-year lease purchase with the renewal of an existing lease. He ignores all of the advantages that are gained in staying in the lease arrangement and renegotiating it.

He ignores the fact that we were able to make arrangements to have the asbestos cost shared. He ignores the fact that there was swing space arranged with Campeau Corporation. He ignores the fact that if there was any particular corporation which I would be disposed to make a deal, it would not be the Campeau Corporation.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, and I am sure pigs can fly as well.

I want to ask a supplementary question of the Acting Deputy Prime Minister concerning this new lease on life for Stanley Hartt.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. When the tender process for the new Transport Canada building was cancelled, Mr. Stanley Hartt, the then Prime Minister's chief of staff, was the same person who later became president of the Campeau Corporation, three months after leaving the Prime Minister's office. Did the Acting Prime Minister ensure that both the letter and the intent of the code governing conflicts of interest and post-employment were observed? If not, does he intend to do so today?

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that particularly when he is dealing with merely an Acting Deputy Prime Minister, if he wants an answer to a question of that kind, he will be well served by giving me notice.

I did not have notice. I do not know the answer. I suspect the answer is in the negative but he does not want my suspicions. I will take it as notice and get back to him.

POST OFFICE

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Today is the anniversary of D-Day. Canadians are paying tribute at memorials and cenotaphs across this country. In Avonmore, Canada Post is attacking these symbols. Canada Post intends to close the post office. It has asked the township to remove the cenotaph so that it can sell the property.

Will the minister intervene on behalf of veterans and stop this horrendous attack on Canadian symbols and veterans?

• (1450)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, when the question about the cenotaph in Avonmore came to my attention, I contacted the post office. They said that their intention, if they have not done so already and I think they might have, is to donate to the town of Avonmore the land, the cenotaph, and the surrounding land so it will be a long-lasting memorial to the veterans of Canada permanently in the hands of the town of Avonmore.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post. I would first commend him for his actions with Avonmore.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickard: I would also remind him that Canada Post is attacking the very fabric of rural Canada. They have removed the word "Canada" from Canada Post. Flags and symbols across this country have been removed in hundreds of communities because of closures. In Avonmore the cenotaph question came up but again that question is going to be asked a hundredfold over with the hundreds of closings that are going on.

Will this minister reconsider his position in shutting down the symbols of Canada in closing post offices and maintaining rural dignity in this country?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, not only is this the day to remember D-Day, it is a day to remember because it is the first time in 20 years I have received applause from the other side of the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as a result of the actions taken by the previous government—the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel was the minister at this time—in making Canada Post a Crown corporation so it could operate free from political interference, it has become the most efficient post office in the world.

Given that tremendous track record, of which all Canadians should be truly proud, I am not about to go second guessing the management and saying they should do this and do that. The representations the hon. member makes have been heard and acknowledged and I am sure that if we allow ourselves we will see that Canada Post is something we can all be proud of as a tremendous accomplishment by the employees who work there.

TRADE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and refers to a question which was asked last Friday in the House. It concerns the Canadian printing industry and the fact that the rule requiring material printed in the United States of America to state clearly on it that it is printed in the United States of America is not being enforced by Canada Customs in the way that the reverse rule is being enforced by American Customs, thus putting the Canadian printing industry at a disadvantage.

This was a concern raised by the industry when they were in Ottawa a week or so ago. Last Friday the government made a commitment to look into it and see what could be done about it. I am asking the Minister of National Revenue what the government will be doing and will they be moving to enforce this rule?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that we only had an opportunity to meet with representatives from the printing industry last week. As a result of that meeting I have asked my officials to review all aspects of the concerns that were raised at that meeting. The report has not been finalized. When it is and comes to my attention for review I will be very happy to share the information with my hon. friend.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Minister of National Revenue could at least make it clear that the government intends to enforce its own rules, which is part of the problem. I wonder if the minister could at least give us that assurance.

While he is doing that, could he also assure us, because I have heard information to the contrary, that the government, particularly the Department of National Revenue itself, is not having GST information and other information printed across the border and coming back into Canada for distribution. Could he give us assurance that his department is not cross-border shopping?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. member my assurances that my department is not cross-border shopping in any way, shape, or form.

I can also give the hon. member my commitment that we are enforcing all rules as they apply to Revenue Canada under existing legislation.

I will go even further than that and say that as a result of the meetings with the printing industry and the review that is under way now, we are looking at ways and government as a whole is looking at ways on an ongoing basis, to try to level the playing field wherever we find it is not level. If we find out that there is not a level playing field in this instance, we will take appropriate action to correct it.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. It is urgent that we move ahead quickly to pass improvements to the Young Offenders Act. Many of the residents of my riding are demanding changes.

I raised this issue with the former Minister of Justice on June 12, 1989, two years ago. I submit that our laws must be changed to reflect greater concerns for the victims of criminals and society in general.

What major changes will be incorporated in Bill C-12, including amendments, and what changes are being considered in phase two of the Young Offenders Act?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question and, once again, for his interest in his particular area. Bill C-12, which is the reinstated version of Bill C-58, was introduced by my predecessor and is at report stage in the House. It deals with the question of the test for the transfer of a young person to adult court and the sentences available to the young offender in the adult courts for youth convicted of murder.

I am hoping that this legislation will come forward quickly. I understand a number of amendments have been proposed. I will be bringing forward the second phase of the Young Offenders Act amendments this fall which will address a broader application of youth in conflict with the law.

I cannot be more specific on it at this moment since the bill is not tabled, but I can assure the hon. member that we are in full consultation with the provinces and other interested parties and I hope to table phase two before the end of this calendar year.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. I want to remind the Acting Prime Minister that in his new job as Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs he will require the trust and the confidence of all Canadians.

In that regard I would like to ask the minister once again to answer clearly in this House and to Canadians for a statement that he made on the May 14 to all Canadians in which he spoke about Mr. Raymond Chrétien in stating: "He very obviously regrets what happened. He has apologized to me, and as I say, that ends".

Obviously the minister must have known that statement was not true because he had never spoken to Mr. Raymond—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member said that the minister must obviously have known that that statement was not true, but there is no difference between saying that and saying that the hon. minister is a liar. That is not appropriate questioning.

I am going to hope that the hon. member did not mean an accusation like that, but that kind of language used in a preamble certainly creates that kind of an impression. The hon. member may put her question.

Ms. Copps: Does the minister stand by this statement he made on that date?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no one is more conscious than I am of the need for me, and indeed the need for all members of this House, to earn the respect and trust of Canadians.

I try to conduct myself in a way that will attract and maintain that respect and trust.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is one of the reasons why this government, when this affair arose, agreed very quickly to establish a parliamentary committee that would allow more extensive discussion of these issues than Question Period permits.

We have a clear example of how right a decision that was today because that very question was asked and answered earlier this morning in the standing committee. The standing committee provides the latitude for there to be that kind of fullness of answer.

• (1500)

I do not think that there is much point or indeed much respect for this institution for me to repeat here what I said in committee established by the House of Commons when I was there as a witness earlier this morning.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some regret on a point of order concerning the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs who has just indicated that he tries to maintain himself in a position that will attract respect and trust.

He and his colleagues have called upon us on a regular basis to change our habits in an effort to raise the dignity and respect which this institution deserves.

During Question Period, the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs referred to my colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway as "Svend baby".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, he did that and I do not think this adds to the decorum of this House. I do not think that attracts the trust and imagery that the minister would want to have. I want to provide him with an opportunity to stand in his place and withdraw those remarks.

Point of Order

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly I would want to withdraw that statement.

While I am on my feet, may I say that I want to consult the "blues" to ensure that my response to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said what I wanted it to say.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make the point that I think the President of the Privy Council demonstrated by his response to that point of order the kind of dignity and respect for each other that we would like to see.

I would hope that the House leader of the New Democratic Party will notice that, take it back to his caucus colleagues and tell them how inappropriate it is to have questions with accusatory, inflammatory preambles, particularly the kind his colleague, the member from Burnaby, has frequently put forward to the House. He would be helping us all earn some respect in this House.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The right hon. President of the Privy Council was on his feet extending an apology with regard to my colleague from Burnaby. Perhaps he would avail himself of this opportunity to stand in the House and extend an apology to Raymond Chrétien.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, we seem to be in a period of some flexibility in the rules.

What I have said, and I welcome the opportunity to say it again although I am sure it has already been drawn to Mr. Chrétien's attention, is that if he believes that any of my comments give him reason to request an apology, he has only to ask me for that kind of apology and I will respond. I do not think that it is particularly helpful to the reputation of this House, nor does it serve the reputation or the interests of Mr. Chrétien to have this matter pursued in a partisan way.

He and I have known one another for eight or nine years. We have worked together very closely.

The House leader of the Liberal Party is asking if I will apologize. I do not think he has any authority from Mr. Chrétien to seek that. I have made it very clear that if

Mr. Chrétien believes that I have said something that would—

Mr. Dingwall: What an example for national unity. What an example.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No. If Mr. Chrétien believes that there is some matter that I have said that should elicit from him a request for an apology, he has only to call me. We have spoken together on matters in the past and I am quite prepared to do that again.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, earlier in Question Period in the preamble to my third question I referred to the President of the Queen's Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs as "Joe baby" in response to his statement to me.

Obviously in the same spirit in which the minister has withdrawn his reference, I too fully withdraw mine.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Following the the generous atmosphere that has been established here in the House, I would like to follow up on the request made by the Liberal House leader. It is not good enough for the minister to claim that this is a private matter between himself and Raymond Chrétien. He tabled a statement in the House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): What is the hon. member's point of order?

Ms. Copps: My point of order is that when a minister comes into this House and tables a document which makes false statements he has the responsibility to apologize to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition wants to know about government House business. What is the point of order?

Ms. Copps: The point of order is this: Is there not a responsibility upon the Speaker when documents are tabled, as there was a document tabled on behalf of the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, which are patently at variance with the truth? Is it not the responsibility of the House to see those statements corrected publicly?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not know if they are patently untrue. I have not seen the documents. We will have a look at them and then I will come with a decision on it. The hon. leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I pose my question to the government House leader, and in doing so I remind him that my colleague from Ottawa West will have a specific question for him with regard to House business and I hope that he will be able to respond in kind.

Perhaps the government House leader could indicate to members on this side of the House what the business will be for Monday and Tuesday and for the remaining part of next week.

Mr. Prud'homme: Two full days of the Machete affair.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): That is serving the nation's interest. You are really interested in that, are you not? I know you have been here 25 years, but please do not interrupt.

Today we will continue with third reading of Bill C-11. Tomorrow was to be an NDP allotted day, but by House order it was agreed that we would not sit so that the NDP could attend its convention in Halifax. Monday will be an allotted day. Tuesday it is my intention to call for second reading of Bill C-10, Excise Tax Act dealing with tobacco, and also for second reading of Bill C-20, the budget implementation bill. At this time, subject to confirmation, Wednesday and Thursday of next week would be allotted days, Thursday being the final allotted day for the current supply period.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I pursue a point of order. The hon. House leader for the government has indicated the business for Monday. Would he clarify whether there will be a vote on Monday? I thought we had an understanding between the House leaders that on that one bill the vote would be passing on division. That obviously did not take place. Will there be a vote on Monday and at what time on Monday?

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, the deferral of the vote on Bill C-17 was to six o'clock on Monday. It is an allotted day. Assuming the extension of hours until ten o'clock, it would be my intention as government Whip to defer that vote on the allotted day until Tuesday to give members a better chance to be present.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in terms of business of the House, today the Supreme Court of Canada turned down the government's appeal and upheld the ruling of the Federal Court of Appeal that section 33(1) of the Public Service Employment Act, prohibiting public political activities by public servants, contravenes the charter and is an undue infringement of the right of freedom and association.

I would like to ask the House leader, now that all appeals are exhausted, does the government intend to bring in a bill to remove the part of the act that the Supreme Court of Canada has now confirmed to be contrary to the charter?

Mr. Andre: It is my understanding that the President of the Treasury Board is examining the ruling to see its implications and we will bring the Canadian law into compliance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as interpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada.

INVESTIGATION INTO SHOOTING

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. I have a question as well for the hon. government House leader.

There have been repeated requests to the Minister of Justice, including a request from the Prince Albert Friendship Centre and the Prince Albert Tribal Council for an investigation into the shooting of an Indian gentlemen, Leo La Chance, by the leader of the Aryan Nations in Saskatchewan, Carney Nerland. Many people are concerned with the relatively minor charge and light sentence that the Crown sought in that particular case. Many people feel that the connection to the Aryan Nations has not been properly explored.

Therefore, I would like to ask the government House leader if he would please request the Minister of Justice to respond to this situation at the next sitting of the House.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would question whether the Minister of Justice or anybody else should respond to a request to interfere in the justice system. As I heard the case described, it is being proceeded with in the normal way.

However, I will bring the member's representation to the Minister of Justice and she may have a response. I remind the hon. member that questions, whether during Question Period or by points of order, on situations of sub judice are really not proper for the very good reason that we should not, through things we say here under the protections of this institution, jeopardize the fairness of our judicial system which we all believe to be as fair as we can make it.

With that reminder, I will, nevertheless, talk to the Minister of Justice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would also like to add to that. It is not because of what the hon. government House leader has just said, but that kind of question should be put at Question Period. It is not a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did consult with my colleagues from all parties and I even consulted with the independent members. I think you would find unanimous consent to allow me to revert to presenting reports from special and standing committees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

TABLING OF FIRST REPORT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the House, I wish to table the first report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, on the Main Estimates for 1991–1992.

[English]

Mr. Riis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member and his committee report. Tomorrow the estimates are deemed to have been tabled and, as far as I can recall, this is the only committee that has been working and is actually now tabling its reaction to the estimates.

I think it is first rate. I think the committee and its members are to be commended. I only wish that other committees could do the same thing. However, because of the realities of the time on some of the impositions that have been placed on the committees, this is impossible.

I certainly want to acknowledge the first-rate work done and I hope that this can be a model for other committees in the future.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House seeks to eliminate a subsidy which has outlived its original purpose and has become a burden on the public purse.

The At and East subsidy program was originally introduced in the 1960s to ensure that Canadian grain and flour would move through Canadian ports. The program provided subsidies to the railways based on the difference between the railway's cost and the statutory freight rates dating back to the 1960s. It is worth noting that only a relatively small amount of Canada's export grain moved under this program, less than 3 per cent.

Various studies have been done on this subsidy over the past 15 years. Those subsidies indicated that the subsidy encouraged inefficient movement plus extra handling and storage. It was clear that the program was expensive and no longer necessary. As a result, the subsidy was terminated effective July 15, 1989, as announced in the April 1989 budget.

In order to minimize the impact on users, the legislation provided for a six month transition period to cover grain and flour inventories that were in the rail system on that day.

Members are aware that the government is undertaking a comprehensive review of agricultural policy, which includes an examination of related transportation issues and involves all stakeholders from the farm level through to the consumer.

The principal goal of growing together is to develop options for a national policy which will serve to prepare the Canadian agrifood industry for the challenges of the 1990s and beyond.

Virtually all of the witnesses who appeared before the legislative committee on this bill agreed that the At and East program should be terminated. However, some of the witnesses expressed concern about the impact that terminating the program would have on the two Atlantic grain elevators. In particular, people were worried about the implications that the possible closure of the Halifax grain elevator would have on Atlantic agriculture sectors.

In response to these concerns, the Minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for grains and oilseeds jointly announced on May 16, 1990, the creation of a steering committee to study the viability of grain handling facilities in the Atlantic provinces.

The steering committee included representatives from industry and the ports, as well as both the federal and provincial governments. The study examined the financial viability of the elevators at Halifax, Nova Scotia, and Saint John, New Brunswick. It also examined the feasibility of a new elevator at Summerside, Prince Edward Island, to handle the increasing volumes of grain being grown in that province.

Proposals put forward by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission and the Halifax—Dartmouth Port Development Commission, concerning alternatives to the At and East program, were examined as part of the study.

The study concluded that virtually all export grain shipments by rail to both Halifax and Saint John stopped with the termination of the At and East subsidy. The Halifax elevator remained a viable operation because it serviced the Atlantic livestock industry and flour mill in addition to the grain export market.

Unlike the Saint John elevator, it can receive grain by either rail or water. However, the Halifax elevator could be at risk in the longer term unless more export grain can be brought through it.

The study indicated that livestock producers in Atlantic Canada would pay at least $10 more per tonne for feed grains if the Halifax terminal were to close.

The terminal provides an alternative to rail shipping and feed grain to the region as well as competition between rail and water for the feed grain business.

The Saint John elevator, which was almost exclusively handling export grain, closed in May 1990. Unlike the Halifax elevator it was not equipped to receive grain by water.

The study did identify a program that could ensure the long-term viability of the Halifax elevator which is more cost-effective than earlier proposals. This option would be to increase traffic through the Halifax elevator by an additional 200,000 tonnes per year, based on a subsidy of about $3 per tonne.

At the time of the study $3 per tonne was the amount required to equalize the freight rate to Halifax, relative to the St. Lawrence port for grain shipped by water from Thunder Bay. Members will appreciate that it is cheaper to transport bulk products, such as grain, by water than by rail.

One of the main deficiencies of the At and East program was that it subsidized the more expensive rail movements. The government acknowledges the importance of the Halifax grain elevator to the Atlantic livestock and flour milling industries.

I am pleased to advise members that the government is closely monitoring the situation and, if needed, is prepared to ensure that the Halifax elevator remains in operation for the benefit of the Atlantic livestock and flour milling industries.

With respect to the Saint John elevator, the construction of marine unloading facilities and additional storage would be required before the elevator could handle the amount of through-put required to ensure its long-term viability. However, the government is prepared to offer assistance to the Saint John elevator, comparable to what it offered to the Halifax elevator.

In closing, I would like to reiterate that the At and East subsidy is an expensive, inefficient and unnecessary mechanism for supporting grain handling on the east coast. Canadian taxpayers cannot afford a subsidy program based on a 1960 policy which is no longer required.

The government is prepared, however, to minimize the impact of terminating the program on the Atlantic livestock and flour milling industries. Therefore I ask members for their support and approval of Bill C-11.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, under normal circumstances I would be very happy to take part in a debate of this kind. However, as you well know, these are not normal times in our country. These are not normal circumstances. Witness the kinds of goings-on here in the House and elsewhere in the past few days. Witness the breakdown in national unity in this country. Witness the breakdown in the economy. These are not normal times and these are not normal circumstances.

The reason why I am not particularly happy about taking part in this debate is that this bill should not be here in the first place. It does not belong in this House at this particular time. At least, at the very minimum, we should not be debating this bill at third reading. At the very least, this is the day this bill should be introduced. We should not be debating it at third reading.

I say that because this particular bill was introduced a long time ago—more than a year ago—under another name or number and died with prorogation. It died. It died early in the month of May and it should not be in this House. The reason why it is here is that this government broke every tradition in this country, every tradition in this Parliament. It broke every convention that we know of and resurrected this bill along with four others.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall very well that we went through this kind of debate just a few days ago. Never before in the history of our Parliament have we ever resurrected a bill without unanimous consent. It has never happened in the Mother of our Parliaments in England, in Great Britain.

In my opinion we are debating this bill today as a result of contempt for our traditions, contempt for this House, and ultimately I believe contempt for the Canadian people. Nevertheless, we have it here. I just want to remind you that this bill, in its previous incarnation, was brought out of committee on May 31, 1989. That is more than a year ago. It was debated at report stage and concurred in on June 5, 1990. That is a year and one day ago.

This government had all the time in the world to finish this bill. It had ample time, but it mismanaged and bungled as usual. Here we are, the government breaking tradition, breaking convention and resurrecting a bill that really died at prorogation in early May.

It is little wonder that this kind of debate at this particular time is kind of vexing. It leaves me a little angry, but we have it. I guess we are going to have to live with it and we are going to debate it.

We might recall—I will just provide a little more history—that the bill, which was designed to eliminate the At and East subsidies, was actually brought in after the subsidies were already eliminated.

The subsidies were eliminated back in July 1989. Some time after that the bill was brought in to confirm something that the government had already done.

In my opinion, that is just more contempt for the traditions of this House.

It was said at the time the bill was brought in, more than a year ago, that it would have harmful effects across the board, particularly in the maritimes.

I am sad to say that some of those forecasts have already come true. I would think that most of the other forecasts will be confirmed in the months to come or at least in the years to come.

Let us look at the facts. They are indisputable. First of all, the elevator at Saint John is gone. It is closed. It is no more. There were 55 jobs lost. In a region of Canada like Atlantic Canada that is particularly painful. Losing 55 jobs is nothing to be sneezed at.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport said a few minutes ago in his remarks that this legislation, the At and East legislation, had outlived its usefulness and had become a burden on the public treasury.

Of course, we all know that this government does everything in the name of deficit reduction.

It has outlived its usefulness. I wish that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport would say that to the 55 people in Saint John who lost their jobs. I wonder whether they would agree. I doubt it very much.

Not only that, it has already had an impact on the elevator at Halifax, Nova Scotia. There are serious ramifications for that facility. Already, according to figures that I secured just today, 27 jobs have been lost at the Halifax elevator.

That is a loss of $14.4 million to the Halifax economy. If that elevator, which is in a precarious situation, closes it will mean an additional $13.2 million lost to the economy in Halifax. When it comes to jobs it will mean an additional loss of 220 person-years.

We are talking about a very serious situation.

The Halifax elevator, according to information that was given to me today, needs about 260,000 tonnes to break even. It is just at that figure now. It is operating at around that figure, so if it drops below that the Halifax facility is in trouble and it could close.

That is very disturbing. It is a very important facility to the city of Halifax.

Mr. Speaker, I want to remind you of something that my colleague from Halifax said in this House back on February 12, 1990. She was taking part in the debate on the legislation at the time and she said: "Halifax is a city that depends on its ports. The grain elevators, the activity produced by the grain elevators and the jobs created thereto are part of the relative economic health of the city of Halifax."

• (1530)

I say relative because it is relative to the ill health of the rest of the region. That ill health in the rest of the region has been caused by the poison dart of government policy.

Then my hon. friend from Halifax continued, and I quote again:

> There is no particular reason, other than a government devoted to a Canada that does not exist outside the very central part of our geography, to see our regions die, and yet they are dying. They are dying from a lack of interest. They are dying from an interest that can only be described as poisonous and that can only be described as anti the best interests of large numbers of Canadian citizens.

That is what my colleague from Halifax said in this House on February 12, 1990. When we are talking about the Halifax elevator, we are talking about something that is crucial to the economy of that city.

As a result of the At and East subsidy elimination, there has been an increase in the cost of transportation to the tune of about $10 a metric ton. This is in line with predictions and forecasts that were made by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission some time ago. Unfortunately the assessment—I say unfortunately because the assessment by the APTC was somewhat alarming—their forecasts are coming true.

While I am talking about the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, this is what it said about the termination of the At and East program. It said that when it comes to grain elevators, the impact—that is, a loss to the economy— would be $3,735,000; the flour mill in Halifax, another $3,200,000; additional cost of livestock and poultry feed, another $8 million; local grain production, $950,000; port and railway employment, $8,280,000. The total identifiable impact on the Atlantic provinces through the termination of the At and East program came to just over $34 million.

Also the Canadian Transport Commission some time ago in its assessment of the At and East program pointed out that the program was responsible in the way of transportation for about 330 jobs; milling in western Canada, another 295 jobs; 75 more jobs at Georgian Bay port; 85 more jobs at Halifax and St. John's; and 402 jobs when it comes to milling in central Canada.

Another thing that the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission pointed out is that if the At and East legislation proceeded to the bitter end, and it looks like it is going to happen—of course the subsidies are all gone—the buyers in the provinces who normally relied on grain from western Canada would have to turn elsewhere. They would have to turn to countries like the United States and to countries in western Europe.

I do not think that makes the people in Atlantic Canada very happy. In fact, I was listening to a speaker from Atlantic Canada in one of our earlier debate. He in effect said that Atlantic Canadians are good Canadians. They want to belong to Canada. They want to participate fully in the Canadian economy. It pains them, it grieves them a lot, if they are forced to turn to other countries for their supplies.

I think it is a darn shame that the Atlantic provinces will have to look elsewhere for their feed grain. In fact, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Committee has already suggested that there be an elimination of the countervail on U.S. corn. It is a ridiculous situation. Here we have a countervail to protect our producers in this country, and now we have in effect Canadians pitted against Canadians. This is the situation we face. Atlantic Canadians who normally buy their feed grain from other Canadians, especially in western Canada, will perhaps have to turn to the United States or to western Europe. Does that make sense? I do not think it does. Of course it is a blow to the west, particularly at this time. I do not have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it is tough times down on the farm these days. Farmers will be very happy to grab on to any market, small or big, to maintain their survival. Western farmers do not want to lose one dollar of market in Atlantic Canada. This is what the elimination of the At and East subsidies has done.

I think that perhaps one of the problems we have here is that this government never really understood the purpose of the At and East legislation. Earlier we heard the parliamentary secretary talk about the legislation outliving its purpose. Well, what was its purpose?

Let me go back exactly 25 years to 1966 when the legislation was brought in. At that time the new legislation or the proposed legislation was spoken to by a very venerable, honourable occupant of this House, a man no less than J. W. Pickersgill. You probably know him. What did Mr. Pickersgill say at the time? Describing the purpose of the At and East legislation Mr. Pickersgill said: "To ensure that we will have rates which will provide some inducement and incentive to shippers to use the facilities of the Atlantic ports".

In other words what Mr. Pickersgill was saying at the time, in addition to ensuring that eastern Canadian ports could compete with U.S. ports, was that the At and East rates were also intended to enable the ports of Halifax and Saint John to compete with Montreal and other St. Lawrence River ports. That was the original purpose of the At and East legislation.

The other thing I would like to point out is that the At and East legislation really was in keeping with the history of this country. What we have done over 124 years is defy the physical make-up of this country, defy our geography. What we did was build up parallel systems to what was available in the United States because under normal conditions and forces the pull north-south. If the nation-builders in the early days of this country had ignored the realities of Canada and the north-south forces, this country might not have lasted. It certainly would not have lasted 124 years. But it lasted and prospered because we had statesmen, politicians, and nation-builders with vision and a strong belief in this country. They established programs and legislation to ensure the future of this country. The building of the CPR is an example, as is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the creation of the Canadian Wheat Board and the At and East program. I could go on and on.

The At and East program is in keeping with our heritage. It is in keeping with our history. It really carries the spirit of Canada, yet this government is saying to heck with all that. It does not care about that. It is not interested in that. It is interested in something else.

• (1540)

No wonder this country is in a state of confusion. No wonder this country is going down hill. No wonder Canadians feel alienated. No wonder Canadians are obsessed with their cynicism. They have a government and particularly a Prime Minister who does not understand the history of this country, who does not understand what this country is all about. At and East is part of that.

At and East was just part and parcel of an orderly marketing system which we had built up over many long years. These things did not happen just overnight. These things did not happen over a weekend or two. It took years and years to build.

Over the years we have built up an orderly marketing system. In that orderly marketing system we have now all kinds of marketing boards. Also within that orderly marketing system we have a supply management system.

Despite some of the grievous problems that we have, particularly when it comes to grain farming in this country, those institutions that we have developed over the last number of decades have served Canadians well, are serving Canadians well and I would submit will continue to serve Canadians well provided that this government stops its darn tinkering and tampering.

There is concern that under this government the unravelling of our programs will continue. It is not just a matter of At and East, it goes well beyond that.

In this House about a year ago or so we witnessed the government putting the kibosh on the interest-free advance payments for crops. There was a great outcry because of that. Prairie producers in particular said: "No, it was wrong. It was an effective program. It was not a costly program. It paid all Canadians in the long run". Fortunately, after a great outcry, after a lot of pressure on the government, the government did change its mind. For how long? We can never be sure. When it comes to this government we have to be ever vigilant.

There is more. It is not only At and East and the interest-free advance payments for crops, there are other programs and institutions at risk. Take for example the Canadian Wheat Board, the venerable Canadian Wheat Board which has served Canadians well. In particular, it has served grain farmers well in this country.

The wheat board is in great danger, I submit. We know that it is now in a serious deficit situation. It is perhaps looking at a deficit of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $700 million, $800 million, $900 million, perhaps as much as $1 billion. I am not suggesting when I cite those figures that the government is totally responsible for that deficit. There is a terrible international subsidy war going on and it is costing the wheat board a lot of money. Where does the wheat board get its money? From Canadian taxpayers.

I do submit that the government has put the Canadian Wheat Board at risk. How? One way is by allowing American wheat into this country.

Under the free trade agreement if the subsidy level in Canada reached that of American subsidies, there was a clause triggered in the FTA that meant Americans would have the right to come in and sell their wheat in Canada.

Unfortunately, the subsidy levels in the two countries met some months ago and it was decided just a few weeks ago that American wheat had to come in.

That poses a terrible risk to the Canadian Wheat Board.

Right off the bat, it cost the Canadian taxpayers $25 million. For the Canadian Wheat Board to compete with the lower priced subsidized American wheat, it would have to drop its prices, and it did. It will cost the Canadian taxpayers $25 million.

There is more to it than that. Once you allow American wheat to come in, you trigger another set of dynamics. I think I have said it before in this House and I will say it again.

When farmers, especially those who live near the U.S. border, see American wheat coming into this country, they are going to look at the American market and say to themselves: "If American wheat can come into our country, maybe we can sell our wheat directly into the American market. We will not have to go through the Canadian Wheat Board. We will find a little niche market here and there, and we will sell our wheat at perhaps a higher price than that offered by the Canadian Wheat Board."

If that happens, and it surely will, one can appreciate the kind of pressure that is going to put on the Canadian Wheat Board.

You cannot have the Canadian Wheat Board, in effect, selling wheat for some Canadian farmers and not for others. You cannot have it that way.

It has to have exclusive jurisdiction or it is going to be out of action completely. I am really afraid for the future of the Canadian Wheat Board.

We hear all kinds of comments from the Conservatives on the other side, this government, saying: "Our faith in the Canadian Wheat Board is solid. Do not worry. We are right behind the Canadian Wheat Board 100 per cent, so all your talk about possible doom and gloom when it comes to the Canadian Wheat Board is totally and completely off the mark."

I do not think I am wrong, and I also know that this is a right wing government. It really does not believe that the government has a place in the economy. It really believes in laissez faire, and so when it talks about supporting the Canadian Wheat Board I really wonder.

The other thing when we are talking about American wheat coming into this country is what the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said: "Hold it. We do not want American wheat coming into Canada at this particular time because we have some unfinished business."

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture took the position that its members were not afraid of competition. They were not afraid of taking on the Americans. Their product is just as good as that of the Americans. They are just as efficient as the Americans and so they were not afraid of competing with the Americans. However, as I said, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture took the position that there was some unfinished business. As long as Americans were raiding our traditional export markets, as long as the Americans were using their so-called Export Enhancement Program to raid our markets, it was the position of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to say and say bluntly to the Canadian government: "Don't let American wheat come into this country until that other serious matter is resolved".

In my opinion the position taken by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and others made a lot of sense. The Americans play hardball; they are tough negotiators. You don't mess around with the Americans. If you are going to deal with the Americans, you take them on and you take them on frontally, directly. You don't mess round. You don't play games. You take them on directly. I think that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture had the right idea. If the Americans want access to our market when it comes to their wheat, then they had better lay off our traditional markets elsewhere around the world.

Now you ask why they should lay off our traditional markets elsewhere around the world. After all, is competition not just competition? It may sound that way, but under the free trade agreement, the infamous free trade agreement, there was an agreement with respect to this matter of one country raiding the traditional markets of the other. I refer to Article 701.4 of the free trade agreement. In that article it says: "The U.S. and Canada are to take into account the effects of their export subsidies on other nations to avoid prejudicing each other's markets".

That is a direct quote. That is what Article 701.4 of the FTA says. There is another article as well and that article is 2011. What does it say? That article stipulates that if one party causes nullification or impairment of any benefit reasonably expected to access to that party directly or indirectly under the provisions of this agreement, that party may, with a view to the satisfactory resolution of the matter, invoke the consultation provisions of the Article 1804 and, if it considers it appropriate, proceed to dispute settlement pursuant to Articles 1805-1807 or, with consent of the other party, proceed pursuant to Article 1806.

There you have it, Mr. Speaker. Under the free trade agreement we had a right to take the Americans on, to resolve this matter with respect to their raiding of our traditional markets. As I said, I think the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and others had it right when they said: "Until that Export Enhancement Program problem is resolved, don't let any American wheat come into our country".

Do you know what members of the government said or did? Absolutely nothing. They did nothing. They would not go to bat for our producers. They would not go to bat for our consumers. They would not go to bat for the country. They had all the right. Not only did they have the legal right under the FTA, I submit to you that they had the moral right on behalf of all Canadians to get some kind of justice out of the situation. However they said no, and I think that is abominable.

I think it is terrible that our government would not go to bat on behalf of our farmers. Then again, I guess it really should not come as any great surprise. As I said earlier, this is a laissez-faire government. It believes in the unfettered market driven economy.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harvard: Yes, there is my hon. friend from Calgary confirming it. According to these anti-diluvian thinkers, according to these dinosaurs, we should close down our democracy, close down our governments. "There is no place for government in the economy. We will just leave it to the boys out there in the marketplace. We will just leave it to the boys and they will do us justice and they will do well. We will have the old trickle down theory and all that nonsense".

You know darn well that is pure, utter hogwash, pure, utter nonsense.

It is not an accident that just days ago the United Nations declared Canada, according to its human development index, the second best country in the world. The United States is number seven, by the way.

Do you think it is really just an accident that relative to other countries in the world Canada is a veritable paradise? Was that just an accident? Not on your life.

We are a great country. This a country that is one of the greatest in the world because we had visionary leaders in this country. Through our democracy they wisely and very judiciously used the instrument of government for the betterment of human development to build our economy and raise our standard of living.

I do not ask government to be oppressive. I do not ask government to take over and run everything. I do not ask government to own everything. There is a place for government. After all, if we are a democracy—and this is a democracy—we must have an instrument to express our democratic will. We do that through the instrument of government, yet we have this anti-diluvian government that is more like a 19th century or 17th century government that says: "to heck with all that tradition, to heck with our history, and to heck with all our economic successes of the past number of decades, we have a better way. We have a laissez-faire way. We have a right wing agenda to pursue and, you know what, they don't listen to us".

I think that we have seen in the past little while that government policies are not working. Just look at the economic indices. Look at the economic numbers. The Tory approach is the wrong way. They are taking us down the hill. I want to say that I think it unfortunate, as I conclude my remarks, that we are debating this bill at this particular time.

As I said at the top, it should not be here at all. I wish the government would rethink, but I know that is hoping in vain. The subsidy is all wrong. That is their opinion. I guess we are wasting our time, but I think it is important we put these thoughts and these comments on the record. I have done that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is again hardly a delight to participate in the debate today on Bill C–11, an act to amend the Railway Act regarding grain and flour subsidies. I do want to say from the start that the purpose of this bill, interestingly enough, is to eliminate the At and East grain transportation subsidy given to shippers of export grain and flour from Thunder Bay through the ports of Saint John and Halifax in Atlantic Canada.

• (1600)

What is interesting about this legislation that the government has brought forward is really two points in terms of process. One is that this is all after the fact. This particular support for the grain industry, to encourage the viability of the elevator at Halifax and the elevator at Saint John, as well as the viability of the livestock industry throughout Atlantic Canada and to provide an essential role in the delivery of competitive priced feed grains to the maritimes, to say nothing of the flour mills and the thousands of thousands of people both directly and indirectly employed by the movement of grain into the Atlantic region, was done away with months ago. As a matter of fact, it was months and months ago. Now we are debating legislation to legitimize what the government did in the past. This is retroactive legislation.

This is not the way to run a government. No wonder the people of Canada are cynical, disappointed and disillusioned. It is no wonder that so many Conservative friends of mine in western Canada shudder when the name of the Prime Minister is mentioned. They are now joining the Reform Party in leaps and bounds as a legitimate, I suppose, conservative party in western Canada and elsewhere, as we are seeing in the papers.

They feel if you have a government and you want to pursue a particular course of action, the usual process is to introduce legislation, take it through the various stages: first reading, second reading, committee stage, report stage, third reading, and then through the other House.

This government has that sort of "father knows best" approach. It has this big brother approach to government that says: "We know what is best for this industry, this region, this community or this sector of the economy, and we are going to just do this with the stroke of a pen or a hack of an axe. Later, if we have the opportunity or some time in the future, we will legitimize what we have done". That is how dictatorships work. That is how totalitarian regimes operate. That is not how a democracy operates, where the duly elected people of Canada participate in a decision: a vote is taken and, if the majority supports an initiative, then that is that.

It is a bit biased, because in this case we have a large Conservative majority and it tends to carry the day. Nevertheless, normally one would expect Parliament to go through those various stages.

Mr. Belsher: You are a little biased in your remarks, Nelson.

Mr. Riis: My hon. friend says I am biased in my remarks. Indeed, as my good colleague indicates, I am. I cannot believe we are actually doing this. I feel dirtied by participating in this process, which I really deem to be bordering on totalitarianism. The government just says: "Forget about Parliament. Forget about democracy. Forget about the opposition voices. Forget about the legislative committees we have in the House of Commons. Forget about the backbenchers of the Conservative Party. The cabinet just made a decision and that is it, and you had bloody well better accept it. If you do not, it does not matter anyway because we have abandoned all this support for the Atlantic grain industry".

That troubles me. It troubles me as a parliamentarian. It troubles me a democrat. It troubles me as a New Democrat, that somehow we are once again seeing the government ignore and abuse the House of Commons. However that has now become a theme. I guess we just have to simply be part of this process and do the best we can.

That is why we have opposed this legislation. Not only do we think it is bad legislation for Canada and a terrible legislation for the Atlantic region, but it is an inappropriate way to proceed.

I know my hon. friend across the way, who is sitting in listening to these debates, shares my concerns. I know he must share the feelings I have, but unfortunately he is not in a position to really do much. However I sense in his heart of hearts that he has agreed with my comments and particularly those of the previous speaker who had a very thorough deliberation on this issue.

That is one concern. Another concern is that this bill used to be called not Bill C-11 but Bill C-26. Bill C-26 was a bill from the previous session. I emphasize the previous session because at the end of the previous session all of the bills the government was dealing with normally just die on the Order Paper. That is the end. It is a new beginning. It is the end of that session and the beginning of a new session. The government introduces a throne speech, the Governor General sits in the Senate and reads out the new agenda for the government and it starts anew.

That is what usually takes place and it is what most governments have done. As a matter of fact, it is what all governments have done in Canadian history. It is what has happened in the United Kingdom year after year, decade after decade for hundreds of years.

However, this government said: "We have a new idea. We are going to ignore what happens at prorogation". Bill C-26 ought to have died on the Order Paper, as has been done now for hundreds of years in the parliamentary tradition. The government decided to bring in a Draconian piece of legislation, a motion that reinstated this bill and simply said: "Let us now call it C-11 and we will pick up where we left off".

That is not right. It is not the parliamentary thing to do. It is not the democratic thing to do. It is not something that would be done in any serious Parliament of the world, and yet that is what we have had done here.

It is very discouraging to have to participate in this process which I consider to be inappropriate democratically. Also, the fact that we are debating legislation to legitimize a decision the cabinet took months and months ago seems obviously not to be the kind of practice found in a democratic society and during the continuation of a democratic process.

However, having said that, let me just indicate why some of us have been so intent on stopping this legislation. This legislation would have done a great deal for Atlantic Canada. I do not think there is anybody in Canada who would disagree that any support, encouragement and development that we can encourage and initiate in Atlantic Canada is good, not just for the people living in Atlantic Canada, but good for the country. If it is good for the country it is good for all regions of Canada.

As a result of the At and East Program, as it has been referred to, a few years ago the grain elevators in Saint John and Halifax had an economic impact of $3,735,600 a year. That is substantial. The flour mill in Halifax alone had an economic positive impact of $3,200,000 each year. For the hundreds and hundreds of families involved in the livestock industry in Atlantic Canada the cost saving to allow them to participate, not only in livestock but in the poultry business as well, amounted to an annual amount of $18,160,000. That was a tremendous level of support the federal government was providing for the livestock producers and people using grain, as I say, poultry growers as well.

Local grain production benefited by $950,000 a year. The port and railway employment benefited by $8,280,700 a year. Those were the men and women involved with the elevators, the port facilities and the railway systems in that area, a substantial number of people, hundreds and hundreds of them.

The total identifiable impact on the Atlantic provinces amounted to $34 million-plus each year.

I read the other day with interest an account in one of the financial papers commenting on the situation in Atlantic Canada regarding this legislation. It said that the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Development Commission indicated that the economics of grain traffic at the port in 1988 amounted to $25.9 million in revenues and 263 jobs, while flour traffic resulted in $28.4 million in revenues and 220 jobs.

• (1610)

A substantial number of people are employed, then, in the elevator industry as well as the flour industry. In Saint John, the Saint John Port Commission put out an information program which indicated that the movement of bulk grains through its port back in 1988 under At and East program amounted to $8.5 million and was responsible for 90 direct jobs.

That in itself is very impressive. In other words, because of the At and East program, hundreds and hundreds of Atlantic Canadian men and women were meaningfully employed. Those were direct jobs. As we know, for everyone directly employed at the elevator, at the flour mill, at the port, on the railway or in other related activities like livestock producers and so on, there are other people that depend on them. I am talking now about the dentists, the school teachers, the bus drivers, people working in retail stores and so on and so forth. In other words, we can talk about the hundreds of direct jobs, but also let us be cognizant of the fact that there are hundreds and hundreds of indirect jobs that are related to these permanent positions.

The government, in its wisdom, has decided to eliminate the grain support from central and western Canada. The Halifax elevator plays a vital role as a grain storage facility. Without it Cover Flour Mill, the only flour mill in Atlantic Canada, would likely be forced to close.

The Halifax elevator requires 260,000 tonnes a year to make it a viable facility. At the moment it is perilously close to moving below that. If that occurs in any substantive way the elevator would be forced to close down its operations partly or wholly and move hundreds of people out of full-time meaningful employment.

Without the Halifax elevator shipping feed grains by light vessel through the Port of Halifax, the only competitive alternative to rail transport, would no longer be possible. Based on past experience, this would result in an increase in the rail rates for domestic feed grains of at least $10 a tonne.

The livestock industry in the maritimes depends on grain from Ontario and western Canada. If the transport costs go up by $10 a tonne it is estimated that 5,000 jobs will be lost in the livestock industry, the feed mills, meat packing plants and dairies. I think that bears repeating. If the transportation costs go up by $10 a tonne it is estimated that 5,000 jobs will be lost.

For some people in the House of Commons losing 5,000 jobs may not be considered a major issue. Large plants in central Canada can close down and 2,000 or 3,000 people lose their jobs. Unfortunately, under the free trade agreement that has become a reality, a regular news item now in many of the regional newspapers. This is sad, it is disappointing, it is regretful, but under the free trade agreement this has become a reality.

In Atlantic Canada losing five jobs is serious. Fifty jobs is a major issue. Five hundred jobs is a regional crisis, and 5,000 jobs is an absolute, total disaster. Yet, that is what the impact of this legislation will do to Atlantic Canada.

I do not understand why people, particularly on the government side from Atlantic Canada, are not standing up and ranting and raving about the absolute lunacy of proceeding with this legislation, are not lobbying the cabinet and lobbying their colleagues to stop this sort of pell-mell run into a major economic crisis. Yet, there seems to be no sound whatsoever coming from the government benches.

If the Halifax grain elevator is required to close because the 260,000 tonnes a year are not realized, that will result in the loss of 283 jobs in the port itself. Another 250 indirect jobs may be lost as well, as I said earlier. Closure of the Dover Flour Mills would result in another 45 jobs being lost and the loss of a local market for producers of milling wheat.

In Ontario four grain elevators have been shut down because At and East has been cancelled—two in Midland, one in Port McNicoll and one in Prescott.

The Ontario flour mills have lost export contracts and require lower wheat prices to compete with Quebec mills for CIDA contracts. At the same time, Ontario farmers are already receiving record low prices and cannot afford to see their prices drop any further.

One can go on and on. I do not think that is necessary. We have to ask: "Who gains by this? Who benefits from this legislation?"

Previous speakers and I have pointed out that hundreds and hundreds of people who live in Atlantic Canada will be losers. A major livestock sector will be a loser. The poultry sector will be a loser. The flour milling will be a loser. Local grain producers will be in difficulty. The people who work in ports and elevators will be losers.

Who gains? Surely, the government must be helping somebody with this particular initiative. Interestingly enough, the winners of the loss of the At and East program are places in central Canada, primarily Montreal, but also ports in Ontario since Halifax and Saint John cannot compete with the St. Lawrence rates.

There is a deep unfairness in that the St. Lawrence seaway is subsidized several millions of dollars annually by the federal government through the provision of free ice-breaking, dredging and other Transport Canada services. While the support for the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway operations continue, the support for the Atlantic system is removed, which essentially is cutting off the lifeline for all those people in Atlantic Canada.

I simply want to summarize my remarks by suggesting that this is part of the way the Conservative government has been progressing.

In other words, let the free market decide what happens in Canada. Imagine if previous governments had done that. If they had simply allowed the American and the Yankee to and fro economic forces to dominate right across Canada, we would not have a country. There would be no Canada.

We were celebrating today the 100th anniversary of John A. Macdonald's death. One hundred years. Here was a leader of the Conservative Party with a vision of Canada: rails across the country and appropriate programs to support Canadian industry and create jobs from coast to coast to coast. He had a vision and a commitment to Canada as a country; something separate, an identity separate from the United States. It would be a way of life, a country and a vision of the future that was separated completely from that of the United States.

Today, we have exactly the opposite. We have a government with no vision at all, quite prepared to sell Canada to the United States in whatever form, and the sooner the better. Here is a government that is removing all sorts of programs which link up Canada and Canadians.

Today we are debating one. It is an opportunity for Canadians in the House of Commons to stand up and say: "Enough is enough". The At and East legislation will eliminate one of the critical and crucial lifeblood systems in the economics of Atlantic Canada forever.

We do not have to allow this to happen. We do not have to see this occur. That is why I am begging my colleagues opposite to do the right thing: stand up and support Atlantic Canada.

If we do not, all of the action is going to continue to flow economically into central Canada. As a result of the free trade agreement with the United States—God forbid if we ever get into the free trade agreement with Mexico as well—if we continue erosion of the economic activity southward into the sun belt and into northern Mexico, that is where the economic action will be in North America.

That is where the jobs will be. That is where the synergy of economics and financial investment will occur. It will not be in Atlantic Canada. It will not be in Canada, period.

This is an opportunity for us within our own area of jurisdiction to stand up and say: "Let's do something for Atlantic Canada that is meaningful."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, National Defence; the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby, Environment; the hon. member for Ottawa West, Public Service; and the hon. member for Hamilton East, Immigration.

• (1620)

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address remarks to Bill C-11 amending the Railway Act. I say to the member from British Columbia of the New Democratic Party, first and foremost, the At and East is dead. It has been dead since July 16, 1989. There is absolutely no point voting against the bill because nothing in the world will resurrect the At and East.

The grain products that were moving under the At and East subsidies ceased to move prior to July 16, 1989, and all we are dealing with is a legal technicality, one that should have been put to rest in the last session of Parliament. Why should it have been put to rest? Apparently the member from British Columbia of the New Democratic Party does not know. It should have been put to rest so we can get on with remedying the situation and to establish set-offs to the cancellation of the At and East that will benefit the port of Halifax and hopefully other east coast ports.

It is very disturbing to hear members of Parliament from other regions of Canada, no matter how well meaning or how good their intentions, to wax so eloquently on an issue that now has been put to rest in the area affected; Nova Scotia and the east coast ports. Let me explain why. There has not been one gallon, not one tonne of grain or grain products moving through the port of Halifax or any other east coast port under the At and East for approximately two years. Everybody should be clear on that.

Let us look at the positive side to which we have been trying to move for that same two year period, the assets to At and East. Even organizations like the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission representing the governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have said: "Eliminate the At and East."

The At and East was involved in expenditure over the years of approximately $40 million by the Government of Canada. What the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission wanted was all or a portion of that money to be spent on other transportation initiatives affecting not only marine transportation but the agriculture industry.

What were some of those offsets? We have had this in the House of Commons before. They are all on record. They have been before standing committees on transport and in various other places. Let me briefly list some of the offsetting items that were talked about by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, by the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Commission and by many other organizations.

One of the things that would offset the cancellation of the At and East and reduce the negative and adverse aspects of the cancellation would be utilization of unit trains to move grain to Halifax. We have for other reasons the possibility of the double-stacking of railway containers which would perhaps be a part of those kinds of railway line improvements.

This has been done in western Canada. Under the grain transportation system additional cars were provided by other agencies such as the government of Alberta, and so more people and agencies can provide better facilities for land transportation of grain. We can make better use of water transportation systems to Atlantic ports for feed grains. We can eliminate countervails on some of the U.S. products such as corn and use those products in Atlantic Canada. We could help the port of Saint John by improving the facilities there for the handling of grain products, and we could promote the export of flour from the port of Halifax with suitable attractions. We could also provide for export permits for feed grains to and from other foreign countries including the United States. We have all of these possible offsets listed, but we are not able to get on with the business of reducing and mitigating the impact of the cancellation of the At and East because it has been held up in Parliament. It has been in limbo for two years. That limbo was created by the opposition, and not always opposition members from Atlantic Canada who knew what was at stake but opposition members like the member of the New Democratic Party from British Columbia.

Let me digress to say that this very weekend the New Democratic Party is having a convention in Halifax. I hope while the New Democratic Party members are in Halifax they will seek the opportunity to consult with port officials and others actually involved, not armchair socialists but people actually involved in marine transportation and in the shipment of grain and grain products. I hope they will say to them: "What do you want us to do in Parliament? Do you want us to continue to hold up the finalization of the cancellation of the At and East, or do you want us to pass the legislation and get on with mitigating the disadvantages of the cancellation of the At and East?"

I am sure they will hear from everyone—port officials, stevedores—to get on with the business of mitigating the adverse impact of the cancellation of At and East.

I stand in the House once more to appeal to the opposition to get this legislation passed. The At and East is gone. There are no grain products moving in Canada on the basis of subsidization through the At and East provision. It is over. As I said at the outset, it is a dead issue; do not prolong it.

Let me talk about the port of Halifax and marine transportation in general. Again, we have those awful armchair socialists in the New Democratic Party reading briefing notes supplied by God knows who and getting up in the House of Commons making speeches about subjects of which they have little or no knowledge.

I am not trying to make remarks in their absence. I know they are all heading to Halifax, and I hope they spend their money there, but unfortunately there are no members of the New Democratic Party present in the House. However, in case they read the record, and I am not saying that any of them take the trouble to read any good material, let them note this. The marine transportation industry is international. It goes across the world.

If you are building a $50 million to a $100 million vessel and you are providing a crew and all the equipment necessary, you take that vessel anywhere you want to go in the world. Anyone in the marine transportation business knows that they have to compete world-wide. It has nothing to do with arrangements with the United States of America. It has nothing to do with loyalty to the North Atlantic routes. They are captive of no one in the marine transportation industry. They go where they get the best deal. They go where they get the best facility.

If Canadian ports do not provide the best facilities and the best arrangements, the marine transportation community operating massive fourth generation container ships and other vessels will go elsewhere. We have got to compete.

There is no way to protect Canada or Canadians in the marine transportation industry. Get it through your heads in the New Democratic Party and in the Liberal Party that this is not Canadianism at stake. We cannot have a made-in-Canada marine transportation policy. We might have a made-in-Canada shipbuilding policy—and we can debate that at another time—but we cannot have a made-in-Canada marine transportation policy.

Do not talk about the United States of America. Do not talk about arrangements with Europe. We have to compete with everyone, and they are from Hong Kong. They are from Taiwan. They are from Korea. They have massive ships. They have the crews to operate them, and they do not have to go to any ports. There is always a port they can find that will accommodate them. The issue is competition. You have to be competitive. The very word these armchair socialists don't like. They hate that word "competition". What happens is they come into the House of Commons and they tell members and the public that we do not need to compete, and that is simply not true. It might be true when you are growing grain and subsidizing it. I don't know about that. It may be true in some areas. But, for heaven's sake, understand it is not true in marine transportation. It is not true in the port business. This is why I want everybody to know, and if I have to say it louder I will: "We have to compete".

They understand that in the port of Halifax. The Halifax-Dartmouth Port Development Commission, the Halifax Port Commission, everybody connected with marine transportation understands it. It is the first thing they will tell you: you have to compete. You have to compete with New York. You have to compete with Montreal. You have to compete with Baltimore. In order to get the business you have to provide the facilities.

Now, let me talk about the port of Halifax, if I finally got that point through to anybody who is interested in that subject. My questions are about the port of Halifax, as an example. Somebody else can make a speech for the port of Saint John. Maybe my good friend from Carleton County will make that speech. For the moment I am going to talk about the port of Halifax, because there are real difficulties in the port of Halifax. They are caused by the pressure of international competition. How are we going to react to these pressures that make the port of Halifax not competitive in some areas?

First of all, we have to have a level field among Canadian ports. That is to say, neither the port of Halifax nor the port of Montreal, nor any other east coast port can have an advantage over the other ports, based on government intervention and subsidization. For decades the complaint in the port of Halifax has been that the government policies favour the port of Montreal. I have nothing against the port of Montreal. I have nothing against appropriate and proper competition among ports. But I, like most people in Halifax, think that the port of Montreal is given advantages over the port of Halifax on the basis of government policy.

I could go back in history in other speeches I have made and detail those specific areas of advantage or disadvantage. Many years ago, the Government of Canada built substantial infrastructure within the port of Montreal. It gave the port of Montreal tremendous facilities at government cost, at taxpayers' expense, and then wrote off the debt. When the Government of Canada under the Liberals—and I do not blame my good friend from Newfoundland about that, those things happen—wrote off the debts for the Canadian ports, the debt they wrote off for the port of Montreal was in the area of $600 million. The debt they wrote off for the port of Halifax was in the area of $100 million. I have the statistics. I presented them years ago to the House, but that is the kind of thing that has happened.

But the big gripe, the continuing gripe, the everyday gripe is the facilities that are made available to the port of Montreal for ice-breaking and navigation. Let me tell you as quickly as possible why that complaint exists.

Halifax is one of the greatest deep water ports in the world. You can get any kind of ship, any size of ship in. Mr. Speaker, as you are from Edmonton you may not be interested in this; you couldn't get a rowboat into Edmonton. In the port of Halifax any day of the week, any time of the day, you can get the largest ship in the world right up to the dock, no problem at all.

You cannot do that in the port of Saint John. I am not going to argue that point. But, in order to get that kind of vessel into the port of Montreal, you pretty nearly have to pick it up and carry it in. It is not quite that bad, but you have to have all kinds of navigational aids. You have to have all kinds of harbour dredging. You have to have all kinds of assistance, and you have to keep the shipping lane free of ice. Who does that for the port of Montreal? The taxpayers of Canada do it for the port of Montreal, because the Government of Canada provides that service and it is not charged to anybody. What we say in the Port of Halifax is: charge those services out to the users.

It is unbelievable from the perspective of Edmonton. For years the port of Halifax was saying: "charge those expenses out to the shippers, charge those expenses out to the users of the facilities". For years the Liberal government refused to do that. Finally, when the Conservative government came to power in 1984, it said that it was time to end this anomaly. It was time to end this unlevel field. It was time to create a proper atmosphere for competition.

The Government of Canada brought in Canada Shipping Act changes in Bill C-75. In that act there was placed a provision that would allow for services such as ice-breaking and navigation to be charged back to the users. The international shipping companies, from Taiwan, Hong Kong, Japan, Europe, Hapag Lloyd from Hamburg—all those organizations—would have to pay the cost of ice-breaking, navigational aids and so on.

Do you know what happened? I do not want to embarrass the member from Newfoundland, but another member from Newfoundland, from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, personally, individually stopped the passage of this legislation in this House of Commons by standing up for seven hours on third reading and stopping that legislation.

Do you know what he said in the House of Commons on October 31, 1986, which was more or less something he said earlier on June 27, 1986? He said that there was no way the Liberal Party was going to allow such a provision to be passed.

He said on June 27, 1986: "I think it is extremely important that the record be set straight, because we would not want the House to inadverently or accidentally get the impression that anyone in Canada is warped enough or misinformed enough to endorse clause 4 of Bill C-75".

Later, on another occasion, October 31, 1986, he spoke of Bill C-75, clause 4, and he said: "That bill died on the vine because we in the Liberal Party opposed it". The Liberal Party opposed clause 4 of Bill C-74, which he said in his speech would allow the imposition of user fees. He said: "User fees for what?" User fees for Coast Guard service, navigational aids and ice-breaking services.

A member from Atlantic Canada stopped the legislative position that would have allowed for a level field between the port of Halifax and other east coast ports and the port of Montreal. It is on record; it is undeniable. Today, five years later and for the last 500 years since John Cabot or somebody sailed up some kind of strait, the port of Montreal has had an advantage over the port of Halifax. We can lay the blame on the Liberal Party of Canada.

They are still at it. They are still stopping measures that could be used to rebuild the competitive base, that could give the port certain advantage, that could provide for offsets to the At and East, that could get us on with the business of improving the port of Halifax.

Let me tell you what the most serious difficulty is now. It is inland transportation. It is the Canadian National Railway system. Unless the Canadian National Railway changes its attitude, unless it provides better facilities, unless we get better service through double stacking, rail line improvements and lower rates, then we cannot be competitive.

People in the marine transportation industry are saying that if Halifax does not get competitive the port can die. It is almost impossible under the present situation for the port of Halifax to compete with the port of Montreal. Forget the port of Montreal. If was not them—and thank God it is—it would be the American ports. At least the business is staying in Canada. But in a short time it will be the American ports that are going to take all the business with the help of Canadian corporations like Canadian Pacific. They are buying railways and providing facilities that will allow Canadian destined cargo to go through American ports.

It is a very difficult situation. It will not be resolved unless we take the initial steps to correct the situation we now have: get rid of the subsidization that now exists, provide effective and constructive assistance , and get on with the matter of competition. There is in no other answer in international trade.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Halifax West and, first of all, I want to respond to the remarks he made about the member from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

The member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte did, as the hon. member just suggested, stand in the House of Commons for six or seven hours and spoke to the House. He dragged out the debate. He spoke all afternoon, all evening, and he was prepared to speak all night. In fact, I am sure he would have spoken for 48 hours or 72 hours if need be.

I want it on the record why the hon. member from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte stood here in the House of Commons last year and single-handedly filibustered a bill presented by the Government of Canada.

The hon. member who just spoke was absolutely correct. The member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte spoke against clause 4 of Bill C-75. I do not recall exactly what the number was, but the clause had to do with imposing user fees for ice-breaker services in Canada.

I would like to put it on the record, in this way, why the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte did what he did.

Today I had telephone calls in my office from two people who lived on an island called Long Island on the east coast of Newfoundland. One gentleman had to go to the doctor because he was having what he called radiation sickness. He was being treated for cancer. He was very sick and he felt very bad. He wanted to go from Beaumont, Long Island into Robert's Arm in Newfoundland to see the doctor there in order to be prescribed some pills because he was feeling so bad after he had taken the radiation treatment, which he told me he takes once a month in the Health Sciences Complex in St. John's.

He telephoned me, and his voice was not very good because the radiation had affected it. He said: "Look, I'm stuck here on this island and I cannot get in to see the doctor. The ice is all piled up around the shore and I cannot get in to see a doctor".

Now there are four islands in a row: Little Bay Islands that the hon. member for Labrador knows quite well; Long Island; then there is Change Islands further on; and then there is Fogo Island. Each one of those islands has ferry boats going back and forth, except right now the ice has clogged up everything. It goes out for about 180 miles.

This gentleman was saying: "Look, there is no helicopter service and planes cannot land". This is today, and he wanted to get in to see the doctor.

I checked with the Coast Guard and it said: "Well, we have one ice-breaker assigned to those four islands to try to keep it ice free. But we needed the ice-breaker today because there was a paper boat going into Beaumont and there was an oil boat that needed to go into Lewisporte and we only have one ice-breaker on all of that east coast of Newfoundland".

I phoned up the Coast Guard and I said: "Now, where are your ice-breakers? Don't you provide ice-breaker service anymore to these ferry boats along the coast?" It said: "Well, you know we have got a lot of business accumulated and we have got one ice-breaker on dry dock and we have another one with the propeller that was damaged". I said: "Well, where are all the other ice-breakers?" The Coast Guard said: "Well, there are seven sitting tied up to the dock in Quebec City."

I said: "Are those working?" The answer was: "No, no, those aren't working, but a couple of them are on stand-by. You see, we do not send anymore ice-breakers to accompany ships that go through the Arctic. We found that it is more cost-effective to leave the ice-breaker in Quebec City tied up and if the ship gets stuck, we will send up the ice-breaker then—more cost effective".

There are another five tied up in Nova Scotia. I said to the Coast Guard: "Now, come on, you have islands that are being totally isolated because of ice. Can't you assign more ice-breakers to keep these islands open?" The answer was: "No, that is not the policy of the Coast Guard anymore. You see, we are into a policy of trying to save money".

See how things have changed. The hon. member a moment ago said: "The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte stood in the House and he was opposed to user fees with ice-breakers".

Of course he was, of course he was. Why, if the Government of Canada brought in that policy there would not be any ferry boats operating. There would not be any because the ferry boats are no longer owned or subsidized by the Government of Canada. The Government of Canada did away with the subsidies for all those ferry boats, didn't they Mr. member for Labrador. He knows quite well. The government did away with that. Now it is whoever uses the ferry boats has to pay for them, not the Government of Canada.

In fact, when we think about this policy of subsidies and trying to save money we know quite a change has taken place in Atlantic Canada. The hon. member spoke about marine transportation, but that is only half the story. Marine Atlantic moves our freight and people throughout Atlantic Canada. Yet, Marine Atlantic has no 1-800 number anymore. We cannot pick up the phone anywhere in Canada and phone a 1-800 number to find out when the ferry boats are going to operate in Atlantic Canada. It was cut out this year by the Government of Canada.

We can no longer phone a 1-800 number to find out or make reservations on Marine Atlantic, but if we were in the United States we can.

Mr. Rideout: That can't be true.

Mr. Baker Oh yes, oh yes. In other words, in Texas we can phone to find out when the ferries are operating. To make a reservation to go to Newfoundland on a ferry or to P.E.I. phoning from Texas you can do it free of charge, but if you are living in Canada you cannot do it anymore. The Government of Canada through Marine Atlantic says it was because of the high costs that it wanted to keep the 1-800 number from the United States because fewer people were using the 1-800 number. Those are the decisions that have been made by the Government of Canada in trying to reduce subsidies for transportation in eastern Canada.

• (1650)

I was looking at the books the other day for marine transportation and I noticed that three vessels now used for the movement of freight on the east coast are not even registered in Canada. In fact, the last vessel that was hired by CN is actually not only registered in a foreign country, but owned in a foreign country.

Quite a change has taken place. If you picked up the telephone in that same area we are talking about, from Labrador down to the northeast coast of Newfoundland, you would no longer speak into the receiver of a company that is a subsidiary of the Government of Canada. That was sold last year.

An hon. member: Really?

Mr. Baker: Yes, and it was sold—this is a long story, but I am going to make it very short.

An hon. member: Oh, no, no, we want the story.

Mr. Baker: The successful bidder was the bigger telephone company in the province, represented of course by a consultant who happened to be yes, a former member of the House of Commons. That is the telephone company. We can no longer pick up the telephone and phone through a telephone company that was called TNT at the time, up until a couple of years ago—Terra Nova Tel.

An hon. member: That is an explosive.

Mr. Baker: It was an explosive telephone company. It was an excellent telephone company. You could phone and ask information what the number was for such and such and it would be able to tell you, because it was living locally in those areas.

The telephone company is gone. Now you go down to the airport. There is no longer a sign saying Air Canada. That is gone since this government took over. You can no longer pick up the telephone and phone through the government subsidized company, a subsidiary of the Government of Canada that was making money every year. The government sold it.

There is no sign that says Air Canada anymore. Then there is the ultimate insult. In this bill we are talking about railway subsidies. We know what the government did to the railway. Every weekend when I am in my riding, I usually try to get a little bit of exercise and go for a walk. I go for a walk along where the railway line used to be.

An hon. member: That is pretty safe, eh, George.

Mr. Baker: Pretty safe. You will never get knocked down by a train because there is no track anymore.

An hon. member: You mean the government even took the track away?

Mr. Baker: It even took the track away. It not only took the trains away but took the track away. Not only that, but if you go a short distance to one of our smaller communities you will find a fellow who does not pick up the phone anymore through a government-run outfit to make a reservation on Air Canada, which is gone, or check on the train, which is no longer operating. Also, there is no post office in the community.

An hon. member: What. Oh, shame.

Mr. Baker: There is no post office in the community. Where is the federal identity at all in those communities? There is no federal presence at all. There is nothing. That is the policy of the Government of Canada.

What are we doing here today? Today we are dealing with a bill, Bill C-11, that says that if you loaded flour on a railway car after July 15, 1989, and it has not arrived yet, then it is not going to be subsidized.

That is what the bill says. If you loaded the flour on the train after July 15, 1989, and it has not yet arrived, then it is not subsidized.

I just hope that it is not what they call bread and roll mix because those railway cars would have blown up by now. I do not know if there is any date on flour but maybe that is what I am doing wrong.

That is what the bill is. The bill is to do away with a subsidy that it did away with several years ago. The Government of Canada is not interested any more in paying a subsidy for anything going to the east coast of Canada.

Hon. members know today where the grain comes from for the livestock feed. Only 380,000 tonnes of it come from domestic places; 320,000 tonnes now come from the EEC or the United States. The government member stands up and says: "We've got to be in a competitive market. We've got to do away with all of these subsidies for moving grain and flour to eastern Canada". The most highly subsidized grain movements in the world are those in the EEC, which now exports grain to eastern Canadian markets and grain movements throughout the United States of America.

All in all, this bill is part of a general philosophy of the Government of Canada which says it is going to set people adrift. It is no longer going to be responsible for an even, fair and level playing field in Canada because it is going to say that those who have it will always have it and those who cannot afford it are never going to be able to get it.

Those people set adrift are the people in eastern Canada, the people in Atlantic Canada. It is the Government of Canada that is totally to blame.

I would suggest that the Government of Canada take a second look at this particular piece of legislation. I do not know what would happen if the bill did not pass. What would happen if the bill did not pass? Is there flour and grain aboard railway cars in Canada that has been there since July 15, 1989 waiting for export which was not completed until after January 31, 1990? What would be the legality? It is an interesting question.

If someone took the federal government to court and said: "Look, you are going to have to pay this subsidy because it is presently a part of the Railway Act and it was never amended by the Government of Canada", it would bring up the question of the supremacy of Parliament. Can the Government of Canada pass a bill which says it is going to discontinue a direct subsidy on a product from point A to point B without amending the legislation to end that subsidy? What would the judge say?

We all know the way legislation is treated. We have all appeared before judges on behalf of our constituents and we have presented arguments on everything under the sun. I have grave doubts whether the Government of Canada would be able to answer the question of why it discontinued a subsidy without amending the appropriate legislation to end it. The Government of Canada should reinstate the subsidy and be true to its word.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next time the bill comes up, the hon. member will have 10 minutes questions and comments. I hope that you will all be there when the debate is all over.

I have received written notice from the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, Mr. Allmand, that he is unable to move his motion during private members' hour on Monday, June 10, 1991. It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in order of precedence pursuant to Standing Order 94(2).

Accordingly, I am directing the table officers to drop the item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

Private members' hour will thus be cancelled. Pursuant to Standing Order 99(2) the House will meet to consider Government Orders at 11 o'clock a.m.

It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 37, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CO-OPERATIVE DEVELOPMENT AGENCIES

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of directing financial assistance to Co-operative Development Agencies, pilot co-op projects, and Community-based Economic Development Organizations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is again a privilege to rise under private members' business to discuss an item of business which I think is very important to a great many Canadians, but which is not very easy to cover within the regular business of the House because co-operatives and community development organizations enjoy a very low priority with the present government.

When we are talking about co-operatives and community development organizations, I think we are talking about something that is part of a larger trend in our society.

Certainly when Canadians are discussing the political and constitutional future of their country, we hear a lot of talk about Canadians wanting to be directly involved in determining the future of the country.

They want to be directly involved in making the decisions that affect their political and economic future. It could well be said that the low standing which the government currently enjoys in public opinion polls is a direct result of its inability or unwillingness to involve Canadians directly in their political future.

I think this feeling on behalf of Canadians that the future is out of their control and their deep concerns about the future of their community, their children and themselves is also very evident when it comes to their economic future. People ought to be involved just as much in their economic future and ought to have just as much control over their economic future as they do over their political future.

If I could review just briefly the general trends when it comes to economic development in this country, I think it is fair to say that we have seen two major trends since the Second World War.

The general policy pursued by Liberal governments through the years relied very much on attracting branch plants to the country and developing an the economy that was very closely linked to that of the United States.

There was very little opportunity within that economic structuring for local control or development of local economies.

With the Progressive Conservative government which we have seen since 1984, those trends have become much more evident. The trend toward the loss of local control has become much more serious through two specific trends which the government has introduced, those being its reliance on megaprojects which are directly tied to its reliance on the major corporations, the large corporations in this country and in other countries.

That again is tied directly to its reliance on the free trade deal to attempt to move the economy of this country forward.

As a result, what we see is an economy that is reeling. It is not only reeling at the national level when it comes to the macroeconomic trends, but it is expressed very much at the local level in the loss of confidence in the future by many people in local communities and the loss of control over what is happening to people's jobs and economic livelihoods.

At the same time, we see the exacerbation of a trend which Canada has noticed for a long time, that is the widening gap between the rich and poor in this country. Canada has one of the worst records in the world when it comes to the gap between rich and poor in this country and that gap is only becoming wider. However, there is an option and that is the option represented by the democratic economic system.

From coast to coast we see Canadians very much involved in the democratic economic system. On the east coast we see the Antigonish movement. In northern Canada we see Arctic co-ops. On the west coast we see fishing co-ops, In Quebec we see the Desjardins movement. In the large cities and metropolitan areas we see the development of housing co-operatives. On the prairies we see the pools and federated co-ops. There are credit unions from coast to coast. There are community economic development organizations in many communities, and these are particularly successful in many of the native communities in this country.

In fact when we look at this sector, we look at 12 million Canadians who have a direct stake in the economic future of their community, 12 million Canadians who are direct stakeholders in their economic future. This is many times the number of Canadians who own shares in corporations through stock exchanges or own and have interest in private businesses. This is the most effective way to get people directly involved in their economic future and that of the country.

When you look at the size and strength of the co-operative sector, seven of the ten largest enterprises in agriculture handling over 40 per cent of the receipts in agriculture are co-operatives. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians are involved in community economic development corporations of one sort or another. We must say that these organizations have grown up largely on their own. At best they have experienced benign neglect from governments both provincial and federal and have in fact developed on their own. In some ways this is appropriate to grass roots economic organizations, but it also demonstrates the strength of bottom-up organizations as opposed to top-down approaches to economic organization. It boggles the mind to think of what these organizations could be doing if in fact they had the appropriate kind of assistance, some of which I plan to outline in my presentation.

In 1984 the co-operative sector, through the Canadian Co-operative Association, undertook a major study on the future direction of co-operatives and how governments could relate to them. There were four major recommendations coming from that task force, including the appointment of a minister of state for co-operatives, the formation of a co-op savings plan, more funds for co-op research and education, and the promotion of housing, worker health, and resource co-ops.

Since then we have seen the formation of the co-operative secretariat and the appointment of a minister in 1987. But it has been a very tentative step and it has fallen very much short of the expectations of the co-op sector and the realization of the potential of this sector. In fact there are only nine people in the co-op secretariat. Certainly when you view the vast mandate to promote co-ops, to organize federal-provincial conferences, to follow up on initiatives from those conferences, to co-ordinate co-operative development through other government departments, nine people arrayed against the vast federal bureaucracy is a mere drop in the bucket. It is a credit to the dedication and competence of those people that we get as much activity out of that secretariat as we do.

One direct result of the fact that those resources are inadequate is what we see happening with regard to the GST and co-ops. I have repeatedly asked in this House over the last year—and the co-op sector has made numerous representations—for equal treatment under the GST for co-ops. As it stands now, the government argues that membership and shareholding in a co-op is the same as membership in a golf course. This is preposterous and indicates what a fundamental lack of understanding there is for how the co-op sector operates among both government bureaucrats and members opposite.

It seems as well that regional development organizations and organizations promoting economic development like the FBDB are inoculated against involvement with co-ops because when you look at the regulations, the pro-active activities they undertake, co-ops and community development organizations very often seem to be the last thing on their mind.

• (1710)

There are a number of specific co-operative initiatives that I would like to outline as being very worthy of public sector support.

First of all, in the area of co-operative housing, we have the sad spectacle of a promise the government made to build 5,000 co-op housing units a year. Has this promise been kept? No, Mr. Speaker. We are now down to about 1,500 units a year. These units are being built under a constant barrage of criticism within this House, misplaced criticism that could only be politically motivated by members of both the government and the political opposition. They attempt to use the fact that several members of Parliament have been involved in organizing and maintaining co-op housing and are trying to use this to discredit the co-op housing movement in general.

When you look at the record, CMHC's own studies show that co-op housing is by far the most cost-effective way to provide housing for Canadians who are now sleeping in streets, sleeping 20 to a home in northern Canada, and in desperate need of moderately priced and affordable housing.

At the same time, I do not hear anything from these members attacking the fact that we subsidize luxury condominiums by an average of $20,000 per unit through the MURB Program.

A second initiative that I think is very worthy of support is the whole area of worker co-ops. A study done in Atlantic Canada showed that worker co-ops use only approximately $1,500 in capital per job to provide jobs through the formation of worker co-ops. At the same time, the government's operation ACOA spends an average of $150,000 to create a single job; that is $1,500 as opposed to $150,000 when you compare worker co-ops to the jobs that are created through ACOA.

It is no wonder that the premiers of Atlantic Canada have noted this phenomenon. They are, at this very time, organizing themselves to provide a major initiative in Atlantic Canada to provide jobs, to develop communities through the development of not only worker co-ops but community based co-ops of all sorts.

I am very pleased to see this and I commend the premiers of Atlantic Canada for recognizing the tremendous potential of worker co-ops and other co-operatives.

At the same time, in other parts of Canada, we see a massive job loss through free trade and economic decisions related to free trade. We see plants being shut down that are perfectly profitable, where those jobs could go on for a long time if it were based only on the economics of the particular plant or enterprise. These kind of enterprises are surely ripe for worker co-operative ownership.

In that respect, I would like to commend my colleague from Sault Ste. Marie for bringing forward a private member's bill that would enhance worker ownership in this country and make it much more feasible to undertake worker ownership. I think this is certainly one of the key factors or mechanisms that we could be using against the very sad trend toward job loss and the loss of economic futures in many communities.

In fact, I would like to say to government members that when the government promised adjustment mechanisms to cope with the fall-out from free trade, surely pilot projects in the area of worker co-operatives are something the government could and should be looking at very closely.

I would also like to say that the government might well look at some of the proposals made by the Canadian Co-operative Association for a worker co-op investment fund and the establishment of worker co-op enterprise centres to spur the development of worker co-ops in this country.

A third area where co-operative development has a bright future and could help economic development is in the whole area of the resource sector. There are farming, fishing and forestry communities from coast to coast in this country under tremendous economic stress and see themselves as having very little economic future if present trends continue. I personally undertook an economic consultation tour in my own constituency recently. My own constituency combines all of those resource industries. It has farming as a major industry. There is a sizeable inland fishery and there is a significant forestry sector in that community. Every community I went to and virtually every group I talked to said the problem is that they have lost local control of the resource, that they can no longer make the economic decisions on resource allocation which would make it possible to sustain their jobs into the future.

Therefore, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that co-operative development in the resource sector, the use of regional development money to finance these kinds of projects, is exactly what we need. We do not need any more megaprojects. We do not need any more fancy schemes cooked up in the capitals to try and prop up these industries. What we need is support for local control, support for local co-operative and community enterprises.

The fourth area that shows a lot of promise when it comes to community and local control is the area of health. A study in Saskatchewan has shown that there is a potential 17 per cent saving in health care costs over all through the use of co-operative and community based health associations.

This is a tremendous saving at a time when our medicare system is under threat from both provincial and federal governments due both to a lack of a philosophical belief in medicare and publicly funded health and the costs associated with it. These savings are possible because these kinds of organizations can provide the kind of integrated health care and the kind of preventive measures that make it possible for Canadians to stay healthy without the high cost intervention of the current medical model.

I would like to commend the community health associations in this country which in the last few days came together to try and form an association of community health centres to promote this kind of development from coast to coast. I would encourage the government very much to support that movement with all the resources that it has and to make a basic commitment to this major change in how we approach health care.

Child care is another area where co-operative involvement has shown itself to be not only effective in giving parents control but also effective in providing low cost quality child care for the many children in this country who do not have it.

We talk about being competitive and productive in this country, but there are hundreds of thousands of parents, particularly women, who are unable to become competitive and productive because they cannot undertake the training or take the jobs that might be available because of the lack of adequate child care. I might note that the national association of those organizations tries to make do with budget of $11,000 a year.

As well, frontier co-ops, as demonstrated by Arctic co-ops and the co-operative development fund in the north, show very clearly that this kind of development is most appropriate to the economic development of native communities and isolated communities in this country where unemployment often runs as high as 85 to 90 per cent, with the resulting despair, stress and social breakdown that comes with it.

I turn briefly to the whole area of community economic development. There is a huge number of these organizations across the country, but they are plagued with several things. They have lurched from one program to another as governments tried to come to terms with this phenomenon, without any real vision or without any real co-ordination. In fact, the Economic Council of Canada in a major report called From the Bottom Up says, and I quote:

> People banding together at the local level to promote community economic development can make a real difference to many places across the country. Local residents are often in a better position to judge the economic problems and possibilities of their communities than are federal and provincial bureaucrats.

As part of that report, the Economic Council of Canada recommends several things. It recommends, first of all, that support should be channelled into the establishment of community economic development organizations and their organizational support. They need better information networks. need training. They need access to market opportunities. The council recommends that business funding should in fact come through existing channels while funding for these organizations should go toward promoting their establishment and organization. They say too that priority should be given to rural and remote areas and that an integrated approach to community development should include not only economics but the provision of services and enhancing the quality of life.

• (1720)

Therefore, in conclusion, I would like to say that there is another option to the way that we have been going in this country, to the regime of free trade and letting the big corporations look after our economic future. This is the community based economic option. The potential of this sector is a sleeping giant. We have seen its potential, but this potential is still untapped.

Therefore I would like to call on the government to exhibit the imagination and political will to realize this potential. Not only would individuals and communities benefit, but we as a country would be very much stronger.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to say a few words on what is not only an important issue but an important movement in the sense that co-ops have been a very integral part of Canada for many decades, and that is particularly true, as the hon. member has just indicated, for rural Canada which in a very real sense each of us represents.

I would like, as a member from western Canada, from the province of Manitoba, representing Brandon—Souris, just to say one or two words by way of introduction with respect to the role of co-ops in the history of western Canada as I have perceived them to be, and then to discuss in greater detail the specific point which is before us this evening.

I think it is probably true that the history of the co-operative movement has not yet been written in any definitive sense. I believe when it is written, or when it is more generally appreciated than is the case now, that there will be a greater awareness of the fact that the co-operative movement for rural Canada has in many cases filled a void which had been there for some time and might have continued to exist into the distant future, had it not been for the co-operative movement and the response of those who lived within the areas.

One of the advantages of course which the co-operative movement had was the fact that it enabled people to a very large degree to look to themselves for solutions to their own problems, whatever the nature of the problems may have been. That is true in terms of the origin of the wheat pools in western Canada, in what we now know as Saskatchewan, then part of the territories, or whether it is in the more recent development of child care co-operatives, day care centres, that are very much a part of most of our urban communities.

One of the great difficulties in rural Canada in the past—and certainly it continues to be now—is the component of size. Very often the private sector is not as interested in meeting what it perceives to be the limited market perspectives of the area. Unfortunately, as a result of that, the alternatives to those who live within the area, the resources available to those who live within the area, were not as great as they would have been.

When I go back and think about the history of the co-operative movement with respect to the marketing of grain, I recall the fact with some clarity that western Canadian grain farmers were faced not with the fact that there were no services made available to meet their needs, but with the fact that very often they were indeed a monopoly. As we know very well, it is the essence of the private sector that it should depend upon the competitive factor to protect the interests of the consumers. Where that is not the case, then very often the consumer is at a disadvantage.

What happened in western Canada in many of our smaller communities is that people began to rally together either to provide a service that was not present at all or to act as a competitive factor with services which already existed and often were operated in a monopolistic fashion.

Thus was born the wheat pools, which today of course is a major agribusiness throughout western Canada, a huge business, perhaps one of the largest that we have, although I do not have the statistics before me.

Another advantage of course of the co-operative movement was that it permitted people to make decisions or have decisions made within their own community, and not to depend upon the headquarters of a business whether it be in Winnipeg, Regina, Toronto or wherever it may be. Very often decisions made by the co-operative movement then, and to a significant degree now, were made by local people in response to local conditions.

The other advantage is that it has provided a tremendous opportunity for the emergence of local leadership. Within all of our communities—and this becomes evident to those of us who are politicians at election time—there is a tremendous talent, a reservoir of leadership talent which is not always tapped. Those of us who get elected as a result of volunteers, in essence often coming out of the woodwork, discover there are many people who have talent for leadership which is not always recognized.

That was true in the emergence of the co-operative movement in the past and I continue to believe so now.

When we look today to the role of the co-operative movement and where I see it as being particularly important and where the government recognizes its importance, is in two areas that I would identify, one, of course, being the north, in the area of the Arctic.

Many of the conditions that exist in the Arctic now are not unlike the conditions which existed in western Canada in days gone by. The reason why the co-operative movement is emerging now, as it did then, is because those conditions are very similar. In fact, if I recall correctly, in the last 30 years some 52 new co-ops have emerged in northern Canada, which of course is a testimony to the fact that the needs which were there in the past are there at present.

The government is delighted that as a result of the emergence of the co-operative movement in Arctic Canada, people have economic opportunities they did not have before. For example, in the area of local community development, we see major management training programs being provided in some cases by the Arctic Co-Operatives Limited. In other cases we see sales outlets being developed in southern Canada for product which otherwise might not reach the market with ease.

The federal government has been happy to play a partnership role in that process through the co-operative secretariat which was established in 1987 and by working in close co-operation with provincial governments in some cases and with territorial governments in others.

The establishment of three community development organizations have occurred in the north and some financial assistance has been provided to them. In addition, looking into the broader area of the co-operative movement today we see the renewal of the co-operative housing program. This, of course, has been important for many of our communities. I have such projects in my constituency of Brandon—Souris and very often it provides a stimulation to the construction industry which is much appreciated and very often much needed. In addition, it often provides a source of stable and affordable housing for those to whom such housing might not have otherwise been available.

The government is pleased to work with the child care co-ops, recognizing that in a changing world there is a recognized need for child care facilities that was not there two and three decades ago. In saying that, I am not suggesting that the need was not there, I am suggesting that the recognition of the need was not there. This provides an excellent opportunity, as I said before, for people to gather together the resources of their own community.

Very often the co-ops are not looking for substantial amounts of federal government assistance. They are to be complimented on that. In fact, what they are basically saying, at least to my understanding, is that they really are not generally seeking anything more than is available to any other institution trying to provide a comparable level of service.

As I say that, I am conscious of the fact that there is some division within the child care community in terms of how services should be provided and who receives what assistance. But I think the generalization which I have issued is reasonably valid.

The other area which I would like to address in a moment is the fact that I believe the co-op movement is extremely important in Atlantic Canada, as it has been in the past.

There are many Atlantic Canada co-operatives that have benefited from some federal assistance. The figures are not huge. In fact, they were talking in terms of, for example, a community development co-operative in Nova Scotia receiving $25,000 in assistance. I think what is noteworthy about that is perhaps not the fact that they received $25,000 but the fact that it is only $25,000 because as we know in this House, we live in a world where now that is not considered to be a huge amount of money.

• (1730)

There is a fisheries co-op in the maritimes that has received assistance of $50,000 to identify ways to pull themselves out of some financial difficulty. The list goes on and if I had more time—I realize the rules do not provide me with more time—but there are many such examples. Perhaps other members in the House will address some of those, and particularly with respect to Atlantic Canada.

I think the history of the co-operative movement in Canada is one of partnership, partnership between people who have the capacity and the desire to assist themselves and the federal and the provincial levels of government trying to assist them wherever they can. I think it is partnership that has been working and I would encourage hon. members to join together to ensure that that partnership continues to function in the future as it has in the past.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure as well to join in the debate on this motion. I think that I in particular am very pleased to be speaking on this motion because my community has a very large co-op in it. The Co-op Atlantic, which is the main co-operative in Atlantic Canada, is headquartered in Moncton and it has made a very valuable contribution to our economy.

I believe that when you look at our economy in Moncton it is the proper mix of those types of enterprises, some large—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. Point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: First of all, let me apologize to my colleague for a short intervention.

There have been discussions among the parties and I think you would find unanimous consent to pass the following motion.

> Notwithstanding any previous proceedings of this House, Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and Customs Tariff in consequence thereof be deemed read a second time and passed on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no agreement.

Mr. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before I was interrupted, Moncton has an economy that has the kind of mix that indicated how well a good positive economy can function and in that the co-op movement makes a very valuable contribution.

As I was stating, Co-op Atlantic is the largest co-operative organization in Atlantic Canada and its headquarters is in Moncton. It employs a large number of people and makes a very substantial contribution to our economy. We are proud of the association that our community has with the co-op movement and with Co-op Atlantic in particular.

If you have ever been to Moncton you can see there are large office buildings on Commercial Street, Record Street, you can see the large buildings on Halifax Street and you can appreciate the tremendous contribution that is being made.

In addition, we have a co-op housing organization called Atlantic People's Housing and, again, that is a co-operative that has made just tremendous contributions in the housing field. They have had a concern for people and they have provided low-cost individual housing and, as well, they have provided good, substantial senior citizen's housing.

In my own neighbourhood there is a large apartment building for seniors. It was erected by the Atlantic People's Co-op and it has done just a tremendous job. In fact, they are always having people trying to get into that particular co-op because of the quality of the building and the quality of the lifestyle. It is a co-operative and people have a say in how it functions. They have input and they have a say. That, I think, is the distinction.

We have also seen the tremendous contribution that credit unions have made to our community and to Atlantic Canada. For that reason we can see the excellent results that the Caisse Populaire, the Desjardins organization in Quebec is having. It is really fuelling the Quebec economy. It has been the small credit unions who know the people, who know the players, who have made those decisions, not on the basis of dollars and cents, but on the basis of people. That is the difference between the co-op movement and some of our banks and other financial institutions. Needless to say, we are pleased in Atlantic Canada, because we are the type of communities where people count, where they make a difference. We are not just a number or a statistic, as happens in some of the larger communities. The co-operative movement is typical of an Atlantic Canadian organization.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are going to try another point of order here.

BILL C-17

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move:

> That, notwithstanding any previous proceedings of this House, Bill C-17, an act to amend the Criminal Code and Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, be deemed read a second time and referred to Legislative Committee H, on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CO-OPERATIVE DEVELOPMENT AGENCIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Funk (p. 1305).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Moncton.

An hon. member: I think it is a great speech.

Mr. Rideout: Well, it had all kinds of potential until now.

I think the one interesting thing with Co-op Atlantic is that it has just adopted a new mission statement for renewing the co-operative option. I think it bodes well for the co-operative movement in Atlantic Canada and throughout all of the country if other co-ops take the same imaginative approach.

I would like to read from their proposal for renewal. "The ultimate goal of the co-operatives that own Co-op Atlantic" says part of the proposal for renewal "is to extend co-operative values to all parts of the socioeconomic system through the creation of an interdependent network of co-operative enterprises whose operations gain their vitality and business strength through innovative application of co-operative values and principles".

That option for renewal is going to be most beneficial to the co-op movement and most beneficial to people in Atlantic Canada.

If the co-op movement in the west and across our country adopts the same option of renewal, not only will just the co-ops benefit, but all of Canada will benefit from that endeavour.

The nice thing about co-ops, as we all know, is that it is a bottom-up theory. We see all of these top-down, big government measures, big corporations that dictate exactly what is going to take place. We have seen it in the fishing industry where the big corporations come in and dictate what is going to take place and the little guy is left out of the process. The beauty of co-operatives is that it is bottom-up. It is the people who are affected who are involved and have the say. That is why we have seen some of the best co-ops function in our fishing industries, our farming co-operatives, as well as retail co-operatives. We all know the wonderful effects it has had in the area of credit unions.

We on this side of the House see very positive advantages to the motion that was put forward and the direction the motion suggests. Again, I look to Moncton and at the amounts of money that Liberal governments put into co-operative housing for seniors, for single parents, for the poor. These large sums of money show the commitment of Liberal governments of the past.

That commitment has not remained. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you would agree with me and that you are as upset as I am by the fact that the government has instituted cut after cut after cut in the area of housing and particularly, co-operative housing in the most recent budget. I can see by the look on your face that you are as upset as I am that the government is taking these steps and doing these types of things, when we should be doing the reverse, putting more money into single family co-operative housing; more money into senior citizens co-operative housing.

I am sure that if you had your way, you would think the way we are, and that is to add and help and try to create something positive rather than tear down and remove the excellent work that has been done by co-operatives across this country.

It is a pleasure to stand up and be supportive of what this motion intends. I hope the government will heed the direction this motion is suggesting and provide the support to co-operatives so they can do the job for the little guy and take care of the little fellow.

• (1740)

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, about three weeks ago, I was invited to be the guest speaker at an annual meeting of a co-operative. I was reminded of that when the hon. member who introduced the motion and the hon. member for Moncton mentioned that they were resource-based industries as they relate to co-operatives.

I was sitting in that meeting of the co-operative called the Fogo Island Co-operative. There were hundreds of people in the room to listen to the annual financial statement.

By the way, there are four or five major fish plants operated by this co-operative and two or three, depending on what kind of a year it is, smaller fish plants. In other words, we are talking about 1,000 regular workers, and another 1,000 people who catch fish to bring into this co-operative.

Everybody was waiting in this room for the financial statement. All we have heard in eastern Canada about the fishing industry is disaster after disaster after disaster. We have had governments, present and past, which have had to pour hundreds of millions of dollars into large private companies in Canada like Fisheries Products International and others.

National Sea Products Limited sometimes forgets that the federal government is about a 20 per cent shareholder in that fish business because of its financial involvement. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been placed in these very large privately owned companies on the stock market to revive them and to keep them alive so that people can continue to have their jobs.

There I was, three weeks ago, sitting down in a hall on an island in the Atlantic Ocean off the east coast of Canada listening to the financial statement of a co-operative. I learned from that financial statement that it did not lose any money. None. It made $1.5 million this past year while other companies are floundering, while the federal government is investing hundreds of millions of dollars in our large multinationals.

This co-operative made $1.5 million last year without financial assistance this year, last year, the year before or the year before that when all of the other companies—not all of them—all the big companies and all of the multinationals were being bailed out by the taxpayers of Canada to the tune of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars.

Here is a co-operative that was competing against them. Not only did it compete, but it made money. It made a profit. I am in complete agreement with the words of the hon. member for Moncton in whose riding, as he pointed out, is the headquarters for Co-op Atlantic, a great organization which deals throughout the four Atlantic provinces, employs hundreds and hundreds of people and gives excellent produce in every single one of its stores in Newfoundland and throughout the maritimes.

I would promote it any day of the week because my mother belongs to that co-operative. I know about the excellent service that it provides.

The resource based industries deserve the presence of co-operatives and the encouragement of co-operatives as the hon. gentleman has put in this motion before the House today. If only the federal government would listen to his good advice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members rising for debate the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, on May 28 I put a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence regarding the defence cuts that have been talked about by that ministry, as well as those announced concerning cutting of equipment.

I am particularly concerned about the cutting of the numbers of the Armed Forces. These cuts apparently are going to go ahead at a time when we still do not have any clear defence policy, nor do we know what roles are going to be expected of our Canadian forces in the years to come. We know that the government is using the calmer period in Europe and the end of the cold war as a reason for downsizing the Canadian forces. However, the truth of the matter is that during past years we were told that we did not have enough military personnel to perform our roles and that we were always short-handed. Now that there is less responsibility in Europe, why not leave the forces as they are so that we will have enough personnel to do the job in the years to come.

We do not have a large armed force, but I want to put it on the record that when this government came to power it promised many things that would be done for the Canadian forces, among which was an increase in numbers to 90,000, to 100,000. That never did happen. In the election campaign of 1984 in a speech in Newcastle, New Brunswick, the Prime Minister stated he was going to increase the number of forces to 90,000. That promise was never kept.

There has always been a discussion in this House about equipment. The present government, which has been in power for more than six and a half years, has not come to grips with this and much of the equipment that it talks about today was either ordered or on stream or produced prior to its coming to office.

For example, the long-range patrol aircraft were already in the air before this government came to office. The CF-18 fighter aircraft contract was well down the road and was completed shortly after this government came to office, but many of the planes had already arrived at Canadian air force bases long before. It talked at great length about tanks but none have been produced since coming to power. The north warning system modernization program to replace the old DEW line was 90 per cent completed before it came to power.

In this regard equipment processes were ongoing, but this government has not kept up with re-equipping the forces. Now that the cold war is off, we still are going to need equipment regardless of the size of the force. I want to emphasize that the Canadian forces have done such a fantastic job in peacekeeping and in fracases such as the Persian Gulf war. I would point out that the ships used in the Persian Gulf were built many years ago by the previous Liberal administration. The government has not brought its new ships on stream—as a matter of fact they are over a year behind schedule. Why not leave the forces personnel intact and centre our policy around that. Tell us what the policies are going to be before deciding what will be cut in the Canadian forces. That is the rational way.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to offer a few comments and to respond to the speech by the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke.

Mr. Speaker, today's fiscal and geostrategic realities have a major impact on defence, and that is why the Department of National Defence has embarked on a detailed study of the defence policy formulated in 1987.

The Minister of National Defence and the Associate Minister consider this review essential to Canada's defence operations. Both ministers are in favour of formulating a new policy that will provide for a plan that is realistic, effective and appropriate to the needs of the Canadian Forces.

Since a decision in this respect has yet to be submitted to cabinet, I am sure the hon. member will appreciate it is somewhat premature at this time to talk about closing Specific military bases. Furthermore, I may remind the hon. member that a review can affect any part of the defence program.

Mr. Speaker, the principles that govern Canada's defence policy have remaining virtually unchanged in recent years. We remain firmly committed to the principle of common defence and security; arms control and disarmament; and the peaceful resolution of conflicts.

Although the review started some time ago, the fact remains that as far as defence is concerned, this government has made more important decisions and has been more active, both in Canada and abroad, than had been the case in recent years.

The hon. member will recall the exemplary service of Canadian Forces during the crisis in Oka and the Gulf war. Furthermore, I am sure the hon. member is aware of the peacekeeping role that Canada continues to play in various places throughout the world.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, as members of this House know, the Fraser River is one of the most important tributaries in all of Canada. It has played an integral role in B.C.'s development and it is vital to our fisheries, our industry, our agriculture and our recreation.

Decades of abuse have left the Fraser River seriously injured. We are pumping raw sewage, toxic chemicals and practically every form of garbage available into its waters.

We need only look at the river to realize its precarious position. When you realize the high concentration of toxins in existence, you know that action is needed immediately.

We are fortunate that there are alternatives available to stop polluting the Fraser River. What is unfortunate is the fact that this government lacks the political will to effect these changes.

The government announced, with great fanfare, its commitment to clean up the Fraser. I would support it in this effort, I really would, except in reality it is trying to pull the wool over our collective eyes.

The government's green plan commits $100 million to clean up the Fraser. We are left with the impression that this money will be spent immediately to address the pollution problems in the river, but that is not the case. It will be spent over six years. Each year the Fraser will only have a fraction of this money allotted to the clean-up.

We have also been given no specifics, there are no goals and no timetables. We cannot evaluate the effectiveness of the plan.

When will we actually see a plan to stop the flow of pollution into the Fraser River? No one knows. When will we see a plan to remove the toxins already there? No one knows.

The plot surrounding this announcement has thickened like the sludge you can see floating on the surface of the river, for the government is tossing out green plan platitudes with its right hand while its left hand pulls out of existing, necessary environmental promises and guides the dumping of toxic soil near the river mouth.

As the House knows, Richmond, B.C. will be the unfortunate recipient of toxic soil from the old Expo site in Vancouver. The public was not informed, even though it puts nearby farmland and the fisheries at risk.

In Question Period I asked the Minister of the Environment to show British Columbians that he is a friend of the environment. He should have halted the dumping of this toxic soil and announced an environmental assessment review plan in accordance with his own government's guidelines. It would have demonstrated his commitment to a new era of environmental leadership. He refused to do so.

Surely this government can see the folly in pledging to clean up a river and then in the next breath supporting a toxic dump on federal lands near its shores.

Can the minister guarantee that this dump will be stopped? Regrettably the government's guilt is compounded by its back-handed withdrawal of its obligation to the Debris Control Board. This agency is responsible for clearing the Fraser of its debris. It is so successful that it is able to recover enough soil to fill three football fields to a depth of one metre each year.

What has this government done to this long standing clean-up pledge? It has reneged on it. Not only did it fail to come through with half of its share on April 1, it has now announced it will be pulling out completely of the debris control plan within 10 months.

Can anyone make a radical leap of faith and explain away this blatant hypocrisy? Can anyone with an ounce of common sense figure out this government's action?

The government knows its green plan has been a big disappointment. It knows its all talk, no action leadership has seriously damaged its credibility and the credibility of its environmental plan.

We want to see the Fraser River cleaned up in British Columbia. We want to see a government that is truly committed to environmental protection for all parts of Canada.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first let me assure the hon. member that this government is concerned with issues affecting the environment. As the member is no doubt aware, various actions have been announced to ensure that appropriate steps are put in place to address these concerns.

Insofar as this issue is concerned, the soils that are planned to be removed from the Expo '86 site have been closely examined and analysed to determine if they are a threat to the environment.

The member may be aware also that local concerns resulted in the city of Richmond putting in place a by-law which has strict guidelines for the movement of soils. The Fraser River Harbour Commission is respecting this by-law and the movement of soil has stopped while the province and the city continue their discussion and analysis of the soil.

I would like to stress that the comments made by the member for New Westminster—Burnaby are most unfair and that she certainly realizes that this government has been the first federal government to commit so large an amount of money and to take so many important steps with concern to environmental issues.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to object most strenuously to the answer put forward by the Acting Prime Minister in the responses last week to questions on the Al-Mashat affair.

Most specifically, the former Secretary of State for External Affairs has failed to meet his obligation as a minister in accepting ministerial responsibility. He has deliberately put on the record misstatements of facts and falsehoods that should not be allowed to stand. On several occasions in this House up to and including today the former Secretary of State for External affairs, the former Prime Minister and Deputy Prime Minister, was given the chance to apologize to the people of Canada and in particular to a civil servant whom he maligned in the name of Raymond Chrétien.

We heard last week the minister refuse to take any personal responsibility for actions of his office, but we now know as a result of revelations in the Al-Mashat affair that his Chief of Staff had in his hand the memo which specifically laid out the the political difficulties inherent in the Al-Mashat case and they were ignored by the minister.

For the minister to finger a public servant, as he has done in this case, is reprehensible and given the future work of the former minister, since he is now charged with the constitutional dossier, it is important that he personally take this opportunity to clear the air and correct the record.

We heard him say in the House today that if Mr. Chrétien wants an apology he should ask him for it.

• (1800)

I would like to say to the minister that in fact the apology he owes is not only to a civil servant whom he has wrongfully fingered but also to the people of Canada. The false documentation and the false statements were put on the record here in the House, and they were also put on the record in the public domain for millions of Canadians.

[Translation]

The crux of the matter is this, Mr. Speaker: Can the minister be trusted by Canadians in constitutional affairs, when he can't even tell the truth in a matter as important as the Al-Mashat affair?

An hon. member: Will you say that outside?

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked whether I would say that outside. Of course I will say outside what I say inside, unlike the minister, who today repeatedly and adamantly refused to apologize to Raymond Chrétien and to all Canadians. He refused to apologize. He claimed that he had already talked about the matter, and he refused to provide any details, when he knows perfectly well that according to testimony about the Al-Mashat affair, he didn't even talk to Mr. Chrétien. How could Mr. Chrétien have apologized—as the minister claimed he did—when he didn't even talk to him since the beginning of this affair?

He claims this is only a matter concerning a public servant, a private matter between Mr. Clark and Mr. Chrétien, but it is not. He told Canadians here on the floor of the House that Mr. Chrétien had offered his apologies and that he was to blame in this matter.

However, Mr. Speaker, we now know that the fault lies with the Minister for External Affairs, and to re-establish his credibility in the important area of constitutional affairs, he must—

[English]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs said in committee today: "I am not responsible for things we knew nothing about". In this case it is clear that ministers knew nothing about Mr. Al-Mashat before he arrived in Canada.

Second, ministers fulfilled their responsibility by ensuring that a full and complete investigation of the matter was carried out.

Third, ministers ensured that the procedure has been changed and the system has been improved. There is no guarantee that errors in judgment and mistakes will not happen again, but ministers have done their best to make improvements in procedures and systems.

[Translation]

Earlier on, I was asked why do I speak mostly English. I can carry on in French. I for one, Mr. Speaker, believe in the sovereignty of this House, and this House has decided to refer this question to a legislative committee. It is not the truth we are seeking, but merely the show. Otherwise, I think we should be sovereign enough, out of respect for the committee working on the matter, to wait for its report. About confidence, I have to say that I have every confidence in this minister. He also has the confidence of the government and over half of Canada.

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to follow up on the question I posed last week to the President of the Treasury Board in Question Period concerning the terrible damage that is being done in many domains of the Public Service by this government's continual bashing of the Public Service.

We had a leaked memo from the Department of National Health and Welfare that showed very clearly that by meeting the restraints in spending and personnel this government is imposing on the Public Service it is going to damage tremendously the delivery of health services in this country.

That almost amounts to a contempt of Parliament, when the government refuses to provide the resources that Parliament has determined should be delivered to the people of Canada. When people have seen decisions made in this House that certain services are in the public interest and are to be delivered, it is incumbent on the government to do the will of Parliament and to provide the resources to make sure that those services are delivered. The minister said: "Well, we are saving money—fiscal restraint". This is a political Preston Manning agenda of pandering to the worst elements in society who do not believe in government and do not believe in government delivering services to Canadians; who would be happy to see our medicare system gone; who would be happy to see our social services system gone and would be happy to see the unemployed left to fend for themselves.

I would like to talk about the $50 billion this country spends annually on health care. It is not really health care, it is sickness care. What I want to talk about is what the actions of this government are forcing to be cut out of services to Canadians that keep them healthy.

The actions of this government are forcing Health and Welfare to reduce health promotion, which at very little cost keeps people healthy, out of hospitals and not costing the taxpayers a lot of money.

Community advertising, community education about public health and disease prevention are going to keep Canadians healthy. With diseases like Alzheimers and AIDS gaining ascendancy and costing us billions of dollars every year, how dare this government say: "We do not want to promote the health of Canadians. We want them to get sicker and sicker so they will end up in hospital and cost taxpayers even more money".

Our medicare system is in danger of breaking apart because this government does not know how to start promoting the health of Canadians and now we see it cutting even more.

We see the discontinuation of the Consumer Products Safety Program, the discontinuation of the campaign against drinking and driving that alone has probably saved thousands of lives in this country since it was initiated.

Even more desperately, we see the elderly and the sick told that they are going to have to wait even longer for potentially life-saving drugs to be evaluated and approved by government. This government will not provide the people and the resources necessary for those new pharmaceuticals that can save lives, reduce pain and suffering, keep people alive and functioning and out of hospitals. This government does not think these kinds of services are important to Canadians.

We are going to see seniors waiting increased lengths of time for their pension cheques, families waiting for family allowances. We are already seeing the unemployed waiting up to six weeks or even longer for cheques to feed, clothe and house their families when they cannot have a job. There are going to be 3.5 million of those Canadians this year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has one minute left.

Mrs. Catterall: The government has delivered seven years of slashing people, slashing dollars and now it is even worse. As the Deputy Minister of Health and Welfare said: "For years now we have been doing more with less. Now we have to do less with less". It is the people of Canada who are suffering when the availability of services to the public are cut and when the people who deliver those services are cut; it is not the government, not the politicians and not us in this Chamber.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, reductions or cuts to federal programs or services are always tough to make. But when you are faced with the staggering deficit in the country then you ought to get spending under control. That is what the federal government is doing.

I want to tell the hon. member that despite some reductions in services and programs, Canadians can still count on the Department of National Health and Welfare to look after their safety and health. It remains a top priority for this government and the department. We have a health care system in Canada that is second to none and we intend to keep it that way.

If you look at where the impact of the budget reductions will be, you will quickly see that they will occur across a broad range of areas within the department so that the impact will be as minimal as possible.

I want to assure all Canadians that high priority areas such as food and drugs, safety, family violence programs, AIDS initiatives and many others will not be affected.

I think any fair analysis of the actions taken by the Department of National Health and Welfare to implement the recent budget reductions would show that while there is some impact, over-all Canadians will continue to be well served.

The government has tackled the deficit. It has cut spending and attacked waste and inefficiency in the government's operations. As well, it has implemented structural reforms to improve the growth potential of the Canadian economy.
