HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 13, 1991

The House met at 4 p.m.

Prayers

OPENING OF THE THIRD SESSION OF THE THIRTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT

[Translation]

The Parliament, which had been prorogued on the twelfth day of May, 1991, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The House met at four o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Secretary to the Governor General announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would arrive at the Main Entrance of the Parliament Buildings at 3.35 p.m. on this day the 13th May, 1991, and that when it had been signified that all was in readiness, His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate Chamber to open formally the third session of the Thirty-fourth Parliament of Canada.

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1710)

And the House being returned to the Commons Chamber:

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-1 respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

Ladies and Gentlemen, Honourable Members of the Senate,

Ladies and Gentlemen, Members of the House of Commons.

It is my great pleasure to greet you as you begin the third session of the Thirty- Fourth Parliament.

In the past fifteen months, my wife and I have had the wonderful privilege of meeting thousands of Canadians at Rideau Hall, La Citadelle and in our visits to all of Canada's provinces and territories.

Whatever our background and wherever we live, Canadians share the same basic hopes and aspirations. We are proud of the great country we have inherited. Above all, we are determined to leave it a better and stronger place for our children.

As Gerda and I meet Canadians, we are moved by the special regard they have for the Queen and for the role she has played in our history. In the nearly forty years since she ascended the throne, she has been served by all seven Canadian Governors General—and she remains a living example of the continuity and stability that are fundamental to our system of government.

Therefore, it was a genuine pleasure this year, on your behalf, to congratulate Her Majesty and wish her well on the occasion of her 65th birthday.

This session will be a turning point in Canadian history. Let no one doubt the seriousness of the challenges we face as a country. You will have the responsibility and the opportunity to forge an historic accommodation that embraces all Canadians, overcomes division and discord and charts a course for prosperity for generations to come.

Last July 1st, when Her Majesty came to celebrate Canada Day with us, she said that the unity of the Canadian people is the paramount issue we face, just as it was at the time of Confederation. And, she went on, "There is no force, except the force of will, to keep Canadians together." I believe that Canadians have that will.

I am confident that, as long as we adhere to the values on which this country was founded—belief in human dignity, respect for differences, civility in our dealings with each other—we cannot fail.

Canada's history is the history of builders and achievers. Together, Canadian men and women have created a society that is as free and fair as any on earth; ours is one of the oldest functioning democracies, a beacon of freedom to people everywhere. Around the world, Canada is respected for the constructive role we play in global affairs, for the protection we accord human rights, for our tolerance of diversity, for our environmental sensitivity, and for our cultural accomplishments.

Canada is also envied for our economic prosperity; we rank only thirty-first in population but we have built the world's eighth largest economy. That economic strength allows us to maintain some of the most advanced social programs in the world.

Millions of people around the world would gladly give up everything they have for the privilege of living in Canada.That is a reality and a response to those who would question the value of Canadian citizenship.

Canada will celebrate its 125th birthday during this session. Let us ensure this celebration will be looked back upon as a milestone on the road to a united and prosperous future. Let us mark the occasion with the same spirit of confidence and the sense of accomplishment with which we all commemorated Canada's Centennial and Expo 67. We believed then that the potential of Canada was unparalleled. It remains so now.

To realize our great promise, we must rebuild Canadian unity and overcome the acrimony, apathy and incomprehension that currently undermine it. In light of the global economic revolution of the past quarter century, we must make the reforms necessary to earn the prosperity that until recently seemed our birthright. And we must address urgently the doubts that have been expressed about the capability of our institutions and processes to achieve these goals.

Proposals will be put before you, therefore, that address these three major concerns of the Canadian people and of my government—unity, prosperity and government responsiveness. I am confident that the importance of these issues will persuade all Parliamentarians to put Canada first, set partisan motives and calculations aside and work together for a stronger country.

Canadian Unity

We have been confided the stewardship of this great nation, constructed across an entire continent by generations of men and women determined to make a home for themselves and a future for their children. They were inspired in their sacrifice by the conviction that tolerance and fairness, courage and compassion, and individual enterprise and neighbourly cooperation could overcome all obstacles and erase all doubts.

Now it is the turn of our generation to overcome obstacles, erase doubts and strengthen Canada to meet the challenges of the 21st century. In doing so, we must safeguard the rights of all Canadians and maintain those standards of citizenship that distinguish the Canadian way of life.

Some reforms can be achieved through legislation or policy; others require changes to our attitudes; and still others require changes to our constitution.

A constitution should unite a nation. Canadians across this country should be able to see themselves and their hopes and aspirations mirrored in their constitution. It is the one document that all Canadians should refer to with pride. That is not presently the case in Canada. And no task is more important than making the constitution a more faithful reflection of who we are, what we represent as a country and what we aspire to be as a people.

The Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future was constituted to give Canadians an opportunity to express their hopes and views on the kind of country Canada should be, so we can continue to prosper as we cross the threshold together into a new century. The Special Joint Committee on the Process for Amending the Constitution was established to allow Canadians to be involved in finding a better way of making constitutional changes. Both have increased understanding among Canadians of how much we have in common—as well as awareness of what we stand to lose. Canadians are moving beyond focusing on problems to suggesting solutions.

My government looks forward to receiving the recommendations of the two committees by Canada Day, July 1st. The committee reports, together with the work of similar commissions in several provinces and the soundings you have all taken of the views of your own constituents, will give you the understanding you need of what Canadians want done.

My government will formulate new proposals to focus public discussion on the goal of a more united and prosperous Canada. The proposals will suggest changes in federal and provincial powers and responsibilities and in national institutions. My government will be guided by a number of basic principles:

—that Canada has already proven its worth; we seek change in order to improve Canada, not to discard what we have accomplished together;

—that the Government of Canada represents all Canadianst; and that change can be achieved only through reasonable compromise and enlightened accommodation of the interests of all Canadians;

—that Quebec's unique character must be affirmed and that the particular interests of the West, the Atlantic provinces, Ontario, the North and aboriginal Canadians must be recognized, as well; and —that the tests of constitutional reform will be fairness, effectiveness, efficiency and the protection afforded to the rights of all Canadians.

In September, my government will refer its proposals to a joint parliamentary committee that will be established to consult with Canadians. The committee will be asked to travel in order to hear the views of men and women across Canada. In each jurisdiction it visits, the committee will be mandated to meet in public session with its counterpart provincial or territorial legislative committee or, where no such committee exists, with counterpart legislators. It will, also, meet with aboriginal groups. The committee will be asked to report back to the government within five months.

After receipt and consideration of the committee's report, my government will propose a plan for a renewed Canada for consideration by the people of Canada. You will be asked to approve enabling legislation to provide for greater participation of Canadian men and women in constitutional change.

My government will work to create a climate in which Canadians can deepen their understanding of their history and traditions and their appreciation of their country's rich diversity. Events planned for 1992, the 125th anniversary of Confederation, will contribute to this greater understanding.

The ability of Canadians to live together in harmony and the ability of Canada to make a major contribution to world affairs depend upon our understanding of who we are as a people. To reduce Canada's vulnerability in an age of rapid, even turbulent, change and of growing interdependence, it is more important than ever that we speak to the world with one, clear and united voice. My government will conduct an active foreign policy in support of the full range of Canadian interests around the world—economic and security, environmental and social. My government will continue to promote democratic values and to defend human rights in the conduct of its foreign and development assistance policies as the best means to ensure progress and stability in a changing world environment and to safeguard Canadian security and prosperity.

Participating in Prosperity

My government will invite Canadians to participate in fashioning a new agenda for prosperity. The goal is to build a prosperous society in which all men and women have an equal opportunity to participate, in which benefits and responsibilities are fairly shared and in which the most vulnerable among us are protected.

There is much more to Canadian unity than amending the constitution. Our unity is strengthened by a strong economy. And prosperity is enhanced by a united country. But disunity in the face of the global economic challenge invites decline.

Economic recovery depends on reducing interest rates. To bring interest rates down, government finances have been put on a sound base. My government is controlling its spending and has established low but achievable inflation targets. That is the way to restore the confidence of Canadians in their future.

Restored confidence means new investment and new investment means meaningful jobs and a better life for all Canadians. With this fiscally disciplined approach, the economy will recover in the second half of this year and will grow strongly in 1992.

Looking to the longer term, Canadians are asking themselves what the future holds for themselves and for their families in a world that is changing so rapidly and profoundly. Deficit reduction, tax reform, free trade and productivity growth are all part of my government's plan to secure the future of Canadians.

Canada is inescapably part of the global economy. As citizens of a country that depends for its prosperity on the sale abroad of almost thirty percent of all it produces, the importance to Canadians of being able to compete effectively in international trade can scarcely be overstated. We guarantee our future, not by running from global competition, but by meeting it head-on, by equipping ourselves to compete with the best, by giving ourselves the economic conditions we need to be competitive and by making world markets accessible to our products.

The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement has helped to secure the Canadian economy in difficult times. Private, non-residential investment in Canada, as a share of our gross domestic product, has been taking place at record levels. For the first time in sixteen years, Canada has been attracting more direct investment—the key to job creation and job opportunities—has been going abroad.

My government believes North America-wide free trade is a logical next step—and one that would increase the prosperity of all Canadians—if an acceptable agreement can be negotiated with Mexico and the United States. My government will, also, cooperate with Canadian business to take advantage of the growing opportunities for sales and investment abroad as a result of the integration of Europe and of the extraordinary economic growth in Asia. A successful outcome to the multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva would be the best means to guarantee access for Canadian products in markets around the world; achieving that goal will be a high priority for my government.

At home, my government will work with provincial governments to ensure that Canada becomes a single, integrated market from coast to coast to coast. We need to eliminate:

—policies that favour a province's suppliers over lower cost producers from other provinces;

—regulations that often make it simpler for producers to ship their products abroad than to sell them in neighbouring provinces; —hiring policies that give preference to provincial residents over those from other provinces; and —occupational standards that restrict the work opportunities of residents of other provinces.

By one recent estimate, there are approximately five hundred barriers to interprovincial trade in Canada. My government's goal is to see barriers to interprovincial trade, services and investment come down by 1995, so that Canada becomes a single, integrated market. The savings to taxpayers and consumers of creating such a market could be as high as six billion dollars—about one thousand dollars a year for a household of four. And a larger home market would allow more Canadian companies to achieve the size and competitive edge to launch themselves successfully into world markets.

Today, investment and technology flow with ease across international boundaries, markets for goods and services are specialized and decisions on production are made on a world-wide basis. In the interdependent world we live in, prosperity is more and more a factor of knowledge, skills and innovation. The nations and firms that are succeeding and will continue to succeed in this environment are those whose people are educated, productive and able to adjust to rapidly changing circumstances. The risk for Canada is not so much to be undercut by developing countries with low-wage economies but to be outperformed by technologically advanced countries with highly paid, highly skilled workers.

Increasing our productivity across the full range of Canadian industry—resources, and services—is the only way to secure and enhance our prosperity over the longer term. Productivity is the difference between prosperity and decline. The prosperity of all Canadians and our ability to maintain social programs depend on the productivity of Canadians. Increasing productivity requires the collaborative efforts of governments, business, labour and individual Canadians, in all regions. To focus this effort, specific targets will be set.

Canadian business, workers and governments will be asked to work together to generate at least two and a half million new jobs by the year 2000 and to raise the real incomes of Canadians by at least twenty-five percent, by the same year. These targets are realistic and achievable in a united Canada, whose population will approach thirty million people by the end of the century and whose gross domestic product will approach one trillion dollars.

My government believes that building Canadian prosperity and securing Canada's natural environment are fully compatible goals. International experience demonstrates conclusively that the most economically prosperous nations are also the most environmentally conscious nations. To safeguard our natural heritage, my government introduced this country's first comprehensive environment plan—the Green Plan—during the last session.

Over the coming months my Minister of the Environment will be implementing a wide range of Green Plan initiatives. These initiatives, in concert with action on the part of the provinces and the private sector, will ensure that Canadians, today and tomorrow, have the clean air, water and land essential to sustaining human health and enhancing our quality of life. They will also encourage the development of "environmentally friendly" products for which there are growing markets abroad.

We must, all of us, come to grips with the fundamental issues involved in integrating environmental and economic considerations into our decision-making. My government will, over the coming months, consult with provincial governments, industry and environmental leaders to explore means of complementing current regulatory approaches with innovative instruments that would achieve positive environmental results without prejudicing economic prosperity.

Increasing economic prosperity is first and foremost an issue of people. Canada's ability to prosper in a global economy will be determined by the level of Canadians' educational achievement, by the sophistication of our management skills and by our attitudes to work and to change. In the dawning knowledge age, how well we live will depend on how well we learn.

Canadian men and women must have access to both the skills and the lifelong learning opportunities necessary to improve their job prospects and ensure their own prosperity. But Canadians are questioning whether this country's approach to learning, despite the great dedication of so many talented educators and administrators, is adequate for the times.

The issue is not exclusively, or even primarily, money.Canada already spends more money per capita on education than almost any other industrialized nation does. Every year the federal government alone spends about eleven billion dollars, directly and indirectly, on education and training. The issue is results.

—Three out of ten students drop-out of high school before graduating.

—Four out of ten adults cannot read or do math well enough to perform everyday tasks.

—Canadian industry spends less than half as much on training its employees as American industry does, a fifth as much as the Japanese and an eighth as much as the Germans.

This is not the kind of performance that will guarantee increasing prosperity for our children; in fact, it has given rise to concerns whether the next generation of Canadian men and women will be the first to have a lower standard of living than their parents.

The time has come to reach a national consensus on performance, goals, partnerships and priorities for learning. As part of my government's new agenda for prosperity, a discussion paper on learning will be published to stimulate and focus discussion on education and training.

My government recognizes that education is a provincial responsibility under the constitution and respects that fact. My government also recognizes that Canadians are concerned about education, and would like to see Canada-wide goals established, with provincial endorsement and cooperation, for the year 2000. These goals could include:

—cutting illiteracy rates in half;

—ensuring that ninety percent of Canadians attain high school diplomas or the equivalent by age twenty-five;

—doubling the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, the sciences and engineering; and

—quadrupling the training provided by employers to their employees.

Students and parents, employers and employees, educators and governments will be asked to work together to develop a "learning culture," just as we have developed an environmental culture. My government will, also, ask the newly created Labour Force Development Board to present proposals in this area. The objective is to equip Canadian men and women to participate fully in creating and sharing Canadian prosperity.

The full participation of Canada's aboriginal peoples in Canada's economic prosperity and political life is a goal shared across the country. To put itself in a position to respond more effectively to the needs of the aboriginal peoples of Canada, my government will appoint the Right Honourable Brian Dickson, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, to serve as a special representative of the Prime Minister in order to consult widely on the terms of reference and membership of the Royal Commission announced recently and report back to my government.

Particular care will be taken to ensure that the Commission neither delays nor negates constitutional, legislative or other reforms already under way. These reforms include land claim settlements, community development initiatives, education and other activities launched during the second session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament. In cooperation with Indian people themselves, my government will explore alternatives to the Indian Act, especially concerning land, monies and self-government. Finally, my government will consult aboriginal Canadians on changes in the system of administering justice. The goal is to work with Canada's aboriginal peoples so that they control their own lives, can contribute to Canadian prosperity and can share fully in it.

Our children are the most important yet most vulnerable members of our society. Last September, at the Children's Summit in New York, the attention of people everywhere was focused on children at risk. Seventy-one leaders pledged that that moment would last a decade. My government will bring forward a plan to implement the commitments it made that day; the objective is to see Canadian girls and boys better educated, better protected and better nurtured so that they can make their own contributions to Canada's future. In addition, my government will review its policies in relation to the family, the most fundamental building block of Canadian society. And my government will appoint a blue ribbon panel of concerned Canadian men and women to inquire into the serious problem of violence against women in our society.

My government will lay before you proposals for programs and policies to remove the barriers still faced by disabled Canadians to full participation in Canada's political life and economic prosperity. The government plans to implement a five-year strategy that will resolve issues such as access to employment, training, housing and transportation, public sensitivity and community integration.

You will be asked to approve a number of other important legislative initiatives to advance the economic, social and international interests of Canadians. You will, also, be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

Changing the Way Ottawa Works

Change is the hallmark of our age; in Europe, in Asia, in Latin America, old assumptions are being discarded and new principles are being adopted. In Canada, too, new problems require new solutions.There is a need for change in the way Parliament does business and in the way governments conduct their affairs. The goal is to ensure that Canadians' agenda is Parliament's agenda.

In the Thirty-Third Parliament, a committee of the House of Commons proposed far- reaching reforms to enhance the role of private members. During that Parliament, you implemented more than eighty-five percent of the committee's recommendations. And, at the end of the last session of this Parliament, further changes were passed to make it possible for members to spend more time at home with their constituents so that they can be more effective in representing the wishes of their constituents and more efficient in the conduct of House business.

Canadians exercise their democratic freedom by electing their representatives through secret ballot. During this session, you will receive the report of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform established by my government. Canadians want to know that their elected representatives have the power and authority to represent them. My government will propose further reforms so that all Members of Parliament can fulfil better their obligations to their constituents.

The respect of the people for Parliament and Parliamentarians is essential for a healthy democracy. But the appearance, and sometimes the reality, of excessive party discipline and over-zealous partisanship, of empty posturing and feigned outrage have eroded that respect in Canada. Members will be asked, therefore, to consider new procedures for assessing legislation, for raising grievances on behalf of constituents and for questioning government. This will further enhance the role of individual members and afford them greater independence.

Change is also necessary in the ways governments conduct their affairs. Governments must be both effective and efficient, implementing necessary programs at the lowest cost to taxpayers. Canadians understand that their governments simply cannot afford to do everything that is demanded of them. In the past six and a half years, through prudent management, the growth of government operations has been curtailed. My government has privatized and eliminated twenty-four Crown corporations and streamlined virtually all government departments and agencies. Since 1984, ninety thousand employees have been removed from the payroll of the federal government and its agencies. During this session, my government will take that process further. A draft spending control bill to cap federal program spending will be referred to a parliamentary committee for consultations with Canadians. Legislation will also be introduced to create a debt servicing and reduction fund so that GST revenues, as well as monies from further privatization of Crown corporations and from voluntary contributions, will be used to service the national debt. Streamlining of government structures and operations to serve Canadians better and to save taxpayers' money will continue to be a priority of my government. Better ways to conduct the business of government are being examined. Improvements in the management of the public service, started under the Public Service 2000 initiative, will continue. A public service reform bill will be introduced into Parliament in support of this renewal program. Additional special operating agencies will be created to provide better service to Canadians through more autonomy and a sharper focus on objectives.

My government will, also, continue to privatize those government activities best done by the private sector, as well as wind up and consolidate other agencies in order to provide Canadians better value for their tax dollars.

Conclusion

You are meeting at a pivotal period in the life of Canada, a time to reinvigorate our country and to bring Canadians together in a renewed accommodation. My government will work with Canadians to achieve its goals of unity, prosperity and responsive government so that all Canadians feel themselves a part of this country, so that all Canadians have an equal opportunity to share in its bounty, so that all can see themselves reflected in its constitution and so that all will find the fulfilment of their aspirations in its future.

Honourable Members of the Senate, Members of the House of Commons, Ladies and Gentlemen, you will play a decisive role in the strengthening of Canada. History will be the judge of the decisions you make on these critical issues.

May Divine Providence be your guide.

ADDRESS IN REPLY MOVED BY MR. DENIS PRONOVOST AND SECONDED BY MR. LARRY SCHNEIDER

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply honoured by this opportunity I am given today to move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina—Wascana, the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. On behalf of my constituency, I wish to thank the Right Hon. Prime Minister and the government for the honour thus conferred on the electoral district of Saint-Maurice.

The challenges mentioned today in the speech from the Throne are certainly not new to the riding of Saint-Maurice.

The first challenge, that of national unity, takes me back to the 1980 referendum campaign in Quebec. In Shawinigan, the referendum on Quebec separation was a very painful experience. At the time, the debate became so heated, Mr. Speaker, that some families were split forever. Lasting friendships disappeared as a result of a single political debate. I personally lost friends because of this referendum. It left scars that have yet to heal today, after eleven years.

We must learn from history. On the basis of my own modest experience in 1980 in Quebec, I feel I must urge this House today to do everything it possibly can to avoid exposing Quebecers and Canadians a second time to a needlessly cruel exercise.

Another challenge mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, the challenge of prosperity and economic effectiveness, is one that the people of my riding will appreciate.

During the past thirty years, I have seen my riding lose its industrial base, experience an economic slump, seen its youth leave for more prosperous urban centres, inherit serious environmental problems, including the rapidly escalating pollution of the Saint-Maurice River, and there is also the phenomenon of a rapidly aging population.

I am convinced that the measures undertaken and proposed by this government will help rebuild the economy and correct the mistakes made during the sixties and the seventies.

• (1720)

First and foremost, Mr. Speaker, we must find a solution to this existential crisis which has too many Canadians believing we can no longer live together.

In the Speech from the Throne, the Government set forth a number of important challenges and spelled out how it plans to respond to this time of decision.

All of us here today have a fiduciary responsibility to safeguard and build upon what has been entrusted to us by past generations.

Members of this House have very heavy responsibilities. As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, no member of this House was elected by his or her constituents to specifically work towards the destruction of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pronovost: Quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker. Canadians expect each and every member, with absolutely no exception, to help find real solutions to improve the situation in our country.

No one in this House was elected to sell off Canada. To make Canada work would benefit Quebecers as all the other Canadians. If our country is to become more efficient once again, members of this House will have to find positive solutions during the present debate.

A constitution should mirror the nation. Unfortunately too many people look in that mirror and do not see themselves. This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. The fact that there may be some cracks in the edifice of Confederation is not enough reason to forsake Canada and all it means.

When we look past the sometimes harsh criticism and strong emotions, we can see that Canadians understand and appreciate that we have so much. We, as a people, dare not risk shattering it all, because of our emotions and some grievance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, as noted in the Speech from the Throne, the government's work will be guided by certain key principles: seeking changes to improve Canada; achieving change through compromise and accommodation; affirming Quebec's unique characteristics, as well as the interests of all Canadians, wherever they live; making fairness, effectiveness, efficiency and the protection of all Canadians' rights the tests of constitutional reform.

But institutions can only do so much. Without the commitment of the members of this House and of every citizen, they are only fine intentions. Trust and generosity, fairness and tolerance, these come from within the hearts of men and women of goodwill.

[English]

We must also assist Canadians to better appreciate their history and tradition, and that undertaking is given in the Throne Speech.

If Canadians are to live together as a peaceful society and contribute as citizens of the world, they must begin by understanding who they are as a people.

Our country has endured difficult times of late. But while passion may have been strained, it must not be allowed to break our bonds of affection. Let us hope and pray now that we will listen to the better angels of our nature.

I would like to close with the following quotation:

> I believe in Canada. I have faith in its future, and I am dedicated to its destiny. I believe that this country has potential for greatness, not only in material terms, but in the things of the mind and the spirit.

The Canadian who spoke those words was Tommy Douglas.

[Translation]

> Today, when the greatest need of free men and free nations is to come together—and act on the compulsions and opportunities of interdependance; at this time of all times it would be a tragic thing for Canadians to have to admit their failure to unify their own country—unity without sacrificing special and separate values. No Canadian, surely, could contemplate with anything but bitter regret the weakening, let alone the failure, of Confederation, especially when Canada has grown so much in stature and won so much respect in the world.

The Canadian who spoke those words was Mike Pearson.

[English]

Finally, Mr. Speaker:

> Federation was a prerequisite to the national development of Canada and the maintenance of national unity remains the key to its destiny. I know there are some who feel a sense of embarrassment in expressing pride to their nation, perhaps because of the fear that they might be considered old-fashioned or parochial—a healthy life and devotion to one's country constitutes a most fruitful inspiration in life.

The Canadian who spoke those words was John Diefenbaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Pronovost: I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker and fellow members, that we would do well to ponder these words, and that they guide us in the weeks and months ahead.

The hour is great with change—so let us begin. I am proud to reaffirm my support to this government and I am proud to present today the Address in Reply to the speech from the Throne.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the honorable member for Regina—Wascana, that the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

> To His Excellency the Right Honourable Ramon Hnatyshyn, a Member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.
> MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:
> We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for this opportunity.

I must say that when I was asked to second the Speech from the Throne, the full impact of this honour did not immediately occur to me. However, this changed rather dramatically when I read the following passage in a book written by John Henderson entitled Great Men of Canada and printed in 1929. In the book, Mr. Henderson makes reference to Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the following fashion. He says: "In seeking federal office, he was elected by a majority 238 and took his seat in the first Liberal Parliament returned after Confederation. Immediately Laurier became a success. He seconded the Speech from the Throne."

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, it was at this time that I was struck with the honour of this opportunity. I only hope that I can be nearly so eloquent as I imagine Sir Wilfrid Laurier was, and become half as successful as he went on to be, of course.

Canadians enjoy the second highest standard of living in the world and a quality of life second to none. We have achieved this as a united country. Indeed, in large measure we have achieved this because we are a united country.

Unity and prosperity, the two go hand in hand. Our prosperity is enhanced by working together in a united country, just as our unity is strengthened by a strong economy.

We can be very proud of what we have achieved, but we cannot be complacent. Simply relying on the things that have helped us succeed in the past will not be enough for us to continue to succeed in the future.

Success means greater prosperity for individual Canadians and, the key to prosperity is to increase our productivity.

Productivity depends on the extent of our investment, the quality of our skills, our natural resources and the efficiency with which we use them to produce the goods and services that we consume at home and those we sell abroad.

Greater productivity means many things. It means higher wages. It means greater rewards for Canadians who save and invest. It also means better pensions, better health care and better income support for the unemployed and the working poor. It means that we can afford more, both as individuals and as a country.

Greater productivity is not an end in itself, it is a means—a means to a higher standard of living and to more opportunities for people to share in the benefits of prosperity.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Schneider: Today, when Canadians look abroad, they see our competitors taking the steps needed to increase their productivity. They see them removing trade barriers, investing in innovative technology and excelling in mathematics and science.

When Canadians look at our performance here at home, they see trade barriers from province to province which make us less efficient than we should be.

They see an inadequate level of research and development. They see that Canadian employers spend one-fifth as much on training as Japanese industry, and one-eighth as much as German industry. Canadians know that we must keep pace or pay the price.

They see that four out of ten adult Canadians cannot read or do math well enough to perform everyday tasks. They see that three out of ten high school students drop out of school. They know that we must do better.

Since 1984, the federal government has pursued a strategy designed to strengthen Canada's ability to compete. Through successive budgets, the government has taken measures to restore a fiscal balance to help create a stable, non-inflationary macroeconomic environment that is conducive to investment and job creation.

This strategy has worked. In the past six years, Canada has had the best job creation record among all major industrial countries. Private, non-residential investment has been at record levels for the past three years.

The government has also introduced a number of structural reforms to make us more efficient and more productive.

Through the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, we have gained new opportunities and greater security of markets for Canada's products. Through regulatory reforms and privatization, we have made our domestic market more competitive and more productive. Through tax reform and the goods and services tax, we have made our tax system fairer, more reliable and more supportive of economic growth.

These structural reforms will raise our annual rate of productivity growth by 0.6 per cent in the next five years.

The free trade agreement and the goods and services tax alone will raise Canada's real Gross Domestic Product by 5 per cent once fully in place. That is more than $900 for every Canadian man, woman and child in this country.

Trading opportunities do not just happen; we must make them happen. Manufacturing and business sectors are promoted at various times by government, as it relocates the country's economic resources.

I am referring to such initiatives as the Western Economic Diversification Program, Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, and the FEDNOR agency of Northern Ontario. are, as we all know, regional economic development initiatives that are designed to focus attention on the regions of our country that from time to time need some government assistance.

My home province, as an example, has initiated a rather dramatic and positive method of assisting or kick-starting economic diversification in Saskatchewan.

The community bond program is a program that is designed not only to bond communities together, but also to assist community economic developments. It is a means of encouraging residents to invest in their own communities. This is done by generating the principle of community investment. Therefore, the program assists in "bonding communities".

During the years immediately following Confederation it was fashionable to criticize the central government for disregarding regional needs.

Today populist movements spring up to voice their objections and offer a new or reformed approach. These populist movements are as new as time itself. I believe that their claim today is as equally invalid.

Research I have currently undertaken demonstrates an acknowledgement of the interests of our regions by the federal government, particularly recently in the area of the Department of Supply and Services. During the two years prior to 1989, approximately $3.5 million of federal procurements occurred in my constituency. In the two years that followed, approximately $5.5 million were spent, and just last week in my constituency Westbridge Computer Corporation won a Department of Supply and Services contract for $12.6 million.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Schneider: This was not simply handed to Westbridge Computer Corporation. Westbridge is a world-class organization, and I am proud to have Westbridge as part of Regina's high-tech community.

The federal government has in the past and continues to make its procurement policies regionally effective. As I have shown it is working in Saskatchewan.

We have already accomplished a great deal since 1984, but we need to do more to ensure Canada's future prosperity.

Taking the steps we need to strengthen our prosperity for the future is far more than a job just for government. There is no quick and easy fix to the challenge we face.

As many private companies have learned, improving competitiveness often involves doing many little things a little better rather than trying to change one major thing and ignoring the rest.

We need to work together, to rethink the way we do things, and to redefine the role of government, labour and industry. We need to examine the quality of our investments in education and training and in public infrastructure, in machinery and equipment, and as well in research and technology.

We also need to examine how we can promote competitiveness in our domestic market. We need to review how we can enhance our market opportunities abroad and how we can develop better methods of management whether in the boardroom or on the shop floor.

For these reasons, the government is launching a new prosperity agenda. We are asking Canadians to work together to generate at least 2.5 million new jobs by the year 2000 and to raise the level of real income in this country by at least 25 per cent.

These are ambitious targets for Canadians to strive for, but they are achievable in a united Canada. We are calling on provincial governments to work with us to eliminate interprovincial barriers to trade in Canada and to take the action needed to accomplish this by 1995. That step alone could result in the equivalent of $250 a year for every Canadian, in lower costs for the goods and services they buy. That is a $6 billion saving to the entire country.

At the same time, we are proposing that we work together with provincial governments, educators and industry to set Canada-wide goals for our educational system, goals for the year 2000 that could cut illiteracy rates in half, ensuring that 95 per cent of Canadians complete high school, and quadrupling the training provided by employers for their employees.

Objectives such as these will only be met through consultations and consensus. For that reason, this spring the government will issue two major discussion papers on its prosperity agenda: one on education and training and the other on industry, innovation and trade. Together they will provide a framework for national discussion on the steps we need to take together to secure our prosperity as a nation and to ensure that all Canadians share in its benefits.

To this end, I would encourage members of this House to work together as one, as one united Parliament, to ensure that we attain these goals so that the Canadian population in a united Canada will benefit from efforts from all members of Parliament working together for the betterment of Canadians.

As individuals of Parliament, I encourage this action of all members on both sides of the House. I pledge my support for every positive action that is suggested by members of Parliament in order that it provide for a more prosperous and united Canada.

I suggest that we get serious about Canada. Let us work together to demonstrate leadership for this country, the kind of leadership that it takes to give us the good things this country has. For it is leadership that is welcomed with prosperity, and it is turmoil that is rewarded with disdain.

The Speech from the Throne has provided Canadians with a direction, focusing on working together. This country that touches three oceans can develop into an economic power that is the envy of the world's industrialized nations.

Mr. Speaker, we have the resources. We have the energy. We have the technology. We have the leadership and, by God, we have each other.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Schneider: There is truly so much more Canada can be. We need only apply that with which we are blessed. I am, therefore, truly honoured to second the motion by my hon. colleague from Saint-Maurice.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chretien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, just before I move adjournment, I would like to indicate that the business of the House tomorrow will be the resumption of debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Speaker, I move:

That this House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 17.42 p.m.

TABLING OF STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay upon the table a copy of the Standing Orders of this House dated May, 1991.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government responses to 37 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour and privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of people from the Shuswap Lake area of British Columbia who point out that the government has cut back $19.3 million to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police services throughout Canada in the last fiscal year, resulting in a loss of $4.1 million for the British Columbia division alone. The consequence of these cuts, the petitioners say, has been the closure of detachments in smaller communities, resulting in an erosion of service and effectiveness of these communities' only viable police force. They point out a number of other concerns regarding the decreased ability of the RCMP to do its job and so are asking Parliament to urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police so it can fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia and to re-examine the government's decision to force the provinces either to increase funding for the RCMP, in many cases far more than they can afford, or decrease services and close detachments, leaving communities without an effective and visible police force.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and present a number of petitions from literally hundreds of British Columbia citizens throughout the province. These citizens are concerned about the current application by Unitel and B.C. Rail and Light Rail regarding the long distance competition in the telephone-telecommunications market. These citizens are urging the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service. They are urging the Minister of Communications to consult with all affected parties, particularly those citizens living outside of Canada's urban areas who will be most severely impacted by this deregulation. They are also urging the minister to hold local hearings throughout our communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I also rise to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. This is a petition which notes that the government as far back as 1986 accepted a report calling for an amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination. It is from citizens right across Canada and calls on the government and this Parliament to bring forth an amendment immediately to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour of tabling petitions by Canadians from the metropolitan Toronto area who believe that a great woman, Marie Sklodowska Curie, must be honoured for her scientific contributions to humanity. They believe that the gift of the discovery of radium to heal the sick deserves to be recognized by Canada and they call upon Parliament to honour Marie Sklodowska Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth which takes place November 7, 1992.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

DEBATE ON ADDRESS RESUMED

The House resumed from Monday, May 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Jean Chretien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start my comments by congratulating the mover and the seconder of the motion before the House today.

I am delighted to see my successor in Saint-Maurice in the role it was my privilege to have in 1964, when I was quite a bit younger than I am today. I congratulate him, and I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Regina—Wascana for seconding this motion. Quoting a passage from our history, he said that if a rural member who had the privilege of moving the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne happened to come from Quebec and followed Laurier's example, he would become prime minister.

I can inform the hon. member that I had the honour to do so in 1964, and I want to thank—

[English]

I am very happy that the member for Regina—Wascana has predicted that I will be forming the government. The people of Canada will be very happy with the wisdom he displayed yesterday.

Yesterday I was involved in an incident that was very, very interesting. While I was listening to the Speech from the Throne in the Senate there was a person there who, like many Canadians, could not stand it any more. She could not take it any more and she fainted. She was next to me and out of a sense of duty, I took her out of the chamber to give her some fresh air. It was the right thing to do. I will do the same thing for the Canadian people; I will take this government out of this Chamber, I will put this team on the other side of the House and fresh air will come back. Happiness and joy will come back to this nation. It is the call of duty. This is what was predicted by the member for Regina—Wascana and so I would like to thank him again.

I would like to start my speech by quoting one well known Canadian who not long ago said:

> The problem with the Government of Canada as presently constituted is that it has lost the confidence of the people. Confidence is very fragile and difficult to define. Once you have lost it, you can never recapture it. Once you have betrayed your word and you have let the people down, you have an enormous problem ahead of you.

Those are tough words. They speak of betrayal and lost confidence. They speak of letting people down. The words I have quoted were spoken more than eight years ago in this House by the right hon. member opposite, the Prime Minister himself.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: The problem with the Government of Canada as presently constituted is that it has lost the confidence of the people. Those are the words the Prime Minister used in December, 1983 when he stood where I am now standing. In all honesty, I could not find a more fitting epitaph for this tired Conservative government, now drifting in its eighth year.

There is no doubt the government has lost the confidence of the Canadian people. To paraphrase the words of the Prime Minister himself, when you have lost the confidence of people, you are in deep trouble.

The Speech from the Throne yesterday is obviously the last will and testament of this government. Like any last will and testament, it is filled with some good intentions and some sober words. It is even filled with one or two ideas borrowed from this side of the House. In the end, however, it is a document written by a government which lacks the moral authority to carry the program.

[Translation]

The Conservative government has practically written its own epitaph, Mr. Speaker, but it is not Canada's epitaph. This government's utter failure to manage the economy and deal with problems relating to the Constitution does not mean the people of Canada have failed.

Granted, the country's morale has rarely been as low as it has been during the past few years. Buffeted alternately by sarcasm and despair, we felt confused, as though we were lost in a dense fog. People are angry, people feel hurt and they are afraid. Canadians are right to be angry, just as they are right to feel betrayed. I use here the word used by the Prime Minister in 1983.

[English]

It is not difficult to see why people feel angry and betrayed. Since this government made its debut seven years ago, not so much filled with promise as filled with promises, we have been hit with scandal after scandal, promise after promise broken and minister after minister has resigned in disgrace.

We have been hit by a made-in-Canada recession, a recession the Prime Minister has admitted the government induced. We have been hit with a GST that has pushed inflation up and sales down. We have been hit with cutbacks to medicare and post-secondary education.

We have been hit with shutdowns of Canadian forces bases, shutdowns at our rural post offices and we have seen shutdowns in our factories, fisheries and farms. We have seen shutdowns at CBC stations across the country. VIA Rail has almost disappeared.

The litany of despair does not end there. As the Speech from the Throne proves to anyone interested in reading it, not all of Canada's recent troubles have concerned economic matters.

Recently, we have seen region pitted against region. We have heard angry words exchanged about language and culture. We have seen our national institutions cast in disrepute.

This is the government that got us into this constitutional mess. This is the government that rolled the dice. This is the government that brought us to the brink.

When we Liberals say we will work to bring the nation together once more, let us be clear: we will be working for the good of the country: we will be working for the nation's interests: we will be working to clean up the mess created by this government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: We, and the people of Canada, will not forget that this government is the author of our misfortune. At the end of the day, this government will be held accountable for having rolled the dice with the future of Canada.

• (1020)

In every region of the country—in the towns, the cities, the rural communities—Canadians have grown weary of our seemingly endless constitutional debates. They are just fed up with this debate. They are tired of the bickering and the cynicism. They want us, their political leaders, to get to work. They want us to get to work at finding solutions to the serious problems this nation now faces, such as the problems in the economy, such as the problem of competitiveness, such as the problems of the environment and social justice.

We in Canada are blessed with so much: beautiful land, prosperous lives, a proud history. What must the Kurds think of us when they see us devote years and years to this constitutional question? What must the people of Ethiopia and Bangladesh think of us when we spend millions of dollars on constitutional commissions and studies?

Beyond our borders, who could imagine that anyone would want to break up a nation that is the envy of the world?

[Translation]

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we must deal with this problem and we must do so quickly. We must deal with our constitutional problems as soon as possible so that we can concentrate on the nation's real problem I mentioned a few moments ago: the economy, unemployment, the environment, social security—all those problems facing us now. Otherwise, we will still be talking about the Constitution. That is why, I repeat, we must deal with these problems quickly, fairly and effectively.

Our party is not afraid to take a stand. Three weeks ago, it presented a method and a program. We wanted the government to be able to put these proposale before Canadians on June 1, because we must realize the situation is precarious and that this has a negative impact on the economy. We must take the situation in the province of Quebec seriously. We may be faced with a referendum there as early as next year, in the spring.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Why wait until September 1? We will lose three months. It will be 1992 before we know it, and we only have five months of public hearings. Of course, that is the government's decision, the real reason being that, once again, it doesn't really know what to do. It is too afraid to offend. Oh, we cannot afford to provoke Mr. Bouchard. We can't afford to provoke Mr. Manning. I say it is high time we got this over with!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: We must speak candidly to Canadians. The government agreed with the idea of having a committee of the House of Commons and the Senate study a constitutional proposal, and it is to be commended for its decision. However, this means it will no longer be possible to have a constituent assembly, because we will then have a concrete proposal, already put before Canadians after consultations across the country. Why this ambiguity? Time is of the essence. I agree, the provinces must be consulted and we have to consult with native groups, but we must start now, otherwise we will once again be caught with our backs against the wall.

What is the Prime Minister waiting for? We say, let the people decide. Last year and the years before that, the people did not have a chance to decide. After the Accord, we had committees travelling across the country, and part of their mandate was that they could not accept a single amendment. Why appoint a committee if no amendments can be made? We had one here in the House, a committee appointed at the last minute, which did excellent work, a committee chaired by the present Minister of the Environment, a committee that managed to obtain the unamimous approval of this House. Not a single member rose in the House to speak against the committee.

It was a compromise which respected the five conditions set by Quebec. However, the Prime Minister, I'm not sure under pressure from whom, decided to set it aside, to ignore the work done by the House, for reasons as yet unknown. As a result, we had this disaster last June.

We say: Let's have a referendum early in 1992. Why a referendum? Because the time has come for people to speak. They will be asked to consider a proposal.

[English]

This project has to be the Canada round. We cannot try to solve the constitutional problem by dealing with the problems of one part of Canada before the others.

I say that in my own province when I am there. What would the reaction have been last year, or three years ago, if they had said: We will solve the problems of western Canada. We will come back here after that. It would have led to a lot of suspicion.

Let's have a Canada round. The Prime Minister and his ministers who are here are using that expression now and I am happy. We have a Canada round where everybody will feel comfortable. We do not have to have commissions to know that westerners want to have an elected Senate.

They want to participate, because the nature of Canada put the majority of the people in Ontario and Quebec. They feel rejected by a parliamentary system which, unfortunately, when your members are with the government, you feel that you are not well represented. So often they speak out in the caucus and they have to vote with the government in the House.

Having an effective Senate, they will have the feeling that they have been heard. Even if the decision is not according to what they wish, they will be comfortable because at least they will have been heard. They made their case and their elected people spoke openly about their problems.

We have to have the Canada round. Everyone knows that. When we have the package, the contents of which I will describe to you, there will be a referendum. Why do I want a referendum? Because this Prime Minister last year, in a very irresponsible way, for weeks and weeks and weeks created the impression that if the agreement were not to pass, English Canada was saying "no" to Quebec.

That was not true. Having created that impression in order to put pressure on everybody, it was no wonder the people of Quebec felt rejected.

If we have a referendum where we address all the problems of Canadians, what will happen? The very day that we have this referendum where we will say to the people of Canada that we need the majority of western Canadians, of Ontarians, of Quebecers and of the people from Atlantic Canada and it is acceptable, it will be a great day, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: That day, the Canadian people who are not from Quebec will say: "No, we have been together for 200 years. We started as a small colony and have become a great country. We understand that it is possible and needed to be different and equal at the same time."

That day, everybody will be happy to say that to the people of Quebec. It will give an opportunity to the million francophones outside Quebec to vote on that issue. It will be the day when the francophones of Quebec will say: "We want to stay in Canada." It will be the day when the anglophones of Quebec will be able to say: "We are anglophones. We are Quebecers and we are Canadians at the same time."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: That very day, the francophones outside Quebec—

—the constituents in the riding of Beauséjour, those one million francophones across the country who have a lot more trouble staying French than any fellow citizen born in Quebec. One million francophones will be able to say: I am an Acadian, I am from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island. This is my home; I am a francophone and I am proud of it! I am proud to be from New Brunswick and I am also proud to be a Canadian!

• (1030)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: If we look at our country's history, we made some very important decisions. At the very heart of the decisions that built this country was the will of francophones to keep and build this country. We refused to join the American Revolution. If we had, perhaps Canada would never have existed.

[English]

I hope the people in English Canada know that. If we had decided to join the American revolution, this country might not exist today. If in 1812 de Salaberry had not been at Châteauguay to push them back, we would not be in Canada today. They should know that. The people of western Canada should know who opened the west. It was the voyageurs who left Trois Rivieres—La Vérendrye, Radisson, Des Groseilliers—who went there to open the west. Otherwise that part of this country would not be part of Canada. These were Quebecers who did that. In a referendum were all the people who believe in Canada, and I know that the people on the other side believe in Canada.

I was happy to hear my successor in Saint-Maurice talk about Canada the way he did yesterday. I congratulate him for that. With all the federalists and all the people who believe that we have built a country here that is the envy of the world will shake hands the day of the referendum. We want to give Canadians a new constitution so that we have the instrument we need to face the 21st century as a proud and independent country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: We will be united. It will be a great day when the myth that Quebec had been rejected is gone forever. It will be a great day.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: We have to let the people speak. But we cannot let the people speak without giving them a program. We, in our party, after a lot of discussion, have put the proposition forward.

[Translation]

I would like to thank the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel who worked very hard last fall as our party's representative and the voice of this Parliament before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: He represented us before the commission but, at the same time, he had many long sessions with members on this side of the House, resulting in the presentation we made before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission on December 18. This presentation already contained elements of the proposal we submitted in Montreal three weeks ago. I would like to take this opportunity to explain them today.

First, we should make a statement on the nature of Canada. This statement would indicate the will of all Canadians to live in this country, in the federal State that is ours. It would also set forth the values we share, including our attachment to both official languages and our commitment to our multicultural heritage. It would recognize the crucial role played by the aboriginal nations in our society and the distinct identity of Quebec society.

[English]

It will also be a good occasion to again recognize our unwavering commitment to equality of men and women in our Constitution because there are some doubts in the minds of a lot of Canadians.

Second, we will make sure the Charter of Rights and Freedoms continues to be the cornerstone of our Constitution. Why? Because we look forward to the next century. In the next century, the majority of Canadians will not be from either French or English backgrounds. What can we guarantee the people who have a different colour, a different language or a different religion? What better can we guarantee to them than their individual rights in their Constitution? It will be clear.

The third element of our proposition is the economic union in Canada. By 1992 there will be more mobility in Europe than we have in Canada. We recognize, and we want it to be in the Constitution, that we have a common market in Canada. We are starting to have a common market with the United States and Mexico, and yet we cannot sell products among Canadians. There is a producer in Dorchester in Beauséjour, two miles from the border of Nova Scotia. He who cannot sell his product to the Government of Nova Scotia because he lives two miles from the border. We do not have the mobility of people like they have in Europe. The time has come to have mobility of people, goods, services and capital in Canada.

The government in the Speech from the Throne talks about it, but it says in the Allaire report it will not happen until 1995. Even those who virtually do not want any link with Canada recognize the need to have a real common market in Canada, so why wait until 1995? Put it in the Constitution right away.

As I said before, and repeat, reform of the Senate is extremely important. I believe in it. I was on the other side long enough to know that sometimes we are driven by the heat of the moment, the push of bureaucrats and so on, and reassured by the support of our troops, quite often saying: "Try that, minister. You are a good guy, try that, show you are strong". However they do not think enough at times about the reaction of the people. The members of the caucus have virtually no choice. If they shut you down, it could cause an election.

On the other hand, if in the Upper House there would be another vote—it might be veto, a suspension of veto and in come cases an absolute veto—the politicians of this House and the minister would have to reflect twice. They would have to compromise when they go there, they do not want to compromise in this House. That would give a lot of satisfaction to the people of western Canada and Atlantic Canada who think they do not have the numbers of their side. This system works in Australia, Germany and in many other nations. Why not have it in Canada, and quickly?

The other point I want to make concerns the natives of Canada. I was Minister of Indian Affairs for more than six years. I have always felt terrible about this social problem. We have to deal with it quickly. We have to do something that they have asked for, in my judgment, for a long time. In 1981 we started to put aboriginal rights in the Constitution. We have to make progress. Whenever I talk with aboriginal people in Canada, they tell me they want aboriginal self-government in the Constitution.

I think it should be done. Progress will be made. We have made enough mistakes concerning natives. We should let them make a few mistakes. They have the sense of dignity that they need. They were here before we arrived. Unfortunately, we have not given them the place that they should have in our society.

I have met people from outside of Canada who watched the international news last summer. I tell you, that on the channels in Europe, the next item after the war news was the fate of natives in Canada. It was not a good story for Canadians.

This has to be corrected, and quickly.

I am happy that Mr. Justice Dickson is going to be working on this problem, but what puzzles me is that this seems to be a royal commission to draft the terms of a royal commission. I do not know why we have a government. He might be able to deal with the whole problem, but this is a royal commission to establish the terms of reference of a royal commission. What kind of government is that? I am happy with the choice of Mr. Justice Dickson and I know he will do his best. I hope this process is not being used by the government to allow it to drag its feet because it does not know what to do. We do not want a repetition of the problems we had last year in Canada, action is needed now, urgently.

I would now like to talk about the six points of our proposal.

The sixth point is the distribution of power. As I told the Bélanger–Campeau Commission last year, there is nothing sacrosanct about the present division of powers.

We must look for a division of powers that best serves the interests of the people, all the Canadian people. This is an important point, and I would have specific recommendations to make on this subject.

The Fathers of Confederation did a good job when they drafted the Constitution. They drafted it however in the context of 1867, based on the realities of 1867. Now, the time has come for us to review how the powers are divided, but we must do so with the interest of the people in mind. The basic premise should be this: who can do the best job, the federal government or the provincial governments? It should not be done in the interest of ministers who want bigger and larger departments or bureaucrats who want to be in charge of a greater number of civil servants. We must ask ourselves what, in the interest of the people, is the most efficient way of ensuring this country will be competitive in the years to come. That is what the key consideration should be in this negotiation. It should not be a question of who is going to win or loose.

The winners should be neither the federal government nor the provincial governments, but the people. That is how it should be done!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Therefore, we recommend a functional approach, because it is possible, as I explained in my speeches of the past couple of days, to solve problems, possibly with additional legislation.

In the case of the environment, for instance, there could be national standards and we need such standards, otherwise a provincial government could offer a manufacturer to set up shop in the province, with the privilege of polluting, which is an enormous advantage.

So, if we had national standards, pollution could not be used to attract nor to reject investors. We do not need two separate groups of civil servants to enforce these standards. The provinces could very well administer them based on local priorities and needs. No administrative duplication is necessary. The same could be done for manpower training.

The Prime Minister mentioned manpower training in the speech from the Throne yesterday. It is an important issue. If nowadays four out of ten Canadian citizens are hindered by a lack of education and training, that is a problem indeed. We must not forget, however, that education is a provincial jurisdiction according to the Constitution.

So, what should we do? The needs of the people can easily be recognized by this Parliament. These are objective standards, including manpower training, but they do not have to be administered by Ottawa, so long as the national objectives are met.

The same is true of regional development. In that case, national standards are needed to take money from the central government and apply it to the regions as well as to account for taxpayers money from across Canada being used just for Northern Manitoba, the Gaspesian Peninsula, the riding of Charlevoix or the St-Maurice Valley instead of Toronto or Hamilton. We must have national criteria but, once those criteria have been clearly established, we don't need this bureaucratic duplication of services to implement the program. We can let the regions take care of regional priorities, instead of having the central government manage the day-to-day implementation of the program.

[English]

Certain principles have to prevail because this is a very important element. Specifically, any change in the distribution of powers should guarantee the rights and freedoms of citizens.

Any review would have to ensure that our two main linguistic communities are maintained and strengthened. This principle is fundamental to Canada's existence and should be generously endorsed by all levels of government. Furthermore, Quebec must be recognized as the linchpin of the French fact in this country.

[English]

Any change in the distribution of powers must guarantee respect for and the growth of aboriginal peoples. Any change to promote the rights and growth of cultural communities, any change in the distribution of powers should maximize the quality and standard of living of all Canadians. Any change should facilitate the working of the Canadian economic union. Any change in the distribution of power should ensure, on a national scale, the pursuit of social justice through the sharing of resources between regions and citizens.

Any review must ensure that governments remain sovereign within their respective jurisdictions. We must try and clarify the situation and ensure there is less duplication than was the case in the past.

Any review should consider the diversity of this country's regions, including the distinct identity of Quebec society.

[English]

I have said many times that the Cullen-Couture agreement between the federal government and the province of Quebec, concerning the problem of population in Quebec, should be constitutionalized. It has worked well for a long time and now should be given a constitutional guarantee.

We have to talk about sharing the spending power. We all agree that there is a great temptation to sometimes abuse the spending power in this Parliament and everyone has agreed for a long time that there should be limits. It would be simpler to have a more functional division of powers, while ensuring that the national objective can be met. Otherwise how can we compete in the world of tomorrow? We should not abuse our spending power. We need to have limits. This issue has been on the table for a long time. It was there 20 years ago and it has to be resolved. It is not complicated. All the taxes have existed for generations. We only have to put them together to have a package.

Take the Supreme Court. It is a request of the provinces, particularly Quebec, that they be able to recommend people to sit on the Supreme Court. As the Supreme Court is more and more a constitutional court, I agree that we should have more input from the provinces. As Minister of Justice, I know what any Minister of Justice is looking for when he appoints a judge to the Supreme Court. He wants to appoint the best person he can find. This is how he eventually will be judged by his peers. Any Minister of Justices takes pride in being instrumental in the appointments to the Supreme Court.

When I was Minister of Justice there were two appointments, Madam Justice Wilson—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: —whom I can talk about because she is not there anymore. I take a lot of pride in being instrumental in the appointment of that lady as the first woman on the Supreme Court. Not only that, she was a fantastic judge. And I did not even know for whom she voted before I asked her to be a judge. That is the way it should be.

We need a deadlock-breaking mechanism. We need it. Otherwise there would be a paralysis of the court if there is a conflict between provinces and the federal government on appointments.

We should have objective criteria but we should have a deadlock breaking mechanism. There is nothing worse than if we were to start using the Supreme Court to play political games, or to put the operation of the country at a standstill with that.

It is easy to do. There are dozens of mechanisms proposed in documents that I saw when I was in the job of the hon. member, the minister of constitutional affairs. That is a package that is easy.

I am convinced and we on this side of the House are all convinced that not everybody will be happy. However, it will meet a lot of the preoccupations of the people of the north. It will meet the preoccupations of the first citizens of Canada, the native Canadians. It will meet the aspirations of the people of western Canada who feel very strongly about an elected Senate.

It is the same for the people of Atlantic Canada who feel that with the small number of people they have, it is not the way it should be. They will be happy with that.

Most of the conditions that were the traditional conditions of Quebec, plus the mobility that was in the Allaire report and the principle of the sharing of powers, should receive very large support from the people of Quebec.

We are proposing an amending formula, that is the Victoria formula, which was agreed upon in 1971. Unfortunately the Quebec government walked away from it for the wrong reasons, and it should now come back. The policy of this party since 1971 has been that we have always accepted that it was the best amending formula, giving a veto to the regions.

This country is made of four big regions, and we have to respect that reality. In contrast, the unanimity rule that the Prime Minister offered last year was no amending formula at all.

In 1931 that was the debate: Should we have an amending formula or not? At that time the Prime Minister and premier refused unanimity. This proposition came back last year. That made no sense because the people of Quebec feel that they are one of the four parts of Canada. It is a reality.

We should have a formula that in the long run foresees what Canada should be 100 years from now. I urge the government to look at the possibility of defining what is a region.

I am willing to offer a suggestion. It might be that Quebec should be the base. If one province 100 years from now is bigger than Quebec, it could be the fifth region. I do not know if it is a very good idea, but we have to make sure that this country is more balanced than is seen today.

An amending formula like the one I proposed, the Victoria formula, will give a great sense of security to the people of my native province. For me, it will be the package that we will be proposing to Canadians.

I am sure that if it is done with good will, if everyone in Canada wants to resolve that problem and to accept some compromise—life is made of compromises—we could have a new Constitution within a year. That would be a real reconciliation because it would not be a reconciliation based on political motivation to win an election.

It would be a reconciliation to build a country that would be a great, independent and proud country with which to enter into the 21st century. That should be the goal of this government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I am telling the Prime Minister that one thing which is very important is that the debate on the Constitution should not be a program to try to win an election. A government should be judged on its activity as a government. It should not play tricks or try to divide the people in an election.

There is a limit where we will not go as a party, because we believe that we need a country that works. This country needs a strong federal government. If there is to be a devolution of powers, we might as well separate right away.

We have to have principles and stand by those principles. We will help the government if it does the same thing. If the government starts to play politics, we can do politicking too. We will tell the Canadian people that we will not accept the dice being rolled a second time with the future of this country.

When we have resolved that, as quickly as possible, we will be able to deal with the economic problems of this nation. This is why we say we need to act quickly: there is nothing worse than political instability. One million dollars does not speak English or French but it walks very fast. Political stability is extremely important for investment and jobs.

What is needed today is for 1.5 million Canadians to get jobs, but this political instability is not helping. The Prime Minister must know a lot of stories of political instability causing problems in Quebec and elsewhere.

We feel that it is very important to solve this problem because these people need jobs.

There are 186,000 children in Canada who go to bed hungry every night. Can we accept that in a country like Canada?

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Chrétien: There are 19,000 Canadians who in the first three months of this year have lost their assets through bankruptcy. What about their dignity when they go home at night? Do you not think that we have to do something? We have to move on this problem quickly.

We see the former Minister of Finance coming to his seat. We heard brave words on the debt of Canada. The government was elected to reduce the deficit. It was another great promise. The government blamed everybody. In seven years it has accumulated more debt than in the previous 117 years of this Confederation. It is because the Minister of Finance made a lot of mistakes by always believing his own predictions. The first mistake he made was when he went abroad to borrow because he could get a better interest rate. A big part of the debt is now in the hands of foreigners. That is why he has very little flexibility.

After that, because he had predicted that interest rates would go down, he shifted the long-term debt to short-term debt. A big part of the debt is in treasury bills which are coming on the table every day and every week. With that error, it is no wonder that he has to maintain high interest rates and a high dollar. He does not want people who have invested in Canada in short-term money to run away with the money.

When I was Minister of Finance I could have borrowed money at 2 per cent in Switzerland. We could have if I had rolled the dice with the economy. I would have looked good in the short term. Who would have paid the capital 10 years later—perhaps three times the capital? No, we were responsible.

When I read the phrase in the Speech from the Throne "Finances have been put on a sound base", who are they kidding? What a joke.

There is 13 per cent unemployment in the riding of Charlevoix. The Prime Minister told them: I am going to create jobs, jobs, jobs. Thirteen percent unemployment in his own riding!

In Windsor last month, almost 13 per cent of the people were out of work. This is the Prime Minister who promised jobs, jobs and jobs. Where are the jobs for those 17,000 people in Windsor today?

In Montreal, again 13 per cent. Today, more than 200,000 people in the Montreal area are jobless. Where are the jobs the Prime Minister promised them during the election campaigns in 1984 and in 1988?

• (1100)

In Saskatoon almost 13 per cent of the people are out of work. This is the Prime Minister who promised jobs, jobs, jobs. Where are the jobs for those 12,000 people in Saskatoon?

In the city of St. John's, Newfoundland, 13 per cent of the people are unemployed. This is the Prime Minister who promised jobs, jobs, jobs. Where are the jobs for those 11,000 people in St. John's, Newfoundland today? It is always more bad news: decline in output in January by 1.2 per cent; inflation 6 per cent; retail is down by 4 per cent; automobile sales are down by 7 per cent.

We can talk about problems of this nature for hours. Some of my colleagues will get up in this debate and give a lot of these problems to the government to solve.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the facts are quite clear. If you are a person living on a low income, you cannot rely on this government. If you are a young person, you cannot rely on this government. If you are an elderly person, you cannot rely on this government. If you are sick, you cannot rely on this government.

[English]

If you own or work on a farm, do not count on this government. If you work in fisheries, it is the same problem. Small factories across the land are closing every day. Nobody can count on this government. This government has turned its back on all the people who are having problems in Canada.

These days the only people who can find work are Tories who work for committees and royal commissions.

We know what has to be done. We have to make sure we have an interest rate policy that makes some sense. We might have to accept a lower Canadian dollar.

What is the problem with the business community today? Look at its situation. Five years ago the dollar was at a more competitive level according to the reality of Canada. That means that today 20 per cent have lack of competitiveness because of the high dollar. The interest rate is 4 points higher on average than the United States. If it is 10 per cent it means that on the item of interest rate for any business the Canadian businessman and producer have to pay 40 per cent more than an American in interest rates. No wonder they cannot compete.

I was in northern Ontario last weekend. In the lumber business sawmills are closing down one after the other. It is the same in Quebec and New Brunswick. Why? Because now we have an export tax imposed on Canada by the American government of 15 per cent. So when you add the 15 per cent plus the 40 per cent for interest costs plus the high Canadian dollar it is no wonder factories and sawmills are closing by the dozen.

I see the minister is now in his seat. He has changed jobs. In research and development we are now 17 out of 23 in the OECD.

The Prime Minister said to Canadians in 1984: "I will double research and development". We went down from 1.42 per cent of GDP in 1984 to 1.28 today, a decline of more than 10 per cent, and the Prime Minister said he was going to double that.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Chrétien: I can go on and on. The former Minister of Finance, the one who caused all these problems, is coming to clear the air. He is the one who created the problem. How can he make Canadian industry competitive when he is the one who caused the decline in research and development? How can he make Canadian workers able to compete in the world when he is the one who cut education year after year after year?

How can we be the best in the world when they have made cuts in training year after year after year. The Prime Minister has put the fox in charge of the chicken coop. No wonder this government is now fourth in the polls.

I said at the beginning of this speech, and I repeat, we are at a crossroads in this land. We want to help the government to solve the national problems and quickly. I am very disappointed that it is waiting three months, because by the end of January there will be a lot of pressure on it to postpone and postpone. I have been there before. I remember very well one time we were to solve a problem and we had from September to December 1980 in which to do it. It took longer than that. We listened to the people. We accepted many amendments to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms because we listened to the people and to the parliamentarians and to the groups. It took longer.

The problem is that if the Prime Minister does not act quickly, we will again have our back to the wall. The problem of the economy will not be solved in that time. Political instability will grow in Canada and investment will dry up because the government is not accepting its responsibilities. We are willing to help. We are willing to help because we believe that, as Canadians, we are very privileged people, including the people who sit there. When you are a Canadian, the best asset you have in your pocket is that little piece of paper that says you are a Canadian citizen. It is the greatest asset we all have.

If Canada had not existed, Quebec would not exist anymore. Look at what happened to the francophones in Louisiana and in New England. Here in Canada, at the time of Confederation, we were one million francophones.

[Translation]

There were one million francophones in Canada at the time. Now there are 6.5 million of us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: There are more francophones outside Quebec than there were in the Canada of 1867. In Quebec, 84 per cent of the people are francophones, Mr. Speaker, and 94 per cent of Quebecers speak French. All this is possible because Canada existed. Those are the facts!

When I see people in this House ignore those one million francophones outside Quebec, and when I hear people over there saying they are as good as dead, except for the death certificate, I think they should go and visit some of the counties in New Brunswick and see the Acadians who were deported and came back, and who will never lose their language because they believe Canada is the answer.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: It is our duty to keep this country together. Thanks to this country, we are proud to be francophones, and thanks to this country, we are where we are today. Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that if the Prime Minister acts now, he will have our co-operation, because in my many trips across the country, I have found a fantastic reservoir of good will and tolerance.

[English]

There are some people who complain about the corn flakes boxes. There are some people like that. If they do not like it, they should turn the box around or pretend to read it if they do not want to talk to their wives during breakfast.

We have to fight for this country. We are unique. Very soon in Europe, everybody will speak three languages.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocard, the French Prime Minister, said in an interview with Le Devoir not long ago that he was looking for ways to ensure that every European spoke at least three languages. This means that if you are French, Italian, Spanish or Portuguese, you would have to learn either English or German, or a germanic language, and of course the opposite would apply to people who speak English, Danish or German. Here, we already have two languages.

• (1110)

I think that pretty soon, it will be possible for every Canadian in this country who graduates from university to speak not just two but three languages. This would mean that we as North Americans would be able to compete, to travel throughout the world and show that we are just as good as the Europeans, especially with the added benefit of two official languages. This is a heritage our country may be proud of.

Hundreds of thousands of young anglophone Canadians will learn French today because they know we have two official languages, and that because we have two languages, we are different. This is one of the most important things that differentiate us from Americans.

I therefore urge the Prime Minister to act quickly, because Canada is far too great and noble a country to be allowed to fall apart. All of us are going to work on this together, and Canada will survive!

[English]

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton East, that the following be added to the address:

> This House regrets to inform Your Excellency that your government is incapable of providing leadership and direction in the constitutional and economic affairs of the nation, and that it has lost the confidence of this House and of the Canadian people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. It is my understanding that since 1957, the Leader of the Official Opposition has always been the first speaker following the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I believe that on each and every one of those occasions, with the exception of 1989, the right hon. Prime Minister was the individual who would take his place and respond on behalf of the government.

As I stated, I think the exception was in 1989 when the right hon. Prime Minister, either for lacking courage or political will, did not—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond rises on an alleged point of order. I think the comments of the hon. member are observations. Of course, there is no order binding the government, or for that matter other members, in a particular order that ministers will respond to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I just take a moment to comment because I think it is very important as we begin this debate?

This is the purpose of the throne speech. Some of the discussions on the throne speech have been to call on this House, as much as possible, to rise to the occasion and be non-partisan. I am disappointed this has not happened.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to co-operate with the Chair. I have said that it is not a point of order. I listened to see whether there could possibly be a point of order from the hon. parliamentary secretary's point of view, and it is not a point of order.

I recognize the minister.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to support the Speech from the Throne as presented yesterday by the Governor General.

I listened carefully to the comments of the Leader of the Opposition as well as the House leader just now, and I regret to say that one important element of the Speech from the Throne has been totally missed by the opposition parties. We are trying to gain a greater degree of non-partisanship and a common approach towards some of the very key problems that we are facing as a country. Two of these I propose to discuss today; unity and prosperity, particularly prosperity.

The Speech from the Throne does present two over-arching themes, two over-arching concerns of Canadians today, one of these being national unity, the other being economic prosperity. National unity, at a time when Canadians are re-examining some of the fundamental institutions and approaches that have served us for generations. Economic prosperity, at a time when Canadians enjoy great benefits but face tremendous challenges to maintain and improve their way of life.

We stand at a crossroads, Mr. Speaker. One road leads to the creation of a new Canada; a Canada whose prosperity has a firm foundation in our ability to meet the demands of the international marketplace; a united Canada whose institutions, revitalized and renewed, will provide a legacy for generations to come. The other road leads towards disunity and economic decline, toward a fading power, a Canada no longer able to take its place at the table of leading economic nations, a nation whose balkanized parts have neither the influence nor the strength to provide an environment for prosperity.

Future generations are going to look back to this Parliament as a time when Canadians faced squarely their problems and challenges and built confidently for the future.

But we do have a choice, Mr. Speaker. Do we turn up the road towards prosperity and unity, or down the road to decline and division? Each of the paths that we can choose from has two tracks. Our economic program and our progress in constitutional renewal are linked as if they were two wheels on one vehicle. Our desire for unity grows from our pride in Canada. But it is nurtured by our desire to prosper. Our social safety net, our standard of living, and our ability to seek fulfilling employment anywhere in one of the world's most envied economies provide powerful reasons for the country to remain united.

A united Canada has economic potential that a balkanized Canada will inevitably lose. This is a powerful argument against those who would pull this country apart. It is an argument against which the separatists have offered no reply. The shared desire to build upon our prosperity helps us see beyond any differences in language, race or partisan affiliation. Both keystone issues of the government's agenda, unity and prosperity, transcend the partisan barriers that regularly divide this House. We cannot afford to let our partisan differences interfere with our drive towards shared prosperity, any more than we can let political affiliation stand in the way of our efforts to unite this country.

We will debate about how we will get there, but both sides of this House agree on the final destination: a prosperous and united Canada.

Let there be no misunderstanding. Choices have to be made. We have gone beyond the point of no return. In our quest for prosperity and unity, there is no room for the past and its less complicated realities.

The choice cannot be between a bold approach and one that is easy and familiar. The past is the past. Old approaches would not be suited to the present situation, both as regards national unity and the economy.

However, some basic truths have remained unchanged since Confederation and even since the Colonial days. The prosperity of our nation has always been linked to trade.

[English]

Trade built this country, whether the export was fish or furs, timber or wheat, autos or engineering services and telecommunications. Trade has kept food on our tables, clothes on our backs for over 300 years. Trade has helped build the high standard of living and the enviable social safety net we enjoy today.

Trade with the world must be the foundation of our prosperity for generations to come. And the removal of our inter-provincial trade barriers within Canada must be a feature of our initiatives towards a new unity. We will work with the provinces to achieve this by 1995. This is not an overly ambitious agenda, because with the work that is being done in the European Community to achieve the same objective by 1992, an objective they have been working on for a few years now, but one that is accepted by 12 countries with 10 different languages. Surely, we in Canada, as one country with two languages, 10 provinces that should be working together in a more aggressive and more effective way, can achieve this by 1995.

Today, the whole world is trading. Competition is tough. We did not make it that way and we cannot wish it away. A failure to trade is a failure to compete and the inability to compete would mean failure to trade. That is a circle that cannot be broken. It is a reality that we cannot ignore. But the environment in which we trade has changed as dramatically as the world has changed since the age of Cartier and Cabot, or Borden and King.

We can no longer rely upon the abundance of our natural resources to provide our standard of living. Nor on the buoyance of our automotive industry. These have been great strengths for us as a country. They have been the source of our prosperity and the build of our trade, and they will continue to be important components of our trade. But now there are new challenges. We must reach further to provide the high quality, high value-added products and services that will support a continued improvement in our standard of living and our quality of life.

We cannot and should not compete in products that are produced by low-wage countries where the level of education, of training and of technology is much lower than ours. That is not our market niche. That would not support our current standard of living.

[Translation]

The challenges of the global economy are impressive. The Canadian people are aware of that fact which was further reinforced by the recession.

It is more difficult to make ends meet, to buy a house and to carry out both personal and family plans.

The same is true for the Canadian economy. Our productivity has increased very marginally over the past decade. We have been outranked by our main competitors.

To meet our needs, we have asked for wage increases which our country could not afford.

This government recognized these developments when it came to power in 1984.

We set upon a course of helping the Canadian economy respond to the demands of the global marketplace. An agenda for economic renewal was introduced in my first economic statement as finance minister and has provided the broad plan that we have followed consistently ever since.

We have introduced new policies to encourage investment, reform the tax system and lessen the burden of government on the economy. Much progress has been made. We eased the regulations that had hampered the ability of businesses to provide for economic growth. We privatized over 20 Crown corporations that no longer serve a public function. We eliminated the taxes on manufacturing products which impeded our ability to sell abroad. Now we must reach further. We must become more competitive as a nation.

I know that some believe that greater competitiveness means lost jobs and lower wages, but in fact the reverse is true. Greater competitiveness means more jobs and higher incomes. Being competitive means smarter jobs, more skilled jobs and greater investment in technology to give people better tools to work with.

Being competitive lets us trade. Trade also makes us more competitive. Competitiveness and trade are not optional extras for the Canadian economy. They are at the core of any modern economy. They make an economy modern. They make it succeed. That is not argument or ideology. It is reality.

I doubt whether there is anyone in this House who would dispute that. Nor can anyone deny that the Canadian market is small, larger than many, but small compared to our main competitors. Twenty-six million people cannot sustain a prosperous economy in the modern world by selling only to themselves.

That simple fact of life has made us one of the world's great trading nations. Many of our companies have been great success stories internationally. They know they must compete abroad to be successful at home. This trade generates revenue. This revenue is spent on research and development, technology acquisition, growth and training.

The success of these companies shows how Canadian industry can meet the challenges of the international economy. But in order for Canada to prosper in international trade we need to expand our access to new markets and secure our access to traditional ones.

Through the growing global initiative Canada will penetrate new markets in Europe and the Pacific Rim and take advantage of market opportunities in the U.S.A. The free trade agreement with the United States was a quantum leap in securing and enhancing trade with our largest trading partner.

In 1988 just prior to the FTA implementation, the net direct investment outflow, that is outflow from Canada, was $2.5 billion. In 1990 Canada had a record net direct investment inflow of $4.3 billion from all countries. That was the first time in 16 years that there was a positive inflow of net direct investment.

Our trade surplus with the United States has grown from $14 billion in 1988 to $17 billion in 1990. Since the FTA was implemented exports to the United States rose by approximately 7 per cent in spite of the recession.

What kind of exports? Commodities like cereals and zinc, manufactured goods such as electrical equipment and railway rolling stock, and high-tech equipment such as aerospace equipment, and scientific and professional instruments. In many sectors we are undergoing an export boom since the FTA. But we cannot rest on our laurels.

Our ability to compete in the global marketplace continues to be severely tested. There are disturbing signs that Canada is losing its competitive edge. We must respond to this.

According to the World Economic Forum 1990 World Competitiveness Report our over-all competitiveness ranking is fifth, but we rank only thirteenth in industrial efficiency, fifteenth in international orientation, and sixteenth in future orientation.

The world is not going to wait for us to dither and deliberate over the various options to improve our productivity any more than it will wait for us to solve our constitutional issues.

We must act quickly. We must rethink our old ways of doing things. We must adjust our business attitudes and practices to fit the new trading environment.

• (1130)

A number of key factors contribute to the construction of a vigorous, competitive Canadian economy that can thrive in the global market.

First, we must improve our science and technology capabilities and apply best practice technologies in the work place. The level of research and development performed by private industry in Canada is significantly lower than the industrial R and D of our competitors. We are about the same in the level of R and D performed by governments, but we are lagging in the private sector.

We must build networks and alliances among the research communities in industry, the universities and government. We must help industry adapt and adopt new technologies that will sharpen its competitive edge.

The second building block of competitiveness is a highly skilled, quality labour force. Not only does this mean helping the educational system provide the skills that are essential for a modern industrial economy. It also means helping business to sponsor continuing training for its employees. This is all part of the continuous learning experience that is referred to in the Speech from the Throne.

The third factor necessary for international competitiveness is capital markets that are responsive to the needs of our entrepreneurs and our inventors. Lower cost of capital investment means that companies can afford a longer time horizon for pay-back on their investments, including investment in research and development.

The fourth factor is that competitiveness requires a business climate that supports enterprise and an efficient domestic market. This climate includes such measures, as I have already mentioned, as deregulation, privatization and tax reform, measures that flowed from the agenda for economic renewal. We have also streamlined and modernized our intellectual property laws and our patent laws and have brought our competition policy into line with the demands of a modern industrial economy.

Fifth, business needs better access to foreign markets and better information about market opportunities wherever in the world they are to be found. We have made historic initiatives in multilateral, trilateral and bilateral trade. We are following up these initiatives by providing services to businesses that will help them tap markets in the United States, Europe and the Pacific Rim, as well as in the Middle East where I had the opportunity to lead a trade mission of some top business people, gaining some new business in the Arabian Gulf area.

Sixth, Canada must reinforce the values, beliefs and attitudes that affect the way we do business. We need to build a business culture that encourages initiative, entrepreneurship and stakeholder partnerships. These are things that cannot be decreed by governments. They must be built through a change in attitude and a change in the environment in which business works today.

Finally, we must continue the course that we have set in maintaining a strong and positive economic environment through lower deficits, low inflation and lower interest rates. This combination of policies will bring real benefits. Our objective, as set out in the Speech from the Throne, is to work with business, labour and provincial governments to generate 2.5 million new jobs by the year 2000 and raise real incomes by 25 per cent.

I list these factors only briefly, but our government will invite Canadians to consider them in detail. In a few weeks, we will release a paper to promote a national discussion on the factors essential for Canadians' prosperity.

[Translation]

I hope that Canadians across the country, from all sectors of the economy and all walks of life, will be receptive to this working paper. After all, it is the Canadian people as individuals that will ensure our success. It is the workers and managers of the industry who run the economy, along with the contractors who take advantage of an opportunity when it comes their way and the scientists who achieve scientific and technological developments in their laboratories to give us a competitive edge.

Teachers, from elementary school to university, play a role in developing the skills and the culture needed to foster growth and prosperity.

Our success, as a nation, depends on our will to succeed as individuals. That is why we must improve our potential.

[English]

I speak of individuals, but individual efforts have much more impact when in concert. Working together, individuals can overcome the fragmentation that results when so few people are scattered across a country so immense.

Overcoming that fragmentation has made Canadians masters of the technology of communications and transportation. It has made us masters of conciliation and consensus.

It has led us to create partnerships, joint ventures, alliances and networks that help span the country in interconnected grids.

It has given us some of the tools we need to take on the global marketplace. It has given us the ability to keep a transcontinental economy moving. It has given us the ability to preserve and revitalize a transcontinental nation.

In conclusion, we must continue to work together to build and strengthen our economy and to renew and strengthen our unity as a country.

It is a strong economy that will give us as individuals the confidence necessary to succeed. This renewed confidence in ourselves will give us greater tolerance and vision to bridge the differences that will always be a part of such a diverse country as Canada.

We all share the vision of the Speech from the Throne for a prosperous and united Canada. I invite hon. members from both sides to join us in implementing the measures that will keep that vision alive, and make it a reality.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, through you, I would like to say to the new minister that I listened to his words carefully.

There was hardly a sentence that I did not disagree with. How does the minister expect this competitiveness, this globalization and all the things that he described in his speech to happen? How does he expect them to happen when we have a dollar that is inflated, when we have interest rates that are crippling us and when we have a tax system that most businessmen in the world think is the most complicated?

How does he expect fairness, conciliation and action to come about in our economy when we are faced with underpinnings that are so difficult to work with?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I am delighted to hear that the hon. member does agree.

I know from the discussions that he and I have had on a number of occasions that there is a lot of common ground between us.

He has raised issues about the Canadian dollar and about interest rates. He knows that the policies we are following of decreasing the deficit and controlling inflation are key to lowering interest rates.

We have to ensure that Canadians can look forward to lower deficits. The Leader of the Opposition talked earlier about the problem of debt. He and I agree on the problem of debt.

The only way to decrease the debt is to decrease deficits. That requires some tough decisions, but decreasing those deficits will help us lower interest rates and place Canadian businesses in a position where they can compete.

The key point that must be remembered here is that we cannot only focus on some of the issues that the hon. member has mentioned and forget about the issues that I stressed in my remarks such as science and technology, education, training—the continuous learning experience—the environment, the relationship between business and labour, incentives for investment, and all of these things which are very important elements in the competitive position of a country.

If we only focus on some of these high profile issues and forget about the others, then we are going to lose the game. That is going to be the essence of the discussion paper and the consultation process that flows from that: how we as Canadians working together can improve our performance in that regard.

It is not just governments that can do that. It is business, labour, educators, provincial governments, municipal governments all working together with one common objective of improving our competitive position.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the minister's comments in terms of making a case for the need for increased competitiveness for the Canadian economy and his reference particularly to support for retraining and education and research and development.

I thought back a few weeks to when we had lobbyists on Parliament Hill from universities, particularly in terms of educational funding for universities and research in a whole variety of areas. Their comments were that over the years the government had actually cut back on the traditional support that it provided for post-secondary education in terms of limiting transfer payments and so on.

I suppose the minister is serious, but does he not think there is a certain hollowness in his comments when he stands and says that this government now is concerned with doing all of these things? Yet would he not have to admit that its record shows that this government has not followed through in supporting research and development, that this government has not followed through with support for post-secondary education and retraining programs.

I know that in my own constituency we have a long list of people who want to get retraining programs launched and there is simply no money there.

While I say the minister is not necessarily being insincere, it must be recognized that there is a certain amount of hypocrisy in what he is saying.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend would agree that we have to get interest rates down. Interest rates have come down about five percentage points since this time last year, but we have to get interest rates down further. One of those ways is getting the deficit down and getting inflation down as well. There has to be a balance. We cannot get deficits down without making some pretty tough decisions on spending.

I acknowledge that there are people in the community who would like us to be spending more money on a number of policy areas, some of which he has referred to just now. I also say to him that the amount of moneys that the federal government is spending as a percentage of our national income compares favourably with Japan, with the United States, with Germany, with France. It is a question of encouraging the private sector to also match that performance in investing research and development moneys.

We have a tax system that is being judged by objective outside observers, not the Government of Canada, as being the best of the major industrialized countries in support of research and development.

My friend talks about training and says that some people in his constituency are having difficulty in getting access to training moneys. I ask him to think back to 1984. There was practically no money available for training, no money at all. We have built that up through the Canadian Jobs Strategy to $1.7 billion prior to the changes in the unemployment insurance system. Through the changes there, we are redirecting some of those unemployment insurance system moneys into training, which will add another $550 million this year, growing to $750 million in a couple of years' time.

While there are people who want more training moneys—and I fully support that as a point of view—we have made a good deal of progress backing up the commitments and the priorities that we have established as a government since 1984.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne and the minister's speech are full of good words, soft, soothing, positive words. The rhetoric is spectacular but it is a fraud because the action is to the contrary. Just a few weeks ago, in a budget that he brought down as Minister of Finance, he cut by millions of dollars the training programs in Canada. The training moneys in Canada now are less than they were in 1984 in real dollars. They cut them by 32 per cent between 1984 and 1988 and then they changed the unemployment insurance program to recuperate some of those dollars. In the recent budget they have cut them again, and they have cut moneys to post-secondary education.

The minister says they are doing that to get interest rates down, but you do not get interest rates down and you do not cut a deficit on the backs of education and training dollars. You never do that. There are other places to cut.

The minister and the Speech from the Throne speak with a forked tongue, in favour of education and training, and then they cut them back in the very next action they took just a few months ago.

I want to ask him how can any Canadian sincerely believe what he says in his speech this morning. How can they believe what is in the Speech from the Throne? We are getting double-talk from this government all the time.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, this type of rhetoric used by the hon. member does not help anybody develop a better understanding of the issue. If my hon. friend would go to OECD papers, the Organization of Economic Co-operation Development papers, he would see what has happened over the course of the last six and a half years. We had practically no active job-training moneys at that time. We had one of the largest passive income support programs of the OECD countries, but we were not putting nearly enough of it into training and education.

We have made a significant degree of progress in that, as I outlined in response to my friend from Kamloops, but more can be done, more should be done. What we are trying to do in the course of the consultations that will flow from the agenda for prosperity paper that I referred to in my speech is seek out the ideas of Canadians as to how we can do this working together. It is not just government training moneys. It is also getting a changed attitude on the part of business so that we have businesses themselves spending more money on training of their own employees.

There are some very powerful numbers which show that Canadian businesses do not spend nearly as much as their competitors in the United States, Germany, or Japan, and we must change this. It is a change in attitude, that continuous learning experience that was referred to in the Speech from the Throne, that is the essence of what we are trying to achieve as a government, but much broader than that, as a people.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, all of us who have been in politics a while have learned to have modest expectations about throne speeches. Throne speeches are almost inevitably vague. They usually lack focus because they cover such a wide range of subjects.

In judging any throne speech, you start with modest expectations and you look for those fresh and creative ideas, those bright and sensitive responses to our many problems that make a good speech stand out from a disappointment.

I have to say, despite the efforts of the previous minister to dress up this speech, there were no fresh and creative ideas in this throne speech. There were no sensitive responses to the hundreds of thousands of people across this country who are hurting because of the government's policies, policies which have been in effect and policies which will continue to be in effect, as expressed by this throne speech.

This speech was not just uninspiring, it was full of bland ideas recycled from the past. As a banner to unite this country the speech is a disaster. As a hope for our economy and the people in our economy, it really is a shameful disappointment to Canadians. If we look around at the reality of our economy, it is a reality which is grim and tough for many, many people.

I have here the report of Statistics Canada which came out last week, May 10, 1991. It shows that over the past year in our country, we have lost 418,000 full-time jobs. The government talks bravely about creating 2.5 million new jobs by the year 2000. It does not recognize at all, in what was said in the speech, that it has devastated this country with these kinds of figures: 418,000 full-time jobs lost in just a year. That kind of devastation is something that a country cannot take. With that number of full time jobs eliminated, one cannot expect people in this country to keep faith in their government and in their political system.

That is why across this country, and I have been travelling across it, one hears so much in the way of cynicism and despair about our government, about our political system.

It is not because people have come to distrust politicians in general, as this government would have us believe. It is because this government has lost the trust and the faith of Canadians across this country in policy area after policy area, whether we talk about the environment and the fact that the much heralded green plan was actually cut back in the last budget, or we talk about social services, so crucial to many people in this country in the middle of a recession. This government has lost the faith of people because it has refused to pay its previously agreed share of the Canada Assistance Plan benefits going to British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

Then this government has the nerve to say to a government like that in Ontario, when it keeps faith with the promises to give people health: "Terrible, you are spending more money". The reason more money is being spent is because the people across this aisle, the people who now come to us and ask for a non-partisan attitude, have destroyed the sense of trust that people in this country can have in their federal government. It has broken not just election promises made before an election but signed agreements with the provinces on which people throughout this country counted and as a result of which they are now suffering.

I say "suffering" not to exaggerate, but because it is an honest reflection of what we have heard in communities across this country. Our economic recovery tour has crossed Canada, has visited community after community, has heard from poverty groups, has heard from community development groups and has heard from city social services groups. It has heard of the way in which the unemployment changes that this government put into effect have forced people on to welfare, have forced municipalities to pay for that welfare, often devastating the tax base of those municipalities and destroying the dignity of the people who are forced to experience such welfare, very often for the first time in their lives.

We can talk about bankruptcies. Again we can look at the latest figures which have come out for March of this year. They show a record. This government has not given us record growth. It has given us record bankruptcies of small businesses and of people across this country: 6,258 in March of this past year. That is up 52 per cent from a year ago. Ontario has suffered an increase of 78 per cent.

We all know that for every single bankruptcy of a small business there are at least two other small businesses that simply shut their doors and lay their people off. The jobs and the hopes those small businesses had disappear.

The Conference Board of Canada, usually a friend of this government, came out this past week with a relatively unbiased source of information, indicating that this government and this country will have the worst growth record of any industrialized country in the entire western world; another record for this government to think about.

Did you see, Mr. Speaker, any of this harsh reality in the throne speech? Did you see any statement which recognized that we are in a recession? Did you see anything which indicated that we have lost 418,000 full-time jobs in the past year, that we have lost 6,000 in the past month? Not a thing, just brave words about prosperity.

This economic disaster is a tremendous challenge to our unity as a country. It is a challenge which this government is not meeting and will not meet with the empty words in this throne speech. It talks about a paper on learning with absolutely no detail, a suggestion that of course it does not take money to do anything about learning. There is no recognition that it is the government's very own cutbacks in financial support for the provinces, through Established Programs Funding, money which goes to education, which is creating the educational crisis across this land.

The government talks again about free trade and how wonderful free trade has been. I would have thought that the government would at least not have had the effrontery, the gall to stand up in this Parliament and talk about how free trade has helped this country in the face of 418,000 permanent job losses in the past year.

Mr. McCreath: Where did you get that figure?

Mr. Langdon: Right out of Statistics Canada.

Mr. McCreath: And how many new jobs?

Mr. Langdon: How many new jobs? There have been 109,000 new jobs, all of them part-time, in the past year. The total loss of employment in this past year has been well over 300,000, even if you include part-time jobs, which most people in this country are not looking for. They are looking for full-time jobs.

I suggest to members across the way that if they are not prepared to believe me, they should look the statistics up in the daily Statistics Canada, May 10, 1991. It states that full-time employment decreased by 418,000.

There is a great deal of talk in this throne speech about the need to be flexible and the need to be able to adjust in this country. The previous minister talked about this need. Yet this government's promise of the very best adjustment policies ever to be seen in any western country disappeared the day the election ended in 1988 and we have not seen any of it in the House of Commons since.

I have never heard such an empty Throne Speech! There is simply nothing in it. Lower interest rates are mentioned, but the job is left entirely to the private sector without any kind of assistance. To help and reassure the people, the government has promised some more major economic restructuring, this time with a free-trade deal between Canada, the United States and also Mexico. That is supposed to make us more competitive on global markets. The government also talks about improving education opportunities and promoting job training. But how can we trust a government that keeps on cutting funding in that field?

[English]

What should this speech have said? There should have been action in it for small business especially. There should have been serious hope of a government loans program that would help small business across this country. There should have been bankruptcy reform which small business has been pushing for for years and which this government still has not delivered. There should have been responses to farmers across this country.

I have just returned from a trip across western Canada in which farmers talked to me about their unhappiness with GRIP. They see the Gross Revenue Insurance Program as something that would simply not respond to their immediate needs and would not give them any serious long-term hopes for the future because there was no reflection of cost of production in the formula that was used to set the basis for support in GRIP.

We have the previous minister talking about competitiveness. We believe in a competitive economy. It is our only hope for the future as a country. However, the question is how do we build competitiveness. Do we build competitiveness by destroying factories and jobs with a free trade deal? Do we build competitiveness by cutting back $100 million in training in the last budget? Do we build competitiveness by reducing support for the National Research Council? Surely not.

What we should do to achieve competitiveness as a country in the future is build a country based on the abilities of its people. To do that, we must end poverty in this country. We must do something to give us more equality in Canada. We must change financial support to give people a sense of security in their health and educational support.

What else? There should have been a commitment to reduce the value of the dollar, a commitment to establish an economic recovery fund which would respond to local community-based initiatives, a commitment to investment in the future of our country.

The speech talks about setting partisan motives aside. This government has not set aside a single one of the partisan commitments which it has forced down the throats of Canadians in this past seven years. It has not rejected the free trade agreement. It has not questioned the GST. It has not questioned the tax changes it has made to benefit the rich. It has not questioned the cutbacks in VIA, the cutbacks in the CBC, the cutbacks in institution after institution that are crucial for our country's future.

Yet it says: "Come on guys, be non-partisan, give us a break". This country has no business giving this government a break. What this country should do is give this government the boot, not give it any kind of break, because it has jammed partisan objectives down the throats of Canadians which can simply not be accepted.

I therefore move a subamendment to the previous amendment as follows. I move, seconded by the member for Skeena:

> That the amendment be amended by adding the following words after "economic affairs of the nation" in the previous amendment: "as demonstrated by the absence of any new initiatives to respond to widespread human distress caused by your government's economic policies and by the reliance on yet another parliamentary committee in the next round of constitutional discussions".

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend from Windsor. There is something in his remarks that leaves me a little confused and I would like to put a question to him with respect to this.

He frequently speaks of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and seems to feel that this has had a negative impact on the Canadian economy, something which I have some difficulty understanding. It is my understanding that possibly my hon. friend feels that, in fact, the Canadian market within itself is large enough to meet all the needs of Canadian manufacturers such that we need never sell anything outside of Canada.

It is my understanding that the way trade opportunities go is through mutual accords of one sort or another. Therefore, if the means to the growth in the Canadian economy, if the means to the creation of substantive employment possibilities is in having access to markets that will allow our businesses and industries to grow, the logical means is to set up trade accords that give us access to those markets. They reasonably are going to want access back to ours.

Therefore, my question to the hon. member is this. If it is his intent that Canada should not open up trade with other countries of the world, if Canada should not access the opportunities for growth and expansion in competitive Canadian industries, how does he propose to have the Canadian economy grow, if we are going to confine ourselves to having higher and higher and higher walls put around our country?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I must say that is a remarkable question for somebody to put, given the debate which has taken place in this country over the trade deal for many years. It has been our position throughout that debate that by locking ourselves into an accord with the United States, we were, in fact, making it more difficult for us to deal with trade opportunities in other parts of the world.

For ourselves, we certainly see the goal of economic policy as, of course, trying to create as prosperous a country as possible, while trying to see to it that environmental goals are met within that framework. In that context we are also trying to expand our trade with not just the United States but the Asian Pacific countries which are growing so fast. The European countries, in particular eastern Europe, is changing dramatically and offers a great many trade opportunities to countries that are prepared to get in there.

I think that where this government made its mistake was to set up a special set of trade rules with the United States which gave every incentive to companies to locate in the United States and export into Canada, instead of locating here and exporting into the United States. In our particular community, for instance, we have seen in the past year 40 factories which have shut up shop and shifted to the United States or to Mexico.

That, Mr. Speaker, is not what prosperity for this country is about. Prosperity is about those plants staying here, exporting to the United States but also exporting to other parts of the world.

I want to suggest too that the member's part of Canada from which I have just returned is going to feel much of this damage now that the doors have been opened to wheat exports from the United States into Canada.

Many farmers who I have talked to in western Canada said that this was going to be just as serious a disaster for the west as the free trade in manufactured goods has been for Ontario.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to look at the throne speech very carefully. There are some excerpts in it that I would like to read:

> —that the Government of Canada represents all Canadians; and that change can be achieved only through reasonable compromise and enlightened accommodation of the interest of all Canadians;

As we are talking right now, 37 per cent of our Canadian population is made up of Canadians who, if we want to call them ethno-Canadians, are people who have come to this country since 1947. Statistics Canada states that by the year 2000, 58 per cent of the Canadian population will be other than an anglophone or a francophone.

If we were to look at what constitutes a francophone or an anglophone, an anglophone could be somebody from the British Isles, an Irishman or a Scotsman. Nowhere in this throne speech do we see precisely and clearly something addressing the needs of the people of this country who have come here in the last 50 years.

Nowhere in the speech are we inviting people who have come to this country in the past 50 years to sit at the negotiating table to look at Canada's future.

My question, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member is: Does he not agree with me that if we do not invite the ethno-Canadians to sit at the negotiating table to talk about Canadian unity, we could run in the year 2010 with small interest groups all over different parts of our country saying that they were not invited. Therefore, we would like to sit down and negotiate out future in Canada now. We could be in the midst of renegotiating the Constitution 20 years from now. Why are we not looking 20 years into the future and inviting those groups now?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I think that it is a very important question which has been put.

Next week the Canadian Ethno-Cultural Council is meeting with all parties. I am never quite sure which category I fall into. I suppose as somebody from the Celtic fringes of Ireland, it makes me either British or anti-British, I am never quite sure.

It certainly makes it important for us as parliamentarians to recognize that our country is changing. In my view, it is changing very much in a positive way in bringing together within our country a wider and wider variety of people.

In my constituency, there is a very large Chinese population. There is a large Sikh population. There is a large Hindu population. We have many different European countries represented. We are seeing an increasing number of people from the Middle East; from Lebanon, from Iran and from other countries in my constituency. I think this is something which is a tremendous boost to us as a community and to us as a country.

What disappoints me most about the constitutional elements in this throne speech is that the parliamentary committee which was made the centrepiece of the new constitutional moves within this document is not going to permit such diversity to be reflected in the decision-making process about our constitutional future.

If we could start to look seriously at a constituent assembly and see it as something that needs to be built for the future, it would be a mechanism which could bring in a wide number of the different groups within this country which are not as fully represented in this Parliament as they should be and, hopefully, as they will be after the next election campaign.

Certainly in our legislature, the New Democratic legislature in Ontario, there is very strong representation of such groups and I hope that will also turn out to be the case in this Parliament after the next election.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the government, in presenting its Speech from the Throne and in dealing, in particular, with Canada's recent economic performance and economic prospects, offers, briefly, five points as the foundation for its further leadership in the economy. First, the government, in the Speech from the Throne, says quite flatly that economic recovery depends on reducing interest rates. The other four nostrums that the government presents are deficit reduction, tax reform, free trade, and productivity growth. I want to deal with each of those five points in order. I want then to turn to the prospects that Canadians face when they ask themselves what is this government's real commitment to create the circumstances in which our economy can flourish.

As I have just noted, the government has stated flatly that economic recovery depends on reducing interest rates. This is a new-found goal for the government. It is not many months ago, indeed it is only a matter of two months or so ago, when the Prime Minister and his colleagues extolled higher interest rates as the most effective public policy instrument for combating inflation. The government told Canadians that inflation was the worst possible threat that could face them. The harsh medicine of high interest rates was the only possible solution to that problem facing all Canadians.

But what have we seen since then? What has happened? In the last budget the government suddenly decided that its policy was in error. It decided that it was wrong, that it had pursued the incorrect monetary policies, that in fact by imposing on Canadians high interest rates it had hobbled the further development of Canadian industry. It had imposed on Canadians the inability to provide themselves with adequate housing. It had denied the Canadian people the opportunity to participate more actively in the greater global economy.

What did the government do? It suddenly decided, and it was very sudden, that high interest rates were no longer desirable, that the made-in-Canada recession which it had itself brought about by pursuing high interest rates was no longer desirable and that it was a mistake. Now the government says that we are going to have reduced interest rates.

All Canadians must welcome that sudden conversion, but the assurance that we are going to have reduced interest rates cannot be accepted without a certain grain of salt, a certain scepticism, when we see the recent performance of this government.

In the instance of its monetary policy, one can only regard the Speech from the Throne with some real scepticism. On deficit reduction equally, the government has throughout its term of office since 1984 assured Canadians that it would reduce the debt and reduce the service charges on that debt. That was a primary goal the government would pursue to ensure further economic growth in our country, to ensure that the costs of servicing the debt was not a burden on the Canadian exchequer or on the prospects of Canadians as they entered the last decade of this century.

What has happened with debt and deficit reduction is, in fact, quite the contrary. The government somehow lost its courage. It made some initial efforts to reduce government spending and, therefore, to reduce the debt and deficit, but it soon lost its courage and nerve. The result is, today, that, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out earlier, since coming to office the government has driven up the debt to unparalleled levels. It has imposed more and more debt-servicing charges on Canadians which have become a real straight-jacket on our further economic growth.

In its second goal of economic management, one has to conclude again that the performance of this government has been a failure. Canadians will regard, with real scepticism, the phrase in the Speech from the Throne that the government, in the time ahead, will be committed to deficit reduction.

On the first two counts, we have to regard these commitments, brief as they may be, and I understand why they should be brief given the government's record, with real scepticism, as we must regard the third element in its economic program for the time ahead: tax reform.

This government came to office promising major tax reform, tax simplification and tax consolidation. What in fact do we have? We have today a tax system which is at least as complicated as it was when this government came to office. So much for tax reform. The fact is that by adding taxes on 32 occasions since it came to office, this government has not only imposed an increasingly heavy tax burden on individual Canadians and on Canadian business, most recently of course in the case of the goods and services tax, but in so doing it has also complicated the tax system and rendered it even more complex than it already was.

The opportunity for Canadians to benefit from a tax system which would offer incentives to those of an entrepreneurial character, to those who want to improve their own skills, to have the full opportunity to participate in our national economy, to move freely in our country, has been denied by the government's consistent failure to fulfil its promise both to simplify our tax system and to reduce the tax burden on individual Canadians and corporations.

That is the third of the major areas in which one can only view with real doubt the degree of commitment the government is making in the Speech from the Throne when it repeats yet again that it will reduce interest rates, that it will reduce deficits and commit itself to real tax reform.

I want now to turn to a fourth major area in which the government has identified a priority in the Speech from the Throne, the area of international trade. Here the government limits itself in fact to the free trade agreement and to the prospect of a North American free trade area. We look in vain for any evidence in the Speech from the Throne that the government has committed itself to a truly global approach in our international economic relations.

Canada has prospered since the end of World War II by its commitment to a global economy in which tariffs have consistently been reduced or eliminated, and Canadian governments, recognizing that Canada is a major trading country, have sought to give further prosperity to Canadians by pursuing the global route in our economic relations.

This government has chosen instead to adopt a continentalist approach. It has, as it were, chosen to place our economic interests even more in the U.S. basket, as it were, than it did in the past. In the Speech from the Throne, the government justifies its commitment to continentalism by stating that the U.S.-Canada free trade agreement has helped to secure the Canadian economy in difficult times.

What evidence does it offer for this bald statement? All it offers is more that foreign investment—according to its statistics—has come into Canada to a greater degree than has been the case in the recent past.

What is the government claiming by saying this? Is it saying that the investment has been in those areas of high economic growth internationally; that it is rendering Canada more competitive? It offers no evidence of the benefits to Canada of this particular growth in foreign investment. Aside from that particular point, is this the final justification for the U.S.-Canada free trade agreement? When the agreement was first mooted, we were all assured that secure access to Canada's major market was the principal goal of those committed to the negotiations.

In fact, that realization of secure access has not been there. The government knows this. The government knows that the free trade agreement is only half completed. Under the terms of the agreement, the whole question of subsidies, a major difficult, complex question, has been left aside. The government says nothing about this in the Speech from the Throne. Yet it must know that during the course of this new Parliament, which we have just embarked upon, the question of subsidies, that is the other half of the U.S.-Canada free trade agreement, will come to a head. It will necessarily have to be dealt with.

What is the government's commitment? What is the government's policies? What does it propose to do to bring to completion its own free trade agreement in a way that can offer some hope that Canadians can benefit from this continental approach that the government has decided to pursue?

That realization of any benefits of free trade with the United States—if indeed there are substantial benefits in a free trade agreement which has not embodied in it any agreement on subsidies—will also be limited by the fact that this government has not offered, and does not in the Speech from the Throne offer Canadians any real opportunity to benefit from the increased global competition through providing them with adjustment assistance.

My colleague from the other opposition party has just drawn attention to the consistent failure of this government since the free trade agreement was adopted to provide Canadian workers and Canadian students with the opportunity to equip themselves to compete either in a continental free trade area or in the freer trade of a global economy. What in this respect is the government offering Canadians in this Speech from the Throne? It is certainly not the best adjustment policies in the world, which the Prime Minister so glibly offered during the free trade debate. It offers nothing to justify the statement in the Speech from the Throne that "the next logical step" is the negotiation of a North American free trade area.

Any Canadian knows perfectly well that the reason the government has entered into negotiations with the United States and Mexico of a North American free trade agreement is that it had little other option. Once the government had committed itself to the free trade agreement with the United States, then by extension, it had to be at the table with Mexico. Is that the government's priority in trade policy? Is our trade policy now largely that we shall enter into a free trade agreement with Mexico? Is this the priority of the government? We look in vain to the Speech from the Throne for any evidence of a real commitment to a global economic policy, to a commitment to trade on a global level. What is in fact this government's trade policy?

It is the year 1991. We are on the eve of a European community of yet greater vigour and integration. We face the prospect of eastern Europe coming into a wider association with western Europe. Throughout Asia, the economic growth offers new opportunities for Canada. Why are we not told by this government that it will seek new trading relations, freer trading relations globally? Indeed, why not seek free trade with the European community and with those Asian countries willing to negotiate? Why not go to those countries and seek the global markets which this government says it is committed to, while the whole time it pursues mainly a continental trade policy?

We look in vain to this Speech from the Throne for anything but a rather stale and doubtful commitment to the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement which, as I say, has not been completed and, in any case, which the government says leads on to the "logical step" of Mexico. In fact, there is no such logic at all.

The logic of the government's trade policy should be to take the U.S.—Canada Free Trade Agreement as a basis, in an urgent way, to seek freer trade agreements with countries outside the North American continent.

The government does offer, in a rather indirect way, the creation of a true economic union in Canada as one way in which Canadians can hope to achieve higher standards of living and to better compete internationally.

There is nothing new about such a commitment. Indeed, the question is rather: Where has the government been? Many issues the government raised in the Speech from the Throne are to be dealt with in further studies. We are told that more commissions are required, but in most issues the work has already been done. The Canadian people know what the problems are. There is no need for further studies and further commissions.

From the days of Confederation in 1867, there has been a commitment in this country, at least in theory, to a true economic union. In 1991, the government says: "We need further study. We will look at the question some more and by 1995 we may have something to say about it".

The opportunities are here now. What leadership is the government providing with the provincial governments? Does it seek an agreement with them on a timetable for the reduction and elimination of internal barriers to the free movement of goods, services, capital and people?

Does it set out a timetable and then reach agreement with the provinces on a monitoring agency so as to assure the Canadian people that real progress is being made?

In any event, is this commitment to an economic union—as welcome as it is and as belated as it is—compatible with political decentralization which the government has been talking about? Is it compatible with the continued federal regulations which act as an impediment to a true economic union in Canada?

One could go on. Obviously, the whole area of greater productivity and competitiveness is one that can also be studied to death. The government, in the Speech from the Throne, offers it to the Canadian people as if it were a new found land. What is astonishing is that it has taken the government so long to identify the need for Canadians to be competitive.

Education is clearly a major part of any such competitive initiative, yet the government offers nothing specific. It simply says: "More study, more commissions. Let's look at it. Let's consider it further. Maybe some time in the distant future, we will come back to you with more specific proposals."

Mr. Speaker, I would submit to you in all these instances and in others the Speech from the Throne fails to provide Canadian people with a clear policy or a clear indication of what this government intends to do in the time ahead.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise two questions with my colleague who has just given a rather insightful analysis of some of the problems that exist in the throne speech.

From my particular perspective, I believe that the Speech from the Throne ought to be a document of hope and one that inspires Canadians with a certain amount of confidence with regard to the problems that we now face.

I have two questions. The first one: Does he believe that Canadians who are dramatically affected in a negative kind of way by Canada's current economic situation have any reason for hope as a result from this Speech from the Throne? I am talking about Canada's almost 5 million poor, most of whom are women and many of whom are children.

As we speak today, there are 2 million Canadians who are on welfare, 1.8 million Canadians approximately who will be fed by food banks and 40 per cent of whom will be children during the next year, unemployed who number over 1.5 million and bankruptcies that have gone up by over 6,000 this month.

If one compares this with a year ago, the number is up over 50 per cent. Is there any hope for any of those Canadians who are among those groups?

My second question recognizes that the deficit is in excess of $30 billion—in fact, it is $30.5 billion—and it has been hovering at about that amount for the last several years and that the debt is almost $400 billion today, it is an increase from almost $168 billion in 1984? Should Canadians have any confidence in this particular Speech from the Throne?

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the questions of my hon. colleague from St. Boniface.

He draws attention to the absence in this Speech from the Throne of any evidence that the government has found the resources or, indeed, the commitment to deal effectively and urgently with the real problems that confront the poor.

Many women and children remain in a state of destitution in a country of extraordinary affluence. You would look in vain to this Speech from the Throne for such initiatives to counter the poverty.

Would it not have been possible for this government to offer, since it seems so committed to studies, commissions and reports, an examination of our social policy programs? Should we, for example, be moving in Canada toward a system of a guaranteed annual income—or a negative income tax, if you prefer to call it that? Should we be examining the further potential of the tax system to provide those Canadians whom my hon. friend has rightly described as living in deprivation with the adequate resources they need to live in dignity and with the opportunity to provide more for themselves than they are able to do in the circumstances which the government has created?

Demand side economics stands back from the provision of those services in which Canadians can be equipped to help themselves. It is time that priority be given more to supply side economics where the government realizes its role in offering the individual Canadian the opportunity to fully realize his or her potential.

On the hon. member's second question, of course the answer has to be no. We have seen no real commitment on the part of this government to bring down the debt and the debt servicing charges, that is to say the deficit, during its years in office. It made a show of doing so in its first years in office, but it got cold feet as a result of pursuing the wrong policies in debt reduction. It then gave up the fight.

To make matters worse, in the election of 1988, in promising the earth, the sky, the moon and the sun to all Canadians, it promised that a decreased level of government spending would bring prosperity. What in fact the government did, despite the denials of the finance minister of the time, was to drive up government spending further. As the hon. member points out, we are now in a situation where the debt is approaching $400 billion.

There is no real commitment in the Speech from the Throne and indeed from the government generally to put its fiscal house in order. It is part of the general tone of this wholly inadequate Speech from the Throne that the government, while touching on the point, glosses completely over what it intends to do to make any real commitment to progress in that area.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his comments. I am not sure if you are aware, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member has taken it upon himself, along with my colleague from Winnipeg, to study our international trade situation.

The hon. member heard what the Speech from the Throne said about Canada's trading future, that we are going to tie our trading future to a trilateral deal. The hon. member has studied the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. I know he had a big role to play in the committee study of the Canada-Mexico-U.S. future trade deal. I know that he has done a lot of work in looking at hemispheric trade.

I am wondering if he could comment on the Speech from the Throne's proposition that Canada should limit itself by tying itself to a trilateral free trade deal. I am wondering if he could comment on where he thinks Canada should go in this area.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for raising what is of course a fundamental question in this Speech from the Throne. The fact that this government has committed itself in trade policy to largely a continental direction is bad public policy. It was wrong in the free trade agreement and it is wrong in the negotiation of a free trade area with Mexico. Wrong in the sense that it is limiting, that it provides a barrier, as it were, to the full realization of Canada's role as a world trader.

What does the government say in its Speech from the Throne? It says that the free trade agreement has helped to secure the Canadian economy in difficult times. That would come as a surprise to most Canadians. I think they would be quite astonished to read that. In fact, most Canadians would think that the free trade agreement probably exacerbated, made worse, the difficult economic times to which the government refers.

The reason that the free trade agreement has made our recent economic circumstances worse is really threefold. One is that the government has pursued monetary policies which have almost certainly rendered the free trade agreement of limited or no present benefit to Canada. The government has pursued a monetary policy of high interest rates which attract foreign currency and drive up the value of the Canadian dollar, rendering Canadian exports non-competitive. The Canadian manufacturing industry—steel, for example—has a very real problem in exporting when the Canadian dollar is at 85 or 87 cents.

The free trade agreement, whatever one's view of it, might or might not work to some benefit to Canadians with a 75 cent dollar. I cannot believe anyone thinks it is going to work effectively with an 87 cent dollar.

So, high interest rates and a high Canadian dollar have rendered the free trade agreement of little or no benefit to Canadians, if indeed it has any benefits for Canadians.

Third, of course, the government, as I mentioned, has not offered the adjustment programs which could help to make a reality of Canadian competitiveness in a world economy. We in Canada need to equip ourselves to trade with the world, not just with Mexico, not just with the United States. We need to pursue adjustment policies to corporations and workers that would strengthen Canada's role in a global trading economy.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this throne speech. I would like to compliment the government on this visionary throne speech which puts forward several ideas that point the direction Canada should be taking as we head toward the 21st century.

I am pleased to see the high profile given to education. Education is the basis for the future, and education is the key that unlocks the door to economic opportunity for all individuals.

I am pleased to see the emphasis on renewing the effectiveness and the responsiveness of the government, and on continuing the excellent innovations that were made toward the end of the last session with respect to how this place operates.

However, the two initiatives that are by far and away the most important include the initiative to respond to what is called the unity crisis in Canada, to look ahead and set in place a process whereby this country can come together and build and strengthen itself and renew confederation as we head to the 21st century. Also, at the same time, there must be the very important recognition that economic prosperity, economic recovery and economic strength are the real keys to unity in this country, bringing together these concepts of political or constitutional unity and economic unity and economic strength. That is the secret to the future of this country. That linkage is very important.

One cannot help but notice in these recent months that increasingly there is a tendency, as we look at this whole issue of national unity in Canada, to see a polarized focus on Quebec on the one hand and on western Canada, particularly Alberta, on the other hand. We see that in those two parties which seem to have very similar goals, the Bloc Quebecois on the one hand and the Reform Party on the other.

I am a member of Parliament from Atlantic Canada. I asked myself as I read this throne speech, as I listened to the debate throughout the nation and read the various articles in the newspapers and watched television, where is Atlantic Canada in this agenda? Where is Nova Scotia in the context of not only the national agenda generally but the agenda of the government of the day?

As I read the throne speech and look to the direction that we are heading, I ask myself where do we as maritimers, where do we as Nova Scotians, fit in all this?

I think it is important. It is a time for reflection as well as a time for looking back. We cannot ignore our history. Some may choose to abuse our history but it can be instructive. It is important to remind this House and to remind Canadians as they head into this continuing process of national renewal that my province of Nova Scotia did not come willingly into confederation. Indeed, it could be said that we came kicking and screaming into confederation.

It is important to remember that in the first election following Confederation, out of 19 members of Parliament, Nova Scotians elected 18 who were separatists, who were anti-Confederates. It is important to remember that we have not always felt welcome and comfortable within Confederation. It is important to remember that there was a separatist movement in 1886 and 1887 that elected a separatist government in Nova Scotia. It is important to remember the Maritimes Rights Movement of the mid-1920s, a movement that resulted in the establishment of the Duncan commission which reported that Atlantic Canada did indeed have a valid complaint with the way Confederation had operated.

I think it explains, if one looks more closely, the tendency throughout the last 50 years for the maritimes to be represented in this House predominantly from the opposition benches. There is a message in that. Why do maritimers tend to vote for the opposition party? The answer, quite simply, is there is a long-standing feeling, rightly or wrongly, that Atlantic Canada has never been at the centre of the decision-making process. It has never been at the centre or in the forefront of the minds of those who lead our country from the cabinet offices.

In a sense, we do ourselves an injustice if we compare the voting patterns of maritimers with the voting patterns of Quebec. Quebec has tended to vote as a block, tended always to be represented predominantly in the government benches and, consequently, to be represented in very large numbers at the cabinet table.

We, on the other hand, as maritimers, tend to send opposition members. As a result, our voices are not as numerous and not necessarily as strong as those of other regions of the country. When I go to caucus on Wednesday morning, I see four fellow Nova Scotians in the room. At the same time, I see 55 or 56 members from Quebec. It is incumbent on us as Nova Scotians to speak up loudly to make sure that our voices are heard.

That is why I stand in this debate and welcome the opportunity to participate early, to raise my voice, not only on behalf of Canada which we are all here to represent, but particularly on behalf of my own province of Nova Scotia, as we look at the two goals of economic prosperity and the quest for national unity.

Economic issues are not only the key to unity, but they are foremost on the minds of Nova Scotians today. When I am in my constituency, or travelling in different parts of my province, I find that while there is passing interest in the unity debate in Canada, the preoccupation is with economic issues.

We are in the midst of, and have been for some time, difficult economic times in the maritimes, precipitated in part by the difficulties in our fishing industry, which is still our largest industry, and also by difficulties in our forest products industry because of burgeoning disputes with the Europeans and concern about what may happen with a memorandum of understanding in softwood lumber, and other issues.

We have not been well served, quite frankly, by the medicine that has been given to the Canadian economy to respond to the overheated situation in Ontario. We have not been in an overheated situation, therefore, we have not benefited from the high interest rates over the last couple of years, or from the high dollar which makes our exports more expensive. In the south-west of Nova Scotia we are an export economy and we have not benefited from a high dollar.

Quite frankly, as I travel from one end of the south shore to the other, I am distressed at the number of businesses that have gone out of business or that are bankrupt.

Looking at unemployment insurance statistics, although recently they appear to have become more favourable in Nova Scotia, I suspect that if we were to examine the number of people who have withdrawn themselves from the labour force, that may well have impacted those rates.

It is important for people here in Ottawa to understand that whatever arguments may be made about various economic and fiscal factors, whether they be good or whether they be bad, the perception that exists in my province right now is that times are tough and that we have been negatively impacted by the economic medicine that has been targeted primarily at Ontario and Quebec.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are giving me the eye so I guess I will have to wait until after lunch.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m., the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

THE ARMENIAN COMMUNITY

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to make the House realize of the concerns shared by the Armenian community of Canada, who are gravely offended and angry about the most recent acts of violence perpetrated by the Soviet security forces.

[English]

Financial assistance should not be provided to the Soviet Union if it does not immediately halt the violence against the Soviet-Armenian population. It is time for the U.S.S.R. to act as a responsible power and facilitate a peaceful solution of this crisis.

It is extremely urgent that we express our great concern and anxiety to the central authorities of the Soviet Union. We must demand an immediate end to these criminal acts.

AIR INDIA FLIGHT 182

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, in 1985 the largest mass murder in Canadian history took place, yet not a single charge has been laid against anyone concerning the Air India Flight 182 bombing, this despite one of the costliest investigations undertaken by the RCMP and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

There have been reports of bungled surveillance, erased tapes, and in-fighting between the two agencies. They were supposed to work in concert on this investigation, yet they have produced nothing.

So far the government has refused every request to look into the investigation. Now that the trial of Mr. Reyat in Vancouver is over, there is absolutely no reason for the Solicitor General to refuse to undertake a full judicial inquiry into this whole matter.

The lack of results in the Air India bombing, where 369 innocent people were killed, begs the question "why", a question which will only be answered by a full and impartial judicial inquiry.

THE THRONE SPEECH

The Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, we heard a Throne Speech which is totally unresponsive to the reality in Canada, and especially in Quebec. Today, there was a general outcry throughout Quebec, in opposition to the government's intention to interfere with education. Even Maurice Duplessis must be turning in his grave. The federal government is insensitive, just like the leader of the opposition who agrees that Ottawa should interfere with job training and education.

Mr. Speaker, today, the Quebec minister of Education said that this is not acceptable. He thinks the Canadian government is using tactics of provocation, and calls it an irresponsible government. The people opposite have lost control. They ignore historic realities, and in particular the importance of sovereign provincial powers, as specified in our present Constitution, Mr. Speaker. They do not even respect the Constitution.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, from January 1, 1989 to February 10, 1990, VIA Rail's management in Montreal prepared the elimination of passenger trains in Abitibi. VIA Rail eliminated 81 trains out of 174 in that area, 69 of those for lack of equipment and/or crew. It seems odd that this information was not passed on to travellers. Usually, VIA Rail's passengers are informed of transfers on the schedule. Why make an exception for Abitibi? The service reduction by VIA Rail followed the traditional model of progressive reduction and deterioration. The same thing happened with the service between Senneterre and Rouyn: transfer to Senneterre, followed by elimination.

That is the kind of work that the president, the board of directors and public relations officers of VIA Rail in Montreal do to the detriment of travellers, without telling anybody.

NATIONAL TOURISM WEEK

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in recognition of National Tourism Week, an event which is very important to my province of Prince Edward Island.

Tourism is the Island's second largest industry, responsible for 10 per cent of the provincial income, the largest of any province in Canada.

The government of Prince Edward Island, the provincial tourism industry, and others are planning a big celebration for tourism week. This year we celebrate our Scottish heritage. The Road to the Isles celebration will include many community events and clan gatherings, including the fourth international gathering of the clans in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia.

Visitors to the island will always be treated to our warm hospitality, our rich culture and heritage, delicious seafood, beautiful beaches and landscapes.

I want to take this opportunity to invite all Canadians to Prince Edward Island this summer for a vacation experience second to none.

RESPONSIBILITIES

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, every day we hear Canadians talking about our rights. Very few talk about our responsibilities. We have a Charter of Rights. We need a corresponding charter of responsibilities.

We need a charter expressly declaring that every Canadian has the responsibility to vote in an election, to work to pay their own way, to contribute to society, to solve as many of their own problems as possible without automatically looking to government, to get an education, training or trade, to pay attention to their own health since it affects all society; to do the best job possible of raising their children, to treat others with decency and respect, to keep their temper, to be fair, to set a good example for others and to give more than they get.

It is these responsibilities along with our rights and freedoms that make up the fundamental values of our society and that bind us together as Canadians.

NATIONAL POLICE WEEK

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of National Police Week, I would like to thank law enforcement officers across Canada for the excellent work they provide the public.

I would also like to give particular recognition to those officers who will be participating in the 1991 Law Enforcement Torch Run for the Special Olympics.

Sponsored by the Canadian and provincial chiefs of police, this year's run will have over 8,800 officers covering a total distance of 15,000 kilometres, and is expected to raise $1.1 million.

The money collected from the torch run will go toward promoting sport, physical recreation and fitness programs for the mentally handicapped.

On behalf of this House, I wish to extend our appreciation to Canada's finest for their efforts on behalf of the Special Olympics and also to police forces throughout the country for the dedicated service they provide their communities.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the United States today moved one step closer to approving fast-track negotiations for a Mexico-Canada-U.S. free trade deal.

This is not good news for Mexico. As the opposition leader there says: "We consider that this particular deal will consolidate the subordinate relationship Mexico already has with the U.S. economy."

Nor is it good news for Canada. In the last year, we have lost 418,000 full-time jobs in this country, mostly due to the present deal we have with the U.S. An extension to Mexico will just make things worse.

In my community alone, 40 factories shut last year, with most plants shifting to the U.S. or Mexico.

This government still has the chance to listen to the majority of Canadians who oppose this new deal. I urge them to do so for the sake of fair economic relations and Canadian jobs.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, finally there is light at the end of the tunnel. That was the finding in a recent survey on business confidence conducted by the Conference Board of Canada.

Results of the survey indicated that 47 per cent of the 400 companies polled by the Conference Board indicated they believed an economic recovery would begin within the next six months, the highest level since 1984.

Restored confidence, as outlined in the Speech from the Throne yesterday, means new investment. New investment means meaningful jobs and a better way of life for all Canadians.

This government has taken the tough decisions on fighting the deficit and holding down inflation. This news from the Conference Board of Canada confirms that while our decisions are not always popular, they are in the long-term good for the country.

FOREIGN AID

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, although Canadians across this nation are suffering from the present recession, which is affecting hundreds of thousands of families very personally, many of us can still acknowledge how fortunate we are in comparison to the populations of a growing number of countries, including Iraq, Sudan, Ethiopia and Bangladesh. Canadians realize that we must put our own house in order, but at the same time our tradition does not allow us to turn our backs on those in great need in other lands.

• (1410)

Our government very quickly found additional funds to wage war in the Middle East, yet today it is running out of funds for emergency relief, reconstruction and rehabilitation for millions of individuals living in apocalyptic circumstances, many of them victims of the war we helped wage. Fortunately, the war ended relatively quickly, leaving Canadian war commitments unused. I ask the Government of Canada to reallocate these funds to CIDA to be used to relieve the famine and misery of those countries in such dire need today so that the development funds of CIDA can be used, as budgeted, to meet the pressing needs of global poverty alleviation, environmental degradation and population explosion.

THAMES BEND FARMS

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, today thousands of Canadian hog farmers are producing the world's top quality pork and superior genetic breeding stock.

This standard of excellence and the millions of dollars returned to Canada's economy can be attributed to elite farmers such as Richard and Warren Stein, owners of Thames Bend Farms of Tavistock, Ontario.

On this past April 12, provincial leaders, six members of Parliament, including the Deputy Prime Minister, plus 1,000 invited guests, celebrated the 25th anniversary of this dynamic family farm and the outstanding achievements in quality swine production and world wide exports.

Warren Stein said, and I quote:

> We are proud to be Canadians and share with you the Canadian dream. I know of no other place in the world that would have allowed us to do what we have done. Starting from a vision of serving our fellow man and contributing something of worth to society, twenty five years ago we, by using Canadian technology and with the help of you, our friends gathered here this evening, have reached this milestone in our business.
> I will be most happy if at this evening's end we can openly thank God for giving us the Canadian opportunity and the pride that goes with it.

What a tremendous Canadian.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, there is one small paragraph in the throne speech that I believe is more powerful for current times than any other. I am referring to those words which emphasize that the cause of national unity and the mission for national prosperity are inextricably interlocked and interdependent.

Yet, that statement conveys realities which are so obvious we frequently take them for granted.

Clearly, we must face the facts that unity and prosperity do go together in Canada's future. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the Atlantic provinces. We are critically dependent there upon a strong and unified country to ensure that we share in the quality of life available to all Canadians. Any breakdown in Canadian unity will be devastating for prosperity in Atlantic Canada.

Conversely, however, the assurance of a unified country provides unique motivation for the entrepreneurial skills of Atlantic Canadians and strengthens their desire to contribute more fully to their own prosperity and to the well-being of the nation.

Unity does spawn prosperity and prosperity does strengthen unity.

That is the message, Mr. Speaker, that we must deliver to every Canadian.

FISHERIES

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, a serious situation is continuing to develop on the west coast regarding the native food fishery. Commercial fishermen are concerned that their livelihoods are being threatened in order to provide settlement of Indian land claims.

The commercial fishermen feel that they should not be called on to bear the brunt and cost of these claims, but that they are the responsibility of all Canadians.

While the threatened blockade of Vancouver harbour on May 31 will do nothing but annoy and inconvenience others, it shows the deep sense of frustration these fishermen feel.

I call on the government to remedy this difficult situation to prevent serious problems on the west coast this year, with meaningful discussions with all groups involved.

TRADE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, clearly one of the thrusts of the throne speech is free trade within Canada. But just as the FTA, a good deal is contingent upon the existence of a level playing field. We must ensure that a level playing field exists within Canada before we start breaking down the barriers to trade that now protect smaller markets like the Atlantic provinces.

A modern, up-to-date, competitive transportation system is fundamental to economic development and prosperity in Atlantic Canada.

Federal discrimination against the port of Halifax and consequently the whole competitive situation of Nova Scotia has been a bug-bear for many years.

While Montreal benefits from free ice-breaking, dredging and nav-aid services, user pay and compensatory rates have always been applied to the rail line that is Halifax's life blood to the rest of the nation. If user pay is to apply to Halifax, it should apply to Montreal. If user pay is to apply, then CN should be required by the government that owns it to effect cost saving technology when available. The acquisition of double-stacked cars will reduce costs by 20 per cent. The survival of the port of Halifax and the health of the Nova Scotian economy depends on it.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

In the Throne Speech, there is a part, which makes up about a third of the document, entitled "Participating in Prosperity". I don't see why it was not entitled "Sharing Hope". For the million and a half Canadians looking for jobs, there was little hope in yesterday's Throne Speech.

Here is my question to the Prime Minister; Does he not think that time has come to abandon the current economic policies of high dollar and high interest rates and replace them with policies which will immediately create jobs for the 1,500,000 unemployed who are feeling desperate right now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the policies suggested by my colleague are precisely the ones we are following, with some success I may add.

[English]

Short-term interest rates have declined 500 basis points since last year and almost 100 basis points since the budget. The Canadian-U.S. interest rate differential is now around 300 basis points, down from 550 basis points.

My hon. friend talks about jobs. We have had a difficult time of it. After leading the industrialized world in job creation for six years, we have had a very bad year of it, but last month employment increased. I know my hon. friend will agree with me that the good news last Friday was that unemployment decreased by three-tenths of a percentage point, dropping unemployment down to 10.2 per cent.

There are encouraging signs in the economy, most important, the steady decline of interest rates and further signs that economic growth will be brought about in a non-inflationary manner. This is, of course, what the government has been seeking to do, and it is the only way to provide durable jobs.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not deny that interest rates are going down, but there is still a spread of almost four points between United States interest rates and Canadian interest rates. It causes our dollar to be too high to make our product competitive in the United States.

In the throne speech, the government talks about 2.5 million jobs being created by the year 2000, nine years from now. Does the Prime Minister not realize that from 1970 to 1979, with a much smaller economy, there were more jobs created than this 2.5 million over the next nine years? Why is the Prime Minister not willing to do something today or not able to do what is needed to make the Canadian economy more competitive so that we will have jobs. We need a lower dollar and more competitive interest rates if we want to be able to compete.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right. Indeed, in six years, from 1984 to last year, there were 1.6 million new jobs created, which was the largest per capita job creation in the entire industrialized world, with the exception of Japan. That was quite a remarkable record.

We think the targets we have set, 2.5 million new jobs and an increase in real individual wealth of 25 per cent, are achievable goals. Perhaps the nation, with increased productivity, by paying down our deficit, lessening our debt load, bringing about a greater degree of unity, can do better. That is why unity is so interrelated with prosperity.

I agree with some of the points made by my hon. friend in his speech this morning. That is why we have to work together to ensure that Canada enjoys both unity and prosperity.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the point I am making is that the Prime Minister does not care at all about the problems of the unemployed today. He is following exactly the same policies that created the made-in-Canada recession. I say to the Prime Minister that it would be easier to have unity in this country if we had a better economy, and he should start to work on that right away. In order to achieve it, he has to reduce the value of the Canadian dollar, like most people in the industrial sector are asking the government to do. In order to achieve it, the government could make the Canadian interest rate more competitive so that we can compete and create jobs.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend says that we have to reduce the value of the Canadian dollar as a top priority. That is quite wrong. We have to reduce interest rates as a top priority, and we have to reduce interest rates while keeping inflation down.

The last thing that this country wants or needs is a repeat performance of that brought about by a government of which he was a member where inflation went to the roof, where unemployment went to the roof and where expenses were completely out of hand.

We want to bring about sustained economic growth in a non-inflationary climate, and that is exactly what this government is in the process of doing.

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, one of the wildest claims in yesterday's throne speech was the absurd statement that the Canada-U.S. trade agreement has helped secure the Canadian economy.

This is patently false. Steel workers, hog farmers, forestry workers all know that the government promise of access to American markets is a fraud. The Canadian economic battlefield is littered with the corpses of the first trade agreement.

With 1.5 million unemployed Canadians, with 360,000 jobs lost since the trade deal was signed, why is the government plunging blindly ahead into a second deal with another country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw my friend's attention to the fact that since 1988 we have seen our trade surplus grow from $14 billion with the United States to $17 billion. We have seen exports grow by 7 per cent in the face of a recession. We have also seen a significant shift in the inward flow of investment. Net direct investment in Canada has changed from a net outflow in 1988 to a net inflow, I believe, of the order of $5 billion. In those broad numbers there are some very significant improvements to our economic performance directly related to the free trade agreement.

There are any number, and I can spend some time going through these with my friend, such as Heron Cable, Union Carbide, Xerox, Proctor & Gamble, "duty elimination as a result of the free trade agreement had an important influence on the company's decision to expand operations in Belleville". We see the impact of free trade being characterized by additional growth for Proctor & Gamble.

I have a number of these success stories as a result of the free trade agreement, and I would be very happy to share them with my hon. friend.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians will not soon forget the words of this minister who created a made-in-Canada recession when he said: "You gotta die before you go to heaven". Thousands of Canadians are dying right now.

For the Prime Minister to put him in charge of trade policy is like asking the pyromaniac to guard the fire hall.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: Yesterday, in the Throne Speech, the Government was blowing its own horn, saying that the Free Trade Agreement helped protect our economy. This is an insult to the 1.5 million Canadians presently unemployed and to the 360,000 people whose jobs have been eliminated since the start of the Free Trade Agreement. Here is my question to the Prime Minister; When is he going to acknowledge that this agreement is hurting the Canadian economy? When is he going to admit that the Free Trade Agreement is contributing to unemployment in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I remind my friend again of those broad economic numbers that I talked about in my first answer to her.

Let me go back to some of these individual companies: Xerox Canada. The president of Xerox said that because of free trade, Xerox had invested in the Toronto area from which they would sell world wide, and that free trade would provide Xerox Canada with more of an opportunity to be competitive. Kodak (Canada) said that this major production transfer to Canada was made possible by accelerated tariff elimination under the free trade agreement.

A smaller retailer, Northern Reflections, was allowed to expand into the United States in order to take advantage of reduced tariffs under the free trade agreement. That is precisely the impact of the free trade agreement, to help companies expand here in Canada. That is precisely why we feel we can move forward with confidence to look at a negotiation with Mexico and the United States to broaden that free trade area, to gain more job opportunities, more opportunities to expand world wide from bases in Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday this government put forward in its throne speech its vision of the future. What it forgot to say was that since 1984, Canadians are finding it increasingly hard to make ends meet, that because of this government's failed economic policies and the Canada—U.S. trade deal, over 260,000 Canadians have lost their jobs. It failed to say that the GST is devastating small business and eroding consumer confidence. And what did it offer Canadians yesterday? More of the same: expand the trade deal, continue policies like the GST.

What did it say to the 1.5 million unemployed in this country? Wait until the next century and you might get a job.

When is the Prime Minister going to direct his ministers to show some real initiative, some real creativeness and get Canadians back working so we can create a Canada that Canadians want to belong to?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the only way that this could be done, and it is a little less dramatic perhaps than what would be suggested by my hon. friend, is to continue the downward trend in interest rates, by keeping government spending down, by reducing the deficit, by trying to get that burden of debt down, to bring about investment with which we can create the necessary jobs.

Interest rates are down some 500 basis points; 100 basis points since the budget.

An hon. member: Not enough.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says not enough. I agree, not enough. With the support of his party, some of the cost-cutting measures that we are going to introduce will help interest rates to come down even further.

I think my hon. friend will have a choice to make and can explain it to Canadian people. Either you go about the question of job creation by reducing interest rates and by bringing about the necessary investment required to create durable jobs, or, alternatively, you spend borrowed money and increase deficits—as has been done in other jurisdictions by some 300 per cent—and see where that leads you down the road. We think that is a blind alley and we think that this is the proper way to create durable jobs in Canada.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the Prime Minister that there is another option. The other option is to invest in the people of Canada and show the Canadian people that we have faith in them.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne, the government says that national unity and the economy are linked. There are 1.5 million unemployed Canadians in this country. In Montreal, for instance, one out of four people live on welfare or unemployment insurance.

If the Prime Minister really wants to help maintain this country's unity, where are the programs that will provide jobs for the unemployed in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): If the Leader of the New Democratic Party has a more effective and perhaps less expensive approach than the one taken in Ontario, I will be delighted to consider it.

So far however, it is clear, unless you absolutely want to saddle our children and grandchildren with a heavy tax burden that would mortgage their future, that jobs can be created when interest rates go down. To make those interest rates go down and thus create jobs in Montreal or elsewhere, by attracting the necessary investment, we must control government spending, we must maintain our policy of putting public finances on a sound base, and we must provide incentives for national and foreign investment.

It was thanks to these policies that during our first six years in power, 1.6 million jobs were created in Canada, and we intend to repeat this exercise, starting in July or August.

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the Prime Minister speak to those hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have lost their jobs through plant closures across this country and do not see that job coming back. They know that the Canada-U.S. trade deal has sold out Canada and they don't want that trade deal extended to Mexico to do that further. That is a future I want to see, where we don't have that.

The Prime Minister talks about the future and prosperity, and in the Throne Speech identifies clearly that one of the keys to that is the education of Canadian young people and the retraining of Canadians.

This government has cut back on post-secondary funding, it taxes books and magazines, and last year cut the citizenship instruction and language training programs for immigrants. How can this government say that it is now committed to education as the key to the future? If the Prime Minister is truly committed to education as the key to the future for our children and our grandchildren, will he reinstate the funding for post-secondary education that this government cut just a few months ago?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the government has increased funding for EPF since 1984 in a very appreciable manner. My hon. friend should also know that the problem in Canada is not exclusively money. Canadians spend more per capita on education than any other industrialized country in the world with the exception of Sweden. The results are what is lacking, not the infusion of money, although the federal government remains ready to co-operate in regard to improving both these standards and in enhancing our competitiveness.

The hon. member points out that her party would cancel the GST, cancel the free trade agreement, cancel the deal with Mexico—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: —that they want to go back to the 19th century. They would cancel the future. But we are going to build jobs for the future as long as I am a Canadian.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Since this government deregulated the trucking industry in 1988 without any adjustment provisions whatsoever for the predictable onslaught of American competition, Canadian truckers have become the victims of endless bankruptcies, lost jobs and weakened livelihoods; in fact, they have needed blockades and parliamentary protests just to get the attention of this government.

Will the government finally take immediate action to help our Canadian trucking industry, which is literally dying while this government dithers, and respond to the crisis faced by these Canadian workers and their families who have hit absolute rock bottom?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the hon. member for his questions, because there is no doubt that the trucking industry is one of the backbones of the transportation industry in this country and therefore it is necessary to build the prosperity that we are all looking for in the years ahead.

My predecessor last year met with the stakeholders in the trucking industry. As a result of that meeting, a task force was formed and that task force, composed of all the stakeholders in the industry, called for seven studies. It was understood at the time among all the partners that the studies would be available a year from that date. The studies are going to be completed. We will get the report from the task force and we will take whatever action is necessary at that time.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are absolutely tired of being studied to death. What they want is some action and some solutions to the problems. That is what they want.

I will return to the minister, because Canadian truckers are being ridden off the road by unfair American competition. Given that our truckers pay the GST and theirs do not, the U.S. has favourable taxes on depreciation and we do not, they have low tax deals and prices and we do not. They engage in a legal cabotage and we look the other way.

Is the minister finally prepared to address the real root causes facing our trucking industry? Is he prepared to change the rules of the game so that our Canadian truckers and our industry can have a chance to survive? When is he going to stand up for number one?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can see that the hon. member is dedicated to the trucking industry as much as we are. I would wish that he would be as dedicated to the truth as we are.

One of the items that he just mentioned was that truckers are paying GST. This is just not true, because the truckers are paying the GST but are getting a refund for it. Therefore, it is not the truckers who are paying the GST.

It was precisely to find out the real truth about the problems of the trucking industry that a task force was created last year. We ordered seven studies to make sure that we have the facts about all aspects of the trucking industry. We will take the necessary action when we get the results of these studies.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, Glengarry Transport, the fourth largest trucking company in Canada, and based in my riding, went insolvent. It created a loss of 1,800 jobs in 13 Canadian cities. So far, the company is not going and everything is stopped.

I want to ask the minister not for a study, but specifically: What is he going to do for my constituents and the thousands of other truckers who have lost their jobs or who are about to lose them?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we always deplore the loss of jobs by any truckers as we do for any other people employed in this country.

The question of a bankruptcy by a private company is something that is beyond the responsibility of the government.

Of course our hon. friend from the opposition should know that in the labour department two years ago, we introduced a program to help the people who are laid off temporarily.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, what they want are not measures that lay them off, they want their jobs back.

[Translation]

Here is my question to the government opposite: 656 trucking companies in Canada went bankrupt in one year and now, the fourth biggest company in this country did the same. When is this government going to wake up? And why do we let one of the biggest Canadian industries slowly die in order to please the Americans?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must remind my honourable colleague opposite that this government is precisely working hard to create jobs for Canadians, as it has been doing since 1984, with more than one and a half million of new jobs created in Canada, and we will continue to do so. In the Throne Speech, we indicated that we will proceed on the road to prosperity by making all Canadian industries more competitive so that more jobs are in store for Canadians.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister for constitutional affairs.

As the minister knows, our committee on the amending formula has just finished travelling across this country holding public hearings. Everywhere we went, the consensus was that people want a constituent assembly to deal with the Constitution. The people want more than just the politicians to be involved in the committee on our constitutional future.

In light of that and in light of the fact the minister has said he wants to build in this country a non-partisan consensus on the Constitution, I want him to explain to this House why he pre-empted that committee report and decided not to go to a constituent assembly at this time. Would he now reconsider that decision and include in that committee next fall not only elected politicians but non-politicians representing the ordinary people of this country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I have particular reason to know from our experience together in this House the depth of his commitment to imaginative and genuine responses to achieving goals of national unity in the country. I look forward to working with him. I assure him that I have not pre-empted the report of the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, which we look forward to receiving.

We have taken the decision regarding the phase of constitutional discussion which will begin in September. There was a question as to whether we should, as a government, respond to what is a very clear cynicism about politicians in the country by contributing to that cynicism by simply saying that politicians, elected people, will no longer be entrusted to carry out the responsibilities that have traditionally been ours.

We have taken the decision that we should not succumb to that cynicism, that we should instead give elected members of this House, and members of the Senate, the opportunity to demonstrate our capacity in the most open, innovative way to serve the interests of the country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, what the Beaudoin-Edwards committee heard from coast to coast to coast was that the old ways are not good enough, that we have to take a courageous step to find a new way to unite this country.

I ask the minister of constitutional affairs why should Canadians have any confidence in this government listening to this newly conceived joint parliamentary committee when they have pre-empted the Beaudoin-Edwards parliamentary committee?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we certainly have not pre-empted the committee whose recommendations I have not seen, but which I look forward to receiving. I believe that it is the view of other members of the House that that committee will have the freedom to make recommendations which will be very seriously considered by the government.

There is no question that people have had enough of old ways. They have had enough of excessive partisanship. There is no question about that, and particularly on this issue.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): As her leader and I had the opportunity to discuss the other day in Whitehorse, there is an expectation on the part of Canadians who support no party, and on the part of Canadians who support all of the parties in this House that we will put the unity of the country above either partisan considerations or any fealty to old ways. We have indicated in the Speech from the Throne that there is going to be, for example, authority for this new joint committee to meet with the elected parliamentarians in the legislatures of the territories. That has never been done before. That is a new approach. There will be several others.

I would hope the hon. member and her colleagues in all parties of the House would give us the opportunity to let Canadians see and take part in new approaches to the most fundamental issue we face, which is not simply the survival but the reinvigoration of this country.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration and it concerns the case of Mr. Al-Mashat, the former Iraqi ambassador to the United States who is now a landed immigrant in this country.

We learned today that his application was processed in 28 days. Meanwhile, thousands of Canadians are waiting three and four years for the applications of their spouses and families to be processed.

Why did this former mouthpiece for Saddam Hussein get preferential treatment at the expense of ordinary people waiting patiently? Why was he allowed to jump the queue?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I had the chance this morning to see the hon. member at the press conference where my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself explained and detailed the reasons why this has happened.

The hon. member raises a point about family reunification. He will remember that when the former minister introduced the immigration plan, the five year plan, she undertook then to review the process so as to ensure that priority be given—

An hon. member: Answer the question.

Mr. Valcourt: What is the point of asking a question if you do not want the answer? What is important is that Canadians know that the government is preoccupied with that aspect of family reunification. I shall look at the processing system and make sure that in our priorities we give priority to family reunification in Canada.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, it is unbelievable. I asked the minister why the ambassador jumped the queue and he talks about family reunification.

I will ask my supplementary of the Prime Minister. We learned today that at least one memorandum about Al-Mashat was sent to the minister of external affairs while the application was still pending. This case calls into question the very integrity of the immigration program. Canadians are entitled to know the facts. Will the government immediately table all memoranda about the Al-Mashat case sent to all responsible ministers, officials and the Prime Minister?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this morning I made public a chronology of events explaining how this decision came about. The hon. member is now asking me to ignore the Privacy Act and the rights of Canadian residents. I do not think there is a need for that. They would like, of course, to make a big thing out of this. The facts were disclosed this morning and we have been quite transparent about it all. What is important is that we avoid such situations in the future and these are the steps we have taken.

DISASTERS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it concerns the Air-India disaster.

On June 23, 1985 a bomb killed 329 people on board Air-India flight 182. Two hundred and eighty people on board that plane were Canadian. There were 80 children on board. It was the biggest mass murder ever in Canadian history.

For the last six years this government has refused a royal commission of inquiry into this tragedy. Now that the criminal charges emanating from the Narita bombing have been dealt with by the criminal courts, will the government now initiate a full commission of inquiry to investigate all the disturbing questions that have been raised by this tragedy?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the House will know that the government has been conducting an inquiry through the RCMP into this matter. I am informed that there are ongoing plans to reinvigorate the inquiry this summer with an effort to recover as much of the hull as can be recovered from the ocean floor.

I appreciate the concern of my hon. friend. We are all concerned about this and we are trying to get to the bottom of the matter. The investigation is ongoing.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that the criminal investigation has come to a dead end. There has been a commission of inquiry in Cork, Ireland and another in New Delhi, India. Notwithstanding the fact that 280 people on board this flight were Canadians, the Canadian government has yet to conduct a royal commission of inquiry. We know about the advanced warnings that the Government of Canada had. We know about the erased tapes. We know about the CSIS and RCMP bungling. We know about the false affidavits. The families of the 280 Canadian victims are waiting for a royal commission of inquiry.

Can the Prime Minister of Canada explain why the conduct of Sinclair Stevens warranted a royal commission of inquiry and the biggest mass murder ever in Canadian history does not?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I reiterate my answer to the previous question of my hon. friend. The government is concerned. The investigation is ongoing and we are making every effort to bring this matter to a conclusion.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

A western newspaper, The Winnipeg Free Press reported yesterday that it was the Prime Minister's decision to open the Canada–U.S. border to wheat, despite his ministers' disapproval. Can the Prime Minister indicate to the House why he overruled his ministers to clear the way for U.S. grains to come into western Canada?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform my colleague that agriculture is of great interest to the Prime Minister. That is one of the reasons Canada entered into the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement.

The hon. member comes from the province of Saskatchewan where a lot of our production in agriculture, as he and everyone knows, is involved in grains. Within the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States, there is a clause that opens the United States border for Canadian grains. There is a clause that says when support for Canadian grains—wheat, oats and barley—become equal or higher than the United States, we would then remove the tariffs on American grain. We have done that, because the support to Canadian wheat farmers is higher in Canada than the support to farmers in the United States.

Another reason, as the member knows, is that in the first seven months of this crop year we have exported 400,000 tonnes of wheat to the United States. We did not want to jeopardize that and neither did the Prime Minister.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The calculations that were used to indicate equality between the two countries do not take proper account of the fact that an important part of Canada's payments accumulate because of premiums paid by farmers and governments over a series of years generate pay-outs on the years that are chosen to decide the equality. Why did this government not stand up and get a proper accounting system to reflect—

An hon. member: They do not want to.

Mr. Althouse: —the kind of systems we have on our side of the border instead of only reflecting the kind of systems and assistance they have on the other side. Why did they not take into account the fact that we have insurance programs and that those should be spread over a number of years, instead of being calculated following the year the pay-out happens to come because of a drought.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is concerned about the agricultural industry and particularly the grain and oilseeds industry. We share that same concern.

The reason we entered into the agreement with the United States was to open a much, much larger market to Canadian grain producers. We are exporting more grain now to the United States of American than we have ever before.

An hon. member: Exactly. It is working.

Mr. McKnight: I can explain to the hon. member, but rather than my explanation, maybe he would like the explanation of the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Mr. Jesperson, who said: "We do not dispute the calculations and we do not fear opening of the border. Our superior quality and efficiency allow us to compete with any country in the world. However, we cannot compete with massive export subsidies being used by the United States, in some cases in direct contradiction".

Also, I can inform the hon. member that the Americans do not use the Export Enhancement Program in their own country. Therefore, we are competitive. We are able to command a higher price now than we were able to before. This government will continue to operate effectively and aggressively seek out markets for Canadian grain in the United States of America.

Mr. Speaker: It is time to move on now.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Recent reports indicate that 25 per cent of Montrealers are on welfare or unemployment insurance and that Montreal has the highest urban poverty rate in Canada. These statistics are absolutely shocking, yet the government in the Speech from the Throne yesterday has promised new jobs for the year 2000.

What planet is the government living on? If it is really serious about unemployment, why are the government's targets set for the year 2000? Why not job creation goals for the year 1991?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, during the previous session I told the same member why and how the government intended to intervene in Montreal. I said it before, and I say it again, that there are a number of economic development programs in the Montreal region that are working very well, including programs in the East and Southwest. A number of other programs are also being considered at this time, but I may remind the hon. member that the same constants that apply to other parts of the country, apply to Montreal.

As soon as interest rates have gone down, as soon as the drop in interest rates has had a positive impact on the economy, I am sure the Montreal region will be one of the first to take advantage of these measures, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer my question. The fact is that today, 25 per cent of the people in Montreal are unemployed or on welfare, and they need their federal government today, not in the year 2000. Why doesn't the minister have any objectives for 1991?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if this government were to do what the hon. member's government did in 1982, when it took the kind of measures the hon. member is referring to, the results would be exactly the same as they were at the time, meaning disastrous.

I am sure the hon. member heard last week about Canadair's impressive regional jet, and I think that is the route Montreal, Quebec and Canada in general should follow.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. For five years this government has championed the recognition of Quebec's distinct identity. That recognition was even signed by eleven first ministers. However, in the Speech from the Throne yesterday, there was no reference to Quebec's distinct identity but to Quebec's "unique character". I would like to ask the minsiter what difference he sees between "distinct identity" and "unique character"?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): None, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, if there is no difference, why change the word? Mr. Speaker, I submit that this government—

An hon. member: Ask the question!

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): —needs a good dictionary more than it needs an adviser on constitutional law. I would like to ask the minister, considering the great debate that is imminent, whether he intends to offer Quebec anything else besides this futile play on words?

Mr. Lapierre: Right on!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I didn't play games with words. I didn't change the words, I didn't change my political convictions and I didn't change parties.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In yesterday's Speech from the Throne the government set a target of creating some 2.5 million new jobs. The minister is well aware that one of the main reasons for double digit unemployment in this country at the present time is the slack construction industry.

Will the minister agree to create housing construction jobs by stimulating demand without increasing the debt or the deficit through the introduction of a 5 per cent down payment for first-time home buyers?

• (1500)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member would be pleased about the recent upturn in housing starts and housing resales which have been stimulated in the last little while.

I also know that he will be encouraged by the fact that interest rates have receded by five percentage points in the last 11 months or so. That is all good news. There has been improved confidence expressed by the business community, and I think that is welcome news as well.

That is the best way to stimulate the housing industry. I am pleased to note as well that at yesterday's annual conference of home builders, they indicated they felt things were turning around and getting better.

With respect to the point the hon. member raised about the 95 per cent mortgages, we are examining that very carefully and will report back to the hon. member in due course.

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would like to ask leave of the House to go back to Routine Proceedings. I have a message from the Governor General, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is is agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1991-92

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1992, was presented by the President of the Treasury Board and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

THE LATE HON. RICHARD BENNETT HATFIELD

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the frailty of human life on this planet has been forcibly brought to our attention with the passing of a truly great Canadian, Senator and former New Brunswick Premier, Richard Bennett Hatfield. Just past his sixtieth birthday, Senator Hatfield crammed a lot into his six decades on earth.

Not only were Richard Hatfield and I about the same age, he had a profound effect on me during the last 20 years of my life, although I knew him much longer than that. Having served with him in the New Brunswick legislature for 12 years, ten as a minister and six as his Government House Leader, our political association continued after I moved into federal politics.

Few people were very close to Richard Hatfield, and this includes most members of his Cabinet. Over the 17 years in which he was premier of the province, wisely he avoided close friendships with his ministers, knowing that he could possibly have to fire them at some point in the future. His leadership style was certainly unique. Definitely not a "hands-on" premier, on a daily basis, he generally left ministers to guide their own departmental activities but was always available to support them if they got into trouble with the caucus, the party, or the public. Many a minister felt the reassurance of his formidable presence when it was needed and they were most appreciative of that. He did have a lot of friends and loved to entertain the backbenchers, (the private members,) the media, and friends in the cultural and political field.

Richard Hatfield was the consummate politician. He lived and breathed politics and really did not work very long in any other field of endeavour. He was extremely good at the game of politics! While no other Progressive Conservative government in New Brunswick governed more than two successive terms, Premier Hatfield led the party to four successive election victories covering the period 1970 to 1987. For those who know the politics and the history of politics in my province, this was no mean feat! With remarkable aplomb, he built the party from its Saint John River Valley base to every county in the province.

Richard Hatfield demonstrated throughout his life that he understood well the aspirations of the francophone community in his province.

Richard Hatfield worked very hard to ensure that his party be representative of all parts of New Brunswick.

[English]

I sincerely hope that Richard Bennett Hatfield will not be remembered solely for the 1987 defeat of the party. That would be a most unfair assessment for a man who engineered a whole series of spectacular victories at the polls. Even after the loss in 1987, it is my view that while the electorate voted against the man, they did not hate the man. Besides, how many parties in history in any part of Canada won five successive election victories?

Perhaps unorthodox in ways, certainly enigmatic, the best term I can think of to describe Richard Hatfield is an enlightened social reformer. In many ways his reform of the political system was years ahead of that in other jurisdictions.

He believed strongly in social reform and instituted changes in family law, judicial reform and child welfare legislation.

Much has been written about Hatfield's so-called special interests, his love of travel, his love of cooking and good food, late night discussions with his host of friends, his penchant for politics—anybody's politics—and his ever-present fight with weight control. Above all of this, he had a tremendous love for his country and for its people.

Richard Bennett Hatfield is now gone from our midst. New Brunswick and Canada have lost a man whose passionate Canadian views were legendary. He loved his country with an unparalleled passion. Above all, he desperately wished to hold his beloved country together in this time of travail. Alas, he would have been able to make a major contribution to our national constitutional debate if he had been spared.

His most durable legacy will be his contribution to national unity. Ever since the 1971 Victoria Conference and until his very last day as senator, Richard Hatfield has pursued national unity with an unrelenting determination and a firm resolve.

[English]

Working with three prime ministers and a multitude of provincial premiers, he assumed the status of senior statesman on this issue. He believed to the core of his being that Canada was a unique land, a land endowed with a host of treasures: its natural resources; its rugged and profound beauty; its magnificent peoples that make Canada their home. His contribution to the cause of national unity will be sorely missed. His legacy, however, will live on.

I believe that when the history of Canada is written, Richard Bennett Hatfield will be accorded the place of honour he so richly deserves: consummate premier of New Brunswick, avowed pan-Canadian, reformer and leader.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, Richard Bennett Hatfield served the people of New Brunswick as premier for 17 years. He led his Conservative Party to an unprecedented four election victories, taking the measure of four Liberal leaders, including the member for Acadie—Bathurst.

Richard Hatfield was proud of his deep understanding of New Brunswickers and his finely honed political instincts rarely failed him, especially when it came to what the electors expected from their premier and their government. Premier Hatfield often said that the secret of his success was that he trusted New Brunswickers and they trusted him because he reflected their values and their principles. He was always supremely confident that their sense of justice and fairness would prevail, come election time, and four times out of five he was right.

For two decades his presence on the national and international scene was the focus for how the rest of the world viewed New Brunswick.

Richard Hatfield contributed greatly to the development of the Acadian community in his province. Unequivocal proof of his dedication to the development of the French fact is found in the unanimous approval by the legislative assembly of New Brunswick of Bill 88, an Act to recognize the equality of the two official language communities of New Brunswick. The bilateral entrenchment of Bill 88 in the Canadian Constitution would crown the courageous efforts of this good friend of the New Brunswick Acadians.

[English]

Chief Rolling Thunder had a special place in his heart for the Micmacs and the Maliseets of New Brunswick and his genuine commitment to aboriginal people was expressed recently in an eloquent statement by Dr. Charles Paul, who described his friend as a true champion of the Indian people.

Richard Hatfield was always, as my friend has said, a passionate spokesman for Canada and in view of his key role in the repatriation of the Constitution, Canadians know he would have made an important contribution to the current constitutional debate.

We are all saddened by the untimely passing of a man who devoted much of his life to his province and his country.

My colleagues and I extend our sympathy to the members of Richard Hatfield's family and to his many friends in Canada and around the world.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Beauséjour in New Brunswick, and especially as a minister who had to deal with Mr. Hatfield in the patriation of the Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, I was very sad to see that he was leaving us so early.

Richard Hatfield was a truly great Canadian. Throughout our negotiations with the provinces on the patriation of the Constitution as well as on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, what I found most impressive in this man was the wonderful courage he has shown throughout his political career. He has never been afraid, although himself an anglophone, to confront individuals who did not appreciate at all what he was doing to promote the French fact in New Brunswick.

Also, as the previous speaker noted, he was incredibly ahead of his time and displayed a tremendous strengh of character on these two issues, even if he lived in a society which made it difficult at times to champion the rights of the native people. Every minute of every hour I have spent working with him was enjoyable; his behaviour was always proper and he was very witty. He never looked worried; life was always great! But he did not neglect the rejects of society. These people count a lot for us politicians.

That is why Richard Hatfield will be remembered in Canadian history as one of the English Canadians who has done the most for promoting, very rapidly and with an incredible amount of energy and courage, the French fact in New Brunswick and the Acadians that I now have the honour of representing. He also helped the native people who, at the time, were not important in the political debate. Nonetheless, every time the subject of native rights came up at the table, no one could have better promoted the rights of the natives and the entrenchment of their ancestral rights in the Constitution than the great Canadian that was Richard Hatfield.

[English]

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I would like to join in making some comments about the unfortunate passing of the Hon. Richard Bennett Hatfield.

I would like to join with my colleagues in everything they have said about the contributions he has made. I would like to concentrate on just a couple of points.

I did live in New Brunswick from 1972 to 1975 when Mr. Hatfield was the premier.

There were a couple of things that, as a resident of New Brunswick, touched me particularly. Most people who live in Fredericton at least got to know the premier because he was a person who would be available in the city. You would often see him in the market.

He was someone who touched ordinary New Brunswickers in a very special way. That certainly is indicated in the way feelings have been responded to since and also by the fact that for 17 years he was premier of that province.

I would also like to make mention of one other point which has also been raised, that is, the truly magnificent efforts that Mr. Hatfield made in bringing official bilingualism to the province of New Brunswick, something which would not have been easy for a Conservative leader at that time.

He did it. He expanded the party as has been indicated to the Acadian population and made the fact that New Brunswick is the only officially bilingual province a very important contribution to Canadian political and constitutional life.

With those few words, I would like to extend on behalf of my party our sympathy to the family and friends of Mr. Hatfield.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I knew Richard Hatfield. I too can testify to his human qualities, his simplicity and his open-mindedness.

[English]

He was a sincere Canadian, but at the same time a sincere friend of Quebec.

Even in critical times like these it must be possible to give tribute to a man of honesty and openness. Richard Hatfield was both.

This man, as deeply involved as he was in the political fight, had no animosity against anyone. He harboured nothing but respect for everybody.

Mr. Speaker, whatever lays ahead for Quebec and for Canada, we must be able to count on the good will and realism of political leaders like Richard Hatfield.

[English]

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to just briefly pay my respects and tributes as well to the memory of Richard Hatfield as a friend, as a great Canadian and as a fine New Brunswicker.

I had the privilege of first meeting Richard Hatfield during my work on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada in 1980-81.

I will never forget the passion that he brought to his commitment to keeping this country together, to strengthening the country and, of course, to promoting the equality of the Acadian men and women.

[English]

He was a warm man. He was a man who was gregarious and friendly, as my colleague indicated, and yet he was also an intensely private human being.

I mourn his loss. I am sure all Canadians mourn his loss. We feel a sense of pain at his premature death. We know that he could have contributed and would have contributed a great deal to the debate which is going on in the country at this time, not only with respect to national unity in terms of New Brunswick but also with respect to the particular contribution of aboriginal nations.

I want to join in saying farewell and paying tribute to this decent man, a friend, and to join in extending my sympathy and respect to his family and to his loved ones.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session; and amendment thereto of Mr. Chrétien (p. 24) and on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Langdon (p. 33).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for South Shore has 12 minutes left for his speech.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up where I left off.

I was talking about the economic needs of Atlantic Canada in general and Nova Scotia in particular. I would like to set forth for the House a number of particular and specific needs.

I think we have in the throne speech some very excellent, general ideas as to the direction in which the country should go. However, I would like to now, if I may, offer some assistance to the government in making some specific suggestions of things that I think we need in Nova Scotia.

They really come into two categories. The first and foremost has to do with our need for transportation infrastructure which is absolutely essential for economic development.

Given our location vis-à-vis the rest of the country and the United States, transportation is a key to our economic survival, let alone development. There are three areas in which I think that there is a particular need. The first relates to the state of our highways. I realize that highways are a provincial jurisdiction normally and that the expectation is that the provinces are supposed to provide for them. However, the fact of the matter is that none of our provinces are overburdened with financial resources at the present time nor have they ever been. I know there was precedent with respect to the building of the Trans-Canada Highway many years ago.

Therefore, I would like to urge the government to consider seriously, over the course of the next three or four years, setting aside the funds to make possible a renewal of that highway system, certainly at the very least the quadra-laning of the Trans-Canada Highway. I would like to see the quadra-laning of Highway 103 and the completion of the all-weather system in Nova Scotia. This would contribute tremendously to our ability to participate in the opportunities provided not only in the free trade agreement with the United States, but indeed in the breaking down of barriers for trade within Canada.

A second area that is absolutely essential to our needs has to do with the rail line, what used to be called the Intercolonial Railway. As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, Nova Scotians were not overwhelmed with enthusiasm for joining Confederation. However, one of the sweeteners offered to us, both at the time before Confederation occurred and after, was the assurance that the Intercolonial Railway would be the link that made it possible for us to participate economically in this new nation.

It is sad to say that the state of that railway is not a great deal better today than it was following its completion in the 1860s. We are very unhappy and unsatisfied with the degree of attention provided that railway by the Canadian National Railway system.

I know that officials of the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Commission are in this city today and will be meeting with the Atlantic caucus of the Conservative Party—and I am sure with others—to impress upon it the absolutely desperate need that we have for the maintenance of that line as a first-class line, as well as for the implementation of new technology that will reduce the costs of using that line, thereby making it much more likely that the Port of Halifax will effectively compete with American ports like Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York.

A third area in which transportation is essential and for which funding is required has to do with port infrastructure. Of course the sea has always been integral to the economic survival of Nova Scotia. Within my own constituency of South Shore, I have a number of ports designated as Department of Transport ports as distinct from Department of Fisheries and Oceans ones. I found regrettable the lack of capital funding available to the federal Department of Transport for port development. In particular, I would like to speak about the port of Liverpool, Nova Scotia.

Over two and a half years ago, the Harbour Development Committee of the Queen's Liverpool Development Commission developed a feasibility study for the building of a new channel that would bring the port of Liverpool to life again. Three major industries are integral to Queen's County: Bowater Mersey Paper Company, Steel and Engine Products and Mersey Seafoods that are highly dependent on being able to bring larger ships into port than was the case many years ago when those businesses first began. We are talking about a major project. We are talking about a $15 million project.

There is money available from ACOA which recognizes the economic development value of that project. Similarly, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, through its Small Craft Harbour Program, recognizes the potential of it. Indeed, I might say that the province is prepared to talk with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources about allocating some funding from the offshore oil and gas fund. The lead is the Department of Transport, but the Department of Transport cannot proceed unless it has capital funds.

I could go on and speak about the dredging that is needed in Lunenburg, about the dredging that would make a channel and enable Bridgewater to become a viable port or about the needs for a new docking facility in the town of Shelburne. But I believe the point is made that funds have to be made available for transportation infrastructure in our marine areas if Atlantic Canada is to have the opportunity to grow as it should.

We understand that times change. Prior to Confederation, the trading patterns for over 200 years in which Nova Scotia was involved were north and south between Nova Scotia and New England and down the coast. Confederation and the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald in the late 1870s and 1880s changed that by setting up tariff walls which enabled the development of essentially a branch plant economy relationship between the United States and central Canada. We in turn were subcolonialized in the maritimes. With the re-establishment of trade north and south, as opposed to east and west, we have to catch up to where we were 100 years ago to re-establish our trading links.

Therefore, I am saying that the government must recognize that not only are we a political federation but effectively we are an economic federation. We have to recreate or establish, for the first time perhaps, a level playing field in terms of the basis upon which we as Atlantic Canadians can compete effectively within the Canadian market, let alone take full advantage of the opportunities that exist with the free trade agreement with the United States, whether on a full North American basis or not.

I read in the Speech from the Throne reference to the breaking down of barriers to trade among the provinces of Canada. This is an obvious and a necessary and important step. It makes sense in theory, but as a Nova Scotian I must be frank and say that it causes me a certain amount of fear. I am not sure that the state of the transportation infrastructure enables us to compete effectively with the larger industries of Ontario and Quebec. Therefore, I trust and hope that as the government develops specific programs to make progress toward those goals, it will take cognizance of the needs of Atlantic Canada.

The second major economic area I hope the government will recognize is the long-standing practice in this country is to recognize that federal as well as provincial expenditures can play an important role toward economic development. Co-operative agreements, of course, have been very effective vehicles, but there must be enough money made available so that development at the local level can take place under them.

We see CIDA as an agency with expenditures that can make a very important contribution to economic development in our region. Unfortunately, CIDA does not seem to have discovered the marvellous food value of fish.

For some time I have been amazed that with the food aid programs around the world we have not taken advantage of the various kinds of dry products which could be used that are wholesome, nutritious and, indeed, would support the Atlantic Canada fishing industry at a time when it is in difficulty.

The last point I wish to make on this has to do with base closures. We found out two years ago the devastating socio-economic impact that could be the fall-out of base closures. I recognize that it is difficult. The Department of National Defence is not a social agency. It has responsibility and it has to use its budget as best it can to achieve the goals it has established. However, there is no good time for a base closure if it is your community that is impacted.

I know. I lived through the base closure at Barrington as a result of the 1989 budget. It did not get the publicity that Summerside did, because of course it was not a closure of the same magnitude. However we are hearing stories now that the government is looking at further base closures.

We in Nova Scotia are hearing stories that Cornwallis may be one of the bases targeted. I want to say here and now that the closure of base Cornwallis would have a devastating economic impact on Nova Scotia at a time when we simply cannot afford it.

As a member of Parliament it is my right to be heard in this place. I believe as a member of Parliament that it is my responsibility to be heard in this place but, I believe equally so, it is the responsibility of the government to hear and to listen to what is said in this place.

I want to say here and now as one member from Nova Scotia—and I am sure I will be joined by every other member from Nova Scotia—to the government: "If you want to think about base closures, forget it for now and forget it for Nova Scotia, because we simply cannot handle that right now and we are not prepared to do so".

I know my time is running down. The key to unity is economic prosperity. When I go home people do not talk to me about unity issues. They talk to me about the basic economic issues: jobs, survival in tough times. That has to be the focus.

I commend the government for putting emphasis on linking economic prosperity and unity because they are one and the same. My closing words have to be as my opening, that as we look at the renewal of Canada, we think about Quebec and we think about Alberta but we think also of the maritimes and of Atlantic Canada. I urge the government as it makes its plans, and I urge all members of this House to bear in mind that we are all Canadians and we must all be in if we are going to have the kind of unified strength that I know we all wish for.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few points and raise a few questions of my colleague.

I quite agree with him when he says when we think about the renewal of Canada we have to think of every single region. We have to think of Quebec, Ontario, the Atlantic provinces, the west, and the great north.

I would, in fact, be prepared to support his plea that no bases be closed particularly if he were able to persuade his government to go back to P.E.I. and see if it could undo the harm that it has done; go back to Manitoba, to Portage la Prairie to see what it might be able to do as a result of the devastation it has wreaked upon my own province of Manitoba.

When he began his remarks he referred to a visionary Speech from the Throne. I think that is a bit of an exaggeration and I will make a few comments and perhaps have him reconsider what he said.

With respect to national unity, I wonder if he would agree with me that we are in fact wasting time. We have a constitutional crisis. I cannot understand why with any kind of crisis one is putting off action. In the Speech from the Throne there is vague reference to a possible referendum or constituent assembly. There is, and I commend the government for that, some hope for aboriginal peoples, although the extent of what will happen is certainly not clear. I would have liked some assurance that language minorities would be protected. I am as concerned as they are with all of the rumours that have been circulating that their rights may be in some jeopardy.

I would have liked to have seen some reference to other Canadians, those Canadians of origin other than aboriginal, French or English.

With respect to the economic situation I cannot see a whole lot of hope for those people who look at the $30.5 billion deficit, the debt of close to $400 billion, the almost five million poor in this country, the two million who are on welfare today, the 1.8 million Canadians who will be served by food banks this year, the 1.5 million unemployed, and the bankruptcies which have soared and which if one compares to roughly one year ago are up in excess of 50 per cent.

My final point is with respect to education. He did make some comments. My hon. colleague knows full well that the Prime Minister, who was then the Leader of the Opposition indicated in his book, Where I Stand, that he would double investments in research and development, and that he made some similar promises during the elections of 1984 and 1988 indicating that he would not tamper with the transfer formula. He made some very laudable statements to his party at the annual meeting in a number of other areas of the country indicating that it should devote more time, energy, to human resource development. What happened? It cut the transfer payments in 1986 by 2 per cent, cut the transfer payments in 1989–1990 and froze them from 1990 on. Research and development used to be 1.40 of gross development and it is now down to a little less than 1.30. For literacy, $4.50 per Canadian per year has been the investment.

Is there not a flagrant contradiction in what we have heard from the government, not only in this throne speech but in other statements? Clearly actions speak louder than words. I think the throne speech has a few good ideas but there is lots and lots of rhetoric, and I am wondering if the hon. member would care to make some comments.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I must say I would like to compliment my hon. friend on his speech, or was it a question? I am not sure which.

I welcome the opportunity to respond. He makes a number of interesting points.

I read in the newspaper today that somebody said the throne speech is a one-day wonder. Well, the throne speech is intended, as I understand it, and most of them are, to be a statement of where the government intends to go. This one has clearly spelled that out.

Clearly the two priorities that have been spelled out are national unity and economic prosperity, and they are linked. I have spoken a great deal on the economic side. I want to talk a little bit about the unity side. I did not have an opportunity to do it before and so I will do it now.

We are all good at talking in this country, but we are not so good at listening. We are not so good at reaching out. We are not so good at seeking to understand the other guy.

When I reflect on what went on in this country a year ago, when I watched the unravelling of Meech Lake through the initial actions of Premier McKenna of New Brunswick and subsequently through the actions of Premier Filmon and Premier Wells, I said: "These people are speaking to their provincial audiences and they love to go on television and be interviewed and speak to whoever might be ought there, but they are not so good at listening".

Last year was last year. They will be judged by history for the actions they took and for the impact that they may or may not have had on this country. We have to start to listen to others. I might say the same applies to Premier Bourassa of the province of Quebec who is reaching out.

I am very pleased to see that the polls indicate the majority of Quebecers want Canada to work. The majority of Quebecers are federalists, but there is a strong feeling of rejection.

I want to send a message, a message that I get reinforced to me day after day by people in Nova Scotia who would really like to understand what the people of Quebec are looking for but they keep coming back to that great barrier that exists between English and French Canadians in this country today: the sign law, Bill 178. It is repugnant to democratic principles. That is what people see. There are so many things being said and so many things reaching out. People want to understand, people want to accommodate and people want it to work but they keep saying: "But what about that sign law?"

Therefore, I would urge the premier of Quebec and those in this House who may know him to say: "Take a look at that sign law and do not justify it by saying that they did terrible things in Manitoba 100 years ago". Two wrongs do not make a right.

We as Canadians, whether we are from Quebec, the west, Atlantic Canada or Ontario have to be prepared not only to talk but to listen and to try to understand. Then we can build this country as we want it to be.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the emphasis seems to be on national unity these days and some say that, without it, we will not be able to meet the economic challenge.

But we know full well that the present economic krach is the made-to-measure creation of this government. It is not because Canada has been divided for the past twenty years that the federal deficit grows by at least $20 or $30 billion a year.

The cumulative debt in Canada has reached $400 billion and we are under the impression that Canada is not doing well because it is divided. Canada is not doing well precisely because there are eleven political powers operating in this country, eleven powers at odds with one another and holding elections at different times, which leads to confrontation and inconsistency. It also goes to show that Canada is not financially viable.

Let us stop kidding ourselves and start decentralizing. We have to give more powers to the regions, thereby making them sovereign. It is a must. What we want, in fact, is for Quebec to be the first to become sovereign. We do not want this country to be destroyed, but to be saved economically speaking. A flashy speech from the Throne like this one will do little for the economy of this country. Far from it.

The first thing to do is to decentralize and give more powers to the regions, thereby granting them sovereignty. Only then can we hope to see the economic situation improve.

[English]

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, my time is brief. I will talk quickly. Quite simply, the hon. member who just spoke ran under the banner of the Progressive Conservative Party and under the leadership of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney who was then and is now the best hope for providing leadership that will reunify this country and recreate the Confederation of tomorrow that we all look forward to.

• (1540)

I respect my hon. friend for his views, but you do not build strength by tearing things apart. You build strength by staying at the table, by slugging it out, by having your say and listening to what the other person says and trying to work together to make it all come together. At a time when Europe is coming together, where is the logic in Canada falling apart?

Quite simply, there is no logic in that. There is no logic in the policy of my hon. friend's parliamentary group, or that of the Reform Party which has the same aspirations.

I say that members of Parliament came here to work for Canada, to have Canada grow, become strong and become unified.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to a matter that affects us all, and this reminds me of that time back in 1981-82, and even before, when I was involved in the debate in this House on a new Constitution with a Charter of Rights. I found this a very difficult time because as you know, Mr. Speaker, I was unable to support measures that would reduce or quantify my rights or add a notwithstanding clause restricting the application of that legislation. I therefore voted against my leader's constitutional proposal—

Mr. Prud'homme: Trudeau never forgave you!

Mr. Gauthier: They didn't forgive me but I think they understood.

Mr. Prud'homme: Oh, they never will!

Mr. Gauthier: Today, Mr. Speaker, Canada is again facing a time of tremendous tension, a crisis partly due to the demise of the Meech Lake constitutional proposal and partly to what I see as a lack of leadership and vision on the part of the federal government and politicians generally.

Mr. Prud'homme: Especially in Newfoundland!

Mr. Gauthier: The advent of free trade, the deregulation policy, privatization, the weakening of agencies that represent our national identity such as the CBC, VIA Rail, Air Canada and Petro-Canada all of this, Mr. Speaker, acted as a catalyst for the present crisis. Because the government has been slow to resolve this conflict, a number of divergent—not marginal because they are no longer that—groups have emerged that are prepared to tear up and destroy everything.

Since fortunately, Mr. Speaker, most Canadians are contra-revolutionary in spirit, we will get together and try to rebuild our country with the same diversity that has kept us together for 124 years.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to individual and collective values, there are two concepts I would like to discuss with my friends today, two concepts that form the very basis of this country. The first concept is dualism. Canadian duality is a fact. It is mentioned practically every year when we discuss legislation. We talk about it and in some parts of the country it has become a very important issue indeed. The second concept is regionalism, another basic concept which we believe is very important in this country, because of our geography, because of the vast territory this country covers, a country that doesn't make sense with its east-west orientation, a country that wants to unite regions that are so totally different.

First of all, our linguistic duality is based on historic, legal and political concepts. Although some may not realize this, Mr. Speaker, linguistic duality will always be a scapegoat in national conflicts. One hundred and twenty-four years after the British North America Act was passed, a reluctance to accept this linguistic duality still exists among Canadians.

Not so long ago, Mr. Speaker, and I saw it happened myself, men used to anglicize their names and forbid their children to speak their mother tongue—

Mr. Prud'homme: In order to succeed in life!

Mr. Gauthier: —as my colleague from Saint-Denis just said, in order to "get on in life" as we used to say. To succeed, they changed their names and no longer spoke French.

In spite of it all, the situation is not hopeless. Francophones can still be found in the regions. They are the majority in Quebec.

Over the last 30 years, we have made some progress, and I was part of it. Let me recount some historical facts so that we have some indications to better understand the situation. It probably began in 1961 with the Heeney Commission, the Civil Service Commission of Canada, which agreed that every Canadian should have the right to service in French or in English from the federal government.

In 1962, the Glasco Commission said the same thing. The Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, that is the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission, was created to, and I quote, "inquire into and report upon the existing state of bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada and to recommend what steps should be taken to develop the Canadian Confederation on the basis of an equal partnership between the two founding races, taking into account the important contribution made by the ethnic and cultural groups of Canada."

In 1965, Mr. Speaker, the Commission concluded, and I quote from the Report:

Canada, without being fully conscious of the fact, is passing through the greatest crisis in its history.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that we also are passing now through a serious crisis here in this country.

In 1966, Lester B. Bearson stated in this House "the principle that both francophone and anglophone candidates are entitled to a job in the federal government and will enjoy the same consideration and have the same opportunity to work in the language of their choice."

In 1978, Parliament passed an Act to amend the Criminal Code in order to allow the concerned parties to ask for a trial in either official languages. In 1979, the Pepin-Robarts Commission—it is now very fashionable to refer to Pepin-Robarts—recommended that the Constitution be amended in order to protect minority rights in some areas. In 1980, the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages was set up. I give credit for that to the then Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Joe Clark, who in 1979 had granted the first meeting of this Official Languages Committee. In 1982, the official and equal status of French and English in federal institutions was enshrined in the Constitution. In 1983, Parliament passed a resolution on the linguistic rights of francophones in Manitoba, and a second resolution in 1984.

To remind those who might have forgotten, in 1982, a referendum had been held in Winnipeg on the rights to services for francophone minority in that city and was defeated.

Since the Conservative government has taken power, progress has been slower. In his first Speech from the Throne in 1984, he said, and I quote: "My government is committed to ensuring that the equality of the two official languages—so vital to our national character and identity—is respected in fact as it is in law."

That promise was not kept, Mr. Speaker. That equality is not a reality today. In the 1986 Speech from the Throne, the Conservative government promised to amend the Official Languages Act. It was amended two years later in 1988. But here we are, in 1991, three years later, and the regulations have still not been passed. The act is a paper tiger, Mr. Speaker, since the regulations have not been passed. Three years after this House passed a bill on official languages, we are still waiting for the regulations.

Even worse. Rumour has it that this Conservative government is considering transfering to provinces the implementation of the official languages policy.

Mr. Prud'homme: That will be quite something.

Mr. Gauthier: The implementation of linguistic rights.

• (1550)

The Speech from the Throne delivered yesterday does not contain a single word to put that rumour to rest or to reassure French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec who sometimes feel they have to go underground for fear of hostile reactions from their neighbourhood.

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, polls indicate a noticeable change in our youth. One can still hope that some day, the Canadian identity, which is largely based on our linguistic duality, will be more than a constitutional reality and become part of the heart and spirit of Canadian men and women.

Debates have been going on throughout this country. A total of eight committees sat and some are still sitting. I will name them, Mr. Speaker. There is the Spicer Commission, the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, the Beaudoin-Edwards Joint Special Committee on the Process for Amending the Constitution of Canada, the Silipo Commission in Ontario, the Bélanger-Campeau Commission in Quebec, the Horsman Committee in Alberta, the British Columbia Cabinet Committee on Confederation, the Manitoba Task Force on the Constitution, the New Brunswick Commission on Canadian Federalism. In all, there are eight commissions presently studying this question.

Mr. Speaker, our country deserves of course much consideration, but also some actions. I believe then, as I tried to make it clear earlier, that dualism is one of the foundations of our federation. If you do away with this feature, Mr. Speaker, you will kill my country. I am quite sure of that.

Second concept: regionalism. It is a basic concept established a long time ago in Canada, since, as I said earlier, our country is so big. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, what other country can boast having vast and fertile prairies, huge farming land, large mountainous regions dotted with lakes, wild regions in the North and the Arctic tundra?

Our country has evolved from distinct regional communities strongly attached to their local identity and traditions. Still, regionalism is one of the foundations of Confederation, but it is also considered to be one of the scapegoats for nationalistic conflicts. I hear members of the "Bar-B-Q" party over there who plague us with their short comments once in a while. Quebec asks for a distinct status or, as it is put in the Throne Speech, unique.

During the school tour I made in my riding since January—I visited almost every single one of them—, I was asked the following question: What makes Quebec so different or unique, since it was said today that these two words meant it was the same thing? I did not say that the Minister responsible did it. Aren't all our provinces distinct? Of course, all our provinces are distinct, Mr. Speaker! That is what makes our country so rich.

But with 5.5 million of people speaking French on a territory where 280 to 300 hundred million of people speak English, Quebec is the only community in North America with a French speaking majority. Besides its language, Quebec has its own Civil Code, its own economic institutions—caisses populaires, Quebec Deposit and Investment Fund, etc. Quebec negotiates educational and cultural agreements directly with France; it participates in numerous international conferences and contributes to the work of the international organizations. Moreover, Quebec has its own pension plan and administers its immigration program. So, by virtue of its language, its culture, its legislation and its economical structures, Quebec is distinct from the other provinces, it is unique.

While recognizing that characteristic, we will have to meet the minimum expectations of Quebec, find solutions to the conflicts between Western Canada and Central Canada, meet the needs of the Maritimes and solve native claims. Mr. Speaker, that is an ambitious program, that is a challenge for us.

Mr. Speaker, if divorce results from an accumulation of factors, the same is true of national conflicts. If a consensus is not found, the antagonisms, whether they are cultural, social or economic, will grow and split this country.

Mr. Speaker, rather than continuing as a federation with two levels of government emanating from the same population—federal and provincial governments are elected by and accountable to the same people—some provinces seem to favour a confederation. I read recently some comments of experts on the confederation process, that is to say a government of governments. The federal government would be elected by the provinces and not the people. The elected members would elect the other level of government.

Experience shows that most confederations have been unstable and have either collapsed or moved to federalism. Mr. Speaker, while the European Community is hoping that economic association will lead to political federalism, some Canadian provinces would like to move the other way.

For lack of a representative and effective policy on the part of the central government, the Canadian federation must now make some major changes.

A number of our problems also come from the division and sharing of responsibilities. Therefore, we must consider a new division of powers which is more in keeping with our time. The society in which our Constitution was born, in 1867, was very different from the present. In a householder I sent to my constituents, there is a questionnaire dealing with this question of division of powers.

Several fields of responsibilities which did not exist or were not fully developed then have been split between the provinces and the federal government. This is the case, for example, of communication, transportation and the environment which were not controlled; fishing and logging were not regulated. Over time, the federal government entered fields of provincial jurisdiction in order to create national programs, while provinces stepped into some other fields to promote regional development. Conflicts, Mr. Speaker, have been fuelled by costly and frustrating duplications. We must, therefore, come up with a new division of powers which will respond better to a rapidly changing society, while providing for a better cultural, social and economic development.

[English]

Much of our current constitutional debate revolves around the distribution of powers and responsibilities. In at least one area, all levels of government—federal, provincial, regional, municipal—share responsibilities.

All Canadians, as stewards of this country, must participate in the protection of the environment. The environment carries no passport. It knows no territorial limitations between countries, provinces and municipalities. The environment is the same.

We share the consequences of neglect and abuse. We share the benefits of clean air, clean water and clean land.

In my own riding, the Rideau River flows into the Ottawa River. Both of these rivers need cleaning and protection. So far, it is only because of emergencies such as the $12 million clean-up of the coal tar spill in the Rideau River in 1987 that we have acted to protect these rivers.

As well, we have not adequately harmonized our environmental laws and regulations despite the obvious loopholes for some offenders.

In Ottawa, as an example, four federal entities—the Bank of Canada, the Department of Transport, the Department of Supply and Services, and the National Research Council—were charged in 1987 with giving chemical waste to hauling companies that illegally disposed of these wastes by dumping them, untreated, directly into the Ottawa River.

• (1600)

Only the Bank of Canada was fined. The other three had their charges dropped on the argument that federal entities cannot be prosecuted under Ontario pollution laws. Such an occurrence is appalling. The green plan created by this government should be addressing such problems.

For this reason we must consider carefully the importance of setting stringent international and national environmental protective standards. Without such standards the likely result is a confusing variety of regulations differing in both strength and scope, encouraging a low level of environmental protection in some areas and creating loopholes.

I want to deal with another important area. Mr. Speaker, I know you have told me I only have a minute. I may want to indicate to my colleagues that I would like to have a little more time, but I will see what questions come. I would like to speak about the process we are facing now, that is the constituent assembly and the referendum question. Both those questions under study at this time need to be explained. I would appreciate getting a question either on the referendum or on the constituent assembly.

Mr. Speaker, let me just say that the challenge of the national unity is enormous, but it is worth tackling. We must face it in a Canadian spirit, with love and kindness. We must find solutions to make this country a greater and better place to live. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval—Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I know that he supports dualism in Canada, and that he has always, at least since I have been a member of this House, defended all Canadians, anglophones and francophones alike. He is a person who is constantly fighting for the rights of everyone.

While I was listening to the speaker who rose before him, the member for South Shore, something he said caught my attention. He said that Canadians should talk to one another. In his speech, the member for Ottawa—Vanier said something along the same line. So I would ask him to elaborate a bit on that last remark, that is, should we, as Canadians, talk to each other in order to understand one another or is it useless to do so?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, first of all, it is true that we need to talk, but I would like to say to my colleague that, in the Speech from the Throne, the governement proposes to establish another parliamentary committee, another tool of communication, but with this difference which I am going to explain.

The parliamentary committee that will be established next September will draw from the Beaudoin-Edward Committee, the Spicer Commission and a government paper that will be presented to it this summer, I suppose, and it will travel through Canada to consult all the legislative assemblies, not the people, but the legislative assemblies; it will report back in February 1992, not to the Parliament, but to the government.

So, I say to government members that they will have to clarify this situation or explain, to me and to all Canadians, why a direct dialogue with Canadians is excluded. Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that with the Spicer Commission, the Beaudoin-Edwards Commission and all the commissions that I mentioned earlier, the situation would have been clear enough. But that is not the case! After having reviewed all those commissions, one would have thought that all the political parties of this House could adopt a common position and have it ratified and presented to the people of Canada, and that the problem would be somewhat solved.

But no! They announce some task force, a study group composed of a government majority which will review next September the said documents and report not to the House of Commons nor to the Senate but to the government.

I say to the hon. member that that is beyond me. Why not go to the people? Why not tell us directly what is happening and what propositions we should consider?

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for his speech. Everybody knows how perceptive he is in constitutional matters. I can even tell him that we listen to him with great interest because we know that even when we were very bound by governmental solidarity he did show more vision than we did in 1981-1982 as he foresaw the problems we experience now.

The hon. member was talking about eight commissions, the hon. member for Laval on the governement side wishes for the return of a kind of Réal Giguère with Parle, parle, jase, jase, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, who has seen quite a few commissions in his life, there have been eight of them, said we are going to have a ninth one, and probably a few others. I listened to Clyde Wells this morning and I seldom agree with him, but this morning he said: even if there were 20 other committees, this is not a matter of process, it is a problem of substance. And when one considers the proposals which have been made, whether it be a referendum or a constituent assembly, in the final analysis the basic problem confronting us is that we hold diametrically opposed views. We have seen today his leader make a very centralizing speech, worthy of the good years, but we listened this morning for example, to the leader of the Liberal party we heard him say: as for the environment, we are going to set the standards in Ottawa, and the provinces will appoint their inspectors; in the field of education, we are going to set the standards in Ottawa and the provinces will see to the rest. In other words, Ottawa runs everything and the provinces pay for it and end up doing all the work.

We know that no political party in Quebec can realistically agree with this kind of federalism. And I know the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is aware that only the Equality Party could perhaps agree with his leader's thinking. But when we look at a report like the Allaire Report, when we look realistically at the facts, does the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier think that the new committee which has just been announced is going to settle the fundamental issues, or whether we are going to be cheated again in the process? It is my opinion and it has been our view from the start that the English Canada will never come up with an acceptable offer by 1992. Ultimately, the train has already left the station and, unfortunately for English Canada, instead of carrying on with the process, perhaps it should focus on the substance of things.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his question. I must tell him that, quite frankly, as far as I am concerned, if there was ever a time when any shape or form of partisanship should be set aside, it is when the unity of my country is at stake. I believe that no government, no politician and no individual has the right to roll the dice with the future of Canada. I appreciate that my colleague is a member of a caucus which is against both the Canadian duality and, more likely than not, the kind of regionalism I described. However, this is not a dialogue of the deaf. We simply disagree on the basic premise. So, we cannot come to an agreement. Explain as I may— ad vitam eternam and ad nauseam, if you prefer—Mr. Speaker, my view of this country of mine, of Canada, I will never make him understand because he has his own view and there is nothing I can do about that.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier who has a reputation for perceptiveness in many fields in this House. He raised the question of the referendum. I would like him to expand on this question of great interest to me, as I am sure most of my colleagues would like him to do, considering his long experience. What would be, in his opinion, the criteria or prerequisites for a referendum to be a true expression of the will of the Canadian people?

M. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on the issue of referendum I have a lot of reservations, as for that matter some colleagues like the hon. member for Saint-Denis would tell you, in 1981-1982 we went through the same experience.

I agree that the instrument or process might be acceptable. And with my leader when he announced it, I expressed publicly some opinions about it. The four requirements which in my opinion should be met or otherwise satisfied would be as follows: That the referendum question be clear and precise; second, that it should be supported by all three political parties in this House; that it does not reduce at all the rights of the minority; and that it be subject to the simple majority of the country and, on top of that, to regional plurality where each region would have a right of veto: Quebec, Ontario, the Maritimes and the West. With these four conditions, Mr. Speaker, I think that should a referendum be held, it could be seen as equitable.

Mr. Prud'homme: You might win the member for Saint-Denis with this.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address this House during this throne speech debate, particularly on that part of the throne speech which had the chapter heading "Changing the way Ottawa works".

Mr. Speaker, many changes were made in the proceedings of this House over the nearly 20 years since I was elected here. I think the most important one was the broadcasting of our proceedings because it brought about fundamental changes in the way we deal with public business. Television cameras gave Canadians access to this House. Canadian men and women in the comfort of their home can watch the work of their elected representatives. Mr. Speaker, it is estimated that about one million Canadians watch the parliamentary channel each week to listen to debates on a bill, hear a statement by their member or watch the Question Period, which is the best show of all.

[English]

Nevertheless, in my view this is just one of the many factors which have contributed to our image problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the issue I would like to deal with now. As a member and as a Canadian, I am deeply concerned about the low esteem and consideration of Canadians for their elected representatives, not only members of this House but also other representatives at all levels. Members of the House of Commons should take this problem seriously and do all that is needed to restore confidence and respect for elected representatives.

[English]

The erosion of confidence in the very foundation of our democratic system must be addressed. It is our intention to do that or at least to try to make some progress in this session of Parliament.

The issue is the disrepute into which we politicians, we members of Parliament—and I think all elected politicians in Canada suffer in this regard, but in particular, we in this House of Commons—have fallen.

The fundamental element of our democratic system is the election in which Canadians, by secret ballot, elect men and women to represent them in their legislatures, city councils, and here in Parliament. Yet the polls all tell us that those who the people of Canada elect are held in very low esteem. Indeed, in looking at the most fundamental question facing the country—namely the question of unity, the question of the Constitution— serious people, people of high repute, people for whom I have a great deal of respect, suggest that the best way to examine these changes is to exclude entirely from the process anybody who has been elected.

For people to seriously suggest that holding elective office is an obstacle to participation in the most fundamental question facing the country is to suggest that they have little respect for the institutions in which we function and that the very basis of our democratic system is in some jeopardy.

That sends signals to us that we would be fools to ignore, not only for our own personal welfare as elected people, but certainly in terms of what we all want in the end. That is to see the survival and prosperity of this democratic country and the institution of which we are a part, which is fundamental to the future of the country, to a democratic system. We cannot have a free and prosperous society without this democratic foundation, an institution like this if not this one specifically.

What is the reason for this? Why have the people of Canada reached these conclusions about those of us whom they have elected to higher office? Well, one of the factors is certainly a skewed and very limited view of House proceedings. TV, which preys on our adversarial system, does not provide the opportunity to see a lot of what goes on. We all know, as members of Parliament, that there is a lot of good work that goes on in committees and many other ways around here. We know that there are debates that are held which are not watched with great enthusiasm, they are not applauded. The press gallery today, as every day, is empty of observers.

When I first arrived here, there was always at least one member of the press gallery on behalf of Canadian Press reporting on the debates. That does not happen any more.

What people do see through television is mostly Question Period. They see high emotional debate. They see strong language. They see outrage and indignation. They see behaviour that sometimes we must acknowledge we are not proud of. What they do not see with enough frequency is calm deliberation, discussion of issues in a serious way, serious issues with serious solutions, respect for each other's points of view even when we differ, and final decision. When they see us vote, they see us vote as blocs. They see us stand up as a bloc either for or against and they wonder about the individual they elected to represent them.

There are other factors which contribute to the disrespect or the anger people have for this institution. I have to acknowledge part of it is the tough agenda and the tough medicine. This government has introduced and passed legislation which was not popular, very definitely not popular. We did so with the firm belief it was required, it was needed, and did it recognizing that we would have to account for it. In the process, people have felt that we were not acting according to their wishes.

It is ironic, 70 per cent to 75 per cent of Canadians say they want their elected officials to follow their wishes, but about 75 per cent say they want their elected leaders to take strong decisions and do the right thing, even if it is not popular. They want strong leadership but they do not want their views ignored.

Of course, they also see us involved in highly partisan, highly fractious debate. They see, too often, members standing up accusing the other side of malfeasance, of corruption, of ignorance, of stupidity, of irresponsibility, all of those things. The blame is not on one side or the other. I am not trying to assess blame. They see us all doing that.

Sometimes the temptation to do that is overwhelming. It is irresistible. It is emotion. We do feel strongly about these things. Yes, when you stand up and take these dramatic emotional stands, your chances of getting reported or appearing on television is increased. These things are, in a sense, understandable, but they bring us into disrepute.

There is also concern in parts of the country, particularly my part of the country, the west, that they are not being adequately represented. Too often they see groups standing up as a party group and voting on a particular issue which does not make sense to them. It does not affect them. They do not understand it.

They do not understand why those of us from western Canada are not standing up and saying: "Well, we do not like this because people in the west do not like it." They do not understand why we vote as a party bloc all the time and do not show more divergences in reflection of the divergences that exist in this country.

They sometimes accuse us of being Ottawa's representatives to the constituency as opposed to the constituencies' representative in Ottawa. They get angry about that.

They believe that the system does not provide enough opportunity for listening, consulting and taking their views into consideration. All of these things have contributed to the general disrepute in which we are held.

Much of the focus of the public debate is on the question of free votes. They say: "We should have more free votes. People should be free of party discipline. We should change the roles of members of Parliament so they can vote as their constituents want."

They suggest that we should eliminate the element of confidence from the questions when you are dealing with legislation. They should not be questions of confidence ever. The element of confidence should arise when they are clearly spelled out as being questions of confidence, thereby freeing members to vote according to their constituents.

I will deal with that in a moment. First, I think we have to remind ourselves of just what reforms we have made, because the House is a dramatically different place than when I first arrived here.

There is the old expression: "Everybody knows that power corrupts." I think it is equally valid to say that powerlessness corrupts. If you do not have power or the ability to have an impact on things, that is corrupting in itself.

It causes you to do extreme things. It causes you, outside these institutions, to involve yourself in civil disobedience and to take extreme action, if you feel you are powerless to change things.

Within this House, it causes behaviour which is not well viewed by the public.

There have been a lot of changes. In 1984, this government in its throne speech promised parliamentary reform, and the McGrath committee was appointed. It did excellent work. It looked at how this House functions, from ministerial accountability to the legislative process to committees.

The McGrath committee had three reports and recommended a total of 119 individual changes. It had 119 individual recommendations and 92 of those are totally in effect. There are 17 more that are partially in effect. Only 10 were not implemented, and most of those were for reasons of impracticality. It was not for political reasons. For example, there was a recommendation that the Justice Building be taken over for members' offices, and so on.

An overwhelming number of recommendations were approved. Committees were given their own budgets, staff and research for special projects, and could perform research on special projects on their own authority.

Prior to 1984, a committee could only meet if the government House leader authorized it to meet. It could only look into those things the government House leader authorized them to look into. Now committees can look into whatever subject they choose. They have their own budgets and research facilities. They have a lot more authority and there is more opportunity for members to have some influence.

An example of the kind of thing that is happening is: after the reforms came into effect, the number of committee reports in a two-year period went from 27 in 1987 to 29 in 1990. There were only 10 and 12 reports from committees in the two years prior to the McGrath commission.

There was almost a doubling of the number of studies. A lot of those reports were excellent and formed the foundation for changes in the law and for changes in the way Canada views a number of issues. They in fact represent substantial good works by members of Parliament.

We now have a process of review of Order in Council appointments. Everybody appointed by cabinet to a position in this country can be brought before a committee of the House. Their credentials are examined to see whether they are worthy of the position. That is new; that never happened before. Committees are set up to follow government departments and are better organized. Committee members have the ability to travel and to call witnesses. Sound recordings of standing committees are permitted.

Private Members' Business was changed. A random system for selecting Private Members' Business was introduced outside the executive's control.

A committee of private members makes the draws. Prior to 1984—in other words, my first 12 years in Parliament—there was only one private member's bill passed to my recollection. That one was by the late Father Sean O'Sullivan. It was a bill to make the beaver the official animal of Canada.

Since those reforms we have had a number of private members' bills passed; not a lot, but a lot more than happened before that.

Those are important changes. The election of the Speaker was an important change, as were Statements by Ministers with equal opportunity for the opposition, more hours of business, and so on.

Phase two of the reforms was introduced at the conclusion of last session. Again they enhanced committee activity. There was more emphasis on precedent. We are now allowing television into committees, which is a recommendation of a committee of this House. It will be a committee of this House that will decide the rules on how television works, not the government House leader or the government. It will make those decisions.

Private Members' Business has been enhanced. There is more flexibility in substituting items. Now we will need to debate a bill for only three hours to bring it to a vote, rather than five hours. That is a significant improvement.

There will be more private members' bills passed. There will be more days for consideration of private members' business than was the case previously.

We have carried on with the reforms, empowering private members in the last changes to the rules. That having been said, there still is a clear view that we need to do more and there is a clear sense that this place needs more reforms.

A healthy democracy depends on participation and information, yet most of the recent reforms and the previous ones are not appreciated or they are dismissed as irrelevant. Canadians do not have a wide knowledge of the parliamentary system and how it works. That is part of the problem.

The changes that are happening in committee are not headline grabbing stuff. It is not on the news. It is not the stuff that gets reported. Ignorance in the best sense of the word, not in a pejorative sense, exists about the parliamentary system.

What we see reported are the partisan fights in this place, the antics. We see very little about the positive, mundane parliamentary happenings which in the end are so much more important. As I said the debate now seems to focus on the issues of free votes and party discipline.

Let us look at that in some detail. First, the majority of votes in this House in fact are not on issues of substance. They are on technical details. We have a lot of votes but only a very small percentage of them is really of substance and something we want to give consideration to.

The question is why cannot we all vote our own conscience. I am reminded of a political science study I saw asking people who came out of the election booth on election day why they voted and how they voted. What was their reason? Forty per cent of the votes were a reflection of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The minister's time is up unless he obtains unanimous consent to continue. Is there consent?

On a point of order the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the minister was just beginning to enter into a question that is very important to all members of this House, and that is the whole question of free votes. I might ask if he would take some time now to respond to that issue which is very much a concern of mine.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is very simple. The Standing Orders provide that a member can exceed the 20 minute period if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The honorable member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Some hon. members: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will recognize you after the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I admit the minister in question touched on an important topic, namely the question of free vote. I would like to ask him to explain his conception of what would be a free vote, briefly of course, in view of what occurred in this House when the government itself, on the opposition's initiative, wanting to reaffirm the confidence of the House in our health system, which is excellent, voted against the motion, giving as an excuse that it involved the confidence in the government. This is a good example of a situation where the government could explain us how and in what context we could use the free vote.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Well, Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have run out of time because I do do want to say, and I will address the question of my colleague, that it is my intention to ask the management committee of the House to look at a number of changes that could occur.

In terms of how we deal with legislation, perhaps one of the reasons we have partisan debates so often on pieces of legislation is the way they are introduced. At second reading the minister explains it in the House, the opposition is almost duty-bound to oppose it, and we are into partisan differences immediately.

I want to ask the committee to look at pre-studied bills after first reading. Bills could be sent to committee after first reading so that the explanation of the details of the bill can be done in a less partisan atmosphere than is now the case, and to see if in turn we cannot have a more limited second reading debate and free votes.

I want to look at the implication of free votes in terms of what it does to the nature of the country. We are one of the unique countries where no one is actually elected on a national basis. We all represent constituencies. We have to ask ourselves if we had truly free votes where everybody represents their constituents, why would there ever be an incentive for my honoured colleague to vote for support for grain farmers since he has none in his constituency, and why would there ever be an incentive for me from Calgary to vote for support for fishermen, for example, since I have none in my constituency.

Political parties have a vested interest in building a consensus across the country, in fact we are one of the few institutions that do have that. I want to ask the committee to examine this matter to make sure that we do not throw out the baby with the bath water, so to speak, in saying everybody is free to vote and should vote according to their constituents wishes.

I want to ask the committee to re-examine this question of opposition day and opposition day motions, which is what the hon. member referred to. These votes on opposition day motions are supposed to be a surrogate for votes on the question of supply and therefore are confidence by definition. They do because of the motion we have raised, "this House loves medicare", and you have the government voting against it which is an absurdity. We do not want to vote against it, but if it is a surrogate for confidence we have no choice.

Let us re-examine that. Maybe we need to re-examine what those votes should be and I would like the committee to take a look at that. I think we have to examine Question Period quite frankly, because if all members are going to be equal, then all members should be equal. He knows, as I know, in watching the British House that it has quite a different approach. The approach is that everybody is equal, the government comes in and everybody has an equal opportunity to question government or make representations on behalf of their constituents, everybody.

We are organized in party blocs where the main opposition bloc first and the second opposition bloc next are structured in a way which means the individual is less important than the party bloc. If individuals are to count in this House, and the public is demanding that, we have got to look at that. Maybe that needs to be changed as well and I ask the committee to take a look at that.

I think that the empowerment of individual members is essential to give meaning to the casting of a ballot and to the selecting of an individual. We also have recognized though that we are a large diverse country and we cannot afford to dilute the glue that political parties bring to this country by giving a Conservative in British Columbia a vested interest in trying to reach an accommodation with a Conservative in Quebec and a Conservative in Newfoundland, and the same applies for the other national parties.

If we unduly destroy the cohesion of national parties, then we have to ask ourselves what is to take their place in keeping this country together? If everybody represents a small parochial interest, then we lose some very important glue. I want to ask the committee to look into that as well.

I want to ask the committee to study these and to report back as soon as possible. I would like to start these changes next September. I do not think we can get them done before the end of June, but I would like them looked at and we do not need to proceed in one large package; we can proceed piecemeal, implementing as we go along.

I know we are all pretty cynical about each other's motives, but I must say at this time when the future of the country is at stake and the reputation of parliamentarians, all of us, is at such a low ebb, that we have to treat this responsibility seriously and we have to look at those changes. I think it can be done. I hope that the committee will take on that responsibility very early and will do something for this Chamber and for this country.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly hear the minister's speech and find any credibility in it. In the Throne Speech, the very paragraph about a reform of the Standing Orders of the House also mentions that the report of the Royal Commission, appointed to study the electoral reform, will be tabled.

May I remind you that the Royal Commission was also established to study political party financing. However, we all know that, in spite of the promise made by the Prime Minister a few days before the last election, to institute public financing as soon as he was elected,—two years and a half have elapsed and nothing has come of it—we know that he never intended to do so and thus he has deceived all Canadians, including Quebecers. Moreover, in establishing that Royal Commission and in appointing the members he has chosen himself, he led the reform in such a way that it did not provide anything on public financing.

So, how can we believe all the words of the minister, when we see that in fact he does not intend to change anything?

Mr. Lortie, the appointed Chairman of the Royal Commission, recently said, in an interview with Le Devoir, there would be no public financing. He even said so before completing his study.

But, no study was made on the role of bagmen within the Canadian Conservative Party, while this process has been denounced for seven years already. No study was made on the impact of public financing, on the participation of Canadian citizens in the whole process of political parties.

• (1640)

And today, they want us to believe that changes will be made to the Standing Orders of the House or to the system. That will never be done. There is no will for a change. I would ask the Canadian and Quebec people to read the 1984 Throne Speech and see all these false wishes that never came true. And the present Throne Speech is a deception for the whole of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure why the hon. member should be upset about having a royal commission on electoral reform. The commission is doing good work, as far as I know. We have not seen the report yet, but we are looking forward to the report.

The throne speech deals not with the electoral process, but in a sense the products of that process, namely, this House of Commons and the way we behave. Some of us get elected under one banner and then change. Whether that is appropriate or not is something that perhaps we should look at. Do the people have a right to expect some integrity from those they elect, and expect them to perform according to what they say? That is perhaps one of the things we may want to look at.

Mr. Kindy: On a point of order. I think 30 minutes has expired.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I too wanted to say a few words on the throne speech debate today, particularly about the issue of the future of Canada and national unity that is so important at this time.

There is no doubt in my mind, as we go into this crucial next one or two years of Canada's development, and as we strive to reach a national consensus, that we should make sure we devise a process of changing our Constitution that is as open, fair, accessible and democratic as possible.

The process must be democratic so that the people of this country have full access to the process, so that the people of this country are the ones who build the Constitution. Constitution-building in this country must be done by more than just elected politicians.

We must have people from all kinds of groups that are under-represented in the Parliament of Canada involved in the process.

I make a plea this afternoon about seven or eight points that should be considered as we look at the future of our country and the unity of our country, which was an important part of the throne speech read by Governor General Ray Hnatyshyn in the Senate yesterday.

A committee of this House has travelled Canada, has had public hearings in 16 different communities in all the provinces and territories of Canada, and has been given a loud and clear message: the people want in, the people want to be part of the process, the people want a new process and a new way of building a Constitution.

People want a constituent assembly where you would have, yes, the elected politicians representing all parties in this House. You would also have people who are under-represented in the current electoral system. I refer specifically to women who are under-represented in this Chamber. I refer to the aboriginal people who are under-represented in this House, and certainly under-represented in terms of our national institutions and our national decision-making bodies.

I refer as well to the many minorities, the multiracial and multicultural minorities that are a growing reality in this country, and want to be part of that process. They would not be a part of that process if our next round of constitutional talks involves only the elected politicians and the senators here in Ottawa.

I make the plea that the government reconsider the wisdom of a parliamentary committee to negotiate the next round of our constitutional future, and expand that committee to include not only elected people and politicians, but turn it into a fully fledged constituent assembly representing the people of this country.

A second thing that is really important is that we have a broad process of public hearings and public input as we determine where to go and the future of our country. It is important that this Parliament make a commitment to have public hearings for constitutional change whenever there is a proposal made to the people of this country. All too often in the past we have not had adequate public hearings or adequate input, or we have had a proposition made by the government to a parliamentary committee and the committee has said: "Well, you cannot really change the proposition. You can look at it and you can have public hearings, but you cannot change it". That is not good enough.

We need mandatory public hearings, where a parliamentary committee would hear from the Canadian people, listen to the Canadian people and change the proposition before it becomes part of the Constitution of Canada.

I would also would like to see the provinces and the two territories of this country do exactly the same thing.

During the Meech Lake Accord, only about half of the provinces had public hearings. The other half never had public hearings at all. Many of the provinces just relied on their premier or a vote in their assembly to say yes or no to the accord.

Even Premier Wells, who likes to talk about openness and democracy, in Newfoundland and Labrador did not have public hearings at all before he rescinded his support for the Meech Lake Accord. Again, is that listening to the people? That is not listening to the people. The provinces in a federation should have public hearings and public input so people at the provincial level can have a say in what their MLAs and their provincial representatives are saying in terms of constitutional change.

The third area we should look at in terms of public participation is whether or not we should have a national referendum for constitutional change. I think that requires further study. A referendum could be very divisive in this country. We have to look at who would write the question and questions of funding for the yes and no side in a national referendum.

Then we have the question of what is a majority. In a federal state is a simple majority of 50 per cent plus one good enough? I suggest it is not. Perhaps a majority in the four great regions of this country: the west, Ontario, Quebec, and Atlantic Canada. Is that even good enough? Is it right and proper to have a national referendum on a question of minority rights where we are dealing with the aboriginal rights or the land rights of the aboriginal people of this country? I am really doubtful.

I caution the government that when it tables legislation on a referendum procedure later on, it had better make sure we know where we are going before we use this tool. A national referendum could override the rights of minorities, override the rights of regional minorities, be it western Canadians, Quebecers, Atlantic Canadians, or northerners. It could override the rights of groups such as aboriginal people or ethnic minorities or, indeed, linguistic minorities such as the anglophones of Quebec or the francophones outside of Quebec.

That is an area that needs further study before we commit ourselves to having a national referendum.

It is more important to make sure that the people have a say in building a national consensus on what the constitution should be. At a time when that consensus is being built, it should be the people of this country who determine whether or not we should be enshrining more aboriginal rights or stronger rights for minorities or a charter of social and economic rights. The people of this country must have a say at the developmental process, at the proposal level and not be handed a fait accompli by bureaucrats, as has happened so many times in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced, after spending several weeks attending public hearings throughout Canada, in every Canadian province, in the Yukon, in Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories, that most Canadians want a united and strong Canada. We must have a Canada for all Canadians. We must find a compromise for the benefit of the West, natives, Quebecers, the North, the Atlantic provinces, Ontario and everybody.

I am optimistic that we will be able to find a way to save our great country and to protect at the same time its national solidarity and its real diversity, Mr. Speaker.

We are lucky to have two great languages, French and English, and the natives who were here before anybody else, and now a large number of people who came from many countries from all over the world.

After six or seven weeks of public hearings, I am convinced that most of our national population will wish to have a united and strong Canada.

[English]

In the process of changing our country, the most important thing is democracy, giving people a voice and allowing them to participate in every stage of the process.

I think we should look at some of our history. We have had a proud history in many ways in terms of what kind of a country we have built. We have medical care, hospitalization, health insurance, and family allowance. We have a mixed economy. We have a free and democratic country.

We have a wealthy country with many resources, but when it has come to changing our Constitution, we have often been deficient in living up to the great rhetoric and the great hope that we all hold for this country.

The oversight that is the most glaring to me is how we have shunted aside and forgotten the aboriginal people, the first people of this country.

When we look at how we change our Constitution, there is no reference whatsoever to aboriginal people. They do not have a voice at the table. Before we make changes to the Constitution with respect to the aboriginal people in this country, changes which affect them directly, whether treaty rights or self-government, I suggest that aboriginal people themselves should have a say.

They should be allowed the right of consent. In other words, we should not change treaty rights without their consent. We should not impose a system of self-government in this country. If there is self-government for aboriginal people, it should be with their consent. If we deal with issues that affect them directly, it must be with their consent.

Second, no matter what the constitutional issue may be, the aboriginal people must be at the table. They must have a voice. They must participate or take part in those meetings, because aboriginal people in this country are affected by equality rights for men and women. They are affected by whether or not there are property rights in the Constitution, whether or not there is free speech. They are affected by our languages, our many cultures and our Canadian reality.

The time has come to make sure that they have voice and that they have a real role in consenting to changes in the Constitution that affect them.

The next thing is the role of our northern territories. When you travel the north, you find out very quickly that they are treated in many ways by people in this part of the world as though they are colonies. Things are imposed on them by the politicians in Ottawa and by the bureaucracy.

Many years ago in 1905 when my province became a province of this country it became a province through an agreement by the people in the then territory that Saskatchewan now is and the Parliament of Canada.

The people of Saskatchewan and the Parliament of Canada in a bilateral sense agreed that Saskatchewan should be a province. The same thing in Manitoba, British Columbia, Alberta, Prince Edward Island and, in 1949, Newfoundland and Labrador.

It was the people in the Dominion of Newfoundland and Labrador who had a referendum and later signed an agreement with Canada through the Parliament of Canada to become a province.

In 1982, when the Constitution was patriated and brought back to Canada with the charter of rights, Parliament changed the rules for the creation of new provinces.

Instead of it being a decision of the people of the Yukon and Northwest Territories, for example, and Parliament, a new province could be created only if there was the agreement of Parliament and seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population of Canada. That is not fair. We are not applying the same rules in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon as we applied in the rest of the country. I suggest that we go back to the rules before 1982 for the creation of a new province. If the Yukon or the Northwest Territories wish to become a province and Parliament consents, then it is a province.

Of what business is it to the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Ontario whether the Yukon is or is not a province? It is time we stopped treating them as if they were colonies.

Second, there is no provision in the Constitution that would prohibit an existing province from expanding its territory into the Northwest Territories or the Yukon. There is no provision that would stop that unless it was stopped by seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the people and the Parliament of Canada.

We suggest that the territories themselves should have a veto over the expansion of existing provinces within their boundaries. If British Columbia, Alberta or some other province decides unilaterally to expand north, the people in the territories should have the right to say no.

Third, it is imperative that the governments of the two territories be represented at constitutional meetings, at the constitutional table, and that they have a chance to participate and a voice in federal-provincial meetings. I am very pleased to see that in Nipawin, Saskatchewan, today and yesterday at the Western Premiers Conference, Mr. Penikett, the premier of the Yukon, and Mr. Patterson, the government leader from the Northwest Territories, were there as full participants along with the four western premiers. That is a step forward. It has become a conference not only of western premiers, but also of the two leaders from the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Let us follow that example and apply it to all constitutional negotiations, to all federal and provincial negotiations, to all negotiations that affect the people of the two territories. If we do that we are then talking about a more democratic Canada.

These are some of the issues that we should address when discussing how to change our Constitution and how we, as Canadians, can make our country more democratic.

There is one other issue I wish to refer to regarding changes to the Constitution. That is whether we should have a free vote on constitutional matters in this chamber. We heard from dozens and dozens of Canadians right across this country who were asking the parties, at the committee that looked at a process of amending the Constitution, for a free vote. Person after person said that if there was a free vote on the Constitution in this House, members of Parliament would be forced to represent more accurately their constituents on a constitutional matter. They would be held more accountable by their constituents on a constitutional matter.

I suggest for all constitutional amendments that come before this House, we have a free vote with a two-thirds amendment, which would force members of Parliament to be more accountable to and representative of their constituents. It would also force members of all political parties in this House, be it three or four or five political parties, to try to reach a consensus on constitutional matters, to make sure that a constitutional matter is above and beyond partisan politics and that we try to achieve a truly national consensus. If a two-thirds majority was required, in almost every Parliament in this country, with a few exceptions like 1984 where there was a large majority, the consent of a significant number of people in the opposition would be required.

A government could not come before this House and say: "Look, here is the proposition and we do not care what you say, we are going to have a committee and then we will ram it through the House." That is not good enough.

I believe that on constitutional matters which are not partisan matters in the traditional sense, there must be a free vote with a two-thirds majority.

• (1700)

I think that is the feeling of the members of the Liberal and Conservative parties who sit on the joint committee on amending the Constitution of Canada.

If we were to open up the process, make the process more democratic, make it more accessible to the people in this country, then I think we could bring this country together. We could unite this country around the values that all of us share.

Travelling the country makes one more of an optimist. People want to stay together. People want this country to unite and stand together. They are also looking for a new way and a new method of building a country, reaching a consensus and building a constitution. They want people to be democratically involved. We can do that through a constituent assembly, where people who are now under-represented in Parliament have a chance to be represented at the table, in particular the aboriginal people of Canada.

Travelling the country you would find, after you get over some of the deep-seated animosity between so many peoples in this country, a real understanding that one of the real jewels of Canada is the diversity that we have, the fact that Quebec is so unique and different, with a different language, a different history and culture, and a different legal system. We have a great tolerance toward minorities and ethnocultural groups from all parts of the world. We are the second largest country in the world, after the Soviet Union, in terms of area, and that tremendous size and the mountains and the differences in this country should be seen as things that we cherish and build on, and not divide us.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my friend, the member for Chambly, and I, we spent two or three days just before Christmas in New Brunswick, in British Columbia and also in Edmonton and when we spoke to students, we noticed that there was not a very big difference in the various parts of the country: All people want a clean environment, a job for their children and peace in the world, whether they speak French or English or live in western or eastern Canada.

[English]

What we need in this country is an open democratic process. I see my time has expired and you are about to rise. We need an open democratic process that allows people to participate.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member. He addressed the question of Canadian unity. He did not mention the question of referenda. I would like to know if he is in favour of referenda, whether he wants people's input, or just the constituent assembly.

Another point I would like to comment on is that Canadians right now have tremendous economic difficulties because of the policies of the government, of high interest rates, and so on and so forth—the goods and services tax in particular.

Travelling this country, everybody tells you the economy is slow and things are not progressing. They blame the goods and services tax and they blame the high interest rates that have caused a made-in-Canada recession.

What we should be addressing is the question of economic recovery. One of the points the Governor General mentioned in his Speech from the Throne was free trade with Mexico. I would like to know whether the hon. member's party is also in favour, at this time, of an association with Mexico, of free trade with that country. I do not believe that this is the opportune time. We have not established a working relationship with the provinces, we have not established free trade with the United States that is to the benefit of Canada. I would like him to comment.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the most important issue in this country today is the economy—all the economic problems, the unemployment, the high interest rates, the devastation in the farm economy, particularly in western Canada. That is the number one issue. People want us to solve the unity problem within the next year or so. Then we can deal with the real problems, which are jobs and creating wealth for the people of this country.

I am convinced, after travelling this country time and time again, we do not need the GST in this country. We should get rid of the GST. The free trade deal with the United States has sold out too much of our sovereignty. We have given away much too much for what we receive. We should not now be entering into yet another free trade deal with Mexico that once again will hurt this country by sending more and more jobs south of the border into Mexico where wages are very, very low and working conditions are very, very poor.

These are real issues that have to be addressed, and addressed very quickly. This is why we have to resolve this unity question, so we can get on to the real issue of building a strong and prosperous Canada with jobs reaching every person.

Second, on referenda, I think the member from Calgary may have been out. In my speech I spent two or three minutes on referenda. I suggested that we have to look at the wisdom of whether or not we should have national referenda. If we do have a referendum, we should look at all kinds of questions that are real problems for me. It could be a divisive tool. What is a majority in a referendum? Is it just strictly a national majority or do we need a majority in each of the four regions of the country? Do we put minority rights to a referendum, such as the rights of aboriginal people who make up five or six per cent of the population. An amendment to the Constitution may be one that deals strictly with their treaty rights or deals with land entitlement or deals with self-government. Should that be put to a national referendum?

There could be a tyranny of the majority, trampling over minority rights. The same is true of rights of multiracial or multicultural minorities. I raise those as questions that are legitimate. There are also questions about the financing of a referendum, do we have limitations on the yes and no side, who will ask the question and why.

The important thing for me is that we involve the people in the process from the beginning through a constituent assembly and through very open public hearings at both the federal and provincial levels so that people participate in building the process and building the Constitution.

There may be a place at the end for a national referendum, but only a national referendum that unites Canada, binds us together and not divides us. All I am saying is that we have to look at it more closely. I think it requires a bit more study.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, there are those of us who came to this country as immigrants, there are those of us who chose Canada. We could have gone to any country in the world. However, we chose Canada. We are very disturbed by some people who are trying to divide the country, the separatists from Quebec and the separatists from the west.

My question for the hon. member is the following: Will he agree that we have to invite the ethno-Canadians? Will he agree that multiculturalism has played a definite part in this country. Yesterday, the first Sikh graduated from RCMP training wearing a turban. Will he agree that ethnocultural Canadians should sit at the negotiating table and start negotiating, that these people who come to this country by choice and are sick and tired of the separatist factions of this country are needed and needed today?

I speak about my hon. friends from Quebec. We came here by choice and we do not want any part of what they are saying.

Mr. Nystrom: I obviously agree that ethnocultural Canadians have to be at the table. That is a major reason why we have recommended a constituent assembly. My friend from the Liberal Party's leader, if I can be a bit partisan here for a second, has rejected the idea of a constituent assembly. I think if one were to reject the idea, I would be hard pressed to figure out a way to bring the people who are under-represented in our parliamentary system to the table in the numbers that they should.

That is why we recommend a constituent assembly. It is easier to have the linguistic minorities, the ethnocultural Canadians, people with multiracial backgrounds and the aboriginal people at the table if there is a constituent assembly.

It is the reason why I hesitate about a national referendum. Minority rights can be overridden by the majority. I think not just of aboriginal people but people from other minorities.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueil): Mr Speaker, some called us separatists earlier. Perhaps you will be proud in a few years to learn that we saved the rest of Canada because we wanted sovereignty for Quebec.

• (1710)

Because of the way things are going right now, this country is heading straight into bankruptcy. The deficit is now $400 billions and we don't know how to solve this problem. I would like only to say that you are going to be proud to see perhaps one day a sovereign Canada, formed of the rest of Canada, that will be able to grow better than it is today.

I would have a short question for the hon. member who just spoke. We talked earlier about unity. He spoke a lot about unity. In the Speech from the Throne, the government said that education should be under its jurisdiction and that we should have a legislation providing us with a national policy on education when we know very well that education is a provincial jurisdiction and that for Quebec, it is very precious. The Quebec Minister of Education said today that that kind of infringment by the federal government was outrageous and totally unacceptable.

Speaking on that same subject, the leader of the NDP said today that the federal government should play a more important role in education. That means that she supports the plan announced by the tories in their Speach from the Throne. Does the hon. member support that position and can he explain how Quebecers could accept such an infringement on Quebec jurisdiction?

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, our Constitution gives some powers to the federal government, other powers to the provinces and I agree that education should stay with the provinces. However, in its administration it might be useful to have a national policy with some kind of coordination between provinces in that area.

It might be possible to have, I am thinking about my own province, Saskatchewan—maybe not Quebec, because it's different—and British Columbia or Manitoba, more coordination between the various systems. But, strictly from a constitutional point of view, I think that this power should stay with the provinces.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. Member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to participate in this debate on the Speech from the Throne.

[English]

This morning when I was walking to the Parliament Buildings, I passed the post office building at the corner of Elgin Street and Sparks Street. I looked again at the cornerstone on that building. It said 1939 A.D. 1939 was after 10 years of the most cruel and crushing depression ever to have been felt in this country, and was the moment that war clouds were gathering over Europe and we were about to be plunged into the most severe military holocaust of this century.

Yet, at that low moment, in that valley of despair, someone had the courage to build a building that was a part of Canada's future. I see that as a metaphor for where we are today, that ability to inscribe hope, even to see confidence, in what we build.

What we must build today is not with mortar and concrete, with glass or steel. What faces us now is building new attitudes of confidence, confidence in ourselves as Canadians, and building a cultural renaissance in our country that will give rebirth to a greater Canada.

Over the last two years as Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I had the chance to see how many other people around this planet view our country. If I had any wish in 1991, it would be that Canadians could see ourselves as others elsewhere in the world see us.

They would find it incomprehensible that we, in this comfortable country, are talking with such despair about our future. Hearing this current debate, they would certainly be blinking in incomprehension.

How about those who are living within the northern or southern borders of Iraq today? What about those in the Bangladesh flood plain, where the current crop of human fatalities is but an ominous portent of what is waiting as the UN today released statistics showing that world population is going to double in the next 60 years?

What about those who live, barely, in Ethiopia or Sudan staring vacantly into the dizzying void of starvation? What about those in the pollution choked countries of eastern Europe? What even of those people struggling to avoid the final collapsing remnants of the communist regimes where the lie could no longer be lived, even by those who spoke it?

Canada imperilled? Canada about to break up, to break down, to break apart? Canada? No one who sees our country from abroad can understand this nonsense. You have to be Canadian to understand the parasitic insecurity and self-doubt which constantly brings us down, to know that the route to political unity actually lies through a new attitude and awareness of ourselves. We are daring to express that in a cultural way and in a vastly more democratic way.

The late Canadian literary scholar Northrop Frye urged that we forsake political tinkering and concentrate more positively and profitably on becoming, for the first time, the cultural federation.

He saw, as I do, as a necessary precursor for our political restoration a cultural renovation of the country, a society valued mainly for its beaver pelts, its softwood forests and the soldiers it can supply to other countries' wars. Frye said, speaking of our earlier years, that Canada is unlikely to develop any cultural phenomenon beyond a problem of identity, a general state of wondering why it exists.

The last 20 years have seen a buoyant and refreshing expression of our authentic selves in a culturally robust Canada. This has directly contributed to our successes in other fields.

Keith Spicer may have been misunderstood when he said that it was important to listen to our poets, but I do not think that he was wrong.

The strength today of Quebec is but an expression of Quebecers' strong sense of a common tradition lived and expressed in a culture which went through a quiet revolution and which gave Quebecers a new sense of status and political influence. All of this, of course, has been done by Quebecers who are proud of their culture and who are living their culture within Canada.

In several very important respects, Quebecers have in fact been leaders of Canada from the beginning to the present. A reluctance in 1914 to send young men from the forests, fields and factories to die in the bloody mud of a European imperial war seemed incomprehensible to many other Canadians.

I believe Quebecers had discerned a truth not yet seen by others at that time. A quest by Quebecers to press for new Canadian symbols was seen as disloyal by many in other parts of Canada, parts of Canada where today those symbols have become proudly unifying for all of us.

Impatiently, ahead of many other Canadians, Quebecers who wished to be maître chez nous set a theme that has been grudgingly accepted by those in other parts of Canada long accustomed to the comfortable cocoon of being, first a British colony, and subsequently an American colony.

Quebecers have, perhaps not always even knowing it, given leadership to Canada. This is the time more than any other for the true sons and daughters of Quebec to stand forward and say to the rest of Canada: "follow us, let us together make the long-held dream of Canada, a greater reality." This is also the time for all Canadians to say to Quebecers that the tempering influences of our larger country have helped prevent a too insular approach. Canada helps us all, wherever we live in this country, avoid becoming too provincial.

Quebecers have not been alone, but have been partners with the rest of us, in giving a definition to the Canadian experience. Nous sommes tous les Canadiens.

In contrast with the United States and with France, which began with revolution and the deductive approach to unity that a revolution inculcates, as Northrop Frye has also observed, Canada has had a history of compromise and ad hoc agreements with a fairly constant attempt—whatever the lapses—to preserve the rights of both sides. As others have already said, in Canada today there are in fact many sides.

In this Speech from the Throne it was very important to hear the government speaking for those who in our society too often are voiceless, too often the silent Canadians.

Yesterday, for example, the references to programs for Canadians with disabilities is of fundamental importance for the kind of Canada we want to be, because 13.2 per cent of our fellow citizens have varying degrees of mental or physical disabilities. That is 3.3 million Canadians.

Likewise, the provisions for the aboriginal peoples, our first Canadians, in the whole new approach that is being taken are overdue and most deserving of support from all of us.

Third, the references to children, the most vulnerable of all in our society. Again, this is important because of their relative voicelessness in society and the importance of supporting those initiatives.

Fourth, Canadian workers and those who operate small businesses in our economy at this time. When combined with the recession there is a major restructuring under way in the Canadian economy, which points to the need for very, very careful action on that front, as was outlined this morning by the new Minister for International Trade.

On the large scale we can see in this speech where Canada is and, I believe, where Canada is going. That is, from the model of a 19th century nation state we are in transition to a 21st century international country. Within this transition all of us have our specific proposals and hopes, those things we would like to see and achieve.

For example, I have been advocating the formation of an International Green Cross, a new international agency that could do for the environment what the International Red Cross does for humans in times of calamity and disaster.

Another idea I want to continue working for in this session of Parliament and beyond is the formation of a national youth service corps for young Canadians at the end of the high school years, even before entering university, a period perhaps of 18 months. Canadians of that age from all parts of the country could work in several streams of a national youth service corps on a rotational basis around our country. One stream, perhaps, of military service, another stream of environmental service and a third stream of social activity and service, and so on. All of this would help to unify the country and build Canadian culture as a result of young Canadians having the opportunity to live for a while in New Brunswick, Quebec, Saskatchewan, B.C. and Newfoundland, and move around and see something of the silent promise this country so often hides from those who never stray beyond their own bailiwick.

These are the kinds of ideas I want to see accomplished. I know so many other members of Parliament and many other Canadians across our country have their projects, dreams and aspirations, but we can only accomplish those in a united and strong Canada. If we do not have a country, what do we have?

That is why this whole approach and the reforms talked about yesterday are so important.

Although the reference in the Speech from the Throne to our cultural accomplishments was only a passing one, I believe the greatest cultural accomplishment is the one that lies ahead of us. It is our greatest challenge to see a re-confederation on a cultural basis.

For example, consider education. The throne speech calls for a new culture of learning. Education is unquestionably the responsibility of provincial governments. Yet, no Canadian can ignore that over the past two decades it was the Canadian government that paid millions of dollars to train adults to be bilingual because the provinces operating the educational system for over a century with two large linguistic groups had largely fostered a debilitating unilingualism.

No Canadian can ignore the fact that today it is the Canadian government that must spend millions of dollars to overcome illiteracy and millions more for worker retraining, even though these, strictly speaking, are matters of provincial jurisdiction.

Provincial governments simply cannot clamour for more powers, judged against this record, until all of us who are Canadians define and defend Canadian national standards. Perhaps those Canadian standards can then be more effectively implemented within our regional and local communities. That, in my view, will be the essence of the constitutional changes which lie in the not too distant future.

The government's educational goals by the year 2000, just nine years off, as mentioned in the Throne Speech, include cutting illiteracy in half, doubling university graduates in mathematics, science and engineering, ensuring that 90 per cent of Canadians achieve high school graduation by age 25, and increasing employer funded training fourfold. That is a great Canadian national challenge. The even greater challenge is to all those who give cultural expression in whatever form to the Canadian experience.

Now is the time that all those people must come to the aid of their country and its definition, because that is fundamental to our future.

Since yesterday, the country has a clearly defined constitutional renewal plan. It has a timetable and it has clear leadership from the Prime Minister who unequivocally has stated, echoing the call of our Prime Ministers of yesteryear, that it is the Government of Canada alone which speaks for all Canadians in the coming debate over the redistribution of Canadian provincial powers and institutional change.

I would like to add an important proviso to that. While it is the Canadian government of all the governments which speaks for Canadians, we can and we must also go beyond governments directly to the people of Canada. When all the constitutional proposals for change have been made by the various committees and deliberative bodies, it must be the Canadian people themselves who decide. That is why the Speech from the Throne, calling for popular involvement in this process, is an historic milestone in our evolution as a true democracy.

The Speech from the Throne advises us that we in the House will be asked to approve enabling legislation to provide for greater participation of Canadian men and women in constitutional change. Tomorrow afternoon I will table again in the House my private members' bill, the Canadian Referendum and Plebiscite Act, so that it can be considered by our Parliament in concert with this stated intention of the government.

We Canadians have been a timid democracy for the main. We owe it to ourselves to more robustly embrace our authentic experience. We owe it to ourselves to involve and to trust the people in the processes of constitution making. Our cousins in Australia have not hesitated to do this. There constitutional amendments must be ratified by the people themselves. If it is not possible to ratify, as the Australians found in eight times out of thirty-two, then if you cannot persuade a majority of the people living in the country that the proposed changes to the fundamental rules of the country are worth making then they ought not to be made.

More important even than the numbers that are added up on the night of a national referendum or plebiscite is the educational process that we go through in the campaign, that intense period of focused debate and discussion, hearing the pros and cons, the self-definition that comes, as it did to Quebecers in 1980, as it did to Prince Edward Islanders three years ago on the fixed link issue, as it did to people in the Northwest Territories on the territorial division plebiscite. This is a great opportunity for all of us to join in direct partnership with the Canadian people. For that reason also, I am very proud, as a Canadian, to be supporting this Prime Minister and this government.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his address which I found to be sensitive. I know him to be a committed parliamentarian.

As I understood the address, he attempted to answer one fundamental question: Why is Canada breaking up or on the verge of break up? Clearly, if we are not careful, it is a possibility. Certainly we hear that a great deal throughout the whole nation.

I want to explore that very briefly. Is it because of the continued tensions between the English and French speaking people of this country? Is it because of the policy of two official languages? Is it because we have ignored for too long our aboriginal peoples, creating pressures that have become very difficult to deal with? We have been very slow in addressing them. Is it because we have been unable to accommodate those Canadians of origins other than aboriginal, French and English, who somehow feel as if they have been left on the periphery? Is it the recession? We all know that people are worried about their jobs. When we do not know what will happen tomorrow we sometimes become much more impatient and perhaps less tolerant. Is it possibly because of the breakdown of some of our east-west links? I do not say that in a partisan kind of way.

Decisions have been made with respect to VIA Rail so there is less travel, disruptions brought about by the Canada-U.S. trade agreement, and the imposition, and I understand the reasons, of the government's goods and services tax. Again I stress it is not a partisan statement. Is that contributing to this breakdown?

Perhaps just a final point, is it perhaps related to, in the final analysis, our inability to work with each other? I was rather surprised by a comment of the member for Yorkton—Melville, who said that my leader had indicated that he was against a constituent assembly. I found that really surprising because I had been the one who had explained to him what my leader had said which was very simply: "Here is what I would prefer, a parliamentary committee putting forth a package, consulting with Canadians, and then a referendum". He did say, and I heard him publicly, if a constituent assembly will do better work than a parliamentary committee, if it can be decided whether it should be elected or selected, how large it should be, what it's mandate should be, then he is quite prepared to look at it.

Is it because in the final analysis, when it comes down to the fundamentals, that we cannot in fact reach out and work out a solution that is the best for the country and the best for all Canadians.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has listed a number of factors: language, the position of aboriginal Canadians, those who feel they are left on the periphery, the economic recession, the east–west links that have perhaps broken down, taxation issues, and others. All of these are sand in the gears grinding down the good will and successful operation of our country.

Most of these serious issues are problems in our country because of the underlying difficulty that we have communicating with ourselves as Canadians. That is why I was emphasizing the cultural basis of what our Canadian experience is. When we have a more robust Canadian identity, we are proud and capable of sharing without feeling inhibited, without having that Canadian self–doubt that causes us to act like shy country cousins and step back, but actually to step forward and embrace one another from whatever part of the country we live in. Then these issues, be they economic recessions which occur in a cyclical pattern in a controlled capitalist economy like ours, or the taxation issues that bedevil us as Canadians want more services but we are finding that the cost of paying for them and servicing the debt is too burdensome to continue on its present footing, can be dealt with.

Those of us in this Canadian House of Commons and those who succeed us in subsequent generations are never going to lack any of these specific issues to debate. Debate is the turning of the gears that makes the sound of a country actually working. My concern is the deeper one that I alluded to throughout my remarks. That is the absence of a strong, positive, Canadian cultural experience that gives us the confidence to go forward with all that we are doing so well, with all that we can be so proud of as Canadians, and celebrate it, and salute one another for doing it.

That is why I pointed particularly to the province of Quebec and its phenomenal progress in recent decades because of the intrinsic strength that comes from that shared culture. That, achieved within Canada, shows us all the better way.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I found my colleague's speech very interesting. I would like to make a comment about the dynamism in Quebec.

I must remind my colleague that Quebec may be a little more dynamic than some other provinces because, in a way, we have learned to be suspicious of the federal government. Just remember the referendum of 1980 after which Quebec had to rely only on its own resources and on its own means. It is around that time that we began to show real entrepreneurship and that our businesses began to be really flourishing. That explains in part why Quebec is one of the provinces which can best cope with global and Pan–Canadian competitiveness.

I would really like to ask my colleague if he ever thought about the things that the provinces had in common. We talk here, in this House, of all the differences, of all the things that divide us. I too am an immigrant, in the sense that I chose Canada, but in my case, I chose Quebec. During my trips across Canada, I saw many things that we have in common. I can quote this example: in Quebec, we have a lot of caisses populaires, while in the West, they have credit unions or co–ops.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in Quebec we have also some mistrust towards Ottawa. This same mistrust exists in the West and in British Columbia, and it is a rightful, healthy mistrust. But it is not strong enough to destroy the country. I would even say that with this mistrust, we can still build a country.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the NDP member's comments concerning the diverse dimensions of our country. That is the true Canadian spirit.

He is pondering over the Canadian identity and the realities all Canadians must dial with. That is paradoxical but the common reality is found in the Canadian diversity. As George Bernard Shaw said it, paradoxes are truly realities.

I think that the challenge is for Canadians to experiment diversity all across the country. I can see how Quebecers that confine themselves to the Province of Quebec, to that sole environment and life experience, may develop a separatist mentality. As for Canadians living exclusively in the West who never know the incredible experience of visiting the province of Quebec or even Ontario and the Maritimes, they truly show a lack of Canadian spirit.

Even Canadians from the Maritimes with their great traditions and secular experience of closeness to nature are a great lesson for us in other parts of the country.

Thus, that is very simple and that is why I have suggested the creation of a national force of Canadian youth.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks by complimenting my colleague from Etobicoke—Lakeshore and saying that I am appalled that he has not been to the maritimes. I hope that he will go there very soon. We will be delighted—

An hon. member: He did not say that.

Ms. Clancy: He did not say that. I am sorry I thought he said he had not been to the maritimes.

Mr. Boyer: My mother was born there.

Ms. Clancy: That is your mother, Patrick.

Mr. Boyer: I have been to Nova Scotia.

Ms. Clancy: Oh, I misunderstood.

An hon. member: Invite him to come again.

Ms. Clancy: That is fine. We would be delighted to have you visit again and share our joint feelings of Canadianism.

When I began thinking about what I was going to say here this afternoon, it was impossible not to think back to the summer of 1990, the summer of our discontent.

It was the summer that saw the failure of Meech Lake, the forcing of our native peoples to the barricades, the looming recession and the terrible polarization that began among Canadians.

Here we are, the most favoured country on earth that has been blessed by God and lent to us privileged few who have the fortune to call ourselves Canadians. We have been and continue to be in great danger of spoiling our heritage and ruining our future.

Today, nearly a year after the summer of 1990 began, we are still a nation in distress. We are perhaps a nation with an illness of the heart. We are a people filled with fear and a nation no longer willing to trust. We are a nation that is frustrated and angry. It is a terrible picture, and it is one that must be changed.

When it comes to the future of Canada, it is absolutely clear to all of us that we must put aside our differences as politicians. We must work together on all sides of this Chamber to ensure that we are are not the parliamentarians who preside over the demise of Canada.

Now and again, I have been accused of being partisan. I accept that description, and I accept it with pride. Parliament is no place for women and men who are not passionate in their beliefs and who do not fight fiercely for their policies and principles.

Partisanship has been getting a bit of a bad name, and we, in this Chamber are all to blame to some degree for that. Partisanship is an honourable tradition in this House, as it is an honourable tradition in all the democracies of the world.

All Canadians are, indeed, better off because that tradition exists and because it is the very heart of our democracy. There are certain times—God knows that this is one of them—that this tradition must give way to a higher need.

In times of national peril, we must all remember that Liberals, New Democrats, Conservatives, Reformers or Independents are first, foremost and always Canadians.

[Translation]

We may be French Canadians, English Canadians, Chinese Canadians or Italian Canadians, but today, tomorrow and forever we are first and foremost Canadians.

[English]

It is our job to convince the people of Canada that we are a constituent assembly, that we represent ordinary Canadians and that, most important, we—every one of us in this Chamber—are responsible to ordinary Canadians. We are responsive to their concerns.

One of the privileges of being a member of Parliament is that it takes you out of your own province and to different parts of the country. It does not matter where I have been in the past year, whether I was in Winnipeg, Toronto, in my own maritimes or in the far west. I heard the same thing from Canadians.

They are afraid and they are uncertain. They look to us to give them a solution to this fear and this uncertainty. Each one of us is only important in that we are here to speak for our constituents.

My constituents, those in Halifax, as well as the people I have spoken to all over this country are saying essentially the same thing. They are saying: Restore our country. Restore our faith constitutionally and economically. Each one of us who is privileged to sit in this Chamber knows that to achieve this is our most important job.

Consequently, this morning when the hon. Leader of the Opposition spoke, he spoke in support of a number of the government initiatives. Indeed, we on this side of the House do support a number of the government initiatives. We support the idea of a joint committee of the House and Senate. I have some concerns about the timing. I wish it were sooner. The fact that it is taking place is a move in the right direction.

We support the idea that the government will put forward its own particular views. Whether we will at the time support all of those views remains to be seen. Nobody, even at the risk of danger for the country, is prepared to buy a pig in a poke. We are here to represent our constituents and ensure that this country not only survives but thrives. The alternative is too terrible to really contemplate. The decisions that we make here, the actions that we take here, will be for each one of us crucial to our own future and the future of the generations who come after us.

Also, in a very important light—and each one of us has this belief, I think, deep down in our hearts—we particularly do not want to leave these jobs having made Canada worse than it was before we came to them. Each one of us, whatever our region, our constituency, our background, whatever the policies that drive us to seek political office, whatever our political parties, comes here, I believe, with an absolute determination to improve this country, to make it a better place.

If we listen to that commonality which is shared with all Canadians, then we are taking the steps to reduce the hurt and the fear and the distrust that has built up over the years—not just this past year but in previous years. We are taking the first steps to create an atmosphere in Canada where we listen to each other, where we respond to each other and where we understand that in our diversity is also to be found our commonality.

I turn now to the second portion of my remarks. Although we must always remember our higher calling and we must work together to ensure the survival of our country, it is not our only job as parliamentarians. We must still carry our passionate partisanship to the specifics of government policies. It is to this that I speak now.

There are many aspects of yesterday's throne speech that are troubling. If this is the last throne speech before the dissolution, and it well could be, there were many things missing from yesterday's alleged blueprint for government action.

One of the things that I noticed missing was the lack of mention of anything relating to a national child care policy or a national child care program. We cannot forget for one instant that there are still a million latchkey children in this country and they are waiting for this government to do something to alleviate their situation. Indeed their problems and the problems of their parents, and in particular of their mothers, are problems that are as crucial in their own way as are the problems of the survival of the country.

A country that is to survive must be a country that looks after its weak, its young, its underprivileged. It is our job again, as federal members of Parliament, to pay attention to this, to respond to this and to react to this.

There were other things that were not mentioned. As a member from the Atlantic region, I was disturbed at no mention in the Speech from the Throne about the fishery. I was disturbed that there was little or no mention of anything remotely offering hope in the area of regional development. I was disturbed that there was little or no mention of anything relating to the whole question of transportation and the problems that we have in Atlantic Canada as a result of the slow destruction, or in some cases the quick destruction, of the transportation infrastructure.

I was disturbed by the pronouncements relating to post-secondary education, not disturbed by the spirit of the statement. The spirit of the statement is fine. Again, it is one of those things that every one of us can agree with. What disturbed me was the call for yet more discussion papers and not a call to action.

Our universities are suffering. Nowhere are they suffering more than in my region with the highest tuition fees, the lowest salaries and the poorest physical plants. These are institutions of higher learning that have a proud tradition and send people from the provinces of the Atlantic right across this country and across the world, people that we are proud of. This cannot go on as they are being choked by under-funding.

I was most disturbed by one line in the Speech from the Throne, and I refer to the translation: "and my government will appoint a blue ribbon panel of concerned Canadian men and women to inquire into the serious problem of violence against women in our society".

Since November when we struck the subcommittee on the status of women of the health and welfare committee, I have sat in that committee and listened to eloquent and moving testimony from witnesses from all across Canada about the increasing and horrifying state of violence against women in our civilized country, in our country where we are all talking about listening to each other and being responsive to each other's needs.

I believe that among the members of this House there is not a person who does not finally grasp the significance and the widespread existence of this problem. In my small province of Nova Scotia, and I have said this before, there have been six spousal murders of women in the past year. Those statistics alone are frightening.

We know the statistics in the city of Montreal in the year of the dreadful, horrible massacre of the young women engineering students, when 118 other women murdered. Those murders were almost unnoticed. We know that this goes on. We know that it occurs in too many households.

Women's groups, individual women, my party, and others have been calling for a royal commission on violence against women. We call for that royal commission because we know it is absolutely necessary to have both the scholarly evidence that a royal commission can call upon and the tremendous light of publicity that a royal commission will engender.

I fear from this one line in the Speech from the Throne that this is not what we are going to get. What I see here is something called a blue ribbon panel of concerned Canadian men and women. We do not need a blue ribbon panel. We need a panel that is rooted in experience and we need a royal commission.

Are you cutting me off, Mr. Speaker?

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the report into Canada's newest immigrant, the former Iraqi ambassador to the U.S., raises many, many unanswered questions.

Why did the ministers of external Affairs and employment and immigration resort to finger-pointing, blaming public servants who only did their job, thereby breaking away from that long-standing parliamentary principle of ministerial responsibility?

The Clerk of the Privy Council, the Prime Minister's deputy, rejected fast-tracking Al-Mashat's case, but that recommendation was ignored. Given that no ministers were supposedly involved, who gave the order to process Al-Mashat at break-neck speed? Was the Clerk of the Privy Council interviewed by government investigators? Three government departments were involved in the case yet the ministers were never informed, and what of the unfair treatment of the thousands of potential immigrants to this country waiting years to be processed?

Yes, it is more than a coincidence. Only a full inquiry will provide Canadians with some answers.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the throne speech this week was significant not just in the things it said, but also in things it did not say.

It did not contain even a token announcement of a national child care strategy as past speeches have. It did not contain any measures to address the tragedy of child poverty in Canada, and it did not contain any measures to get people back to work.

This government and this House made a commitment to end child poverty in Canada by the year 2000. If we are to achieve this, we must be working now to make the changes and set up a timetable for action. Unfortunately this government seems unprepared to make concrete commitments.

But the throne speech did mention a review of policies relating to the family. Tory review is a scary concept to most Canadian families and it may mean elimination of family allowances as some Conservative MPs have demanded.

This government should abandon its band-aid solutions to child poverty and start dealing with the real issues such as pay equity, an adequate minimum wage, adequate affordable housing for all Canadians, a national child care strategy, and full employment policies to get Canadians back to work.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I know there will be little debate among Canadians about the old axiom that knowledge is power, or about the fact that education and training are crucial keys to future prosperity in Canada. Yet one of the most profound and disturbing revelations in the throne speech is that Canada has not been getting full value for the very substantial current investments being made in our search for knowledge, skill, and innovation.

I feel sure it will come as some surprise to many Canadians that the federal government alone, both directly and indirectly, is now spending close to $11 billion annually in support of education and training. These priorities are high dollar items in provincial budgets as well.

Unfortunately, however, the returns do not measure up. The high school dropout rate stands at 30 per cent and functional illiteracy among adults is equally bad, to state only two examples.

Education is a provincial responsibility in Canada but, jurisdictional sensitivities aside, there is a national interest in nurturing a new culture of learning and in developing co-operative strategies for attaining better educational results. This is a mission to which the government is committed and it is one in which all Canadians will want to join.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, since this government came to power in 1984 it has deregulated the trucking industry in Canada and implemented a free trade agreement. These two moves are systematically destroying the Canadian trucking industry.

Twelve thousand Canadian truckers lost their jobs last year. Others have been losing their trucks and their homes due to United States truckers operating in Canada, yet this government expects them to compete against United States firms whose costs that are about 25 per cent less than those in Canada. Fuel costs are less in the United States, interest rates are lower, repair costs are less, and the trucks themselves cost far less in the United States.

There is no level playing field, and yet this minister stated in the House yesterday that he is waiting for seven studies. Canadian truckers do not need studies; they need action now, government action to save their industry, their jobs and their homes.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, when Canadians think of the great national institutions which bind our country together, they think of the CBC, Air Canada and VIA Rail. They seldom, if ever, think of our political parties and their leaders. And yet a national political party and its leader must strive to find policies that will unite as many Canadians as possible by focusing on what we have in common in spite of the language, racial, regional, social and economic differences that often bitterly divide us.

The membership of a truly national party reflects as accurately as possible the demographic composition of our entire country. The compromises made by political parties, frequently considered unprincipled, are usually made in the name of the great principle of Canadian unity.

The truly national political party has been the only effective institution that we have been able to devise so far for overcoming the deep cleavages among us. It is one of Canada's greatest national inventions.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Communications remains silent while every Canadian with a telephone has a stake in the enormous corporate showdown for control of our former Crown corporation, the international telephone company, Teleglobe Canada, and its parent, Memotec Data.

To protect consumers from abuse of market power and unfair rate increases, this government in 1987 passed a law preventing Canada's large telephone companies from controlling Teleglobe.

In the interest of Canadian consumers, I ask: Does the government still oppose corporate concentration in this sector? Is the minister the anonymous "government source" who today said that Ottawa would block any changes to Memotec? How is he answering to the BCE chairman who is asking for Ottawa's permission to get his hands on Teleglobe.

While some experts say Teleglobe could fall under control this week without prior CRTC approval as is required by law, we ask: What is the minister doing to see that the letter of the law is respected and followed?

In the interest of every single Canadian who uses a telephone, where does the minister stand? What action is the minister taking to protect a fair telecommunications marketplace?

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, May 5, a crowd of Dutch people gathered at Groesbeek Canadian War Cemetery to pay tribute to those Canadian soldiers who died so that they might be free.

The Dutch do not forget their Canadian liberators of years past. Each year they meet at one of the three Canadian war cemeteries in the Netherlands. The graves of our young Canadian soldiers are covered with flowers picked by school children.

To the Dutch it makes no difference if we come from Alberta, Quebec or Prince Edward Island, to the Dutch we are all Canadians. We are the ones who liberated their country in 1945.

At a time when Canadian unity is threatened, when Canadians are searching, we would do well to look at ourselves as others do and to count our blessings.

Canadians have much to be proud of.

BILL C-79

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on the issue of the unusual procedures that were used to proclaim Bill C-79 last week.

By avoiding the normal procedures that are there for proclaiming legislation and avoiding the safeguards and the checks that are in place for that sole reason, the government has laid itself open to an accusation of abuse of power. The government's actions have left the impression that the timing of the proclamation was due to a court case or to an investigation.

I call upon the minister responsible, the government House leader, to rise in this House and list all the information from the MPs involved, their solicitors, or any other persons who acted on their behalf with any member of this cabinet.

THE LATE HON. RICHARD BENNETT HATFIELD

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Although Richard Hatfield has passed from this world, Mr. Speaker, that for which he stood will never pass.

Richard Hatfield was an active participant in Canadian politics dedicated to a strong and united New Brunswick, a strong and united Canada.

He said so simply, as was his way, in an article written for New Brunswick Day:

> It doesn't matter where you come from if you call New Brunswick my place/mon foyer. We have more in common with each other than any other peoples in the world.

He never wavered in his commitment toward that end and now that we are facing perhaps one of the greatest challenges to the future of Canada, his insight and wisdom will be sorely missed.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, Canada has lost a friend.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, a delegation of three representatives of the Independent Truckers Spouses Association, led by Mrs. Janet Keusch of Alexandria, Ontario in my riding, were here today to attend a previously scheduled meeting with the Minister of Transport.

However, when time came for the meeting, the minister's staff claimed that no meeting had ever been scheduled and of course that the minister was too busy to listen to the plight of the women and children, the spouses of the truckers.

What is the Minister of Transport afraid of? Why does he refuse to meet with these women and children? I can only conclude that the minister is ashamed of his government's policies.

I call upon the minister to meet with the Independent Truckers Spouses Association immediately after Question Period. They will be waiting for him.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne, the federal government suggests that national unity would bring economic recovery. This is just hogwash. The facts speak for themselves. The government extolled the virtues of discipline and moderation in provincial spending. Result: Ontario's deficit tripled and reached $10 billion. While the management of the economy has to be decentralized , the government suggests centralizing it. Inflation is up in Ontario. The federal monetary policy is knocking out the provincial economies.

So far, unity has produced the following results: inconsistency and recessions. Now we should be looking for more unity. It is clear that this will only produce even more inconsistency and less economic efficiency.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, let us take a look at what the interest rates have been since 1979. The rate was 13 percent in September 1979; 12.5 percent on August 25, 1980; 22.75 percent on August 7, 1981; 16 percent on August 20, 1982; 13 percent on August 10, 1984; 10.25 percent on August 23, 1985; 9.75 percent on July 18. 1986; 10 percent on July 31, 1987; 11.25 percent on August 26, 1988; 14.25 percent on August, 1990. And now, Mr. Speaker, it is down to 9.22 percent.

CANADA HEALTH ACT

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the western finance ministers have issued a report that calls for the dismantling of our national medicare program. The report demands that the federal government stop all cash payments for health and instead transfer tax points to the provinces.

The report sets out new program criteria such as affordability, efficiency, flexibility and abandons the Canada Health Act standards, public administration, comprehensiveness, universality, portability and accessibility.

Medicare is one of Canada's most treasured programs that holds this country together. I call upon the new minister of health, in the name of national unity, to state clearly that his government is committed to a national medicare program including federal funding and national standards.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, for some time this House has been treated to the featured corporate welfare bum of the month by the member for Nickel Belt.

Which NDP premier did not have the guts to tax the so-called corporate welfare bum pronounced by the member for Nickel Belt?

Whose NDP deficit is now $10 billion?

An hon. member Bob Rae.

Mr. Holtmann Which NDP premier increased his deficit by 300 per cent in one year?

Some hon. members Bob Rae.

Mr. Holtmann Which NDP deficit amounts to $1,000 per person in this province?

An hon. member: Bob Rae.

Mr. Holtmann Whose NDP economics on a federal scale would create a $90 billion federal deficit?

An hon. member: Bob Rae.

Mr. Holtmann Who is spending like a drunken sailor today so that our children can pay his bills tomorrow?

Some hon. members: Bob Rae.

Mr. Holtmann Therefore, is the NDP premier from Ontario, Bob Rae, not eligible for the political welfare bum of the month?

THE LATE MICHAEL B. KIRBY

Mr. Speaker: It is my sad duty to advise the House of the untimely death on April 23, 1991 of Michael B. Kirby, one of our table officers since 1979. A parliamentary employee for 25 years, Michael died of cancer after a short illness at the age of 51.

Most of us at one time or another have turned to Michael for procedural advice, for interpretation of the Standing Orders, or for information about precedent and practice. His counsel was always wise and thoughtful and usually given with a refreshing mix of Irish wit and charm. He was often seen standing beside the Chair offering your Speaker advice or guidance and he loved as well to recount stories.

A particular favourite of his, was the incident where a noted British Speaker was presiding over a particularly heated procedural row in the Chamber and sent a note to the clerk asking for advice. And, as Michael said it, the clerk sent a note back which said: "If I were you, Mr. Speaker, I should proceed with caution".

[Translation]

Mr. Kirby was a man of sound advice and it was at their own risk that Chairmen would ignore his advice. His dedication and loyalty to Parliament were unequivocal and were always evident in all the functions he performed, be it as committee clerk, head of Journals Directorate, principal clerk at the Table Research

Branch, principal clerk of the Public Bills Office or Table officer and Chair advisor.

[English]

For those of us who also have had the privilege of having Michael as a friend, his personal warmth and friendship and his unfailing generosity and good humour will be surely missed.

To his wife, Sylvie, and to his family, may I convey on behalf of all members and staff of the House of Commons my very deepest sympathy.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The first duty of the Prime Minister is to promote the unity of Canada for the benefit of all Canadians. It is also my duty, and it should be the duty of all members of this Parliament.

How is the unity of Canada being promoted by asking Parliament to remain in the dark until September about the constitutional proposals of this government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no one is asking Parliament to remain in the dark. The House just came back 48 hours ago. The throne speech debate has yet to conclude. The leader of the NDP and I will be speaking this afternoon and there will be a vote tonight followed by other involvement.

There has been a recommendation from both sides of the House to proceed with care and to ensure to the extent humanly possible that the constitutional initiative is a success. The House normally would rise on June 21, return in early September, and that appears to the government, and indeed to many members of the House, to be an appropriate time to begin the formal sittings of a joint parliamentary committee.

That in no way precludes that committee from spending a very productive summer of work in anticipation of the beginning of its public hearings.

Therefore I want to assure my hon. friend that while we want to make haste, we want to make haste in a prudent way to ensure the success of this constitutional initiative.

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is again directed to the Prime Minister.

It is easy to start negotiations on the Constitution but very difficult to get positive results. We on this side of the House believe that there are a number of important deadlines that must be met and that time is of the essence.

Why doesn't the Prime Minister want to appoint this committee of the House of Commons and the Senate immediately, so that it can start listening to representations by Canadians, based on the specific document which will be submitted to them? They have had these papers for ages. The political will must be there to start immediately, so that by next spring, we will have a solution and will be able to meet any deadlines Quebec might have and avoid backing the country against the wall again, which would be disastrous for the future of this country.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to understand why my hon. friend is in such a hurry.

After Meech last summer, all members of this House asked for more intense consultations with the public. That is why we set up the Citizens Forum and the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee.

These committees will not report until July 1. This means that if we want to be consistent, we should wait until the reports on these massive consultations have been tabled before proceeding with a government initiative.

If the government were to proceed otherwise, I imagine the Leader of the Opposition would accuse me, and rightly so, of proceeding unilaterally, without waiting for the committee reports. We want to wait until the committees are ready, we will analyse their recommendations, and we will be ready to proceed, in the national interest, on September 1.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have been asking since December that we proceed quickly in this matter. We asked that the committee not be limited only to the amending formula but that it hear the views of Canadians on a broader basis. The Prime Minister said no.

It is, in my view, extremely important to give all Canadians the opportunity to participate in a referendum where the Canadian people will be able to say "yes" to each other, and in particular to say "yes" to Quebec. Will the Prime Minister give a guarantee to this House, as he indicated to the press this morning, that he is contemplating having a referendum? Why does he not say right away that there will be a referendum on reconciliation in 1992, before the Quebec deadline?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend should do me the courtesy, if he is going to quote me, of quoting me accurately. In respect of a referendum this morning the transcript reveals the following: "Mulroney: I can see a referendum being helpful in a number of ways. I can see a referendum being most unhelpful if it were to divide the country and if we thought that were to be the case, we wouldn't use it".

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the ministers of external affairs and employment and immigration in their report admitted that a memorandum had been sent by senior officials of the Department of External Affairs to the minister's office, but that no appropriate action was taken based upon that memorandum. Those ministers then took the unprecedented step of publicly identifying and blaming a senior official for that serious mistake.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: What has happened to the long-established principle of ministerial responsibility, which is the very cornerstone of our parliamentary system? I want to ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to release all the documents, and especially the memorandum sent to the minister, so that Canadians can know exactly what advice was tendered? I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will now show some leadership and ask the responsible ministers in this case to step aside until a proper inquiry can be had into this very serious issue?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would point out first of all that what transpired yesterday was exactly what the Minister of Employment and Immigration had said last week would be forthcoming, which was a report on what had happened.

In terms of revealing the names of officials who may have been involved in this, I would point out that it has been past practice very often to use the titles of officials who have been involved in any particular case. In this case, there were only two. From the titles that were used, that can only be one person.

Let me also say that in terms of ministerial responsibility, there is a parallel with the contempt of court case against the then Secretary of State for External Affairs and the then Minister of Employment and Immigration concerning ministerial knowledge when they did not have the information at their disposal. The court said they did not have a legal responsibility.

The cases are not totally parallel, but they are sufficiently similar, I believe, to give us a precedent.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the issue before the House is not a question of civil liability in a court, it is the question of the accountability of ministers for their actions, their officers and their departments. That is the issue.

I want to ask the Prime Minister specifically, because this is in his own office. It is quite clear. It was admitted in the report yesterday that Mr. Paul Tellier, who is the chief public servant and who reports directly to the Prime Minister, knew about the entry of Mr. Al-Mashat several weeks before he was give final approval.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he was informed by Mr. Tellier. If he was not informed, why was Mr. Tellier's judgment not called into question? If the Prime Minister was informed, what did he do about it?

I want to also ask why the Secretary of State for External Affairs was not informed by memorandum when, in fact, he was clearly in Ottawa, not travelling in the Middle East, as has been reported.

In other words, the government's whole case is full of holes, omissions and a bucket full of whitewash. Surely the Prime Minister understands that if we are going to have the credibility of government at stake, he has to have a public inquiry into this case. It stinks like a sewer hole.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend could have perhaps saved himself some degree of anxiety by reading the very complete report that was submitted yesterday.

An hon. member: He read it.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, he clearly did not. In regard to the specific question that he asked, indeed, Paul Tellier, on March 11, was informed that the Department of Immigration did not support the issuance of a minister's permit, nor any accelerated processing of Mr. Al-Mashat's application. The Clerk of the Privy Council was informed and concurred with that judgment. The Privy Council advised the Department of External Affairs that it was opposed to the issuance of this visa. Notwithstanding the firm opposition of Mr. Tellier, Mr. Al-Mashat was admitted on March 30, and we were advised on April 30. These are precisely the points that were brought forward by the ministers yesterday.

There were administrative errors made in the system for which apologies have been conveyed and accepted. It was an administrative error, no more and no less. There is no attempt to whitewash or to denigrate anyone. It was a simple administrative error that was made, acknowledged by the public servants involved and accepted by the responsible ministers.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In the throne speech on Monday, the government stated that the economy was inextricably linked to national unity. In that throne speech, there is talk about employment and the need for a low interest rate.

In the throne speech, Canadians were promised 2.5 million new jobs by the year 2000, by the government's own projections, taking into account the growth in the labour force. This will mean that the unemployment rate in the year 2000 will still be around 10 per cent.

Is this government saying that it accepts a 10 per cent rate of unemployment and that such a rate, which now means 1.5 million unemployed, is necessary in the Conservatives' view of what constitutes competitiveness?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that of course is no. What we are seeking to do is to reduce the number of unemployed. From 1984 until the recession hit, 1.6 million new jobs were created in Canada and Canada led the industrialized world in the creation of durable full-time jobs.

We want to replicate that in the next number of years. The process that we propose to follow is one of lower interest rates and greater investment in a non-inflationary climate. It is the only way that durable jobs can be created.

We do not accept the idea of a 10 per cent unemployment rate. In point of fact, when we formed the government in 1984, the unemployment rate in Canada was 11.7 per cent. We reduced it to 7.3 per cent, and we hope to do better in the upcoming cycle.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, despite what the Prime Minister says, the projections in their own throne speech indicated that there will still be a 10 per cent unemployment rate in the year 2000. This means more food banks, more people on welfare, and it will not mean Canadians working.

Today, Statistics Canada reports that same-day trips to the United States by Canadians are up 25 per cent. It is clear that Canadian consumers and Canadian jobs are heading south of the border. The trucking industry has reached a desperate situation. We need only go outside this House to hear what truckers are saying about their situation and the effects of this government's policies on their livelihood.

Ask Canadians across this country, and they will tell you that this government's economic policies are not working. They did not want to hear more of the same in the throne speech.

Will the Prime Minister stop pursuing policies which are clearly making Canada uncompetitive and start putting in policies that will get Canadian families back to work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have, of course, a great deal of sympathy for all people in Canada who are confronted with rising costs that make the sale of goods and services and products of various kinds less competitive.

My hon. friend points to the fact trips to the United States border are up dramatically. That probably has been up dramatically since the Ontario budget because with the budget in Ontario gasoline is 14.3 cents a litre, whereas in Michigan and Ohio it is 4.6 cents and 3.1 cents.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The government is well aware that it is this government's policies of deregulation and the trade deal that have directly led to the state of the truckers and of the loss of jobs.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne the government said that economic recovery will depend on whether interest rates go down. However, according to a report published in February, at the height of the recession, the Governor of the Bank of Canada intervened directly to prevent a drop in interest rates. Could the new Minister of Finance give the House the assurance today that he personally had a meeting with the Governor of the Bank of Canada to advise him that the government's policy is to continue to lower interest rates?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, interest rates have come down by five percentage points since the high of last year, and we hope that trend will continue. That trend will continue, providing we attack the underlying causes of inflation, the inflationary pressures, the inflationary expectations and as long as we can keep our fiscal house in order.

I can assure the hon. member that her concurrence with the Government of Ontario in chalking up a huge deficit with complete and total disregard for fiscal responsibility is not the course of action that this government wants to take. I must suggest to her that it is not the proper course for any province or any government to take in these circumstances.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. If the Al-Mashat fiasco is nothing but an administrative error, there should be no fear of an open inquiry. In the report to the immigration and external affairs ministers issued yesterday by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning this case, we are told that the investigators interviewed "a number of the officials who had been directly involved".

My question is a simple one: Who were these officials? Which officials were not interviewed? Why were they not interviewed? Did the Clerk of the Privy Council tell the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I have already indicated to my hon. friend that the Clerk of the Privy Council was advised of the possibility and he indicated his disapproval with the issuance of a visa to that individual. He conveyed that directly to the department.

Notwithstanding the firm disapproval of the Government of Canada, the visa was issued. When he arrived in Canada with the visa that ought not to have been issued, the Clerk of the Privy Council, again, and I were subsequently advised. In other words, the Clerk—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Indeed. I was advised a month after he got here. We should have been advised by the public servants in advance because Mr. Tellier, speaking for the Privy Council Office, said "do not admit him". Notwithstanding that, he was admitted. That was in violation of the procedures of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, on March 11 the director general of case management in employment and Immigration informed external affairs and the Privy Council—and we have heard this—that Mr. Al-Mashat's application should not be fast-tracked.

If he was so concerned that he called the Privy Council Office, why did he not inform his own minister, why did not those briefed immediately brief the external affairs minister, and why did Mr. Tellier not tell the Prime Minister immediately?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is missing a very key point. Of all the questions that are being asked around here on this issue, the key point is this: ministers were not informed. That was the error in judgment, not that Mr. Al-Mashat was admitted to the country, not that Mr. Al-Mashat was admitted on a fast-track. The key point was that ministers were not informed. That is the problem with this case. That is why we are saying there were errors in judgment, and that is what the report that we called for and was made public showed.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, we know that in late February the security intelligence service conducted an investigation to determine whether "Mr. Al-Mashat was a valuable source of intelligence". Mr. Reid Morden, the director of the security intelligence service, was aware of it. Will the government not admit that the director of the security intelligence service, Mr. Reid Morden, informed the former Solicitor General prior to Mr. Al-Mashat arriving in Canada?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there is a committee which meets to discuss matters such as my hon. friend refers to. The membership of the committee changes from time to time. Whoever is familiar with that particular file sits on the committee. All the proper procedures were taken.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, this so-called comprehensive report that the government issued yesterday was strangely silent when it came to the role of the former Solicitor General and the role of the director of the security intelligence service. I put the question to the present Solicitor General: Exactly what was the role of Mr. Reid Morden, the director of the security intelligence service, and when did he inform the former Solicitor General?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the role of the director of the security intelligence service and CSIS in these matters is to examine the situation and determine whether or not the individual involved is of any use to Canada in terms of intelligence matters.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to come back to the Solicitor General.

In view of the concern of Canadians about the extent to which procedures were violated, and the extent to which a gentleman whose record is documented in a report which I received this morning written by him which includes, among other things, the statement that members of Amnesty International are bigots who make a noise and: "I would like to see one victim of chemical weapons inside Iraq".

In view of that kind of documented background, I want to ask the Solicitor General once again if he will clarify at what point was his predecessor as Solicitor General informed by CSIS that Al-Mashat was seeking to enter Canada? Was that before the visa was issued or afterwards? When was it?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is my information that the previous Solicitor General was informed after Mr. Al-Mashat entered Canada.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister.

I want to ask the Prime Minister first of all, why is it that the director of CSIS did not inform the Solicitor General about this very serious matter?

Second, if the Prime Minister is not concerned that the former Minister of Employment and Immigration, who found out about this matter on April 16, did not do any follow-up inquiry whatsoever other than issuing what she called a sharp note after being scraped off the ceiling, and did not even bother telling the next minister of immigration that this was a problem, does the Prime Minister not recognize that Canadians do not accept this explanation? They do not accept civil servants being blamed, and they do not accept this cover-up of ministerial responsibility.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would look at the report which he has in hand, he will first of all see the dates on which CSIS made a routine report to officials and thought that was the end of it.

If the hon. member is suggesting that a sharp note to a department is not sufficient, let me just point out to the hon. member that also in this report it indicates that there was follow-up.

My department and the people who work for me have always recognized that if I send a note, I expect some follow-up. There was in this case.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The trucking industry in our country is taking a brutal beating since the government introduced deregulation, thereby putting our Canadian truckers on an unequal and impossible footing in comparison to their American counterparts.

Since the Prime Minister has spoken so proudly in the past of having been a truck driver himself, when will the government stop hiding behind the studies? Will the Prime Minister request the Minister of Transport to at least have the decency of meeting with truckers. Together we can hammer out real and immediate solutions so that Canadian truckers can once again begin to earn a living, just like the Prime Minister did a few years ago?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that it is precisely to take away from the discussion the type of things he says are not exact.

For instance, he says that the effects of the government deregulation has had a very negative impact on some aspects of the trucking industry. He forgets to say that the federal fuel excise tax in Canada is one-third less than in the U.S.

He also forgets to mention that the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax has reduced the tax on fuel by 2.5 cents per litre. He also forgets to mention that the recent decision of the Ontario government to increase the tax on fuels by 2 cents a litre immediately and another 2 cents in January is also increasing the problem of the trucking industry.

We did not decide to begin the studies and analyses just for the fun of it. It was understood by all stakeholders in the trucking industry; the provinces, the Canadian Trucking Association, the unionized truckers, the Coalition of Independent Owner-Operators and federal departments, that we would form a task force to examine all aspects of the trucking industry in Canada. That task force decided to have seven studies. They are not frivolous studies. Some of the studies are on the effect of taxation on Canada-U.S. competitiveness, assessment of Canada-U.S. trucking cabotage, comparison of Canada and U.S. trucking costs in transborder—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister can find another way to provide that information. The hon. member for York West.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. It has become painfully obvious that this minister does not understand, or appreciate, the absolute terrible state facing Canadian truckers and their families across the country.

How can the minister and this government expect the trucking industry to survive when Canadian truckers in increasing numbers have lost their rigs, their earnings, their profits, their homes and their dignity to the unfettered American competition? Does he not think it is time that he came out from behind these studies and studied the problems facing real Canadians, that he sit down and get some real solutions so that together our industry may have a chance of not only competing but of surviving?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, contrary to the customary way of doing things by members on the other side, we believe in the notion that before we can arrive at solutions we must identify the real problems. This is what all the stakeholders have decided to do, not just the government itself. They have agreed that before we can discuss things intelligently, we must have the facts.

We have met with the Coalition of Independent Owner-Operators group that represents 7,000 members. I have met with representatives of the Canadian Trucking Association. I have been open to discussions with all authorized representatives of the trucking industry. We sympathize very much with the truckers. We are trying to find a complete and permanent solution rather than to try to have temporary solutions, which is the favourite subject of members on the other side.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. Already in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk three trucking firms have collapsed under the weight of this government's policies.

The minister fails to realize that bankers will not wait until he finishes wall-papering his office with studies. Truckers are losing their jobs. They are losing their trucks and they are losing their homes. It is completely in the power of this House to do something about it. What is the minister waiting for?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the member was not listening when I gave the previous answer. This matter was the subject of very serious discussions among all the parties involved last June. At that time we established a process of having seven studies that will establish a level playing field. These studies are in preparation and will be given to the task force shortly. At that time we will know exactly what are the complete problems, the hypothetical solutions and we will take that report very seriously.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I was listening to the minister. The minister said that no action would be taken by the government until all the studies were complete. I have a letter from the former Minister of Transport and it says in it: "I have no intention however of waiting until all the studies are completed to take action".

Will the minister now honour the words of his predecessor and take action today to help these Canadian truckers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that one of the main actions we took to improve the lot of the trucking industry was to remove the manufacturers' sales tax of 13.5 per cent. But we could only do it after a year and a half of bickering by the Liberal Party and their friends in the Senate.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. An environmental disaster has been discovered in Mercier, Quebec. It is clear that Laidlaw-Tricil broke the law. It is clear that this company is an environmental criminal and that the contamination at the Mercier site is only the tip of the iceberg. Will the minister apply the sanctions provided under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act? Will the government act now?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member, I was informed that containers had been discovered on a site, a lot in Mercier. The hon. member is probably aware that a memorandum of understanding between the federal and provincial governments provides for clean-ups of unsupervised sites. Now it seems that this particular site, as the hon. member implied in his question, belongs to a company known as Laidlaw which has started clean-up procedures. I may remind the hon. member that under Quebec law, the company may be charged. Meanwhile, we will let the investigation proceed and testing continue, and subsequently, Mr. Speaker, we will take appropriate action, if necessary.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, Quebec is sick and tired of being exploited by environmental criminals who unlawfully use the provinces as a dump for dangerous products. My question is directed to the Solicitor General. We have already seen Quebec used as a dump for toxic and dangerous products. We saw it in Saint-Jean, we saw it in Saint-Basile and we see it again today in Mercier. Is the minister prepared to order the RCMP to conduct an investigation of course, with the co-operation of the Sûreté du Québec to examine the whole issue of transportation inside and outside Quebec under the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you and the members of this House that we share the concern of opposition members and the hon. member who just spoke about the transportation of toxic wastes of any kind. However, I may remind the hon. member that it is also important to avoid making general and sometimes unfounded allegations, and that the truth and the facts must be respected. Actually, since I became a member of this government, I have been impressed by the fact that there has been very little political partisanship on environmental issues. There is a tendency to avoid such tactics.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that as far as I know, governments have never taken lightly situations involving the transportation of toxic waste, and that when violations were discovered, they were thoroughly investigated. That is what is happening today in the case of the Mercier site, which was mentioned yesterday on the news and in the media. My department intends monitor the situation very closely, as has always has been its policy in the past, and we will also continue to monitor any similar allegations.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the minister of immigration knew about the Al-Mashat matter on April 12; indeed, she reprimanded her department on April 16, but her colleague, the minister of external affairs says he did not know until May 7.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Could he tell us today why the minister of immigration did not tell of this matter to the minister of external affairs?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the then minister of immigration found out on April 16. The memo was dated April 12 and reached the then minister on April 16. A note was sent back to the department saying that this was not to happen again and looking for follow up. At that point there was no particular reason to inform another minister because there was no way of knowing where the error had taken place.

But what is clearly important is that action was called for on that date, but the report was not made before the transfer of responsibilities to another minister.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I know it is astounding to the Canadian people that there was no reason to tell the then minister of external affairs about an ambassador from a country with whom we had been at war a scant two weeks before. More important, the minister learned, as she says now, of the Al-Mashat matter on April 16 and allegedly hit the roof. But no investigation began into this matter until May 8, the day after the press broke the story. Inquiring minds would like to know what was the hold up.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, inquiring minds normally take advantage of the material that is put in front of them. As the hon. member will see in the report, there was follow up within the Department of Immigration and that there is, indeed, a note in the Case Management Branch on May 1.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The government has attempted to convince parliamentarians and, through Parliament, Canadians that no minister had any idea whatsoever about the arrival in Canada and request for asylum by Mr. Al-Mashat. That is what the government has claimed.

The government made clear in its report published very recently on this whole affair that a memorandum was sent to the office of the former Secretary of State for External Affairs on March 8. This memorandum requested that the minister be informed of the request by Al-Mashat for residency in Canada.

The minister said in her public statement yesterday: "The one memorandum sent to the minister's office via the senior departmental assistant prior to the arrival did not clearly seek ministerial view or concurrence". We are being told that because the memo was less than crystal clear the ministers are absolved.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister table that memo and make it public? Let Parliament judge whether or not ministers were informed of this matter.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as usual we are getting very mixed signals from people in the opposition. On the one hand they say that names should not have been released and now they are asking for more names. I do not understand what they want. They do not like the names we released, they want other names. Maybe that is what the difficulty is.

The point is that what is laid out in here was a report to deputy ministers by two neutral people within the Public Service who entered into this issue very carefully. My successor, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, had said a report would be made. A report was made. It is as complete as it can be and it tells people what they need to know.

The critical point which the hon. member continues to miss is that ministers were not told. That was the error, that was what was wrong and that is why ministers themselves were not pleased.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, what we are looking for is not names, we are looking for the truth.

The fact of the matter is that the senior political staff in the office of the minister of external affairs were informed. A memo was sent. The senior public servant, who reports directly to the Prime Minister, Mr. Tellier, was informed. It is incredible that when the ambassador to a country with whom we were at war seeks asylum in Canada, no minister claims to know about it. We simply do not believe it. Canadians do not believe it. Make the memo public and let us judge for ourselves. Put an end to this whitewash and this hanging of innocent public servants.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the report speaks for itself. The report goes into some considerable detail in a very precise form as to what happened during the process of this incident.

• (1500)

I may say as well that in a different case where the two ministers did know in advance that someone was seeking to come to Canada, that was turned down. Therefore, that should have set the stage for any future people who chose to come to Canada under similar circumstances. I do not know what else ministers can be expected to do.

RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Between January 1, 1989 and February 10, 1990, 81 out of the 174 routes serving Abitibi were eliminated, 69 of them for lack of available crews or trains.

My question is this: Can the minister tell us today why the president and the management of VIA Rail have deliberately cut passenger service in Abitibi on several occasions to the detriment of both patrons and employees of VIA Rail?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to praise again the hon. member for Abitibi for his unrelenting concern for his area and all that affects it.

I also want to tell him, as he probably knows already, that VIA Rail is a Crown corporation with its own administrative structure. I can confirm, however, that the Abitibi line is under examination by VIA Rail because of the infrastructure problems it has experienced in recent months. We are still monitoring the situation through, as I said, the administrative structure of the corporation.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I am honestly not quite sure whether this is a point of order or a question of privilege.

I was the seventh member on this side to make a statement today. Out of 12 statements, only five were for this party. I was listed to be the second person from this side to ask a question. Only one question got on. As a backbencher, I think we deserve better than that in terms of being able to ask questions and make statements.

Mr. Speaker: I accept the hon. member's intervention. I know that all hon. members would want me to do the very best I can to make sure that the count is fair on both sides of the House.

PRIVILEGE

ORDER PAPER QUESTION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of personal privilege arising from a response to a question on the Order Paper, pursuant to Standing Order 48(2). I provided notice to the Chair on April 15 of this year.

This is the earliest possible opportunity for me to raise this point of personal privilege.

On April 11 last, I placed a question on the Order Paper for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship. The question dealt with the involvement of a Dr. Ralph Agard and the establishment of a race relations network. This question was subdivided into eight questions.

I believe that my personal privilege as a member of this House was violated because of a response provided by the minister. My question asked whether Dr. Agard had received any contracts, either directly or indirectly, since April 1, 1985, other than for a feasibility study for the network. The minister's response was "No."

It has been brought to my attention that this response was incorrect and that the minister was probably aware of this fact at the time he answered my questions.

On June 9, 1989, the minister announced three race relations initiatives. The second, according to the press release from the minister's office, was the commissioning of International Briefing Associates to develop a national action plan to propose specific concrete measures that would lead to improved police–minority relations.

I provided the Chair with a copy of this press release. I have also provided a copy of a discussion paper summarizing the consultations carried out by this organization. It is clear from this document that Dr. Agard benefited directly from a contract with the Ministry of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship. This is in direct contradiction to the response of the question that I placed on the Order Paper.

How am I to perform my duties as a member of this Parliament if the responses ministers of the Crown provide to questions are inaccurate? Had the minister taken the time since he provided the response to correct this error, I would not have risen on this point of privilege. He has not done so.

Mr. Speaker, I urge you to assist me in finding a means to remedy this situation.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fairly obvious to the House and to the Chair that this is not a case of privilege. As the Chair is well aware, there is never a case of privilege when there is a matter of dispute over an answer.

The Speaker is also aware that to any question raised in the House or put on the Order Paper I could rise on behalf of the minister in my capacity as Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader and say: "Yes, no, maybe". The truth is that it is an answer and it is not, therefore, a subject of privilege here in this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you rule quickly on this one so that we can get on with the business before us.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised an issue which is not an unusual kind of issue to raise. The hon. member is not satisfied with the response given. The difficulty that is always with the Chair in these cases is that there are often very great differences of interpretation on answers that are given. In this case, I think the hon. parliamentary secretary is correct. It is not a question of privilege, it is a question of disagreement over certain facts and answers that were given. The hon. member may, perhaps, have another means to pursue the matter.

I thank the hon. member for giving me notice and complete detail of her question of privilege.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION AND PRIVACY

TABLING OF REPORT CROSSING THE BORDERS OF PRIVACY

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I am pleased to table today the study Crossing the Borders of Privacy, Vie privée sans frontières.

The study was undertaken in response to a recommendation of the parliamentary committee which reviewed the federal access to information and privacy legislation.

VISITORS TO GALLERY

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seek your guidance.

I had guests today, 15 people from the Labour College of Canada and three from the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, who were to attend in the opposition gallery and they were turned away, being told that room was being made for 100 guests of the Prime Minister.

I am not sure what to do with this or where to go to seek advice or with whom I should raise the question.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could come and see me at her very earliest convenience.

CANADA REFERENDUM AND PLEBISCITE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke–Lakeshore) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–201, an act respecting referenda and plebiscites in Canada on questions of public importance.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased at this time to present to the House for first reading the Canada Referendum and Plebiscite Act. This is the enabling legislation under which plebiscites or referendums could take place in Canada at the national level. It is the same Private Members' Bill in substantial form that I have had in the House since July 1988. While there is much discussion from all sides on whether and when there should be referenda, there is at the moment no federal enabling legislation for that purpose and that is the intent of this Private Member's Bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr.Speaker, I would like to present a bill, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops, entitled an act respecting a compensation fund for members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member for Mackenzie, but I have just been informed that the Table does not have a copy of the hon. member's bill. We cannot proceed without that. I wonder if the hon. member would like to discuss the matter with the Table and perhaps we could take it up tomorrow.

Mr. Althouse: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, my staff has them.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of British Columbia who point out that the government has cut back millions of dollars to the RCMP and as a result there has been an erosion of service and of effectiveness in terms of police protection. Also, there have been cuts in training, in patrols, and in the ability of the police to enforce laws. Therefore, they are asking the government to consider restoring proper funding to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to enable the force to fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia and to remain a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of citizens from my constituency of Notre–Dame–de–Grâce condemning the government for critically cutting the budget of CBC and requesting the Parliament of Canada to strengthen the CBC to serve as a primary instrument of Canadian cultural sovereignty, providing high quality service to all Canadians.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition signed by over 300 petitioners, stating that whereas thousands of eastern Europeans did enter Canada legally in good faith and did subsequently apply for permanent residence in Canada pursuant to the self-exile program, and whereas these refugee claimants who, although successfully established in Canada, are being refused landing at pre-inquiry humanitarian and compassionate reviews, they are calling upon this Parliament to request the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to speed up the processing of any outstanding self-exile applications, to allow self-exiled applicants in Canada to be allowed to work and/or be allowed to go to school, and accept all persons registered in the refugee backlog who are established in Canada for landed immigrant status at their pre-inquiry humanitarian and compassionate reviews. These are hundreds of petitioners already added to the thousands that have been tabled prior to today.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from 225 of my constituents of the Bonavista Peninsula, 15 other communities including King's Cove, Plate Cove, Southern Bay, Sweet Bay and indeed from the other extremity of my riding in Lumsden and Bonavista North. These people are very concerned about the deep and drastic cuts that have been made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation because they feel that one of the things CBC does for the Atlantic region and particularly for Newfoundland is to maintain and nurture our cultural integrity. They are particularly concerned about the demise or coming demise of the program Land and Sea.

They call upon Parliament to ensure that CBC programming remains intact, and in particular, that local programming like Land and Sea be maintained and indeed restored.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my privilege to present to this House on behalf of many Canadians a petition asking that a great woman, Marie Sklodowska Curie, be honoured for her scientific contributions to humanity. In fact, she must be honoured.

We believe that the gift of the discovery of radium to heal the sick of the world deserves to be recognized by Canada.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to honour Marie Sklodowska Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth, November 7, 1992.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by Canadians from Montreal, Toronto, and Scarborough dealing with the subject of a very famous woman who has contributed greatly to the health of the world, Marie Sklodowska Curie.

The petitioners ask a very simple thing, that Canada honour her by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth on November 7, 1992. I certainly think it is a laudable goal.

THE SENATE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my privilege to present a petition signed by many of my constituents, as well as those who live in neighbouring constituencies, dealing with the Senate.

The petitioners reflect in this petition their concern about the Senate's contribution to the democratic debates in this country. It says: Therefore, that the Senate now performs no useful function, is completely partisan and has proven after many efforts to be impossible to reform.

Wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to abolish the Senate outright.

I submit this petition on the petitioners' behalf.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition to the House today signed by numerous residents of my riding of Kingston and the Islands.

These petitioners are concerned about the desecration and destruction of the Canadian flag, which happened recently in the riding of Kingston and the Islands.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to defend the symbol of our country and pass a law making it an offence to destroy or desecrate the flag of Canada.

CIVIL RIGHTS OF CROATIANS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of my constituents I would like to present a petition asking Parliament to support the civil rights of the Croatians in the country of Yugoslavia.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to add my voice to the petition just presented supporting free choice for the people in that country potentially on the brink of a civil war.

My petition today deals with the great woman who has already been referred to, Marie Sklodowska, commonly known as Madam Curie. She not only should be honoured for her scientific contributions to humanity, but because she has also served as a tremendous role model to young women around the world.

I believe, along with a number of my colleagues, that the Canadian government could commemorate this on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth on November 7, 1992 by launching a commemorative stamp. This would certainly speak volumes about the place of womankind in science.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present from my riding in addition to the many petitions that have already been presented on this issue.

The petitioners again call upon the government to reject its current proposals to increase costs to provincial and municipal governments for maintaining RCMP services. The petitioners also ask that the government continue the 70–30 per cent cost sharing ratio between the provinces and the federal government for RCMP services to allow our national police force to remain visible across the country as a national body.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

CANADIAN TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice of motion under Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for York West.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the House to discuss an urgent and immediate matter, namely the crisis currently being faced by the Canadian trucking industry.

I served the appropriate application to His Honour this morning. It is not my intention to adjourn immediately, but simply request that after the 8 p.m. vote this evening the House of Commons engage in an emergency debate to try to resolve together some of the problems facing the Canadian trucking industry.

I put before His Honour simply a few quick facts. The fact of the matter is that there were some 656 trucking companies in Canada that went bankrupt.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member on an important matter, but the hon. member knows that in making the application one should not slip into debate. However, that takes nothing away from the importance of the application.

I wish to respond to the hon. member. First of all, I want to thank him for giving me notice and bringing this to my attention.

I should say to the House and to those who are listening and watching that I have watched and listened with great interest debate about this matter, both yesterday and today. It is clearly a matter of very great concern, as has been evidenced by both sides of the House, by the people who are involved in it and, no doubt, by Canadians in general.

However, at least at this time I am not inclined to think that it requires an emergency debate tonight. I will be listening carefully to what transpires in the House. I thank the hon. member.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session; and on the amendment thereto of Mr. Chrétien (p. 24), and on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Langdon (p. 33).

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise the House and the hon. member for Halifax that the hon. member has three minutes of debate left to her. I will call her in just a moment. That will be followed by ten minutes for questions and comments.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when I interrupted my remarks yesterday I was presenting some of my views, the views of a number of my constituents and the views of women across this country on the crucial matter of violence against women and its escalation in Canada today.

There are questions the women of Canada are asking, which have arisen due to the Speech from the Throne. They would like to hear from, and are hoping they will hear very soon, the right hon. Prime Minister. We heard in the Speech from the Throne that a blue ribbon panel of Canadian men and women will be appointed to deal with the question of violence against women. This, as I said, raises a number of concerns.

As I said yesterday, I and several other members of this House have been, since November, members of a subcommittee on the status of women dealing with the question of violence against women. We have heard many eloquent witnesses over the past several months and have more witnesses scheduled to appear in the next few months.

Many of us, many women's groups across this country—such as the YWCA of Canada, the National Action Committee, the Canadian Research Institute for the Advancement of Women, and a number of others—have called for a royal commission on violence against women.

The major reasons we have called for this royal commission is that, first of all, the research into violence against women and its causes still tends to be, in this country and in other countries of the west, anecdotal as opposed to empirical. We also believe that a royal commission, properly constituted, would shine the light of publicity and provide this frightening and rapidly growing problem the kind of notice and the kind of credibility it requires in all corners of this country. The sad fact is that too many people in Canada still believe that incidents of violence against women do not happen to people in the so–called mainstream, that they happen to some mythical underclass who really are the architects of their own destruction.

The women of Canada are concerned and many supportive men in Canada are concerned that this issue not be shuffled off. We want to know what a blue ribbon panel is. More than that, we want to have a royal commission. We want to seek and find and publish the answers as to what the root causes are to the questions of violence against women.

We know, for example, that alcohol plays a part. We know that the cycle of violence from childhood plays a part. We know that economic problems play a part. However, none of these things is necessarily common to every incident. What we need is a royal commission rooted in the experience of women and some men who work in the front lines, in transition houses, in shelters, and in women's centres across this country. We need to hear from police officers, we need to hear from judges, and we need to hear most especially from the women who deal in the transition houses on a daily basis with the battered and injured women who are the victims every day and every night in Canada of an horrendous wave of violence.

I call upon the Prime Minister and the government to let us know what their plans are. I beg them in the name of the women of Canada, indeed in the name of all of those who believe in a truly just nation, to deal with this problem as soon as possible and to deal with it in the way that the women of Canada and those experts in the field have asked.

I call upon the Prime Minister to appoint a royal commission into violence against women.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax has certainly been a leading proponent on the subject of women's issues in Canada. As our caucus critic in that area, she has assumed a considerable responsibility and has had many dealings with women's groups across the country.

In the course of her work with those groups, I would like to ask her if she has encountered any opposition to the idea of the creation of a royal commission to look into the question of violence against women.

I may say, as a passing comment, that I have received widespread support for that idea from women's groups in my own riding that have met with me. I wonder also if she could tell us how she sees the work of a royal commission tying in with the review of current government expenditures in this area, namely, in its support for women's groups and in its campaign against violence to women which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has discussed in this House on past occasions.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Kingston and the Islands for his question. Indeed, it is a very relevant question because some women's groups across the country have been leery of the concept of a royal commission.

A colleague of mine from Mount St. Vincent University, the Women's Studies Department, very recently engaged with me in an interview on CBC Radio where we discussed it. The fear of some women is that the matter could be shunted aside into a royal commission, that it could be put on the back burner, so to speak. If they send it to a royal commission, they can forget about it.

This is not the kind of royal commission that women's groups, we on the opposition side of the House, and we on the subcommittee on violence against women have been talking about. We are talking about a royal commission that is rooted in women's experience. That is the phrase that has been used by proponents of this commission over and over again. We need women who have spent time and gained expertise in this area, and we have them right across the country in every province, in every region: north, south, east, west. They are there and they are willing to serve.

Let me turn to the second part of my colleague's question on how this relates to government funding. We know there have been great difficulties. We know there have been cutbacks and freezes to women's groups and women's centres which are in the main the referrals and the havens for women who suffer violence. We know there was an initiative announced by the then minister of health, now the Minister of Communications, on second-stage housing. However, we still need action on they very front lines.

By the way, the amount of money the government has allotted for second-stage housing would build one small apartment building in each province in Canada. The problem is we need first-stage housing and first-stage assistance. For every 10 women who seek assistance, five are turned away.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear my hon. colleague's comments. Obviously, everyone in this House agrees concerning the seriousness of the problem of violence against women. That is why I was so delighted the Prime Minister and this government have agreed to proceed with a national inquiry into this very issue that the hon. member and so many women across this country have raised. I know that I have received something over 25,000 names on petitions asking for us to take further action in this area.

I see the requirements to be an initiative which ensures that we co-ordinate and integrate, the knowledge that is available and we search for new, creative solutions. In that process we need something that is quite creative. We do not need the sort of old style perhaps royal commission where people sit in a hotel room and just hear briefs from groups. We need the capability of highly qualified, dedicated men and women who would go out where women are, where women who have been victims, where women who have been involved in the front lines and really find out the causes and seek out, I hope, some solutions.

I would ask my hon. colleague, and other colleagues, to give me their advice on the terms of reference and the kinds of processes that I hope will come from a feminist perspective, that we can think about something different. We have the commitment to the inquiry. What is now important is to make sure that it works, that we have the best people involved and that we will in fact progress to finding real solutions to this societal problem.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for her comment. Indeed I am aware of her interest and her commitment to this. I guess I will turn to Shakespeare: "For a rose by any other name". I am not wedded to the term "royal commission". I do not think any of us are.

What we are wedded to is the kind of creative solutions and creative investigation of which that the minister is speaking. It gives me heart to hear her make these comments.

What is tremendously important, and I believe the minister referred to this, is that we are really talking about the same thing. When the minister refers to going out to where the women are and seeking the answers, that is certainly part of it. I would also hope that this national panel would have as part and parcel of its mandate the academic, scholarly, empirical thrust as well. A great problem, and a problem that we have heard time and again from witnesses at our subcommittee is that we do not have the hard evidence that convinces, with the greatest of respect to the gentlemen in the Chamber, our male colleagues across the board about the seriousness of this issue and that we are going to need—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to offer my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the member for Saint-Maurice and the member for Regina—Wascana. I have absolutely no doubt that their words will persuade all members, unanimously, to adopt the Speech from the Throne.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in the history of nations as in the life of individuals, there are times when it behooves us to consider the hopes we all have for the future on the basis of past history.

Canada, as a country, and all of us as Canadian citizens have reached one of those crucial moments when we have to draw from our historical background the resolve and confidence we need to face our destiny. In coming to terms with our identity, we must now decide what we want to become.

This session of Parliament is sure to go down in the history of the Canadian Federation.

[English]

We have great problems to confront, and it will help if we can maintain a sense of historical perspective. In the debates leading up to Confederation, the public finances of Canada were in bad shape; the economic outlook was uncertain as Britain declared for free trade as opposed to Imperial preference; Lower Canada felt, even then, that its language and culture would be swamped by Upper Canada; and later, Mr. Speaker, there were even separatists elected to the House of Commons—from Nova Scotia.

Some years later, Laurier spoke of his fears for Canada. He said:

> The Province of Manitoba is in open revolt—the Province of Nova Scotia demands its separation from Confederation—In fact—from East to West and from North to South—the prevailing feeling in Canada is one of unrest and uneasiness, of discontent and irritation.

Three years later, in 1890, Laurier had occasion to warn that:

> We have come to a period in a history of this young country when premature dissolution seems to be at hand.

But leaders persisted, and Canadians prevailed.

Like our predecessors, because of the trust placed in us by our fellow citizens, each of us has the historical responsibility to help strenghten the bonds that hold this great country together.

In this House, as members from all political parties, we represent the various regions of the country. We each have our political affiliation and our own views on how to solve the country's problems. However, if we are to succeed, we must never forget that what bonds us is stronger and more precious than any divisive factors that might break us up as a people.

Indeed, the leader of the opposition was right when he said recently that the future of Canada is more important than a political career. At the beginning of this new session, I want to reaffirm that both myself and my party fully intend to work with all members whatever their party who share the desire and the will to build a stronger Canada while, at the same time, respecting the legitimate aspirations of the regions and the provinces.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, now is the time to move beyond special interests. Now is the time to speak for the national interest. That is the role and the responsibility of the Parliament of Canada. There is no greater constituent assembly than the House of Commons and this House of Commons will assume national leadership.

Our constituents have sent us here to debate the issues and to resolve Canada's problems. The problems are serious. But so are the opportunities. Men and women of good will, of vision, who believe in Canada, who know of the magnificence of our own citizenship and our own heritage, will confront this challenge. We will prevail because Canada's interests, the national interests, demands it and Canadians will ensure that that turns out to be the case.

We all have partisan interests and instincts. That is the nature of politics. I occasionally, not often, indulge in partisan comments myself.

Some hon. members: No, never.

Mr. Mulroney: But on this issue, Mr. Speaker, we are all partisans, partisans of Canada.

I have said it before, and I tell this House now, what matters is not the next election, what matters is Canada; only Canada.

While leadership is required, there is also a time to listen. And we are now listening carefully to what Canadians from every corner of the country have to tell us, their representatives. After the consultation, precise and perhaps far-reaching initiatives will be announced. When that time comes, we will do so with the certainly that the Canadian population has had the opportunity to offer us their opinions and the chance to express their own hopes and dreams and those of their children for the future.

Make no mistake, the government and the Parliament of Canada, all parliamentarians, will play a leadership role in this debate, not simply as arbiters, but as proponents and strong defenders of the national interest.

I noted the comment of one of the members of the Citizens' Forum who said Canadians were ready for a new Charlottetown. Our challenge in the government and Parliament of Canada is to provide a focus for these voices which seek change. I am confident that Canada and Canadians will rise to that challenge.

We are called upon now to find a common vision and a common purpose. Perhaps it is not as complicated as some may believe. Irrespective of where we sit in this House, irrespective of our own personal backgrounds; if we bear in mind our common values of compromise, tolerance and respect for one another's language and religion, culture and region, we will come through this challenging time in the life of our country and Canada will be a better and a stronger nation for it.

We will need all of those values if we are to define a new vision of this country. We are challenged to bring forth not just a vision that Canadians will accept, but one they want.

Those who signed the British North America Act were not dreamers or sorcerers' apprentices. They had a realistic and pragmatic concept of the geographic, cultural, social and economic factors that would determine our future on this continent.

[English]

The Canadian economic union succeeded for a very simple reason. It went hand in hand with a Canadian political union. In our history books we focus on Confederation as an act of accommodation and indeed, it was that. We tend to overlook that it was an act of separation as well, an act of separation from the 1840 Union and that too is an important consideration.

In choosing federalism over a unitary system, we put an end to the notion that the path to Canadian unity lay through submerging our diversity in a unitary state. Rather, we chose a system in which provinces are sovereign in their respective areas, but Canadians are associated on matters we have in common.

Our economic and political union, founded on generous ideals and on sound principles, has proved remarkably adaptable in the 20th century. It facilitated the entry and the development of six "new" provinces into the Canadian family. It has evolved in response to depression and war, the growth of the modern welfare state, massive immigration and the post-war baby boom. In the face of the stresses and strains of the past decades, Canada has developed innovative and sophisticated solutions to meet remarkable new challenges.

Today Canada is one of the world's leading economic powers. Our standard of living has consistently been among the highest in the entire industrialized world.

Our record of growth in job creation has been one of the best among the industrialized, G-7, and OECD nations in the last six years. The strength of our economy and our solidarity have allowed us to implement cultural and social programs that express our generosity, our values and, in many ways, are regarded with envy and admiration by most people around the world.

We are one of the great trading nations of the world and a strong voice for international co-operation. We have earned our place at the G-7 table. We have earned our place at G-7 and we are going to keep it.

Some self-styled economists say otherwise, but the Canadian economic union has served Quebec well since Confederation. In fact, it is rather ironic to hear these people urging Quebecers to leave a federation that, according to them, can only spell economic disaster, and then turn around and say there must be an economic union with Canada.

Mr. Speaker, although they refuse to consider being involved in developing Canada's financial policies, they do want a monetary union with Canada. The Allaire and Bélanger-Campeau reports acknowledged that Quebec would be well advised to maintain this union. However, these reports, some of which were not necessarily prepared by the Commission but by certain groups working for the Commission, are on the wrong track when they maintain that economic ties will not necessarily be affected by political separation.

Quebec is an integral part of the Canadian economic union. It is a vast market for other parts of the country and, in turn, enjoys extraordinary benefits as a result of its participation in the economies of the other provinces. In fact, six of our provinces, including Quebec, sell more manufactured goods to other provinces than to foreign countries. It would be unrealistic to think that an economic union could be run effectively in the next century without the central government playing a major role.

Mr. Speaker, why would Canadians jeopardize an economic union that has worked so well and that still has so much to offer? No one claims that Canada is perfect, but we are all aware of the benefits we have enjoyed in this country for almost 125 years. The most eloquent example of economic and political integration today comes to us from Europe, especially from France and England, the mother countries of Canada's two great linguistic families.

All over the European continent, we see nations that have waged bloody wars practically from generation to generation during the last millennium and who, thirty years ago, started to create an open and dynamic economic union of over 300 million people.

Mr. Speaker, how can anyone seriously consider strengthening an economic union that is so vital and necessary to the future of Quebecers and Canadians, while at the same time isolating the members of that union? Quebecers know Canada isn't perfect, Mr. Speaker, but as a Quebecer—and I said as much recently in my own riding of Charlevoix—I know the people of my native province are deeply attached to Canada and that they are very proud of its great achievements.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of certain speeches and impressions, Quebecers have no intention whatsoever to tear their Canadian passeport and plunge into the unknown. That, I can guarantee you, Mr. Speaker.

A month ago, Mr. Jacques Delors, chairman of the European Economic Community, during an official visit in Ottawa, was asked a few questions on national unity. I did not provoke the question. It was a spontaneous question asked by a distinguished member of the public gallery. The answer given by Mr. Delors, a former minister of Economy in the French government, when asked about Canadian unity, could not be clearer; here is what he said here in Ottawa a few steps away from here:

> As you know, in Europe, we are working on a certain political union, a federal state. Our conception is federal, he went on to say, and it provides for a common policy on external and economic affairs, a common currency, a common central bank, and an economic policy parallel to this monetary policy, both policies being strongly convergent.

And he concluded:

> So, in Europe we are uniting because we believe that nowadays we do not have individually a sufficient liberty of movement to guarantee our autonomy, our well-being and reach our goods.

Certain people in Quebec would want us to believe that, while prosperity in Europe will be gained through unity, our prosperity in Canada and Quebec can gain through disunity. What an illogic and unacceptable statement that is for Canadians and Quebecers!

I am sure that the best way to protect the French language, to guarantee that it will continue to express the characteristic spirit of the French majority in Quebec and of the French minorities outside Quebec, is to maintain the stability of our political institutions and the economic prosperity which derives from it. That is because Canada, unlike many countries, respects diversity, one of it's fundamental principles. The influence of the French language will extend over large areas only if it is used in great alliances and the main international forums.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is quite true to say that the few French immigrants who settled here three centuries and a half ago would marvel at the sight of Canada today, the world's second largest francophone country and, with France, on of the main supporters of the international francophonie.

[English]

The great preoccupation of Quebec and French Canada is now, as it has been for many decades, the preservation of cultural and linguistic heritage. Let us not forget that this undertaking was given in the most solemn way in 1867.

There are political groups in Canada who now tell their supporters that this country should plan to get along without Quebec or that Quebec can and should get along without Canada.

These groups, at opposite ends of the disunity spectrum, stand for fragmentation whereas Canadians and Quebecers have always stood for solidarity, unity and strength. The greatest assurance this House and this country can give French Canada of the respect of its language and its culture is the assurance that that language will be respected and honoured in the rest of Canada now and as we work and live together in a greater and greater way across the nation in our homes and in our lives.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Quebec wants the tools necessary to protect and affirm its distinctiveness. Last June 23, I said that before we tried again to amend the Constitution, we would have to clear up some of the difficulties and misunderstandings and find a better way to amend the Constitution. So we set up a citizens forum to listen to and gather the views of as many Canadians as possible in as short a time as possible.

I think, under very difficult circumstances, the citizens forum has done a remarkable job. I have every confidence that its final report will be a valuable contribution to the proposals the government will bring forward in the autumn.

Running on a parallel track is the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, known as the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, which is seeking the views of Canadians on improving the way we change our Constitution. The excellence of its work has been commented on in editorials across the country.

On behalf of all members of the House I want to pay tribute to members of that committee, who have done such outstanding work.

Clearly, we must find a better way to transact constitutional affairs in this country. I am hopeful that the joint committee will help point us all in a better direction.

The reports of both the citizens forum and the joint committee are due by July 1, and the government will give every consideration to their recommendations in formulating its proposals over the summer months. Then, in a little more than three months, the government will submit its proposals to the new joint Parliamentary Committee on Constitutional Affairs. The committee will travel the country for several months, seeking the views of Canadians in every corner of this land.

The committee, as noted in the Speech from the Throne, will meet legislators from parallel committees of commissions in other provinces; perhaps on the floors of their own legislatures. It will also meet with aboriginal groups across the country.

This is an inclusive process open to all Canadians. I see nothing exclusionary about it.

I give this House an undertaking, on behalf of the government, that the government will be very open-minded to constructive amendments offered in the spirit of improving its proposals and broadening the consensus that Canadian unity needs and demands.

Reform of the Senate of Canada and of other institutions will improve and ensure both greater fairness and greater responsiveness. Oftentimes we are told that in some cities in western Canada people live some 2,000 miles from Ottawa and yet they feel that they are 2 million miles away because of the manner in which some concerns are dealt with. A lot of that has to do with the deficiencies in some of our institutions and the lack of responsiveness to the calls of the regions. Reform of the Senate and of other institutions to ensure both fairness and responsiveness means a great deal in western Canada and in many areas of Atlantic Canada.

People in Ontario are concerned about the growing costs of government generally and about the need to compete with our world-wide trading partners.

Aboriginal Canadians continue their quest for social justice and constitutional assurances.

This round will be a Canadian round, east and west, north and south, English and French speaking. All Canadians can and will benefit from constitutional reform.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: While there is no doubt that we are living through a crisis in the life of this country, it can also be viewed as an opportunity. It is an opportunity to do even better. The only deadline we face is the time needed to build a consensus among Canadians on how to improve Canada. Our only challenge is to recognize that a strong, economic and political union is fundamental to our collective prosperity.

• (1600)

Today I want to address, very briefly, some of the economic issues and options that will underlie the government's proposals. Others have referred to them. No one is re-inventing the wheel, as the Leader of the Opposition or the Leader of the NDP has pointed out in different circumstances. The Constitution clearly must guarantee the free flow of people and goods and services, capital and technology within the federation. It must also provide a broad framework for the economic union and establish key economic rights. The need for competitiveness and the imperatives of economic success make it essential that the provincial governments work with the federal government.

We must ask ourselves some basic and blunt questions about the efficiency of our economic union. Is it normal, for example, that internal barriers make Canada a much more balkanized domestic market than Europe or the United States, geographic groupings with 10, 12, 13 times the population of this country? Why is it easier for some firms to do business overseas than in a neighbouring province? Should Canadian firms be handicapped by the need to comply with two sales tax schemes; one federal and one provincial? I know some people will argue that we should not have any at all. I see my friend from the NDP applauding, but I can tell him one little fact of life: if you want sound and magnificent social services, we have got to pay for them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I say that with respect to my friend from Regina.

Do we really need three separate security regulators when all over the world countries are moving to a much more centralized regulatory regime? Does it make any sense that a trust company conceivably can face 11 separate sets of rules and regulations if that corporation wishes to operate across Canada when the goal in Europe is to allow institutions in one country to operate under a single licence right across the community? Is the population well served when a provincial government raises its deficit dramatically while the federal government and all other provincial governments seek to reduce the financial burden of the nation?

Sovereignty is the capacity to develop fundamental common values along with the economic strength to sustain and defend them. A country whose public finances drift into disrepair creates problems not only for future generations but for its capacity to act independently and assertively on the world scene. In the conduct of its public finances, Canada has been flirting with danger. Since 1984 we have made some progress in regaining control of the public finances. The rate of growth of program spending in Ottawa since 1984 has increased 3.7 per cent per year below the rate of inflation. In the previous 15 years the annual rate of increase of program spending on average was 13.9 per cent per year every year for 15 years.

There are consequences for overspending. There are consequences for everything we do. I mention this simply to make the point that at the end of the day this nation needs the resources if we are going to remain strong and united. A national debt of roughly $18 billion in 1969 with no deficit was transformed by 1984 into a national debt of $206 billion and an annual deficit of $38.9 billion.

My hon. friend from Newfoundland asks a very good question: What is it now? He is quite right, it was $206 billion and it is now $389 billion, but I want to point out to him that almost all of the increase in the national debt since 1984 is the result of compound interest on the glut that we have had. My hon. friend will understand that, believe it or not, this is not said with the view to scoring a given point. It is to try and make a point. I know that he would make the point if he were on this side, pointing out the gravity of the same problem.

The problem is that when we began, 12 cents of every tax dollar was going to service the debt. With this size of debt, 32 cents of every dollar was required to pay the interest on the debt. So financing the deficit sucks up huge amounts of capital that are no longer available for education and for health care, defence expenditures, foreign aid, and assistance to building a better quality of life for Canadians.

This Constitution and national unity cannot be discussed in abstract terms. There are some very hard realities that we have to consider. If all of that amount, 32 cents, 33 cents, 34 cents per dollar, the second worst record in the industrialized world, if that amount is going to bond holders, to people holding our debt, that means we have the $20 billion and $30 billion per year going out, which in comparative terms is not going out of other treasuries, that we do not have for investments in infrastructure, for investments in social programs, for investments that strengthen the unity of the nation.

I think it is important to point out because without economic strength, and if you add to the deficit and you continue to add to your debt service costs, then what is left to provide programs for Canadians? How would we fund medical and pension benefits for an aging population? How would we invest in infrastructure improvements? How would we honour our obligations in the world?

I do not think it is a partisan statement to say that to believe in sound finances for the Government of Canada does not signal a lack of compassion. It signals—and I think I can say that on behalf of all members—a sense of realism that, without fiscal discipline and sound economic growth, the only thing that governments can deliver is a fool's paradise and that is not good enough for Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The questions of our unity and prosperity cannot be considered apart. When Canadians are troubled over their future together, it sends very negative signals to the investment community. When our prosperity is diminished, it weakens the foundations of our living together. The unity of Canada is tied to our competitive position in the world and our competitiveness is a pillar of Canadian unity.

[Translation]

The Speech from the Throne mentioned the major problems facing us and the decisions we must make. As we predicted, there are now signs that we are coming out of the recession. Last month, the unemployment rate fell for the first time since last June. The increase in jobs during the past two months was also a positive sign. In April, housing starts increased by nearly 30 per cent over previous months. Confidence in the business community is now at its highest level in seven years. Interest rates, the cornerstone of all genuine and durable economic recovery, dropped 5 per cent over the past year and have gone down 1 per cent since the federal Budget.

However, we cannot, in the long term, continue to take our prosperity for granted. We cannot afford to sit back and rely only on Canada's vast natural resources. A difficult road lies ahead if we are to raise our productivity to the same level as that of our competitors. However, instead of letting ourselves be paralysed by our problems, I say we should take advantage of this opportunity to strengthen Canada.

We must consider how to increase our productivity which alone can create durable prosperity. Government deficits and letting the Bank of Canada print more and more bills leads to inflation. It may get us a few part-time jobs but it does not produce any durable wealth. Productivity alone is the key to a great nation's durable prosperity. Clearly, we have not been able to maximize the principal agent of our prosperity our human resources.

In the Speech from the Throne, it was announced that we would initiate a debate on education, while fully observing the jurisdiction of the provinces in this field, and that we would do so by publishing a discussion paper on learning. Together, as citizens and parents, we must stop the draining away of our young talent and help them stay in school instead of dropping out, now that education, excellence and training are vital to success on the labour market.

[English]

The Speech from the Throne set out the problem quite clearly. The issue in this regard is not exclusively or even primarily money. Canada already spends more money per capita on education than almost any other industrialized country in the world. I believe the exception is Sweden.

From the federal level alone, the federal government spends almost $11 billion directly and indirectly on education and training, to say nothing of the billions that are spent by the appropriate provincial governments in providing facilities and training for our young people.

Yet, the issue remains: results. Three out of 10 students drop out of high school before graduating. In some jurisdictions, it is higher, it approaches four out of 10. Four out of 10 adults cannot read or do mathematics well enough to perform everyday tasks.

Canadian industry spends less than half as much on training its employees as American industry does, a fifth as much as the Japanese, and an eighth as much as the Germans. This is not the kind of performance that will guarantee increasing prosperity for our children.

In fact, it has given rise to a very important question and concern. That is, whether the next generation of Canadian men and women will be the first to have a lower standard of living than their parents.

The Speech from the Throne proposed some important objectives for the nation. These goals could include cutting illiteracy rates in half, ensuring that 90 per cent of Canadians attain high school diplomas or the equivalent by age 25, doubling the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, the sciences and engineering, and quadrupling the training provided by employers to their employees.

One member from the back says: Mind your own business.

I want to tell you: This is my business.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: If you are here today, it is because one morning you woke up and found out that you were born and you were a Canadian.

It is because you are a Canadian that you turned out to be educated, so prosperous looking and so dignified from time to time.

These are valid and urgent objectives for a nation whose domestic lifeblood is international trade. Only substantial productivity improvements will restore and sustain our competitive position and under-write our economic security.

The Speech from the Throne emphasized the need for Canadians to share in the benefit of prosperity and nowhere is this more true than in the case of aboriginal Canadians.

I have been gratified by the favourable response to the appointment of former Chief Justice Brian Dickson to advise the government on the membership and terms of reference of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Affairs.

A few weeks ago in Victoria, I set out some of the progress now being made. First, the fast-track process is introduced to deal with land claims of $500,000 or less. Second, in order to accelerate claims processing, the authority of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to approve settlement payments without reference to the Treasury Board will be increased from $1 million to $7 million.

Third, some $355 million will be dedicated to this initiative over the next five years. This represents a quadrupling of resources for this program.

Fourth, the process will be made fairer by the establishment of a specific land claim commission.

Fifth, in co-operation with Indian leadership over the next few months, a joint Indian government working group will be established to address unresolved specific land claims process and public policy issues.

Finally, pre-Confederation land claims will be accepted for consideration for the first time.

Another native agenda initiative designed to help Indian leaders build a better future for their people is the Pathways To Success program. The objective of this program is to create a skilled, competitive aboriginal workforce. We anticipate investing approximately $200 million per year in aboriginal labour market programs.

As part of the native agenda we have increased the budget of the Indian post-secondary program by $320 million for a total expenditure of more than a billion dollars over five years. This year government assistance is making it possible for 22,000 Indians to go to college and to change their lives. When the member for Saint-Denis and I were going to college, there were fewer than a hundred aboriginal students. This shows that some slow but steady progress is being achieved.

Perhaps the combination of the royal commission, strong support by Parliament and government, and constitutional change will provide our aboriginal peoples with the justice and the respect they have long deserved but have too frequently been denied.

Recently, the former Secretary General of the Commonwealth, Sonny Ramphal, said: "Canada is a model of stability in a multicultural world, and the breakup of the country would be seen as an encouragement for other societies to fly apart. Canada", he said, "has been something of a flagship of stability in a world of multiculturalism; the Canadian model has been replicated around the world."

[Translation]

A handful of professional pessimists keeps focusing on the flaws in our political system. Of course there are flaws. No one ever said Canada or federalism were perfect. There are flaws, but the same professional pessimists who concentrate on those flaws and are always trying to obscure the greatness and strength of Canada, would have us succumb to their siren song and thus undermine our belief in the unity and greatness of this country. In Quebec, they are promising people the moon, and referring to economic and political unions that are purely imaginary. There are others outside Quebec who would have us believe that the best way to deal with the pervasive malaise in this country would be to separate Quebec from Canada.

[English]

Both sides of this pessimistic equation—those who want Quebec to leave Canada and those who insist that division is inevitable—both of these graduates, with doctorates in the school of pessimism, are completely wrong and they will be repudiated by history.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: People who think Canada is a set of building blocks that can be rearranged at will or who think Canada can function just as well without one of its basic components are badly mistaken.

[English]

To strengthen our economic union, the federal government must exercise key economic powers and both levels of government must work together to secure our prosperity.

I believe it is possible in areas of federal jurisdiction to integrate explicit and effective inputs from regions and from citizens into the making of laws and policies. We must also find new and imaginative mechanisms to manage the interdependence of the federal and the provincial governments.

A look at the attribution of powers in 1867 provides a guide to the genuine thinking of the Fathers of Confederation when they created this country.

You will see that the erosion of many of those powers over the years has brought about quite a different country from that which they contemplated. This explains some of the serious problems that provinces feel, particularly as they are further and further removed from the centre, as they are more and more concerned about their capacity to protect language and culture and regional interests.

And so we must find new ways to manage the interdependence of the federal and provincial governments. Federalism is a balance between the need for central authority and the scope for decentralization to meet local aspirations. Its genius lies not in its perfection, because no system of government yet devised is perfect, but its genius comes from the fact that it combines self-rule and shared rule, sovereignty and association.

The challenge we face is to rebalance our federation, not to throw it out. This will be the most important challenge that we have to meet during this session. The eyes of the nation are turned toward this Chamber and all of its members. It is not the time to exacerbate our differences; I think, Mr. Speaker, it is the time to extol our diversity. This is not the time to weaken our country; it is the time to strengthen our resolve. It is not the time to point fingers; it is the time to join hands. This is not the time to turn our backs on the common destiny; it is the time to prepare a better country for all of our children.

On July 1, thousands of Canadians, young and old, French speaking and English speaking and first Canadians and recent immigrants, will stand outside this building and look to the top of the Peace Tower. They will see there the maple leaf, be witness to our history and the emblem of our future greatness. Indeed, my friend says "a great flag", and he is 100 per cent right.

Our challenge is to reject the call to selfishness and division and to point the way to a better Canada, a Canada that is more open and fair, and generous and free, which will become the pride of its citizens and a model for the entire world.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton East has very generously assisted the Speaker. I recognize the hon. member for Yukon.

The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to express our gratitude to the Official Opposition for its courteous gesture to allow our leader to make some remarks regarding the throne speech. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I could also seek unanimous consent to allow my leader to complete her remarks during her response.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to indicate that indeed that had been the proposal in the rule changes that we had negotiated at the end. It is too bad it could not be automatically part of the rules, but of course we would extend that courtesy to the Leader.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to comment on the government's Speech from the Throne as well as on the Prime Minister's remarks just preceding this.

We have heard many members of this government say that this session could be the most important one since Confederation and I and my party certainly agree with that. We have also heard the government say that imagination will be required to move forward and emerge stronger from this crisis in which our nation finds itself. Again, we in the New Democratic Party agree with that. I have heard from this government that we are at a turning point in our history and once again, we agree.

In listening to the Speech from the Throne, what is most striking and most disturbing is that there is nothing in it to meet the challenges confronting Canada now. It contains the same old responses, the same failed economic policies and the same flawed constitutional process.

It is saddening that this government has chosen and is determined to follow the same old course, because being at a turning point means turning. The government refuses to turn. Instead it goes blindly ahead and takes Canada into another dead-end. We must turn to find new directions and new ways, to find a destination and a new future for Canadians. That is the responsibility for all of us.

The throne speech identifies unity, competitiveness and responsive national government as priorities. Indeed, they should be because in the six years since this government took power, Canada has moved to a large degree from unity to disunity, from being globally competitive toward being globally uncompetitive, and from having functional national institutions to national institutions such as VIA Rail and the CBC that are mere skeletons of what they were when this government took power.

These are issues which must be addressed and I will do that today, but in a very different way than this government. I propose that we follow a people's agenda, an agenda that serves Canadians and Canadian families.

It is clear to everyone, except a few across from us in this House, that the Conservative corporate agenda has failed Canadians. I want to ensure the Canadian people that our party will not stand by and watch these six years be followed by another six years of this kind of failed economic planning.

This Parliament is charged with one responsibility this session. That responsibility is to work to build the kind of Canada that all Canadians want to belong to.

It means drafting a Constitution that will unite this country. It also means creating an economic, social and environmental partnership among Canadians and between governments and the people they represent.

Canada as we know it today is a country where 1.5 million people are jobless, where the gap between the rich and the poor is widening by the day and where the middle class is in the process of disappearing.

Our health system is in jeopardy, our education system is deteriorating and major social programs are being eliminated. Moreover, the crucial environmental challenges we are facing are left unanswered. Every day sees another institution, a symbol of our Canadian identity, such as VIA Rail, Air Canada or the CBC, undermined or simply eradicated. The links that bond this country together are being cut unscrupulously. The problem is that the Prime Minister make a lot of fuss about the need to save Canada, but then his Minister of Finance tables a Budget that strikes at the heart and soul of this country. It will take more than declarations of love for Canada to save this nation and allow it to grow. It will take a government capable of making concrete commitments toward giving the country a strong and fair economy and strenghtening our social programs and national institutions. We will need a government committed to shaping Canada to be a better place to live for all Canadian men and women.

It would not be fair of me if, based on no evidence, I accused the government of a gap between its rhetoric and its action, so I draw your attention to the last throne speech delivered in 1989. It said that one of the government's objectives was:

> —to maintain a caring, compassionate society which will be able, through continuing economic prosperity, to meet its obligations and responsibilities to those who are less fortunate and in greatest need.

What did the government do toward this end? It introduced the clawback to old age pensions and family allowances. It abandoned funding of unemployment insurance. It announced the delay of long-promised national child care programs. It introduced the GST. It capped funding for social programs to B.C., Alberta and Ontario. It froze transfer payments for post-secondary education and health care.

I have not read the most recent edition of the Oxford Dictionary, but it seems to me that unless the meanings of caring and compassionate have changed—the words that this government in 1989 said it cared about, that it wanted to make sure existed in Canada—they have been revised by what this government has done. The policies I have just cited which have been put forward by this government have nothing to do with caring and compassion, but everything to do with indifference to the ordinary Canadian.

Surely if we are to have a renewed Canada, we must build a nation in which all people can share in its bounty, in which all Canadians can participate and in which all Canadians feel they genuinely belong.

In this throne speech, the government speaks of the need to build an economy competitive globally. Global competitiveness is the new corporate catch phrase and I am sure we are going to hear a lot about it in the months and years ahead. The question is not whether we should be competitive, of course we should be. The question is how do we get there.

The government and the corporate community insist that there is only one road. That is to further cut workers' wages, to reduce benefits, to cut social programs, to provide fewer government services, to weaken government and diminish standards to the levels of countries such as Mexico.

There is another way. There is not just one way to become competitive. There is another way and that is by investing in people. It means investing in research and development, investing in training and education. It means strengthening programs which increase economic security, ability and productivity of workers to compete with high wage, high productivity and low unemployment countries such as Germany.

The choice is clear. We can reduce Canada to the lowest common standard or work to join the world's best. We, on this side, say let us work to join the world's best.

The hon. member for Mississauga South who will chair the Fiannce Committee stated recently that the Canadian worker, and I quote, "can either work harder for a lesser pay or not work at all. It is quite simple. That is what competitiveness is all about."

That may be how this government defines competitiveness but, for the record, the New Democratic Party will not let the governement use this argument as a pretext to close down plants, to drive farmers to the brink of banckruptcy and to trample the rights of the Canadian workers' families.

The government must recognize that it is unacceptable that, for the sake of competitiveness, we have 1.5 million jobless people in our economy.

That is totally unjustifiable, Mr. Speaker. The NDP finds unacceptable as to the Canadian people.

The government undertook in the Speech from the Throne to create 2.5 million jobs by the year 2000. The question is how can that be done. That the government did not say.

I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this vague commitment will bring little comfort to the 10 percent plus Canadians who are without a jobs in 1991. It will not reassure the Canadian men and women who will loose their jobs in 1992, 1993, 1994 and so on, because this government has its mind set on pursuing destructive policies such as free trade, the GST, and high interest rates combined with an overvalued Canadian dollar.

[English]

While the 2.5 million job creation figure may sound impressive on the face of it, the reality is, given the fact that more people will be entering the workforce this decade and given the growth in the size of the workforce, the creation of 2.5 million jobs between now and the year 2000 will mean an unemployment rate, not of 4 per cent, not of 5 per cent, but of 10 per cent in the year 2000.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Ms. McLaughlin: This government is planning for permanent unemployment. A 10 per cent unemployment rate in Canada—millions of Canadians out of work—is not the New Democratic Party's definition of competitiveness. It clearly is the Conservative Party's definition of competitiveness: some workers have to be out of work; some workers cannot work; and some workers cannot be productive because that is going to be in the interests of this nation.

We say that is not in the interest of this nation. The human deficit is the largest deficit we have in Canada today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: The Prime Minister will say: "Well, we have created a lot of jobs". There is also the question of what kinds of jobs are being created.

A few days ago the finance minister said that to him, a job is a job is a job. There is little one can do in the face of such an insensitive remark but to ask the minister if he believes that a single mother forced to take a part-time job, making $100 a week, has a job just like a cabinet minister who makes thousands of dollars a week or a lawyer or a corporate executive who makes over hundreds of dollars an hour.

What would he say to the women some of my colleagues spoke to yesterday, one of whom has a husband who is a trucker and has not had work for eight months, thanks to the policies of this government? Here is a woman who supports her family by making $300 a week, working six days a week, paying $625 a month in rent and who has not been able to buy her teenage daughter anything new in two years. Would that minister tell that woman that a job is a job is job? Well it is not. It is poverty.

Job creation is about more than poverty wage jobs. It is about creating full-time jobs that have decent wages and dignity. It is about pay and employment equity. It is about ensuring that child care is available for all Canadians who require it in order to make a living.

Job creation is also a matter of improving training, research and development and education. This is the front that this government has failed miserably on. It promised the trade adjustment program after the trade deal. For most Canadians, it never happened. Its cuts to the National Research Council have devastated that council, and that respected institution and this government's spending on R and D continue to lag behind those of our international competitors.

In the education field, after years of cutting transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education, with cuts of $3.8 billion between 1990 and 1995 alone, for this government to turn around and identify education as a primary national objective in the throne speech is the ultimate hypocrisy.

You cannot cut post-secondary funding just a mere three months ago and now identify education as a priority. Somehow, the government's actions have to match its words. Strong curriculum and teaching objectives and goals are all part of quality education but adequate funding is crucial. I would suggest that if this government is serious about education and about attacking the problem of illiteracy, it restore funding immediately.

One last comment on the economy, Mr. Speaker. It is interesting to note that the Speech from the Throne finally recognizes—better late than never—that economy and national unity are closely intertwined. I have been saying so for a long time.

To the Saskatchewan family facing the loss of its farm because of excessively high interest rates, interest rates are a matter of national unity. To the Windsor worker who has lost his job because of free trade, free trade is a matter of national unity.

To the young woman laid off by a textile industry in Montreal, it is also a matter of national unity. To the northern residents who must pay the GST when everything already costs so much, taxes are a matter of national unity.

Thus, for the sake of national unity and competitiveness, I ask the government to recognize once and for all that free trade, GST and high interest rates are bad policies that must be rescinded.

[English]

I would now like to comment on some of the other aspects of national unity in the agenda put forward by this government.

I would like to address in particular issues concerning the constitutional aspects of national unity and the call for non-partisan co-operation. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that the future of Canada is more important than the fate of any one political party. It is more important than the career of any one of us in the House of Commons. Our decisions and actions in the coming months must be guided by that reality. The good of the nation comes first always.

I believe that we can find a way to work together for the good of the nation. I say to this House with honesty and with a depth of emotion that the members of the New Democratic Party will do all that we can to work to forge a common future. That is our responsibility and we take it very seriously.

At the same time, I say with honesty and emotion that the members of the New Democratic Party and all Canadians cannot be handed a take it or leave it deal and be told to accept it in the name of non-partisanship. Non-partisanship is about bringing people together into the process from the beginning. It is about truly listening, incorporating constructive suggestions put forward and it is about respect. It is about respecting the views of others and it is about true co-operation. Non-partisanship does not mean playing by only one set of rules, the government's rules; it means setting the rules together.

I say to the government and to the Prime Minister: Let us begin by opening up the process. The establishment of another traditional parliamentary committee I think will signal to most Canadians more of the same, more of the old way, more of politicians talking to other politicians and more delays in dealing with the real issues.

This House could move to immediately establish a constituent assembly based on Canadian reality and on Canadian needs. There are many other models across the country, but we do not have to just accept those. We have enough innovation here. We could create our own, one that meets our own needs. We should establish that format so that Canadians are directly involved in the process from the beginning.

If we cannot start with something new, how will Canadians have any confidence that the result will be a new and renewed Canada?

I believe that we could have a constituent assembly where there would be elected officials and non-elected officials, where there would be a genuine guaranteed participation of aboriginal groups, women, northerners, multicultural and official language group communities in addition to participation by our elected colleagues in territorial and provincial legislatures.

I know the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs and the Prime Minister will say that a parliamentary committee, the traditional way as opposed to a constituent assembly, has been established by this government because it is up to elected representatives to take responsibility to set the course of the nation. By doing so, they will say, elected representatives will gain credibility and the trust of Canadians.

We elected representatives do have a crucial role but surely the way to earn the trust and support of Canadians is to demonstrate that we have been listening to what Canadians have been saying. Canadians have been saying: "We want a different way. We want to feel included in the process from the beginning".

It surely cannot be that difficult to be somewhat creative, somewhat innovative and to try something new that will respond to the calls from the public and will be a truly co-operative effort in forging this new nation.

As it stands under the government's proposals now, which I hope it is prepared to reconsider, with the various committees that have been travelling the country and will travel the country, in the final analysis it will be the government itself that will be able to retain all levers of control, to decide what evidence it will hear and what it will listen to. Will it just perhaps follow an agenda that it intended to follow all along? That is something that we all as parliamentarians have to address; we are saying to Canadians at the beginning that their views count. I suggest we can do that by a process of including a broader range of people right from the beginning.

We must continue to work for a fair and open process because Canada quite simply cannot withstand another failed round of constitutional discussions.

As for the content of those discussions on national unity, my party will continue to put forward ideas that we sincerely believe will contribute to strenghtening our national unity.

We have already made positive suggestions on the contents of a new Constitution and on the need to not only conclude a constitutional agreement but also agreements on economy, environment and social programs.

Therefore, I ask the government and the Prime Minister, in the spirit of the call to non-partisanship that is reflected in the Speech from the Throne, to consider those propositions and try to integrate them into a program to strenghten national unity.

• (1650)

Let me close by saying that having recently travelled extensively throughout the country, I have seen a positive change in the mood of the country. I think some of the acrimony or the bitterness that emerged after the Meech Lake process has diminished, and Canadians are really beginning to renew their search for compromise and agreement.

I am optimistic that we can succeed in meeting the many issues before us, in meeting the unique responsibilities of Quebec, the home of French language and culture in North America, and in addressing the real concerns of aboriginal people, the west, Ontario, the north, the Atlantic provinces and all the people who live within our borders.

I believe we can, through acknowledging diversity, make that diversity our true strength, our true uniqueness as a country. The goal must not simply be keeping Canada together; the goal must be building a truly better Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: There will in the coming months be much discussion about what is wrong with Canada, but let us never lose sight about what is right with Canada. Ours is really a marvellous achievement, an achievement of diverse cultures coming together, of people separated by great distances creating common bonds, and of individuals and communities sharing common values and common objectives.

I recently read something that a Canadian song writer, Andrew Cash, wrote when he returned from a trip to India, an old country that has a long history. He observed that Canada:

> —has more space and time than, perhaps, any other nation in the world to be thoughtful and innovative, not just in accumulating wealth, but in the field of human understanding, in pioneering new ways for different peoples to live together in harmony.

It is our responsibility as parliamentarians to take this session of Parliament and use it to be thoughtful and innovative, to find new ways for Canadians to live together, to work with all Canadians in building a Canada that says to the world: "This is what can be achieved when a nation takes the gifts it has been given and dedicates itself to creating a society that values and cares about each and every one of us".

The New Democratic Party pledges to the Canadian people to work toward and offer constructive suggestions to make sure that this great country of Canada, the one that many of us grew up in, will be here for our children. In my view, we do not have the privilege of dealing away this country. We must take the responsibility for building it. I look forward to that task, as does my party, with great enthusiasm.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago we heard the Prime Minister calling Canadians to take heed to the celebration that we will experience here on Parliament Hill on July 1.

The Prime Minister did not talk about the thousands upon thousands of Canadians who this July 1, like this June 1, like this May 1, will be experiencing hunger and frustration and disappointment and despair because this government is not meeting its responsibilities to Canadians.

I listened to the Prime Minister remind us of the fact that this is a country that must operate in the public interest. I could not agree more.

I have watched this government for six and a half years. This has been a government of the private interest. The private interest of American Express. When it wants to deal, there is a turn around time of 24 hours. The private interest of the Iraqi spokesperson. Thousands upon thousands of people around the world are waiting in line for months and years to come to Canada, but he receives a quick turnaround because he has a private interest.

The private interest of the Boeing Corporation. We remember when the Prime Minister, a mere two years ago, stood in the House and said that he was introducing legislation to save those jobs. Now the single largest employer in the city of Toronto has its livelihood threatened by a takeover from a company that is asking for $500 million in taxpayers' aid before it even guarantees Canadians jobs.

What is the public response of this government? Since the Tory takeover in 1984 of over 900 foreign takeovers, Investment Canada has not overturned a single takeover.

When the Prime Minister talks about the private interest and asks us to rally around the public interest of Canadians, I say to the Prime Minister there is a public interest here. There is the public interest of the women in the gallery today who were in tears. The members opposite may laugh and chuckle but those women were in tears because they saw their families' livelihood being dealt away by a trade deal signed by this Prime Minister.

In my own community there is the public interest of the steel workers. From December 1989 to December 1990, imports of steel from the United States, during this great window of opportunity supposedly created by the trade deal, increased by 166 per cent while exports from Canada to the United States decreased by 12 per cent. Is it any wonder that in my own community over the last year unemployment has increased by 67 per cent?

I want to say to the Prime Minister that when he tells Canadians to wave the flag on Parliament Hill on July 1, he should also tell Canadians that by restoring the economy, the sound economy of this country, we will begin the road toward constitutional and economic sanity.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made a fine speech today in the House and I would like to believe him. He has mentionned the fact that we must work together, that we should not indulge in narrow partisanship about the constitutional issues. I feel the same way and I completely agree with this idea, Mr. Speaker.

But we must remember, Mr. Speaker, who has indulged in partisanship for the last three years concerning the future of our country. It is the same man on the other side who claims now he is going to revitalize Canada, the very person who has created a situation where people, across the country, do not believe in our Canada.

It is neither the leader of the Opposition, nor I, the member for Hamilton East, it is not the other hon. members who have gone to Quebec, time and again, to tell them: "If the Lake Meech Acord is not ratified, you will be humiliated." It is the Prime Minister who has kept spreading this rumour. That is what he is doing, Mr. Speaker.

• (1700)

A wave of the magic wand and the Prime Minister is supposed to be able to restore a sense of team work here in the House of Commons. I want to believe him because I agree with the statement made by the House leader of the government side that this is probably a turning point in Canadian history.

Those Canadians outside the province of Quebec who see the constitutional question as just another chapter of Canadian sabre rattling are wrong. Those outside the province of Quebec who think they can merely excise the wishes—

—the will, the aspiration and the history of a people who has been living here for 400 years, I will tell them: You are wrong!

[English]

Those people outside the province of Quebec who believe, as does the leader of the new Reform Party, that you can have a Canada without Quebec are wrong.

There are two parties now on the federal scene who aspire to achieve political success at the expense of the country. On the one hand you have the bloc——who wants a Quebec without Canada. On the other hand, you have the Reform Party who wants to have a Canada without Quebec.

An hon. member: They are crazy.

Mrs. Copps: But in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, every hon. member, whatever his political colour or history who really wants to have a Canada, should understand de facto that it must include Quebec.

[English]

Those people in my own province who recently spoke before the Ontario committee on constitutional reform and believe that somehow the cost of separation would be borne only by a single province, their neighbouring province of Quebec, are wrong.

Thirty billion dollars worth of business takes place annually between my province and the province of Quebec. Those who think that we can arbitrarily cut them out of the Canadian equation at no cost to the rest of Canada are dead wrong.

The constitutional clock is ticking. On this side of the House we made very specific proposals. Last December we called for the Prime Minister to act immediately to give the parliamentary committee of Beaudoin–Edwards an expanded mandate. My leader, Jean Chrétien, the only national leader to appear before the Bélanger–Campeau committee, spoke in a very eloquent fashion about the steps that must be taken immediately to restore constitutional sanity to this country.

What have we had from the Prime Minister? We have had a disgusting exercise of constitutional strip–tease. He takes it off one by one by one. Two months ago he announced that he would be announcing an announcement of an announcement next September of a committee that might have a chance to report sometime next year. Yesterday he announced the announcement of the committee of which the membership will be announced in September and we still do not know whether the committee will be mandated to examine a notion as simple as either a national referendum or a constituent assembly. Further chapters to follow.

I say to the Prime Minister, the time for the constitutional games are over. Now is the time to act, and to act in the best interest of all Canadians.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister told us earlier this afternoon—and I think everyone, including me, would agree with that, that the Parliament of Canada and our ability to survive as a nation is much more important than the fate of any political party, and that is true. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I, as a Canadian, cannot help but ask myself a question, and I know that is tough. Some members close by will tell me: Mrs. Copps, you are being much too hard on the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, do you think the Prime Minister can in fact regain the confidence of the people, after having lied so many times about the constitutional issue?

A few weeks ago, I held a public meeting in my constituency and about 300 people attended. I can tell you this was not an English community meeting, which does not even really exist, since 34 of the 35 people who took the floor chose not to speak in their mother tongue, English, and all of the participants, who wanted some answers about the economic situation, the interest rate policy, the monetary policy, and the constitutional policy, said: In order to rebuild this country, we have to get rid of the Prime Minister.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, we know the economic problems. We know the inflationary problems caused by this government's insidious GST. We also know that Canadians are unanimous on one question and it is that this Prime Minister has rolled the dice one too many times.

If this Prime Minister really cares about Canada, then maybe he should rethink his political future. Maybe he should step aside and give a chance to somebody who really wants to rebuild this country. Maybe he should take the high road and let Canadians, by way of an election, choose for themselves the leader who can rebuild a true Canadian constitutional family. Take it to the people.

This Prime Minister expects all Canadians to rally around the absurd notion that he has taken the politics out of constitutional discussions. I sat here in the House when my leader was away on medical leave and watched the Prime Minister tear strips off him daily in his absence. I sat here as the self-same Prime Minister then called out to the opposition and said "we must be non-partisan".

We all realize how important this country is, and I for one was among those who were prepared to take a very difficult position on constitutional reform and support the Prime Minister, as I did in 1987. I believed that the capacity for reconciliation and the greater good of the country was more important than single political initiatives. But the Prime Minister has betrayed us too many times, and for him to come into the House today and ask Canadians to believe that he will be non-partisan on the issue of constitutional reform is just too difficult for Canadians to believe. It stretches the credulity of even the most silent backbencher on the government side.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the next 14 months will be crucial in the history of Canada. I am not sure that the tide has turned yet, although the leader of the New Democratic Party said so in her remarks. But I think we have the ability to make the tide turn.

• (1710)

For example, we made very precise proposals in that regard. In fact, they included elements of Senate reform, elements of monetary policy reform, elements of power sharing reform, elements providing that all government levels would have to respond to the needs of every citizen and that any decision on power sharing would have to be made in the interests of the citizens, not of the government level.

When my leader attended the Belanger-Campeau Commission and when, after his appearance, he issued a statement in Montreal, he was very clear about the timetable that we expected. Unfortunately, the government ignored it. I do not know why it is dragging its feet. Mr. Speaker, we already lost six months and we expect to lose another three. We lost almost a year before the Prime Minister gave Parliament the tools that are needed to reform the Constitution.

The Prime Minister argued earlier that the word of the people, the uppermost word, is the word of the Parliament. Why, then, does he not give us the tools, right now, so that we can start working to reestablish the constitutional sovereignty in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Speaker, we in the Liberal Party are prepared to start working now. We are prepared to start working today, because the constitutional clock is ticking and too much time has already been wasted.

We ask the Prime Minister, why wait until fall? Start now with the process of allowing the people of Canada to have their say through their elected members of Parliament. Unlike the NDP, we do not want to wait until Spicer and Beaudoin–Edwards report. Certainly their reports can be complementary to the work that is being done by this parliamentary committee, with the objective of looking at all aspects of constitutional change.

Given the time frames that are facing us, whether or not they are of our own choosing, they are a political reality. The time has come to get down to business in this Parliament.

It is strange, as we talk about the future of the country, as the Prime Minister himself says, so much is at stake. Why is it that we are the only Parliament in Canada that is forbidden by the fiats of the Prime Minister to deal with issues other than the simple amending formula in the Beaudoin–Edwards committee? It makes absolutely no sense that that committee's hands should be tied at a time when we should be listening to Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

We have proposed a Canada round. In fact, a number of the proposals articulated today by the Prime Minister, were taken, as a matter of fact, from speeches delivered on several occasions by the Leader of the Opposition. He called for the Canada round because he understood that for constitutional reform to truly work, it has to involve the empowerment of every Canadian. It cannot be a special interest exercise.

We believe that we have the political will and that, when they realize that they are wanted by the rest of Canada, Quebecers will say yes to Canada. The time has now come for the Parliament of Canada to say yes to Quebec, to say yes to the distinct society and also to say yes to Senate reform and to power sharing among regions which will really reflect a renewed Canada.

The task is weighty and time is running out. The time has come to start working and we expect that, right today, the Prime Minister will appoint a new constitutional committee to really do the work that must be done in order to restore to Canadians their confidence in the best country in the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Hamilton East was complaining about the record of Investment Canada.

I share her concerns about that deplorable record. That member was a member of the Liberal Party, which was in office until late 1984. When we look at its record, we find that Canada had more foreign ownership and control per capita than any other industrialized nation and more than many developing nations.

Despite FIRA's record, less than one half of the approved foreign take–overs intended to increase their investment or provide any new jobs. Since the beginning of 1984, 15 per cent of those approved promised neither new jobs nor new investment.

I am wondering whether the member associates herself with the attitude of the Liberal government of those days with respect to FIRA and the way it used it, or believes there should be a new policy toward foreign ownership in Canada.

Ms. Copps: Unfortunately, the member should talk to his colleague, the member for Vancouver Kingsway.

I do not know how many times in this House the member for Vancouver Kingsway has urged that the government re-institute FIRA because he thought it did such a good job protecting Canadian investment.

While he is talking to his colleague, he might want to pass a word along to the premier of Ontario, who not only closed his eyes, but kissed Varity good-bye as it moved its operations from Canada to the United States.

The former Massey-Ferguson got the blessing of Bob Rae when it moved off to the United States with Varity Corp.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Hamilton East and I can say that she talks a lot—very well by the way—but she does very little.

Mr. Speaker, if we could give an award for partisanship, the hon. member for Hamilton East would win handily if it were put to a vote. I never heard the hon. member, although the government did not always—

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, nobody is perfect and no government is perfect, but the hon. member for Hamilton East has never, not even once since I am a member of this assembly, acknowledged that the government was trying to do something. She conveniently forgets that it is this government, our Prime Minister, who recognized the distinct society and worked assiduously to try and save Canada.

We would not be talking about the Constitution if it had not been for her party, if influential members of her party had not done the utmost behind the scenes to sink the Accord. She is now saying that the Canadian federation is in need of changes, but between the talk and the action there is quite a gap, as she seems unable to propose anything. Her leader says one thing, only to contradict himself the following day.

We are talking about transfer of responsibilities to the provinces. That is what the provincial governments want, but her leader is against any transfer of powers to the provinces. Could the hon. member for Hamilton East tell us—as deputy leader of her party—whether she is in favour of transferring powers to the provinces? What kinds of powers would she agree to transfer and how would she do it? Let her make some suggestions, we might find them interesting.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): But at least our leader had the guts to put these proposals before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, while your leader won't even raise the question in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I can talk about the political aspect of Meech. Is that all right? Don't ask me about the rest, because if the hon. member thinks the Prime Minister did a good job, it is because she does not know Canada outside Quebec. He sent a gentleman who could not even run for dog catcher, former Senator Lowell Murray, who was sent across Canada to sell Meech Lake. Why? Because he wanted to go back to Quebec to tell them: You have been humiliated! The reason people will not accept Meech Lake is because they are against Quebec. He used Meech to damage the Liberal Party, but he did not bother to say one word outside Quebec.

I made speeches in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, to explain how important it was for Quebec. The Prime Minister sent Lowell Murray. Come to my riding, Mr. Speaker, and ask ten people who Lowell Murray is. They don't know.

• (1720)

They don't know him from Adam.

An hon. member: The dog catcher!

Ms. Copps: He couldn't even run for dog catcher. Imagine!

Our position on the transfer of powers was clear. We stated quite clearly there is nothing sacred about the division of powers. In fact, we have to start analyzing the division of powers between the federal and the provincial governments. We should start, bearing in mind what is good for Canadians, what will minimize duplication and repetition, and what gives us the best return on our investment. That is what we want to do, and this was made quite clear to the Bélanger-Campeau Commission on several occasions but, unfortunately, the hon. member insists on claiming that her leader is the only person with a political position.

If he really wanted to sell Meech Lake, he could have done so by acting responsibly as the leader of the government. What we have here is not the leader of a government but the leader of a political party, and that is why my speech was partisan as well.

It shocks me to hear him claim he is going to save Canada, when he cannot even say the same thing in both languages, in English and French, across the country.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): I have a very short question.

The preceding speaker from Hamilton East, I am quite sure, has taken note that nowhere in the throne speech was there one word in reference to medicare, the cornerstone of our social policy in this country and not a word. Does she not find it strange that at a time when medicare is being eroded this government does not even lend one word of support or encouragement to medicare?

Ms. Copps: That is not surprising if you look at the financial record of the government. In the last budget the former Minister of Finance, who is now being charged with the responsibility of making us competitive, savaged the transfer payments from the federal government to provinces for health and for post-secondary education. The savage cuts by the Minister of Finance and by the Prime Minister really laid bare for all the world to see how false their claim is that they are now going to invest in education and health care for Canadians.

I think the proof was in the pudding when the government recently defeated a motion by the opposition to defend medicare. It is not even prepared to vote for it in the House of Commons.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable pleasure that I rise today to comment on the speech of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, which opened this session of the 34th Parliament.

His Excellency has expressed, on behalf of our government, a number of particularly pertinent themes. Our overriding concern at this time must be for the unity of our nation and, within that context, for all of the elements which contribute to a strong and vibrant Canada. This includes creating a political structure within which all Canadians can find free and full expression for their aspirations.

It also includes, as the throne speech rightly points out, the assurance of economic prosperity, of a clean environment, of improved representation and of a stable, compassionate and caring society.

If, as the throne speech states, the family is the most fundamental building block of Canadian society, then the elements of a strong and vibrant Canada must include the protection and nurturing of the family. It is for this reason that our government has committed itself to review its policies in relation to the family

This is a commitment that I and many of my colleagues have worked hard for and I want to express most sincerely my appreciation to the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues for listening to our concerns on this issue.

I am also grateful that this government has indicated that in the context of its over all plan for constitutional reform it is prepared to act to ensure that our support for families is effective, fair, efficient and above all, that the rights of families to choose their own lifestyles are protected. This commitment, I believe, is confirmed by the statement that "the test of constitutional reform will be fairness, effectiveness, efficiency and the protection afforded to the rights of all Canadians".

The family is the most fundamental building block of Canadian society. Strong families have had, and will continue to have, an enormous effect on building and strengthening our nation. No matter what part of the country we come from, we see this impact in our history.

We recall the early settlers of both our founding nations; the families of United Empire Loyalists who established themselves in the maritime provinces—

In Quebec, we know that families have been for a long time one of the pillars of the Quebecer society. Family respect and loyalty have played a key role in the building of the Quebec culture which is so rich, warm, distinct and open to the rest of Canada.

[English]

In Ontario and western Canada we celebrate the remembrance of our families, who often came in waves of immigration from England, Ireland, Germany, the Ukraine, from China and many other Asian countries, in fact from throughout the world. Everywhere in Canada our aboriginal peoples celebrate the endurance of their families and often-times heroic endurance that has given them the strength to survive enormous cultural, social and economic change.

Whatever our origins, we all look back on our families and relate stories of how their courage and determination built our nation. It is only with strong families which feel secure in their inheritance that we can continue to grow and prosper as a nation.

I have to say that there are problems. Over the years our laws, particularly taxation laws, have not kept pace with the changes in society and in family structures. In our well-meaning attempts to fix problems we have created an extraordinarily complex system of deductions, credits, refundable credits, exemptions, support payments, sales tax credits and support programs; a system which almost no one can understand and one in which different elements often work at cross purposes or to the disadvantage of certain lifestyles, particularly traditional family lifestyles.

Although I will highlight certain examples today, I cannot refer to all of the anomalies in our laws and regulations which conspire against the family. Let me say, however, that I recognize that most of them are paradoxically rooted in the concept that the traditional family is the norm, and in old-fashioned and sometimes inappropriate concepts of dependency.

A simple example of this is the well-known case of two senior citizens each receiving the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement. If they get married, they lose about $3,000 per year. Similar situations occur with veterans widows' allowances. If the survivor marries, the allowances are reduced or cut off. Examples abound in the Income Tax Act and I will come to these in more detail later.

The issue is that we constantly put an economic disincentive on marriage and that the government through its policies interferes in family decision making, particularly as it relates to child care.

Let us examine, then, the tax system as it affects families. I wish there was a way to make it simple but there is not, and that is part of the problem. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you and my colleagues will bear with me.

The first issue is the impact of the tax system on marriage. Although the tax system is essentially based on individual income, rules have been introduced relating to certain credits where eligibility credits are based on family income. The GST is a good place to start. First let me say, without apology, that I support and supported this progressive and much-needed tax reform because I know that consumption taxes are fairer than income taxes which only penalize success. In my view, there is one important flaw in the GST. It relates to the credits for low income earners.

Because the rules refer to family income, the result is that two people living together, each making only $24,000 per year, that is with a family income of $48,000, can retain full GST credits and bonus credits totalling some $580. The minute they are married they lose the entire credit because their family income now exceeds the limit. In fact, two people making only $17,000 each would not be eligible for the credit if they were to marry. Add children to the family and the benefit to the unmarried couple is even more significant.

Another example is the principal residential exemption. Under the income tax system, profit from the sale of a home is considered non-taxable capital gains. This exempts the taxpayer from any capital gains tax on the sale of a home. Marrieds are permitted only one exemption because they are not permitted to share income. Since persons who just live together can share income, they are eligible for two exemptions.

There are also problems with the capital gains exemption, which I will not detail today because of the lack of time. However, they are similarly related to the examples just given.

What is also surprising is the rules for disabled attendant care. If an unmarried spouse is disabled, he or she can pay their spouse for care and claim a $5,000 deduction at income tax time if the disabled partner's tax rate is higher than that of his or her spouse. Again, marrieds are prevented from doing so by the attribution rules.

The equivalent to married exemption was intended to give single parents the same tax advantages that married couples enjoy, that is a spousal deduction. Unfortunately, many unmarried couples are manipulating the credit to their advantage. Unmarried couples with children can claim two equivalent credits, each worth $1,400. As a result, the unmarried couple can be almost $1,300 better off after tax.

Let me give another example. The threshold of the refundable child tax credit is $24,800 and is based on family income. Unmarrieds can each make $24,000 and still receive their full credit. A married two-income family with the same incomes as the unmarried couple will lose the entire credit because their family income exceeds the threshold. In fact, the married family could have a family income of $17,000 less than the unmarried family income and still lose their entire credit.

The second major issue in the tax system is the combined effect of having only one earner in a family, along with the effect of marriage.

The first of these examples is the effect on family allowance. Family allowance rules require that the higher income spouse in a married family report the family allowance as income. Unmarried families can avoid this rule; the lower income spouse can claim the family allowance and reduce the tax burden of the higher income spouse.

The unmarried couple also benefits under the new family allowance repayment rules. Here family allowance benefits under this scheme are available in full only until the individual's income reaches $51,000. Unmarrieds can avoid the repayment threshold either through income splitting or by the lower income spouse claiming family allowance.

Two earner married families may not be able to use income splitting measures but they do benefit from the fact that the threshold is based on individual income. In a one-income family, the benefits are taxed back when the family's single earner's income is $51,000. A two-income family, however, with each parent earning $51,000, for a combined total of $102,000, retains their benefits in full. Concerning the child care deduction, if you are married you cannot pay your spouse to remain home and care for the children. If you are unmarried and living together with children, you can pay your spouse for caring for the children and then claim the payments for child care expense deduction which amount to $4,000 for each child under seven and $2,000 for children ages seven to fourteen.

Within the marriage category, however, the one income family is hit the hardest since it is only eligible for a $200 tax credit supplement to cover all the costs of raising children within the home. The working married couple on the other hand can obtain the full benefit of the deductions. The full costs of raising children within the home are not considered by the present system. The system interferes with parental decision making by making out of home child care the preferred economic option. The system is not neutral or passive.

To summarize the impact of just some of these rules, I would like to table an analysis of the tax circumstances of two families in Ontario. I have that here in both languages. In these examples each family has $60,000 of income. Similar examples could be presented from each of the provinces, but of course I am only presenting one here as an example.

One family lives a traditional life-style and has one income and three children, two under seven and one child over seven. One of the parents cares for the children at home. They are married. The other family is the same in every respect except that one of the younger children is unrelated to the others, both parents work—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We require unanimous consent for the hon. member to table a document. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Johnson: The other family, as I was saying, is the same in every respect except that one of the younger children is unrelated to the others. Both parents work, earning $36,000 and $24,000, for a total of $60,000. The adults are not married.

Let me say at the outset that this analysis is designed to dramatize the impact of the Income Tax Act on these two families, but it does not by any means use all the loopholes that are available. It may seem incredible, but the total taxes paid by these two families differ by over $12,200. That is over $1,000 per month more tax that the traditional family pays. Almost half of this can be related to the $36,000—$24,000 income split. The other half is due only to the fact that the traditional couple is married.

In the examples that I have tabled, the income splitting effect has been separated from the marriage effect by also including data for a married couple with the same income split.

The tables show that the total taxes of a one earner family with three children and a family income of $60,000 are more than $6,700 higher than the two income married couple with the same number of children and the same income. The total taxes of a married two income couple with three children and a family income of $60,000 are more than $5,400 higher than the unmarried two earner couple in the same circumstances.

As I have said, the combined effect is that the total taxes of a one earner married couple with three children and a family income of $60,000 are more than $12,200 higher than for the unmarried couple in similar circumstances.

There is no doubt that we have a problem, but where do we go from here? The answer lies in the throne speech. We must carefully review not just tax legislation but all legislation that affects families. There is no easy solution. We are all aware of the difficult financial circumstances Canada faces with its mounting debt and seemingly intractable deficits. We need a complete review of all legislation and regulations that deal with family. Fairness must be the keystone of any response that we develop.

The other guiding principles in the throne speech—efficiency, effectiveness, and the protection of individual rights—must also be fundamental to our response. Directionally we must be certain that we are fiscally responsible. Family support already costs this government over $10 billion a year. Our challenge therefore is not to spend more money but to do a better job with what we have. The issue is fairness.

One of the difficulties we have is defining the family and developing laws that treat all families fairly. I submit that the definition of a family should not be based on relationships between adults, but on the presence and circumstances of children. Children define families and are its most vulnerable members.

Surely there are opportunities for us to combine the dizzying array of family support systems—family allowance, GST credits, child tax credits, equivalent to married exemptions, spousal credits and social assistance plans, all of these—into one meaningful payment that can be directed to children based on their circumstances, not that of their parents. This would allow more meaningful support to be directed, for example, to children in single adult households who are truly disadvantaged. It would also mean that parents would have a greater freedom in deciding whether or not to care for their children at home.

An alternative would be to develop a system of family taxation, a system through which people gain access to preferred methods of taxation through commitment to family responsibilities.

Another approach might be to extend all family attribution rules to all persons in a household.

It is not my purpose today to propose an all encompassing solution to a very complex problem. Rather, it is to applaud our government and our Prime Minister for their forthrightness and courage in opening this subject up for discussion and for committing to review all aspects of government policy that relate to families.

An opportunity exists for us to re-establish the family as a unifying factor as we design our constitutional relationships. I can foresee a national program of family support that binds the country with common standards and commitments to national well-being, similar to our national medicare program and our pension legislation.

It may be appropriate to establish a program that is consistent nationally and can be augmented by provinces or regions to account for local differences in living standards, culture and lifestyles. This would mean abandoning the Canada Assistance Plan, but we must not be afraid to establish clearer responsibilities and delegate taxing authority to the specific level of government that has the spending responsibility.

Clearly, I support constitutional models which have some shared responsibilities, but which limit the national role to setting and taking responsibility for minimum national standards. I prefer universality and I hope that we can get away from complicated tax brackets.

In closing, we are faced with many problems, but also with an historic opportunity. In the context of revitalizing our Constitution, we can reassess our approach to families and develop laws which are, above all, fair to all families, which are effective and efficient, and which return to parents the primary responsibility and the ability to choose what they consider the best form of upbringing for their children.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few comments and maybe ask a question here or there.

Listening to the Prime Minister this afternoon and the hon. member who has just spoken, there seems to be a linkage in the throne speech between Canadian unity and the economy. I agree with it and our party has been saying it all along. I am glad that the government has finally realized it.

I do not understand how, if you examine the economy and what is happening and the policies of this government, it can put forth such a throne speech and believe in it. It is certainly not doing anything for the economy, or more accurately it is doing the wrong things for the economy.

I want to give a very specific example. In my riding, the unemployment rate has gone up in the last little while. Nationally it has gone down and the government has bragged about that, but it has gone up in my riding. The unemployment rate is at 18.5 per cent in my riding. Last week, Canada Post announced that it would eliminate 11.5 jobs at the post office in Campbellton, a city in my riding. It is going to relocate those jobs to another city farther south where the unemployment rate is much lower.

That does not make sense. I would have thought that since the unemployment rate is so high in an area, the government would try to at least preserve what employment is there, if not add to it.

There seems to be a movement in government toward a lack of compassion or thought. People are just a bunch of numbers. The government is eliminating the federal presence right across Canada while trying to convince people that this is a country that has to remain united.

It is unbelievable that there is nothing in the throne speech about job creation. We are talking about 10 years from now. There might be the creation of maybe 2 million jobs, or whatever.

What is happening today? That is the key—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, 1,500,000 Canadian men and women are looking for work across this country. There is nothing in the speech from the Throne that can give them hope. There is nothing in it for the fishermen or the workers in the mining and forest industries.

I ask the honorable member who has the floor if he can explain why the Speech from the Throne contains no job-creating program.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Calgary North, I must say that I have five questioners here, six now.

If you would like to use this question, I would like to get everybody in. It will be a little difficult, but I will try.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief in response to that rather rambling question, which was somewhat unconnected to the speech that I made.

I think the issue of jobs and the health of the economy is best outlined by the way the interest rates have been coming down. The government has been applying its economic policies to get this country moving again.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I want to very sincerely applaud not only the remarks that my hon. colleague made today, but the tremendous and intense effort that he has put into the family caucus.

As you may or may not know, he chairs the family caucus. It has been a refreshing time since the hon. colleague has taken on that role.

He made a comment that seems to underlie his motivation. It dealt simply with fairness. That is essentially what he is after.

I will ask a question and then follow it up with a bit of background to provide the basis from which the question comes. It concerns the family caucus.

I am inquiring whether the family caucus has addressed child care as it relates to the child care needs for single parents, as it relates to those who choose to stay at home, the relative fairness of existing tax laws, and that sort of thing.

The background I wish to provide the member I gained from knocking on doors. There are situations where single parents have found it beneficial to them and their family to stay at home and raise their children, on the one hand. On the other, there are people who prefer to stay at home and raise their families in an environment where there is a spouse working and bringing income into the family.

There is the question of income tax rules affecting both of those situations. I also knocked on a farmer's door where the wife said that if the husband hired a tractor driver, the tractor driver's wages are deemed to be a business expense while if she hires day-care and rides the tractor, the day-care expenses that she incurs are not deemed to be an expense.

That is the background for that question.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from my hon. colleague.

I would like to mention that the issue is certainly fairness. Within that issue is the issue of choice. We cannot develop a program that gives everyone the choice to do just what they want to do because of economic limitations.

We have to develop a program which delivers support to children so their parents and guardians can best choose what type of child care they should have. Within that concept, I would be willing to see considered a system whereby spouse can pay spouse to look after children. We could do away with the spousal deduction and allow it to be compensated for by one spouse to another in the tax system.

That system would also lead to homemaker pensions, and things like that. I think there is a lot to be said for that type of approach.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast, then the hon. member for Northumberland, then the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia and then the hon. member for Oshawa, in that order.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I am glad to see that the hon. member is involved with fairness for families, but will he tell us how he thinks that raising taxes, I think it is 33 times since 1984, primarily for low and middle-income Canadians, has helped the state of the family in Canada.

Will he tell us how his interest rates have helped low and middle-income families pay mortgages? How his prolonged high dollar has helped families try to keep their jobs?

Will he tell us one single thing his government has done since 1984 that has helped the cause of building stronger families across Canada?

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, very briefly, as far as the economic issue of raising taxes is concerned, we do not deny that we have raised taxes to take care of the deficit left to us by the Liberals. I do not want to get into a long discussion on that.

As far as the one single thing the government has done, I think we should look back at the $130 million announced in the last session to help with the problem of violence in the family.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, in the member's earlier comments, he, as have other members in the House debating the throne speech, referred to the section in the throne speech, and I will quote it:

> Our unity is strengthened by a strong economy.

Certainly, everybody in this House knows that we lack in a strong sense of unity in this country at this time and we certainly lack a strong economy.

It goes on to say in the throne speech:

> The disunity in the face of the global economic challenge invites decline.

As we stand here and debate, there is a growing crisis in our country that is brought about by actions of truckers across this country. I would say that action is simply symbolic of a crisis that is expressed to me day after day after day by constituents in my riding.

However, I get the sense on this side of the House that members on the other side of the House do not have that same sense of urgency and crisis existing in their constituencies.

I feel that we have right here in this House of Commons a constituent assembly and that many of us are prepared right now, today, to get on with the issue of our Constitution and our unity issues.

I want to ask the member of Parliament across the way if he has personally heard stories of the frustration and crisis among his constituents. If he has, how does he respond to his constituents and tell them to wait that it will all come to pass. I have a terrible time trying to assure my constituents that their economy is going improve and that their country is going to stay together.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to comment briefly. If the member opposite would like an example of how disunity invites decline, she should have listened to the member for Hamilton East a little earlier.

As far as the other comments are concerned, I know very well the frustrations of unemployment, having experienced it at times in my own family. I also know that the only way to get the country back on a healthy track is to stick with firm policies that reduce the deficit, bring interest rates down and get the country back to work.

An hon. member: Very wise.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I really only have a comment. I commend the hon. member for Calgary North on what I think was a very outstanding, meaningful and practical contribution to the debate. I know the hon. member for Calgary North has developed a reputation as a hard worker, especially in this area of research into family issues, and fairness and equity in family taxation.

It is good that this House acquiesced unanimously to allow the tabling of some documents which the hon. member prepared. I would urge that all members have a look at them. I think it provides some important background material for deliberations which may come down the road.

I think that there are ways of rolling together this plethora of programs that we have relating to the family, to child care, to child tax credits and so on, of putting them perhaps all together in a more meaningful way, a way which may not require more money being spent. I think it is important that we not try to buy our way out, the way the opposition has suggested, the way the opposition have acted in the past, the way the present Ontario government suggests, that somehow you help young people by mortgaging their future.

I just want to congratulate the hon. member. One question I would ask him is: how can he justify in any way the actions of those who suggest that in order to solve the problems of today, we borrow more and more and more. Does he see that as a solution to the needs that have been expressed here today by opposition members?

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I do not see any excuse for borrowing money. As I said in my presentation, we spend some $10 billion a year now on family support. I think we have to do a better job with it.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I was struck by the sincerity and the thoroughness of the arguments the member put forward about things that were wrong with the tax that he supported just last year.

I am a little lost and confused. In this Chamber perhaps you can make that argument that this is all very well in the long run. I would like to ask him one simple question. Outside this Chamber, on Wellington Street this afternoon, are families whose lives have been ruined by the economic policies of this government. Has the member tried to go out there and explain it to them?

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, once again very briefly, I just want to explain that it is quite possible to support a tax like the goods and services tax and not be in agreement with every particular aspect of it.

The member opposite may recall that the report on the technical paper on the goods and services tax issued by the Standing Committee on Finance in November 1989 also commented on this problem and the need to come back to the inequities that may exist in the GST credit system. I do not think I need apologize at all for that. This is an area that needs substantial work in the future.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I realize it is traditional to thank the mover and seconder of the Speech from the Throne at the outset of one's remarks. I will have the pleasure of doing that in a few moments.

I am still basically a broadcaster by instinct, and so I will lead my remarks with the news that today, May 15, within the past 24 hours, the man who was supposed to become the president of Yugoslavia, Stipe Mesic, was the man who told me that he would be the last president of Yugoslavia as we have known it.

When a parliamentary delegation, as part of the Canada/Europe Parliamentary Association met with Mr. Mesic three weeks ago, I asked the then Vice-President from Croatia: "Mr. Mesic, I ask this question with sadness, but will you be the last president of Yugoslavia?" He answered me directly: "Mr. Scott, you asked the question with sadness, I answer it with joy. Yes, I will be the last president of Yugoslavia." Well, Stipe Mesic never got the chance to take over as head of one of the most politically turbulent countries in the civilized world, which I will point out in a few moments, makes Canada's troubles seem like a calm cul-de-sac with little butterflies, by comparison.

Not simply because of tradition, but also because of admiration for both gentlemen, may I sincerely congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice, and the hon. member for Regina—Wascana.

As you know, I have been around here covering Parliament in the news business, or sitting in this place as the member for Hamilton—Wentworth since 1958. During those 33 years, I have sat through dozens of throne speeches, and their movers and seconders, and I cannot remember in recent times when I have heard more eloquent testimony to the reasons this country should hang together than those presented by the former Mayor of Regina and my friend from Quebec, a fellow journalist by background. Well done, Larry. Their genuinely expressed feelings, from very different parts of Canada, about what it means to keep this country united, lead me directly to what the throne speech says about how we are viewed outside these borders.

> Around the world Canada is respected for the constructive role we play in global affairs, for the protection we accord human rights. Millions of people around the world would gladly give up everything they have for the privilege in living in Canada.

Never did I realize that so profoundly as during a recent visit to Yugoslavia and Albania. I spent the Easter weekend in Albania, which is one of the most brutally repressed countries in eastern Europe as a result of 50 or 60 years of communism, as a result of an assignment by the Department of External Affairs. I also spent an unforgettable two days in Bulgaria while we were in eastern Europe. I will have more to say about those countries on another occasion. It is because there are so many hundreds of thousands of Canadians of Yugoslav origin that I must weigh my next remarks carefully.

This 24 hours in Yugoslavia could be truly historic; today, May 15, could signal the end of Yugoslavia as we know and treasure it.

Let me quote the distinguished Toronto Star columnist, Richard Gwyn.

> The country's present is defined by its past. North of a line essentially within Slovenia and Croatia you are still in central Europe. The towns and hamlets, neat and orderly, as if belonging to a poor province of Austria, and above all clearly European. South of the line, you are in the Balkans; everything is much poorer, is harder and starker and much more clearly Slav.

Mr. Gwyn points out:

> While in London last week, the Croat president Franjo Tudjman declared provocatively 'Serbs are another world and another civilization from Croats. It has long been probable that south Slavs, or Yugoslavs, would discover eventually that the common denominator was not enough to keep them together. Former President Tito did this by the power of his personality and by terror'.

To many Croats the creation of Yugoslavia was a forced partnership. The Croatian people never expressed a will to enter this state, according to one Croatian journalist. This two-way deep-seated mistrust has bubbled over as Croatia and Serbia clash over their differing views of a future Yugoslavia. The Serbian president Milosevic—and I will refer to him in a moment—and President Tudjman "like to fight; they enjoy the hate", contends Milovan Djilas, a former communist dissident and long-time observer of the Yugoslav political scene.

Some analysts say the current crisis—the tanks, the armoured vehicles, the troops, the shootings, the deaths—has been used by the communist leader of Serbia, Slobodad Milosevic, to "step up demands for emergency measures" to stop Stipe Mesic from assuming the presidency of Yugoslavia today. Serbia is also determined to prevent Croatia from holding a planned referendum on independence this coming Sunday, May 19.

As of today, President Milosevic seems to have got his way. Mesic is a Croatian who is understandably vehemently opposed to the Serbian president and all his works. I guess that is why the Serbian president and others in the collective presidency ganged up on Mr. Mesic and denied him the natural right to the presidency.

Tourism is a $2.5 billion a year business for the country of Yugoslavia. It has been severely harmed by the last several months of unrest. Hardest hit have been towns along the Adriatic coast, like Makarska, which earn their livelihood from foreign visitors. The dispute in Yugoslavia sharpened several weeks ago when Croatian policemen were sent to protect Kijevo, a Croatian village inside the Serbian enclave. Serbs replied with a blockade of all traffic into the village, cutting off food and medical shipments.

Shortly after the Yugoslav army arrived to act as a buffer between the two sides. Croatians were incensed that the army, which is led by a predominantly Serbian officer corps, did not move to open up the road to Kijevo and they organized a demonstration against the military in Split, a coastal city with a major garrison.

That protest and others damaged Yugoslavia's reputation. Those pictures toured the world. As Yugoslavia reaches the front pages and the TV screens of the world media, I believe it would be foolhardy to think that we can contain the unrest and turmoil to the confines of southeastern Europe.

We are now watching the unravelling of an international state, the total collapse of the political and economic structure of Yugoslavia. Holding this country together, or as we discovered while travelling through the various republics, this country of countries, with apologies to my right hon. friend from Yellowhead, will be a dangerous game requiring great skill. Maybe the whole thing can be settled peacefully. Canadians of Yugoslav origin tell us that "a just divorce settlement can be reached after an unhappy marriage". Maybe, but do not count on it.

If anyone attempts by force to create a new state of states, the army will be called in, violence will be the continuing inevitable result and then equally inevitably, you will have a civil war. That episode would widen, I believe, into a much larger regional crisis extending far beyond the borders of Yugoslavia and would attract world-wide attention and concern.

I hope the Canadian government will urge the Secretary General of the United Nations to stand by and be ready to move quickly with UN mediation efforts in Yugoslavia if the situation deteriorates in the way I fear it is doing now. The United Nations has been effective elsewhere around the world in containing those painfully difficult transitions on how to get from communism to democracy. That is really what this whole struggle in Yugoslavia is all about as tensions between the Serbians and the Croatians and the Muslims reach a fever pitch.

The Canadian delegation of parliamentarians to the various republics in Yugoslavia heard everyone talk about a peaceful resolution. We urged everyone to dissolve the union or restructure it, but do it peacefully. I can vividly remember the moment when I sat next to the President of Serbia, Slobodan Milosevic. I literally erupted. I had my finger wagging, pleading with the communist boss of Serbia that we Canadians do not mind demonstrations. We tolerate and occasionally enjoy them in our country, including all the horn honking in front of the Parliament Buildings today. "But please, please for God sake", I asked the Serbian president, "try to avoid the international bloodstains of Yugoslavia's reputation by keeping your demonstrations peaceful as we try to do in Canada".

The official translator was simultaneously whispering in the president's ear. He kept nodding in apparent agreement. I am not sure what the enthusiastic handshake at the end of our encounter really meant, but I believe the violence one reads about on the front pages these days indicates that President Milosevic took my pleading with all the seriousness that he thought it deserved.

Yugoslavs are entirely on their own now. The west is no longer worried that the Soviets will try to exploit the situation now that the cold war is over. I am sad to say it, but I echo the words of Yugoslav's Mesic: "Croatia and Slovenia are just too European not to leave Yugoslavia sooner or later and enter Europe itself". I am deeply convinced after my travels through the many republics and the two provinces and after conversations with hundreds of Yugoslavs that some sort of loose federation is the only answer to the survival of the country as we know it. Were it not for the comments of somebody like Mesic, as I mentioned at the outset, I would optimistic that the collective presidency of the country might somehow result in a decision for the continuation of the multiplicity of states within a state. That collective presidency is meeting as I speak at this moment.

Even as a perennial optimist, I am doubtful about the outcome of this Sunday's referendum in Croatia and the resulting fallout. Now, as the crisis deepens, I think it is going to mean that Yugoslavians are going to have to keep stiff upper lips and white-knuckle their way through this, with hopefully a dash of diplomacy thrown in. Otherwise Yugoslavia may be just hours away from a full-fledged civil war.

Indeed, Slovenia has already been heading outward toward western Europe. Slovenia's local parliament has passed laws of dissociation from Yugoslavia. Does that sound familiar? Outright independence in Slovenia is planned for June. Croatia would like to do the same except for one slight problem. Of its five million people 600,000 are Serbs. Again, does that sound familiar? Quebec has 5,300,000 population, the English speaking minority, 637,000.

The tragedy of Yugoslavia sends a very real message to Canada. It is hard to believe that even the most nationalistic Quebecers cannot understand the consequences of dissociation, or separating. Quite simply it means the disintegration of Canada as we know it. Just as we are seeing the disintegration of Yugoslavia as we know it now, I thank God for the thrust in the throne speech which says, in effect, let us build Canada as we know it but let us build it better. I do not want to see my country break apart the way we are watching it happen right now in Yugoslavia.

The other welcome direction in the Speech from the Throne is the fact that individual members of Parliament will be allowed freedom from discipline by the government in order to give expression to our views and the views of our constituents. I am taking the government at its word so here goes.

I want the goods and services tax, the GST, removed immediately from feminine hygiene products. This government is taxing the menstrual cycle while exempting donated male sperm and sperm banks from the GST.

Time after time, phone call after phone call, I have received the same answer from the Department of Finance: "Sorry, feminine hygiene products don't qualify under GST-exempt regulations. They cannot be zero-rated like male sperm".

I want the Minister of Finance to give me logical reasons why not. So far, all finance officials have told me is that these products are not health/medical related. I believe they are.

While I have received the utmost co-operation from both finance department officials and spokespersons from the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, the hon. member for Capilano-Howe Sound, I am still waiting for answers that make sense. I am going to keep the questions going until I get those answers, and until we get the GST removed from feminine hygiene products.

If I have time I would also like to draw to the attention of the House the outrageous largess that this government is lavishing upon one of Canada's greatest and wealthiest superstars, Wayne Gretzky. Why on earth should the Canadian taxpayer be subsidizing a Calgary-based company, Kevin Sports Toys, to the tune of $1 million for the "Great One's" blessing on NHL insignia and colours, with royalties in the millions, to the disadvantage of one of my Dundas companies, M.A. Henry Ltd., which is trying to make it on its own without government money?

Since M.A. Henry stands to suffer as a result of Ottawa's $1 million to Kevin Toys of Calgary, will somebody please tell me why this is being done at all? Why is this government not playing on a level board hockey table top? Can't Wayne Gretzky make enough millions on the ice without dipping into our pockets?

Mr. Speaker, I hope to have the chance to put these and other questions as the days in this Parliament roll on. I thank you and hon. members for your attention.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I was listening with interest to the hon. member, but I was in my office and I missed some of what he said.

He addressed a very important issue, the situation in Yugoslavia. As he said, Mr. Mesic was not elected president. He was vice-president and it was his turn to become President of Yugoslavia. I think the vote for his presidency was four in favour and one abstention.

Yugoslavia is going through a very difficult time. The people of Yugoslavia have different views of what their country should be, as do we in Canada. We have the same type of problem. There are differences of opinion about what Canada should be.

It is a very difficult question. I wish to ask the hon. member one particular question. Does he believe that the Croatian people have the right to self-determination? I attended the election Mr. Tudjman as President of Croatia. It was a free and democratic election.

The people of Croatia had spoken. They said: "We want a somewhat looser association within that confederation." Does he believe that the will of the people should be respected?

At the same time, I would like to congratulate the hon. member in speaking about the GST and how unfairly it is applied to certain products. I hope he will continue his fight. He should get the help of all the members.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): It is a very tricky question that the hon. member for Calgary Northeast has put to me, about whether Croatia has the right to secession. The democratically expressed will of the people could mean that it would have the right to secede if it did not affect the welfare, the outcome and indeed the entire viability of the country as a whole.

As I pointed out, there is a huge Serbian minority in Croatia which has, for obvious reasons, very real concerns about Croatia trying to secede and joining Europe. This is what the fight is all about.

To say that the Croatian people have the right to secede and the right to independence, well. Vice-President Mesic, the man who almost became President of Yugoslavia, has said that if he did not become president, he would work for Croatia's independence and secession.

I feel that if Croatia left Yugoslavia, it would be the end of Yugoslavia as we know it and that would be a tragedy. In the same way, if Quebec decided to leave Canada, it would be the end of Canada as we know it and that would be an even greater tragedy.

I really believe that if there is a will and a way for the states in Yugoslavia to co-operate in some sort of loose confederation and keep the country together, that is the best way to go.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I was encouraged by the last couple of moments of the hon. member's intervention on the throne speech.

I wondered, for a little while, whether I was sitting in on a debate at an external affairs committee. I know that the hon. member is very interested in the affairs of Yugoslavia. I was under the mistaken impression that he was going to try to relate that, in one way or another, to the throne speech. But, he recovered and he talked about the independence of members, addressing himself to the unfair imposition of the GST, but stopping just short by noting only one unjust application of the GST. I would have hoped that he would have gone further. I also would have hoped that he would have elaborated even further on the question of government financing of industries in various parts of the country, willy-nilly on an ad hoc basis, without putting forward an appropriate industrial strategy.

I was mildly encouraged because, quite frankly, on hearing of the troubles of Yugoslavia and eastern Europe and the Balkans themselves, I wondered whether in fact he was going to, at the same time, avail himself of the opening that the government had presented to him by saying that the throne speech accomplished one very important factor, which was to free all hon. members so that they could give the appropriate advice to this House and to the government. In that way, he could avoid such problems by looking at the inequities and the wide open vacuums, the caverns of emptiness in the throne speech by telling this House and members on this side just what it is that his government would do specifically, not only what but how they would solve the problems that they have outlined as a result of the enormous dirth of educational abilities that his government has outlined.

What would he do specifically to alleviate some of the problems that we noted, and as he has noted in his good report on Yugoslavia and other parts of the world, with respect to immigration? Are we going to have, as he would suggest, an industrial policy designed to get us out of the doldrums into which his government has driven this country? Is he going to address, by using the kind of independence that he says he would like for all members of this House, the position that would give us the kind of wealth and security and unity that all Canadians crave today?

Why did he forgo the opportunity to avail himself of the enormous occasion presented to him in this speech by diverting to Yugoslavia?

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, that was one heck of a speech. If I could have the unanimous consent of the House to continue for another 40 minutes, I might be able to address some of the issues that the hon. member has raised.

Let me just say this. This is the government which is allowing members of Parliament the freedom and independence to speak out even if it happens to embarrass the government or even if it happens to go against the government. I never noticed that happening in previous governments, particularly the one in which the hon. member represents now. I think that is something to be applauded. I think the Speech from the Throne has made a wonderful move for this House to be able to give us, as individual members of Parliament, backbenchers, on behalf of our constituents, total freedom to speak out and I have done that on a couple of issues.

Sometime, Mr. Speaker, when I have the chance and when you will give me an extra 20 or 30 minutes in front of the hon. member, I would be delighted to answer his questions.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I want to applaud the member for Hamilton—Wentworth on his comments, particularly the sensitivity that he has shown towards women in his remarks. It is not the first time that this member has shown that kind of enlightened attitude towards women. I am pleased to know he is working towards removing the GST from feminine hygiene products such as tampons and sanitary napkins.

I raised this in the House of Commons before the GST was passed and I have written to the minister and have not had a satisfactory response. I would ask the member whether he would also work towards removing the GST from birth control products. In an age when sexually transmitted diseases are rampant in this society, I believe that the GST should be removed from condoms. Even some provinces do not tax these products.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her comments. It is a very worth-while suggestion. I am sure that officials in the Department of Finance and the Minister of Finance will hear those representations.

I stress and emphasize that the removal of the GST on feminine hygiene products is related directly to health. This is definitely a health issue. I would like the Department of Finance to respond to that first. I am sure they will take your representations into consideration. I do, and I will make the point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. The hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, it certainly is a privilege for me to take part in this debate on the throne speech. I appreciate the opportunity to put a few thoughts and concerns on the parliamentary record.

The hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth can certainly count on my support in his efforts to remove the GST from feminine hygiene products. I would also hope that the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth would support the efforts of many, many Canadians, millions of Canadians, to have the GST removed from reading materials. After all, we live in an age of increased awareness about the need for education. In the opinion of this side of the House, the GST is a barrier. It is a barrier to reading, a barrier to education. The sooner it is removed from reading materials the better.

As we discuss the throne speech that was delivered this week, it reminds me of some observations that we made some weeks ago when we were thinking about this particular event, the delivery of the throne speech. There were a lot of commentators in Canada saying that the throne speech was to be this government's renaissance, this government's renewal. This was the document that was going to signal to all Canadians that this government was going to turn a corner. It was going to stop some of its bad old ways and adopt some new ideas, some new plans to give Canadians some hope, to give Canadians some plans to get us out of the recession.

I have looked at and listened to the throne speech and I would have to say, humbly, that it is empty. It was nothing more than a lot of rhetoric. Nothing more than a lot of words.

After you listened to the throne speech, would you want Brian Mulroney as Prime Minister for four more years? I doubt that many Canadians would answer yes to that question. Only a pretty devoted Tory could answer that question in the affirmative.

Let us just take the national unity issue, for example. Are we farther along on the road toward national unity than we were before Brian Mulroney became Prime Minister of Canada? Not on your life. This country is in a mess. There are few Canadians who can recall so much disunity, so much doubt about our future. It is because of a Prime Minister who acted like a fool and was thinking more about himself and about power than he was about his country.

There was a referendum in the province of Quebec in 1980 and federalism won. The Constitution was patriated shortly thereafter.

• (1830)

In fact, the Prime Minister supported Mr. Trudeau at the time. There was no suggestion from Brian Mulroney then that Quebecers were humiliated. That is the word that the Prime Minister has used, that Quebecers were humiliated by the patriation process. It certainly was not his notion then, but somehow it is now. He was the man who went from coast to coast to coast in this country saying that if Meech Lake is defeated it is a rejection of Quebecers, something that could not be further from the truth. Yet that is what the Prime Minister said.

Is it little wonder we have so much disunity in this country? Is it little wonder there is so much grave concern for the future of this country? It is because we have had a Prime Minister who, to use that cliché that has been used so many times, rolled the dice once too often.

I worry that he is the kind of man who is apt to do it again. He is a man who will put his own political interest ahead of that of Canadians, ahead of that of this country. That is deplorable.

We were hoping on this side of the House that there would be some kind of plan. I am still on the issue of national unity. We were hoping the throne speech would contain some kind of plan to deal with the national unity problem head on. What did we get? Just more promises of talk, more promises of studies, more promises of commissions. That is not what this country needs now. This country needs leadership, firm leadership because we are in perilous times.

We cannot just fool around, dither, stall and wait until next fall for some kind of government plan. The clock is moving and we should not be waiting around.

On the issue of national unity, would we want the Prime Minister for another four years? The answer is a clear no.

Let us look at the issue of the economy. Remember how the Conservatives offered so much hope? We went through the recession in the early eighties. Not only did we have a recession, but the debt piled up. We had a deficit and the Tories came along and said: "There will be a Renaissance. There will be a renewal of the economy. Elect us and just watch us. See how we turn the economy around". A lot of Canadians bought into that. They elected the Conservatives. They elected Brian Mulroney.

Now it is almost seven years later and the economic despair that Canadians feel rivals the despair that was felt by our parents and our grandparents back in the so–called dirty thirties. Look at the figures: 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. Those are depression figures. Just in the last little while 19,000 Canadians have lost their assets through bankruptcy. Children are going hungry in this country, children are going to bed hungry every night.

Yet it was this government who said: "Give us a chance and we will revive the economy". They talked about the deficit and they talked about the debt.

We all know that the debt has doubled since 1984. People wonder where the the government spends all the money.

They increase taxes, they increase the debt 100 per cent, and they ask: what do they get for it? What do they see? How they howl about the deficit. How they bemoan the deficit. Very little happens, very little happens. It is a conundrum. It certainly is a conundrum for almost all Canadians, a government that says that a deficit is so pernicious to the economy that it really blocks our hopes and dreams for a better Canada, and yet it just sits there. It does very little about it.

It makes you wonder and it certainly makes you cynical. I have come to believe that this government would like to have the deficit there, perhaps forever, because it is the stick it uses to beat us over the head. It is the government's raison d'être. Everything it does is all in the name of deficit reduction. It goes ahead and destroys our public institutions, our democratic institutions and destroys Canadians' ability to have a better economy, all in the name of deficit reduction. We get the destruction, but we never get the deficit down. It makes you wonder, does it not?

God forbid if we ever had this government for another 10 or 20 years. My guess is that if it were here for another 10 or 20 years we would still have its deficit. It has absolutely no credibility whatsoever when it comes to deficit reduction, none, absolutely none.

Remember the former Minister of Finance, now the Minister for International Trade and some other things, and how we had to have high interest rates to beat down inflation, to wring inflation out of the economy? We have noticed in the past few weeks a reversal. Now we have to have lower interest rates. So what is it? Is it high interest rates that Michael Wilson espouses? Is that what he embraces? Or is it now lower interest rates?

There is the high dollar. The former finance minister, who preaches an economic philosophy that is supposed to be the be-all and end-all to our problems, creates a high dollar which is a barrier and an impediment to our exporters. How many business people in this country have asked for a lower dollar? How many business people have asked for lower interest rates? The government does not listen, except now in the last few weeks when there has apparently been this conversion on the part of the government, on the part of the former finance minister, and I suppose on the part of the current finance minister that we need lower interest rates.

I ask the question again: Would we really want the Prime Minister for another four years? The answer from this side is no. I notice that the good Minister of Justice would like to have him for another four years. I think she should reflect on that. I think it is a poor reflection of her judgment.

It seems to me that based on this throne speech this government is jaded, it is exhausted, it has no ideas, it is drifting and it is stalling. It is in stall and it has lost absolutely all moral authority to govern.

Canadians have said that in spades. They do not want this government around any more. Just look at the polls. They do not want this government any more. The sooner they can get rid of it, the happier they will be.

Medicare has been eroded by this government. It is the cornerstone of our social programs—my guess is that 95 to 99 per cent of Canadians support it—and yet there is no mention of medicare in the throne speech. In the last session of the House, we on this side put forward a motion asking the government to reaffirm its support of medicare. It said "no".

It voted against that motion. Now we find—given its negative vote on the motion, and it should not come as any great surprise—that there is no mention of medicare in the throne speech.

I come from western Canada. There is no mention of Senate reform. I think that the Prime Minister alluded to some kind of Senate reform. He was very vague in his remarks this afternoon but in the throne speech there was no suggestion of an elected Senate; none whatsoever.

Western Canadians are demanding a greater voice. They are demanding equality. That is what they want. They want a change in their parliamentary institutions. Western Canadians want an elected Senate right now. What do we get from this government? Zero.

Western Canadians will disapprove of any government that continues to bury its head in the sand.

I could not find the word "agriculture" in the throne speech, and yet down on the farm times have not been tougher.

An hon. member: You should have tried farming in 1980 and 1981, or in 1979.

Mr. Harvard: Try it in 1991.

An hon. member: They are trying it.

Mr. Harvard: They are trying, and you are not helping. What do you do? You open up the borders to our wheat.

There are many wheat organizations in this country that said: "Keep the wheat out." You would not listen because you are so bloody arrogant. You never listen. You are despicable. Absolutely true.

Farmers do not want American wheat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is going to be an opportunity for questions and comments very shortly. The hon. member still has two minutes left in his speech.

Mr. Harvard: The reason American wheat is allowed into Canada is because of that poorly negotiated free trade agreement.

We have had a wheat board in this country for more than 50 years; a very good agency working on behalf of farmers. This government, through its policies, will likely destroy that agency.

The Wheat Board has served Canadian prairie farmers extremely well and yet this government says: "We will let American wheat in and we will put the Canadian Wheat Board at risk."

That is the kind of thank you that Canadian farmers get from this government.

Let me just say something in my last couple of moments. It concerns the credibility of this government and, in particular, the credibility of the Prime Minister. There is no credibility. The government is now telling us that ministers, including the first minister, knew nothing about the Iraqi ambassador being allowed into Canada. If you can believe that, you can believe any kind of preposterous story.

What does this government say in the throne speech? The throne speech talks about a learning culture being the cornerstone of this government's agenda for prosperity and yet it is this government that has cut some $160 billion from transfer payments. The government has the gall to say that in the throne speech.

I have just one more thing to say but I will leave it there because I know I am out of time.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make a few comments. I know my hon. colleague across the aisle would very much like to put forward a credible debate, so I would just like to suggest a few changes in dates.

He started his address talking about the referendum in 1980 in the province of Quebec, one which all Canadians who valued the future of the country supported. The Prime Minister of the day made it appear that if Quebec citizens made a decision to stay within Canada, he would then address some of the concerns and the outstanding grievances of the province of Quebec. That was in 1980. That same Prime Minister, just so the member opposite recalls, brought home and developed a Constitution in Canada and presented it without the signature of the province of Quebec, the very province representing the very citizens that in 1980 that Prime Minister had told: "We will address your concerns in the future."

The Prime Minister today, Brian Mulroney, addressed those concerns and will continue to work to address those concerns.

We can speak briefly about the notwithstanding clause. It has been identified by Manitobans, the province that the hon. member comes from, as something they do not like because it allowed the province of Quebec to implement legislation which we all find difficult to understand. That was put forward in the Constitution created by the previous Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, and the member sitting opposite, who supports him and tries to glorify him in his absence.

We have, in the Speech from the Throne, the identification of a future. We have, at the present time, commissions, such as the Spicer commission, talking to Canadians. We have the Beaudoin–Edwards commission from the House of Commons and the Senate talking to Canadians. We have put forward another opportunity for people to express themselves.

I want to take just a second to respond to the member's comments regarding leadership. There are examples of leadership, some are very recent. Let us talk about what took place in the Persian Gulf and the leadership that was necessary at that time and was shown by Brian Mulroney, both nationally and internationally.

Let us contrast that leadership to the leadership shown by the leader of his party who identified the need, but as soon as it became difficult said: "Canadian men and women serving and providing world security should be returned home." Then, in 48 hours, he reversed that decision and said: "Well, they are there now, they may as well stay." That is not the leadership that the Canadian people want. I think the hon. member understands that there is a contrast and the present Prime Minister stands as a leader.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James. Before the hon. member answers the question, I would like to say that the hon. member for Sudbury will be recognized, the hon. member for Cambridge and the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur. Please use discretion.

• (1850)

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I will touch briefly on two or three areas raised by the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

This man talks about leadership and yet we have a Prime Minister who has redefined leadership as being a slave to George Bush.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harvard: That is his definition of leadership. It is very reasonable to believe that it was George Bush—they never want to hear the truth, they just howl and bark like dogs, that is what they do— and the White House which wanted the Iraqi Ambassador to come to Canada and not to their country. Guess what? The Prime Minister of Canada says: "Yes, we will bring him in".

The hon. Minister of Agriculture speaks of the events of the early 1980s. He conveniently does not tell the House who the premier of Quebec was back in 1981 and 1982. It was a chap by the name of René Levèsque, who would have never signed his signature to any document that would have recognized the success of Canada and certainly the success of federalism.

One more thing. The hon. Minister of Agriculture speaks of the notwithstanding clause. Again he conveniently forgets to tell us who pushed the notwithstanding clause. It was one of his Conservative lodge brothers, Sterling Lyon, then premier of Manitoba. He attacks the notwithstanding clause as I do. The Prime Minister attacks the notwithstanding clause, yet when it came to Meech Lake did the Prime Minister, Mr. Brian Mulroney, try to have the notwithstanding clause removed?

An hon. member: Of course not.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague on a very spirited speech.

When I sit in this great Chamber and someone speaks and gets that kind of reaction from the other side of the House we know how uncomfortable they are feeling. They ought to be very uncomfortable.

Congratulations to my colleague.

I have a question for my colleague. I listened to the Speech from the Throne. I have an excerpt and it shows the lack of reality surrounding this government. It says, and I am quoting from Hansard, page 3, May 13, 1991:

> The Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement has helped to secure the Canadian economy in difficult times.

Where are they getting this idea? Today we have truckers blocking highways everywhere, complaining about the lack of jobs, the lack of a level playing field. That is very symptomatic of what is going on across the nation. There is a loss of jobs, a loss of anything that we might have had that was good.

I ask my colleague where are we going and what can we do for the people of Canada if this government will not listen?

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, there is no hope that this government will change the free trade agreement. It made a mistake. It made the mistake more than two years ago and it seems more than happy to live with that mistake.

If this government found any positive figures whatsoever, any positive numbers to support the free trade agreement, it would be hollering from the roof tops every minute of every day. The fact of the matter is that there are no positive results. There are no positive figures. They are negative.

Somewhere between 300,000 and 400,000 jobs have been lost. Plants have been closed. Hundreds and hundreds of businesses have been closed. So there is no hope. What we need is a new government and the sooner Canadians get it the better.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, last week the province of Ontario came out with a budget and I would like the member to remember these simple numbers. Two years ago the province of Ontario had a balanced budget. Now they want to run a budget of $9.7 billion, $10 billion, and $9 billion and $8 billion, and $8 billion for the next four years. The premier of that province defends it by saying that today they are only paying 11 cents of the tax dollar toward the debt and they can keep it under control.

In 1968 when Prime Minister Perfect took over, we had a balanced budget and the federal government was paying 12 cents of every dollar on the debt. At that time he and his finance ministers started to run deficits, and at the end of the reign it was 32 cents of every tax dollar that was being used to pay down the debt.

I know the hon. member will give me a very straight answer. Is he telling me that the policy of the Liberal Party is to build the economy by continuing to build up deficits? He seems to be suggesting that the policies of Prime Minister Perfect are exactly the policies Premier Rae is following in Ontario.

Mr. Harvard: I am glad that the hon. member from Ontario has taken note that Ontario had a balanced budget a couple of years ago. My memory tells me that it was a Liberal government.

But, no, I will answer him honestly, it is not the policy of this party to build prosperity on deficits. That is not our policy.

Let me tell you this, Mr. Speaker. This government for more than six years had a golden opportunity to deal with the deficit. It had a golden opportunity to deal with the debt and it failed. It failed miserably. And what do we see today? More bankruptcies, more despair, more unemployment, more closure of plants—that is what we got from this government. We do not have to take any lessons from these people.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the learning culture in the throne speech. Does my hon. colleague agree with me that when we talk about learning culture it is just a use of words rather than action? If we look at the action of the government in the past on education, we see that it has placed the GST on books and magazines, which is actually a tax on learning. It has increased postal rates on community newspapers. It has taxed student loans. It has made cuts in transfer payments which are to post-secondary education so it has increased the cost for education. In my estimation it is a historic failure.

I am wondering if my colleague could comment on this learning culture that the Prime Minister wants to institute.

Mr. Harvard: I alluded to this matter toward the end of my speech, Mr. Speaker. The government talks about a learning culture and yet this is the government that has taken, on four separate occasions for a total of $160 billion, out of transfer payments. It has destroyed our public institutions so I ask the question: "Who is going to finance the reduction in literacy in this country?" We have a serious problem with respect to illiteracy but it has diminished our public institutions to such an extent that we cannot cope any more.

It is the same thing with education, exactly the same thing. It is just more hypocrisy from this government.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today, and I thank the House for giving me this opportunity. I believe this Speech from the Throne was one of the most important this government has presented and I think that it meets the aspirations and expectations of the Canadian people as to what we want to become.

Mr. Speaker, I represent the marvelous riding of Argenteuil—Papineau, as you know. There are 55 municipalities within my riding, from Lac-des-Deux-Montagnes, at one extremity, to Plaisance, in the Petite Nation area, at the other with Morin Heights and Saint-Adolphe-d'Howard to the north. Culture is febrile in my riding which I would describe as a microcosm of Quebec society and perhaps our Canadian society. Indeed, it is predominantly French-speaking, although a substantial English-speaking minority lives in the Lachute area, in the north and centre of the riding. As a matter of fact, those are people I come across regularly and they have been living in harmony with the francophone community forever.

Of course, it happens that we have some minor of problems communication, but friendship, or the neighborhood spirit as we say, makes for good relations. We too have our share of marginal elements who would like to sever our connections with the rest of Canada or to force the people of Quebec to take actions much more centered on one issue. As the saying goes, it is not a matter of the head but of the heart. So, for my constituents, the whole constitutional issue is very much a matter of the heart.

I think they have been deeply hurt by the failure of Meech. That is what I hear when I tour the riding anyway. I consult my constituents as much as I can and let them know for instance when I have breakfast with some of them as I do sometimes—be it only for my personal satisfaction—that I would rather spend seven days a week in my riding meeting and discussing with them, but that duty calls in Ottawa.

What I am told on such occasions, Mr. Speaker, is that they want respect. The French Canadians want us, their fellow citizens, to respect the fact that they are French-speaking and want to live in harmony in the predominantly English-speaking North-American culture. I think that the English-speaking community in my riding misundertood, and certainly did not quite stomach—I have to mention this to give an accurate account of what they tell me, the Quebec sign law, Bill 178. They saw it as an attack on their personal and individual rights while, for their francophone counterparts, it was merely a collective expression of the will to preserve their culture and to save whatever little French fact was left in North America.

Mr. Speaker, the men and women in my riding are also telling me that there is, of course, a world of difference between what is told and what actually happens. The constitutional debates have always been emotionally charged. That is nothing new! Take the 1980 referendum for instance. Just this past Tuesday, Mr. Speaker, people I considered as ardent nationalists and separatists were telling me that, with the passing of time, they are not so sure anymore that Quebec should separate, that separating would be a good thing for Quebecers. They have come to realize that, finally, every effort should be made to save this great country of ours.

We often forget to remind ourselves that our country is the second largest in the world, with its border stretching over 8,850 kilometers. That is huge. There is a saying, Mr. Speaker, according to which one cannot appreciate what one does not know. Often, we think that the people of Manitoba and Alberta must be quite tough. But that is not true. When we travel there, we feel very welcome. Some of my constituents visited Western Canada and they were delighted, and even surprised, by the reception they got.

Mr. Speaker, whenever I travel throughout Canada, I know I will be warmly greeted by the vast majority of Canadians. Quebecers have always had a strong personality. They are very open. They try very hard to speak English when English-speaking tourists stop them for information or directions. Quebecers are a very generous people. Everyone I met either in Atlantic or Western Canada have told me: There is a world of difference between what we hear and what really happen. Sometimes, we get a dangerously distorted picture simply because of some minor details.

Mr. Speaker, if I mention all this it is because I want to relate an incident which has affected my constituents very deeply. When a very small group of dissidents trampled the Quebec flag in the Sault Ste Marie area, I think it was, when—

An hon. member: In Brockville.

Mrs. Bourgault: I'm sorry. That incident took place in Brockville, yes, thank you. The CBC and the media showed us these pictures about 40 times. Put yourself in the place of Quebecers who had just been through all the episodes of the Meach Lake saga, who believed that Canada had finally said yes to Quebec, and who see on their television set, on the CBC, a small group of people soiling, trampling on and burning the Quebec flag.

Then, subliminally, when one sees it many times, one tends to think that the majority is acting that way.

Mr. Speaker, when I meet my constituents, I often tell them: Listen, you say that we should care about spending, that we spend too much, that we are wasting money. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is true. The government machinery is indeed an administrative monster and I hope that in his Speech from the Throne the Prime Minister gave an inkling of great progress in that regard. That government machinery really has to be reformed, because the right hand in there does not know what the left hand is doing. The worst department, in my opinion, is the Revenue Department, the Taxation Department. If you owe money or you are to get some, you are dealing with two different stories, but in the last analysis the guy downstairs does not know what the guy upstairs is doing. It is totally absurd because they are dealing with the same taxpayer.

Mr. Speaker, some things also are absolutely incredible. Recently, in my riding, in spite of very harsh budget cuts, we managed to convince the Minister of Transport to grant the municipality of Lachute a small sum of $80,000 to repair the municipal airport located a few kilometres from Mirabel, whose future possibilities are outstanding. But, believe it or not, since it was money coming from the federal government, Quebec had to go through an enormous amount of red tape in order to enable the municipality to spend this small amount of $80,000 on repairs needed at the airport.

So, the Economic Development Board, the municipality of Lachute, the Chamber of Commerce, all these bodies want to know what is the reason for these anomalies because everybody, including foreign investors, is waiting for these repairs and because it is only a study.

Certain things should not be, Mr. Speaker, and our constituents have reason to complain about government, at all levels. I only mention those two points because there would be too many, and I would need all my time if I were to mention them all.

Also, when I ask my constituents: "Listen, you say that we do not make enough cuts, that we must make more cuts. It is insane, the deficit is way too high. Where will that lead us?" And I tell them: "Give me some examples where we could make cuts."

• (1910)

Mr. Boudria: Fine. Dear GST!

Mrs. Bourgault: There, I can tell you that our constituents are just like us. You know, governments really reflect society. We must also submit to soul-searching. We also find it difficult to decide where to cut. It is all very well to talk, but again when it is time to act, all is different. Where shall we cut?

It happens every time—let me digress a little—during the debate on GST, as a matter of fact, most of the business representatives, and I will give no percentages, came before the Committee on Finance studying the tax and said: "Yes, GST is excellent; it's a necessary evil, but you must apply it. Go ahead, there is no problem; tax on manufactured goods is not good for businesses, we agree. However, please exempt us for such or such a reason." So, at the end of the proceedings, we realized that most businesses wanted cuts, but not on them.

It's always the same situation, Mr. Speaker, everywhere. People are concerned with their daily activities, for you know that besides political ideologies, there is a daily life for our constituents and it is not easy. I witnessed plant closures in my riding and I can tell you that I was first to wonder if free trade was responsible for all that. Many of my constituents believed so. But, after meeting with people and speaking to them, I came to the conclusion that most of those closures were due to mismanagement, overexpansion; those were businesses which used to manage growth but suddenly were unable to manage downsizing. In brief, they were unable to stand up to the challenge.

However, our constituents realize that we are living in an extremely generous society and that we are so spoiled that we consume frantically, Mr. Speaker, me included. I do not say that only for others, I include myself in the picture. So we consumed so much that we did not ask ourselves if it was harmful to the environment, if natural resources were there forever without creating any problem. Our quality of life demands that we own two cars and that we go to restaurants at least twice a week. Anyway, you know, we consume a lot and we work twice as much. Where is the quality of life for the families?

Today, we talk about latch key children, those who arrive from school before their mothers get home from work. Why? It is often because the family needs money, consumes a lot, needs a lot of money to face its commitments. Finally, who suffers? It is the latch key children.

Mr. Speaker, where is our quality of life now? That is the question that I ask myself. When women, more often than not—I know that, nowadays, men are greatly involved in the issue of child care—but we must say that it is often women who have to face child care problems. These women work inside the home and outside the home and are exhausted. How do you think families can cope with that without any problem?

Mr. Speaker, we always say that we have the governments that we deserve. But what can we do individually, each and everyone, in our own backyard? What can we do at home to set an example? We say: If things are bad, the government is to blame. But we do not want to look at our own faults. What do we do? Do we consume too much? No. Do you know what we do, Mr. Speaker? We put our garbage on the sidewalk and we say: I don't care where this is going, as long as it is not in my backyard. A truck comes around and goes away with our garbage. But then, when we talk about waste management, sanitary landfills, and so on, we say: "Take that anywhere, but not in my backyard!"

You see, we have a conscience. I believe we should, all of us, ask ourselves a question: "Where are we going, and what can we do individually to prove that we can, too, tighten our belt?" We ask the government to cut, but we should be in a position to tell the government where to cut. Are we capable today, when we want services, more services, of saying that we will pay for them?

Mr. Speaker, time is running out, and I still have so many things to add that I would need more than the 20 minutes allowed. I know that I still have some time left, and I would like to come back to the Speech from the Throne. The government said that it would act on the education level. For some persons, it may look as if the gouvernment will intervene in matters under provincial jurisdiction. At first sight, when we look at it cooly, rapidly, we may think that it could be true. But if we analyse it further, we have to look at the clientele it will serve in the long run. This is aimed at illiterate people, people who cannot read nor write, and who are desperate.

So, if we consider the people this is designed for, we will be less inclined to think that it is a question of provincial jurisdiction. Lets take the case of the Canada Health Act for exemple. We have national standards, but this issue falls under provincial jurisdiction. Why not have national standards in education for literacy and the like, while this issue would still fall under provincial jurisdiction? It is something that I would like to know. Like every Quebecer, I fiercely defend my province's juristictions and I would not like an important federal interference in these areas.

The government also mentioned the native issue. Mr. Speaker, my riding went through a crisis last summer. I talked about it in my speech after the Oka crisis. The members of this House should not worry. In my opinion, there will not be another crisis this summer. I do not think so, because the Oka people has once again realized that a very small group—let us not be afraid of stating the facts as they are—a very small group of armed warriors hiding behind masks came to Oka against the will of a majority of Kanesatake citizens. What did they do? Four or five persons managed to attract the national medias' attention and thereafter, everyone thought that all Mohawks were like that. Such a parallel bears importance in relation to what I said about the Quebec flag.

So I must say no, Mr. Speaker, though the populations of Oka and Kanesatake have a hard time recovering from that serious crisis, they do not want another one, absolutely not, not even anything close to what happened last summer.

However, now that our eyes have thus been opened concerning the aboriginal question, my constituants and, I think, every Canadian man and woman, wants to know what sovereignty means. They ask me: "Mrs. Bourgault, does that mean that the warriors, the Mohawks will continue to illegally sell cigarettes and deal in illicit gambling? Is that what sovereignty means? While a few miles away, in Oka, I sell cigarettes and that Indian is also selling cigarettes. Will sovereignty mean that he will be able to sell his cheaper than mine?" Those are basic questions that our constituents ask.

It is the same thing with the administration of justice and family matters, for example. I think all members must have felt a tremendous sadness last week when once again we saw a case of violence against women, a woman who was killed by an ex-inmate and who was kept three days in her apartment. We cannot remain unmoved when we hear about such cases, and with the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, I hope we will find solutions. I hope we will go beyond talking and actually find concrete solutions and see how Canadian men and women, how we as a community can stop, can wipe out this incredible and intolerable violence being inflicted on women and children.

Mr. Speaker, I am interested in fiscal justice. There is a group called the alliance for fiscal justice, which has proved beyond a doubt that the tax system is more favourable for couples living common law with children, than for married couples. This is unacceptable.

Mr. Speaker, I agree that we should change the way Ottawa works, as I said before, but the government and Canadian society must get together to analyse their needs and ensure that the government responds to the wishes of the citizens of this great federation, because, Mr. Speaker, my constituents tell me: It must be attractive. If you want us to stay in Canada—that is what Quebecers tell us—make it sound attractive. Prove that we can live and continue to prosper and be respected as francophones in Canada. If we do that, Mr. Speaker, they will stay and give us one last chance. Thank you for your attention.

• (1920)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully, as usual, to the remarks of my colleague and neighbour. The only thing that separates the riding of Glengarry-Prescott—Russell from the riding of Argenteuil—Papineau is the Perley bridge.

So I listened carefully to the hon. member's speech, in order to know more about the project to replace the Perley bridge. We know that progress has finally been made in that area, and I hoped to learn more about it today. I thought my colleague would take this opportunity to indicate publicly what kind of progress was made in that regard. My question will be another opportunity to give this information.

I have more comments. The hon. member told us that money was being wasted in some government sectors and she mentioned duplication in the National Revenue Department. She could not come up with a better example.

A few days ago, Canadians heard the news that the government ordered special pins to commemorate the first anniversary of the implementation of the GST. It spent $32,000 for GST pins. The first question that comes to mind is why should we remember the GST? Why commemorate this event?

If I were Conservative—I hope that never happens because it would probably be three times worse than being hit by lightning and it would also probably be just as fatal in terms of popularity—but if I were a Conservative, it seems to me that I would try to forget about the GST. I wonder why the Revenue Minister has decided to spend $32,000 in order for Canadians to remember it. Maybe the hon. member could tell us about it.

Finally, I apologize, Mr. Speaker, because I know that our colleague is anxious to answer those questions, but I would like to tell him about the trucking industry. The hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau is aware that there are many trucks here in Ottawa, as well as owners of trucks, businesses that have lost assets, and drivers that no longer have a job. I know that she knows a lot about the trucking and construction.

Therefore, I would like her to tell us what she thinks of the future of that industry. She might also want to tell us whether she thinks her government should take action to protect jobs in the trucking industry.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from across the bridge asked me three questions.

To answer this question about the pins at the cost of $32 000, the only thing that would please me would be to know that it is a Quebec company that has been given the contract for these pins, but I did not see them yet. For this reason, I do not know what to tell him. Yes, Perhaps it seems incredible, but it could be that the government had a little surplus somewhere and that he wanted to encourage a Canadian company to produce pins for $32 000. That's the only logical explanation that comes to mind.

Regarding Perley bridge, Mr. Speaker, that is obviously what I would like but, of course, I know there will not be a new bridge built before the next election. On the other hand, I would like my colleague and I to be able to announce that the construction of the bridge will start on such and such day. The government is deeply committed and he knows it. Environmental studies, the preliminary study has already begun, but once again it is a question of— Imagine three governments: Ontario, Quebec and the federal government negotiating a cost-sharing agreement for the construction of an inter-provincial bridge, while we all know that it is already difficult to find time to negotiate between two persons. Here, three governments are involved in negotiations. It has been a long process; there was an election in Ontario.

But I am very optimistic about the outcome of Perley bridge and again, I know that my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is very much involved and interested and I thank him for the support he is giving me in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that I know well the trucking industry. I don't know where he heard that. There are companies that own trucks in my riding and there are all kinds of views about that, but I understand the truckers from Quebec and the rest of Canada that have problems with this whole question.

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, first let me convey my appreciation for the heartfelt comments of the member from la belle province, Quebec, regarding culture and language and the sensitivity of all regions of our country to the fact that we all must work harder to understand one another. We must understand that no matter where you come from in this country, it is unique, it is beautiful, and we all must understand each other better in order to work and live with each other. I hope that spirit of understanding and co-operation will continue during the course of the debate.

Where we differ, of course, is with respect to her comments on the economy. I am a little concerned that the member wants to blame everyone else but her own government for some of the mismanagement of the economy.

While we all agree that the Speech from the Throne talks about being more competitive, investing more in people in terms of education, illiteracy and training, one must look at the past record of this government in order to view whether or not the Speech from the Throne really reflects not only their good words but whether or not those words will be turned into action. One could surely be very suspicious about the fact that the words might be fine but the actions in the past have not been there, and whether or not they will be there in the future surely is suspect.

In light of the fact that her House leader has indicated that the back bench of her party will be allowed an awful lot more freedom, with greater input into the governmental system and the parliamentary system, I wonder if she can comment on whether in fact her government really will stick with its word with respect to allowing the back bench of the government to bring forward some good ideas as to how we can straighten out the economy in terms of some of the concerns that she mentioned. Obviously, rhetoric is not what this country needs any more, it is action and action now.

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, right after being elected, I was named to this committee on the reform of the House of Commons. I am one of those who believes that from time to time we should be capable of voting against a proposition of the government, and at the same time members of the opposition should be allowed to vote with the government on other occasions.

I certainly agree with more freedom in Parliament. My hon. friend says we want to blame everybody else but ourselves. Fair enough, I agree with that; maybe we, as citizens of this great country, want to blame everybody else but ourselves. So maybe I am an elected member of Parliament representing constituents who are saying that "It is not my fault, it is your fault". We should think of stopping that sort of belief and bring forward some tough new proposals that will keep this country as economically viable as it should be.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau who certainly spoke from her heart in this House. However, I want to ask her a question about what she said with regard to Quebec because she is very interested in Quebec matters. She made me shiver when, speaking about education, she said she was concerned at first when she heard that the federal government wanted to get involved in education but that she felt reassured when she listened to the arguments put forward by others, and realized that it was a good thing for the illeterates, etc.

I can hardly believe that. She even referred to "national standards". I am convinced that the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau didn't come up herself with the idea that the federal government could set national standards in education. She knows that Maurice Duplessis would be turning in his grave if there were such national standards.

So, I want to know what she really thinks. I know that she thought about that question. Yes or no, should the government of Canada infringe on Quebec exclusive jurisdiction over education?

• (1930)

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted I managed to give the hon. member the shivers with what I said here in the House.

What I meant when I referred to national standards in education—as they say, let's not get carried away, we have to look at this in the perspective of responding to a serious national problem: the number of Canadian men and women who are illiterate.

Now, whether a more national standard is the answer—I am being very careful, so that my constituents and Quebecers generally won't think I agree with federal involvement in provincial jurisdictions—on the other hand, I am trying to consider the target population, in other words, people who cannot read. I think that with the help of the federal government and the provinces, we could deal with this matter by negotiating an agreement that would be for this particular group only.

So that is what I had in mind. However, all this is still up in the air. We don't know the details of the proposal mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I would be delighted to discuss the matter with the hon. member as soon as we have more details.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate this evening in the time left allotted to me in the throne speech debate.

After having read the document, any Canadian who viewed the debate thus far or read the media could easily draw the conclusion that at the very least, the government was consistent with its record since 1984. It was consistent in the sense of unfulfilled expectations and broken promises.

It was only last week, before the House resumed, that the House leader on the government side said that this throne speech was going to be the most important throne speech in the history of the country, and therefore it was the government itself that elevated the expectations on behalf of Canadians, thinking there were going to be some remedies to the problems and difficulties embracing and afflicting Canadians from coast to coast.

As has been done time in and time out, the Canadian people and Canada have been let down. They had raised the stakes and all that Canadians have received through this throne speech is a document filled with very empty and general platitudes. Not only was it a heightened expectation, but somehow this was supposed to be the second track of how the government was going to usher in "the new agenda."

The first track was with a reshuffling of cabinet some days ago, a reshuffling of the same cards in the same deck. It was a case of the same old tired faces being reshuffled into new positions. If you were a business person and your executives had failed in their departments, I do not think there would be too many business owners today in Canada that would not only not remove those individuals, but in fact promote them.

The second prong of the new agenda was to be this throne speech, probably for the country and, politically speaking, for the Conservative Party. What we have in the pages of the throne speech read by His Excellency the Governor General, is simply a reflection of a very tired, a very insensitive and a very unimaginative government. Its fatigue is colossal, one that has crippled them into trying to crystallize Canadians' aspirations and dreams across the land.

How do we judge a throne speech? One way that the success of any throne speech delivered in this place ought to be measured is how Canadians, average Canadians, relate to this document. That is to say that we should not be engulfed in reading a throne speech for the purposes of members of Parliament, senators and the national media.

Somehow the throne speech has to have meaning to Canadians on the streets of Canada.

When a laid-off construction worker in York West looks at or hears about this document, what does it mean to that laid-off construction worker? What does this document mean to a plant that is either downsizing or about to be shut down on Toryork Avenue in my riding?

What does it mean to a university student who, after completing exams at the end of last month, graduates and is about to seek his or her place in Canada? Does it move a nation? Does it have a sense of purpose? Does it give definition or clarity to a direction of Canada? Does it serve to right the wrongs in the last number of years?

Does it say: "Maybe some policies we ushered in, perhaps with the best of intentions, has not worked? We are prepared to have the strength and the courage of a government to say so, to recognize it and to put something different in its place".

The throne speech does none of the above. The average Canadian who may or may not have a job cannot take solace from this throne speech. If the average Canadian cannot identify with a throne speech, then why do we have the pomp and the ceremony? Why do we spend hours debating a document that 200 feet from Parliament means very little?

It is an abuse of our democratic institution if it has no meaning at the base of our country.

Talking about the aspirations of the average Canadian, one can quickly and very generically summarize the two great challenges facing our country at this time, the issue of national unity, and the issue of the faltering economy and the recession in which Canadians find themselves.

On national unity, you pick up the throne speech and you search for the answers. There are not any. The response of the Prime Minister on behalf of his government on the question of national unity is delay.

What he proposes in the throne speech is the creation of another committee that will not be mandated until September. To make matters worse, that committee will be given a lifetime of another five months to report back to this Parliament and to this government.

It will not be until January or February of 1992 that the national Government of Canada will say anything definitive about our Constitution when, in fact, the Government of Quebec, to its own credit because it is taking care of its own house, is already making it very precise on when the potential dates of a referendum will be.

We have a national government, mandated to speak for the country of 26 million Canadians, which is unable to say anything definitively until February 1992. That is a shame and irresponsibility at its height.

If the fragile state of the nation was not as bad as it is, then perhaps a bit of time and consultations would have been legitimate and very much warranted.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you: In the midst of a national unity crisis of sorts, we will not hear anything from this government until February 1992. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is not because Canadians ought not to be consulted. I am very confident of what I am picking up among Canadians.

They are absolutely sick and tired of being studied to death by this government. Whether it is the issue of unity, whether it is the issue of economy or whether it is the issue of trucking, this government simply hides behind the word "study".

On the question of national unity, we have had a number of committees and commissions, provincial and federal, travelling across the country. Canadians are saying to this government: "It is time for our country to be rallied. It is time for our country to be rallied to a point of strength and confidence, not to be rallied to a point of study, indifference and indecisiveness". That is not national leadership. That is only a manifestation of an absence of national leadership and national purpose.

This is the failure of the government. Let us make it perfectly and crystal clear. Let us not have Canadians lose hope in themselves and in their country because we have a team on the other side that cannot shoot straight. Let us not have the failures of the government be the failures of Canada.

That is why my leader, my caucus and my party decided to try to rally that confidence of Canadians. We put out a challenge to the government. We have initiated through a series of speeches across the country a nine point program, a vision of the country that we have asked the government to try to respond to, to try to kick-start a debate, to try to bring Canadians and wrap the strands together. My friends, unless Canadians are confident in themselves and of this country, we will be unable to come to grips with the challenges and the problems that confront us.

We did not wait for a committee to report. We did not wait to appoint our members on that committee. We did not wait for a white paper, a black paper, a yellow paper. My leader did what he does best. He spoke frankly on behalf of this country. He has also given the opportunity to Canadians to ratify through a national referendum.

Yes, a referendum can be divisive. My leader clearly was at the forefront of the last referendum in Quebec in 1980. However, this party also believes that if we are going to get a referendum in Quebec, then what is wrong with extending that opportunity to the other Canadians across the country? What is wrong with not giving a stake to the 26 million shareholders who equally own a piece of this country called Canada? There is nothing wrong for those 26 million shareholders on a given day to mark their ballot on behalf of Canada.

Therefore, not only do we speak of a vision of this country, a program for constitutional reform, but we have not dithered or dallied: Do we have a referendum, do we have an election, do we have a constituency assembly? We have said: "Give those people, those shareholders, an opportunity at the end of the day to speak for themselves and for their country".

I challenge the Prime Minister and his government not to wait, not to study, not to fiddle while anger, jobs and national unity burn, but to act as they were elected to do. If the Conservatives are unable to act responsibly, if they are unable to provide the leadership, then they do not deserve the responsibility of sitting to the right of the Speaker. They should vacate and vacate quickly.

The other challenge is economic vitality. We have a recession made in Canada by Conservatives. We have the situation where there is a high dollar, high interest rates, plant closings across the country, jobs lost and lost permanently, jobs that will not come back. We have structural changes to make in the face of world change. What does this throne speech say of those realities facing Canadians? Absolutely nothing.

Once again I return to the premise of my argument. If this throne speech does not mean anything for that unemployed Canadians, then the throne speech has failed and failed miserably.

I see that you are signalling me, Mr. Speaker, and I look forward to continuing tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have seven minutes, plus ten minutes questions and comments tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

It being 7.45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 55 to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment, standing in the name of Mr. Langdon. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

PRESENTATION OF FIRST REPORT

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the pleasure to present to the House, in both official languages, the first report of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

CANADA–EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

PRESENTATION OF REPORT

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canada–Europe Parliamentary Association attending the visit to Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, March 14 to March 26.

• (1010)

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to add, on behalf of my colleagues in the House of Commons who were on that visit, the recommendation that the Canadian government urge the use of United Nations mediation facilities in Yugoslavia, through the good offices of the Secretary General, should the need arise.

We see this as a vital element in ensuring a peaceful, democratic future for all of Yugoslavia, whatever political choices are made.

The opportunities are great for Canada in terms of assisting both Bulgaria and Yugoslavia with their economic and democratic plights. We urge the opening of an embassy in Bulgaria, with a strong trade presence immediately, to press on as partners in the western industrialized nations the need to focus on the plight of the Bulgarian economy as it struggles to restructure. We urge to direct our trade and other officials to give a high priority to assistance, especially in the agricultural sector, to Bulgaria.

We want to alert our trade officials here in Canada to tell Canadian companies that Yugoslavia is virtually a free market and that there are tremendous opportunities for Canadians in hydro engineering and telecommunications.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–2, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FEDERAL REAL PROPERTY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–3, an act respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL DAY OF REMEMBRANCE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–202, an act respecting a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce this Private Members' bill. This bill is a way to mark in a meaningful and respectful way the massacre on December 6, 1989, of 14 young women in Montreal.

This day could also be a day of action around the issue of violence against women, although every day should be a day of action against violence against women. This could be a special day in order to ensure that this terrible plight in our society is eradicated.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-203, an act to amend the Criminal Code (terminally ill persons).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is about life, about the quality of life. Life in a free nation is about choices made first in birth and in youth largely by our mothers, hopefully our fathers, and perhaps our communities. As we become mature adults, the choices become more and more our own individual choices, made in conjunction with our own conscience and our God.

I respect the informed and subjective decision of doctors and the state but the decision relating to the quality of my life and to the nature of my death are important enough that I would prefer that my own will, the will of my designate or my family and my God, have legal standing and precedence over and above the decisions of doctors and the state.

That is what this bill is about and I look forward to debating it in the House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my colleague, the member for Winnipeg Transcona, I ask for consent of the House to introduce the bill to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act. The Clerks at the table worked very hard to be able to expedite the introduction of this bill, and my colleague has been inadvertently delayed. I ask for consent of the House that I introduce it in his absence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So ordered.

Ms. Hunter (for Mr. Blaikie) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-204, an act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act.

She said: Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill and it is an important day to introduce this bill. Sixty-one years ago today the mine that provided the nuclear material for the bombings that occurred in Nagasaki, Japan, was discovered. It is an important day and it is an important subject. I know that my colleague will be speaking extensively and urging all members of this House to support this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will be moving two motions today, one relating to the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare and the other to the commonly referred to Beaudoin-Edwards committee. The President of the Treasury Board will then be making a motion regarding the reference of the estimates to the various committees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The parliamentary secretary needs unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No consent. Point of order, the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised that you heard a no because there were discussions on these matters at the House leaders' meetings and there was an agreement to proceed on these issues. Perhaps you could ask the question again. I cannot believe there was a no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no unanimous consent.

PETITIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and indeed a privilege to present a petition on behalf of constituents from all the communities in the North Thompson Valley of British Columbia, including Blue River, Clear Water, Barrie and Little Fort as well as Logan Lake, Chase, Westwold, Monte Creek, Monte Lake, Red Lake, Pritchard, Savona and the great city of Kamloops.

These constituents are concerned that the government has cut back on funding for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police resulting in a major loss to the province of British Columbia.

The petitioners point out that the consequences of these cuts have been the reduction and erosion of police service, effectiveness and protection. They also say that the results of these cuts have been the reduction of training, patrols and travelling expenses for the RCMP serving our communities.

The petitioners point out that the federal government is uncompromising in its negotiations with its provincial counterparts by maintaining that their share of funding will be reduced as of March 31, 1991, resulting in taxpayers having to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars more in most communities in British Columbia, to say nothing of the reduction in police protection.

The petitioners are urging the Government of Canada to consider restoring proper funding to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police so that it can fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across B.C. and so that it may remain a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to table in the House a petition signed by residents of Haut-Sheila, Pont-Lafrance and Leech who continue to protest the injustice caused by the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax.

Mr. Speaker, these people feel that the financial burden resulting from the GST continues to increase unemployment in the region, and they ask the government to reconsider this entirely unjustified tax.

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session; and of the amendment thereto of Mr. Chrétien (p. 24).

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, like other colleagues I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak today on the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne which took place at the opening of the Third Session of the thirty-fourth Parliament.

I am not one who speaks often in the House, being convinced and persuaded that repeating what has already been said many times before is perhaps a waste of time.

I feel that in this Speech from the Throne there is a particular paragraph in which I think has not been duly recognized by many people, certainly not by the media. I would like to participate largely for that reason.

I would like to congratulate my two colleagues, one from St. Maurice and the other from Regina—Wascana, who moved and seconded the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Each did this in a most eloquent fashion and should be commended.

We should also note that one is a francophone from Quebec and the other an anglophone from Saskatchewan. I think we should not overlook the fact that it is possible in this country for people who have goodwill and who are willing to look at the issues in an objective way to come together and talk and act for the benefit of this country as a whole.

That was the main raison d'être or the main issue raised in this Speech from the Throne; the one we are debating at the present time.

There were three main headings or general topics that constituted the Speech from the Throne on this particular occasion.

The first was the issue and subject of Canadian unity. The second was that of "Participating in Prosperity" and the third was "Changing the Way in which Ottawa Works". I would like to address all three of those to a greater or lesser degree, but from the somewhat unique position as a member and chairman of the previous Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. As you know, the committees have all been dissolved with the prorogation of Parliament earlier this week, and we now await these committees being re-established. But I would like to speak from the perspective of having served on that committee and more recently as chairman for a number of years.

In the course of doing this, I want to look at the Speech from the Throne and view it in a number of ways, but particularly in how it addresses a large segment of the people of Canada, namely those who are disabled. I should inform colleagues in the House that that represents about 13 per cent of Canadians. There are many of us, of course, who feel fine and are fit at the present time. But most of us, sooner or later, are going to be subjected to being included in that group of 13 per cent that are disabled. I think we should, for that reason, give this further consideration and perhaps more than it has had over the course of the years.

I am pleased to see that my colleague and former chairman of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore, speaking earlier in this debate, made reference to a very important paragraph in the Speech from the Throne that I want to deal with as well. That interesting paragraph comes under the heading of "Participating in Prosperity". When one takes a cursory look at the Speech from the Throne, one might wonder indeed how a few of the three or four social issues that are mentioned, would come under that rubric or under that heading of "Participating in Prosperity", but in fact they do.

I would like at this point to quote from the Speech from the Throne the particular paragraph that I am referring to, because as I said earlier not much mention has been made of this in the last several days. I am quoting now.

> My government will lay before you proposals for programs and policies to remove the barriers still faced by disabled Canadians to full participation in Canada's political life and economic prosperity. The government plans to implement a five-year strategy that will resolve issues such as access to employment, training, housing and transportation, public sensitivity and community integration.

As I mentioned earlier, I do regret the fact that there has been relatively little attention paid to this in some newspaper stories, other than where they list a series of headings from the Speech from the Throne. We do see mention of this reference to disabled people, but it is not picked up as a news item or as a story or something that somebody in the journalistic field wants to talk about or elaborate on. Virtually the same is true here in the House of Commons. I would suggest we will hear very little about this. We will hear a lot about the national unity issue and the economic problems that we are having, the need for prosperity, but perhaps not very much about this subject of the disabled and how they relate to the over-all picture.

I am not sure why that situation prevails. I might suggest that possibly the subject of disabled people is not sufficiently controversial although if you are a disabled person you might not quite agree with that. It may be that the people who are looking and writing about the Speech from the Throne do not really realize the significance of this particular paragraph.

It is obvious to everyone that the speech does address the two main issues that I have alluded to, namely the national unity issue and the issue of the economy or the future prosperity of this country. It does this in an interesting way. It links the two issues together and shows how the one is essential for the success of the other. I think we are seeing a lot written about that now, and that is indeed appropriate.

I think that while disability might be considered a social issue by most people, as I have indicated earlier, a little thought about the subject would suggest to one that it has its own significance regarding the headings of unity and prosperity.

There is a connotation in this paragraph that the issue of the problems faced by disabled people relates to the subject of unity and also relates to the over-all picture of the economy and prosperity in this country. I will want to elaborate on that before I finish.

Before doing that, I also want to quote another short paragraph from the Speech from the Throne. It appears in the first introductory page of the speech, before we launch into the specifics of unity. There are a number of words in it I want to touch on as being particularly significant in several ways. The paragraph reads as follows:

> This session will be a turning point in Canadian history.

It is going to be a turning point, but it is a turning point for those who are disabled as well. For the first time, we find a confirmation and a commitment by the government that it is now going to have a five year strategy to deal with the needs, the problems of access and so on of disabled people.

While it may be a turning point in general for Canadians and for Canada, it is also a turning point, I would submit, for disabled people. The paragraph continues:

> Let no one doubt the seriousness of the challenges we face as a country.

If any group in this country faces a challenge it is the disabled community. They have been recognized as being disabled. They have, in the past, been set aside and overlooked. We are now seeing an attempt made by government and by the committee of this House to address those challenges that they are facing and try to help them to overcome them.

The paragraph goes on to say:

> You will have the responsibility and the opportunity to forge an historic accommodation that embraces all Canadians,—

We do, indeed, have a responsibility. I would submit we also have an opportunity now, through this Speech from the Throne, to do exactly that, to make this historic accommodation.

The word "accommodation" brings to mind a couple of points. First of all, if we are going to have national unity in this country, various groups have to learn to better accommodate one another. I would also submit that it raises in the minds of those of us involved with disabled people the fact that they are looking and seeking for the term which is referred to as "reasonable accommodation", added to the Canadian Human Rights Act. At the present time, there is no requirement for employers, for example, to supply reasonable accommodation for disabled people. I was pleased to see this very word used in the Speech from the Throne and, of course, as it says here, it has to embrace all Canadians. For a change, we can assume then that among all these Canadians will be those who are disabled.

The throne speech goes on to say:

> —overcomes division and discord and charts a course for prosperity for generations to come.

Indeed, we are looking at prosperity not only for those of us who are able-bodied Canadians, but also prosperity for those who are disabled because they form part of the over-all picture of all Canadians.

I am pleased that we can see that kind of wording in the Speech from the Throne and we should compliment the government for taking that position.

The Speech from the Throne serves to focus, as I have suggested previously, on the bonds and the ties between the subject areas of unity and prosperity and how one is necessary for the other. That makes a great deal of sense and I am sure much has and will be said about that in the course of this debate.

The speech goes on, under the heading of "Participating in Prosperity", to address the need to consider, in addition to disabled people, other social issues as well. I just want to acknowledge the fact that it does indicate the need to address the issue of education, the role and needs of aboriginal peoples in this country and the issue of children. This arises, to some extent, from the considerable involvement that Canada had, through the Prime Minister playing a leading role at the UN conference on children last fall.

There are other social issues, but I want to, by and large, confine my remarks to the one dealing with the disabled people. Like the issue of disabled people, these areas that I have alluded to relate closely to economic prosperity and unity issues. They also transcend the traditional controversial and divisive issues of language, culture and so on.

At this point it would be appropriate to indicate that the work of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons is the type of work that transcends some of the divisive areas we have in this country. For example, discussions are taking place whereby the committee will plan to visit Quebec and look at the problems disabled people have there. That is helping to bridge a gap between the two language issues within this country.

We also have in mind, after having done it 10 years ago, a visit to the native peoples of Canada and try to understand better their needs vis-à-vis disabled persons, but by doing so we are also bridging gaps that lie between the aboriginal people at the present time and the rest of us in this country.

The history of the standing committee that I alluded to is interesting. I would like just to comment a little bit on that committee and the work that it has done in the past. Before I do that, I want also to acknowledge the fact that the third item that we are dealing with in the Speech from the Throne, namely the changing of the way Ottawa works, is also well exhibited in what the standing committee has been able to do over the last 10 years and even prior to when it became actually a standing committee.

It shows how this issue of unity can be seen to work on Parliament Hill among political parties, and a brief resumé of some of the work of the committee will illustrate that.

Those hon. members who have been around for a while will recall that the late Hon. Walter Dinsdale was probably the first and the main champion of disabled people in this country. He proposed for a number of years that there should be a study made of the needs of disabled people. Finally, in 1979, during the Clark government, agreement was reached to have such a committee established, but that government fell before the committee could be set up. The defeat led to a change in government, but not a change in the desire to have this committee move ahead. Under the Trudeau government at that time, the Special Committee on Disabled and Handicapped People was struck, chaired by David Smith, at that time an MP from Toronto.

Mr. Smith fashioned a very excellent, non-partisan committee. The style of functioning was essentially non-partisan which led to the committee being able to come up with the unanimous report entitled "Obstacles". It was so well that received it went through three printings because of the demand for it.

I cannot help but mention, again alluding to the issue of unity, the fact that the only surviving member of the House now of that original committee is the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine. I want to acknowledge the fact that he has been a prime example of how we can work together as members of a committee in a non-partisan fashion for the good of the people of Canada, in this particular case, for the good of those who are disabled.

I just want to acknowledge that fact because I think altogether too often we find partisanship prevailing. In my view, the people of Canada are becoming a little tired of that, but there are examples in this House where that does not have to happen.

The committee went on after having presented its report on "Obstacles" to go through many other changes and has presented many other reports over the years. I want to allude to the fact that in 1985 it became a subcommittee and was under the chairmanship of the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. That committee made several reports.

One of the interesting things that happened in 1987 was the acceptance by the Speaker of the House of Commons, who decided it was appropriate to establish a task force on disabled and handicapped on Parliament Hill. He came up with a very voluminous report indicating the changes that needed to take place on the Hill and set an example for government departments and agencies to do more themselves on behalf of the people of Canada. I am proud to think that our Speaker was able to take the lead in that regard.

• (1040)

Following that, in 1988, the committee assumed the full status of a standing committee and since then is known as the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. It is interesting to look at the terms of reference of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. They are unique terms of references. No other committee has precisely these terms. I say this in reference to the changing patterns of work here on the Hill.

Reading from the Standing Orders of the House of Commons of May 1991, page 75, Item 108(3)(b)(ii), the terms of reference state:

> (ii) the proposing, promoting, monitoring and assessing of initiatives aimed at the integration and equality of disabled persons in all sectors of Canadian society;

We have that unique opportunity of proposing, promoting, monitoring and assessing. I want to suggest that it has given the committee an opportunity which has not always existed in the past and it does suggest a move to make the standing committees and the ordinary members of Parliament much more effective.

The other thing that has happened because of the ability of the committee to propose and to monitor and to be advocates on behalf of disabled people, is the fact that we shall be entering the fourth National Access Awareness Week two weeks from this week. I would like to pay tribute to the fact that this has been something that has been accomplished over the last four years by a collaborative effort by a number of groups in this country including the Federation of Canadian Municipalities that have combined with others to produce the Five Star Community Awards that are presented during National Access Awareness Week. These include about ten of the leading companies in Canada. I will not read them all because of the shortage of time.

I see my time is running out. I want to remind members that two weeks from yesterday, this fourth National Access Awareness Week is going to be held here in Canada and we are going to recognize that on the Hill when the standing committee is going to co-host, along with the Speaker of the House of Commons, a reception in the Railway Committee Room, to which I hope all will attend. At that particular reception we will be bringing to the attention of members Independence '92, which is going to be taking place in Vancouver next year and will represent the culmination of the UN Decade of the Disabled.

I would like to say a lot more about this subject. I know my time is up and I will reserve further comments until a later date.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, as a parliamentarian and a Quebecer, I was very disappointed by the Speech from the Throne.

Instead of a global vision of our country, I heard only words devoid of logic, rhetoric devoid of substance. Instead of finding substance, especially in the kind of action to be taken by the government, I heard only promises. Not promises for today, Mr. Speaker, not promises for tomorrow, but promises for the year 2000. I find that incredible.

Instead of showing sensitivity in the Speech from the Throne— we must understand that what Canadians are looking for in this Speech is whether the government is aware of the problems of the unemployed, of women who want daycare, of consumers who are seeking better protection, and workers who are seeking better protection as well. These people want a government that is sensitive to their problems, and instead, all the government does is urge us to be more competitive.

To be competitive, however, means that as a worker you are well paid. It means that as a trucker—like our truckers outside—you are competing on a level playing field. But that is not the case.

The government wants all Canadians and Quebecers to be more competitive. Exactly what does that mean? I think it means the government wants us to take a cut in pay and work more.

I wonder, however, how cutting people's pay and making them work longer hours is going to make us more competitive. I know that the people in my riding, don't agree. In my riding, people say that the work they do is not a problem, because in Quebec people have always been productive. That is not the problem.

The reason we are not competitive enough—and I quote the Wall Street Journal, which is probably the Tory government's bible—is the way we manage the Canadian economy. In fact, the former Minister of Finance—I haven't heard any more about this but it's true—was called the worst Minister of Finance of any of the world's developed countries. And that is saying a lot! The worst in the world, and this from the Wall Street Journal! In Canada, we know how to do things. We know how to distinguish ourselves. Just look at the former Minister of Finance who was called the world's worst Finance minister!

When we talk about—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Edmonston: I see members on the other side are wide awake. They aren't late this morning. They are bright-eyed and bushy-tailed. That's good.

When we talk about the hypocrisy and lack of truthfulness of this government, I have yet to hear the government say: Sure, we made mistakes; sure, we lied to you about the GST; we misled you about tax reform. I have not heard them say anything of the kind. Instead of admitting his mistakes, the Prime Minister used the Speech from the Throne to brag: I did not make any mistakes, and I made some difficult decisions. Good grief, they were not difficult decisions, they were the wrong decisions! That is why he got this slap in the face from the Wall Street Journal, because the government has been making the wrong decisions about the economy for the past six years.

I realize my conservative colleagues are upset because I am blaming them. I agree they cannot be expected to take all the blame, because in 1984 they inherited an incredible deficit which was the result of the incompetence and arrogance of the former Liberal government. I remember. I realize that is how it all started. But as angered as I was by what happened under the previous government, it is totally unrelated to what is happening now under this government. The Liberal arrogance and incompetence has been replaced by a corporate agenda calling for the Conservatives to do certain things to please our friends the banks and big businesses. That is what we got for trying to boost our economy somewhat when we were deep into a "made in Canada" recession. Again, Canada has the know how. This government surely knows how to plunge us deep into a recession.

There is more, Mr. Speaker. After plunging us into a deep and severe recession, the government has the gall to blame us Canadians for contributing to this recession. How is that?

An hon. member: That is the Tory way!

Mr. Edmonston: True. That is the Tory way of doing things. They blamed us for this recession. They said that we do not work enough, that we are greedy and spoiled. Quite frankly, it takes a lot of gall to say something like that!

Now, we are facing three national problems requiring direct and immediate action. These are, unemployment, unfair taxation and national unity.

[English]

This government's corporate agenda of high interest rates, high taxes and a high Canadian dollar has put millions of Canadians out of work. Free trade and unemployment insurance cuts together ensure that these jobs will never return and that the government's safety net for the jobless has wider gaps than ever.

If you do not believe there are gaps, come to my riding of Chambly and listen to people who have had to sell their homes because they lost their jobs, who had to move out of their community, who have to shop across the border. The government is making us nomadic shoppers, driving us away from our own country with its own taxation policies. Go to your ridings and listen to the people.

Montreal, Quebec, my own home town, has 12.5 per cent unemployment, the highest unemployment in Canada. That is my town and this is my country. I do not believe that the one-third of the caucus who are from Quebec can say they defend Quebec's interests while allowing 12.5 per cent unemployment to continue. That is not defending Quebec's interests.

Allow me to speak on the second national crisis we are facing. I call that unfair taxation. That is right, unfair taxation. You heard me.

Today the average, middle-class Canadian family is being taxed out of existence. When more than 50 cents out of every dollar is grabbed by the government what incentive is there to build for the future? What incentive is there to save? What incentive do we have to believe in Canada?

A fair Canada? Not with unfair taxation.

We have heard the lies and the hypocrisy about taxation in this country for years. I am not telling Canadians anything new when I recall that the former finance minister said: "Hey, the GST is great, it is going to be a visible tax". Ha, ha. Wrong.

A visible tax. Did you see it? I didn't see it. Most places say: "Our fee, our price, includes GST". That is not very visible.

Also, we heard another—I have to watch my language here because I know I must not be unparliamentary—error from Mr. Wilson, another error from the former Minister of Finance. He said: "the GST will be revenue neutral". We do not hear that any more. Revenue neutral, my eye. It is a cash cow and he knows it.

Mr. Heap: And he got out of the job.

Mr. Edmonston: Yes, Mr. Wilson did get out of the job. I want to recall what he said, though. Mr. Wilson, the former finance minister, said that we, the middle-class taxpayers, would probably have to pay about $300 more because of the GST. He said: "If you want to help this deficit, bring it down, that is what is necessary".

Well, I'll be darned. The latest figures show that it is closer to $600. That is double.

Ms. Hunter: The gouge and screw tax.

Mr. Edmonston: Double what they promised us. I mean, how wrong can you be?

The government says it has been cutting costs to bring down taxes but we still have close to 40 ministries, about double what we had two decades ago. Government workers had their wages cut, but senior government officials, the so-called mandarins—I never used the word mandarin before I came to Ottawa— and the workers for the Bank of Canada, had a real sweetheart deal. They received their increases a couple of days before the wage freezes and the wage cuts.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Edmonston: Canadians see that. Good old John Crow and his Bank of Canada slipped themselves a nice bundle of extra cash just before the wage freeze.

Mr. Heap: They knew what was coming.

Ms. Hunter: They looked after themselves.

Mr. Edmonston: Sure, they knew. I spoke earlier about this government making Canadians nomadic shoppers across the border. This is what is happening. There is an increase of about 22 per cent. That is incredible. We want to support our communities, we want to support the businesses in our communities, but the government is making it impossible for us. It knows it.

The problem is that the parliamentarians on the other side will probably not be here after the next election. Unfortunately, because I believe that most of the people believe that they owe them an explanation. The government has never given them an explanation for all of these problems—and it is not in the throne speech.

This wasn't always a problem, this high unfair taxation. Canada was not always like that. In the fifties, according to Statistics Canada, for every revenue dollar the federal government collected about 49 cents was from the average taxpayer and about 51 cents from corporations. Do you know what it is now, do you know? I don't hear my colleagues from the other side. I will tell you what it is. We, the consumer, the aggrieved taxpayer, are being charged right now for every Revenue Canada dollar—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has three minutes left and then there will be questions and comments.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the questions and comment. I would just like to make the point that at one time every tax dollar average Canadians paid represented about 50 per cent of revenue and corporations represented about 50 per cent whereas today the average taxpayer contributes 85 cents of every tax dollar received by Revenue Canada. Corporations pay about 15 per cent. Check the figures. Fifteen per cent. The corporations' contribution to the average tax dollar received by Ottawa is almost the same as the Conservatives are right now in the Gallup poll.

• (1100)

That is scandalous.

Besides talking about unfair taxation, I would like to talk a little about Canadian unity. This government, with help from Liberal flip-flops, has been the major cause of disunity in our country.

Take a look at the Reform Party and at the Bloc Quebecois and tell me if you do not see orphans from the Conservatives and from the Liberals who can no longer deal with their own parties.

They chased them out. They would not allow them to speak their own mind. What they are doing is kicking the whole system down. They are saying: "We do not want anything to do with you."

I know we have the Bloc Quebecois in back of us, but I will tell you something: I would rather see separatists who are separatists and who say they are than people who are but say they are not and belong to a major party. I would rather see people who are not more hypocritical than the hypocrites I see on the other side. I know it hurts them to hear that, but that is the point I would like to make.

I think I should apologize a bit for being over-exhuberant. This throne speech did make me mad because I promised the people in my riding that they would see something that would give them some hope. Instead, I see nothing in this throne speech but despair.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, the throne speech outlines a plan and we will see detailed legislation.

Recently, in the province of Ontario, we had the first NDP socialist budget, supported by the NDP federal party. There are some interesting numbers in it because they talk about, for example, taxation of corporations.

The Ontario budget in 1989 projected that $4.7 billion would be collected from corporations. In 1991–92, the NDP government is anticipating collecting $3.1 billion, that is $1.6 billion less from corporations.

You talk about taxing corporations more and yet the first NDP socialist government seems to recognize that corporations do make a contribution. Maybe, you would be curious and explain that.

The premier of Ontario defends the budget. He is saying: "Although we are going to have a deficit of $38 billion over the next four years, it now only costs 11 cents of each Ontario tax dollar to pay for that debt".

In 1968, when the federal Liberals moved from balanced budgets to running deficits, it was 12 cents on the dollar. By the end of the reign in 1984, the federal taxpayer was paying 32 cents on the dollar.

When you get on that slippery slope of deficits, it is just deferred taxation. The province of Ontario, with an 8 per cent retail sales tax, collects $8 billion. When it presented the budget it said: "We are going to have an $8 billion deficit."

It did not tell the Ontario taxpayer to pay for these programs. It really should be a 16 per cent provincial sales tax if we want to balance the budget.

Would the hon. member please explain to me how a budget like that helps to create an economy and get it growing.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, allow me at least to explain briefly what I think happened in Ontario.

Ontario inherited a deficit. When the provincial Liberals were defeated and the New Democrats came to power, the Ontario Liberals were less than candid in saying that there was a $200 million surplus. Do you remember that? I find such a lie unacceptable.

Finally, the New Democrat government decided to invest in the people in spite of the recession. Of course, there will be a deficit. But I think it is much too early to say that the Ontario deficit will hurt the people. I suggest it is an investment in people.

The Tories have their way of doing things but, if I remember correctly, there were deficits too in the days of the famous former Premier of Ontario, Mr. Bill Davis, were there not?

An hon. member: A very small one!

Mr. Edmonston: A very small one, granted! In any case, let me tell you about what we are doing in Quebec. We too have a deficit. I would not be surprised at all if every province in this country has a deficit to some extent because they do not want the public pay for the problems caused by the recession. Now, you can argue about the size of the deficit but I believe—in the Toronto Star I saw an article by Bill Walker defending the latest Ontario budget—saying that Mr. Rae had no choice but to help the people of Ontario.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Crowfoot and then the hon. member for Calgary Southeast has a question, so govern yourself accordingly.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I presume it was for convenience that the hon. member decided not to answer the previous question as to why it is corporations are being taxed less.

The Ontario government has increased expenditures in Ontario in the last provincial budget by 13 per cent. It has not just increased the deficit, it has tripled the deficit. That government tripled the deficit in a single fell swoop.

I want to ask the hon. member if the Ontario government ever intends to pay it back. If it does, then how is it going to do it except through taxes? Today he basically talked about taxes as if somehow it were something that was imposed by this government at this time. He ought to know that the only reason for taxes there is because of the history of how they came to be in the first place. His party is exactly on the same route of upward pressure on inflation and upward pressure on interest rates. Because it governs the largest population province in Canada, the Ontario government bears a burden to all other parts of the country because Ontario affects the national economy far more significantly than any other province. It has a duty to Canadians elsewhere who are trying to manage the economy of the country more prudently.

Mr. Edmonston: I do not think Conservatives who have been chased out of Ontario need to give me any lessons about a prudent economy.

Mr. Edmonston: I do not have any lessons to learn from a party that has fallen to third in the polls in its own province. I think the province of Ontario told the Conservatives what it thought about their so-called "prudent" management of the economy.

Let me talk about their corporation taxes. I think that is important. I do not think Canadians want to gouge big business any more than they want to be gouged themselves. The key word here and a word the Conservative Party keeps having trouble with is "fairness". It is called being fair and Canadians want that fairness.

Look at the figures from Statistics Canada regarding the dollar that the average Canadian spends and that Revenue Canada collects. Eighty-five cents of every dollar of taxes comes from the average Canadian and only 15 cents comes from corporations. I am talking on a federal level here, primarily.

An hon. member: Is that fair?

Mr. Edmonston: I find that unfair. You can tell me about Ontario. You can tell me about Quebec. The figures speak for themselves and that is why, presently, the government is moving toward a single digit in the polls. People do not trust it and they are tired of unfairness.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment briefly. It is not like me to comment on any NDP economic statement, because its credibility is questionable in the light of economics.

• (1110)

Look at the experience of NDP governments: the devastation caused to B.C. by that hiccup of history, the Barrett government, and the Ontario government. I could not say it any better than the Calgary Chamber of Commerce when it issued a release in which Tom Cumming, its president, said:

> The Calgary Chamber of Commerce is concerned and disappointed with the recently announced budget of the Ontario government which projects a deficit of $9.7 billion in the fiscal year 1991-92".
> While the Calgary Chamber of Commerce normally does not comment on budgets in other provinces, it has elected to break tradition because the projected deficit is so huge and because of its implications for Canada in general. "Ontario is a major player in the Canadian economy. There is a strong likelihood—that this exploding expenditure in the Ontario government will have negative impacts upon interest rates, inflation and the value of the Canadian dollar at a time when Canada is struggling to be competitive."

These people understand the economy of Canada and understand the devastation caused by the Ontario NDP government, the kind of policies proposed by the member who has just spoken. We have an idea of the credibility of NDP economic performance and policies.

Even greater cause for concern is the Ontario government's projection of a continued deficit of over $8 billion per year for the next succeeding years which will take that province's debt from its current $42 billion to $77 billion. What this will do to the Canadian economy is preposterous just when we have turned it around to lower inflation and interest rates in this country; one irresponsible government can go against 10 responsible governments and turn the whole mess around to the previous state, as NDP governments have in the past.

The Calgary Chamber of Commerce and other chambers across the country have been campaigning long and hard for fiscal responsibility on the part of all governments in light of the burgeoning direct debt load which now exceeds $550 billion. When many provincial governments and the federal government have been making progress in bringing their expenditures under the semblance of control in recognition of the growing fiscal crisis in Canada, it is especially disappointing to see one province so massively ignoring this problem.

It is also disappointing to hear the NDP continue these tired old lines about old ways of how to destroy an economy.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I have just a final comment on the comments of my colleague who just spoke. I am really surprised. I think there are some statistics in what I had said. I tried to give some common sense facts and I tried to show the government where it could really regain the confidence of Canadians.

I know that sometimes the government side can be extremely sensitive to what I call common sense facts. Anyone who talks to the truckers, any consumer or anyone who deals with the every day world would agree with my presentation that this government is running this country straight into the ground.

I have one last comment. I hear these little snide remarks from the government side and sometimes from the Liberal side about which country are we talking about. I chose this country of Canada. I chose it as many of the other people chose this country. I do not really accept that kind of off the cuff remark about "which country are you talking about".

Finally, I just want to mention one thing. I wish that both the Liberals and the Conservatives in this House would not mistake Quebec nationalism for separatism. There is a big difference.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to address my fellow citizens today in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. Last Monday, the Governor General gave Canadians a clear message, one based on national unity, on the prosperity of the Canadian economy and on governmental efficiency.

Canada cannot continue to grow, prosper and develop without these three elements as part of a coherent whole. Mr. Speaker, Canada's unity involves the very existence of this great country, which was bequeathed to us by our fathers and mothers and is now lent to us by our children.

[English]

Canada cannot exist without retaining the integrity of its territory. This land has to stretch from the waters of the Atlantic Ocean to the waters of the Pacific Ocean and to the waters and icefields of the Arctic.

Canada has to include the rocky shores of Newfoundland, the rugged but grandiose expanses of Labrador, the beauty of the maritimes, the uniqueness of Quebec, the industrial structure of Ontario, the Great Lakes, the vast prairies, the mountains and beautiful coast of British Columbia. This country has to include the Yukon and its natural resources, the Northwest Territories and the Arctic. Without any one of these geographical areas, Canada is not a country.

Canada is also a country of diversified people.

The first native inhabitants, the first immigrants from continental Europe and the British Isles and all those who followed them have worked together to populate Canada. Take one of these people away and Canada is no longer a country.

Mr. Speaker, today we must look at the situation head on. Can we afford to take actions with unimaginable consequences? No, Mr. Speaker. We all have the responsibility to weigh carefully the significance and impact of the action we take. Breaking up the country and ending arrangements that have served the interests of Canadians and Quebecers well is too risky. Is it not wiser to continue our efforts to strengthen the country! Is it not more logical to take new approaches that will lead to constitutional arrangements that are acceptable and profitable for all citizens of Canada? The answer to this question is yes.

Let us look together for arrangements that will let Canada continue on the road to greater prosperity. Our government's initiatives are a step in the right direction. The Citizens' Forum under Keith Spicer has done good work and continues to do so. This unique unprecedented initiative has enabled very many citizens to talk about their vision of Canada.

Mr. Lapierre: It was a farce!

Mr. Langlois: I hear the hon. member for Shefford, Mr. Speaker, say that the Citizens' Forum was a farce. I would simply remind the member for Shefford that the chairman of the Citizens' Forum is a great Canadian who has worked under several governments, including the former government of which the member for Shefford was a part.

The Citizens' Forum gave them a chance to talk about their vision of Canada for today and tomorrow.

[English]

The Beaudoin–Edwards commission has completed its consultation on the amending formula and will table its recommendation in a few weeks. The Speech from the Throne outlines the future steps that our government expects to take starting in the fall.

This round of constitutional initiative is for Canada.

The success of this series of initiatives by our government will lead Canadians and Quebecers to realize the importance of keeping the country together. The prosperity of the Canadian economy will also help ensure Canada's unity.

The Speech from the Throne presents Canadians with a progressive vision for the direction of the country's economy. Prosperity depends on competitiveness, the dynamism of Canadian businesses and the skill of Canadian workers. Since 1984, our government has implemented a whole series of measures to make Canadian businesses more competitive.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of this House and Canadians, let me mention some of them: The thorough full overhaul of the tax system; the free trade treaty with the United States; the revision of the Financial Institutions Act; the privatization of many Crown corporations including Air Canada and Petro–Canada; the sale to the private sector of government–controlled businesses; and the implementation of regional development programs in many parts of the country. That, Mr. Speaker, is a whole series of initiatives to strengthen the country's economy.

• (1120)

The Speech from the Throne proposes new and bold initiatives aimed at reinforcing our economic structure. I would like to quote the following from the Speech from the Throne:

> —my government will work with provincial governments to ensure that Canada becomes a single, integrated market from coast to coast to coast.

This proposed initiative will cause major changes in the Canadian way of doing business internally. It will mean the elimination of policies preventing provincial agencies from buying at lower cost in other provinces. It will mean the elimination of regulations that force Canadian suppliers to sell their products abroad instead of selling them in neighbouring provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this initiative will also eliminate employment practices that hurt Canadian workers.

That is an important courageous initiative that will also contribute to the country's prosperity.

Manpower training will also receive special attention. Our workers must adjust to technological change, new work methods and new concepts of management and production.

Bill C–21 now makes available funds so that we can considerably increase our efforts to improve the skill of our labour force.

Our small and medium sized businesses in Quebec face huge manpower problems. It is most urgent that our government and the Government of Quebec conclude agreements on labour force training.

This is not the time for discord and jurisdictional quarrels. Employers and workers need immediate strong actions and the federal government has an extremely important role to play in this field, even if the hon. member for Shefford does not agree, although when he was on the government side, he could have influenced these decisions, but I must say that he did not do so.

The Speech from the Throne also announces our government's firm intention to increase its efforts in education. Together with all my colleagues from Quebec, I applaud this initiative. We members of Parliament from Quebec in Ottawa call on our provincial colleagues to react positively to this intention.

Together, let us tell the ministers responsible, both in Quebec and in Ottawa, to leave rhetoric aside and to think of the young people who drop out of high school. That is the problem, which must be attacked resolutely.

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne reveals some horrifying figures: Three high school students in ten drop out before graduation—and in some regions of the country, it is four out of ten,—and four adults in ten neither read nor do arithmetic to function properly. These data justify immediate action that must not cease until the goals set are reached.

These goals are clearly set out in the Speech from the Throne: Cutting illiteracy rates in half; ensuring that ninety percent of Canadians attain high school diplomas; doubling the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, science and engineering; quadrupling the training provided by employers to their employees.

Let us join forces at every level of government to achieve these goals. The prosperity of our country depends on it. The need to improve the efficiency of the machinery of government is stated in the Speech from the Throne. That part of the Speech contains a list of proposed changes.

Now, it is up to the Parliamentarians, elected representatives and government officials to set up the appropriate mechanisms.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say again that the people from remote areas, who live far away from the governmental major decision-making centres are frustrated by what they perceive to be indifference on the part of civil servants in dealing with their problems. I must admit that, while this frustration is sometimes legitimate, most civil servants try to provide the best service possible to their clients.

The problem, in my opinion, is that the decision-making process is too concentrated at the upper echelons located far from the major centres.

Regional services do exist but, more often than not, decisions are made at the head office.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the efficiency of the machinery of government calls for a genuine decentralization of the administrative decision-making process. Departments must grant a greater autonomy to their regional managers.

Those are some of my comments on the Speech from the Throne opening the third session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament of Canada.

If we work together toward achieving the goals set by the government, we will be gratified, by the end of this mandate, to see we have helped maintain and strenghten the integrity, unity and prosperity of Canada.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what was said by the hon. member for Manicouagan, and I noticed more specifically his reference to regional development programs, which according to him—I don't want to put words into his mouth—but according to him, in any case, these programs had improved since the Progressive Conservative Party came to power.

Perhaps I may describe the following situation for the hon. member and then ask him to comment on the impact of regional development programs since his government came to power, and more specifically in the part of the country I represent, in Eastern Ontario, where the unemployment rate today is almost as high as in certain areas in Newfoundland. For instance, in Hawkesbury, which is in my riding, the unemployment rate is up to 15 or 16 per cent. In Cornwall the unemployment rate is even higher. Pembroke, Renfrew and other regions, with the exception of the National Capital region, also have very high unemployment.

Before 1984, the CIRB program, which was designed to find new industries for regions dependent on the textile industry, was abolished by the present government.

We also had the IRDP, the Industrial and Regional Development Program, which was active in my region and many others as well, which was also abolished by the government opposite.

There was a federal provincial agreement between Canada and Ontario, the subsidiary agreement for Eastern Ontario, to help regions like mine.

Does the hon. member still think regional development programs have improved since the Tories came to power?

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I found the comments by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell most interesting. I would like to point out to the hon. member that in the part of Quebec I represent, regional development agreements signed by our government with the government of Quebec focus on industrial development tourism and developing the region's own resources.

I wish I were able to comment on the situation in Eastern Ontario and the riding he represents. However, at one time, because the business I worked for had made a number of acquisitions in his riding, I was in that particular area to do business. We found that business people in the area were very dynamic and that in addition to being very dynamic, they, and small businesses in this part of Ontario were technologically very advanced.

If the hon. member feels that further efforts should be made by the federal government in his riding, I would ask him to make the requisite submissions to the minister. As parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, I should be delighted to be of assistance, if necessary. However, I can say that in the part of Quebec I represent, these regional development programs are working very well. They have made it possible to attract new investment and create new jobs, and they have helped the fisheries and tourism industry to make considerable progress. I would therefore urge the hon. member to look at these results and see whether it would be possible to implement the same measures in his own riding in Ontario.

• (1130)

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Manicouagan a few questions, particularly as he is a conservative member for Quebec who for all practical purposes, does not care about Quebec.

I would like to ask him whether he agrees, as his speech seems to indicate, with the fact that the federal government is intruding directly in the field of education and vocational training?

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that at the time of the signing of the Constitution of 1867, the Fathers of Confederation had left education to the provinces, which were given exclusive power in that field.

Despite the present constitutional upheaval, the federal government, in its Speech from the Throne that we are currently analyzing, plans to intrude directly in that field.

I would like to know whether the hon. member for Manicouagan agrees with such an intrusion. Would he say it as categorically?

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, does he agree with the fact that the Speech from the Throne is now talking about a "unique" society rather than "distinct" as it was in the Meech Lake Accord and as was agreed by the eleven Prime Ministers. Is the member for Manicouagan in agreement with the Speech from the Throne which describes Quebec as a unique society?

My third point, Mr. Speaker, deals with the fact that the Speech from the Throne is proposing a legislation allowing for a consultation of Canadian citizens on the Constitution, through a referendum or a constituent assembly. Is the hon. member for Manicouagan in agreement with the leader of the opposition who says that a referendum should be held, throughout Canada, before the referendum in Quebec, that is before June 1992 or October 1992?

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to answer the questions asked by the hon. member who just spoke—

Mr. Rocheleau: for Hull–Aylmer.

Mr. Langlois: For Hull–Aylmer, thank you. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to remember where the hon. member is from, since he has sat in various places in this House, it is a bit tricky. So, please, forgive me.

Mr. Speaker, in answer to my colleague's third question, the Throne Speech does say that Canadian men and women will be invited to take part in the debate, and that will happen through extensive consultations, which have already begun with the Citizens' Forum and the Beau-doin-Edwards Commission and will continue this autumn with the creation of the committee, as announced in the Throne Speech.

Mr. Speaker, there was no mention of a referendum in the Throne Speech, nor is it included in the government's proposals, and I think it would be wise and well-advised to realize that a whole series of consultations will have to take place before we decide exactly what mechanisms will be used to amend the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I am quite content with the expression "unique society" used in the Throne Speech, since it acknowledges the fact that Quebec is in a unique and very particular situation, as one of the founding nations, with its own characteristics, its own language, its own legal institutions, and its own education system. That is the way, Mr. Speaker, that the unique character of Quebec society should be recognized.

Thirdly, the Throne Speech specifies that the federal government intends to interfere, with provincial consent and cooperation, in education and job training.

My honourable colleague should reread the Throne Speech very carefully. He would see, Mr. Speaker, right there in the Throne Speech, that the federal government is ready to get involved in these areas "with provincial endorsement and cooperation".

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this very important occasion in the life of this Parliament, which is to debate the new blueprint put forward by the government.

This is one of the signal hallmark events in the life of any parliamentary session. It should establish for all Canadians the opportunity to know where we are going, to begin to put together the kind of plan and formulation of goals that are going to be essential to deal with the kind of world we live in.

As I read and listened to the throne speech and to the debate, I wondered if we were really engaged in a serious exercise. I thought really the whole object of the government was to build up a tourist industry in Canada by convincing Canadians they do not have to go to Florida to go to Disneyland or Fantasyland. They only have to come to Ottawa and look at the performance of this government. They do not have to go down to Orlando, Florida to see Dumbo and Goofy, they can look at the front benches of the government in the last few days to understand what kind of fantasy world is being built here in Ottawa.

The government talks about a prosperous Canada, and it talks about it sort of based on the free trade agreement and all the new economic initiatives. The reality of Canada is 100 metres in front of this building where truckers are protesting, as they are across Canada, because they are losing their jobs and they are fighting for their economic survival. The government says: "We will study the problem."

What can be more of a fairy tale than that enormous gap between the reality that every one sees as we walk in this building in the last days, and when we listen to members on the opposite side or the ministers who say: "We are going to build a prosperous Canada."

The government talks about caring for our children. Our children are our most important asset. The reality is, as I see in my riding, that 40 or 50 per cent of the food banks are occupied by children and their families because they cannot get enough to eat at home. Their welfare payments or their income is not enough to buy them the basic staples of our society.

Is there anything in the throne speech—although I hear a comment from the minister that yes, we are. We are going to have another study. We are going to have another committee. The government is turning Canada into one big university symposium. The only people who are going to get jobs out of this are the researchers and the appointees to new royal commissions, new committees and new study teams.

What goes on in the reality of Canada as it now exists is that we have the shame and tragedy of close to half a million children starving in this country. I have not heard any real commitment to action based upon that harsh, difficult and incredibly insensitive reality.

As a critic for external affairs, I looked again at the throne speech and have listened with some anticipation to what the government said about the world we live in. It says Canada will once again defend its interests in this world of a global economy. The harsh reality, again, is seen on the hills of Turkey and Iran where there are still over one million Kurdish refugees. It is seen in the depleted, tragic wastelands of Bangladesh, Sudan, Somalia and Ethiopia. That is the harsh reality of the world we live in.

What does our government have to say about it? What initiatives are we going to take? What roles are we going to perform? If you listen to the throne speech, we are going to do what we have been doing up to now, which is nothing.

We fought a war just a few months ago in the gulf where we were prepared to spend close to $1 billion. We said it was a great fight for democracy and for the rule of law. It was a great opportunity to show that there will be now a new sense of international responsibility and collective security. A billion dollars to fight a war.

We had war cabinets meeting every day, and the cameras were whirling. We had the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs coming out and declaring the important initiatives. Canada was going to fight for a reduction in the arms trade. Canada was going to propose economic development. Canada was going to take the leadership in reforming the United Nations.

Is there anything in the throne speech about that? Did you read anything about what we are doing now? The arms trade is going on in the Middle East. They have just negotiated a sale of $25 billion. I did not hear anybody from the Canadian government objecting to that initiative. I did not hear anybody in the Canadian government in this new world order saying to our allies in Europe, the United States or others: "Hey, stop selling arms". That is what the Prime Minister said we were going to do during the war. But somehow we have forgotten about that obligation.

I see the tragedy taking place in the aftermath of the war; the consequences of the war, the total destruction in the countries, the refugees hanging out in the hills. Where is the incredible mobilization of Canada that we saw during the war? Where is the peace cabinet that should be mobilized to bring the resources of this country together to help these people? Is that not equally important?

I do not see any commitment in the throne speech. I do not see any initiative by the Canadian government. I do not see any action being promised. It is a total absence and omission.

Instead, it fired some 300 people from the Department of External Affairs, people who were working on proposals to deal with the spread of arms; people who were working on UN reform. These people who were working on these very initiatives no longer have jobs.

Of course, the new minister of external affairs has set an incredibly new launch in her tenure as a minister by totally denying her responsibility for the action of the department and is trying to lay the blame on civil servants. What kind of performance is this government going to expect from its prime public servants when it has trespassed upon the fundamental, essential, value of ministerial accountability. It is a great way to start the new world order from a Canadian point of view by telling your department it can hang out to dry. That is an awfully good way for this government to start leading its new interventions in the world with a minister, who in a cowardly way, refuses to take responsibility for what that department does. That is a great way to get started.

Once again we are back in the world of fantasy land. We are back living in a world that really does not exist. The government side is weaving and spinning in a world of make believe, of magic. Unfortunately, the only people who believe it are the members of the government, because nobody else out there does. Nobody else believes there is a real commitment to action. No one else believes there really is a plan in mind.

The harsh reality is that when it comes to dealing with the problems of Canada and the problems of the world, this government is bankrupt of ideas. It has nothing to offer except more study, more examination, more review, more inquiries, nothing that would give any sense that it knows where it is going. There is no blueprint here. All we have is a prescription for navel gazing, hoping somehow that there will be some magical turn of events because it does not know how to control matters any longer.

What is sad about it is that it has not learned from its mistakes. It has not learned that there are serious fundamental problems in this whole trade arrangement with the United States that is leading to enormous losses of jobs in steel, automobiles, food processing and agriculture. Jobs are being lost every day because we did not negotiate the right deal.

However, the government does not say: "Well, okay, we have had a couple of years to see how it is going. Here is how we can change it. Here is how we can renegotiate it. Here is how we can improve upon it. Here is what we should do about it". It says; "Hey, it is wonderful".

Tell the unemployed workers in the steel mills or the food processing plants how wonderful it is and they will tell you that once again you are living a great lie.

The harsh reality again is that there is no sense of realism about what it is doing. Instead it promises that it is now going to renegotiate a deal with Mexico, for North American free trade, but without knowing why, without knowing where it wants to go, without knowing what kind of conditions.

President Bush at least had the good sense to set certain objectives, dealing with social, environmental and labour problems. We have not had a word, a whisper. There is nothing in the throne speech to show that we have learned any lessons about how to deal with the difficult world of international trade.

Again, dealing with the incredibly important problem of national unity, we have a promise for another committee to study the works of other committees, who were studying the works of other committees. We are sort of beginning to chase our tail on this issue. The Prime Minister says one thing and then another. We may have a referendum, we may not have a referendum, we may have this, we may have that. We have no sense of where we are going.

As a westerner I am surprised and extremely disappointed, that when discussing changing how Ottawa works, the whole fundamental question of Senate reform was totally ignored.

I would like to read into the record a statement by Gordon Robertson, one of the most senior and respected public servants in this country for many long years. I quote from his book A House Divided where he wrote: "Agreement on the Senate was the key to Confederation in 1867. Agreement on its reform could be the key to the impasse that today threatens the renewal of our federalism for the future."

One of the most important and admired public servants who has studied the Constitution says the key to the impasse of trying to find reconciliation between east and west, of giving the regions the feeling that they belong in a full sense, is Senate reform.

I looked closely at the throne speech, I used a microscope, I changed my glasses, I examined it, perused it. There is not one word about our willingness, our preparation to change the Senate. It is totally ignored. Yet I know that last month during the parliamentary break when I travelled throughout western Canada as chairman of a committee of our own caucus on constitutional matters it came up in every single meeting. It has the same symbolic importance in western Canada as the issue of a distinct or unique society has in Quebec. The same feeling of providing a recognition of belonging.

Yet, a throne speech which tries to set out the new blueprint for federalism completely misses the point.

There has to be Senate reform. It is a way of righting the imbalances, inequities and inequalities that have existed in federalism since its inception. There is not one federal state in the world that does not have a second chamber which works effectively to represent regional interests.

Through quirks of history ours does not. It is not an elected body, it does not have the credibility or the legitimacy of being democratically elected by the people. Therefore, its ability to provide a check and balance upon the role of the executive, which is dictated to by the majority of members from the heavily populated provinces, is constantly undermined. We see it repeated time and time again in many decisions, I don't have to place in the record of the House that history. It is seen and felt in a palpable way.

There are all kinds of proposals around. Mr. Robertson, in his book, discusses all of them and comes up with what I think is a pretty fair proposal, an elected Senate that has effective powers to provide checks and balances, that can say yes or no to appointments to Crown agencies, to Crown boards, to various appointments. It could provide protection for language and culture at the national level, rather than relying simply on provincial powers.

There could be an election based upon proportional representation to ensure that minorities are reflected in that body. The elections could be staggered every two years in a six-year term to create a kind of mini-election to test the government so it would have to be conscious of changes in the mood of the public and their concerns.

There are some good ideas around, ideas that we have promoted. The 1986 resolution, passed at our own policy convention, set out a very clear statement of our commitment to that reform. There is nothing from the government on that crucial issue.

I say to the new Minister of Constitutional Affairs, who is from western Canada, that no one should know better than he how important it is that Senate reform become part of the package. I am not saying this in a partisan sense. I am simply saying there will be no agreement on any new constitutional package until we have a commitment and agreement that we will pursue Senate reform based upon a democratic election, upon effective powers, and making it more equal.

That has to be the hallmark of any new proposal. It is something that is important because in western Canada we recognize the importance of reorganizing and restructuring our own arrangements.

A week or so ago I put out a proposal saying that the prairie provinces have to come together in some form of union. They have to begin merging and integrating many of the economic activities of the prairie region, such as telecommunications, training, and transportation. We are small and do not have the same kind of critical mass, resources, and people and as a result we have to begin combining our resources and combining our energies to make it work. There are similar proposals in the Atlantic provinces for the same thing.

We are prepared to restructure this country. It is important. We recognize the crucial challenges in the global economy. It is not going to happen until there is a willingness at the federal level to make changes. That means not just dealing with Senate reform but reforming many of the regulatory bodies of the federal government to make them work at a regional level, and ensuring that transportation is tailored and blueprinted to the concerns of that region.

It means using some of the regional development funds, instead of using them as slush funds for individual businesses, to start rebuilding the infrastructure, the training facilities, and the schools of those regions so they can get up to par, so they can begin to improve those areas.

There is an awful lot more reform and remodelling that has to be done than simply having another committee go to work on it. On the crucial question of constitutional amendment, we could use the Victoria formula. A prairie union could provide its own veto for that part of the world and ensure that westerners do not feel they are being left out, like they are second class citizens in their own country.

Those are the kinds of proposals I would have expected in a throne speech that said we are at a crossroads, a turning point. I would have expected a clear, unmistakable agenda of action, proposing how to deal with problems of the world, how to deal with our own economic problems, and how to deal with regional problems.

That was not in it. Instead, we have a brochure from Disneyland outlining how to pretend what is going on as opposed to getting down to work, getting down to action.

I know my time is about through—I would love to be able to spend more hours with you, and I know that you would love that as well. The message we are really trying to give is that we all recognize the importance of breaking out of conventional ways of putting our heads to work, of coming up with ideas that Canadians can really understand and that indicate the political system is working well. Credibility and belief in the political system will not be achieved by tinkering with a little bit of machinery. It is going to come about by clearly demonstrating that the people they elect know where they are going, can provide some leadership, have a sense of purpose, and know what the blueprint should be. If that is the criteria for leadership then the throne speech is an abysmal failure.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my hon. friend on such a compassionate speech. I am sure that all Canadians share in the disillusionment that he expressed with the lack of depth and commitment this government has shown in this throne speech. The most accurate reading I could make of his interpretation of the speech was that there was a total lack of commitment on the part of the government. It was a promise that they will continue to offer Canadians what they have been offering them for the past several years.

In other words, Canadians, the government is saying: "You had better like what we have been doing to you for the past several years because that is our commitment to you for the future. That is what we are going to be doing to you for years to come." The time period, of course, will probably be limited to about two years.

I wonder if the hon. member would just react to that rather simplistic view, perhaps, of the throne speech. Do you think it is an accurate one? Do you think this government was really saying to Canadians: "We hope you like what we have been giving you because that is what we are going to continue to give you and continue to do to you?"

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it only shows how many prescient people there are in this country that they would be able to provide such a highly accurate appraisal.

There is another comment that came to mind as the member for Leeds—Grenville was speaking. It reminded me back when I was a graduate student and one of my professors commented upon a certain political statement and said: "the poor gentleman is lecturing on navigation while the ship is going down". I think that is a pretty accurate description of what this throne speech is about.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to ask a question that comes from the Canada West Foundation. The member in his speech talked about the free trade agreement. The foundation said that Canada's merchandise trade with the U.S. jumped to $17.4 billion last year, up from $14.2 billion in 1988. More impressively, direct investment in Canada exceeded Canadian direct investment in other countries by $4.3 billion in 1990, the first time in a decade that there has been a net inflow of funds. In 1988, just before free trade, there was an outflow of $2.5 billion.

Looking at only the flow of direct investment between Canada and the United States, there was a similar reversal. In 1990 Canada attracted $800 million more in direct U.S. investment than the U.S. did in Canada, and in 1988 the U.S. had attracted $3.8 billion more. This suggests that overseas investors see Canada as an increasingly attractive place.

This information comes from the Canada West Foundation. I remind the member for Winnipeg South Centre that this was put together by a business consultant based in Winnipeg who concluded in his report: "Despite the bad economic news of 1990, including confirmation of a recession, export sales to the U.S. have been a shining star. Export growth has been driven by high-tech sectors while traditional main exports, such as autos, metal, forestry have slowed. The bottom line is that Canadian trade with the U.S. has been basically business as usual".

This comes from western Canada, part of the country that he represents. It seems to differ with the partisan comments that he has suggested. I would like him to comment on these particular numbers.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was not conscious that my remarks were particularly partisan, but I am very pleased to respond to the question. It was totally non-partisan and objective as we well know, as has been my tradition in this House over the past 12 or 13 years.

The member points out figures provided by the Canada West Foundation. I think he might more accurately look at some of the figures provided by agents of Statistics Canada. They point out that we have the highest current account deficit in the history of this country, close to $20 billion. The net outflow of funds on dividends, profits, and intercorporate transfers is at its highest level ever. What is really happening in this country is that we are haemorrhaging in terms of flow of dollars outward.

Also, let us take a look at direct investment figures. If we break them down in their particulars, we find that a large proportion of direct investment is going into takeovers and acquisitions. I think the last figure provided by Statistics Canada was close to 95 per cent. It is not going into new investments or new businesses. It is going into taking over Canadian companies which are not able to survive.

It is also important to point out in terms of those figures that one of the reasons there is an inflow is that we have a God-awful, unacceptable, high rate of interest and high dollar. They have to be kept propped up in order to bring in money to replace that which is flowing out. In order to replace what is being haemorrhaged, we have to provide an unnatural pool of money for blood transfusions. That is the real problem.

It is only, as our leader said in his opening speech, when we have a more realistic economic policy that we can begin to get our economic house in order. Then we will not have to rely upon all that direct investment, simply short-term Treasury bill investments, to prop up the economy. We know we are in a vicious circle caused by much of the openings that took place under that trade agreement.

Third, I ask the hon. gentleman—and I know he is a serious member of Parliament—to step across the lawn and talk to the truckers today and see how they feel about the economic policies of this government. He should go down to the food processing plants that have been closed in Portage la Prairie, the steel plants in southwestern Ontario or auto parts plants.

There is one basic fallacy in the comments the member made, and I am sure he made it mistakenly. He said: "We may be selling a little bit more high-tech but, after all, things like agriculture, fish, auto parts—all these other things—are not doing so well any more". I will tell you why they are not doing so well. It is because of that trade agreement. We lost control of our resources, and those other industries that he mentioned happened to be the backbone of the industry of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Has the honorable member for Shefford a question or a comment?

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Of course I would like to direct a question to the honorable member who has just resumed his seat. He talked about Senate reform as being a crucial issue whithout which no constitutional reform could be acceptable, for him and his party, I guess.

I believe, I heard him mention the traditional triple "E", but I would like for him to elaborate on equal representation in the Senate. He said: We want it to be more equal. His leader, every time, avoid stating his party's position about the question of equality in the Senate. Would every province have the same number of senators? I would like to know the honorable member's opinion on the matter.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I would especially like to know what he thinks of the federal government's role in the field of education and vocational training. I know he is an expert in this area and I would like to hear what he has to say on these two issues.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am very happy that the honorable member acknowledges the importance of a Senate reform.

In my opinion, it is crucial to find a formula which would provide for a more equal representation, by region and by province. I think it would be a worthwile subject to be considered by this House because we have received several proposals for a report from Mr. Robertson, the Senate and the House of Commons over the last three or four years.

Several proposals have been put forward for consideration but I think it is the government's responsibility to come up with a formula to be looked at by the other members of Parliament.

But is its importance symbolic? You, your group that is, has said that it was important to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. It is important for your region, but the same applies to the western regions. It is absolutely essential. I think it is a proposal which should be incorporated in a formula concerning the role of Canada, as my leader has said when he spoke with debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

As for the formula, I am prepared to consider several options, several proposals, but the principle of equality is what matters.

[English]

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I am always impressed by the position taken by that member on the issue of the free trade agreement. Tragically I am now under the impression, since he has been removed as the trade critic, that the position espoused by the former leader of the Liberal Party on the free trade and the Mexico connection has been changed by the Liberal Party.

Will your party or will it not abrogate the existing free trade agreement? What is your position on Canada participating with Mexico in those new talks?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased at the opportunity of helping my hon. friend from British Columbia to clarify his thoughts.

It is one of the more difficult tasks one faces in the House of Commons, but I am certainly prepared to undertake it at any opportunity.

It is clear—and I think our leader has said it in his response to the Speech from the Throne and on other occasions—that the trade agreement is not working for Canada and it must be renegotiated.

Mr. Barrett: Renegotiated, that is absurd.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): How else do you do it? The member says it is absurd, but the fact of the matter is that there is an agreement in place. It means in order to change it, to abrogate it, you have to work under that agreement. It is an international document and therefore you have to make your proposals. That is clearly what I have said.

Second, on the question of the Mexico round, unfortunately the round has started. Our own party in this House of Commons, with our trade critic and others, again put the proposition very clearly to government members that they should not enter into any of these kinds of discussions until they meet certain conditions.

The government has not met any of them and it should not be there. What I would suggest to the hon. member is that what is really crucial at this time is for us to recognize what is going on. The trade patterns in the world are really being dominated by the hub and spoke strategy that the Americans are following. It is really incumbent upon the next Government of Canada, which we will be, to provide an alternative to that strategy, to open up trade—particularly in the western hemisphere—to get a new set of trade relationships—

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by expressing my congratulations to the member for Saint-Maurice and the member for Regina—Wascana for the excellent way in which they began this debate.

This session of Parliament will be more important than most, perhaps more important than any before it. During this time, our country will either agree to go ahead or decide to close down. That determines our obligations today. As all the leaders in this House have said, this is not about the preferences of a party or the agenda of a government. The only agenda is Canada. That has never been a partisan purpose before and it will not be now.

Those of us sitting here are far from perfect, as individuals or as a Parliament. Whatever our past failings, we are determined that we shall not fail Canada. I understand fully that the non-partisan approach requires the government to involve all of Parliament in basic decisions. That is why the Prime Minister stated explicitly yesterday our willingness to accept sensible proposals from any party or parliamentarian. That is why I began my new responsibilities by reaching out deliberately to Canadians who had felt excluded in the past—native leaders, northerners, western Canadians. We have an obligation to listen, to learn and to lead, and I know we must do all three if we are to succeed.

No individual, party or government is going to compel Canada to continue. Canadians must decide whether we wish to keep our country. That is a decision for all of us.

Elected members of this House have an extra obligation. We have to ensure that the issues are clear, that the stakes are understood, and that Canadians have the chance to consider every reasonable proposal to renew and to save this country. We will need a lot of help in that work. We cannot lock ourselves into old ways which Canadians no longer respect or trust.

Neither should we lightly put aside our parliamentary process which has earned its legitimacy through 124 years of Canadian experience. Parliament needs to be reformed, not abandoned, and on behalf of the government I am prepared to consider any serious proposal any member might make as to how we involve Canadians who are not elected.

Involving them does not mean that we should step aside from our most basic responsibilities. None of us would deny that this country is in crisis. This crisis can also be an opportunity, a new beginning, a journey of liberation from the worst of our past and a freedom to build upon the best within all of us. I believe that Canadians across this country are beginning to see it that way too.

They are beyond simple despair at how things have gone wrong, and are wondering how to help set things right. This is a time for this country to reflect on our past and get to know it, to reflect on our present and decide how to improve it, and to look ahead to our future to determine how best to achieve it together.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our plan consists of four separate phases. Phase one is nearing its conclusion. By July 1, we will have received the reports of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future and the Special Joint Committee on the Process for Amending the Constitution of Canada. Both have done a good job, and the government will examine their conclusions with all the attention and care the views of Canadians deserve.

The next step will be the tabling of a set of proposals on how to reform the country. These proposals will be detailed, they will be specific and they will be published. They will not remain in the private domain, known only to a chosen few. All Canadians will know our vision of the future.

These proposals will not be final. However, during the third phase, Canadians will have a chance to tell us what they think. A joint committee of Parliament will meet Canadians across the country to hear their views. The committee will hold public hearings, not to discuss the country's future in genenral but to discuss specific changes.

The committee's mission and purpose will be clearcut. It will be asked to consider concrete proposals for constitutional change. It will seek comments from Canadians and make recommendations to the government. The committee will have discussions with committees or similar groups of members of the various provincial and territorial legislatures, on how they will proceed and the witnesses they wish to invite. This will be more than just a matter of joint hearings. It will be a full-fledged association. The resulting dialogue can then be used to build a national consensus.

[English]

A major priority will be an intensive dialogue with the aboriginal community whose constitutional concerns must be addressed in this committee while simultaneously its economic and social concerns are the subject of a royal commission inquiry.

In the final step, we expect Parliament will propose reforms that will set this country on a sound and sure course for the next century. In order to leave open as many options as possible, this House will be asked to pass legislation which would enable the people of Canada to express themselves directly in a referendum.

It is not our preference nor is it our intention to seek to resolve complex, constitutional questions by way of referendum but we believe it is prudent for the federal government to have the full authority to conduct a Canadian referendum—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —should that become the best way to achieve consensus on defining our future together.

We are prepared to consider other methods of consulting Canadians, including any proposals that might come from the mixed committee, the Beaudoin–Edwards committee.

I do not believe there has ever been a more open process put in place for the people of Canada to decide themselves the destiny of our country. I wish to turn to some of the tasks which I believe are in front of us in the months ahead.

First, this time constitutional change must address several issues simultaneously. This cannot be a Quebec round, an aboriginal round or a Senate round. We have to make progress on many fronts together. This must be a Canada round.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Second, we must be guided by a sense of both pragmatism and history. We want a country that works well and works together in one of the most challenging periods in world history.

The only way for our reforms to succeed is to respect the special nature of this country, including the objective reality that Quebec is a distinct society.

Third, the country must get to know itself better. The stories which suffuse our history are extraordinary. They are stories of achievement, of strength in the face of adversity, of a unity built on diversity. We do not tell those stories so we do not know them. Let us tell them again. Nostalgia will not hold this country together, but knowledge can.

We need to know our history, but we also need to get to know each other better. In Yellowknife last week, Mayor Pat McMahon brought a few people together to talk to me about Canada. One woman observed of Canada, and I quote her: "Everybody feels misunderstood". That says two things. First, misunderstanding is widespread but, second, for most of us the priority is to have others understand us. It is not a one way street.

If we want to keep and build this country, citizens everywhere must work at understanding why other Canadians have priorities different from their own. Quebecers must try to understand why western Canadians feel that institutions like the Senate must be changed fundamentally. Western Canadians must try to understand why recognition of a distinct society is so important to Quebec.

Those of us whose ancestors came to Canada from somewhere else must try to understand that aboriginal claims are about respect as much as they are about money.

Fourth, there is a real desire in this country for information. Canadians want to base their decisions on evidence and not on ideology. They are ready to move beyond accusation to deliberation. They want to know what unity gives them. They want to know what taking away unity would leave.

Sometimes I think we talk too much about our differences and too little about our common Canadian citizenship. I celebrate the diversity of this country, but the real strength of Canada is that we have made these different parts work together. That has required a basic respect for others that is not at all common in the world. We Canadians use our gifts of wealth and freedom to advance our neighbours' interests, not just our own. That sense of duty to a larger community is evident everywhere in Canada. We have to make more of that common Canadian citizenship.

According to any standard, we, as Canadians, have accomplished a great deal. We are free, we are prosperous, we are tolerant and we are educated. Taken individually, these qualities are exceptional. Together, they have made Canada a country that is both unafraid to tread uncharted paths and that cares for its people.

Mr. Speaker, it cannot be repeated often enough that the integrity of Canadian values is part and parcel to the integrity of this country. Canadians did not choose the path of mutual respect because they felt like it but because our diversity implies the mutual respect of our component parts, so that our relations can be peaceful and productive.

Canadians did not choose the path of tolerance because it was fashionable but because different cultures must work together if they are to survive.

Mr. Speaker, most Canadians have other, more pressing concerns and priorities than changing the Constitution. They have to look after the education of their children, maintain their prosperity and keep their neighbourhoods safe and clean. However, they must also keep pace with the rest of the world.

[English]

People can unplug their phones, countries cannot. While we are deciding whether Canada should continue, other countries are moving forward without us. What price are we paying for quarrelling at home while others are focusing on the future? What price are we paying while others are preoccupied with innovating, educating, changing and competing? Unlike Peter Sellers' last movie, countries do not succeed by just being there.

I am not saying that Canada should stay together just because some accountant or economist might say it makes sense. Canada is not a corporate merger but being poor is no foundation for doing anything. I do not know of one economic argument which says that being smaller means being better.

If there were such an argument, Europe would not be uniting. If there were such an argument, Asia would not be trading. If there were such an argument, Confederation would never have happened. Our ancestors would have seen a better life apart than they found together.

If that was the decision in the middle of the 19th century, when the global economy had barely begun, how on earth can it be different now when the global village is at our doorstep, and at our doorstep forever.

Whatever the options in the past, whatever the differences Canadians have had, our advantage in the future is to be together as one strong, large, effective country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I believe we have time. In 1864, Confederation was constructed in four short months between the conference in Quebec City and the conference in Charlottetown. Although our problems may be more complex, surely we can begin to save a country in the time it took to build one.

In 1865, George Brown, one of the Fathers of Confederation made a statement. He had not been a fan of Confederation, but he came to be a convert. He said, and I quote:

> We are endeavouring to adjust harmoniously greater difficulties than have plunged other countries into all the horrors of civil war. We are striving to settle forever issues hardly less momentous than those that have rent the United States of America, and are now exposing it to all the horrors of civil war. Have we not then great cause of thankfulness that we have found a better way for the solution of our troubles than that which has entailed in other countries, such deplorable results.

Canada is still the better way. The world knows it. Our ancestors knew it when they chose to come here from around the globe. Canadians know it today. It is our obligation to build that better way, not to discard it, knowing the value of our achievement and knowing that we can make it better still.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, the minister had a very effective speech. As he put the four stages of the process before us, it certainly cleared up some of the concerns I have and I am sure other people have.

Having been on the Beaudoin—Edwards committee and knowing that everybody who came before us said that public participation was critical to the process, I had hoped the minister would come up with proposals that the public would have had a chance to discuss. I will ask about that again in my second question. But from that discussion, a new set of proposals, some reinforced or some discarded, and then more public participation after it had been looked at again.

I am wondering if there is to be a two-stage public participation in the process.

Second, I cannot believe that we have to wait until September to get the proposals. I think everybody in Canada knows that the Senate and Parliament have to be reformed. The Supreme Court could easily be, by bringing together the provinces to look at it. The distribution of powers does not need unanimity. There was not one expert who said it was the Constitution that was to blame. They said it was the process that was used around Meech. There was not one expert who did not point out that we had two amendments since the new Constitution was in place that passed, and only one failed.

I just cannot believe, with the government having a majority here and in the Senate, that we cannot get together and reform the institutions within our own jurisdiction this summer. I do not know any Canadians, since I crossed Canada, who felt that we were giving them leadership, from this place down to the people, in the areas that we have control over.

The other thing is the power of spending. That is something that the government can talk about and talk about immediately. I do not believe that you can roll the dice, come February, to the Allaire or the Bélanger–Campeau committees and not have time next fall to undo it. I know the feelings out there and I am sure the minister is well aware of the feelings right across Canada. There is a hope that we can come together in Canada and redefine ourselves but I do think there is a lot that could be done immediately to make that process a lot easier.

I am wondering if the minister would tell me why the proposals cannot be done, and some of the things done immediately.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): There is no question about two realities concerning public opinion: One is that there is a profound cynicism about existing institutions, and each of us will attribute that to different origins, but there is no question about the reality of it. There is also no question about the fact that that, if we simply succumb to it, it is corrosive, that could be destructive of this country. What we have to do is not succumb to criticisms of our institutions but to prove that by reforming them we can make them work better. That cynicism is there and we have to take account of it.

The second reality, flowing from the first, is that Canadians very much want to take part. Individual Canadians do, but so do some particular Canadian groups. The hon. member has been engaged in this process more intensively over the last few months than I have been but since my appointment to this portfolio I have, for example, made a point of meeting with native leaders, going to the north and speaking to people who see their interests not simply in terms of their own particular interest, but also in terms of the regions they represent or the groups from which they come.

Speaking of public participation, we have two processes that end the July 1. The hon. member is part of the joint committee and we have the Spicer committee. There was a lot of scepticism about the Spicer committee but I think that process has engendered a great deal of participation and a lot of originality across the country.

Public consultation cannot stop. We all have obligations to carry it forward, and I have to find ways in which some of the work that was started by Spicer can be carried on. It is important that the next phase of public consultation not be about issues in general, but about specific proposals that can put things in a general context of reform. We are not talking here simply about changing institutions within the federal jurisdiction; we are talking about basic changes in Canada, including changes in the way we see ourselves and changes in attitude. There needs to be some over-all context within which we act and we are trying, hoping and expecting to have it ready for the fall. We expect to be able to put before this House in the fall an over-all position as to how these changes which we must pursue together can be put together to advance the country.

Then the discussion, the next phase of public participation, will be a phase which will allow individual Canadians to focus specifically upon particular proposals placed in a Canadian context that have been put forward by the government.

We will welcome amendments, changes and improvements in that process. We think that is the best way to take account of what is being done now and to ensure that Canadians have a constructive opportunity to help define the future of the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands. I would like to recognize the hon. member for Parkdale and also the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Shefford, but I only have six minutes.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin my remarks by congratulating the minister on his appointment to this portfolio and to wish him well. I hope that the esteem in which he is held in this country will bring a resolution.

Having said that, he knows what is coming next. The remarks in his speech were well-suited. He talked about reaching out to those who felt excluded, and as a member of the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, that was the over-riding theme. I caution and urge him and all of us to have the political courage as politicians to step back from this issue, look at it and take the condemnation of the Canadian people sincerely.

We deserve it. This is a wonderful country we have, and we are at the risk of losing it. As you, Sir, know better than most people, we have a wonderful country. People outside of this country are wondering what we are on about here when they are talking about issues of survival and here we are navel gazing.

That criticism is real. It is very sincere. Please do not dismiss a constituent assembly made up of politicians and those who have felt excluded. Please do not exclude that option, because that is something that I think is a balance. Please do not exclude that.

My second point is with respect to your reference to a Canadian referendum. Referenda have been divisive tools in Canada's history. My question is: What do you think would constitute a majority? Would Quebec need to have its referendum on the same issue? The west? The north? The aboriginal people? This is the complexity.

As one of the witnesses at the Beaudoin—Edwards committee hearings pointed out to the committee, any parliamentary reform is like a Rubik's cube. You change one thing and the whole thing changes. We in this place have to have the wisdom to be able to see what those changes will bring.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, first, on a referendum.

I have said publicly that in our view a referendum cannot be used to force any group of Canadians to do something that it does not want to do. We are in a situation in which the Government of Canada does not have the legal authority that we require for the kind of consultation that might become necessary as we seek to achieve the broadest possible consensus in the country. We are not introducing it because we intend to use it; we are introducing it because we think we may have need for it and we think it would be prudent to have that in place.

With respect to the other question, I agree with the hon. member's comment about the force of Canadian opinion. I do not intend to reject in advance anything that might be proposed by the Beaudoin—Edwards committee.

Here is the challenge that I think we all have to look at in the next little while. We have a parliamentary system. It is heavily criticized, but it has served the country well for over a century. Churchill once called it the worst system of government in the world except for all the others, and that reality continues.

We have that base. How do we add to that base in this committee process to make all Canadians, particularly people who have felt excluded, feel more a part of the process? I have some ideas. Some of the proposals put in the throne speech are regarding working with legislators from the territories and from the provinces. That has never been done before. That is an innovation that may be helpful. There are others we are prepared to consider, and I say very sincerely that I would very much welcome practical proposals from any member of the House as to means in which we can combine the fundamental nature of a parliamentary committee with the necessity to involve people who felt excluded before.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the minister on his appointment and his new role and wish him well and success. He will be missed in the external affairs portfolio where we had a very close working relationship.

He is looking for proposals and I would like to toss this proposal to his committee. I was born and raised in Saskatchewan. I went to a one-room rural school. In Grade 1, the teacher made up her own rules. She had the entire school stand up—the entire school being 30 students—and salute the Canadian flag, which was a little different than the one beside you now.

We all had to salute the flag and we had to recite "I pledge allegiance to this flag and to the country for which it stands." I realized later that she had adopted a modified version of the American pledge to the flag.

In all the committee hearings that have been going on across the country, the one thing we are not hearing is: What does it mean to be a Canadian citizen?

As a Canadian citizen what are my obligations, what are my duties, to this country? Every group says: "What is in this for me? When you modify the Constitution, what would it give me". It is high time we turned this around and asked: "What can I do for my country?"

I would like to see that in the preamble to the Canadian Constitution where we talk about goals in education. Every student going through the school system, regardless of province or territory, should memorize such a pledge. I think the next generations would be proud to keep their various cultural backgrounds, but the one thing every Canadian would have in common is growing up saying: "I pledge allegiance to this flag and to the country for which it stands".

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, Grade 1 classes in Saskatchewan were larger than they were in Alberta.

We do not want to instruct people to salute our flag but create conditions where Canadians everywhere choose to celebrate our flag. We will need a great deal of help in this. I take it as part of the responsibilities that are now mine to try to evoke in Canada a much stronger and truer sense of Canadian citizenship, of common Canadian citizenship.

I agree with the member that it is essential, but it is something that we have to draw from the people rather than try to impose upon them. In this unusual time of real anguish in the country, when Canadians are genuinely concerned about the future of the country, we have a better prospect of doing that than we ever had before. We have to know more about our country. I am appalled at how little Canadians know about the history of this extraordinary country. I am appalled that anyone could think that a country like this is dull. The other day I was in Iqaluit. In the bright light of night Canadians were going out to the edge of the ice floes to hunt seals. At the same time in southern Canada, some of the best scientists any country anywhere in the world could develop were working on ways to move into the future of high technology.

We are a country that has everything. We do not know ourselves well enough and that is part of the reason we are in the difficulty we face now. I look forward to help from the House and from other Canadians to try to create a much more striking sense of a common Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I know there is not much time and I want to respond to some of the comments made by the minister.

I quoted in my own speech the comment made by Gordon Robertson who, he knows, is a highly respected commentator on constitutional affairs. He said: "Agreement on the Senate was the key to Confederation in 1867. Agreement on its reform could be the key to the impasse that today threatens renewal of our federalism for the future."

In the throne speech there was no mention of Senate reform. The minister in the past has been slightly negative about the proposal and has rejected it. I want to know if the minister is prepared to say today that he will support an initiative to reform the Senate, to make it an elected body, a more equal body, and one that has effective powers. This would allow us to have a true federalism with a second chamber that could provide the balance that our country needs.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I have never rejected Senate reform. It is important in this debate that we all read one another's statements carefully. I will read his carefully.

Not only will I support Senate reform, I will be proposing Senate reform as part of the proposals we bring forward. I would add to the observation that the hon. member made. Yes, I think there should be institutional reform, probably not just the Senate, because I think Canadians from our part of the country want more than just the Senate changed. In fact, there may be institutions more important than the Senate. The Senate has a great symbolic importance but there are also other urgent issues. We cannot this time, for example, ignore the concerns of Canadian aboriginal people. Those concerns too must be given the highest possible priority and we intend to do that.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his speech, but throughout his statement, he somewhat trivialized the Quebec issue by saying: Listen, fundamentally, what Quebec wants is an emphasis on the distinct society, period. You know that is totally untrue and that Quebec's demands, even the traditional ones, go far beyond the concept of a distinct society.

What amazed me in the Throne Speech, since we are talking about that framework, is that how the minister, who should be sensitive to the Quebec symbol, namely in the area of education—and I don't need to remind him of the words of Maurice Duplessis and others—could allow his government to intrude in the area of education, which is the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, particularly of Quebec? The minister is aware that, for example, on the issue of vocational training, in Quebec there is not a consensus but unanimity on the full repatriation of the whole issue of vocational training.

How can the minister explain to me today that his government, which wants to hold out its hand to Quebecers once again, is raising its fist instead?

First, on the subject of education, it is clearly stated in the Speech from the Throne that we will fully and completely respect the provincial jurisdiction in that matter. But it is also true that the federal government already spends billions of dollars every year on education and that we are going through an education crisis in this country. This is an issue that will require greater cooperation between the various levels of government and, in fact, between all sectors of our society.

Second, in response to the allegation that I trivialized the Quebec issue, I want to tell the hon. member that I have been a member of this House for eighteen years. I came from Alberta and was unilingual. I learned French by myself and I can speak it. I am not a member of the French Academy, but I can speak the language rather efficiently. I am not the only one. There are several members—the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville is one, and so is the President, Mr. Fraser, to name a couple—who come from various parts of the country geographically remote from Quebec and who, since they were elected, have displayed a willingness to respect the uniqueness and distinctiveness of that province, not only in words but by their actions. I have been active myself on national issues, in Quebec and elsewhere defending Quebec, throughout my career in this place.

I am not the one trivializing Quebec today, neither do I intend to trivialize its future. I want to secure a strong future for the people of Quebec and the way to achieve that is to be part of a large country, not a small one.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time alloted to questions and comments has elapsed. On debate. The hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount.

[English]

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to intervene in this debate following the comments of the right hon. Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

I could not help but smile when I heard many of the remarks made by the minister. I heard him say that the federal government would put forward a proposal for constitutional change by September and that the government would not be tied to these changes, that it would welcome changes and improvements to the proposal.

I could not help but feel that we have come a long way from the seamless web, the ill-fated proposal that was debated in this House a year or two ago, which could not be changed, not one word, comma or period.

Yes, the minister has listened to his critics. Time will tell whether a leopard can truly change its spots. We will see whether this government will, indeed, speak for the national interest, not in the speeches that we are hearing today in this House but through the proposals it will table and its actions in the months ahead.

It is with interest that I listened yesterday to the Prime Minister's speech on the Constitution. I was glad to hear him finally admit that what matters is Canada and Canada above all.

After seven years, he admits that we now have to talk in favour of the national interest. He said, and I quote: "That the next round will be a Canadian round." Moreover, he talked about the need to create a national market for securities, and to exempt trust companies from the overregulation of eleven governments. His speech, like the one made by the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, made me smile.

The Prime Minister finally listened to his critics. It was said a few years ago that he did not respect the national interest. Today, he is telling us that the national interest must be paramount. It was said that his role had been limited to that of an arbiter. Yesterday, the Prime Minister said that he must not act as an arbiter, that he must fight for the national interest.

The question, Mr. Speaker, is to know whether we can trust this new talk by the Prime Minister. Can we really trust him to keep his word? Will he really fight for the national interest this time? Time will tell. We will see in the coming months when the government will put forward its proposals on Constitutional reform and we will see it by its deeds, not by the words pronounced in this debate on the Speech from the Throne.

The Prime Minister also talked about economy and education. He listed a few problems that you are no doubt familiar with. Thirty per cent of high school students drop out before graduation. Forty per cent of adults cannot read nor count well enough to perform day-to-day tasks. The Canadian industry devotes to the training of workers only one half of what is devoted to it by the U.S. industry, one fifth by the Japanese industry and one eighth by the German industry.

The government now wants to set up national standards with regard to education. In the coming weeks, the government will table a discussion paper as a guide for the public debate, which should lead us to some solutions.

Today, seven years after being elected, the government is proposing a debate. What has the government done for seven years? Didn't it have the responsibility to take action in those areas, to give an example, to show leadership in the areas that it would now like to draw to the attention of Canadians through a debate?

The debate proposed by the government is an admission of failure. It is the admission, that we have lost seven years during which the government should have taken action to ensure that Canadians have access to quality education and that businesses in our country do enough research and development. On the contrary,

Mr. Speaker, we saw several measures that went against those objectives.

[English]

In the throne speech the government also says that it wants to develop "a learning culture". I am apprehensive about the use of the phrase "learning culture". For some time students of Canada's science and technology policy have taken to attributing our deficiencies in science and technology to our failure to develop a science culture or a research culture.

What is meant by that is a culture which values knowledge and education and which would place top priority on developing Canada's human resources. The very use of the word "culture" is an indication of the difficulty in changing directions. A cultural change, with all it implies, is seen as the necessary condition for building public support for policy changes and for ensuring that there is a real priority for these changes in the federal and provincial halls of power.

By definition, a cultural change is something that will take a long time. The idea that we need to develop a learning culture or a science culture has become an explanation for failure. When the government uses this phrase you have to ask yourself whether the need for a cultural change is not being used as an excuse for further inaction. This is the caution which I want to draw to the attention of Canadians.

Let us take a closer look at the proposal to establish Canada-wide goals in education. The government says it would like to see "Canada-wide goals established for the year 2000". Reading this literally, this appears to mean that the government would like to see these goals established by the year 2000. It is not saying that it will reach these goals by then, but that it will establish them by then. The government appears to be suggesting, in other words, that it will take nine more years to establish goals relating to education.

Is this what the government means? Is the government suggesting that it will take nine years to establish these goals? I cannot believe this is what the government is proposing.

I would hope that this statement will be clarified and that the Prime Minister will tell us that this is not what is intended but rather that these goals will be established shortly. I recognize it may take a year or two. The negotiations or the understanding that we have to arrive at about these goals should be part and parcel of the redefinition of the country that we are currently engaged in. Certainly these goals should be arrived at in the next year or two and we should start to take action aimed at reaching them.

Even with such a clarification, Canadians should understand that the throne speech is ambiguous. Many may think that the government is suggesting that we could reach those targets by the year 2000, that we could double the number of graduates in science and engineering and that we could reduce illiteracy substantially within a period of nine years. If that is what the government is suggesting, it is unrealistic. It is impossible to double the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, the sciences and engineering in such a short time, as has been amply demonstrated in study after study produced by the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council.

In his speech yesterday the Prime Minister gave us a big lecture on the need for fiscal discipline. We in our party share the view of many Canadians that the federal fiscal deficit is a serious economic and political problem. Our leader notably did not make a single spending commitment in the leadership campaign. We agree that the federal fiscal deficit is a serious problem. We also agree that achieving low levels of inflation is an important objective. There is no disagreement with these objectives.

But we have to ask ourselves what is the government's record with respect to these objectives. The inflation rate today is about 7 per cent compared with 3.8 per cent inflation when the Conservatives first took office. The deficit is forecast to be $30.5 billion, which is $2 billion higher than the forecast in the budget a year ago. Contrast that with the statement of the former Minister of Finance in his first budget in 1985 that he would reduce the deficit by the end of the decade to $18 billion.

Before I go on, I just want to remind you again, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance missed the mark by the small sum of some $12.5 billion. He was predicting in his first budget that he would get the deficit down to $18 billion by the end of the decade. It is now $30.5 billion. He missed the mark by some $12.5 billion.

I find it quite outrageous to hear the Prime Minister giving us lectures about fiscal discipline and about the need to keep a budget when his government does not know the first thing about it.

It is precisely because of the government's failure to achieve the objectives it set for itself that many Canadians are having increasing doubts about the Conservatives' ability to manage the economy, to put it mildly.

While I agree that the federal fiscal deficit is a serious economic problem, it is not the source of our problems. The Canadian disease, if I may put it that way, relates to our inability to keep pace with global economic and technological change. After seven years this government must bear some responsibility for not leading the way.

I would like to read from an article published about a month and a half ago by the current chairman of the Science Council of Canada. She recited many of the sorry statistics that we have become so familiar with. She said: "We have lost a great deal of international competitive advantage we held some 30 or 40 years ago. Our standard of living has slipped accordingly and we have simply failed to anticipate environmental reality". She went on to say: "There is no use searching for a Canadian policy to cope with this crisis. We don't have a national policy".

The chairman of the Science Council of Canada is no slouch. When she says we do not have a national policy and there is no use searching for a Canadian policy, I think that Canadians by and large stand up and take notice. This is a statement that was not made eight or nine years ago. This was a statement made on March 31 of this year, seven years after this government took office, seven and eight years after the Prime Minister in the run-up to the 1984 election promised to correct the very ills which he is again talking about in this throne speech.

Canadians can no longer afford ambiguity in action and absence of national leadership. We cannot wait for changing attitudes. We cannot wait a generation. Difficult choices have to be made now. These choices say a lot about our country and its priorities.

For example, should we be investing in Hibernia or James Bay II or would we be better off investing the same kinds of resources in research and development? Canadians again should not have to wait a generation for answers to these questions.

We have a very practical example in the last day or two. The French company, Aerospatiale, wants to buy de Havilland. It is prepared to invest $1 billion in research and development, but it wants the government to pay for a substantial part of that investment. The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade has said that funding will have to come out of existing programs. The head of the Aerospace Industries Association of Canada has said that the existing budget is already spread too thin, and it has been reduced by some 25 per cent in the past three or four years.

Where will the money come from? The minister of industry has said that there are no additional funds. It is clear that without additional government investment, we will not have research and development in Canada.

A 1986 study by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association demonstrated that when it comes to non-tax support for research and development, Canada is not in the same league as many of our competitors. It is not a question of ownership.

Pratt & Whitney in Montreal is a foreign-owned company and yet it is one of the most research intensive companies in Canada. We will find that it has entered into a number of memoranda of understanding with the government in which the government funds a good portion of its R and D. This is the same as every other country, whether we are talking about the United States, Japan, Germany, the Scandinavian countries or France.

I will call it one o'clock and I guess resume after three o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You will have three minutes left, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

TRADE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to set the record straight. On Tuesday, the Minister of Agriculture led this House to believe that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture was in support of opening the Canadian border to U.S. wheat. This is not true. The CFA actually opposes opening the border. CFA president, Ralph Jespersen, said in a letter to the Prime Minister: "We have the opportunity to show one of the perpetrators of this devastating trade war, the United States, that the violations of trading rules cannot continue—.We ask that the provision requiring import licences be retained".

In other words, the CFA is opposed to opening the border to U.S. wheat. That is the truth. The government should know better and not twist the facts.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, during the parliamentary break the American network ABC aired a 20/20 program that dealt with the case of one Charles Ng who is wanted in California to face charges in connection with a series of brutal slayings five years ago.

Mr. Ng is currently appealing his extradition to the U.S. from Canada.

The program was called "Refuge for Murderers" and that, unfortunately, is the way many Americans have come to view our country. It is embarrassing, frustrating and downright frightening the number of times that America's most wanted are shown on television and then subsequently found in Canada.

We cannot allow Canada to become a refuge for criminals. We need changes to our extradition act and we need them now.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the Achilles heel of Canadian competitiveness is R and D. When the World Competitiveness Report looked at Canada, it saw that we spend a mere 1.3 per cent of GNP on science and ranked us sixteenth among our competitors.

When 400 elite policy-makers, many of them federal bureaucrats, were surveyed, they said our lack of R and D, the high dollar and high interest rates were self-inflicted wounds. They know that R and D is the key to the new products and processes that create jobs.

But the Prime Minister consistently ignores his own advisory board on science and technology when it asks him to live up to his 1984 promise to double Canadian R and D. So when the throne speech cites targets for education and training, but omits any mention whatsoever of research and development, it is dramatically significant and tragically clear. After seven years of jawboning, we will have no public policy to achieve targets for Canadian research and development. The implied policy of the Department of Finance has now become the explicit policy of the Department of Industry, Science, Technology and International Trade.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, those who want Canada to survive in its present form are searching for those things we have in common. Those who think they will profit from the failure of Canada are underlining what divides us into regions and along the lines of language and culture, but there is one group of Canadians who have made the ultimate gesture in support of this great thing we call Canada. It is a group of men and women who actually fought in the name of this country in world wars, Korean conflicts, and the gulf conflict as well.

I rise today to salute them and the Royal Canadian Legion, which has mounted a public campaign in the name of national unity. The Legion realizes well that this goes beyond the bounds of partisan politics, and is taking the initiative in reminding us all of what is at stake.

The Legion has been a supporter of a strong central government in the past. But the Legion also knows that changing times demand changing attitudes. When the question is put whether Canada can change or must fragment, the Legion's answer is clear: we must change.

I would ask all those Canadians who are busy building walls in this country, walls to keep their own intolerance strong, to look toward the Legion. There is the real vision of Canada.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the plight of former Route Canada employees continues five years after the government sold this trucking company to a man who could not even get a credit card.

Two thousand workers were left without jobs. Creditors lost $60 million. Many former employees lives were shattered when they lost their homes, their livelihoods and their dignity.

Still the government refuses to launch an investigation into this dirty deal. The RCMP has been investigating the case for almost three years. Surely it has some answers by now.

Canadian taxpayers and former employees have a right to know what the RCMP has discovered.

Right now there are hundreds more truckers outside our door who understand what former Route Canada employees have been living through. They feel betrayed and sacrificed by this government to the interests of big business.

I call on the government today to show some compassion for compensating these former employees of Route Canada, to launch an investigation into its sale and to bring forward the RCMP investigation.

LIBERTÉ COMPANY

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, following an exclusive agreement between Liberté and Vnikmi (the USSR milk products national research institute) and the Licensintorg firm in Moscow, kefir, a product originally from the Caucasus Mountains, is now available on the Canadian market.

Kefir is the most popular milk product in the USSR, and for centuries, mythical properties have been attributed to it. According to legend, people from the Caucasus Mountains, who drink kefir from their early childhood, are amongst the longest living human being in the world.

Japanese researchers confirmed that kefir acts on the immune system. The Liberté company is considering supporting medical research on kefir.

Liberté, which has been established for many years in Brossard, in my constituency, is proud to be one of the first small enterprises in North America to establish economic ties with a Soviet Union company, and to offer to North American consumers a popular product that is so distinctively Russian, as much so as vodka and caviar.

Congratulations to that successful enterprise, and to its president, Abe Gomel. I say to all Canadians, bon appétit and enjoy!

HEALTH

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, each year the gradual undermining of the age old practice of breast feeding by bottle feeding with processed cow's milk causes many cases of illness, malnutrition, allergies and at least one million infant deaths.

Breast fed babies absorb antibodies against major diseases from their mother's milk, suffer fewer allergies, enjoy better jaw and teeth development and are more contented.

The World Health Organization concerned with the constant undermining of breast feeding by companies in the manufacture of breast milk substitutes, and which constantly inundate hospitals, doctors, mothers, and others with free samples of their products, has instituted the international code of marketing regarding breast milk substitutes.

The code calls upon all hospitals, doctors and medical personnel and others to stop the distribution of baby formulae as well as to stop the distribution of literature advertising breast milk substitutes.

Therefore, I call on the government to support the World Health Organization in its endeavours to enhance and encourage breast feeding which would result in better health and protection to all babies in our country.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to extend my congratulations to the entire class of Royal Canadian Mounted Police constables, who graduated this week at the RCMP recruit training detachment in Regina. All of them are proud to wear the uniform of a great police force, with a tradition of honour and service almost as old as Canada. Among them was Constable Baltej Dhillon, the first Canadian of Sikh faith to wear the regulation turban, which itself has a long and proud tradition associated with service to the Crown within the Commonwealth.

I also congratulate the RCMP which polices ours, the third largest country in the world, for uniform adaptations to accommodate religious and native Canadian sensitivities. To all of the graduates and to Constable Dhillon, I extend best wishes for successful careers in the RCMP.

RADIO WEATHER SERVICE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for months, the farmers of Abitibi—Témiscamingue have been asking the Conservative government to set up a 24-hour-a-day radio weather service.

Today I am proud to tell them that indeed the federal Minister of the Environment, the Hon. Jean Charest, will soon announce that our great region will be served by a high-frequency radio weather service, using Communication Québec's sites in Chibougamau, Mont Vidéo Barraute, Ville-Marie and Aiguebelle Park, not far from Rouyn-Noranda.

That is the excellent work of Environment Canada officials in Montreal and Val-d'Or.

The 24-hour-a-day radio weather service will be monitored in Val-d'Or by the Environment Canada regional office.

Mr. Speaker, within a few weeks, the farmers, fishermen, hunters, aviators and all the people of Abitibi—Témiscamingue can tune in to the weather service.

INUK VIDEO

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday evening here on Parliament Hill I had the pleasure of attending the premiere of the first Inuk music video. I would like to thank the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his department for their sponsorship and support.

I want to pay special tribute to the talent of a young Inuk singer-songwriter, Susan Aglukark, who is from the small community of Arviat in the Northwest Territories.

In her video entitled Searching, Susan shows and sings of the anguish young Inuit people face in trying to come to terms with both their traditional culture and heritage and the fast-paced urban life found in southern Canadian cities.

Her message is a powerful and moving one. Despite the difficulties that may be experienced, never lose sight of who you are and where you are from. With this inner knowledge, strength and courage, all obstacles can be overcome.

Canadians may see Susan's video on MuchMusic.

Congratulations, Susan.

WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise once again to speak on behalf of weekly newspaper publishers in Brandon-Souris and their more distant subscribers and to ask both the newly appointed Minister of Communications and Culture and the Minister responsible for Canada Post to reconsider the decision to terminate certain federal government subsidies to weekly newspapers as of June 1.

Weekly newspapers are an integral part of rural Canada. In fact, they personify in a very real sense the communities in which they are located as they publish the sort of local news which the dailies would never deign to do.

Moreover, they are an important link with their former residents who have often moved to our cities and, as such, they constitute a bridge between rural and urban Canada.

In the name of rural Canada, therefore, I ask both ministers, as well as the newly appointed Minister of Agriculture, who I hope will emerge in a very real sense as the minister responsible for rural Canada to re-examine this issue prior June 1.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, municipalities throughout British Columbia have been without a contract for RCMP services since March 31, when the federal government refused to renew previous agreements.

The former Solicitor General has attempted to coerce B.C. to sign a new agreement which would see the federal contribution reduced at the expense of the province and its municipalities.

The over-all cost increase would translate into over $12 million a year for municipalities and $27 million a year for British Columbia as a whole.

As a result, B.C. municipalities will see their policing costs soar from 10 per cent to 25 per cent. These are costs B.C. taxpayers simply cannot afford.

The situation cannot persist.

My B.C. colleagues and I urge the government to resume negotiations and immediately enter into an interim agreement with the province. In western Canada, the RCMP is a visible symbol of Canadianism. Its contribution to national unity goes far beyond dollars and cents.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers is a goal of this government. Why? Trade barriers within Canada make us less competitive, thus costing Canadians jobs and opportunities.

For example, in the field of agriculture, there are 167 regulations. The European Community, with 12 nations, is more open in terms of agricultural trade than we are within a single country.

The existing system rewards inefficiencies.

According to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers would put $5 billion into the pockets of Canadians.

I believe that the creation of a single Canadian market goes hand-in-hand with national unity because it is by working together that we build a stronger more prosperous Canada.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce to all members a new commentary in the House of Commons entitled the Cross-Border Report.

The Cross-Border Report will not be convoluted or multi-topical. Rather, it will focus on one issue; cross-border shopping. Yet, I know that all members will find the report of interest. It is at the front line of our efforts to be competitive.

Cross-border shopping is a multi-faceted phenomenon dealing essentially with why the Canadian consumer finds an incentive to shop in the United States.

The exodus is fostered by a number of motivational factors, including the strength of the Canadian dollar, differences in distribution channels and mark-ups between our countries, the non-collection of provincial sales tax and the applicable duty and taxes at the border. There is aggressive U.S. marketing and advertising, as well as a free trade mentality luring the Canadian consumer. The means to address these factors lies not with one but a number of players, including all three levels of government, business and labour.

Stay tuned for the next edition in a series of many of the Cross-Border Report.

FISHERIES

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Today some 8,000 fishermen along the northeast coast of Newfoundland and Labrador lose their unemployment insurance benefits. However, they cannot start their fishing season because the ice conditions are so severe that they cannot get to their fishing grounds. They cannot even set up their gear. Because of this, 8,000 fishing families have no source of income as of today.

The matter was brought to the federal government's attention some 10 days ago, and fishermen are still waiting for action. The thousands of Newfoundlanders affected desperately need help. They do not need foot-dragging or a royal commission to solve their problem. What these people need is a short-term solution for a short-term problem.

I am calling on the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to sit down immediately with the representatives of the fishermen and work out an emergency program.

STELCO INC.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Revenue Canada has just reimbursed Stelco Inc. $7.4 million in duties paid to the government because the department granted relief from customs duties a few years ago on importations of continuous casting system to three of its competitors.

The reason, and I quote:

> —is because no one at Revenue Canada checked to see if the imported goods were actually eligible for the break on customs duties; in fact, they were not. That error is costing Canadian taxpayers some $30 million.

Aside from focusing on the level of qualifications and, in fact, competence of the revenue officials responsible, it is important to remember that the minister is ultimately responsible and accountable for the operations of his department. Taxpayers footing the bill for the errors of his department have a right to explanations that the minister should make available to this House. Specifically:

1. What competitive disadvantage earned Stelco the $7.4 million?

2. What tests for verification of suffering did the cabinet apply in its decision?

3. Are there other companies on the list for more moneys?

4. Finally, what specific structural and operational guarantees are being put in place to ensure that costly errors will not happen again?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. We are very pleased that the Minister of Transport has finally agreed to meet with the truckers to discuss the serious problems affecting them, but I want to ask the Prime Minister this: Does he intend to allow his minister to act quickly, because the truckers and their families are in a desperate situation, the industry is completely collapsing and thousands of jobs are being lost every week?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport did not wait until today to meet with the people involved in transportation. On Monday, I met some representatives of the Coalition of Independent Owners. On Tuesday, I met a representative of the Truckers' Association. In the coming days, I will also meet other representatives. The Department of Transport, through the previous minister last year, was very actively involved with this problem which, it must never be forgotten, is under both federal and provincial jurisdiction, I think, and we will do everything necessary. With the agreement of all concerned, Mr. Speaker, we have set up the studies required to find solutions and once we have completely identified the problems to the satisfaction of all concerned, we will take the action required to deal with the situation.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the problem of truckers—and we saw that yesterday—the Prime Minister likes to blame the government of Ontario and the premier of Ontario likes to blame the federal government. While the two stand there and blame each other, the lives of thousands of truckers are going down the drain.

I want to ask the Prime Minister when he will stop passing the buck, take his responsibility and solve this very serious problem.

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I assure the Leader of the Opposition that we will not follow his favourite manner of resolving problems, going back and forth. We accepted the fact last year that this was a problem of dual jurisdiction between the provinces and the federal government. We are prepared to accept our share and we are looking at ways to resolve the problems.

No one should forget the fact that the provincial government of Ontario, through the Liberal administration as well as the NDP administration, decided over the past 12 years to increase the tax on diesel fuel by 10 cents and only 7.1 cents on regular fuels. I do not think that it is really helping the trucking industry.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the truckers have shown good faith today. Traffic is moving again on the 401. Now is the time for the Prime Minister to show that he has faith in the trucking industry of Canada.

Will the Prime Minister, himself a former trucker, agree to meet the truckers today—he should not be afraid of them, he knows them well—and do something to cure this problem and make sure that the trucking industry can compete with the American trucking industry?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this government over the years has taken measures not only to help the truckers but the over-all industry in Canada by trying to recuperate from the very poor financial administration of the previous government over the last 16 years.

We have indicated to the owner-operators that we are sympathetic to their cause. Yesterday afternoon, I met with the wives of the truckers and this morning for one hour and a half I met with representatives of the truckers. We have discussed the problem at length. We have identified the major problems. We will continue to work in conjunction with them to try to arrive at a proper solution.

We are not looking, as did the previous administration, to a quick-fix solution.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the report that she and her colleague had released speaks for itself and tells everything we are supposed to know about the Al-Mashat affair. However, within 24 hours we know just how misleading, incomplete and inaccurate this report really is.

The former Canadian ambassador, Mr. Gotlieb, in an interview presented last night indicated clearly that the matter was under consideration several weeks before Mr. Chretién, the Associate Under-Secretary, was informed of the matter as contained in the report.

It is also not explained why the orders given by Mr. Tellier, the Clerk of the Privy Council, were ignored and whose orders from higher up countermanded those particular instructions. In other words, this report does not deal with the truth.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, rather than scapegoating public officials, will he not recognize that the only decent and credible thing to do, to give some veracity to this affair which is disturbing many Canadians, is to hold a public inquiry where all those concerned will appear and can be properly examined?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to present this again yet today, since the hon. member is having some difficulty understanding what is actually before his very eyes. Number one, all of the information regarding this situation is out and was made public. The second point is that ministers took the responsibility to ensure that the information went public and that that information to date has not been contradicted.

The third point I would like to make is that this minister and members of this government are quite prepared to appear before a parliamentary committee.

Parliamentary committees have the right to examine facts, and I would welcome an investigation like that by a parliamentary committee. I am quite prepared to appear before it with my officials. I stand by everything that these ministers have done and continue to do.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we will welcome and certainly accept the offer of the minister to appear before a committee as soon as that committee is established.

There is also a missing link. We know, for example, that in a statement in the report, it is clearly said that the chief of staff of the former minister of external affairs had a copy of the memorandum. His minister was in town, and somehow he did not receive it.

We also find it incredible to believe that on the intervention of a former deputy minister and Canadian ambassador, the former secretary of state would not have known about that serious intervention.

We also find it it difficult to note that the Under-Secretary of External Affairs would not know. My question is this. Considering the missing links, can we get a commitment from the Prime Minister that he will instruct the former Secretary of State for External Affairs to appear before the committee to be examined and to answer those questions so we can find out what really went on?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all let us be clear on another point, that is that ministers did not know before the fact. That remains clear and has not been contradicted.

Second, I have already said that ministers will be available to appear before the committee. I will be there with officials. The committee has the right to ask anyone it wants to come and appear before that committee.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

It is clear that the deregulation of the transportation industry policy has been a disaster for truckers and for Canadian families and small businesses.

I want to point out to the Prime Minister and to this House that this was a policy in 1984—we have had lots of promises about what deregulation will do for truckers and for the transportation industry—when the former Liberal transport minister, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, promised that deregulation of the trucking industry would bring jobs. He also said that management will have to improve "but the good trucking companies will do very well".

The then opposition critic from Vegreville agreed with this. Now that minister, the Minister of Finance, said that deregulation would bring innovation and efficiency.

I say to the now Minister of Finance, tell that to the truckers outside this House. Neither the Liberals nor the Tory government listened to the truckers because the Canadian Trucking Association said it would create chaos. It has.

I ask the Prime Minister what he is prepared to do to enhance Canadian jobs in the trucking industry now.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the NDP is true to herself in blaming all the problems of this world on free trade, deregulation and all these other fantasies.

Deregulation, free trade and the GST are all measures courageously taken by this government to improve the lot of all Canadians. The trucking industry, as other industries, is going through at the present time through a difficult situation. We understand it. We sympathize with the people, and we are in fact doing everything we can to help them out of this situation.

We started that last year by getting all the state orders together to try to analyse what the exact problems were and not to deal with perceptions but with realities, and to examine the problems as they are, to find proper solutions, not on a quick-fix basis but on a long-term basis to ensure that they will have proper jobs for many years to come.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): The minister should get out of Ottawa. Go and talk to Canadians who are losing jobs every day. He will see that deregulation has brought the trucking industry misery, the trade deal has simply brought Canadians despair and he should be talking to Canadians about that.

• (1430)

It is clear to Canadians that truckers are losing their jobs from coast to coast to coast, as are many Canadians in the manufacturing sector and in the farming industry.

Will the minister immediately bring in new regulations that will put the Canadian trucking industry on a level playing field with their U.S. counterparts, do it now, and do it today?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday and I will repeat today, it is precisely to make it possible to have a level playing field that last year we instituted the task force to examine the situation so that we can talk about realities, facts, and not perceptions.

We are living up to this commitment. As I said before, I met yesterday with the wives of the truckers. I met this morning for an hour and a half with the truckers themselves. We have explored avenues, but there is no quick fix in this situation just as there are no quick fixes in other situations.

This government is taking the courageous way of improving the economy of this country so that our citizens and their children will have a viable country to live in.

Perhaps the leader of the NDP would like to speak to her counterparts in the Ontario government. According to The Toronto Star the NDP will not drop new taxes on diesel fuel, which are crippling the transportation industry in this country.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, when this government revises deregulation, gets rid of it, brings in some new regulations, brings in some real tax reform, takes care of the GST, what I will do is talk to my counterparts and your counterparts in Alberta and Saskatchewan and Manitoba who have the same problems.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: We were talking to a trucker this morning and he told us that, once all his bills are paid this year, he will have earned only $917.

Mr. Speaker, we have truckers demonstrating today, but many more Canadians are having a hard time providing for their families. And not only are this government's road transport policies to blame, but so is all the rest: free trade, the GST and the interest rates that are still way too high.

When is the government finally going to do something for the Canadian workers across the country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the leader of the NDP that instead of trying to score easy political points on a difficult situation, she should try to work with the independent truckers and the government to find appropriate solutions to the problem.

It does not help at all to repeat unthruths as she did earlier in her speech on free trade, since trucking is not affected at all by free trade. And the GST is not to blame either. On the contrary, the GST brought a 2.5 cents per litre reduction on gas, thereby cutting operating costs in the trucking industry.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will know that ministerial responsibility is of paramount importance in the kind of government we have in this country.

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that the former minister of external affairs was fully aware of the goings-on with respect to Al-Mashat on February 27, 1991. It was also clear that the former minister's chief of staff, an experienced lawyer and an experienced parliamentarian had all of the information contained in the document on or about March 14, 1991. Will the Prime Minister instruct the former minister of external affairs to appear before the parliamentary committee, as the minister of external affairs has now agreed to do. Will the Prime Minister give that undertaking?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the former minister of external affairs does not have to take any lessons in integrity from the member opposite.

The former minister of external affairs is one of the leading parliamentarians in the House of Commons. I know he will, as the minister has already indicated, respond to any request from the House or a committee of the House of Commons. He has always acted according to the traditions of the House of Commons and will continue to do so.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the Prime Minister has yet to provide all of the memorada requested on the floor of this House of Commons. It is clear to date that the former minister of external affairs has not given a detailed account of his involvement in this particular case.

The facts are unbelievable to Canadians and the Canadian people are suspicious of the integrity of the government's information.

I ask the right hon. Prime Minister if he will give us a clear undertaking that the former minister of external affairs, all other ministers, chiefs of staff and the appropriate officials will appear before the parliamentary committee? Will the Prime Minister give us the undertaking today?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member clearly is not listening to the responses. Both the Prime Minister and I have said that we are prepared for full disclosure within a parliamentary committee, based on the traditions of parliamentary practice. That is the place to look at this issue. Ministers were the ones who accepted the responsibility by asking for a report and making the information public.

The hon. member can read this just as anybody else can. The committee can ask officials. We will encourage officials to go. We have spoken together to say that we will be frank within the context of a parliamentary committee, just as we have been in asking for an inquiry. It was ministers of this government who asked for an inquiry and we will continue to do so.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

For 124 years the Public Service of Canada has worked side by side with governments, carrying out the will of Parliament. Now the Prime Minister is destroying the Public Service, blaming public servants for the mistakes of the government in the Al-Mashat case and dragging them into the political arena with no voice to defend themselves.

Will the Prime Minister listen to the criticism, for instance, of Gordon Robertson and will he apologize to the Public Service for the terrible damage he has done, or will he go on dismantling the nation by dismantling the Public Service?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that question is unworthy of an answer, inasmuch as the hon. member, by asking it, has impugned the integrity of the Public Service of Canada.

Let me just say that by asking such a malicious and misleading question, the hon. member has impugned the integrity of the Public Service of Canada. Let me say that this government has worked effectively and well, at all times consistent with parliamentary traditions, with the Public Service of Canada and will continue to do so for many, many more years.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. In case the Prime Minister does not know, the Public Service certainly knows who is impugning their integrity.

The very foundation of a non-partisan Public Service is being ripped away when ministers and the Prime Minister refuse to take responsibility for their actions. In this case, that is what they are doing. Great public service leaders of the past, the Gordon Robertsons—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I must remind hon. members that preambles are not a place to make a speech. Would the hon. member please put her question.

• (1440)

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, given that the people who have made the Public Service great would not have put up with this attack on the Public Service, why is the Prime Minister hiding, and allowing ministers to hide behind public servants who have no opportunity to defend themselves? Why is he politicizing the Public Service?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, clearly this government is not impugning the Public Service. As I pointed out yesterday, the circumstances in this case were extraordinary in that ministers were not informed. Ministers accept—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Questions are being asked. Ministers of course are being asked to give their answers and I know that all hon. members would want to hear the minister.

Ms. McDougall: Having taken full responsibility for this case, which the Minister of Employment and Immigration did when he and I together asked for an inquiry, we committed ourselves to produce a report, which we did.

The two officials involved could have been identified by their title. There are precedents for this. There have been names of public servants released before under situations that were equally extraordinary. We promised a full report. We gave a full report. The full report included the two names.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the minister said that the government promised a full report but Canadians were deeply concerned to learn that two influential lobbyists, John Godfrey and Allan Gotlieb, apparently made representations on behalf of former Iraqi ambassador Al-Mashat on February 27.

In view of the fact that both Godfrey and Gotlieb stated that they were told that an inquiry was already under way before February 27, does the minister stand by her statement that there was no action at all in this before February 27. How does the minister explain the statement in her full report that it was on March 4 that "telephone calls were made by two Canadian acquaintances of Al-Mashat". Who made those calls on March 4 when the two calls by Godfrey and Gotlieb were on February 27? What other representations were made on behalf of ambassador Al-Mashat?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the point is that representations were made on behalf of Mr. Al-Mashat to officials within the Department of External Affairs. That is public knowledge. We made that knowledge public.

The fact that calls were made to officials does not negate the fact that ministers were not informed before the fact. We produced a full report. We are suggesting that a parliamentary inquiry can answer other questions.

I do not see why the hon. member is so exercised when he can ask these questions in committee.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the minister of course missed the point of the difference between the 27th of February and the 4th of March. Read the report.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. In view of the fact that sometime earlier she and her colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs had turned down another application for an Iraqi diplomat, why was it that this minister on the 16th of April, when she found out that Al-Mashat had been allowed into Canada, did not say one word to the then Secretary of State for External Affairs? Why did she order no inquiry whatsoever? Why did she say nothing to her successor? Why is this minister stonewalling, blaming public servants? Why will she not come clean with Canadians?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when I found out about the situation well after the fact, I did send a note to my department, as it then was, saying that I disagreed with the process and the substance. Any department that I have ever worked in has always taken any note from me seriously and produced a report. I asked for a report and that report was in the process of being generated.

When that report was generated it would have been shared with any relevant person.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, after she "scraped herself off the ceiling", as she is quoted as saying, I wonder if she left her tongue up there. Because the former minister of immigration knew all about the Al-Mashat affair on April 5, yet the Prime Minister was not told until April 30—25 days later.

Does the Prime Minister truly believe it proper that the former minister of immigration, upon learning of the Al-Mashat affair, decided not to tell either the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs or even her successor to the Ministry of Immigration about this entire matter?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the opposition is accusing us of confusing dates. The hon. member has just used the wrong date himself. I found out on April 16. I initiated an inquiry within my department. That is what responsible ministers do and that is what I did.

An inquiry was instituted later. That is what responsible ministers do; they try and ascertain the facts. That is what they try and do and that is what I did, and that is what other ministers did when they found out.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): April 5 or April 16. She adds fuel to her own fire. It even took longer. She didn't even bother telling the Prime Minister in the additional two or three weeks.

So we have to come back to the original question: the minister knew. The minister knew for weeks, and after she peeled herself off the ceiling, why did she not tell the Prime Minister? She did not tell the Prime Minister during that whole time.

Mr. Prime Minister, do you find it right that your now external affairs minister—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that questions have to be put through the chair. I know that may seem very archaic in some respects, but it probably helps the general decorum of the House.

Does the hon. minister want to respond? Well, the hon. member for Hamilton West has a question. I am sure the hon. member will put it very briefly.

Mr. Keyes: The question is, did the Prime Minister believe it proper that the former minister of immigration, upon learning of the Al-Mashat affair decided not to tell either the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or even her successor at immigration about this entire matter?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): When the minister of immigration, as she then was, found out about this affair, she instituted an inquiry within the Department of Immigration in order to have some facts on which to proceed.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put a question to the minister and I am sure that hon. members would want to give the hon. minister the courtesy of listening to her reply.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have responded. I have told the House that when I found out I instituted action within my department. I think that is what responsible ministers do. The minister of immigration is the one who is responsible for people coming into the country. I instituted an inquiry within my department. I stand by that and I think that is what responsible ministers do do; they ascertain the facts before they start spreading rumours around.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, responsible ministers know what is going on in their departments. Canadians find it unbelievable that three ministers of the Crown were kept in the dark for months before they were told that the Iraqi ambassador to Washington was seeking permission to enter Canada as a landed immigrant.

We are pleased that an inquiry will take place, and we accept the undertaking of the Prime Minister that the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, the former Minister of Employment and Immigration and the former Solicitor General will be appearing before the committee to give evidence.

I would also like the Prime Minister to give his undertaking that Mr. Raymond Chrétien, Mr. David Daubney, Mr. Paul Tellier and Mr. Reid Morden will also appear before the committee to defend themselves. If the government is truly interested in getting to the truth of this matter then it will have all relevant witnesses appear before the committee.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that the hon. member would have known by now what is the responsibility of committees of this House and their chairmen. It is up to the committee to invite whomever it wants to have appear before the committee.

I have made a commitment that those of us who are involved will appear before this committee. That is a committee matter.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): The committee can invite the Queen, but that does not mean she is going to appear. I would like an undertaking from the Prime Minister to have the civil servants who were directly involved in this matter to appear before the committee.

If the Prime Minister refuses, the only conclusion we can draw is that the government really is not interested in getting to the truth of the matter. Have these officials appear so they can defend themselves against the accusations made by their political bosses.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's problem is that he has nowhere to go now that we have said that people will appear before a committee.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the Federal Court of Canada, trial division, today ruled that the cabinet broke the law on October 12, 1990 in exempting Alcan's Kemano 2 project from the public environmental assessment process. The court also struck down the September 14, 1987 backroom deal between the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Alcan, which is the basis upon which construction of this immense project is now proceeding.

I would like to ask the Minister of the Environment to assure this House that a panel will be set up immediately and that he will assure all Canadians that all major projects from this point on will undergo an environmental assessment before they proceed, not after construction begins?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I understand the ruling that my friend from Skeena refers to came out this morning. I think it would only be a normal course of action for us to look at it and then act accordingly.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I think most people would have had time to read it by now. It is the first ruling in the history of Canada of the Federal Court finding that the cabinet had broken the law in exempting a major project.

I would like to ask the Minister of the Environment if he could assure this House that all major projects from this point on will undergo an assessment first and will he immediately set up a panel to look into Alcan's Kemano 2 project?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the member deals with these matters. I know that on this side of the House, as far as we are concerned, the ruling came out today. We will take a reasonable period of time to make ourselves familiar with it.

By listening to the member, I am not sure, but he seems to want to indicate that we have not read it. We want to take time to read it. I am not sure from listening to him today whether he has read the ruling either.

EDUCATION

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for Science and it pertains to the educational initiatives outlined in the Speech from the Throne.

In the throne speech, we heard that our government is committed to increasing the number of high school graduates, cutting the illiteracy rate, increasing the amount of employee training, as well as increasing post-secondary graduates in math, science and engineering.

Can the minister apprise this House what our government is doing to increase the number of graduates in the fields of math, science and engineering?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, one of the cornerstones of our efforts to increase the number of students in math, science and engineering is, of course, the Canada Scholarship Program which was announced by the Prime Minister in 1988. Under that program, 9,000 scholarships have been issued to students from high school into first year in these particular subjects.

As well, we have a number of programs. The latest one, announced by the Council of Science and Technology Ministers of Canada just last week was "Innovators in the School". We expect by August of this year to have every part of this country involved in sending scientists and engineers into all of the public and high schools to talk about careers in those particular subjects.

I would hope that by the time this program is finished we will have some 25,000 people, qualified scientists and engineers, moving into the schools to talk about that particular issue.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

One of my constituents, Mr. Sadhu Singh, died 18 days ago. His sister, now in India, wishes to attend the funeral but was denied a visitor's visa, apparently for fear she would not return, even though her husband and two children are not joining her at the funeral.

My repeated representations to the minister's office and the minister himself have failed to move them.

Could the minister explain to this House how Mohamed Al-Mashat, spokesman for a murderer, can be hastily ushered into Canada as a landed immigrant, while this grieving woman is refused a visitor's visa to see her brother one last time?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I share the hon. member's preoccupation with his constituent. It is true that the hon. member has made representations. An official of this government, posted in the country in question, has refused a visitor's visa for this women. Upon receiving the representation of the hon. member, I placed an immediate inquiry to the post overseas in order that I be informed as to why this has happened. Surely, I cannot overrule an official in the Public Service—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: That is outrageous.

Mr. Valcourt: May I can complete my answer, Mr. Speaker.

• (1500)

The reason is that I cannot interfere with the decision of the public officials unless and until I know why he was refused. The minute I receive this information—and we have conveyed that to the hon. member—and know why he was refused, I can exercise my discretion and authorize that person to come to Canada for the funeral in question.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it has been more than a week since I made my representation to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: That may very well have been, but I would ask the hon. member, given the time, to put the question directly to the minister, please.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, the body of Mr. Singh cannot wait for three more weeks in a Winnipeg funeral home. Neither his sister nor the Singh family can wait and grieve indefinitely.

Where is the heart of this minister? I ask him to act now. Issue a permit, Mr. Minister.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is all right to stand up here and say those great things.

He was not even able to give me the name, the date of birth, or address of the person we want.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: As soon as I receive the information, I will be able to make a decision. I will do it at that time, and not before.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I direct my regular question to the government House leader regarding the proposed activities for tomorrow and next week.

While he is on his feet, perhaps the government House leader can indicate to the House when the parliamentary committee, which has been given an undertaking by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will meet. Can he give us the date of that particular hearing?

Are there undertakings that the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, the former Solicitor General, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, the present Solicitor General, all officials from the relevant departments including David Daubney, Mr. Chrétien as well as Paul Tellier, and all other officials will appear before that parliamentary committee?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in terms of business, there will be the continuation of the throne speech today.

Tomorrow is an allotted day. Monday is a holiday. There will be the continuation of the throne speech on Tuesday and Wednesday. I will talk about other business after that.

As the hon. member knows, the management committee, which is also the striking committee, is looking at the membership of these committees.

I can assure you that we are very anxious to have that committee meet as early as possible. We are very anxious to have ministers and officials appear and very anxious to show how outrageous the charges of the Opposition are, and to get the truth out. We are anxious to do it.

I would ask the hon. member to get his Whip to meet right now to strike that committee so we can put an end to this outrageous nonsense we see in the House.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. government House leader for his undertaking that the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, the former Solicitor General, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Solicitor General, all of their relevant officials as deemed by the committee, the former chief of staff, Mr. Tellier as well as all other officials will be involved.

I want to assure the government House leader that we will be able to move very quickly on this matter, within a matter of minutes upon departing the Chamber here. I thank the government House leader.

Mr. Andre: I would like to compliment the House leader of the Liberal Party on his cute lawyer tricks. I would suggest to him that he could show a little more respect for commitments given many times today. Several times, the questions kept coming back again and again and again with pejorative and out of order preambles.

I am anxious to put an end to those. That is why we are anxious for this committee to meet.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I have listened to this discussion with great interest. The government House leader is calling into question whether or not questions put by members opposite were properly in order, and in doing so is questioning the role of the Chair and whether the Chair is performing in a proper fashion during Question Period.

That cannot be allowed to stand if there is to be proper order in this place.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as we know from the rules that were adopted some time ago, it is no longer appropriate during Question Period to raise points of order.

I listened to what the hon. member had to say. I wonder if the hon. member would have the courtesy to listen to what I have to say.

Mr. Speaker: Some weeks ago we had a discussion that I think resembled the discussion that is about to take place. Surely to goodness it is appropriate that we have that discussion with a certain calm and respect for each other.

The hon. minister has the floor and I am sure we all want to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Excuse me for just a minute. One of the constant complaints in this place is that sometimes a member on either side goes beyond what is appropriate. I hope hon. members will recognize that if, when an hon. member is recognized to speak, other members shout at him or shout at her, they are going to get a response equal to the kind of epithet that is thrown at them.

I would ask hon. members that if we are going to have a discussion about the conduct of this place, which I think the public frankly wants us to have, let us try to have it in a civilized way.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as I was indicating, citation 359 of Beauchesne, fifth edition, lays out the strictures on oral questions. There are numerous examples here, but let me give—

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton East, but surely she rises on a point of order. I want to facilitate the functions of the House and the minister hardly got started. However, I will hear the hon. member for Hamilton East for a moment.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am seeking some guidance from the Chair. At the beginning of this discussion after Question Period, the question revolved around the composition of the parliamentary committee and who would appear.

The House leader on the government side, by attempting to edit in a rather particular fashion the activities and questions that were posed during Question Period, is in fact calling into question the judgment of the Chair.

Question period is over and we are now on House business. The specific business of the House right now is to determine whether the terms of reference of the parliamentary committee that has been agreed to will include the civil servant, Mr. Raymond Chrétien, and also the chief of staff, who were fingered by the government. That question has not been answered. That is the issue of the order of business of the House, not an attempt by the House leader on the government side to browbeat the Chair. We will not put up with the browbeating of the Chair.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I think I have to say very quietly and as gently as I can that I certainly have not had the sense that I am being browbeaten.

The hon. minister may continue his response.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, in response to earlier questions about whether questions are out of order, I make the point that Section 359 of Beauchesne's fifth edition, which lays out what questions should be or should not be says:

> (2) The question must be brief. A preamble need not exceed one carefully drawn sentence.
> (3) The question ought to seek information and, therefore, cannot be based on a hypothesis, cannot seek an opinion, either legal or otherwise, and must not suggest its own answer, be argumentative or make representations.

I quite understand the difficulty in enforcing these strictures in Beauchesne, in that after they are made cannot be retracted. In the age of television and so on, they are out. Therefore, it is fair and appropriate that the ministry reply to the accusations, innuendo and so on that are contained in the preambles.

The point I would make is in response to a suggestion in the last session by the House leader of the Liberal Party, that Question Period be examined in terms of the length of preambles, the length of answers and the method. It is a very valid one and I am hoping that the new management committee will take this under advisement.

Mr. Speaker: All of what the hon. minister has said is of great interest to this Chamber. But there is an appropriate way, after discussion, to bring these matters to a committee, to bring these matters to the Chair and if necessary to bring these matters into the Chamber. Surely what we are dealing with here—and I want to try to get back to what we really are dealing with—is a question put by the hon. House leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition on the question of what is the business which is forthcoming.

I think we should come back to that and I think we should get that resolved.

Mr. Andre: I completed my remarks when I was shouted down by the other side again.

An hon. member: If he wants a debate, he will have it. Keep acting like this. We are not easily bullied, I can tell you that.

Mr. Speaker: There is a fundamental tradition in this place that your Speaker, and I am your servant, has to maintain order. There is a reason for that. If we do not maintain reasonable order, we cannot have free speech.

I would ask hon. members to let us get through the next few minutes without making comments from wherever hon. members may be sitting and, in the absence of being recognized, to make a contribution.

Let us try to get back to the business which was quite legitimately raised, and hear the hon. minister.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, said on several occasions in response to questions during Question Period that she welcomes, looks forward to and anticipates appearing before the committee with—and please listen carefully—all relevant officials or past ministers or ministers in order to assure everybody concerned that there is no substance whatsoever to the suggestions of impropriety about the ministry that have been laid today. We are anxious to do that. There is no need to repeat the list. As answered in Question Period several times, all relevant officials will be before committee.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for giving us the assurance that the parliamentary committee that will look into this matter will hear the ministers who were in any way connected with this case.

However, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, perhaps inadvertently, made it seem less than certain when, during Question Period, she said the committee was master of its procedure. The minister knows perfectly well that the majority of the committee's membership will consist of government members. To ensure that all the proper procedures are followed—and I appreciate the reply the minister just gave, because I think he has given us the assurance the ministers will appear before the committee, and I think that is quite satisfactory—according to members on this side of the House, there are two people, who should be heard if they wish to be heard. The committee should at least hear the two senior officials whose judgment was impugned by some ministers, namely, Mr. Daubney and Mr. Chrétien.

If these two officials are willing to appear before the committee, we want to have the assurance that the government majority will not prevent them from appearing and answering questions. Do we have that assurance?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, again motives are being impugned, suggesting that somehow there will be an attempt to avoid implementing what I have just said the government is anxious to implement: that all relevant officials will be allowed to appear.

I also said earlier, perhaps the hon. member did not hear me, that we are not just willing but also anxious to get this matter before committee. It is unfortunate that the hon. member would have to impugn or suggest that somehow we are going to use the Conservative majority to try and avoid this. We would all be better off if we would stop making these accusations of cover-up and so on and let the facts speak for themselves.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I think I can add something that would end this discussion to everyone's satisfaction.

The Government House leader indicated that he is anxious to see this matter go to committee. We all are. We have all agreed that an existing matter before the health committee ought to continue. We have agreed to expeditiously reconstitute the existing health committee to deal with that issue and then we will move on to dealing with the committees later.

I suggest, in that same mode of communication and co-operation, that to facilitate this committee hearing we should agree that the existing committee simply be extended to deal with this matter and we can do that later today.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, there is one slight inaccuracy in what the House leader of the New Democratic Party said and it is that we had agreed to reconstitute that committee. There was an attempt by my parliamentary secretary, the member of Parliament for Peace River, to get agreement. Unanimous agreement was denied by the Liberal Party among others.

We have not had that agreement. As I indicated, he should not get anxious and he should not make accusations of tardiness. We are anxious to proceed with this committee. The whips can meet and agree to the membership. As soon as they are available that committee can meet at an earlier date. I can assure you that the officials in question will not escape to Brazil and be unavailable for consultations if it happens—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton on a short point I hope.

• (1520)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): A lot has been said and a lot of motives have been imputed by the hon. member opposite. I, for one, respect the rulings of the chair and the decisions of the chair, whatever that may be.

However, some things have to be attended to. The hon. government House leader has said, I think unfairly, that we in this party somehow denied unanimous consent for the health committee and the Beaudoin-Edwards committee to continue.

I want to make it perfectly clear that we give our full consent. However, I was informed by the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader that tomorrow we would have a discussion, because he wanted to link certain other items to that. That was my understanding.

Now, that may be incorrect. All of a sudden the government comes with a motion today, not informing the opposition House leader. We deny that liability. To show good faith, I state clearly on behalf of my party that we give unanimous consent to the reinstating of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, of the health and welfare committee, and we would also give unanimous consent, now, on the floor of the House of Commons, to reinstate forthwith the Standing Committee on External Affairs.

I do not see anything wrong with that. I just wanted to clarify that for the members of the House.

Finally, the government House leader, in response to my question, raised—

An hon. member: Oh, he is walking out of the House now, he is walking out of the House. How insulting!

Mr. Dingwall: —a question about the tone and the content of Question Period. You, quite rightly, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam is rising on a point of order. I, of course, will hear him. I am listening to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, but I will hear the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting here for 20 minutes to put a simple question on House business. The hon. members can surely shorten their comments into one or two sentences. This debate that is going on is absurd.

Now the government House leader has left the House. I ask them to wind up their discussion and do it sensibly, and let the rest of us put our questions.

Mr. Dingwall: I am sorry that the hon. member is offended, and perhaps quite rightly so, by the time it is taking in terms of regular House business questions. However, I want to inform the hon. member that a lot of information is being put on the table which is totally inaccurate and it has to be corrected now and forthwith.

In response to my question, the government House leader made interventions with regard to the tone and content of Question Period. Members on this side of the House quite rightly believed from what he had said that he was attacking the Chair. The Chair responded and said it did not believe that was the case. We will accept the ruling of the Chair. I wish to give notice to the Chair that on many occasions, the government House leader has availed himself of the opportunity to run off at the mouth, and to refer to certain provisions in Beauchesne to show that we are doing something wrong.

I want to make it perfectly clear that if we are in breach of the rules this should be brought to the attention of the House and the Speaker should deal with it forthwith. You have not, Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, ruled any of our questions out of order or improper at any time.

We have made the offer to discuss with opposition parties, as well as the government, the timing of Question Period, and more importantly, the timing of the responses of government ministers. That is what we gave to the government House leader.

Let us not have a repeat of the government House leader rising in his place to castigate members on this side of the House who legitimately ask questions regarding House business, or coming forward during Question Period on the undertakings of the Prime Minister and the minister of external affairs on very, very important matters that involve the state.

I would ask, Mr. Speaker, for your affirmation that we on this side of the House have conducted ourselves within the boundaries of Beauchesne, within the boundaries of the Standing Orders. The matter should rest there.

Mr. Speaker: I must say I have listened with great interest to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. I think that he has probably resolved the matter, at least for this afternoon, on a very sensible basis. Hon. members should always try, as he insists that his own colleagues have done, to contain the enthusiasm, sometimes the very great passion, that is brought to this place within the bounds of the rules, as set out in the various editions of Beauchesne.

The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam rises again and I will of course hear my hon. friend.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I know you have to be polite to those two members, so I will put it a different way. I have a question—

Mr. Speaker: No, no. I want to make something very clear, I have to be polite to all hon. members, including the hon. member who is rising now. I would hope that the hon. member who is rising now will be polite to all hon. members in this Chamber.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I have a question on House business, a somewhat easier question perhaps. Since the minister has left the House I will put it to his parliamentary secretary, if I might.

I want to know if the government is bringing forward a bill on gun control, and when it will be bringing it forward.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding, from comments made publicly by the Minister of Justice, that she intends to bring forward a bill. However, I cannot say, specifically, when.

I will take the hon. member's intervention as a representation and try to find that out for him.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford and then the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, we are now talking about the business of the House. However, during the four days we have debated on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, not a single independent member has been given the floor.

Mr. Speaker, I thought we had an understanding that an independent could be given the floor after every group of 13 speakers. This week, we were entitled to only one question in the House, and since I want to do my work as a member as well as any other member in this House, I wish the House would give me a chance to do so.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise this matter with you, since I have some comments on the Speech from the Throne, and I would like to have a chance to take part in the debate like any other member. Being in the back near the curtains doesn't mean we don't have the same rights and privileges.

Mr. Speaker: I listened carefully to the hon. member's comments. However, after every speech by any member in this House, he has a chance to ask questions or make comments during a ten-minute period.

If there is a problem about an independent or a member of the Bloc taking part in debate, of course I will consider your remarks, and I hope we will be able to settle this in the appropriate way.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I don't want to go on about this, but my contribution is more than just a short question at the end of a speech. What it boils down to is that we are allowed these short questions for charity's sake. What we want is to be able to make a substantial contribution to this debate, and it takes time to make a full-length speech.

Bearing that in mind, Mr. Speaker, we want the same rights and privileges as any other member.

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: I understand quite clearly the concerns of the hon. member and his colleagues in the Bloc Québécois. There is a problem because in the House we have three major parties but we also have independents, including our colleague from Alberta who is now in his seat.

I can assure the hon. member that after this afternoon's comments, I intend to look at all the options, and I hope the results will be satisfactory to the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to give notice that the member for Winnipeg North, who asked a question during Question Period regarding a constituent who was trying to bring the family together for a funeral, was answered by the minister of immigration, who suggested that not all facts that should have been provided were provided by the member.

The member, who had an urgent meeting immediately after Question Period and who has now come back into the House, wanted to give notice at the first opportunity of a question of privilege, and I was trying to reserve on behalf of my colleague—but I can see he came in while I was speaking.

Perhaps the member would raise a question tomorrow and give notice today.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a question of privilege and if it arises out of the recent proceedings, I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I have to review the actual Hansard myself. I have not seen his reply.

He suggested I could not even give the name of the person. Well—

Mr. Speaker: One moment. If the hon. member needs the assistance of the transcript or more study then the Speaker accepts that. It is not necessary to argue it now. The hon. parliamentary secretary though is on his feet and I will hear the hon. parliamentary secretary, but I want to make it very clear to the hon. member for Winnipeg North that I accept what the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte has said. I have notice of the question of privilege and the question of privilege is reserved.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, if it is reserved that is satisfactory with me. I wanted to make sure that the minister was present.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session; and amendment thereto of Mr. Chrétien (p. 24).

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that by September the government will table its proposals for constitutional reform. The throne speech addresses the questions of unity and prosperity and I would like to quote from the throne speech:

> Our unity is strengthened by a strong economy. And prosperity is enhanced by a united country.

Those are propositions that I am sure we all agree with. Does the government understand that constitutional arrangements must support our economic objectives?

Our leader, Mr. Chrétien, has said that in making changes to the division of powers the essential focus must be an arrangement which best serves the needs of people, not governments or bureaucrats or politicians. Any new arrangements must provide the flexibility to meet the changing demands and challenges of the future. To my knowledge, the government has yet to make a similar statement. Quite frankly, I am concerned about recent proposals to hive off various aspects of economic and social policy, such as training of workers, to the provinces. Divorcing such training from income security policies and tax policies will make it impossible to adequately address the needs of individual Canadians.

We have to be careful about placing limits on the federal spending power. Overlapping jurisdictions are inevitable in a modern and complex world. For Canada to adapt to global realities, a comprehensive and integrated plan of action will be required, one in which training, education and social assistance policies are updated and research and technology strategies are defined on a national level.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the issue of national unity more particularly. I know that we in Quebec feel some disappointment following the events of recent years. The failure of the Meech Lake Accord was interpreted wrongly, I think, as a rejection of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, it is time to go beyond emotions and to analyse more objectively. Personally, I believe that we live in one of the best countries in the world.

When I get up every morning, I thank God for keeping me alive and for the privilege of living in this country.

We do not need an exhaustive analysis to understand and realize Canada's incredible advantages and assets. I am sure that everyone can give a short personal experience. I could talk about it for a long time, but I will confine myself to a small example.

I remember visiting a refugee camp on the border of Cambodia and Thailand in 1980. In that misery, Mr. Speaker, were Canadian doctors and nurses who, in addition to their work, acted as interpreters between some Swedes, who spoke only English besides their mother tongue, and French people. That is Canada's true vocation, Mr. Speaker. With our two languages and our different cultures that make up Canada, we can indeed play an important international role.

Should we not rather take on the challenges of the world?

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint–Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the speech by my colleague, the Liberal member from the Montreal area. In his talk, he said that he was staying with us in Quebec. This statement was challenged by the member for Shefford who seemed not to believe that the member was a Quebecer, even if he is English speaking, and this kind of statement is quite deplorable and should not be parliamentary.

However—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that the hon. member would direct his question to the hon. member's speech. I do not wish to hear anything about anybody else's question in the House.

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to agree with some parts of the speech by my colleague on national unity. However, he said that his party was prepared to show flexibility. I have trouble grasping that part of his speech, since the leader of the Liberal Party recently said that for him, there was no question of any present federal power being transferred to the provinces.

If that is flexibility, I would like the hon. member to tell me exactly what his party's position is, because if we want changes, both the federal government and the provinces must be prepared to call some things into question. My question for the hon. member is along those lines and I would like him to tell us the position which his leader seems to have great difficulty putting before us here in this House.

Mr. David Berger (Saint–Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. He totally misunderstood the speech of my leader.

For several months now, since his appearance at the Bélanger–Campeau commission, my leader has actually said that he is ready to review the distribution of powers between the federal government and the provinces. He often said that nothing was sacred in the present division of responsibilities.

In my speech, I stressed another aspect of Mr. Chrétien's speech in this regard. He said that we must, in every change, allocate a responsibility to the government which is best able to assume it, while looking for arrangements which would best serve the interests of citizens instead of governments, bureaucrats or politicians.

Therefore, our leader has demonstrated many times his flexibility and his openmindness on this question. I would invite the member to read more carefully the recent speech and proposals my leader made on April 21, in Montréal. I could send him a copy.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am of course very pleased to speak today in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is at the crossroads, not only as a political entity, but also as an economic power in North America and in the world. More than ever, we have the duty, as individuals, to decide what kind of country we want to live in and what place it should occupy on this continent as well as in the world.

Of course, national unity plays now a pivotal part in the choices facing us. It would be a mistake, Mr. Speaker, for us collectively to refuse to face up to reality at a time when it is vital to be careful to avoid delusions. All aspects of our daily life are tied to the survival of this country which, in turn, is dependant upon unity as a link between several communities and cultures.

Because of these differences and thanks to these differences, this country is probably the best equiped to ensure the prosperity and quality of life that all the people of Canada are looking for. It is the very existence of Canada as an international power that is at stake. So, I urge you to stop and think of the implications for a moment.

I urge Canadians to consider reality, their reality, setting aside the symbols, the misunderstandings and the conflicts, between the French–speaking and English– speaking communities, between the east and the west, between native people and non-native people or between new immigrants and not so new immigrants, and answer this question: do we still want this country?

I am talking about a country with a 125-year history as a federation, whose various communities, against all odds, share the common values of peace, justice, tolerance and liberty. These values, embodied in our lifestyle and in our institutions, are what make Canada the envy of most countries in the world.

Since I came to Ottawa in 1984, I have often been confronted, as have my colleagues from Quebec, Mr. Speaker, by the problem of the two solitudes, as we call it. I also had the opportunity to discover a richer yet more complex reality. Confronted to this reality, I realized that ordinary Canadians across the country have more of less the same needs and the same aspirations.

On major issues such as the environment, economic prosperity, the family and health, people all share the ideal of a better life, whether they live in Roberval, Quebec, or in Vegreville, Alberta. We could probably build a lot on these sound aspirations that we all share, provided we are careful, we listen and reach out.

[English]

Canada is facing formidable challenges at this time. The identity crisis our country is going through at this time raises certain basic questions which involve each and every one of us. We can blame the government but this crisis needs to be seen as the culmination of a long series of missed opportunities and broken down communications.

Often we fail to ask the real question for fear of getting real answers, the real truth.

Are we perhaps afraid of finding out what we have really become? Any identity crisis, and ours is complicated by also being a unity crisis, is a mirror into which it takes courage to look. The crisis we are experiencing contains the seeds for major change, potential rebirth of our entire country. I want to see this country have the audacity, the daring to question every aspect of this issue, to believe in its own ability to find the right answers.

I have spoken of change and rebirth. What will this consist of? It is not solely up to the government or governments to decide. All Canadians must take part in defining their country, regardless of what that definition may turn out to be. Canadians are the ones who built this country, who made it a country, and they are the ones responsible for its prosperity.

Today's men and women receive this country as an heritage from those who have gone before them. They are therefore the ones who need to be asked what future they want to see for this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, make no mistake. There is no cut and dried solution to the present crisis in this country. Our government has taken and will continue to take initiatives to advance the cause of national unity, but without the participation of the Canadian people and the co-operation of all major groups in Canadian society, the process is doomed to failure.

Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about another government project. We are talking about the future and the unity of this country. How could we agree on a plan for the future to renew our unity, without calling on the partnership of all Canada's dynamic forces? Without this kind of participation, we will never be receptive to the problems of others. Since there seems to be a consensus in this country on changing the status quo, perhaps it is time to get down to basics and talk about foundations for a new union.

Canada will deserve to be called a country if it has a minimum of consensus. Only broad participation by Canadians can guarantee that a consensus will be reached. We are embarking on an exercise in reflection that will not be complete until Canadians have stated what they want the future of this country to be.

During the months to come, Canadians will have to think about this country's future. We will have to start by thinking about what we are and the kind of society we have built over the years.

As the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I can testify to major achievements by Canadian men and women, and I also want to do so as an individual who is concerned about the quality of life of his fellow citizens and who welcomes this responsibility.

In the field of health and welfare, Canada, during the past 50 years, has adopted policies and programs that are the envy of practically everyone. In the heat of the debate on free trade and again today, when we are discussing the pressures of international competition, Canada has vigorously renewed its commitments. Despite frequently expressed concerns about the intentions of our government, we have not only maintained our commitments, we have improved on them.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's health care system is recognized as one of the best in the world. Wherever they are in this country, Canadians can be assured of receiving high quality services. They can depend on a national system whose excellence owes a great deal to cooperation among the provinces and to provincial initiatives to improve that system. Because of needs and expectations, the health care sector has expanded enormously over the years. Mr. Speaker, the federal and provincial governments spend $40 billion of their revenue on health care, out of a total of 60 billion.

This year, the federal government transfered $14 billion to the provinces in the form of transfer payments and tax points.

[English]

It is more important than ever that the main principles that have served and continue to serve as the foundation of our health system be reaffirmed. I can state without hesitation that features that make our system unique—universality and accessibility—will not be challenged in any way. The risk that those people who are most vulnerable might have to bear the consequences of any change of that kind has convinced me of the need to reaffirm that our national standards will remain intact.

In a time of limited financial resources and increasing pressures on our provincial health services, the federal government is prepared to intensify its co-operation with the provinces. We must find ways of helping our health systems respond more effectively to pressures resulting from such factors as demographic change, technological development and public expectations.

It is also the responsibility of the federal government to ensure that our native people have the greatest possible accessibility to health and social services. This responsibility which the federal government has assumed on behalf of the people of Canada for nearly 125 years has contributed to the establishment of an extensive system of facilities and services for the native and Inuit population extending from the Yukon to the maritime provinces, a system which today consists of some 488 health service facilities including nine hospitals in eight large regions.

Through this system we are able to help the various communities in their efforts to decrease alcohol and drug consumption on reserves, thereby helping to reduce family violence.

Mr. Speaker, this fact demonstrates the importance of having a national vision of health and welfare that covers the needs of all communities in this country.

The protection of public health is another area whose impact is impressive. Every day, the lives of every one of us are in some way affected by action taken by the Health Protection Branch of Health and Welfare Canada: monitoring the processing and manufacturing of food and drugs, monitoring medical products compliance, taking part in investigations of epidemics, analysing drug samples as part of the Canadian drugs strategy, and so forth. The expectations of Canadians in this area are very high. It is a difficult task that requires many resources and action on a national scale.

[English]

Another area in which the activities of the federal government influence the day-to-day reality of Canadians is the area of social programs. It is important to know that Canadians are proud of their image as a caring nation. As our country has matured, social programs have grown and changed to better meet our evolving needs. Although we hold different ideas about the best way to help needy Canadians, the shared value of caring for each other unifies us across the country, and in all regions we expect governments to have a social face.

It is in keeping with these values that we must take stock of the future. Our achievements are considerable but there are challenges which remain. No government program can or should replace the family. However, where governments can assist is by helping the family respond to changing needs and by creating a healthy environment in which Canadian children can live, learn and grow.

More than ever Canadian women are joining the labour force. Sometimes this is a choice, but more often than not it is an economic necessity. At the same time as holding down jobs, many parents must take care of children and elderly parents. Lone parents face a unique challenge in working while trying to provide the best care for their children. The many roles that family members must play create a tremendous strain. As the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I am pleased that the throne speech promises a review of policies in relation to the family. I want to ensure that our policies best meet the present and future needs of families.

Our most precious resource is our children. By their very nature, children belong to society's most vulnerable group. Modern society, for all its technological achievements and advances, has not done well enough with the children. In our country, children have a problem which we cannot ignore; as well as assisting families, we must continually help children out of poverty. While we have seen some improvement in child poverty rates, we must continue to seek the fuller understanding of the root causes of poverty, and work with other governments and voluntary organizations to find effective ways to keep children out of the welfare trap.

The Children's Bureau will help me to develop recommendations to cabinet to fulfil the commitments made at the summit. I envision Canada's National Action Plan as addressing a broad range of issues which affect children, including enforcement of child support orders and action against child pornography.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I have to mention the government effort to fight AIDS. We developed a national strategy, which has the support of community groups, non-government agencies and all levels of government, a remarkable achievement in terms of consultation and partnership.

Let me assure you that I will carry the work initiated by my predecessor in that field. Therefore I undertake to step up all joint efforts which will help us beat this horrible virus.

Mr. Speaker, we are facing other great challenges. Canadian men and women expect their government to use extreme caution, and it is vital that we live up to their expectations. Canada has a good name, thanks to its vision based on such values as fairness, compassion, tolerance and generosity. As a nation, we now need to re-affirm our unanimity cohesion in the values and the assets we share. Health and social programs are some of our vital assets.

That is what I want achieve both as a minister and a member of this government. I came to Ottawa hoping I could contribute to Canada's growth, bearing in mind the values, principles and differences which make our country. I hope we can soon find the path to unity, so that we carry on with this humna-scale undertaking.

I invite everyone to take an active part in the preservation of our heritage, since, in light of the challenge that lies ahead, we can hope for even better tomorrows.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me the opportunity to make a few remarks and also to direct a question to the minister of health.

Just this very day there was a very grim report put out by a journalist from the Edmonton Journal. Basically what that article says is that northerners lead the nation in most classes of illness. It says:

> With the exception of heart disease, Canada's northern territories experience higher death and disease rates than the rest of the country. Birth and infant mortality rates are also higher.

It also quotes the minister of health from the Northwest Territories:

> It is only recently that we have been able to supply a fairly decent level of water and sewage, says Nellie Cournoyea, the Territorial Health Minister.

It goes on to say that it is not unusual to have as many as 16 people living in a poorly ventilated, substandard home. The chronic housing shortage is a major obstacle to combating infectious diseases, such as tuberculosis and respiratory infections. Cournoyea adds that an additional 2,000 housing units are needed to meet current demands, never mind the nightmare of an anticipated population explosion that could see the vast region's population double within 30 years.

• (1600)

Housing is the number one health priority in the Northwest Territories and the second priority is environmental health in the homes, says Dr. Paul Cappon of McGill University.

They go on to say, and this is very important, that a 1986 survey showed that 77 per cent of Inuit women and 65 per cent of Dene and Metis women smoke, giving women in the territories a cancer rate four times higher than the rest of Canada. More than half the residents of the Northwest Territories and 40 per cent of Yukoners smoke, compared to one third of the population nationally.

This is a very grim indictment and I would like to get some kind of an indication from the minister of health. I know he is new to his portfolio, but in what way can we as parliamentarians and elected officials, in a responsible and non-partisan manner, try to grapple with these very, very difficult health issues that affect the remote areas of Canada?

In 1991, should we expect to have diseases that were unheard of and that were rampant in the 1940s and 1950s, such as tuberculosis?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the member. We know very well how dedicated she is to the problems dealing with aboriginal peoples.

In the analysis I have made of the Department of Health and Welfare, I drew the conclusions that I drew in the five other departments where I worked before, that the reality of native people in this country is very particular.

I have two bands in my riding and the highest rate of suicide in Lac-Saint-Jean is in Point Bleue, in the Montagnais band in my riding.

I hope that my colleague will agree with me that there are many factors dealing with the problems, particularly with these people. The problems are unemployment, family violence, drug abuse and alcohol abuse. I am not sure that as a country we have always given those people the chance to get out of those problems in the same efficient way we gave to it other people. That is why I have particularly asked the department to look at means that could be used to increase help given, particularly to northern bands.

I was in Winnipeg last Saturday. The first visit I made as the minister of health was to the office in Winnipeg, committing myself to return and to particularly meet with native people to see what we can do better. Already the drug strategy and family violence have been approached, as well as child intervention, and we will have more on that in the fall. I will keep that in mind. It is very sensitive.

It is not just a matter of saying we will, it is a matter of seeing the ways and means we have. Resources are more scarce than they were, but I committed myself to do my best to help those people the best we can.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi and then I will recognize the hon. member for New Westminister—Burnaby. Questions or comments.

[Translation]

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in his speech, the Minister often mentioned the important benefits we have in this country. I would like to say that the other day, I was watching a television program. We know that in the United States, some universities have a chair or school of Canadian studies, where American students find out what is happening in our country, Canada. The dean of such an institution faculty was asked what American students ask him most often about Canada. First was our health system. Second was history and third, the Constitution.

I do not know whether the minister could tell us how it would be easier to make our fellow Canadians understand that this country has social programs like health insurance that are envied by other countries and even by our neighbours, the United States, which may be one of the world's richest countries, but which does not have the same quality of social services that we have here. People often complain in our country that taxes might be a little higher than elsewhere, than our southern neighbours have to pay, but in return, we have incomparable social programs that are envied by many other countries.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I appreciate the question from my colleague, Mr. Speaker, because indeed, not a week goes by without the department of health and welfare receiving delegations from the United States that want to find out exactly what makes our health plan and all our social programs so good, bearing in mind that Canada shares these costs among 26 million while our southern neighbours have a population of 250 million. In many fields such as education, health, social programs, action on AIDS, they are considered among the best.

I must tell my colleague from Brome—Missisquoi that of course, if you have something for a long time, you forget how valuable it is and how to keep it. I think that the way the federal government handles such things as the resources at our disposal, transfers and so on is often discussed. We should never forget that with our precarious financial situation, the least economic mismanagement or moving away from our interest rate policies or the way we are managing, difficult though it may be, the economy and finances of Canada— What many provinces have done recently will probably make it possible for the system to continue. But again, we must always keep in mind that the slightest relaxation, the least temptation to correct the situation in a different way could endanger this system and then Canadians would realize that they do have one of the best systems in the world.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, through you I will extend my congratulations to the new minister of health on assuming his new portfolio. I think today is the first time he has spoken in the House as minister of health.

The minister is well aware of the controversy that has been surrounding breast implants in this country and in the United States. His department has issued just today a new bulletin called Implantable Medical Devices. It comes from the Health Protection Branch.

It says: "The scientific and medical communities have identified a number of confirmed and hypothetical health risks associated with breast implants."

This is after months and months of reassurances from the department and from the previous minister of health that there was in fact no problem with these devices.

The United States Food and Drug Administration has now revised its published estimate of cancer risk from breast implants. It now uses the one in 10,000 risk figure. Critics in Washington say the FDA is muzzling its own scientists.

We have asked the minister for a judicial inquiry on this whole matter and process of medical devices being approved by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The confidence of Canadian women in the Health Protection Branch has been seriously eroded.

The minister must do something to reassure Canadian women. We have had the IUD scandal. We have had the thalidomide scandal. We have had the Depro Provera scandal. He must do something.

Will he assure Canadian women that there will be an inquiry into breast implants in this country, an inquiry in which Canadian women can ask the questions they feel they must ask?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I realize that the question is very important, but the time has expired.

• (1610)

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, this will not take long. I would like to have a chance to go further with that question, but first of all I want to reaffirm something of interest to me in terms of the health of Canadians, particularly women in this case. In all the reviews I have made about breast implants, and in particular the Meme implant, everything has been done by the department and the minister, my predecessor, in light of the information which was available at the time. Any contrary information has been duplicated and has been controlled at any time by the department.

Once again, what has been issued today refers to information that Canadians, particularly women, need at the present time. I believe that my colleague has to keep in mind what we have done and will continue to do. As an example, she is surely aware of the 1-800 line that we offered to women last week. Five hundred women have called so far. The department reported to me that answers given, by and large, satisfied the people who called.

We deal with 25,000 new medical devices every year and there are 500,000 on the market. The department is open at any time if my colleagues would like to come, get informed and look at the way we work. We have just formed a committee chaired by Dr. Hearne which will determine a way to review the medical devices operation. If there are any problems they will report to me. Obviously I will change the process, but I believe what my colleague has in mind is important and that is not to worry women about the way it works.

I can confirm, with all the information that I have at the present time, that what is done is well done, controlled, recontrolled, reprocessed and redetermined. But once again decisions are made based on information available at the time. But science is science and if I have to change a decision in light of new information I will do so.

I can guarantee the women of Canada that in terms of breast implants at the present time everything has been done well and will continue to be done well.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The Honourable Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell—Trucking Industry; the Honourable Member for York South—Weston—Disasters; the Honourable Member for Don Valley East—Housing; the Honourable Member for Scarborough West—Immigration.

The hon. member for Shefford.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you for recognizing me at this time, in the midst of a debate which surely will count in the history of Canada and will probably become more acrimonious in the months to come. I have in mind in particular the speech from the minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs this morning in which he told us that they would be introducing a bill on the holding of referenda when we know that a similar measure has been introduced in the National Assembly in Quebec City and should become law before the end of June.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, we are in a pre-referendum period. Therefore, coming here to tell our English-speaking colleagues what we want and what the situation is, is fulfilling the role the Bloc Quebecois sets for itself, the role of being a link with English Canada at a time when the concept of sovereignty is more and more accepted and is becoming a political necessity.

In the next few minutes, Mr. Speaker, I would like to convince you that sovereignty is also an economic necessity. Naturally, over the last twelve months we have seen a lot of water flow under the bridge. After the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, Quebec had extensive studies done on its future.

I think that all members of this House will agree that the Bélanger-Campeau commission was a model of democracy, a model of broadening political horizons, not only for the elected members of the National Assembly but also for the leaders of various communities and groups in Quebec. Besides, it was an unprecedented experience in Canada, where for the first time non-elected people were part of such a broad, wide-ranging, important process.

There was also the Allaire Report in the Quebec Liberal Party, which was adopted by a large majority. So to those who claim that sovereignty is advocated only by a minority or who think that only independence crusaders believe in it, I want to tell them that the consensus in Quebec is growing day by day and since the failure of Meech Lake, we have learned not to trust others but to decide on our collective future ourselves.

That is why when I see federal initiatives that may be intended to counter the initiatives of the Government of Quebec, I tell them that they are really pale imitations.

For example, we have seen the Spicer commission in recent months. I feel sorry for English Canada to have to go through this charade instead of discussing and really looking into the kind of country you want. Of course, the Beaudoin-Edwards committee has been concerned with the mechanics, but completely ignored the substance, the content. And God knows that in Canada now, the two confronting visions have nothing to do with process: they are realities in people's hearts and minds. And whatever process is adopted, do not think that you can reconcile the difference between a group that wants a strong central government—and I respect those in English Canada who want a strong central government; it is their right. For others, the only real government that counts is the one that controls the majority, the one in the National Assembly.

No travelling committee, not one, two, three or twelve committees will change the reality out there. The debate now going on in this country is not one of process, but of vision. Everything hinges on there being two visions but only one country. What is missing is a country. That is why we see more and more Quebecers who traditionally rejected sovereignty come to realize that the differences are irreconcilable. We tried everything.

The Minister of Health asked us earlier what kind of country we wanted. Quebecers have unequivocally answered this question twice already and, each time, their cry from the heart was not heard. No wonder that a formation like the Bloc Quebecois was established. No wonder that a formation like the Reform Party is emerging today. This is happening because of the fundamental difference between the legal vision of Canada that you are proposing and what this country is really about. All the difference is there.

It is about the real country that we want to talk about in this House, Mr. Speaker. We know it offends the pure and innocent ears of some of our hon. colleagues. We know this is not the traditional argument heard in this House where efforts are made to disguise reality by pretending that the country depicted in the legislation corresponds to the real Canada. However, the reality that people see in their heads and in their hearts is totally different.

The reason why traditional parties are facing massive rejection throughout the country is very simple: they do not suit the real country and the aspirations of the people who live in this real country, outside of this ivory tower we live in, here, in Ottawa.

So, when I hear the Speech from the Throne challenge, call upon the Canadian people to participate, the first question that comes to mind, Mr. Speaker, is who is going to believe this government? It is the first one that comes to mind in response to this challenge. For their part, Canadians would like to challenge this government to run again in an election. In that way, this Speech from the Throne is fraudulent. It was made by an illegitimate government, a fact corroborated by all public opinion polls. This government would do the country a big favour if the Prime Minister were to decide to put Canada's interest before that of his own party and to ask Canadians and Quebecers to pick true representative in these times of turmoil. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the make-up of this Parliament would reflect the actual make-up of this country and not that of some dream that this Speech from the Throne is trying to sell us.

We know what the reality is in fact. So, when our friends opposite claim they will take up these great challenges, we know that they lack the moral authority as well as the capacbility and the will to do so. We know they are the lowest ever in the polls: they have lost the trust of just about everybody in Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, rhetoric aside, in real life, there are realities to face. As we speak and as this government is trying to sell us his lines, 1.6 million of our fellow citizens are unemployed. Under this government, which is allegedly so generous and so perfect, as we speak and while the Prime Minister is praising the great virtues of federalism, 11,180 banckruptcies have been recorded in Canada over the past year. At a time when the economic policies of the government should be one fostering a strong economy, as promised in its last Speech from the Throne, interest rates are oscillating between 10 and 12 percent, while our dollar is at 87 cents.

So, we talk about sovereignty, Mr. Speaker, it is not strictly a matter of political necessity. Sovereignty is increasingly becoming an economic necessity, and that statement is not from me. Even the Quebec Chamber of Commerce tells us, in its brief, that it is time to act. They say the decision-making process should be put in place immediately. The same recommendation was made to the Quebec government by the Bélanger-Campeau commission. That is what the legislation the Quebec government introduced yesterday is about, one more step toward a referendum in Quebec.

But, this afternoon, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs told us that the federal government will want to hold its own referendum. They will introduce their own referendum legislation in an attempt to weaken the resolve of Quebecers and create a diversion.

Mr. Speaker, we realize this is an attempt to create a diversion! So we invite all those who want to relive the torments of conscription to hold their federal referendum; we invite them to ask Quebecers the real question and they will get an answer they never hoped for.

Mr. Speaker, to those who thought they could, out of Ottawa, scare the Quebec people with their jackboots, I say: Go pay a visit to Quebecers in the next little while, you will see how low your credibility level is, how you will not be able to convince anyone, because the onus of proof rests with you, and so far you have not delivered.

Mr. Speaker, for years, I advocated a renewed federalism. But one day, I came to realize that we could not deliver, that we had to find some other way, another political formula, one that would solve our real problems. When we talk about real problems, we talk about major national programs, and the generosity of the federal government, but we know, Mr. Speaker, that this government owes $388 billion, uses a third of our taxes to pay the interest, and increases the national debt by $30 billion each year, so how can they talk about sharing the wealth? In fact, all they have done this last few years is sharing the deficit. The fact is the government cannot afford its dreams any longer. That was obvious in the Throne Speech. Actually, Mr. Speaker, they now want to establish national standards in areas they have no business into, and then have the provinces foot the bill.

They even have the guts to refer to national standards in education, an exclusive provincial jurisdiction ever since 1867, especially in Quebec. I am convinced even Maurice Duplessis must be turning in his grave right now, at the throught of Ottawa interfering in education. That was part of the original agreement. The government does not want to abide by the rules in general matters or respect the necessary choices of the grey areas of the Constitution, and now they are even prepared to ride rough short over the most clearly-stated parts of the Canadian Constitution. All this from a government that said it had a favourable bias for Quebec. That is shameful, Mr. Speaker. I tell the members from Quebec on the other side that Quebec will never accept your meddling in education policy. We will never accept your meddling in our affairs in that field.

Even worse, this government wants to go even further in occupational training. In Quebec, there is not just consensus but unanimity on occupational training being the exclusive responsibility of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, even the Conseil du patronat, federalist to the core, issued a press release recommending that all manpower training programs be carried out by the government of Quebec. We know that about 40 per cent of the funds for such training are wasted. So when we say that sovereignty is necessary, we need only look at the attempts of this government to meddle in fields of provincial jurisdiction, to duplicate services, to waste our taxes, and God knows that we cannot afford it now.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about federal policies. We can talk about those where they have responsibility, in particular research and development. We read recently that the Space Agency, which was supposed to be the leader in research and development for Quebec, this famous space agency that we had to fight over and wrench away, and I will give you the figures, Mr. Speaker, for this space agency's research contracts: 50 per cent in the West, 35 per cent in Ontario and a meagre, shameful 9.5 per cent in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, that is from this government which says it has a favourable bias. I think that if we want to pursue our economic objectives, if we want to recognize the political, economic and commercial imperatives, 30 years of discussion, bickering, frustration and above all misunderstanding, as shown of this Speech from the Throne, of insensitivity, lead us to conclude that we would prefer to assume our responsibilities ourselves. That is why from the context in this Speech from the Throne and the debate on this amendment, I would like to move a subamendment, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member from Hull—Aylmer, which reads as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by adding, after the words "economic affairs of the nation", the following: "and in light of its interference in the exclusive jurisdiction of Quebec in the fields of education and training".

Mr. Speaker, I think that this subamendment is acceptable and I hope that we will have an opportunity to vote on it because I want to know where our colleagues stand. It is important to know how strong their convictions are and especially how much they respect the letter and the spirit of the present Constitution.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table this subamendment.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Shefford, whom I think I know well.

• (1630)

I even remember visiting his place of birth, I believe in the Magdalen Islands.

An hon. member: A Magdalenian.

Mr. Boudria: A Magdalenian, yes. That was the term that the hon. member for Shefford taught me when I paid him a visit. I must say that it was a most enjoyable visit.

I do not want to reveal before this House secrets that have to do with personal friendship, but suffice it to say that at that time, the hon. member believed—as I still believe—in a strong and united Canada. I am disappointed to hear his comments today. I am disappointed, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that the hon. member has confused two issues and I wonder if he sincerely believes what he says because, surely, he must understand that there is a difference between being a member of the Opposition to the government, where it is the role to make the government accountable, and being opposed to the very existence of one's country. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there is a difference between these two issues.

It is my duty, as a member of the Opposition, to make the government accountable. I do not apologize for it: That is the reason why I was sent here by my constituents. The people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell have asked me to represent them; they have given me a mandate to represent them in this House. Because of circumstances, because of what has happened in the other 294 ridings in Canada, I sit on the Opposition side. It is not because of what happened in my own riding, indeed, if I had not been elected, I simply would not be here. I am on the Opposition side because of what has happened in the other ridings. You are either a member of the Opposition or a member of the government. As a member of the government, one tries, as best as possible, to conduct the affairs of the country, like any other government in the past. But as a member of the Opposition, one has to make the government accountable.

Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member says that the government lacks credibility, I can certainly share his opinion; however, Mr. Speaker, that does not mean that Canada lacks credibility. It may be true that unemployment is high in Canada and that our monetary policy is not good, and it is an opinion that I share, but that does not mean that Canada is a bad country. Those are the fundamental differences on the basis of which we must separate our role as spokespersons in the House of Commons from our reactions toward those who govern and those who form the opposition. But this role does not allow us to say to Canadians that their country does not work because people have lost confidence in those who are in power.

Mr. Speaker, there is another point I want to make. The hon. member for Shefford talked about job training. As a matter of fact, I think he mentioned it in his resolution. He says that training—I think he used the terms job training and employment training in his speech—is strictly under provincial jurisdiction.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he has ever signed a form under the Job Development Program. Under that program, grants can be obtained from the federal government, but the Member of Parliament has to give his approval. Has he ever signed a form under section 25 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which is about job training? I have signed quite a few, Mr. Speaker, and I must say that those forms are public documents available under the Access to Information Act. I hope that members in this House who have heard the amendment put forward by the Bloc Quebecois today will look for those forms signed by each member of that party, Mr. Speaker. I hope that some hon. members opposite will do it.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that we must keep the system accountable. I do not share his feelings towards my country. I for one, Mr. Speaker, would like to offer my best wishes to the minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

It might not be fashionable for a member of the Opposition to formulate such wishes, but I think that in doing so, Mr. Speaker, I am not wishing that the government opposite run the economy the way they did in the past, but that the minister succeed in keeping our country together, because that principle is larger than I, larger than the members opposite and even larger, with all due respect, than the occupant of the Chair. And there lies the difference, Mr. Speaker. I take this opportunity to formulate this wish to the minister, because I want our country to remain strong, united and prosperous in the future.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am taking the hon. member's subamendment under advisement. As soon as I can make a ruling on it, I will.

I do not know whether there was a question there or not, but I will let the hon. member reply.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments made by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I understand why he wants to defend Canada as it is today. I understand because he was not rejected by Meech Lake. He supported the Meech Lake Accord throughout that debate, unlike his leader. Personally, I think that if anyone is to blame in this House, and I don't blame the government for the demise of Meech Lake, I am more inclined to put the blame on the Leader of the Liberal Party who forced us all, as individual members,to start wondering about the ability of this Parliament and this country to function as such. Mr. Speaker, I think, in fact I sincerely believe, that for the past 30 years our institutions have been unable to respond to the fundamental requirements and needs of Quebec. Consequently, I no longer believe that even with another round with committee after committee in fact, I am positive that 18 months from now, we will be holding a referendum on sovereignty, because English Canada will not have given the matter sufficient consideration and have been unable to make concrete proposals.

My comments are not meant to be anti-English Canada. They have every right to define the country as they want it to be, in their image and likeness, as we say. They have the right to make education a national issue. They have the right to let Ottawa run everything, if they want to. That kind of country does not have my loyalty. One thing is certain: This has been very difficult for me. It isn't easy to file in here, one after the other. It isn't my idea of fun. However, we believe that without a reaction from Quebecers the day after the demise of Meech Lake, it would have been business as usual, as the Leader of the Opposition hoped it would be, when he said: After June 23, it will be the 24th and the 25th, and just forget Quebec's demands. We want to remind people daily of the problems we had to face and the way we were humiliated. Consequently, I believe the institution has failed, but not necessarily its individual members. However, we must face the fact that if the division of powers is not changed, nothing will change in this country. That is why I think English Canada has the right to define the country it wants. We have done our duty. All we have to do now is make our decision.

As for the jobs strategy, I am sure the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell does not believe his stop-gap projects are occupational training; mowing the grass— What I want is real jobs—

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Order, please. The amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shefford and seconded by the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer has been ruled in order.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the consent of the House to the New Democratic Party's intention to split our speeches into two speeches of 10 minutes with five minutes of questions from now on. I do not think that should be any problem.

I would like to begin my comments on the Speech from the Throne with some general comments. The speech begins by talking about Canada's history as a history of builders and achievers and how Canadian men and women created a society that is as free and fair as any on earth. I want to make sure that the government was not intending to include itself in this category of builders and achievers and creators of a free and fair society. I assure the government that the people of Canada do not share the view that this government is in that category and sees the government as a destroyer and creator of something which is unfair, not something which is fair.

The speech goes on to talk about the need to rebuild Canadian unity and overcome the acrimony, apathy and incomprehension that exists. Of course we all agree with that, but the government must also take its responsibility as one of the main culprits in generating disunity, acrimony, apathy and incomprehension about the importance of Canada and holding the country together.

The Speech from the Throne goes on to talk about putting Canada first and wanting all parliamentarians to put Canada first, to set partisan motives aside and work for a stronger country.

How can the government expect us to put all our partisan views aside? How can it expect us to buy into its view of Canada which has generated such unemployment, such misery and such poverty across this country? The government is not learning from its mistakes. The New Democratic Party cannot participate in working towards the sort of Canada that this government wants. We will, of course, work towards a Canada which is one and united, but a Canada which is fair, compassionate and cares about people rather than corporations.

Even in the Speech from the Throne, there is more of the same. There are more of the government's economic policies, which have torn the country apart, being proposed for the next session of Parliament. There is more privatization, more deregulation, and more economic policies which will tear the country apart. There are more references to cuts to transfer payments which will tear the country apart in terms of our social policies. This is a trend which has been going on for quite some time.

The Speech from the Throne talks about a Constitution that will unite a nation. Well, so it should, but so should a government unite a nation. It should seek compromise and consensus, not just at the time when a Constitution is being framed, not just when a Constitution is being negotiated. It should also unite a nation at times when we are dealing with social policies and economic policies.

We have seen the tragedy of this government's economic policies. Social programs have been cut at a time when they are needed most. We have seen this tragedy caused by the free trade agreement, by unfair taxation, by the high dollar, by high interest rates, by cuts in transfer payments to the provinces, by deregulation, by privatization and by cuts to national institutions like CBC and VIA Rail.

In spite of all the evidence this direction is continued in the throne speech. We have free trade for provinces too. This means the end of manufacturing industries in Saskatchewan. It means the concentration of more manufacturing in central Canada and Ontario, away from the hinterland economies. It means more job losses, more pain, more poverty, more unemployment and more sickness in the regions. This is thoroughly unacceptable to the people of Saskatchewan, thoroughly unacceptable to the people of Atlantic Canada and all the regions of Canada who have not received a fair deal under this or, indeed, former governments.

There is much that could be said about the general thrust of the Speech from the Throne but I would like to concentrate on one issue which is not in the throne speech but which should have been. It deals with matters of poverty and, in particular, child poverty. We all remember that this House, this government committed itself to removing child poverty by the year 2000.

We need a plan and a timetable to ensure that child poverty is eliminated by the year 2000.

The government in the throne speech has committed itself to implement the commitments made. This would take a major change in attitude. Somebody must have been on the road to Damascus to see some revelation which would suggest that we have to do something different. Yet this government has been a government which has slashed education programs and slashed transfer payments to the provinces for social programs in B.C., Alberta, and Ontario. This has had major negative implications on children, yet now it wants to say that it is going to change for the better and that it will ensure that Canadian girls and boys will be better educated, better protected and better nurtured. If they are going to be better protected, it seems to me they had better be protected from the present Government of Canada which has caused them great harm over the last short while.

I would like to make two brief comments with regard to the children's summit which is mentioned in the throne speech. The government talks about following through on those commitments.

There are two commitments in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. One is to ensure that children enjoy the highest attainable standard of health and facilities for treatment of illness and rehabilitation of health—the highest attainable standards.

Anybody in this country knows that we are far, far away from ensuring that children across this country, particularly those in rural and northern areas and poor children, receive the highest attainable standard of health. They do not, and it is time the government made some commitments in that regard.

In addition, with regard to education, there is a commitment to ensure that higher education be accessible to all on the basis of capacity, by every appropriate means. Yet this government has slashed funding to higher education which has meant less and less successful education for low and middle income Canadians, higher tuition fees, and so on. We can see that all across the country in our own universities and our own communities where tuition fees are going through the roof.

What we need is not more rhetoric. We need to be caring about children. We need policy initiatives which actually resolve the problem.

We need aggressive action on pay equity. We need an end to tax loopholes that benefit the wealthy individuals and corporations in our society. We need to cut subsidies to the rich corporations instead of slashing social programs for those who need it most. We need a national child care strategy. This is the first Speech from the Throne for a long time with not even a mention of child care.

We need viable housing initiatives. We need increased social assistance levels to protect those who are weakest in our society. We need to reverse cutbacks to health and post-secondary education. We need to be paying attention to aboriginal and minority concerns so that the poverty gap between those groups and other Canadians can be bridged.

These things were not in the speech. There was no commitment to addressing the real concerns of Canadians or addressing the real concerns of those least affluent Canadians. That is what we needed. Instead, we received more of the same disastrous policies which we have seen over the last few years.

In closing, Canadians need and Canadians demand better policies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I thank the hon. member for being so succinct.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I was very happy to hear my hon. colleague make the remarks that he did. I think it is incomprehensible to many of us that a government that is languishing at 15 per cent of the polls, with 85 per cent of Canadians opposed to the direction in which it is headed, can talk about unity and competitiveness and still forge ahead with no change in direction.

Surely in a situation where we are becoming less and less competitive and less and less united, and 85 per cent of the public is opposed to the government's policy, it would read the writing on the wall and make some changes. There have been no changes, and I think that is a real shame. I think Canadians are calling for change and they are not getting it.

I would like to ask my hon. colleague to reflect on some of his previous life experience as director of the co-operative centre at the University of Saskatchewan. Perhaps he could share with us some of the ideas he has developed about how the co-operative system could well play a major role in bringing this country together and making it a more competitive and compassionate place, for example by encouraging much more involvement in the co-op housing sector.

There have been reports indicating that the health care system would be much more efficient, cheaper, as well as more effective if we made greater use of co-op health as a mode of health delivery. He mentioned day care. A lot of the most positive development in this country in the field of day care has come through co-operatives, in spite of the lack of funding. It is a very important factor in protecting and diversifying primary production in many parts of the country. With the increasing number of lay-offs and plant closures due to free trade, very often the formation of worker co-ops to save jobs is the last line of defence in protecting jobs in communities.

I would ask the hon. member if he might comment from his extensive experience in this field.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, it was a long time ago that I was so involved with co-operatives. It is clear this is an area which the government has essentially abandoned. It abandoned it probably because co-ops represent Canadian-owned, locally run institutions, some of which have been incredibly successful in the province of Quebec and in my own province of Saskatchewan as well as across the country with some 11 million members, almost one-third of the Canadian population.

In particular, one matter which could have been addressed by the government is the application of the goods and services tax on membership fees of co-operatives. The government seems to be penalizing co-operatives by charging the GST on the membership fees, which Canadians have to spend in order to become members of co-operatives to participate in the organization. The government has received numerous applications to respond to the problem of Canadian-owned and Canadian-managed corporations and yet has refused to do so, leaving them at some disadvantage with regard to other corporations.

I commend co-operatives to this government as a Canadian-owned, Canadian-run democratic corporate entity which has served the needs of 11 million Canadians well.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, we listened to the throne speech earlier this week and looked to the government to provide the Canadian people with a plan for economic recovery, a plan for a statement on national unity and the Constitution and, sadly, we were all very disappointed. It seems to be again the same, tired old Tory agenda, an agenda that has brought us the free trade deal, an agenda that has cost Canadians thousands and thousands of jobs in every region of this country, an agenda that has increased taxes, increased the burden on to the backs of middle and lower income people and an agenda that has failed to this point on national unity.

National unity is much more than which spending powers are administered by which level of government. It is about a nation in which individuals are secure, employed and contribute to the good of all in our society. It is about a nation in which every Canadian is valued regardless of the region they come from, the colour of their skin, or their abilities.

Canadians do want a strong Canada, a diverse and a vibrant nation, one they can be proud of. I have spoken to my constituents, as many of the people in this House have spoken to their constituents, and have listened to their concerns on the future of this country and on the pain and the worry they are feeling right now about the very future of our nation.

It is hard to be optimistic about Canada when you are under attack by your own government, a government that has brought us the GST, brought us the free trade deal, brought cutbacks, one that put capping on the Canada Assistance Plan to Ontario, to British Columbia, to Alberta, and one that implemented cutbacks to social programs and left Canadians feeling very disintegrated and worried about the future.

Many Canadians are feeling the impact of the trade deal, particularly in the province of Ontario. It is not just Ontario, however, that is losing manufacturing jobs. In my own riding of New Westminster, there is a plant which has been making steel tubing for 33 years under Canadian ownership, providing jobs in my community. It had been purchased by an American firm recently, and within three months that company, Wolverine, is moving south of the border, closing that plant in Canada. It seems that what the Americans got out of the trade deal is a market in Canada but no commitment to jobs in Canada. Our government gave away that commitment to jobs; 180 jobs were lost in a very small community. That is just one example of what is happening right across this country.

We have seen it with the truckers who are out here today and have been here all week demonstrating. They were demonstrating a year ago about deregulation and about the changes in their industry. They were warning the government in saying that the government's initiatives in deregulation were bad for them and bad for their industry.

The government does not listen. It continues along the same blind policies, policies that are really ruining our country and ruining the sense of people in the nation as Canadians. I wonder which jobs are next on the government's hit list.

I listened to the throne speech for any mention of the green plan that was unveiled by this government with a great deal of attention, hoopla and promises, but it was not mentioned. The commitments of the green plan are not being fulfilled at all. The Fraser River runs right through both parts of my riding—Burnaby and New Westminster. There was a commitment in the green plan for action on the Fraser River. That river is one of the lifeblood rivers of the province of British Columbia, and where is the action to clean up that river?

What have the members of the government done with the green plan so far? They have spent $37,000 to test the reaction on a logo. They spent $12,000 on picture frames. They spent $150,000 on communications advice from private firms. They have spent almost $2 million on advertising. What has been done on the Fraser so far? They say it is coming; when is it coming? People are waiting in every region of British Columbia. People in their ridings are asking questions and people in my riding are asking questions. They say soon. People have been asking the questions for seven years of your government and have got no response on the issue of the Fraser River.

That river is important in British Columbia for tourism, fishing and for the lumber industry, and the member opposite knows that. It is of major importance in our province. We keep hearing that there is going to be an announcement but it never comes. I have constituents calling me weekly about when that announcement is coming. They get no answer from the Department of the Environment of this government.

I was pleased about the throne speech mentioning a blue ribbon panel on violence against women. I am also concerned that this new committee has precluded immediate action on gender sensitivity training for judges. I am concerned that the government is ignoring one simple and effective action on violence against women, and that is to remove the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, which funds shelters for battered women, child care and social assistance. Abused women must have the support they need. They need a sympathetic justice system and they need economic options.

Nobody knows what a blue ribbon panel is. It sounds like some kind of prize at an agricultural fair. We have had experience with this government's blue ribbon panel in the past: the De Grandpré blue ribbon panel. Most of us will remember what Canadians got from that blue ribbon panel.

I am concerned that the present panel may preclude a royal commission on violence against women, which, if it were implemented, like the 1970 royal commission on the status of women, would have focused public attention on the issue, raised awareness, provided education and led to government and public action on this issue.

I hope that the panel will be made up of victims of violence, those who work in the front lines with victims of violence, and women-positive researchers. I hope that this panel hears from women and issues a definitive report which is taken seriously by this government and acted upon.

• (1700)

There is a promise of programs for disabled people in the throne speech. I support any program that makes our society more accessible to the disabled, but I also want to alert the government to the fact that disabled women are at a far greater risk of violence and attack.

I would like the government to keep the particular problems of disabled women in mind when it sets up these programs for the disabled and when it sets up the panel on violence against women.

Except for the panel and the programs for the disabled, which account for three sentences in the throne speech, the speech was a disappointment to Canadian women. There was no mention of child care. It was promised in 1984 and 1988. It was mentioned in every other throne speech, but not even mentioned this time.

As of March 1990, there were 433,000 children under the age of three with no parents at home to care for them. As of March 1990, there were 47,000 day care spaces, including family day care, for children of that age. That leaves almost 387,000 children under the age of three with informal, insecure arrangements which range widely in quality, or with no child care services at all.

There is no commitment to strengthen the employment equity legislation which comes up for renewal this year. There is no commitment to affordable housing. There is no commitment to remove the discrimination against immigrant women in federally employment-related language training programs.

There is no commitment to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

There is no promise of fairness for women federal Public Service employees. In the 1986 throne speech they promised to correct inequitable wage rates in the public service. Now this government is blocking the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal hearing into unfair wage rates for women in the Public Service.

The throne speech talks about literacy, education and yet, the government froze spending on education which amounts to a loss of millions of dollars in funding to education year after year.

The throne speech talks about Canada's economic strength and the most advanced social programs in the world. I do not know what world this government is talking about. Is it Mars? Here on planet earth, most western European countries have a much more advanced parental leave program and child care system than we do here in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I think you are signalling me that my time is up. I would like to make a comment about the government's request to set aside partisan comments in the House of Commons. I am happy to support the government when and if it brings in good policies for the Canadian people.

For example, I and my party did support a government Private Members' Bill to help women have access to their share of the Canada Pension Plan. This was a positive step and we all supported it.

However, do not expect me to support the GST. Do not ask me to support cuts to leave for adoptive parents. Do not ask me to support a bill that will harm the Canadian people. We want effective action from this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since there will not be any questions or comments, I gave the hon. member an extra three or four minutes.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to comment on the throne speech delivered on Monday by the Right Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn, Governor General of Canada.

As the Prime Minister eloquently expressed yesterday, Canada is at a crossroads. Regardless of the final direction and outcome, Canada will never be the same. To those who take great pride in wallowing in defeatism and pessimism about Canada's future, let me say that no generation in Canada's history has ever passed without its share of doom and gloom forecast. Despite the naysayers, Canada has endured, more vibrant and alive with each passing year. I have never been more optimistic about our future.

Yes, it was tragic that Meech Lake died. However, that accord was carrying excess baggage not related to the Constitution.

The failure of the Meech Lake Accord has caused worry about national unity, but it also made two things clear: we must find a better way to amend the Constitution, and Canadians want to have a say in the process.

Accordingly, in November 1990, the Prime Minister announced the establishment of the Spicer commission and, in December, the formation of the special joint committee on the constitutional amending formula. Frankly, it would be naive to expect a magic formula to come from the deliberations of these bodies to cure all the aches and pains of our nationhood. However, in both cases a genuine attempt is being made to develop a national consensus rather than a provincial, territorial or special interest group perspective of Canada.

The wounds of past grievances are deep, but if we are true to our hearts and intellects, we can heal them. The risks created by our current disagreements are wide, but together we can bridge them.

That is the philosophy of the Prime Minister, the government and myself, and that is the direction expressed in the throne speech. Many Canadians blame the current problems of the economy on the Prime Minister and the policies of our government when, in very real terms, we have championed reforms and changes necessary to produce and ensure prosperity for all Canadians for years to come.

There is no denying that there has been a 2.5 per cent drop in the economy's performance, and high interest rates have contributed. However, interest rates are coming down and we must not lose sight of the fact that the U.S. economy has been in recession as well, with the resulting dampening effect on our economy.

In the current recession there has been a loss of 6.5 per cent of manufacturing jobs. However, in the recession of 1981 and 1982, the loss of manufacturing jobs was 12 per cent. Present circumstances, although undesirable, testify to the resiliency of the economy under our government's leadership. In fact, although the unemployment rate stands at 10.2 per cent, 1.285 million jobs have been created in Canada since September 1984 when we were first elected, and 470,000 of those jobs were in Ontario alone.

Of the jobs created by the Progressive Conservative government, 76.8 per cent have been full-time employment opportunities. As a government we are fully committed to further reductions in federal spending and deficit. As outlined in the latest budget and reaffirmed in the throne speech, the deficit will be brought down to under $25 billion in 1992-93 and $6.5 billion by 1994.

From 1992 through to 1995, program spending will be limited to an average of 3 per cent a year. We practise what we preach. The provincial governments have certainly been spending on a much more lavish scale, and the same applies to municipal governments.

The bottom line is simply that if competitiveness is the key economic issue of the 1990s, Canada is off to a very rocky start this decade. Our efforts to improve Canada's economic efficiency through the free trade deal, the GST, unemployment insurance reform, spending controls and deficit reduction, have all been bitterly opposed. Much of the opposition is based on the erroneous belief in Canada that the world has changed so little in recent decades that Canada need not change in order to keep up.

Many Canadians honestly believe that our current standard of living can be maintained without adjusting to the new global economy and by using the same economic and business strategies that have proved successful in the past.

Nothing could be further from the truth. If those delusions continue to distort discussion and action on national competitiveness, it will doom Canadians to unnecessary failure.

The course outlined in the throne speech attempts to steer Canadians clear of a head-in-the-sand approach to our economic well-being.

However, the throne speech did not only dwell on questions of the Constitution and the economy, it reaffirmed our commitment to the proposition that building a prosperous economy is fully compatible with maintaining a healthy environment.

In fact, since coming to power in 1984, our government has shown decisive leadership in placing an emphasis on the state of Canada's environment.

Briefly, I would like to review a few key highlights. In the current 1991-92 fiscal year, we have committed over $1 billion to environmental programs. The Acid Rain Abatement Program initiated in February 1985 committed the seven provinces east of Saskatchewan to reducing their annual emissions of sulphur dioxide, the principle cause of acid rain, by 50 per cent of 1980 levels by 1994.

To date, sulphur dioxide emissions in Canada have been reduced by 40 per cent.

We have shown leadership with several important initiatives intended to reduce the presence of industrial toxins in our fresh water.

In October 1989 we announced a $125 million five-year Great Lakes action plan to deal with health aspects of pollution, prevent toxic contamination and start a clean-up of areas in the Great Lakes basin.

In addition, in June 1988 we announced a five-year $110 million program to protect and restore the quality of the St. Lawrence River. We have introduced some of the toughest environmental legislation in the world, including the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and the federal environmental assessment process.

However, nothing is more significant than the Canada-United States air quality accord signed by the President of the United States, George Bush, and our Prime Minister on March 13.

I have served for over 10 years on a special parliamentary committee on acid rain, and in this Parliament as a member of the Standing Committee on the Environment.

I can honestly say that this historic agreement will have a significant impact on acid rain depositions in my riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka and elsewhere for years to come.

We have only touched the tip of the iceberg in terms of the environmental initiatives and programs our government has been responsible for since 1984. In the throne speech, we reaffirmed our commitment to using the comprehensive, six-year, $3 billion green plan as the principle vehicle by which Canadians will be helped to clean up, protect and enhance the environment over the coming months and years.

I am confident that the green plan initiatives, combined with actions by the provinces and the private sector, will ensure that Canadians have the clean air, water and land essential for a quality standard of living.

Finally, I was very happy to see that the throne speech established the family as a major priority. The family is, after all, the basic unit of Canadian society. Its strengthening should be a major objective of government policy.

I am encouraged by the fact that our government recognizes that Canadian society is changing and considerable pressure has been placed on the family unit. In light of those changes and pressures, it is reassuring that the government has made a commitment to renewing its policies to ensure that they are well tailored to meet the current and future needs of Canadian families.

The government already provides substantial funding for child care, allocating close to $1 billion annually through a number of tax and expenditure programs. Recent changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act now makes available a total of $1 billion per year to assist mothers and fathers in caring for new born children. However, I believe we are taking a significant step in the right direction with our commitment to a national action plan for children which will address a broad range of issues including child care, enforcement of child support orders, and action against child pornography.

In the course of reviewing existing policies, it is my hope that we examine closely the family tax and support system currently in place. As it stands now, the family tax and support system is cumbersome, inefficient, and unfair in its treatment of the family. Many aspects of the present system weaken rather than strengthen the national fibre.

In concluding, let me say that in many ways Canadians are a family. True, we have our differences and have gone through our fair share of growing pains. But like a family, I believe that when push comes to shove, the time comes to pull together. We have reached that point today in Canada.

The directions laid out in the throne speech do not provide all the answers or solutions to our present ailments. We do not even suggest that we have a cure-all. What we are doing as a government and in the commitments outlined in the throne speech is reaching out as family members across the floor of the House of Commons and across this great land, saying let us work together to ensure that a great country becomes even greater.

As individuals, as a government, as a people, we are far from being perfect, but then who is. Yet, as a nation we are the envy of the world. Indeed, Canada is a living and international ideal worth preserving and nurturing for generations to come.

The distinguished Canadian historian, A.R.M. Lower, in his book Colony to Nation made a reference to Canada which to me is quite appropriate given our present circumstances, and I quote:

> In every generation Canadians have had to rework the miracle of their political experience. Canada has been created because there has existed within the hearts of its people a determination to build for themselves an enduring home. Canada is a supreme act of faith.

Canadians have not lost that faith, and I have not lost that faith. For the sake of future generations, I hope the majority of the members of this House have not lost that faith either.

Mr. Speaker, again it has been a privilege to comment on the Speech from the Throne.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to comment on the future plans of this government for national unity and economic prosperity, as laid out in Monday's throne speech.

In doing so, I must express my disappointment that at this time with so much concern over the state of the nation and the economy, and concern by all Canadians over the state of the nation and the economy, the speech shows no sense of direction or any evidence of the leadership that this country needs to survive and prosper as a country.

We needed action on the problem of keeping Canada together, but we have another joint committee. On the economy and competitiveness, we needed a sign from this government that it realized the disastrous effects its policies have had over the past eight years. They have not worked. Instead, we saw that it plans to stay on course.

My talk here tonight will be on these two items; the Constitution and national unity, and the lack of what I consider economic direction by this government in such a critical time of our country.

With respect to the Constitution and national unity, 11 months have passed since the Meech Lake Accord failed. In that time, our Prime Minister has appointed two commissions, the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, otherwise known as the Spicer committee or commission, and the Special Joint Committee of the House and the Senate on the Amending Process for the Canadian Constitution, otherwise known as the Beaudoin–Edwards committee of which I was a member. Both were set up to seek out the views of Canadians on what they want their country to look like in the future and how they want their Constitution changed to reflect their values, if it needs to be done.

As well, we have seen Quebec, who has had two studies, the Belanger–Campeau, a committee set up with politicians from all parties, as well as members from outside of government, interested Quebecers. We have also seen the Liberal report on Allaire. That is Quebec's combined position towards Canada and what it needs or where it wants to go within this framework of Canada.

I have to say that I regret that the provinces have not come across in the same way, but I am not sure they have been encouraged by our Prime Minister or by the Government of Canada to start looking at this very serious question.

I was a member of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee. Since February 19, 1991 this committee has held about 27 public sessions both here and outside of Ottawa. We dealt with a very distinct area in the Canadian picture or in the Canadian Constitution. We dealt with the question; was there something wrong with our Constitution, with the amending formula and was there a need for a referendum or a constituent assembly. I do not really want to pre-empt the report of that committee. We have been pre-empted already by the Prime Minister who set up another committee without waiting to hear what we had to say, but we did hear from experts on this item.

I think we heard from experts across the country on our present day Constitution. Unfortunately, I can say, in contradiction to the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, who thinks we should be looking for a better way to amend our Constitution, that none of the experts said it was the Constitution itself, the present day Constitution, that was so bad in the Meech Lake process, they said it was the process itself in Meech Lake that did not allow public participation.

Actually, the current Constitution has worked twice out of three times; once in 1983 and again, I think, in 1987. It did not work in 1988. But if one looks at the Meech Lake Accord, what was it? It was a new amending formula agreed to by 10 provincial premiers and the Prime Minister. It was not even in our Constitution. Everything in the Meech Lake package, except for one item, needed unanimity.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I made the mistake that probably most Canadians make, nothing in that package except one item needed unanimity. The rest could have been done by the seven and fifty rule in the Constitution. I am sure most of it would have passed had there been flexibility on the part of our leaders, which I think was lacking, and public participation, so people would know exactly what our politicians were doing in the Meech Lake Accord. That was lacking. That was brought out at the Beaudoin–Edwards committee by the experts. It was not the Constitution. It was the lack of flexibility and the lack of public participation. As well, over and over again we were reminded that the Meech Lake package was presented as a fait accompli, take it or leave it, and that no changes would be permitted regardless of the level of public outcry.

I remind the House, it was a new amending formula that was used; unanimity or nothing, when they could have probably passed all of it, except for the Supreme Court, with the seven and fifty. Despite this clear message, and despite the weight of the evidence, the committee did not even have a chance to report before the Prime Minister decided to put his own approach to the public process.

We could have sat last week or this week and finished it. I do not think we can even sit next week unless we agree to sit as a committee to finish our work because the House has not agreed to let the committees resume. We saw that earlier today in the external affairs debate concerning what had happened in Question Period.

He wants the opinion of yet another committee. He wants a special joint committee that will travel, just like we have seen the Spicer committee do, just like the Beaudoin–Edwards committee has done. Yet there is no leadership in presenting concrete proposals as to what could be done to start the process.

He wants another nine months to pass before we get any specific proposal is brought forward. That is dangerously close to the deadlines Quebec has established in the referendum. More to the point, contrary to what we had heard on the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, there is no specific commitment to involve Canadians directly in the process. Once again, they may end up as spectators.

I am sure I am not the only person in the House who senses some of the same back to the wall, roll of the dice tactics that we saw between 1987 and 1990. I do not think we need another joint committee in the fall.

I was pleased this morning to hear the new minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs outline the four stages he saw the government taking. He said we would await the reports of Spicer and Beaudoin. Then proposals would be formed by the government, and a joint committee would travel across Canada on those proposals and then it would go to the legislators.

The main thing that was brought before us is that the public wants to know that there is flexibility at all stages and in particular, at that last stage once the proposals have come back from that joint committee and before they go to the premiers, they want to know if they have any public input on that proposal.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, this is where the government has failed. It is waiting until next February to say to the public: "You may have a couple of months and that is going to be it, because Quebec is going to make its mind up one way or another". Again our back is to the wall.

Why are we not starting it now? Why are we not discussing a specific proposal over the summer? What would I put in that proposal? It does not take imagination. Most Canadians know what is in there. My leader gave an outline the other day of what his proposal should be.

First and foremost we should define what Canada is supposed to be for all Canadians. Second, I think we could go to the fact that we probably have to have a human rights code in our Constitution because there are some who do not feel that all people are equal before the law, so we have to define it. I am one of those who feels that we should be big enough to have all people equal before the law. But that is another thing.

Spending power is a grave concern to the provinces. Why are we not talking about it? We have not talked about it since Meech failed. Why are we not talking?

Some witnesses said: "start talking". Do two stages. Start talking about what we can present to Quebec and then bring Quebec back to the table. We heard that from Mr. Pennicott in the Yukon. We heard it from other witnesses.

We also need to look at the distribution of powers. The Prime Minister mentions in the Speech from the Throne educational standards across Canada. Is he opening the way to talk about division of powers? Well, if he is, why are we not talking about it now, publicly, to see if there is not a need for a uniform standard in nine provinces of Canada of an education system respecting at all times the rights of Quebecers to their education system.

What about the aboriginal people? I have been in and out of this Chamber, by election, a number of times. It is more than time to start recognizing that they have certain rights that are inherent by virtue of having been in Canada before we came here. It is time for us, as Canadians, as politicians to put it out. We have all summer to talk about it. We have all of June. I do not see why we have to go by deadlines, particularly when it is so important to Canada that we stay together.

I could talk about the Senate. They have a majority. They appointed a majority over there. Change the Senate with your majority. Let us get down to work.

This week I was pleased to hear the member for South Shore talk about the concerns of Nova Scotians. It was a first. I was pleased and I agreed with everything he said. I would hope that if it came to a vote that he would vote with me or I would vote with him. For once in my life in Parliament we would have the same concerns for an area. This Parliament is outdated and it is a waste of effort sometimes. No wonder we are not respected by an awful lot of Canadians for not being able to sit down and tackle it.

The last thing I want to say, because my time is going, is on the economy and the competitiveness that was talked about. It was with a mixture of anger and disbelief that I read the pat on the back the government gave itself on the economy and the competitiveness in the Speech from the Throne. I am sure that the 1.4 million Canadians who are currently out of work because of the government's made–in–Canada recession had a similar response.

This government has systematically wrecked our economy and undermined our competitiveness with every decision it has taken in the past three years.

The truckers in Ontario today are a prime example. We have no VIA Rail. We have no railroad and it is doing away with the trucks. We cannot be competitive because of what? The government has jacked up interest rates to a point where there is an unprecedented spread between Canadian rates and those of our chief trading partner, the United States. There is 4 percentage points. It is forcing our businesses to pay more for capital than their chief competitors south of the border and undermining our competitive position.

It has pegged the Canadian dollar at an artificially high level in American dollars. For the year to date, it has averaged 85.7 cents U.S. This is a break with our tradition of letting it float to whatever value is justified by the realities of the Canadian economy.

This has discouraged our exports into the American markets and undermined our competitiveness. I can speak for an area that has fish and because of our interest rates and our high Canadian dollar, it is expensive to send into the U.S.

In passing, I would like to say that if it ever should come out that there was an agreement between this government and the United States under the free trade agreement to prop up the Canadian dollar to make it that high, I would hope that there would not be a Canada, if there are any Canadians left by the time this government is through with Canada, who would ever vote for them again.

It has implemented an offensive new tax, the GST. That is devastating our border communities. Even before the tax was brought into effect this year, the government knew that the GST would raise the price of Canadian goods and services an average of 3.8 per cent over those being sold in the United States.

The government also knew that the cross–border shopping trips would increase by 2 million per year, solely as a result of the GST.

Remember that 80 per cent of the Canadian population lives within only 200 miles of the American border, easy driving distance. I simply cannot understand why the government went ahead with a tax that so severely undermines our competitiveness. On that only, we hear from them that we need to have production costs that are equal to the United States.

When this government puts our interest rates at the same level as the United States, when our dollar is not pegged as it should be today for our exports, and when our taxes, GST or our personal taxes are at the same level as the United States, then maybe the costs of production in Canada might be able to come down to the same level as in the United States, and we might stop blaming the Canadian labour people for what this government has achieved in one final swoop with its economic policies.

I tell you, it may be hurting somebody over there, but he will have a chance to ask a question if he wants.

I cannot put the blame on people for this government's free trade agreement, a free trade agreement that it now wants to expand to include Mexico, where there are even cheaper production costs when we cannot compete with the United States under it because of the economic policies of this minister.

I can only say that Canada is a great country. If the people over there are hurting a little bit, maybe they should start to influence their government. Maybe if they influenced their government and spoke up in their caucus, we would not have the high interests rates that we have had that created this recession. We would have our exports going fairly into the United States. We cannot even finish our fish because the policy of this government on fish has been three ministers in less than two–and–a–half years. How can you have any policy for fish when you have a new minister every nine months. Heavens, if they created anything in the nine months I would be happy, but they have not created anything. They had to be replaced.

I am looking forward to seeing this new minister, because he has, I am sure, long experience and has been a minister of fisheries in the past. They have resurrected the minister and I hope that by his resurrection he will have a new policy.

I do think that unless there are backbenchers who in caucus will start to talk about their economic needs in their regions, we will not have anything left. Certainly the Canadian public, the polls, everybody is telling them to change their economic outlook in Canada and let us begin to prosper.

We do not need to see truckers having their jobs done away with across the country. We do not have any rail. We are not going to have any trucks in the east. I do not know what we are going to have at the end of it. I can certainly say that at the rate this government is going, we are not going to have much.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I do take exception to a number of things the member has stated, but there is one thing on which we do agree, and that is that we do have a great country.

Obviously, to maintain a great country, you have to respond to changes that the modern world is demanding. I know the hon. member takes exception to that because change is always difficult. The difficulty in our position is simply that we are a government that takes its responsibilities seriously and if to meet the demands of the world marketplace we have to change, we are going to change. It is never easy. The result of that is simply that we are low in the polls, because change is never easy.

Again, the hon. member is going through that old bag of Liberal philosophy, the one they have tagged and carried along with them since 1987–88.

Every sparrow that falls they blame on this government and our trade agreement. What she chooses to ignore is simply this. The last figures coming out of Canada–U.S. trade indicates that we are winning, that we have a $16 billion to $17 billion trade surplus. It means despite what the member states, we are doing a number of things right.

The hon. member wants to concentrate on the negative, and that is fine, but let us take a look at the big picture. In Canada, the trade agreement is working to our benefit. If you want to look at isolated statistics in relation to unemployment, unemployment in the United States is 10 times higher than ours. Do they blame that on the trade agreement with Canada? Of course not.

There are other factors involved there, mainly a downturn in the western economy. We are part of that western economy. We cannot ignore that. We cannot bury our heads in the sand.

The hon. member also moved into an area of particular concern to me. It is the relation to cross–border shopping. No one ignores the fact that we have a problem in that regard. Again, in a province as small as the one that I represent, the province of New Brunswick, in the big picture we do very well.

The member again chooses to ignore that statistic. The province of New Brunswick has a $600 million trade surplus with the state of Maine despite all the cross–border shopping that takes place.

She chooses to ignore that very figure and takes a look at the Canadian dollar. The Canadian dollar is simply a reflection of the strength of the Canadian economy. Any economist will tell you that.

It simply means that the other countries of the world have confidence in us as a nation. If they did not believe in us, we would have a 50 cent dollar. That is the difference between our philosophy and their philosophy. For years, they wanted to prop themselves up with a weak Canadian dollar.

In the long term, that is not the answer. The long–term answer is we have to be competitive. If we are competitive and we are doing the things that are necessary to maintain a strong and healthy Canadian economy, the result is you are going to have a strong Canadian dollar.

I, for one, if I was in the exporting business, would love to have a weak Canadian dollar, but there is a price that is paid for that, a price that you pay for a weak dollar. The hon. member knows very well what it is, because she has an understanding of economics which is sometimes clouded by the political party that she represents.

We are doing very well in the international marketplace, and I do not want the member to distort the big picture. She is very effective at distorting the big picture when she chooses to do so, although on an individual basis she starts out very well.

I think she is reflecting her own sense of where she is and what is going on. When she gets into the big black cloud that sort of looms over her party, she falls into that same trap that they have entrapped themselves in, not going beyond that.

We, as a party, will go beyond that. We will make the tough decisions that are going to be good for all Canadians in the long haul.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not know if there was a question, but if the hon. member would like to rebut.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say to the hon. member that I do not think I distort any facts.

We can all have our party policies, and whatever. What I was bringing out was that there are production costs that this government has control over and has had control over. One is the interest rate. One is the Canadian dollar and one is certainly the level of taxes.

The GST could not have come at a worse time. I think it was in The Financial Times or somebody in the paper the other day who said: "If the free trade agreement was good policy, it was the wrong time, and if the GST is supposed to be so good, why was it brought in at the wrong time as well?"

I can say that I am glad that the GST is going to pay off the deficit. I ask only: What has the government done with all the money that it has collected since January? It still has not introduced a bill since the budget came out in February showing that it is going to put on the deficit. Is it that strapped that it has to keep going with the GST to run the government? It could make some other decisions like believe the commissions that it has set up for millions of dollars, believe what people are saying to those commissions and start looking at the problem right now of keeping Canada together so we can get down to the basics of the economy.

The only other thing I would say is, yes, Canada is an exporter. I have known that all my life. Therefore, we need a low dollar right now in order to get our exports up and to get the economy going. If the member does not understand that, I do not know what else I can say.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it was an excellent speech, I think, in response to the Speech from the Throne from this 15 per cent government. I found it very interesting that the member dwelt on the question of the contradiction between the government's announced policies and its actions when it comes to making Canada and Canadians more competitive.

In my constituency, which encompasses the northern half of Saskatchewan, we are certainly in a situation where there are policy changes needed in order to make that constituency and those constituents more competitive.

What I am talking about is some of the investments that this government is prepared to make in people. Certainly the government member who spoke is correct in saying we have to be ready for changing times, new times, the technology of today and so forth.

However, what is the record of this government? It talks in the throne speech about creating a learning society, about support for education and so on, but what has it done? It has withdrawn completely from adult basic education. With regard to its literacy program, in many cases, the vast majority of funds are spent on receptions, television shows and so on. CJS funding has been cut. Funding for post-secondary education has been cut.

At the same time, there are literally thousands of parents in my constituency who are not able to take advantage of work opportunities or education opportunities because of the lack of child care. It is a very, very real need. People cannot participate in this economy. They cannot get ahead. They cannot make themselves more competitive or more productive because there is no proper child care system brought forward by this government in spite of numerous promises to do so.

I would like to ask the member to comment on how Canada and Canadians can become more productive when government policies keep them from becoming so.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with the hon. member's question on that point because I had to leave that out in my text. One always has more to say, and most politicians do, than they can get on the record.

I would say that this government has cut secondary funding to the provinces consistently since I have been back. As you cut secondary funding, you are hurting the education system and the training necessary. I will go to the day care in a minute. I would just say that my figures show that illiteracy in Canada is around 20 per cent and going up. I would even go higher than that, but I do not have that particular statistic here.

An hon. member: It is higher than that.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): It is higher than that? Well, it is 20 per cent, at least in my area where I have a very active and very good illiteracy council. It has statistics. What scares me about that statistic and should scare the minister and should scare others in this House is that as our population becomes less educated and unable to read, it will be a real cost of production. I think it is scary that that number has grown and it has grown in this government's time. At the same time, it has cut educational programs and training.

I look at the developing countries and their percentages are far lower for illiteracy than ours because they put their priorities on education. If you have an educated work force, you will be able to produce.

• (1750)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but her time has expired.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate today in the throne speech debate. This new session of Parliament signals a new beginning, a new determination by this government to take the steps necessary to help Canada and all Canadians to face the challenges of the future.

There are some disturbing realities that face us as a nation, and as citizens of the world, in this first year of the last decade of the last century of this millennium. The list is daunting; the future of Canada as a confederation, the state of the environment, the ability of the economy to continue to generate growth and jobs, the plight of children in poverty. And what makes many of these realities so disturbing is that they in themselves compromise our ability to deal with the challenges and the changes that are confronting us.

We are constantly assailed with mountains of news and information, and yet 40 per cent of Canadians cannot read a daily newspaper. We worry about our farmers having too much product and not enough markets, while untold millions of people are facing starvation in places like Iraq, Bangladesh, Ethiopia and Sudan. We worry about the quality of the education that our children are receiving, while the job market is changing so fast that some of the professions they are training for will have disappeared by the time they are out of school.

There is an old adage that the only constant in the world is change. It sounds trite, but its truth is all around for us to see. And it is also true that those who know how to deal with and adapt to change will ride the crest of the wave of history, and those who do not will be swept along by the tide against their wills. We have no choice but to adapt to change, but we do have a choice about whether we make it work for us.

What this means is that change should not be feared, it should be welcomed. If we can make it work for us instead of against us, we can make Canada a more prosperous, more progressive, and more unified country. It is not so much the changes that we make, but the way that we make them, that give us the opportunities to move ahead.

You will remember that one of the themes of the last federal election campaign was about managing change. Candidates of both the Progressive Conservative and the Liberal parties used the phrase. It was a favourite of the pollsters for quite a while. Personally, it always made me think of a child putting his or her quarters and dimes into a piggy bank. However ridiculous the phrase, there is an important concept behind it. People are quite rightly afraid of change, or at least the implications of change, but they are also realistic about the fact that it is inevitable and part of life.

They know that promises of some to stop change, or to turn the clock back to a simpler time, are just insulting to their intelligence. To quote Derek Burney, our Ambassador to the United States, "Stop the world, I want to get off", may be a comforting slogan for some, but it does not offer a very promising trip.

At the same time, we must recognize that our society has a finite capacity to accept radical change. Conservatism is a trait deeply ingrained in Canadians. We are suspicious about bold new policies that promise to solve all of our problems overnight. We are especially suspicious of bold new policies offered up by governments, and rightly so. We remember the National Energy Program and Allan MacEachen's 1982 budget. We know that they are still paying for those mistakes, in lost economic opportunities and higher debt servicing costs.

The signs of too much change, too fast, can be disturbing. We see it in the rise in unemployment and plant closings, and in lost international markets for our products. We also see it in growing racial intolerance in our cities, and in the rising violence against women and children. It is reflected in questions about our immigration policies, about the size and effect of the national debt, about the ability of the Canadian confederation to cope with the aspirations of Quebec and the west.

Therefore, we must recognize the finite capacity of the Canadian economy and society to adapt to change. It is the duty of the government and of this House to propose and consider the means to increase our capacity to adapt to change. In this way we can ensure that change becomes an accepted part of life, not something to be feared.

This means that all Canadians should become more aware of the challenges that we are all facing together, and more aware of our collective strengths and skills. This means that we must be more tolerant of each other, less afraid of each other, less violent toward each other. A change in peoples' attitudes toward other languages, other cultures and other races will not happen overnight, but there are important steps that can be taken soon, that will contribute to changed attitudes.

We can take steps toward making the workforce more skilled and flexible and therefore more secure and prosperous. We can take steps toward developing a literate and numerate population more receptive to new ideas. We can take steps toward making sure that our children are healthy, well nourished and well cared for and therefore ready to embrace the challenges that the next century holds in store for them.

Canadians want to make sure that they can individually and collectively adjust to the changes that they are facing. They want to be able to adjust, they want to be able to take advantage of new opportunities. In other words, they may be conservative, but they are also progressive.

What is even more important than the decisions we make as a government and as a Parliament is how we make them. People will no longer accept decisions made behind closed doors. They want to be part of the decision-making process. The process must be open, consultative and co-operative; it must rise above petty partisanship or narrow self-interest.

It must also be realistic and workable. It cannot be possible for the entire process to be derailed by a single individual or group with their own agenda. It is far easier to say no and to ignore the consequences than it is to participate in the process that finds the way to say yes.

The challenge we face is to find a way to get more people involved in the process, to make more people involved in the quest to find a solution acceptable to as broad a spectrum as possible, to make our democratic system work better.

Therefore, I see the challenge that we face in this session of Parliament as threefold. First, we must recognize the real limits of the capacity of Canada and Canadians to deal with change. Second, we must pursue policies that will work to expand these limits. Third, we must pursue these policies in a more open and more democratic way.

What does this mean in practical terms? Let me talk about one of the most pressing and tragic issues facing Canada today, one that concerns me greatly.

At least one in every ten women in Canada is battered by her male partner. A million women in Canada are battered weekly. Half of all women murdered each year die at the hands of their partners. The prevalence of such violence in Canada is nothing less than shocking. Some say that this violence is increasing as the advances made by women in society triggers a backlash, while others claim that the abuse women suffer at the hands of men is simply part of the uneven distribution of power in society.

The challenge for everyone involved in the issue is to find a way of preventing the violence from occurring in the first place, by changing deep-seated attitudes. We in this House can change laws in a matter of months but attitudes, values and behaviour can take far longer to change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret, I have to interrupt the hon. member. She will have 10 minutes remaining in her speech, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

Before I get into the late show, the Chair would like to remind hon. members that pursuant to Standing Order 38 as amended, which came into effect at the beginning of the session, the time available for each matter raised during in the adjournment proceeding is now six minutes. The member raising the matter may speak for up to four minutes and the time available for reply is two minutes.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1800)

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, in Canada, the trucking industry employs approximately 500,000 Canadians. It generates about 12 billion dollars annually, and is an important industry in our country.

Last Friday, I was very disappointed to learn that Glengarry Transport, better known as GTL in our region, went bankrupt. About 1,794 employees were left without a job. No more jobs in an industry and in a community that certainly needed good jobs like the ones GTL provided.

Mr. Speaker, the jobs at GTL were certainly good jobs for my constituents, but they were more than that. In my town, when we saw the name "Glengarry" or "GTL" painted in yellow on the trucks, all the residents of Glengarry were rightfully proud. GTL was founded in 1948 by Mr. Lefebvre and today, or at least until last Friday, the company was still operated by his sons. Until 1988, the company had never lost any money. Forty consecutive years of profit. All of a sudden, in 1988, there was deregulation and since then, losses.

[English]

It is more than a coincidence, 40 years of regulations, 40 years of profits; three years of deregulation, three years of huge losses at GTL.

[Translation]

If members opposite or others think this situation might be exclusive to GTL, that there might have been some mismanagement, they should look further. They should look, for example, at Kingsway Transport, a leading transport company in Canada, which is now for sale. The owners of Federal Industries want to get rid of the business because it is losing money.

If people think this situation is exclusive to these two large companies, they should go outside today and see the, independent truckers who, are also facing the same problems.

On April 29, I wrote to the new Minister of Transport asking for his help not only for GTL, but also for all the workers in the Canadian transport industry.

Last week, on Thursday I had the honor of meeting with the Minister of State (Transport) and, accompanied by Mr. Gilles Lefebvre from GTL (Transport), I made representations to him. I told him why GTL was at its very end. At that time, I had no idea the company would go bankrupt 24 hours later.

So, Mr. Speaker, today we are in the House and the government must do whatever it can to help the transport industry in general, but particularly the GTL workers who have lost their jobs. At this very minute, I have just been told that all attempts to reorganize the company have failed. So, it is sure and final now, and early today, GTL had to shut down.

[English]

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his notice of the question and the concern that he has so eloquently expressed on behalf of his constituents.

I think the member would like me to set the record straight. This government has been listening to the truckers. Last year the former Minister of Transport initiated dialogue with the truckers. There is not now nor has there ever been any disagreement about the fact that truckers are facing difficult times. The minister has been most sympathetic about the difficulties the truckers are facing.

What we have had to say though is that there is no quick fix here. As the minister has said in the House and in the meetings he has held is that he is willing to work with the truckers.

The minister has shown his good faith. This morning he met for an hour and a half with the truckers who are parked on Wellington Street and who have been on Parliament Hill this week. The minister has arranged a further meeting today between the truckers and his officials. He met yesterday afternoon with the wives of the truckers. He met the day before with the coalition, and he is scheduled next week to meet with the Canadian Trucking Association.

There is another point that must be made here, which is to point out the very large provincial involvement in this issue. I am not pointing fingers, I am really stating facts. The provincial fuel tax question, particularly in Ontario, must be recognized.

Last, I want to make it clear that we have been working very hard for many weeks and months. We will continue to work hard with all the parties; the truckers, our provincial colleagues, the unions and shippers. I hope we made it clear that we are involved and will stay involved.

DISASTERS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, this is a follow-up to my question to the Prime Minister on Tuesday concerning the Air-India disaster.

Last Friday, Inderjit Singh Reyat was convicted of manslaughter in the 1985 bombing which took place at Narita airport in Japan. That particular incident and the Air-India disaster took place 54 minutes apart.

In the Air-India disaster on June 23, 1985, 329 people were killed, 280 of whom were Canadians. There were 80 children on board. It was the biggest mass murder in Canadian history.

Over the course of the last six years I have pressed this government for a royal commission of inquiry into this particular disaster. The government has continued to come up with excuses one after another.

One of the excuses it continued to use was that there were criminal proceedings ongoing into the related Narita bombing. Those criminal proceedings are now over. A conviction has been secured.

Another excuse this government has been giving is that there were civil proceedings ongoing. The families of the victims have sued Air-India, the Government of Canada and others. Those civil proceedings are all settled and the Government of Canada contributed to the settlement which would indicate some type of responsibility on its part.

The criminal investigation into the Air-India disaster has reached a dead end. The Government of Canada and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police know who did it, yet they do not have the evidence in order to convict the person or persons who committed this horrendous and hideous crime.

A royal commission of inquiry is absolutely essential in order to assist in the criminal investigation. It is also essential in order to determine the role that the Government of Canada played in this particular matter, the role of the security intelligence service and the role of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

There have been allegations that the Government of Canada received advance warning before the bomb went off on June 23, 1985. We know about erased tapes. We know about false affidavits. We know about CSIS bungling. We know about RCMP bungling. Yet the government refuses a royal commission of inquiry.

I suspect it is because of the embarrassment that a royal commission of inquiry will cause. I would like to remind the House in closing that when it came to the conduct of Sinclair Stevens—we all remember Sinclair Stevens, who was a former Conservative cabinet minister—the government was quick to call a royal commission of inquiry.

It cost the taxpayers of Canada $5 million in order to conduct that inquiry. The taxpayers of Canada paid Mr. Stevens' legal fees in the amount of $500,000. Now we are dealing with the biggest mass murder ever in history of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for his question because it is one that has been of interest to me and to my constituents as well.

• (1810)

Mr. Speaker, together with all Canadians, I share the hon. member's desire to find satisfactory answers to the terrible tragedy which occurred off the coast of Ireland in the summer of 1985.

The continuation of the police investigation into this matter is the appropriate response and one which requires our full support. I can assure the member that the downing of the Air-India flight 182 on June 23, 1985 is still under active investigation by the RCMP and all investigative leads are being vigorously pursued.

I point, for example, to plans now being made to send four RCMP investigators, an RCMP laboratory expert and a Transportation Safety Board of Canada expert to the Air-India crash site in the North Atlantic, 110 miles off Cork, Ireland.

This significant undertaking will commence in early July and will take up to one month to complete. The purpose of this endeavour is to recover certain wreckage which will further the ongoing RCMP investigation.

In the summer of 1989, an RCMP expedition successfully raised pieces from the plane's debris from the ocean floor. This summer, the RCMP team will work at the crash site from a vessel fitted with a remote operated vehicle capable of working in 5,000 metres of water. The wreckage of the downed Air-India aircraft is located at a depth of about 2,000 metres.

Any items of wreckage recovered will be shipped back to Canada for detailed forensic examination and analysis. The recovery operation planned for this summer is but one step in a continuing RCMP investigation.

In my view, it is essential that the RCMP continue in an unimpeded fashion its exploration of all possible avenues of this most important investigation.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, when my great grandparents came to Canada in 1884, they built their own home in Toronto on Broadview Avenue, across from Riverdale Park. They were homeowners. My grandparents after them were homeowners. My parents were homeowners and when I was growing up, like you, Mr. Speaker, I just assumed that one day I too would be a homeowner.

Today, fortunately, my wife and I are homeowners. Home ownership is the cornerstone of this country. It is the dream of most Canadians. Fortunately, in Canada, we have one of the highest rates of home ownership in the world; some 62 per cent of Canadian households are home owners.

But today, young Canadians are asking themselves if they will ever having the opportunity to be homeowners. The Prime Minister alluded to that yesterday when he said that our children may be the first generation of Canadians to be worse off than their parents.

That is why we have to break down some of the barriers to home ownership. What are those barriers? We have barriers like high housing prices; we have zoning that discourages the construction of affordable housing; we have high interest rates for mortgages; we have a lack of confidence in our future employment, and we have high down payments.

A lot of those things we cannot do anything about, but we can do something about the high down payments, because presently, if you have a down payment of 25 per cent or more there is no problem. You can get a mortgage, no problem at all. If you have a down payment somewhere between 10 per cent and 25 per cent, then the mortgage lender requires mortgage insurance and that is the only way that you could get a mortgage. If you have a down payment of less than 10 per cent, no way, you cannot get mortgage insurance, you cannot get a mortgage at all.

The government housing agency, CMHC, has estimated however that if we dropped homeowner downpayments to 5 per cent, with a 95 per cent mortgage insurance, we could ensure that up to 200,000 additional households across this country could become home owners.

Why do we not do that? When interest rates were going up, I was told that would to stimulate demand and send the wrong message. But now, as you know, interest rates are going down. In fact, in addition to that we have double digit unemployment, 15.5 per cent more unemployment in the construction trades than we had a year ago, prices are down, and surely now it is an ideal time to lower down payments and allow more people to be home owners.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have often asked the opposition for its ideas as to how to create jobs, but at the same time not increase the deficit and the national debt. Well, this will do it.

At the same time as increasing home ownership and increasing employment, however, it is also going to help young Canadians to realize their dream of home ownership.

My Progressive Conservative Party wants to encourage home ownership. What does your Progressive Conservative Party want to do, Mr. Minister?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank, on behalf of the Minister for Housing, my colleague Alan Redway for his suggestion about creating jobs in construction by lowering the down payment on a home to 5 per cent.

[English]

Canada is a nation of homeowners. In fact, Canadians enjoy one of the highest rates of home ownership in the world, about 62 per cent over all.

[Translation]

The best way to create jobs and help people become homeowners is to build a strong economy. To that end, we need low interest rates and moderate inflation. If we achieve that, business and consumers will regain confidence in the economy.

That is the approach this government has chosen. Interest rates have gone down five points in the last eleven months, and inflation is stable.

[English]

Business confidence is rising. There is good news for the residential construction industry and future home buyers. Yesterday, the Canadian Real Estate Association reported sales of existing housing across the country soared over 66 per cent since this time last year.

In my riding of Manicouagan, several millions of dollars in loans were insured by CMHC in 1990.

The opportunity to own a home is an important value in Canada. Home ownership encourages stable communities and helps individuals and families build equity for the future.

[Translation]

Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is presently considering various ways to help Canadians buy their own homes. One way would be a mortgage insurance for people who can only afford a down payment of 5 per cent. This insurance would be guaranteed by the government.

[English]

CMHC studies estimate that by reducing down payments to 5 per cent, it would allow up to 200,000 Canadian renters a reasonable opportunity for home ownership. Of these, there could some 10,000 potential first-time homeowners in the first year.

[Translation]

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we want to help home buyers, and this is my answer to the hon. member.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, I asked a question of the Minister of Immigration and it bears repeating. It concerns the Al-Mashat case. I asked very simply:

> Why did this former mouthpiece for Saddam Hussein get preferential treatment at the expense of ordinary people waiting patiently? Why was he allowed to jump the queue?

The minister did not answer.

Canadians know that there are rules and that for every rule, there is an exception. Canadians also know that ministers are the custodians of the public trust and they are expected to implement and respect the rules and to explain and justify the exceptions.

Let us look at this case. On Wednesday, February 27, External Affairs is advised that Mr. Al-Mashat wishes to defect. The next day, Thursday, the defector committee meets and rejects his application as a defector. The next day, Friday, the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service conducts its first inquiries. Canadians are asked to believe that the defector committee did not think it important enough to advise the minister that Al-Mashat had been rejected.

Canadians are asked to believe that CSIS found the former ambassador not to be a valuable source of intelligence. Canadians are asked to believe that no one at CSIS thought it important enough to advise the minister.

On Tuesday, March 5, the Al-Mashats are interviewed. Who interviewed them? Who suggested to them that they apply as retirees, a class that the minister of immigration had announced was being phased out and which, in fact, will disappear June 30.

Canadians are asked to believe that officials in Vienna did not think this man important enough to advise our ambassador in Vienna.

On Thursday, March 7, the Al-Mashats had their second interview and are given provisional acceptance, two days after their first interview.

On March 8, a memorandum is sent to the Secretary of State for External Affairs explaining the situation. Canadians are asked to believe that the memo was not brought to the external affairs minister's attention. On March 11, senior immigration officials are so concerned that they call external affairs and Mr. Paul Tellier, Clerk of the Privy Council, to insist that the application not be fast-tracked. Canadians are asked to believe that these senior officials did not, despite their concern, alert their own minister.

March 28, landed immigrant status is granted to the Al-Mashats, 28 days from start to finish, including interviews, medical clearances and CSIS security checks for a man that CSIS found not to be a valued source of intelligence. That process for ordinary people takes, at best, 12 to 18 months and, more usually, two to three years. But for him, 28 days and no minister knows about it.

I ask again: Why was this man given preferential treatment? Canadians have the right to know.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in response to this question, the reason why Dr. Al-Mashat's immigration application was processed quickly has already been addressed in a report by the Deputy Ministers of Employment and Immigration and External Affairs. This report, which was made public on May 14, 1991, is based on the findings of an extensive inquiry into the circumstances under which Dr. Al-Mashat was granted admission to Canada.

This afternoon, the Secretary of State for External Affairs confirmed on several occasions the willingness of ministers to appear before a parliamentary committee together with officials concerned to respond to questions on this matter. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has stated in the House that there is no need to table any document related to Dr. Al-Mashat's admission to Canada. The report by the Deputy Ministers of Employment and Immigration and External Affairs released on May 14, 1991, clearly outline the circumstances of Dr. Al-Mashat's case.

This government has acted openly and responsibly on this issue, and will continue to do so.

HEALTH AND WELFARE, SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SENIORS AND THE STATUS OF WOMEN

REINSTATEMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the second motion deals with the health and welfare committee and is as follows:

That the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women as it existed on the last day of the Second Session of the present Parliament be reinstated for the sole purpose of completing its report on the health care system in Canada and its funding, such reconstituted committee being a separate and distinct entity from the standing committee of the same name as listed in Standing Order 104.

For the purpose of this order, the Standing Orders relating to the committee in effect at the end of the Second Session of the present Parliament continue to apply.

That the evidence adduced by the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women in the Second Session of the present Parliament, be deemed to have been referred to the committee.

That all motions and orders adopted by the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women in the Second Session of the present Parliament, necessary for the completion of its report be deemed to have been adopted by the committee in the present session.

That this committee hereby appointed table its report to the House no later than June 1, 1991, and that upon tabling of the report, the committee shall cease to exist.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I have written to the chair of the health and welfare committee that, in doing its study on health care in Canada and its funding, it give serious consideration to how medical devices in Canada and research on medicine is done by the Ministry of Health and Welfare. I would hope the committee would take that into consideration in its deliberations.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I hear the representation of the hon. member. However, I would suspect it would probably be better dealt with in the new health committee that will be formed as soon as the Whips have completed their work and are able to report their striking committee report to the House.

Ms. Langan: I thank the hon. member for his comments and I do believe that would be a good topic for the new committee when it is struck. But if the new committee is looking at health care in Canada and its funding, I think it is very important that this question be looked at by the committee as part of the whole question. I would ask them to at least consider it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not understand if the hon. member is withholding consent for the motion to be approved at this time.

The motion has been heard and has been adopted.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE AND ELECTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am sorry, I have a couple more to go.

I move:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections as it existed on the last day of the Second Session of the present Parliament be reinstated for the sole purpose of completing its report on the question raised by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River regarding the release of certain documents by the Solicitor General of Canada.

That the evidence adduced by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in the Second Session of the present Parliament be deemed to have been referred to the committee.

That all motions and orders adopted by the said Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in the said Second Session necessary for completion of its report be deemed to have been adopted by the committee in the present session, and that upon presentation of its report to the House, the committee cease to exist.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE PROCESS FOR AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I believe this is the last one:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours with the fact that the House of Commons does unite with the Senate in the reconstitution of the Special Joint Committee on the Process for amending the Constitution of Canada that existed in the Second Session of the present Parliament with all the same powers and conditions contained in the Order of Reference dated December 17, 1990.

That the membership of the House of Commons on the committee be the same membership as on the last day of the Second Session of the present Parliament.

That the evidence adduced by the Special Joint Committee on the Process for amending the Constitution of Canada in the Second Session of the present Parliament be deemed to have been referred to a Special Committee hereby appointed;

That the portion of the budget of the Special Committee on the Process for amending the Constitution of Canada not expended during the Second Session of the present Parliament be deemed to constitute the entire budget of the Special Committee hereby appointed, unless a supplementary budget is approved by the Board of Internal Economy;

That all contracts entered into by the Special Joint Committee on the Process for amending the Constitution of Canada during the Second Session of the present Parliament be deemed contracts for the Special Committee hereby appointed and be deemed to be in force, unless the Special Committee hereby appointed orders otherwise;

That all motions and orders adopted by the Special Joint Committee on the Process for amending the Constitution of Canada during the Second Session of the present Parliament be deemed to have been adopted by the Special Committee hereby appointed, unless it otherwise orders.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West) moved:

That this House condemns the government for undermining the Canadian trucking industry through an irresponsible approach to deregulation, taxation, and Canada—U.S. trade, and;

That this House calls upon the government to introduce immediate measures to permit Canadian truckers to compete on a level playing field with their American counterparts.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased on behalf of my Liberal colleagues in the House of Commons today to make the subject of our opposition day motion the crisis facing the Canadian trucking industry, an industry that in terms of federal responsibility was placed on a very slippery slope in 1988 when the government, the national Conservative government, deregulated the trucking industry. Since then Canadian trucking firms have had to protest without any success, have had to urge blockades to try to get the attention of the government and, this week, those truckers have brought their concerns to Ottawa and have parked themselves in front of the Eternal Flame on Parliament Hill.

On Monday our Liberal caucus met those truckers and met the spouses and the children of those truckers to try to give them at least a forum for venting their frustrations that have come to the fore. We, through the parliamentary opportunities granted to us in Question Period, have tried to raise those concerns. We have also petitioned the Speaker for an emergency debate which was regrettably turned down.

Therefore we have gone the extra distance of dedicating this day for the concerns facing the national trucking industry in Canada.

Our concern did not start this week. Our concern has certainly been voiced in terms of the deregulated mode that the government is introducing in the transport sector, not only in trucking but elsewhere. Not only have members of Parliament met Canadian truckers in Ottawa, but members of the Liberal caucus have met with those trucking companies and representatives in major cities in Ontario and elsewhere. Members of Parliament from Windsor West, Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Essex—Kent, Haldimand—Norfolk, the riding of Kent, Lambton—Middlesex, Willowdale, and Prince Edward—Hastings, just to name a few, and others have confronted the concerns of those Canadians.

Deregulation, 1988. To try to make the Canadian industry more competitive, to try to inject competition and efficiency, the government opened the doors of deregulation, and thereby allowed market forces to clearly dominate. Before deregulation, an American trucking firm had to prove that there was indeed a market requirement for that firm to do the hauling, given the fact that Canadian firms were not doing it. It could be appealed by Canadian interests so that if the market between Buffalo and Toronto was saturated, then for all intents and purposes that American firm would not be permitted in that saturated market.

Under deregulation, that market and those doors have been fully opened, and that has meant that American firms have had the license to freely come into our market and compete head to head. It has meant that in 1986, before deregulation, in the province of Ontario there were 500 trucking carriers trying to deal with a $2 billion freight business.

After deregulation there are 3,000 truckers after the same pie, and therefore the survival of the fittest has become the rules of the game. Since deregulation there have been almost a thousand companies—600 last year alone—that have gone belly up and have gone under and are not returning.

This is not a small industry. It is an industry which employs directly over 600,000 Canadians, with indirect spin-offs. I would suggest to the minister, with regard to the seven famous studies, that the time for study ought to have been before the flood gates were opened, before the deregulated barn door was thrown open, to ascertain what the down sides and the up sides would be under deregulation. The deregulatory doors were opened and then the consequences were studied.

The government deregulated, allowing American companies to come in freely, and it did so knowing full well the realities of the trucking market: Canadian truckers would be forced to operate at a 15 to 20 per cent cost disadvantage; American truckers could write off their trucks in four years, while in Canada that same write-off takes 13 years. American truckers can write off their licences, Canadian truckers cannot. Fuel prices are comparatively 20 cents per litre more in Canada than in the United States. Buying a new truck in the United States costs, on average, $70,000; in Canada $90,000. In addition, we have a high dollar and a high interest rate policy which further aggravate an already bad situation.

With the geographic nature of our country, it is very clear that the American trucking fraternity can penetrate most of our market very quickly and very easily through the cross borders. We simply cannot reciprocate because we would not be able to compete in the heartland of America and hit its far-flung markets. Our populations are sparse whereas those in the United States are certainly concentrated in greater numbers.

When we talk about buying tires, equipment and insurance, the Americans pay less. For example, to refit a set of tires on an average rig in the United States costs $2,500; in Canada, the same set of tires is $5,000. In Canada a tune-up for an average rig is double that of an American tune-up.

We have deregulation, then we have deregulation on a basis that the Canadian government knew exactly that the Canadian trucking company, unless it has an equalizer, unless it has an adjustment mechanism, would not be able to compete fairly and successfully head to head. Is it any wonder that those truckers, angered and frustrated with the economic realities of the marketplace, have parked their vans and trucks in front of Parliament Hill?

• (1020)

All that reflects the human face of the economic misery which is facing Canadian truckers. It is organized frustration of not only truckers but of other workers who have had enough of this government's policies. These policies are irresponsible and they are insensitive to the needs of Canadians. Canadian interests ought to be priority number one, not priority number two.

None of the Canadian trucking firms last year made sizeable profits. GTL, the fourth largest firm, whose head office is virtually next door in my colleague's riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, went under just last week.

In our meetings, we heard not only testimony from the drivers, but from their wives and children. They are hurting as well because spouses are being forced to take on two jobs to make ends meet at the end of the month because there is no money coming in. There are no jobs. There is no profit. There is no pride any more if the Canadian trucking industry is allowed to continue its slide down the slippery slope of deregulation.

Many wives told us in very emotional ways about the food rationing in their own families. They told us that many truckers do not have sick pay or holiday pay. When they take a day, it comes out of their wages. We met Dave Wallis, who before deregulation had seven rigs operating at profits.

Today, Dave Wallis has one truck left and he is on the verge of losing that last truck. Dave Wallis must pay $60 an hour to a mechanic to fix his rig but he can only get $30 an hour to haul the materials. How does a Dave Wallis survive? How long can Dave Wallis tread water?

The Dave Wallis is symptomatic. We need to talk about the Dave Wallis' of this country. Rather than hiding behind studies or generic terms, we need to discuss the impact on the average Canadian trucker. What is the impact on the average Canadian family in that business and in others?

It is not only a problem in the trucking industry. Talk about Open Skies. The government wants to deregulate the skies. Is it going to do to our air carriers what it has done to our truck carriers?

Why does the government not ask the Americans to take down the protectionist walls in shipping? The Americans refuse to compete in shipping. They know that our Canadian shipping industry can compete very well, thank you very much. Oh no. The Americans do not want to ruin their industry.

They put up a wall there, but they tell this Canadian government to bring down the walls on trucking and in your skies so we can compete and do a job on you.

I also want to mention that the infrastructure of VIA Rail has been gutted. It is not only an isolated case of the trucking fraternity. It is a mindset that has been applied to the trucking industry and to the rail industry. It is being applied, perhaps, in the few short months now that the government is negotiating Open Skies, to our air carriers.

I think that the transport industry in this country is not only important economically, but it has been a sense of pride and a sense of unity in terms of the development of this country.

While no one should be an ideologue or dogmatic, we should also protect, preserve and try to promote our own transport industries rather than giving them away.

I would suggest to the hon. minister—I appreciate and thank him—who listened to our appeals to at least meet with the visiting delegation. He has done so and he has met for the last day or day and a half with these owner-operator truckers, which he had not done before. I appreciate the fact that he has given his hours to try to mediate.

The time for throwing out the word "study" is over. There are seven studies under way that may not report until the end of the summer. Canadian truckers need a greater sense of hope because his predecessor, in Windsor last year when the truckers did the same blockade, basically raised the expectations of the trucking community. The predecessor to this minister said: "Do not worry. I will talk to the Minister of Finance. I will put in place reforms that will try to equalize the level playing field between the United States and Canada".

What has happened is precious little. Therefore, the expectations are high. The stakes are high. Those stakes have been raised by the government. Therefore, I urge the minister to be very cognizant of what his predecessors have put in motion.

His predecessor even said in a letter that he would not be prepared to wait until the final seven studies are in before taking action. I think that this minister ought not to simply study the issue to death while jobs are dying, families are struggling and hope is dwindling.

I am going to suggest to the minister nine options that our caucus and our party are prepared to put on the floor of the House of Commons today for debate. Nine options that, either in whole or in part, I believe and my caucus and my leader believes can, in fact, be the immediate remedy to some of the challenges facing truckers.

Option number one is a quicker write-off provision under Revenue Canada. I have mentioned that the United States truckers can write a percentage of their truck off in four years, whereas, the Canadian trucker by comparison takes 13 years. I would suggest that Revenue Canada permit the Canadian truckers to write off their rigs between four to seven years, therefore, cutting the depreciation time in half and bringing it up to speed with the American truckers. A truck costs a lot of money and, therefore, a quicker write-off period would put more dollars in the pockets of Canadian truckers. It would add to the cash flow and would allow the trucker some latitude and some flexibility to meet the hard times. The hard times are here now and, therefore, there is a greater sense of urgency for cash flow during a recessionary time. That assistance is needed now.

Option two is to take a look at the federal excise tax and offer some relief in terms of diesel fuel. The taxes are both provincial and federal. I will come to the provincial one. The federal tax is roughly four cents per litre. However, the federal government ought to recognize that where the inequities really begin is in the base price. Diesel fuel in the United States, before tax, is 18.6 cents a litre. In Canada it is 37.9 cents. After tax in the United States it is 27 cents per litre and in Canada, after tax, 59 cents.

What I am suggesting is that, in terms of the federal tax, the government can have three options. It can provide a temporary relief on payment of the federal excise tax until the industry is back on its fee. It can perhaps drop the excise tax by a cent or by a margin it feels would provide some leadership to the provincial transport ministers in the provinces to do likewise. This would show good faith and at the same time, of course, relieve the truckers from that.

Third, the government can also provide the truckers, as we do the farming community, with a subsidy on diesel fuel. Those are three possible options the government could implement to deal adequately and efficiently with the federal tax on diesel fuel.

Option number four relates to the GST. We believe the government should scrap the GST, period. However, it seems the government is going to persist with the GST. Therefore, we are suggesting, that the government drastically shorten the rebate period for Canadian truckers. Currently, truckers pay GST on fuel and then receive a rebate. It takes about six months. That period is far too long. Canadian truckers give money to the government, almost as a loan, and have to wait six months for their rebate. In that six month period, compared to their American competition, the American driver is ahead.

The period for the rebate should be considerably shorter than six months. On average, to fill up the tank of a diesel truck costs $250 more in Canada than it does in the United States. Every fill-up costs the Canadian trucker $250 more. If truckers received their rebate in a shorter period of time that money would assist greatly in their cash-flow.

The other option related to the GST is that the government should provide the truckers with a longer period of time to pay the GST on the goods they ship and collect from the shipper. The problem is that this government requires the Canadian trucker to submit the GST collected from the shipper within 45 days but the shipper does not pay the trucking company for 50, 60 or 90 days. This means that truckers have to pay the GST on the goods shipped and their invoices do not get paid for 90 days. We have again money going out of the pockets of Canadian truckers.

We are suggesting as option number four that the government try to equalize the lag so that the Canadian trucker is not out of pocket. As soon as those invoices are paid then the GST would be remitted. This gives a financial break, in terms of cash-flow, to Canadian truckers.

Option number five. We are suggesting that the government seriously consider allowing Canadian truckers to deduct their licence fees, their licence expenses. American truckers can deduct the licence fees from their taxes. Revenue Canada does not extend the same luxury to Canadian truckers. A licence fee, on average in Canada, costs $2,000. We are suggesting, therefore, to allow Canadian truckers, like the American trucking fraternity, to deduct those licence fees from their taxes.

Madam Speaker, you mentioned that I have a minute left. I seek the co-operation of the House to allow me to finish presenting my nine points so the government can respond.

Option number six. I would suggest that the federal Minister of Transport urgently convene a ministers' meeting of his provincial counterparts because, while there are two levels of government involved with trucking, there is one trucking constituency. That trucking constituency needs a coherent, co-ordinated and harmonized approach to deal with their problems. The federal government blames the NDP government of Ontario, and the NDP government, Premier Rae, blames the federal Conservative government. They are blaming each other and it is a great Ping-Pong game, but those truckers are still outside and still hurting.

We need an urgent meeting to co-ordinate our efforts and begin to deal with the problems head on.

Option number seven is to pursue a federal-provincial trade-off. What do I mean by that?

I am suggesting financial co-operation to ease the provincial tax portion, which is roughly 15 cents, a heavy burden, almost four times the federal tax. I believe that the federal government can encourage the provincial governments, of Ontario for example, to reduce the burden of their excise tax if it, for example, is flexible enough in terms of funding for infrastructure of roads.

In the United States, the national government pays roughly 20 to 25 per cent of road construction. In Canada the federal government pays 5 per cent and the majority is obviously paid by the provinces. The federal government should say: " If we consider increasing the moneys we will give to the provinces for construction of roads, will you, the provinces, give the truckers a bit of a break on the excise tax?" What the provinces lose from their fuel excise tax, they will gain in transfer payments from the federal government for construction of roads.

Perhaps Mr. Rae in Ontario would not levy 2 cents, as he did in his budget, and another 2 cents on January 1, 1992. That is exorbitant. I believe there can be a constructive give and take between the two levels of government to the advantage of the Canadian trucker.

Option number eight. Many American truckers and American trucks are now engaging in illegal cabotage. That is a fancy way of saying that instead of going from Buffalo to Toronto and back from Toronto to Buffalo, those truckers are going from Buffalo to Toronto, sneaking into Hamilton, perhaps London, and then back into Buffalo. Canadian truckers cannot compete as it is. We are going to be thrown off the road if American truckers continue to engage in illegal cabotage because we cannot compete with them.

Option number eight contains two subsections. First, a greater enforcement mechanism at our border crossings to ensure that our enforcements may in fact be enforced and American truckers know clearly that we will come down hard and very quickly. I would suggest that the penalty, when an American trucker is found doing illegal cabotage, be increased immediately from a $2,000 fine to a $5,000 fine. This represents a doubling and gives it a bit more teeth. If an American trucker wants to take a chance, he will pay stiffer penalties if he is caught. Hopefully, he will be caught at the border crossings because of stricter enforcement. We have jurisdiction at the border crossings.

Option number nine is a temporary moratorium on new interprovincial licences to try to stand back until this industry has caught its breath. Ontario has done that for its new licences. It does not solve the problem of the existing licences, but it certainly does not aggravate it to the nth degree. In interprovincial trucking the federal government has jurisdiction, so it can impose that moratorium if it wants.

Madam Speaker, I appreciate your flexibility and the flexibility of my colleagues on the other side. I have tried to be constructive. I have tried to give some facts on what deregulation has done, how uncompetitive we are head to head and third, to offer nine options which I believe, if enacted in whole or in part or in combination, will allow those truckers outside to enjoy this holiday weekend just a little more than they will if this government turns a deaf ear to their concern.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, I would also like to respond to what was said by the hon. member opposite. To hear him talk, he and his party have all the answers.

What often bothers me about the hon. member is that every time something happens on this side of the House in Ottawa, it is always because he recommended it. I have been watching the minister for the last few days, and I saw he managed to meet them and their families as well. I also met the truckers.

Madam Speaker, I used to work in the industry, and truckers really have problems. Those people outside really need help. I know them. I worked for them and with them, and I had the privilege of having them as customers. They are really in trouble.

My colleagues do not seem to realize what the situation is, and they seem to be proving it this morning. Fifteen years ago, we repaired trucks for these people. Believe it or not, some garages wouldn't do jobs for truckers because they couldn't pay the repair bills. That is a sad commentary, and these people certainly did not have an easy life.

I hardly think these people are here today because the situation has improved. In fact, they are getting the short end of the stick. There have been taxes, taxes and more taxes. They were taxed on diesel fuel, they were taxed on gas—they were taxed on just about everything.

There is another problem the hon. member forgot to mention. About five years ago, a company in my riding, owned by a good friend of mine, couldn't get insurance. He was paying $30,000 for a fleet of 20 trucks, and he was going to be charged $135,000 for going to the United States. He went to the United States because his company had business there.

And now with free trade, I thought he would keep going to the United States. But nothing has changed. So it isn't because of the GST. Fifteen years ago there was no GST. It isn't because of the GST, because five years ago the GST didn't exist. There was a tax on gas, but not as high as it is now. Unfortunately, provincial taxes don't only hurt truckers—and I said so when Quebec brought down its latest provincial budget—they also tend to aggravate other problems, because truckers transport goods— consumer goods. It isn't the GST. Here in Quebec, it's the GST plus the QST, plus this and that. But people tend to forget that.

Earlier, the hon. member said there are solutions. There is no miracle solution! Even if we remove the GST tomorrow morning, the truckers might get from Wellington to the next street over, but the problem would still be there. There is no miracle solution. The minister made this quite clear. What we need is a package of solutions.

The Liberal Party's solution is quite simple: forward, reverse, forward and reverse. You don't do that when you drive a truck. You have eighteen forward gears and one reverse. Madam Speaker, I used to work for a company that had 3,500 trucks to repair. But the problem was always the same. I used to say—do I have a few minutes left, Madam Speaker?

Madam Deputy Speaker: We had a ten-minute question and comment period following the speech from the hon. member for York West. But I notice that others yet would like to make comments and ask questions. Therefore, I would ask the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to conclude, if he may, to allow the hon. member to answer and give someone else a chance to ask questions.

The hon. member can of course be recongnized later if he wants to speak again.

Mr. Della Noce: All right, Madam Speaker. I wish I had had as much time as he did, because I would have a lot to say, but I will try again later.

In closing, if my hon. colleague intends to blame the government for everything, there is nothing easier to do for the opposition, but I would like to quote just a few lines from the May 17, 1991, Globe and Mail where it said:

[English]

The trucking association had urged the treasurer not to increase fuel taxes. Indeed, the truckers said if they did not receive a fuel tax cut, the industry would be increasingly vulnerable to competition from U.S. truckers.

[Translation]

That is in Ontario. Perhaps my hon. colleague has a closer insight in this, since he is from Ontario. I am not saying things are better in Quebec. We have the same problem. In fact, the price is even higher. I am against provincial taxes as well, not just the 4 cent federal tax. We tried to set an example was set but, unfortunately, the provincial Finance ministers—

I want to tell my hon. colleague in closing that, if there ever was a reasonable Finance minister dealing with these truckers, it was the federal minister. There has been no tax increase on fuel and gasoline in two years. I want to mention it because he neglected to say that. That is what is important, but those people failed to mention it. The provinces however imposed heavy taxes unfortunately.

[English]

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that he used to have truckers as his clients and, therefore, he knows their problems. His leader, the Prime Minister, was a trucker himself and he should be as sensitive as the hon. member suggests that he is. If he boasted very proudly of having dirtied his hands hauling in Baie Comeau at one time, then why have we a government that is so insensitive?

I am very grateful to the Chair and to the members on the other side for giving me the opportunity to complete my remarks. Although I accuse this government of neglecting the facts and the realities facing our industry before deregulation, and of inaction following that, what I have tried to be is not so much negative or accusatory, but constructive and I have placed nine possible options. They are not exhaustive, they are not exclusionary of other ideas, they are nine possible actions which can be implemented to give our Canadian truckers a chance and an opportunity to compete.

As I have suggested quite clearly, the government must change the rules by which we are playing the game with Americans, otherwise we are going to lose the game and it is going to be a rout. It is not going to be even close. I have suggested nine rule changes. I look forward to the member offering more rule changes. If it is not going to change the rules, then I ask the government to let us not beat around the bush, let us change the game. Let us change the game and re-regulate it so that the Canadian truckers have a chance to finish the game, complete the game and be successful at playing the game.

There are basically two options: change the rules so that the truckers can play and compete fairly; or, please, Mr. Minister, do not send our truckers on a collision course with American truckers. I have confidence in Canadians. I have confidence in our industry. I am also a Canadian who is realistic and I have pride in not sending Canadians without an equalizer to compete with the best. Every country does it.

We ought to give the tools by which our Canadian truckers can earn their livelihood, make a profit and raise a family; something that they are being precluded from doing in great numbers.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague from York West on his interventions on a very important subject matter, namely the crisis that we have in the trucking industry at the present time.

The member has made nine succinct points in terms of what governments can do. I was interested in his remarks with regard to the mindset of the government opposite. It seems that it was aware of difficulties that would be forthcoming in the trucking and transportation industries, but notwithstanding that, it proceeded with the consummation of the free trade agreement.

My question to my colleague is: is it his view that this particular trade deal and the mindset which surrounds that deal and which has followed that particular deal is, in itself, having some negative impact on the trucking industry in Canada?

Mr. Marchi: Madam Speaker, I thank my House leader for a very pertinent question. I met with one trucker on the Sparks Street Mall yesterday. With regard to the seven studies, he said: "Mr. Marchi, why didn't they do seven studies before deregulation? Why didn't they study the impact before they threw the door open to American competition? Not open the flood-gates, not open the barn door and then say 'By the way, we are going to study the impact and see how badly Canadians are being hurt.' "

• (1050)

What my House leader is suggesting is the government clearly put the cart before the horse and it really seems insensitive to the fact the cart is being trampled.

It is the mindset of a government that is driven by market forces and laws of the jungle to allow the Americans to come in on the guise of: "We are competitive. Don't you worry, boys. Go out there and be the best."

The government told us with free trade we can do the job. We can compete. We asked for a better deal. We are not opposed to freer trade. We are opposed to a bad free trade agreement.

There has not been an equal playing field. There have been no adjustment programs. What we see in the dangerous mindset of removing FIRA, Petro-Canada, CBC and VIA Rail, is the dismantling of mechanisms and institutions which have taken a lifetime to build and win.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, since May 1990, groups of unaffiliated truck owner-operators have been sporadically demonstrating and blockading highway checkpoints.

Truckers' concerns have been focused on taxation differentials between Canada and the U.S., notably on fuel and on the enforcement in Canada of the prohibition of cabotage—the carrying of goods between Canadian points by U.S. trucks—and on the impact of economic regulatory reforms and free trade generally in the industry.

In the summer of 1990, my predecessor established a task force to look at the concerns expressed by the truckers and created a forum for dialogue. I venture to say that this is a much more productive direction than hearing the previous speaker, my hon. colleague from York West, say that a committee of the Liberal Party has been functioning throughout this year.

Today in the House of Commons he deposits on the floor nine quick-fix solutions in an area where there is no quick-fix solution. The solutions that we must look into are medium-term and long-term solutions.

In the summer of 1990, this task force was created. It includes representatives of major trucking associations, union leaders, independent owner-operators and provincial government officials. This task force has initiated studies on taxation, trucking costs, cabotage and on other factors considered to affect the competitive position of the Canadian trucking industry.

The studies are expected to be ready for release at the end of this month.

Although some laws apply to interprovincial highway transport, provincial governments enforce the legislation and generally take the lead in this field. The situation today is that there is a task force process under way with representatives of all segments of the industry, with the governments involved, federal and provincial, to look at the concerns of the industry.

Earlier this week I met with the coalition. On Wednesday I met with spouses of the truckers and yesterday I met with a delegation from the owner-operators now gathered in Ottawa.

My officials continue at this time to meet with these representatives to address the concerns which fall within federal jurisdiction. I have listened to and heard their concerns, and I understand them. I invited these truckers to join the task force process because this process is an appropriate forum for looking at this issue.

There have been a number of statements about the impact of federal policies on the industry. I would like to clarify some salient points.

First, free trade. The free trade agreement did not include any changes to the ground rules for the trucking industry. Second, under the old federal sales tax, while truckers did not pay sales tax on their purchases of tractors or trailers, they did pay federal sales tax on most other goods purchased, including fuel. The new GST effectively eliminates any federal sales tax from trucking inputs because the truckers will be refunded all the GST they pay on their rigs, fuel, parts, servicing and on other overhead.

Mr. Boudria: When?

Mr. Corbeil: I hear shouts from the opposite side. That member should know that there is a clause in the GST regulation to the effect that if the recipients of the credits are not refunded within 21 days, if I am not mistaken, the federal government is going to pay interest on those payments.

After the implementation of the GST, total federal taxes included in fuel prices in Canada are 4 cents per litre; 2.2 cents less per litre than in the U.S.

In relation to the depreciation issue, I would like to explain that in Canada tractors and trailers are given a 30 per cent declining balance treatment. This would be roughly equivalent to allowing truckers to write off their trucks over a seven year period. In the U.S. the corresponding periods are three years for tractors and five years for trailers.

Offsetting this preferential depreciation is the fact that the U.S. also levies a 12 per cent heavy truck and trailer excise tax which Canada does not.

Provincial fuel taxes tend to be higher than U.S. state taxes and this differential has been increased as a result of some provincial budgets, such as Ontario's and Quebec's, where fuel taxes were increased by 3.4 cents a litre over the period of the year 1991.

I want to back up a little here and talk about some of the things that have happened in motor carrier transportation during the past year. I want to first elaborate on some of the initiatives that were begun, not today on the floor of the House of Commons, but last year.

At a meeting of federal and provincial transport ministers last year in St. John's, Newfoundland, it was agreed that the work necessary to find solutions to trucker problems should be divided into two parts. The first part was the examination of owner-operator issues. A working group was created under the chairmanship of Manitoba.

There were three questions posed specifically by the owner-operators: one, should owner-operators be licensed; two, should load brokers—intermediaries who are paid a commission to bring truckers and shippers together—be regulated; the third question asked that the working group be mandated to act as facilitator to bring the trucking companies and the owner-operators together to negotiate a code of ethics.

I must say that the provincial and federal officials on the working group have reported a considerable lack of co-operation on the part of the trucking companies. I find it very disappointing that the members of the Canadian Trucking Association have refused to meet with the working group and the owner-operators to discuss the code of ethics.

The code of ethics was to set guidelines for business relations between owner-operators and trucking companies. The trucking companies have expressed an unwillingness to reduce a long list of grievances that the owner-operators have with some trucking companies. Needless to say, such an attitude has not been helpful.

The second part of the work mandated by the council of transport ministers was to address Canada-U.S. tax issues and transborder trucking competitiveness. Transport Canada officials were instructed to launch a study on global transborder competitive factors. The study was divided into eight parts. The objectives of the study were to determine the nature and extent of the Canadian share of transborder markets, assess the over-all—

NEW BRUNSWICK RESEARCH AND PRODUCTIVITY COUNCIL

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, yesterday in Fredericton the New Brunswick Research and Productivity Council officially opened its new laboratory complex which will be devoted primarily on behalf of small and medium sized business to applied research and technological service in the fields of chemistry, biotechnology, microbiology, and food science.

The facility will also include a pilot plant for the development of new food products and a quarantine unit for aquaculture health studies.

All of these capabilities will be dedicated to the provision of knowledge, skill and innovation for use by manufacturing companies in New Brunswick and elsewhere in Atlantic Canada. In fact, the scientific and engineering services and competence of RPC is gaining a truly national reputation.

This expansion is part of a $20 million strategic development plan for RPC, being funded substantially through the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. It is a major investment that conveys dramatic evidence of Canada's commitment to regional economic expansion in the Atlantic region and to the creation of higher productivity and increased competitiveness as key elements in our mission toward national prosperity in Canada.

ASSOCIATION OF POLISH ENGINEERS IN CANADA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Association of Polish Engineers in Canada, which is being celebrated this weekend in Ottawa. They are a shining example of all an NGO can be and can achieve.

In 1941, with only 100 engineers and a charter drafted by our own Senator George McIlraith, then parliamentary secretary to C. D. Howe, they began the work of assisting professional newcomers to gain Canadian accreditation and technical language skills required for speaking and writing English.

By arranging for Canadian engineers to teach them, not only were the desired language skills learned, most students were hired by one of the Canadian companies that donated the teaching time.

With Sir Casimir Gzowski, an engineer and builder of our railroads and bridges, as their patron, they expanded to include chemists, physicists, and members of other related professions and now number in the thousands.

Today I ask all members of the House to join me in saluting the ingenuity, dedication and hard work which have resulted in this outstanding achievement by the Association of Polish Engineers in Canada.

KANESATAKE BAND COUNCIL

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Madam Speaker, people were amazed to hear on the CBC yesterday that the Kanesatake Band Council was receiving up to $150,000 a year too much for its activities, on the basis of inaccurate population figures. Such a situation is unacceptable and the Band Council's failure to declare the exact population of Kanesatake to the government authorities is a serious offence that victimizes taxpayers.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I ask that an inquiry be launched after May 31 so that those guilty can be punished by law. I call upon the clan mothers to dismiss this Council which has been guilty of committing such a fraud and ask that the government immediately appoint an interim council until the community comes up with a new form of government, that a band census policy be implemented immediately to avoid further incidents of this kind and that the royal commission of inquiry be authorized to do so under its mandate. It is important to act quickly, Madam Speaker, to restore the trust and honour of citizens of that community.

COAL MINING

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, once again the Conservative government is trying to sap the lifeblood out of the people of Cape Breton.

While the Conservative government nurtures the development of the Westray Coal Mine in Pictou East, home to the new Tory Premier Don Cameron, the Cape Breton Development Corporation is being dismantled.

The Westray Coal Mine will be seizing 300,000 tonnes of Devco's traditional sales to the Nova Scotia Power Corporation. If the Lingan Mine in Cape Breton is closed as a result, 700 to 800 coal miners will be out of work in a area where the unemployment rate is over twice the national average.

The Island cannot absorb any more job losses. We have hundreds and hundreds of families out of work and out of hope, and the Conservative government wants to kick us one more time. We are paying a painful price for the freedom to vote on the Island.

After winning the leadership of the Nova Scotia Conservative Party, the premier said:

> I can tell the people of Cape Breton they have nothing to fear from Don Cameron—will no longer play political games with their lives.

The games have not stopped. We have a provincial and federal Tory government that would rather line the pockets of a foreign investor than make sure that families—

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, traditionally this House has been better at creating conflicts than resolving them, but Canada was created only when George Brown, a Grit, and George-Étienne Cartier and John A. Macdonald, Conservatives, put aside their partisan differences and worked together to bring about a united country.

There is a lesson in that for all sides of this House, but it is not just a lesson for politicians. It is a lesson for all Canadians. Those of us who believe in a strong, united Canada must stop saying: "They do not respect us. Let them go. It has got to be our way or else", and start saying publicly and loudly: "We do respect you. We all have a lot to lose. We are all Canadians".

Who speaks for Canada? Every Canadian must do that.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, four years ago Jesus Seferino Aguilar came to Canada seeking protection as a refugee. He had left home in the war zone of El Salvador after witnessing the killing of his brother. After a long delay, he was placed in the refugee backlog with the minister's promise that all cases would be decided by December 31, 1990.

Jesus waited alone. He could not visit relatives in the United States or El Salvador nor sponsor them to Canada because he was not landed.

In 1990, a psychiatric study sponsored by the Canadian Council of Churches, showed that the mental health of the majority of refugee claimants in the backlog was growing worse with danger of suicide. The United Nations Committee on Human Rights was sympathetic, but the then minister scoffed at the warning.

Jesus had no friends in high places to plead for him. He was repeatedly treated by a psychiatrist for depression and schizophrenia. This month, more than two years after the minister's promise, four years after he came, when only a third of the backlog had received a decision, Jesus Seferino Aguilar killed himself.

Again I urge this government to stop the suffering and death it is causing—

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister for Science who, because of his vast wealth of knowledge and experience, knows the importance of encouraging students to pursue studies in the fields of science, technology, and engineering.

These fields will ensure that Canada remains globally competitive in the 21st century by retaining our position among the top 10 high-tech countries. All members of this House must continue to make a concentrated effort in every area concerning the youth of Canada and their education. Education must and will play a key role in Canada's future.

EDUCATION

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Yes, Madam Speaker, education must play a role but not with the approach that is being pursued by this government.

S. O. 31

I would draw Your Honour's attention to the throne speech in which the government states that with provincial co-operation it would like to see Canada-wide goals in education "established for the year 2000".

Reading this literally, the government appears to be suggesting that it will take nine years just to establish goals relating to education.

Say it ain't so, Mr. Prime Minister. You cannot really be suggesting that it will take nine years just to establish goals. Agreement on goals in education should be part and parcel of the constitutional agreement we hope to conclude. In other words, our constitutional arrangements should support our economic objectives.

First of all we need to agree on goals and quickly; then we need to take action to reach them.

Canadians can no longer afford ambiguity, inaction and the absence of national leadership.

NATIONAL POLICE WEEK

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Madam Speaker, we all know that this is Police Week.

I take the opportunity to extend my hearty congratulations to all police officers in Canada for their ongoing efforts to maintain peace and order throughout the country.

I also want to congratulate all police officers in my riding, especially eight policemen from Brossard who received the Distinguished Service Medal for Police at a special ceremony.

I personally wish to point out the tremendous and untiring dedication, as well as the courage and bravery, of Raymond Gagné, Alain Gingras, Michel Grenon, Marcel Gagliardi, Jean-Guy Leclerc, Pierre Morasse and Louis Alleva.

Madam Speaker, a special posthumous presentation was made to the son of Sergeant Gilles Veilleux, who died two years ago.

Congratulations and thanks to our police officers!

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, last week I wrote to the Government of B.C. about the potential for flooding due to an above average snow pack. I have yet to hear a response from the Government of B.C. on what could represent a major disaster.

Earlier this week a road was washed out, outside Fernie, B.C., and the danger for wider flooding continues to exist.

A recent study has shown that schools in Coquitlam, B.C. would not have a chance of withstanding a major earthquake, and we know the potential that exists on the lower mainland of B.C.

Earlier this spring Canadians watched entire communities being washed away in Quebec.

Given the fact that the Government of B.C. has been slow to act and given the fact the federal government has allocated only $6 million for emergency preparedness for the entire country, I would like to call on the government to take action to better co-ordinate emergency preparedness with the provinces and make a real investment in emergency preparedness instead of waiting for a disaster to happen.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, of great concern to all Canadians is a terrible toll of family violence in our nation. Because there are many causes there must be many remedies.

To help Canadians deal with the problems, the Canadian government has introduced many programs and initiatives to meet the problems. These include education programs for Canadians regarding the extent and causes of the problem. Other initiatives strengthen the legal framework to assist victims and to stop offenders. The government will increase services to aboriginal communities, provide more housing for abused women and children, including emergency and longer term aid. They will assist in providing treatment services for offenders as well as their victims.

Much more needs to be done but the government is to be commended for the programs it has already initiated.

CANADA POST

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, I hope the minister responsible for Canada Post will realize that postal workers in the Outaouais are going to put the pressure on. For some time there have been rumours that the offices in Gatineau, Hull and Aylmer would be vacated and mechanical sortation done at the Alta Vista branch. Madam Speaker, after talking to some of the unions. I find it hard to understand why no consultations were initiated by Canada Post to find out why these rumours were circulating.

I think the minister responsible for Canada Post ought to put an end to the uncertainly and realize that the issue of mechanical sortation at Alta Vista does nothing to resolve the specific problems of a region like the Outaouais. Ever since Confederation we have had our own postal administration. Now, all of a sudden remours are circulating and a number of steps have already been taken.

We want to ask Canada Post and the corporation's management to do what is necessary to put an end to—

ONTARIO BUDGET

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, yesterday almost 3,000 people representing a wide cross-section of Ontarians protested outside Queen's Park expressing their disapproval of the recent NDP budget. They believe this NDP budget will provide for massive disincentives for both existing and new companies to invest in Ontario. They know it is a tax time-bomb that will go off in the next couple of years.

I am sure this group of fiscally responsible and concerned taxpayers was not surprised to hear that both the province of Ontario and Ontario Hydro had their credit rating revised downward. Their simple message to Bob Rae is: "Stop putting the taxpayers' money where your mouth is".

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

The truckers who are still out there in front of the Parliament Buildings are a symbol of the frustration of millions of Canadians who are unemployed or on the verge of bankruptcy as a result of your economic policies.

I personally met mothers with families, and so did the minister, who are going through a family crisis because of your policies. Stop hiding behind studies or other governments. Will the federal government do something today so that these families can live in dignity?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada and the Ministry of Transport did not wait until the trucks lined the streets to do something about this problem.

About a year ago, we had a meeting with all the main parties involved. They agreed there would be studies on every aspect that, in some cases, required clarification and in others presented a real problem. These studies will be used to get the facts, as opposed to perceptions or allegations.

That is being done now. Meanwhile, we have had another meeting with owners and leaseholders, who are now meeting at the office of the Ministry of Transport.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, three years ago, your government initiated its policy to deregulate transportation in the trucking industry. They have now been here for a week, and all they are getting is tickets.

[English]

They have been out front and they are in the rain today. They have been here for a week and all they have got from your government are tickets, 40 tickets, to show for their actions.

I want to ask the minister when he is going to stop hiding behind studies, when he is going to stop playing political football, and when he is going to start providing some real answers.

This minister from Toronto may think it is very funny. I have met with women in the gallery who were in—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may want to speak through the Chair and please put her question at this point.

Ms. Copps: My question is to the minister. As the speaker will know, it is not a laughing matter. There are thousands of families whose lives hang in the balance, and I want to know if he is going to announce specific measures today so that those families can come in out of the rain and start having a hope for their economic survival. Will he provide answers today?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I can assure you my colleague from Ontario did not consider this a laughing matter. I think his remarks concerned my colleague, today's Acting Leader of the Liberal Party and the Opposition, and her habit of dealing with the subject by daily repeating a number of half truths or unfounded allegations.

I repeat that the studies were not ordered as a result of a unilateral decision by the federal government. The decision involved all the main parties involved, including the truckers themselves, trucking companies, the provincial government and the federal government. In fact, provincial governments can have an even greater impact than the federal government in this area, when we consider that the provincial sales tax on diesel fuel is much higher, four or five times as high, as the federal tax. This makes a tremendous difference when you add up the total cost of company operations.

I would like to ask the Liberal Party, which announced this morning that a committee had been examining the matter for several months, to tell us about the committee's conclusions. I would like to say to the hon. member for Hamilton East that it would have been far more—

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, these truckers are the tip of the iceberg in a brewing tax revolt that is sweeping this country.

Does the government not realize that the GST was the last straw for Canadians? The minister knows that every time a Canadian trucker fills his tank it costs him $250 more than an American trucker for the same tankful.

• (1120)

I want to ask the minister a specific question. He has asked us about our proposals. We have put some specific proposals on the table, and one of them includes ending the excise tax on diesel fuels. Will he do that today?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is really unbelievable that the member on the other side is asking the federal government to reduce its federal sales tax which is already 2.2 cents per litre lower than the corresponding tax in the U.S.

She also says we should remove GST. The implementation of GST, which was delayed for almost two years by the members of her party and her friends in the Senate, has had the definite result of reducing the cost of operations for all the truckers. As far as the gas is concerned, the GST is responsible for a reduction of 2.5 cents per gallon.

At the same time, the hon. member comes from a province where the diesel fuel tax has been increased many times and is in the process of being increased again. I think she should invite the truckers, rather than fuelling some political aspects in this debate, to address the provincial legislation as strongly as they can because the real problem is there and not in this House.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, today Statistics Canada, in reporting on the inflation figures, in effect, said that the Minister of Transport does not know what he is talking about.

Statistics Canada today reported that the year over year inflation rate is up by more than 6 per cent for the fourth month in a row. The government's own statistical agency said about these figures: "They continue to reflect the higher price levels resulting from the introduction of the GST".

Will the Acting Minister of Finance admit the Department of Finance was wrong and the GST is having much more than a one-time impact on inflation? Will he take steps to reverse this GST policy which is destroying retail businesses, driving more and more Canadians to shop in the United States, and obviously doing great damage to our trucking industry?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, first of all I should make it very clear to the hon. member and to those who are watching Question Period today that on the GST and truckers, truckers used to pay 13.5 per cent sales tax when they bought a truck. Now they pay a GST of 7 per cent and claim it back. They claim back the GST on their gasoline. Their operating costs are much less, so that helps the truckers. That is what the GST does positively for the trucking industry. The hon. member should understand that.

We are encouraged that the inflation rate has levelled off and has remained steady. We still believe that we will reach our target. As we have said in the budget, and I would like to quote from The Budget Papers just so that the hon. member understands the targets that we have set for inflation in this country: "The first target is to lower the annual increase in the Consumer Price Index to 3 per cent by the end of 1992. An interim milepost of 5 per cent has been set for the end of 1991".

We believe we are on target.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, not only does the Minister of Transport not know what he is talking about, this is obviously the case with the minister of state.

By the time the truckers get back the GST they will have gone broke because of the delays in this government's approach to this matter.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, year after year, the inflation rates for Quebec City and Montreal are the highest in Canada. Statistics Canada has said that these fugures continue to reflect the implementation of the GST.

[English]

The minister has confirmed that this government wants to have a tough anti-inflation policy more than it wants to create jobs or growth. Will he make a commitment for the government today that in dealing with the inflation its own policies have created it will not revert to the high interest rate policy that has already destroyed so many jobs and businesses in this country? Will he make that commitment today?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, old habits die slowly.

I must say that interest rates have dropped over the past year by almost 5 per cent. Mortgage rates are down. Housing starts are up. Resales are reaching record levels at the present time.

We have made a commitment to get inflation down, to get interest rates down, and to keep them down. As long as the inflationary pressures stay down then interest rates will stay down.

I am encouraged and the government is encouraged by most of the provincial governments in this country that have, together with the federal government, brought in budgets to restrain spending, to control wages, and to try to get the expenditures of governments under control.

There has been only one government that has not gone along with this. It reminds me of my father when he used to say: "Everybody is out of step except my son, John".

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Constitution. It is in relation to a new approach that is needed to national unity.

I want to begin by suggesting to the minister that if he is truly committed to non-partisanship and co-operation, it is action and not words that are going to show that to the Canadian people.

It seems to me that there is nothing in the throne speech that suggests co-operation when we are told: "Here is the process that is going to take place. Here are the rules. Now everyone had better co-operate".

Will the minister, because I understand he is fully responsible for this area and can make these decisions, withdraw the committee process that is outlined in the throne speech and in a truly co-operative spirit meet with the other parties in this House to discuss a process that we can begin right from the beginning, that is truly co-operative, and that in fact will show Canadians that all parliamentarians in this House are prepared to do that?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity to answer what was in effect that question yesterday when it was posed by the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands after my remarks in the House.

We have taken a decision that faced with the cynicism in Canada about elected officials we could either contribute to that cynicism by having parliamentarians walk away from our most basic responsibility for the future of the country, or we could try to change that cynicism by demonstrating that parliamentarians are effective and prepared in dealing with the nation's problems. But we are not going to do that in old ways. We are prepared to establish a joint committee of this House and the other place and then adopt the most original means we can to involve the Canadian public.

I said to her colleague in the House yesterday that I would very much welcome specific suggestions from the NDP, the Liberal Party, or indeed from individual members of the House, as to means by which we can preserve the well-established tradition of parliamentary democracy in this country and add to it the most effective possible involvement of other Canadians interested in this process.

As to actions speaking louder than words, I agree with her. That is why I began my responsibilities in this portfolio by acting, by going to talk directly to people who had felt excluded from the process in the past. I intend to continue to act in that way, as this government does.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, it is clear that any constitutional decision will be made by the Parliament of Canada.

We will not be undermining the authority of the parliamentary tradition in Canada, it seems to me, if as politicians we show to Canadians that we are listening to what they have to say.

In fact, I am suggesting to the minister that that is our responsibility and our duty so that the process that we institute at the beginning indicates that we are listening to Canadians.

No one is suggesting that elected members would not be a part of that process. I am simply suggesting it should be enlarged to include those who are under-represented in this House.

I will say to the minister that women make up 51 per cent of the population of this country. They make up 14 per cent of the population of this House. Aboriginal people and visible minorities are under-represented in this House.

Will the minister consider seriously that we try a new way, perhaps a less traditional way, which will include elected officials but expand that process right from the beginning to show Canadians that we are listening and we are prepared to do something in a really new way?

• (1130)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, the answer to that general question is yes.

Certainly I agree with the observation of the hon. member. It is one of the problems of any elected institution that it is not as representative of the country, demographically, as it should be.

Will we take a variety of means, as innovative as we can find, to listen to people, to involve them in the decisions? The answer to that is clearly yes. Will we abandon Parliament? The answer to that is no.

Our view is that Parliament needs to be reformed, but not abandoned. We recognize the cynicism that exists in the country. We think it is corrosive. We think that succumbing to that cynicism could in fact make it more difficult for us to build the kind of strong Canada we want. We intend to reform the way this Parliament works. We intend to reach out as widely as we can to involve Canadians in the process of deciding our future together, but we do not intend to abandon one of the institutions that has served this country very well in 124 years of our history.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, no one is talking about abandoning Parliament. We are simply saying that this an extraordinary, absolutely serious and crucial issue for the future of Canada. Surely the authority of parliamentarians will be reinforced when we say that we are prepared to do things in an extraordinary, innovative way right from the beginning for this particular situation.

I think to characterize it as abandoning Parliament is clearly not presenting what I am suggesting.

[Translation]

I would remind the government that the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee will soon make its report public. Can the government promise today in this House that it will not ignore any recommendation to increase the participation of as many people as possible at the beginning of the process advocated by this report?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I clearly said yesterday in my speech in the House that I have no intention of judging the Beaudoin–Edwards committee report before it is received and I have no intention of rejecting the suggestions it may contain. If the Beaudoin–Edwards committee suggests ways for Parliament to consult Canadians better, I would be quite interested in hearing them and I intend to take them seriously.

As far as innovation is concerned, we already said in the Speech from the Throne the other day that, for the time in the history of our Parliament, we would give a parliamentary committee, as a formal part of its mandate, the right to work with elected provincial legislators and not only to consult them. That is something new. There are other ways to ensure more citizen participation, but on a parliamentary basis that serves Canada well.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

On Wednesday the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the only problem with the Al-Mashat case was not that Mr. Al-Mashat was admitted on the fast track, but that ministers did not know.

Once again the new Secretary of State for External Affairs has it all wrong. We will find out what ministers knew. We are equally concerned about why Al-Mashat was given a fast track when so many people are not given any preference, any kind of access, because they do not know people in high places.

I would like to ask the minister this question. In 1988, close to 27,000 Kurdish refugees escaped from the chemical attacks of the Iraqi government. Three thousand applied to come to Canada, and according to a report of the Turkish government, not one has been accepted or interviewed up to this time. They are still tragically waiting to be accepted.

Rather than being solely preoccupied with defending the reputation of ministers, when is this government going to afford the victims of the Iraqi government the same kind of treatment it gave to Al-Mashat.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would like to quote from page 21 of the McGrath commission report which was unanimously endorsed in this House and signed by the hon. member's seatmate. It states:

> The idea of a minister being responsible for everything that goes on in a department may once have been realistic, but it has long since ceased to be so. A minister cannot possibly know everything that is going on in a department. The doctrine of ministerial accountability undermines the potential for genuine accountability on the part of the person that ought to be accountable—the senior officer of the department.

The recommendation, endorsed unanimously, was:

> We recommend that all ministers co-operate with committees exercising their expanded mandates by making available public servants that may be called to testify before a committee.

We have made that commitment. That committee will implement these recommendations which were approved—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the problem with these ministers is not that they don't know everything that is happening in its departments, they don't know anything at all about what is going on in their departments. Especially when it goes into their own offices, they have no control or judgment on it.

If that minister is now speaking for government, my specific question is about why the Kurdish refugees who escaped from a brutal chemical attack are not given any consideration at all? I have a specific case of one of my own constituents who, over a year ago, married a Kurdish woman who has been sitting in Iran for close to a year without any kind of treatment or review whatsoever by the Department of Immigration.

Does this not show that there is an unfair and discriminatory system? I ask that minister, is that not one of the primary topics and subjects of investigation that the parliamentary committee must address: why the immigration system gives preference to people in high places but ignores the plight of ordinary citizens?

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there are no doubt cases where there is unfair and discriminatory queue jumping. I remember very well when one potential immigrant drove to Manitoba, was put into a ministerial car, given a ministerial driver and driven to Emerson, Manitoba for the Emerson shuffle so that he could be landed. Does the member remember that? We would be glad to bring that forward in the committee.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and, in his absence, to the Acting Prime Minister.

Recently, Zbigniew Redka, a man of Polish origin, was told, after waiting for two years, he would have to wait another two years to have his immigration case heard. Shortly after, he hanged himself.

Last week, Jesus Saferino Aquilan, a Salvadoran refugee claimant committed suicide in Toronto.

How can the government of the day allow Mr. Al-Mashat, no friend of Canada, to jump the queue and yet have refugees and self-exiles wait three, four and five years for a landed immigrant status?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the point I was trying to make by reading the McGrath committee report, which is the recommendation we have approved, is that these kinds of detailed questions are unsuitable, as this committee recommended, for this kind of exchange. They are good for scoring political points.

The committee will meet just as soon as his party co-operates with establishing the membership. In fact, those questions about Al-Mashat can be dealt with and we can put this strawman aside and deal with the real issues that affect Canadians.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I drew a potential suicide case from Montreal to the former minister of immigration's attention. Today the minister says: "People who are committing suicide because of the government's bungling should not be raised in this forum?"

I have just drawn attention to two cases. How many more such cases are there in the refugee backlog?

I would like to ask the minister if he will hold an inquest into the two cases that I have mentioned and report to Parliament? Will he agree today to grant work permits and permission to go to school to self-exiled refugees who have to wait 18 to 24 months for their landed immigrant status? Also, will he promise today in this House that the government will clear up all refugee backlog cases within six months?

• (1140)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the minister is unavoidably absent from the House today. I know this was a serious question raised by my hon. friend and I will treat it that way, and I trust his colleagues will.

He relates to the House circumstances which all of us would regard as tragic. Certainly the problem of refugee backlog is one that has been of concern to the House and to the government for some time. We have taken some actions to deal with it. He has made some specific requests that I will draw immediately to the attention of the minister who will, I hope, be in a position to reply either directly to the hon. member or to the House as soon as he is back next week.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday the Federal Court ruled that the cabinet broke the law to cut a special deal for Alcan. Today I would like to pursue the special deals found in the green plan communication contracts which have been flowing to friends of the Prime Minister and the cabinet at $250,000 a month since the last election.

Does the Acting Prime Minister feel it is appropriate to pay $20,000 a month to Paul Boomer Throop for advice to the Minister of the Environment, knowing that P. Boomer Throop was the 1988 election tour co-ordinator for the Prime Minister and is presently employed by the Conservative Party?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity today to respond to the first question to come to me as the Minister of State for the Environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Browes: Some three weeks ago the Prime Minister put additional emphasis on the preservation and the protection of the Canadian environment by appointing an additional voice to the cabinet. I am very privileged and pleased to be able to fulfil those duties.

In relation to the question that the hon. member has brought forward, the green plan that was established by the Government of Canada had extensive consultations. Over 10,000 Canadians were consulted about the green plan, in co-operation with the provincial governments and industry.

It was an opportunity for us to reach out to hear what people have to say and at the same time bring together the green plan of over some hundred initiatives.

Now we have an opportunity to bring forward the information about the green plan to the Canadian people. I am very pleased we are doing that and we are going to continue to be consulting and implementing the issues and the green plan.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I welcome the minister to her new position but my question is for the Acting Prime Minister about corruption and the need to do something about it.

I am sure it is just a coincidence, but would the Acting Prime Minister explain why Ian Anderson, the Prime Minister's former deputy communications director received $75,000 for communications advice on the green plan, or why Pat Delbridge who is now head of the government's environmental logo board received $200,000 for two months work last year?

Will the Acting Prime Minister support sending all of these contracts let so far under the green plan to a public auditing function by a special committee of this House to determine where these untendered $8 million are going and whether or not they are just going from the public purse to friends of the Conservative Party?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Madam Speaker, the green plan is a tremendous, major undertaking by the Canadian government and by the people of Canada. We want to discuss and implement these various initiatives which are set out in the green plan and we will continue to have these consultations and the implementation.

In relation to the particular issues that the hon. member has mentioned, there will a thorough analysis of all of this. The Minister of the Environment and myself are new to these positions. We are looking at all the analyses as to how we can communicate best with the people of Canada.

CLOTHING INDUSTRY

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the new Minister of Labour. I want to congratulate him on his promotion.

I would like to ask the Minister if he is aware that 39 women's clothing factories have closed down since 1986, resulting in some 2,000 lost jobs in the Montreal region and elsewhere in Quebec.

The Minister's predecessor had already met these people and given them promises which he did not keep. Will the new Minister of Labour try to help these people and be more effective than his predecessor?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his question.

I can tell you that my predecessor was very, very effective and probably even more effective than my colleague opposite when he was Minister of Labour in Montreal.

The hon. member for Papineau-Saint-Michel knows very well that the Department of Employment and Immigration has some training programs to help these people who lost their jobs. If some of those companies are eligible for the Older Worker Adjustment Program which the Minister knows very well, we in the Department of Labour will be pleased to see that those people are compensated adequately.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker.

I would remind the Minister that it is incredible that his predecessor did not know that the regulations for the Older Worker Adjustment Program required a certain number of employees per factory and plant. Now, 90 per cent of this women's clothing industry in Quebec has about 30 or 40 employees and the Minister's regulations required a minimum of 100 employees.

Will the new Minister be more competent and effective than his predecessor and change the regulations?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel knows very well that the regulations of the Older Worker Adjustment Program are negotiated with the provinces. It is a federal-provincial program.

We are now looking into the various regulations with the Quebec Minister, Mr. Bourbeau, and I can assure the Minister that we will do everything possible so that the workers in the Montreal region whom he has just mentioned can benefit from as many programs as possible offered by the Department of Labour and also the Department of Employment and Immigration.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Environment.

The minister, coming from metropolitan Toronto, is well aware of the fact that, like so many other Canadian cities, metropolitan Toronto is facing an imminent garbage crisis. One of the worst offenders in this crisis is excessive packaging.

Since the voluntary packaging program does not seem to be working, will the government introduce immediately a program of stiff regulations to reduce packaging and do it before the 1993 deadline or target date set in the green plan? If we do not do that, we are going to have garbage piled up in our back yards and our parks.

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Madam Speaker, I want to first compliment the member for Don Valley East on his continued interest in environmental issues. I have worked with him on those in metro Toronto and I appreciate his good work.

The national protocol on packaging, as established by the environment ministers of Canada, is to reduce packaging by 50 per cent by the year 2000. Nobody in this House wants to wait till the year 2000 to have all of this done, so by 1993 we are going to have regulations. If by 1992 we see that the voluntary action, the consultation with the provinces, the consultation with industries, is not accomplishing what we want it to do, the federal government will put forward those regulations. The provinces monitor the volume of waste into the landfill sites so that will be our indication whether or not the program is working.

I want to say that the consumers themselves can do a great deal in terms of reducing waste. Just yesterday I received 30 letters from the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. minister will find another moment to get into what seems to be a speech.

BANKRUPTCIES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister for employment or the Minister of Labour. Yesterday Pascal's hardware, a successful Montreal business for 87 years, fell victim to the recession and went bankrupt. As a result 21 stores have closed and 1,600 employees have lost their jobs, many of them with more than 20 years service.

Would the minister say whether this massive lay–off will qualify for help under the program for older worker adjustment and what other initiatives does the government have to retrain and re–employ these workers?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, a committee will be formed immediately between the Quebec representatives and the federal representatives to decide on the eligibility of the workers of Pascal's.

With regard to the retraining, the hon. member is aware that the federal government through the Department of Employment and Immigration has a significant number of retraining programs. We could even have had more had the Official Opposition not blocked Bill C–21 for two years. We do have the programs in place and we will use them.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, that is not enough. When is this government going to recognize it bears a heavy responsibility in closures such as this. The goods and services tax, high interest rates, the free trade agreement and mass cross–border shopping have all contributed to this closure.

Why is the government ignoring the economic and social conditions in Montreal and right across this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, no one is happy when a company goes bankrupt, but I think it is very important that Canadians understand the reasons why and not the fallacious reasons—

Mr. Allmand: GST and the free trade agreement.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member, Madam Speaker, just mentioned the GST as he did in his speech. Practically the price of everything in a hardware store is going down as a result of the GST because of the tax credit.

Mr. Tobin: That's nuts.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend from Newfoundland says: "That's nuts". If he would go and look at the nuts and bolts in a hardware store, he will see that the changes in prices are significant. Prices have gone down on a broad range of items in a hardware store.

The point I am making, Madam Speaker, is there are reasons for companies going bankrupt, but let us not confuse the facts. Let us make sure that the GST is credited for being a benefit to hardware store owners.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I would like to return to the Acting Prime Minister and the Al–Mashat case. Canadians, particularly those who have been involved with the immigration process and know its delays are asking why he received this very special treatment. There is a suspicion that Canada was being used as a safe house for an American informer.

Given that today Mr. Al–Mashat claims that he was offered asylum in both France and the United States, which the French doubt and the Americans now officially deny, will the minister confirm that the Prime Minister of Canada himself is willing to appear before the parliamentary committee; that the government has no objection to Mr. Al–Mashat being subpoenaed to that committee and will the government make representations to the United States government so that representatives of the National Security Council and the CIA can be brought before the parliamentary committee to testify. Maybe we can get to the bottom of this.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, just to confirm what was said yesterday on several occasions, we are very anxious to get this matter before the committee as soon as possible. Then all relevant officials can be called before the committee because we are absolutely convinced that the facts we have elucidated will become obvious to those who keep an open mind. We are anxious to put behind us the innuendo and so on that comes forward as a result of lack of information and pure unsubstantiated suspicion. Let us let this committee do its work. I am sure at the end of the day we will all be better off when we know what we are talking about.

JUSTICE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

This morning I learned from a Crown attorney, in the case against the member for Lévis, that the defence had indicated last Monday, May 6, that they would be using C–79 in the defence at last Wednesday's court hearing. As a result, the Crown told witnesses not to appear, in that a non–proclaimed piece of legislation would not have any status before the court.

Is this minister in a position to assure this House that neither the member for Lévis, his lawyer, nor anybody else acting on his behalf, approached cabinet ministers or their offices, urging the proclamation of C–79, prior to that specific court hearing?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, after two years of all–party activity on committee, there was unanimity among the parties to introduce Bill C–79 to regularize the relationship between the House and the RCMP in terms of responsibilities. There was unanimity in that regard.

When bills are given Royal Assent there is sometimes a time separation between Royal Assent and Proclamation, because administrative matters need to be taken care of and put in place. No such requirements were necessary with this bill.

When I became aware, as a result of a conversation with a member of Parliament whose offices were being searched by the RCMP at the time, that C–79 had not been proclaimed, I was on my way out of town. Three days later when I got back, I asked my staff to have it proclaimed.

The reality is that it was given Royal Assent on April 11. It should have been proclaimed on April 12. It should have been passed last year.

The hon. member, in looking for conspiracy and in suggesting that there is something wrong in proclaiming a bill which was endorsed by both Houses, which was unanimously approved by all political parties in this House, is really, really searching for scandal. I wish he would be more sympathetic to peoples' reputations as members were sympathetic to his reputation when he had problems.

PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION OVER EDUCATION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Last night, a few minutes after his appointment as federal minister responsible for meddling, his colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration said on the CBC, and I quote: "Education is nobody's exclusive domain." I would like to ask the minister responsible—

An hon. member: It's true.

Mr. Lapierre: I hear another conservative minister say "it's true". I would like to ask the responsible minister whether or not he is willing to correct what his colleague for Employment and Immigration said, and remind him of Section 93 of the BNA Act of 1867?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I don't have to read the Constitution to my Cabinet colleague. The Speech from the Throne is very clear. We do not intend to interfere in provincial jurisdictions and we clearly accepted— we said in the Speech from the Throne that education would remain a provincial matter.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister. Mr. Rémillard, a distinguished lawyer who has read the Speech from the Throne, says: "It is unacceptable that Ottawa should intrude in a field of provincial jurisdiction like education and training". Is the minister telling me that Mr. Rémillard did not read the Speech from the Throne correctly or will he explain to me how he can reconcile the statement from the minister of Canadian affairs and the attitude of his government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, when I will need to talk to Mr. Rémillard, I will do so directly and not through someone who changed views and party while in this chamber.

JUSTICE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, my question is for the hon. Government House Leader.

• (1200)

As we understand the hon. House leader to have responded to a question previously, a member whose office was the potential subject of a police search had approached him on proclamation of Bill C-79.

Does the hon. government House leader not think that this is obstruction of justice?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, those are not the facts. The facts are that the office was being searched under a search warrant. The hon. member phoned me up to inform me of that fact so that I should know in the event it became—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the member for York South—Weston would allow the hon. minister to complete his answer.

Mr. Andre: As I was saying, Madam Speaker, the hon. member, in view of my responsibilities, phoned me up to inform me that the search was under way, not to ask for any action.

Incidentally, in the conversation he informed me that Bill C-79 had not been implemented. That would have had no effect, because that bill which was unanimously adopted by her party had been given Royal Assent. It had been approved by both Houses back in April. I then asked my staff, three days later as a matter of fact, why it had not been proclaimed and asked that it be proclaimed.

I am sorry the hon. member cannot seem to listen to my answer without her jaws moving and noises coming out of her throat.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I want to refer to my answer to the hon. member for Windsor West. I gave some inaccurate information in my response to him when I said that the truckers paid federal sales tax on trucks and trailers. They did not under the old system. Under the new system they do not pay federal sales taxes on all their business expenses as they used to do. I apologize to the House for that misinformation.

While I am on my feet, I have two Ways and Means motions which I wish to table today.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 83(1), I have the honour to lay upon the table a copy of notice of a Ways and Means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act and other legislation respecting the implementation of the goods and services tax, and a Ways and Means motion to amend the excise tax and the Excise Tax Act.

I ask, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 83(2), that an Order of the Day be designated for the consideration of each of the said two Ways and Means motions.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House thanks the hon. minister for setting the record straight.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to seven petitions.

RAILWAY ACT

REINSTATEMENT OF BILL C-26

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have several motions that relate to the reinstatement of bills from the previous session. The first one deals with Bill C-26. I move:

That, notwithstanding any standing or special order of this House, the following bill introduced in the Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament be reinstated forthwith in this session as follows:

An act to amend the Railway Act (Grain and Flour Subsidies), be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time and referred to and reported by a legislative committee with an amendment, concurred in at report stage with an amendment and ordered for third reading.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is denied.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION OR TRANSFER AUTHORIZATION ACT

REINSTATEMENT OF BILL C-73

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, this relates to Bill C-73, something that is up and running right now. It is an attempt to save money for the taxpayers:

That, notwithstanding any standing or special order of this House, the following bill introduced in the Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament be reinstated forthwith in this session as follows:

An act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time and referred to and reported by a legislative committee with an amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent. The hon. member may allow me to look around the House. I have now heard him and consent has been denied.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

REINSTATEMENT OF BILL C-87

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am on a roll, Madam Speaker.

This relates to Bill C-78, the environment bill:

That, notwithstanding any standing or special order of this House, the following bill introduced in the Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament be reinstated forthwith in this session as follows:

An act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time and referred to legislative committee C (Bill C-78); and that the evidence educed and documents received by any special committee of this House in the Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament in relation to this bill be deemed to have been referred to legislative committee C (Bill C-78) in this present session.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary is not receiving unanimous consent to move this motion.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is denied.

APPOINTMENT OF A PORT WARDEN FOR THE HARBOUR OF QUEBEC

REINSTATEMENT OF BILL C-82

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, this relates to Bill C-82:

That, notwithstanding any standing or special order of this House, the following bill introduced in the Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament be reinstated forthwith in this session as follows:

An act to amend an act to provide for the appointment of a Port Warden for the Harbour of Quebec and an act to amend and consolidate the acts relating to the office of Port Warden for the Harbour of Montreal, and to validate certain fees and charges established pursuant thereto, be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second to a second time and referred to and reported by a legislative committee (without amendment), concurred in at report stage, read a third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion has been denied.

FEDERAL TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES

REINSTATEMENT OF BILL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I move:

That, notwithstanding any standing or special order of this House, the following bill introduced in the Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament be reinstated forthwith in this session as follows:

An act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, be deemed to have been introduced, read a first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time and referred to and reported by the Standing Committee on Finance with several amendments.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

MEMBERSHIP OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am sorry, Madam Speaker, there is one more that has been brought to my attention.

This one is a request of the New Democratic Party effecting changes on the management committee for the first striking meeting on which I think notice has gone out for Tuesday:

That effective May 21, 1991, the following changes be made to the membership of the Standing Committee on House Management:

Ms. Langan for Mr. Angus, Mr. Axworthy for Mr. Riis.

And that effective May 27, 1991, the following changes be made to the membership of the Standing Committee on House Management:

Mr. Angus for Ms. Langan, Mr. Riis for Mr. Axworthy.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, it is rather interesting to note some of the comments of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader who either intentionally or whatever brought these particular motions to the floor of the House today to seek unanimous consent of the House.

It was discussed earlier this morning with myself and the parliamentary secretary. There was a clear undertaking from the government that we would pursue discussions on these various matters. Obviously, in a sense of not wanting to co-operate with opposition members, they have proceeded to introduce these particular motions.

It should be noted that this is a very significant point of order, very, very significant. Since the beginning of this session contained in the throne speech, leading up to the throne speech and shortly thereafter, we have been hearing the buzz words and the rhetoric with regard to non-partisanship and co-operation among the parties.

We have co-operated when we have been consulted such as on the Beaudoin-Edwards committee. We have agreed to that. On the standing committee for health and welfare we have agreed to reinstate that. With regard to elections and privileges, we have been consulted on that and with regard to the references in terms of supply to the various standing committees, but lo and behold the government House leader is at it again. He is trying to drive things down our throats.

I am informing you, Madam Speaker, and through you members opposite, that members of this caucus and of this party are not going to put up with that. We are not going to accept that kind of conduct from government members opposite.

Very briefly my point of order will conclude. On the substance of those motions, the parliamentary secretary knows very well that the contents of those bills in many of those instances is that we have opposed them and opposed them vigorously. If they wish to proceed with them, they have an opportunity to lay the legislation before the House of Commons. But if they were so desirous of having all that legislation introduced, consummated and passed by Parliament, why did they not extend the sittings of the House and not call for a new Parliament?

The fact of the matter is that they do not want co-operation from opposition parties; they do not want that at all. They want to have it their way and to heck with those of us in the opposition.

I wish to inform you, sadly, Madam Speaker, that we in the opposition will not accept that kind of conduct from the parliamentary secretary who we always believed to be an honourable person. But obviously he has taken instructions from the thug of thugs.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I realize that the hon. member had a message which he wanted to put across, but I still do not see where there was a point of order.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I do not wish to extend the debate. I just simply wish to express to the House that no, we on this side of the House have not abandoned any desire to co-operate and to provide every opportunity for consultation with the hon. members.

I want to indicate to the House and to members present that what I did do was have meetings with the two opposition House leaders earlier this morning. We had some discussions. I had a change in circumstances at about 10 to 10.15 this morning which I tried to relate to the hon. members. I was in fact successful in communicating that to the House leader of the New Democratic Party, but was waiting for and have not yet received a return phone call from the House leader of the Liberals so I had to proceed.

I apologize to the hon. member. But perhaps in the future what he can do is return my calls. Give us a chance to discuss these things and we can then resolve them without having battles on the floor.

Mr. Dingwall: To my colleague opposite, I have never heard such blarney in all of my 11 years on the floor of the House of Commons.

In point of fact, the parliamentary secretary and I met in his office this morning at 9.40. The parliamentary secretary made the request at 9.50, prior to the House leader of the New Democratic Party coming, that we have to meet on a daily basis to discuss the various motions and matters which are going to be laid before members of Parliament on each and every day.

At that time, we concluded that we would meet again to discuss further the possibility of the reinstatement of bills. Now, to come into the House of Commons and say at 10.10, when we are on an opposition day—and the opposition House leader should be here with his official critic for transport to participate in that day—he drags out a phoney, lame excuse that he called and the phone call was not returned.

If there is not a demonstrable way of misleading the House, I do not know what better fact is. If the hon. member does not believe that it is misleading, I will withdraw that. But I will say this to the hon. member: You are awfully careless with the truth.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I do not wish to extend this discussion or debate any further. I simply want to state that what I have said is true and I stand by what I have said.

POINT OF ORDER

THRONE SPEECH BACKGROUND PAPER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to express to the House and to you, that I believe that an essential document for the functioning of our Parliament has not been provided for members of this House.

When the throne speech was presented to members of both Houses by His Excellency the Governor General, it was accompanied by a background paper which was provided to all members of the media. Members of the media, who were consulted only moments ago by myself and my colleagues, stated that they all received this document. No member of this House has received this document which accompanied the Throne Speech and which was entitled Background Paper. In other words, an explanatory note to the Throne Speech that was supposed to tell all of us how the document worked was given to members of the media and to no member on this side of the House, and it was probably not even given to the Chair.

It is essential that if this House is going to function, and if members are to be able to do their jobs, they must have access to all of those documents, a document which is supposed to be the original paper that tells us how the whole session is going to work.

Under the definition of privilege in Beauchesne's fifth edition citation 16 is stated:

> Parliamentary privilege is the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions and which exceed those possessed by other bodies or individuals.

If we cannot even get a copy of the totality of the throne speech of this Parliament, how can we as parliamentarians do our job?

There has been neglect on the part of the government, at the very least.

An hon. member: And negligence.

Mr. Boudria: Probably even worse. I want to know, why in this House, you and I and other members of this House were not given a copy of the document, which is an explanatory document to the throne speech, at the same time that it was given to every single member of the media in this country.

The opposition House leader just indicated the lack of co-operation we are getting from the government. It is even worse when we cannot even get a copy of the throne speech.

Madam Speaker, I hope you and your officials will examine this situation because it goes to the very root of how this Parliament can or cannot function by the way this government is operating.

• (1220)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I do not believe that the hon. member has a case of privilege. I looked at the throne speech. I did not see anything in it that indicated an addendum or an annex that was attached to it, so I do not know what the hon. member was protesting about. If in fact the press received background briefings or press briefings, that is a normal practice that many of us engage in, including the hon. member who from time to time gives the press materials.

It is clearly not a question of privilege. It is clearly a matter of debate. I am sorry that the hon. member has chosen to use his Opposition Day to do that.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, one of the principles on which Parliament operates is that Her Majesty the Queen is not to be injected into partisan debate. I regret very much that the deputy House leader for the government is taking this step. I hope that this will be noted in your ruling.

I want to draw your attention to a column which appeared in The Toronto Sun on May 15 written by Douglas Fisher. This column comments on the throne speech. It speaks of the background paper which in the words of Mr. Fisher elaborates on the throne speech and which he calls "an accompanying paper".

Mr. Fisher goes on to quote the portion of the throne speech which says that the government will ask MPs to "consider new procedures for assessing legislation, for raising grievances on behalf of constituents and for questioning governments to further enhance the role of individual members and their greater independence". Then Mr. Fisher goes to say: "The background paper says much of the public debate about reform of Parliament is focused on free votes".

The background paper apparently also talks about the government's desire "to avoid what is visually and physically reinforcing the we and them phenomenon which largely dictates the outcome of votes."

This is not in the throne speech. This, according to Mr. Fisher, is in the background paper which, in the words of Mr. Fisher, elaborates on the throne speech. In other words, it gives information about the government's plans and intentions sketched out in the throne speech. Information which, if it pertains to the throne speech, should have been given to members no less than to the press.

It is clear from this column by Mr. Fisher, a long-standing commentator on Parliament and a former member of Parliament, that this background paper was more than just a press summary of the throne speech. It developed the government's ideas as set forth in the throne speech beyond the actual words of the throne speech. If that was the case, then the government had an obligation to present that background paper to Parliament in the same way, and frankly, at the very least, before it did so to the press.

Not having taken this step, if this is not a breach of the privileges of the House, certainly we have a valid point of order and I ask you to rule accordingly. By the way, I am sure that the assistant deputy House leader, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, would want to make clear that if you find a prima facie case of privilege, one of us in the Official Opposition will be more than happy to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Cooper: I believe that the press person that my hon. friend refers to is probably Mr. Doug Fisher, who is a well-known watcher of Parliament. Someone whose reputation is highly regarded as an individual who knows a lot about this institution and the way that it functions. I think what the hon. member may want to do is sit down with Mr. Fisher in terms of the definitions that he used of any documents that he may or may not have had.

I do want to say that if the hon. member had been interested in the kind of issues that this government was concerned about and wants to see the House act upon, then all he would have had to have done is either watched or read the speech of the government House leader delivered in this House on Wednesday. The House leader went into detail about the kind of parliamentary reform and the kind of changes that we feel are necessary to try to restore to this institution, and to members, the confidence that I think has been lacking in us as demonstrated by the people of Canada.

I think that is what needs to be done. They can talk to Mr. Fisher. They can read the House leader's speech and it will give a clear indication of the kind of direction, the kind of commitment that this government has made in the past to parliamentary reform, has made in the present and will continue to do so in the future.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I listened very carefully to the remarks made by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and the hon. parliamentary secretary.

I think the debate that just ended is much more a political than a procedural debate. I do not believe it would be necessary for the government to present a document that was prepared for other purposes. For now, I do not consider there is a question of privilege. If, in the future, one were to submit others arguments to the Speaker, this decision could always be reviewed but for now, I do not consider there is a case of privilege.

We will continue with Routine Proceedings. Presentation of petitions; the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel.

PETITIONS

LEBANON

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition signed by Montrealers of Lebanese origin who are asking the government of Canada to take step as soon as possible at the United Nations so that the Security Council of the United Nations reaffirms the independence and sovereignty of Lebanon and guarantees its territorial integrity. Also, that the Security Council intervenes in order to insure the complete removal from Lebanese territory of foreign forces that are presently on Lebanese soil.

I would like to say, Madam Speaker, that the government of Canada has a responsability in this issue.

Lebanon is a beautiful country which deserves to be protected, and the government of Canada should take its responsabilities within the Security Council of the United Nations.

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present today.

Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise to present a petition signed by residents of Marcelin, Saskatchewan, who have recently been informed that Canada Post plans to close their community post office which is currently staffed by a postmaster who has done a fine job for the past three years that the post office has been under review.

The petitioners state that the Marcelin post office has been serving them well. They call on Parliament to support full service post offices like the one in Marcelin and to reject any proposal that would result in the closing of an existing post office.

I have another petition which is my duty and honour to present. This petition is signed by nearly 300 residents of the Saskatchewan community of Canwood, where Canada Post corporation has announced that the full service post office will close in early July.

The petitioners say their post office has served them well and they call on Parliament, first, to support the maintenance of rural postal services from existing full service post offices like the one in Canwood, and second, to reject any proposal that would result in the closing of this existing post office.

I hope the government will heed the wishes of my constituents.

Supply

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition that has been signed by Canadians right across this country. In this petition they are asking the government to make good on its promise, made in 1986 to take whatever measures are necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited grounds of discrimination in Canada.

The government has yet to introduce any type of legislative amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act, despite it being over five years since they made that promise.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission has consistently called for an amendment to the act.

The petitioners also say that in Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and in the Yukon, the provincial governments have made these provisions in their human rights legislation.

They call upon the government to ensure that it brings forward, immediately, an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited grounds of discrimination.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Marchi (p. 233).

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I do not wish to take away from the time of the minister unduly, but I believe there might be a disposition within the House that opposition members be given the opportunity to split their time as they see fit, 10 minutes and 10 minutes. I think that is in keeping with the traditions of this particular House and I am sure that members would want to concur.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I would like to indicate our full co-operation and concurrence and, in fact, it is consistent with the rule changes that we recently brought in.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I would like to resume my speech in this important debate where it was interrupted at 11 o'clock this morning for the Business of the House.

So, Madam Speaker, as I was saying this morning, our government is aware of the truckers' situation. Let me repeat that we have already acted. Last year, we asked officials in my department to do a comprehensive study of the factors involved in cross-border competitiveness.

The study was divided into eight parts; the purposes of this study are to determine the nature and parameters of the Canadian share of the cross-border market, to evaluate the competitiveness of Canadian trucking companies in these markets and to analyze the impact of factors that can affect their ability to compete. The priority of all concerned is the comparative study of the Canadian and American tax systems. That is why we speeded up the process in that particular area.

The firm of Peat, Marwick, Thorne has thus undertaken a thorough study of the tax systems in effect in both countries and their impact on the cross-border competitiveness of Canadian transportation. This study is to be printed this weekend, and I will then send it to task force members. Until then, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the contents of the study, since the task force has not yet made it public.

[English]

Believe me, if I could I would because I believe it will, once and for all, lay to rest much of the negative misinformation that is currently being circulated about Canadian taxes.

The study has been extremely helpful in clarifying the issues. It shows, for example, that broad generalizations cannot be made about taxes and the trucking industry. There is not one over-all factor that explains disadvantages and advantages. Taxes obviously are not the only matter of concern to truckers.

[Translation]

For the other expenses concerning trends in cross-border transportation, analyses of the economic conditions for Canadian carriers operating in cross-border markets, a comparison of their economic performance, the costs of Canadian and American truckers in the cross-border market and an evaluation of alternative standards for cabotage, a study will cover and summarize all the action taken.

This study must be completed for the task force to review it and draw conclusions and make recommendations next week. All concerned must be present at the discussion table to be able to review this very important aspect of the studies. I am sure that every member of the task force will participate in this review and in making recommendations.

I would like to add a few words about the methodology of these studies. I am convinced that the way they were conducted can only give great credibility to their findings. So that no group in particular be targeted by any part of the studies, the task force was comprised of two groups of truck owners, one of them representing seven associations represented, as well as the three unions representing the majority of the transport companies employees, the Canadian Trucking Association, the Truckers Council which represents hundreds of truck fleet operations and six national freight associations.

[English]

As the provinces play a very prominent role in the administration of trucking regulations, each province and territory has a place on the task force.

Finally, because many federal departments are touched by the issues on the table, six federal departments are represented. No point of view was overlooked, as 40 different organizations are represented. Not all members attended every task force meeting but a good cross-section of each industry and government was present at each one. They were present and actively participated in the selection of consultants. They have criticized the draft reports and sent the consultants back to do again various parts or all of the study in order to meet their demands. They are expected to meet for the sixth time on June 4 to criticize the wrap-up study and formulate their recommendations for action.

I fully expect that there will be work for everyone coming out of these recommendations, for the federal and provincial governments and for the industry itself. No one will get off scot-free. The task force has worked as a team. Even though some of its members have not always seen eye to eye, they have, in the vast majority of cases, gone away from meetings with a feeling of positive accomplishment.

I only wish that other jurisdictions were as co-operative on other issues as they have been with regard to the studies.

[Translation]

It is ironic that, just a few weeks ago, the Premier of Ontario wrote the Ontario Truckers Association to tell them, and I quote: "Having worked closely with Ed Philip, the Ontario Minister of Transport, you are certainly aware that we are presently reviewing the short term tax measures affecting the trucking industry."

I bet the Ontario Trucking Association was surprised when it found out that the real intentions of the government had to do with tax measures concerning the trucking industry. Over the past few days, many figures were quoted concerning the number of banckruptcies in the trucking industry in accounts from truckers, from the media and from the members opposite.

While there is a proportional increase in the percentage of banckruptcies in this industry, it does not exceed what can be expected in such a cyclical industry as trucking.

I know that this is of little comfort to those affected, but the number of banckruptcies in the US trucking industry also reached a record high in 1990.

Some claim also that the American carriers are taking all the work away from Canadian companies. It may seem like that because the figures from Statistics Canada indicate that tonnage carried by trucks between Canada and the United States dropped 7 per cent between 1988 and 1989, and declined an additional 3 per cent last year.

Before 1988, Madam Speaker, Canadians had an apparent advantage because of the deregulation of the trucking industry in the United States in 1980. It is a fact that since January 1, 1988, there are more U.S. carriers in Canada. This, combined with a drop in traffic as a result of the recession, accounts for the difference in market share, compared with what the situation was like before.

I would like to focus a few moments on the impact of the recession. We can give many reasons why the present recession hurts as much as it does. One is that we had previously enjoyed a period of unprecedented strong economic growth.

Entry controls in the trucking industry were relaxed in the early 80s, soon after U.S. deregulation. During the five years prior to January 1, 1988, 95 per cent of trucking licences were issued by provincial transport commissions.

Many new Canadian companies started operations during this period, and we have good reason to believe that many will survive to enjoy the next period of growth which all economists say will start in a matter of weeks. These companies are challenging old concepts and bringing innovative solutions to the industry. We need these companies to become competitive on new world markets.

Our truckers would never have acquired the requisite "lean and mean" approach if we had continued to hide them behind the protective walls of regulation. We have good reason to believe the economy will recover in the fall. Our truckers will be ready to respond to this economic renewal and to the higher wages the Free Trade Agreement will bring as a result.

Meanwhile, I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that I and my colleagues on this side of the House have listened to the genuine demands made by the hard-working and determined men and women in the trucking industry. We are actively trying to find ways to help them weather the present storm. We have asked all parties, including governments, labour, the trucking industry and the business community to co-operate with us. I am convinced, Madam Speaker, that in the course of the process that is now going on, which includes all parties involved in this area, we will find the kind of solutions that will help these men and women who are truck owners and who represent a very substantial part of the vitality of Canada's trucking industry.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I listened to the minister attentively. I would like to ask him a couple of questions.

He referred to the fact that as minister he is not able to refer to some of the findings of the studies that have been commissioned by this government. I am wondering how he reconciles that comment with that of his predecessor who, in a letter to the Canadian Trucking Association, said quite clearly that he would not be prepared to wait until the final chapter is written on those studies, and that he would like to commence on some of the obvious findings rather than waiting.

It seems that the comments of today's minister are very much at odds with those of his predecessor.

Second, I am wondering if he could perhaps explain what he meant in today's Toronto Star where he is quoted as saying that there is "one major component" of the cost of doing business as a trucker in Canada that can make our drivers uncompetitive with American drivers. He has suggested that there is one trump card in a deck of options that he has focused on. I am wondering whether he can clarify for this House and for Canadians what that one major piece of the puzzle is.

Last, could he inform us or provide us with an update—again, I made reference to the fact that I thanked him for meeting with the delegation. He has been meeting for over a day. The meetings are still ongoing. Could he give us an update as to how the discussions are going. Are there any specific items on the table that he can tell us about and any commitments that have been made to show that there is indeed momentum and not just meetings? Thank you.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, in reply to the first question, I think that what I said earlier contradicts in no way what my predecessor wrote in his letter because, aside from these studies, work that could be conducted in-house, within the Department, was indeed undertaken. As a matter of fact, we have been provided with partial findings of these internal projects to allow us to determine, once the studies are completed and the findings submitted to the Department, whether we will be able to answer this or that question and, more importantly, discuss the facts.

As regards the status of the present round of discussions, I have no indication that they are over. So, I have to assume they are ongoing. The meeting started yesterday afternoon, at 5:30 p.m., and went late into the evening. Just the fact that they have agreed to continue the discussions this morning is certainly a very clear indication that they are relatively happy with how things are going. Otherwise, they would have left the table a long time ago.

However, I am not at liberty to disclose specific items to my hon. colleague from York West. It was agreed from the outset between the representatives of the independent truckers at the table and my senior officials that, as long as the discussions were not finalized, neither side would comment on the contents of the discussions. Of course, I intend to honour that commitment.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister about some remarks he made before the Question Period started in which he said that the Canadian Trucking Association refused to co-operate in drafting a code of ethics for truckers. My office has received a call from Mr. Ken MacLaren, the executive vice-president of the Canadian Trucking Association, in which he said: "The government is hiding behind studies. The trucking industry has not been consulted about the direction or the content of studies".

More seriously, Mr. MacLaren denies that the Canadian Trucking Association has refused to co-operate in drafting a code of ethics for truckers.

Now if I know Mr. MacLaren I am sure the minister will be getting a letter with smoke coming out of the envelope very shortly. I want to know if he can present to this House whatever evidence he has to refute Mr. MacLaren. He was most adamant in saying to my office only half an hour ago that at no time did the Canadian Trucking Association refuse to co-operate in drafting a code of ethics, and that they were not consulted about the direction or content of studies.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will certainly not get into a debate here on what someone might or might not have said. The information I obtained from throughout my department indicates that what I said just now is accurate. I will recheck after this debate to ensure that my words indeed reflect the actual situation, but nothing leads me to believe the opposite for the time being.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I had asked a second question of the minister. I am wondering if he went on honestly to the last question. I appreciate that if an agreement was made with the truckers not to release detail it is something that the minister and the truckers will have to honour.

However, the minister did speculate out loud with some of the media yesterday. He was specific in saying that there is one major component that can make the truckers either competitive or non-competitive. I assume that it is uncompetitive and therefore some improvement is necessary to that one major component.

Perhaps the minister would share with us today, or the Minister of State for Transport later on during this debate, what that one major component is so that we in the opposition can address ourselves to it as well.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I would really like to satisfy the wish and request of the hon. member opposite, but in discussions with the owner operators yesterday morning, we identified, an important component of their operating costs. After we did so, we mutually agreed to extend the talks last night. If I commented on this important component of operating costs, I would not keep my word because that is precisely one of the subjects of our discussion and the main subject of the discussions now going on.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I could not agree more with the vice-president, who says that the government is hiding behind studies.

I would like to ask the minister what his department has been doing for the last three years. Presumably, before the department embarked on the deregulation of the industry, which was a precursor to the free trade agreement, there should have been some studies done.

In the same way as the Department of Finance kept most of those studies secret from the public, I believe that there were studies done in his department as to what the effect of deregulation would be and what the specific effect of the government's tax policies will be. If studies were not done then clearly the government moved in a manner which showed complete and utter disregard for the jobs of Canadians.

The minister said that he is waiting until the studies come in. His predecessor said he did not have to wait for the studies to come in. I would like to ask him specifically what action he is prepared to announce today in the House of Commons to give some hope to those truckers and their families who will remain here on the Hill. The tie-ups across the province of Ontario have had an effect on its already reeling economy. Is the minister going to continue to allow that to happen and is he going to continue to play political Ping-Pong with his friend Premier Rae of Ontario who, like the minister, is not prepared to hit this problem head on and provide some real solutions to the truckers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, when the hon. member for Hamilton East makes statements like the one she just made, she does not lead us all to practical solutions. As I said in this House several times, it is precisely to determine whether the perceptions and allegations of the Canadian tax system putting owner operators at a disadvantage are accurate or not. The government did not decide to conduct studies—I repeat it and I will go on repeating it forever—it was the various interested parties. The provincial governments, in spite of what our friends opposite might say, have a tremondous responsibility in this issue because of the taxes they impose on diesel fuel.

It is therefore at the request of the interested parties that we created this task force made up of all interested groups and this task force decided to conduct studies to establish the facts.

[English]

I would like to tell my hon. colleague that in the end there are many people who are saying that deregulation has not been detrimental to the trucking industry, and that in fact is has had significant positive benefits to the whole trucking sector.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I want to first say to my colleague from York West that I am very pleased that he and his party moved this motion today, and I want to compliment him on his speech because it is about the same as I would have said. I probably could endorse 90 per cent of the remarks he made.

When we get into these kinds of crises, we all forget some essential things about transportation. Without a good, efficient, functioning transportation system, all modes that operate at a reasonable profit and the entire economy of the country grind to a halt. Transportation is the foundation of any economy of any country.

Successive governments have played fast and loose with transportation policy in the name of so-called free enterprise, competition, competitiveness and so forth. Today it is not just the trucking industry that is hurting and is in real trouble, but the railroads as well. There are essentially only two of those. Why? Because of the very thing that the minister just said, that deregulation helped them, when the opposite is the case.

I do not know if the minister was here when I sat on the standing committee when we dealt with the government white paper on deregulation for over two years. We held hearings all across the country. Repeatedly, we were promised by the government that something would be done about many things, including the differences in the tax laws between Canada and the United States.

When we were dealing with the legislation in 1987, which took effect in January 1988, we were promised that with deregulation something would be done about a number of matters and still all we are having are studies.

I keep hearing about the word "competitiveness". The word "competitiveness" has been in the government's vocabulary ad nauseam for a long time. "A level playing field", that is another one.

By the very laws, rules and regulations that the federal government and all 10 provinces are carrying out, they are hurting the competitive capacity of the trucking and railway industries in Canada. They are at a disadvantage with the United States operators. Last year in the province of Ontario alone, 675 trucking firms went bankrupt. That is as a direct result of deregulation.

Everybody wants into the act and all that happens is they take turns going broke. When they go broke because of laws and regulations, or lack of laws and regulations, by the federal government, it means the federal government itself is to blame for any lack of competitiveness in the trucking industry in the railroads.

Then there is this level playing field. If you walk out on a baseball diamond or on a football field, you will see that they are not level. They are sloped. They are higher in the middle than on the sides and the ends.

This level playing field that the government has devised under the free trade agreement and deregulation is sloped. It is sloped all down hill to the U.S.A. What the hell is the use of having a level playing field if according to our own laws, rules and regulations, or lack of, the other guy has the ball on our 10-yard line all the time? We have to start from behind. It does not matter whether it is the trucking industry, and it is not just peculiar to Ontario and Quebec. It is the case in every province across Canada.

American railroads can do things in Canada that Canadian railroads cannot do in the United States, depending on what state they are in. That part of the playing field has never been made level. That is part of deregulation and the free trade agreement.

The tax laws have been gone into, the depreciation schedules. I will not repeat what my friend from York West had to say, but let me remind the Chair that the submission to the federal minister's task force by the Canadian Trucking Association recommended that: "In the case of the depreciation rate issue, the Canadian Trucking Association urges the Government of Canada to take immediate actions to equalize the depreciation schedules for tractors and trailers in Canada with those in the United States. It is anticipated that by undertaking this action approximately 20 per cent of the current competitive disadvantage experienced by the Canadian based motor carriers would be eliminated".

That should also apply to the Canadian railroads, which are victimized by the same kind of depreciation schedule for their rolling stock as our trucking industry is.

In the case of truck tractors, in the United States a tractor owner can write off one-third of it in the first year; in Canada it is 15 per cent. In the second year he can write off another 45 per cent of it; in Canada, 25 per cent. By the fourth year the American carrier can write off the remaining 7 per cent; in the thirteenth year the Canadian carrier can write off the last .5 per cent.

It is similar in the case of trailers: 20 per cent depreciation for a U.S. carrier in the first year, 15 per cent for Canadian; 32 per cent for an American carrier in the second year, 25 per cent for Canadian, and so on down through the piece.

I do not understand the stubbornness. This matter of depreciation schedules was also raised with the previous Liberal government and we got nowhere.

I have been through 14 ministers of transport since I came here in 1968. They should have a revolving door in the minister's office. Every damn one of them, Liberal or Tory, it did not make any difference, would not act.

There is another matter about fuel taxes. All the provinces have a fuel tax and the federal government has a fuel tax. In the United States, fuel taxes are earmarked; 97 per cent of its fuel taxes go into highway infrastructure of all kinds and 7 per cent into mass transit. In Canada, the federal government which collects something in the order of $600 million, puts 5 per cent, is for mainly the Trans-Canada Highway through national parks and nothing else. The government threw out the entire revolving fund for grade separations. Rail line relocation has disappeared.

If the federal government would at least use the fuel taxes it collects to finish four-laning the Trans-Canada Highway, northern Ontario alone would be a $2 billion to $3 billion tab. In the western provinces we are looking at another $1 billion. When we drive through northern Ontario heading west, any resemblance between that and the Trans-Canada Highway is laughable. They could at least spend the fuel taxes on transportation but, no, it goes into general revenue and the government can do whatever it likes with it.

The finance department does not like dedicated taxes. There are some that should be dedicated or earmarked and the fuel tax is one of them. It is a user fee and you use those taxes for the infrastructure—roads, bridges, highways, and grade separations or whatever—as the Americans do. I am not all that complimentary about very much in the United States, but that is one thing it uses some good sense on. We cannot get it here. Since you are not going to use those fuel taxes for transportation then why not reduce them? Otherwise you are collecting taxes under false pretences. It is a transportation user tax and it is not being used on transportation.

There is another matter that I have raised in this House repeatedly since the mid-1970s, in the days of the late unlamented Otto Lang, figuratively speaking.

An hon. member: He was Liberal, was he not?

Mr. Benjamin: Oh, yes. What is the difference?

An hon. member: Or even the good party.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes. They are the good guys now, you see. If they had done all the things they said today back when they were in power, there would not be a Tory government in place. But that is all right.

The whole matter of interprovincial and international trucking or any kind of interprovincial-international transportation, under our Constitution, comes under federal jurisdiction. There are no ifs, ands or buts about it.

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, the federal government of that day transferred the administration and the responsibility for that over to the provinces. Ever since then we have had a jungle. We have had 13 jurisdictions: 2 territories, 10 provinces and the federal government, running in 13 directions. It does not matter whether it is load limits, speed limits, size of trucks or safety standards, the jungle is still there. That is something else that we were repeatedly promised. In the two years we spent on the white paper on deregulation and in the almost one year we spent on the bill itself, we were repeatedly told by the government and the then Ministers of Transport that meetings were going on.

I think it was three different Tory Ministers of Transport who came before the transport committee with their annual estimates and a statement and assured us, time after time, of how they were negotiating with the provinces to arrive at a standard that applies across the country.

We have still got some more studies. After all these years, where is this standard? The federal government, through an Order in Council or whatever it takes, has the constitutional jurisdiction to say to the provinces: "We are setting the standards. If you will not agree among yourselves, if you will not negotiate the common standards across the country, then we will do it for you because we have the constitutional authority".

I am sick and tired of various provincial governments in their parochial little centres, and that is of all parties, that do not consider the whole country. We are the ones who have to consider the whole country. If we do not, who the hell is going to? I am tired of these baronial premiers who worry only about their own little bailiwick and not about their fellow Canadians.

• (1310)

There is another area. My colleague from York West mentioned that as well. I liked pretty well all of his nine points. In general, I can support them and I am sure my colleagues will.

I had discussions with Canadian Trucking Association representatives a year ago in which they told me that five or six medium and large Canadian trucking companies had just picked up their head offices and their operations and moved across the border. It is still going on and it is going to get worse. We will end up without a Canadian trucking industry worthy of the name.

The problem is deregulation. If you can find a bank manager to lend you the money, lease a second-hand tractor and, if necessary, a second-hand trailer, you can automatically get a licence and go into business the next day.

The established trucker who has his own mechanics, maintenance and everything else and has put 20, 30 or 40 years into his business has to compete with that. That is one of the results of deregulation. It threw the industry into a jungle. It is survival of the fittest. That applies to Mother Nature, but deregulation is not our mother and it is not natural, nor is it fit.

In a society supposedly trying to keep this country together from east to west and from the 49th parallel to the Arctic, all the government does is to continue to divide us. All it does is allow this kind of squabbling to go on without having the courage to take some decisive actions.

Tommy Douglas taught me that I would rather lose for doing something than win for doing nothing. When the devil are you going to take action to re-regulate.

I am glad to note that Ontario has placed a two year moratorium on new licences in the trucking industry. I hope all the provinces do that. It is overdue. We need more trucking companies like we need a hole in the head.

I want to say to the hon. member for York West that we appreciate the motion he moved. In general, we liked the contents of his speech and I hope the government will decide as a result of today's debate that there are some actions they can and should take.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague who just spoke probably stopped his watch 90 years ago. He is talking to us about the socialist rhetoric that has failed most of the countries in the world that have implemented it. The only countries in the world that are successfully governed by socialists are succeeding because they have returned to the free market and the laws of the free market.

The hon. member said that deregulation has caused all these problems. He asked a question, but I have still not decided in my mind what competitiveness means.

I would like to say to the hon. member that competitiveness—

Mr. Benjamin: I do not remember that.

Mr. Corbeil: Maybe he does not remember from one minute to the next what he said. That is precisely what he said.

The capacity to compete with others is very closely tied to deregulation. Regulation prevents players in any given field from having the flexibility necessary to meet the competition from other countries.

I would like to show hon. member through a little bit of arithmetic. He talked about the federal excise tax which, as I said this morning and I will repeat it again, is 4 cents a litre. The federal excise tax in the U.S. is 6.2 cents. The federal excise tax on fuel in the U.S. is almost 60 per cent higher than in Canada, per litre. In the U.S., it is 6.2 cents and ours is 4 cents.

The hon. member also wants to ignore the fact that the provincial sales tax on fuel is the crippling aspect of the situation. The fuel tax in Michigan, with which most Ontario truckers compete, is 4.6 cents per litre.

By the end of this year, when the announced increases are implemented by his friend from the branch in Toronto, it will be 14.3 cents. He complains about the federal excise tax and the taxing system which is 60 per cent or at least 40 per cent less in Canada than in the U.S.

At the same time he does not see much wrong with the fact that the government with which he is friends is imposing a provincial fuel tax that is 300 per cent of the one that is implemented by the corresponding U.S. state.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I am glad we got another 10-minute speech out of the minister.

I was complaining about all the sales and excise taxes but at least the provinces, all of them, spend as much as they collect from fuel taxes, or more, on highways, roads, streets, sidewalks and mass transit. They do not specifically earmark it, but that is where the money is spent.

The federal government's contribution to the transportation infrastructure in this country is abysmal. If the government is not going to use the tax it is collecting for transportation then it should get rid of it.

My point was that despite all this talk from the government and in the throne speech about competitiveness it cannot happen because the laws we have, whether they are deregulation or provincial and federal taxes, prohibit Canadian trucking and railway industries from really competing.

Unless those laws are changed, the deck is stacked against them. The government has allowed the other side, the Americans, to have the ball on our 10–yard line all the time in a so–called level playing field. That is not fair ball.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by commending my hon. friend on his very fine, articulate, and at times very passionate speech in defence of some national responsibilities that ought to be discharged somewhat more forcefully.

The minister compared fuel taxes between the United States and Canada. It says in my statistics—perhaps we can take another look at it—that the American federal tax is 4.6 cents a litre whereas ours is 4.0 cents a litre.

Theirs is in fact slightly higher. However, what the minister failed to mention is that the base price for diesel fuel in the United States is 18.6 cents a litre compared to 37.9 cents a litre in Canada.

Therefore, while the two excise taxes charged by the two national governments are almost the same, the big differential is in the spread between the base prices. That is why I believe we on this side have been making an argument that we need to obviously be very concerned with both the federal and provincial excise taxes simply because the base prices are very, very different.

I am wondering if the hon. member can perhaps make a comment on that debate and, second, if he would be able to offer his analysis and his party's views on the fact that the government seems so intent on issuing study after study after the advent of deregulation, when in fact those studies ought to have properly been done before the deregulation door was swung open. I am wondering what his rationale would be for a government which studies the down effects after a policy has been undertaken, as opposed to having it done in the reverse order.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. gentleman is quite correct about his analysis and the statistics he has. I might add that slightly less than 40 cents per litre, depending on the volume purchased, is the diesel fuel cost in Ontario. The cost of diesel fuel on the more concentrated U.S. trucking routes is 26 cents.

I heard on CBC Radio news this morning of 33 cents cost in upper New York State compared to 53 cents in Canada, and 56 cents on gasoline.

That kind of handicap destroys any possibility for competitiveness. Surely that requires both the federal and provincial governments acting in concert, and not more studies. We have had studies up to our ears.

I remember the two years we spent on the white paper, and we heard witnesses from Halifax to Victoria. Their big corporations wanted deregulation, but we did not hear that very much from the transportation industry.

I want to say that the whole ideological binge that the government is on has got to stop. Their policies have proven to be harmful, are hurting this country, hurting its sovereignty, hurting its independence, and hurting a hell of a lot of people in this country.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The time for questions and comments has expired. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

The hon. minister of Labour has something more to say?

M. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, during a previous intervention, the previous speaker—

[English]

The speaker mentioned previously that something I had said in my speech was incorrect because he had an indication from an outside source that this was not the case.

I am informed that there have been three meetings of the federal–provincial working group on this matter. This was chaired by Manitoba. The Canadian Trucking Association refused to attend. The owners and operators coalition has also tried and the same organization has refused.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Very well. Back to the debate. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, you probably noticed, like I did, that this was not a point of order.

I am glad to be able to take part in this debate today, and I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for York West, for presenting this motion to the House.

[English]

Canada's trucking industry is a $12 billion business. It employs directly and indirectly almost half a million Canadians. It is indeed big business and it is a business that we should all strive to help, to assist and hope to conserve, both for the near and distant future.

A little more than a year ago the government was made aware of the difficulties of this industry, if it did not know even before then through the blockages that occurred at a number of border points.

[Translation]

At that time, Mr. Speaker, the government was already aware of the problems. In fact, in 1988, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel and I made speeches in the House against the deregulation bill, the bill tabled by the government opposite to deregulate the transportation industry.

We said at the time that the rules were not the same on both sides of the border and that deregulation would immediately give U.S. truckers an advantage. Perhaps the minister would care to check Hansard to see what opposition members said. Unfortunately, all of this proved to be true. I say unfortunately, because a lot of my constituents are hurting now.

[English]

On April 26 of this year a number of my colleagues and I were holding task force hearings on the deindustrialization of our country. In Alexandria, Ontario, we met with a number of truckers who came to tell us the state the trucking industry was in.

Three days later, on April 29, I sent an open letter to the Minister of Transport and had it hand delivered to his office here on Parliament Hill. To this date the letter remains unanswered, not even an acknowledgement has yet been received by my office. In that letter I outlined for the minister the problems that were related to us by Mrs. Janet Keusch who was here a few days ago and met with the minister.

They told us very clearly the troubles the industry was in. They told us that not only was Glengarry Transport, GTL, having big problems but so were they, the small truckers, the truckers, the brokers, and the independent operators of the difficulties.

They told us about the depreciation rules that they felt were unfair. They told us about the fuel that was considerably more expensive in Canada—I am reading from the letter that I sent to the minister—insurances which are very high, the unreasonably high deductibles that they have to deal with on insurance, and of course they told us about the border problems where U.S. truckers come here with little or no verification as to the safety of their vehicles.

Most of all they talked to us about the GST which stands for, they say, "government squashes truckers". The GST, the minister tells us, is reimbursed to the truckers for their fuel and input costs. When? I have yet to find a trucker who has received a GST cheque. Today is May 17. The GST has been in effect since January 1.

[Translation]

Since January 1, the truckers in my riding and across Canada lend this government money every time they pay the GST. They file for their refund but they never get the money, Mr. Speaker. To justify its position, the government says: They will get interest on their refund. Mr. Speaker, when his company is bankrupt, receiving $3 or $10 in interest is no help to a trucker who just lost his business, his home and all his assets. That is something the government should understand.

[English]

Now the government tells us it has seven studies which were started a year ago. Why does it take this long to have studies done? Why can we not get at least interim relief for the truckers? And why has that not been contemplated before now? This is a little hard to understand.

The Minister of Transport will know of the letter sent by his predecessor, the member for Simcoe North, in which he said earlier this year that he would not wait for the outcome of the studies. I quote from the letter of January 11, 1991, which was sent to Mr. A. K. Maclaren.

• (1330)

It says:

I have no intention, however, of waiting until all the studies are complete, to take any action which becomes evidently necessary—

The highways are blocked with truckers. Is it not evidently necessary that something has to be done? Glengarry Transport, Canada's fourth largest trucking company, has gone bankrupt and 1,800 people have lost their jobs. Is it not evidently necessary that something has to be done?

According to a May 9 story in The Financial Post Kingsway Transport is for sale, Federal Industries wants to get rid of it because they are not making any money with the company. Is it not evidently necessary that something has to be done?

The letter of April 29 that I sent to the minister remains unanswered. Three times I tried on behalf of my constituents to get a meeting with the minister, for Glengarry Transport. Once I managed to get a call back from one of his assistants. The meeting was never held between that minister and Glengarry Transport.

The closest I managed to get to the minister was in the lobby with three women, one of whom was from my riding. The minister, in his condescending way, refused to let me be there with my constituents. To make it worse, he did not want to appear outside the House of Commons within the same television screen in case there were cameras there with the MP representing the people in question. That is the kind of work that was done by that minister across the way, and I point the finger at him.

In the moment or two that I have left, I must say, though, at the very least his seat mate, the Associate Minister of Transport, did agree to meet with the people of GTL. She did try. I know it was at the last minute. We were only 24 hours away from the bankruptcy, but when I failed to get a meeting with the senior Minister of Transport, at least I managed to get one with the Minister of State for Transport, who at least was willing to hear the concerns of my constituents.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister of Transport—I realize he may be a little newer at this game than some of us—that it is high time he helped the industry and my constituents, 1,800 people in Canada in the case of Glengarry, and the 656 other companies that went bankrupt last year and all other Canadians who lost their jobs.

In a letter dated January 11, the minister's predecessor told us he would not wait for the results of the studies. If that is still the government's policy, I would like to know now whether the government intends at least to take certain measures to help trucking companies, before it announces further measures later on.

[English]

Finally, to the people sitting at our left, they should remember the last increase in the price of diesel fuel by the the Government of Ontario. While both the federal government and the Government of Ontario are arguing with each other, trying to figure out which of the two is the worst culprit, my constituents are going bankrupt. The people of my riding do not have jobs. People elsewhere in Canada in the trucking industry need help.

[Translation]

So I want to ask the minister today, in this very last minute, this last hour which may be crucial for many truckers, to help them by at least announcing a number of measures.

I know he had several meetings with the truckers during the past few days, and I hope we will get at least a few measures that will give hope to the people who are about to lose everything, everything—excuse the repetition—as a result of this government's deregulation policy which was introduced in 1988.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Five-minute period for questions and comments.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue on the same theme as my colleague, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I would also like to let him know my concerns and that I too understand the truckers, as I just said to his colleague from York West.

These people have problems, Mr. Speaker. They did long before the GST, long befere deregulation, maybe even before some of my colleagues came to this place, except for the hon. member who just spoke. He has been here for at least 25 years. As I was saying, these people do have problems, not only fuel and tax problems, but also major problems with insurance, licences, buying trucks and repairs.

I can remember garage owners I was dealing with telling me 15 years ago: "Truckers are all fine people. They are having a rough time, but we cannot fix their trucks if they cannot pay the bill." I can tell you that, 15 years ago, many of my colleagues had never heard of the GST stood for. I can see that the opposition always comes up with the same suggestion: "Take a step forward, a step backward, a step forward. Remove the GST; that will solve the problem."

Even if we removed all taxes—GST and federal tax—tomorrow morning, these guys would not go a block that they would face the same problem. They would come back and say: "Mister Minister, we are still experiencing problems." The minister mentioned that the report is about to be released. I hope so. The truckers are not looking for a quick fix or a two bit solution. They want a long term solution to their problem. Were licences issued? I remember the provinces used to make the decisions and issue licences. I went to get one myself at the Quebec Transport Commission. So, they made the decisions. Unfortunately, they made the wrong decisions at some point because there were too many requests. We cannot prevent people from earning a living, but regulations may be needed in certain circumstances.

The "forward, backward" solution the Liberals are suggesting is not to remove the GST, for the truckers do not pay GST or, if they do, they can get a refund.

An hon. member: They never got it!

Mr. Della Noce: They never got it. Did they ask for a it? My colleague mentioned that GTL Transport just went bankrupt. I would like to point out to him that there was no GST in 1990. What would the ideal solution be in his view? Would it be to remove the GST or to keep the truckers safely protected by regulation?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russel has the floor for two minutes.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, first the hon. member opposite just told us that the industry had problems before 1988. First, in the case of Glengarry Transport, that is not true. The company was founded in 1948. For 40 consecutive years, GTL made profits, from 1948 to 1988. In 1988, the company started to incur losses and this has continued until 1991. That means, since deregulation. I want to tell the hon. member opposite, Mr. Speaker, that at last report, GTL was losing a million dollars a month. This is a company that made profits until 1988 and that had always been profitable.

The hon. member opposite asks us what we Liberals propose to do. I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to read once more the proposals of my colleague, the hon. member for York West—

[English]

The hon. member for York West proposed earlier today—I will repeat it for the benefit of my colleague across the way—quicker write-off provisions, federal excise tax relief on diesel fuel, more fairness for the GST on billing.

He wants to have a better system for the GST rebate on fuel, deduction of licence expenses, meetings of federal and provincial transport ministers to solve long-term problems and federal-provincial trade-off issues, stricter enforcement and higher penalties for American firms engaging in cabotage and a temporary moratorium on new interprovincial licences.

I thank my colleague for asking those questions again. They were all answered about an hour ago, but it gives us another chance to put them on the record.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity today to speak on a very important industry to the province of Ontario and to Canada.

As the truckers outside this Parliament park their rigs, they wait for action from this government.

If I may, on behalf of the truckers, Dale Hellier, Diane Bell, Dave Wallace and many more offer their thanks to the OPP, the RCMP and the security officers for the courtesy that has been shown to them while they have been here in Ottawa on the Hill. It has been greatly appreciated.

• (1340)

Driving a truck is more than a job, it is a way of life and the current federal government is destroying that dream for many. I have been a truck driver travelling all over the prairies. I know the intense feeling of independence, of getting the job done on time and with a great deal of pride.

I drove auto transport to Saskatchewan, through small towns in Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Manitoba. I also drove in the sugar beet industry and drove the grain runs in southwestern Ontario for many years.

The trucking industry is crucially important to Ontario. It is the lifeblood of every community, especially in the smaller and rural areas. Virtually every person in the province, whether they realize it or not, depends on trucks to keep the products we all use and consume every day moving and available.

Trucks move every product and commodity: consumer goods like appliances and furniture; bulk commodities like grain and fertilizer; delicate products such as fresh fruit, meat and vegetables; major products such as cars, steel, livestock and heavy machinery; and the most intricate products such as scientific instruments and computers. They serve every Ontario community accessible by road, and every day, in some way, they contribute to the lives of every person in Ontario and Canada.

Think of the human factor. Hospitals, food and grocery stores, drug stores and gas stations cannot operate without direct transportation. Indeed, in Ontario, truck transportation accounts for nearly 70 per cent of the total freight shipped. Trucks generate more gross income than all other modes of transportation combined, estimated to be $24 billion just five years ago.

The industry employs over 250,000 people in Ontario; they are drivers, mechanics, computer specialists, marketing experts, terminal workers, accountants and administrators. In fact, the trucking industry employs fully five per cent of the provincial labour force. As well, the Ontario trucking industry, responsible for nearly half of all the trucking activity in Canada, spends over $5 billion in operating expenses.

In addition, it is worthy to note that every sector of the economy relies to some degree on trucking services. As a result, trucking activities have higher than average multipliers or spin-off effects in Ontario. So if the federal government, at this time, would let them have a rebate they would receive the money back many times over with men being employed and able to operate.

A recent study by Coopers and Lybrand said that a one dollar increase in trucking activity generates more than two dollars worth of goods and services in other sectors. So the money the government does not receive today by allowing them a few breaks will come back manyfold. When the trucking industry is hurting we are all hurting.

Trucking firms paid the federal government more than $70 million in federal corporate income tax. Ontario motor carriers paid over $170 million in federal excise taxes on the diesel fuel they consumed. The little bit of taxes on the fuel saved now could keep these people working and more money in circulation. Of course, none of that money will help to rebuild the road and highway system, so important to truckers and an efficient economy.

I hope that sets in everyone's mind just how important a profitable trucking industry is to Canada and especially Ontario.

I met with many truckers outside on Wednesday. I speak their language. There were no bureaucrats or cabinet ministers or studies or task forces or committees or politics. We spoke straight up with no bull. These people are hurting. Their pride is being devastated. One of the drivers from Windsor, a 21 year veteran, said he could not help but break down and cry. His frustration was very evident; he has lost his truck, his home and his family.

These truckers, the independent and free spirits of the open road, are having their dreams shattered by deregulation and the big American firms. All they want is a level playing field. Then watch us compete.

A trucker from Ridgetown in my riding was laid off just last month by Central Transport, a division of McKinlay. Two years ago there were 240 drivers; today there are just 67 left, as the routes are being gobbled up by the Americans, with little or no reaction from the federal government. That is just one example of many, many hundreds in my own riding who have lost their trucks and their jobs.

It has been brought to my attention that the American trucks are engaging in cabotage, something that is supposedly illegal. Americans are dropping off loads from General Motors in Oshawa, and then taking another load from there to London or Hamilton. They are only supposed to be allowed one drop, one hook.

I would like to know from the government how many American trucks have been inspected and verified at weigh scales to prevent cabotage. Truckers tell me that because of government cutbacks the number of inspectors has been reduced. Since deregulation, how many additional inspectors have been hired by Transport Canada to enforce our rules? How many charges have been laid?

The truckers' concerns are well know, and my colleague from York West has outlined them extremely well. It was nearly one year ago that truckers were forced to block border points to get the attention of this government. The issues are still the same. But the only response over a year has been the creation of studies. Meanwhile, small and independent truckers are going under every day, losing their trucks, their homes, their families and their dignity.

Because deregulation has relaxed or eliminated government regulation of routes and tariffs, it has opened the door for more competitors, bringing predatory rates.

Because Canadians pay higher taxes and fuel costs, deregulation has left them vulnerable to low-cost Americans. Since 1986, the Ontario trucking industry has lost over 6,000 jobs to the U.S. through no fault of our truckers. It costs about 20 per cent more to send a shipment in a Canadian truck than an American one. With deregulation our firms are left wide open for bankruptcy. Depreciation rates for Canadian trucks are based on 13 years instead of four as in the United States. There is no level playing field on the trans-border issue.

The former Minister of Transport met truckers last year at the Windsor border crossing. He listened. He even sent out a news release that said he will act on the grievances of Canadian truckers. But this is government by task force, action through shuffling paper and bureaucrats and no results. So we have truckers and their families parked outside Parliament Hill and blocking major highways in Ontario.

Why does it take that sort of protest to get the attention of this government? Why does this government not listen? We have native blockades at Oka, people protesting CBC cutbacks, slashes to VIA Rail, army base closures. The list goes on. This government, I am afraid, is destroying people's way of life through their policies, a plan to tear Canada apart.

The Ontario trucking industry must be saved from oblivion. Since 1988, the year of deregulation, no trucking firm has been in the black. I do not follow the government's logic, that to be competitive with the Americans, we tilt the playing field in their favour and throw our truckers to the wolves. We just make it impossible for people to compete.

It must also be mentioned that the Ontario socialist government has a role to play here. The NDP's recent budget was practically the straw that broke the camel's back.

A huge increase in the diesel fuel tax, $15 more tax for every fill-up; $4,000 more every year just in taxes. That is the socialist solution to our trucking woes, while the Tories in this House seem to ignore the real problems and set up task forces that are covered with a years' worth of dust.

Trucking is essential to Ontario and to Canada, especially as we try to meet the challenges of the 21st century. Trucking is used for 70 per cent of Ontario's exports to the U.S. and 75 per cent of our imports. Trucking is the lifeblood of our economy. It must be saved.

In closing, I cannot stress too strongly to this government that they are ignoring the people who are losing their jobs, their trucks, their homes, their families and their livelihood. My riding has been devastated.

Many thousands of truckers, including the hundreds here in Ottawa are just trying to make a living, but the government is tying their hands behind their backs. The recession is hitting hard. Give us a level playing field.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Kent for his comments on the nine suggestions proposed by the member for York West. The member for Kent obviously approves of them.

The indication was that the Leader of the Official Opposition also approved of them. As we have heard that this is not a problem that has occurred overnight, that it has been accumulating for over two or three years, I am wondering if the hon. member could tell me what the cost of these particular suggestions that his party is making is.

Obviously the suggestions did not just come off the top of his head. I am sure his party has carefully analysed the particular cost of this program. Perhaps if the number is not at his fingertips some of his members could help him. Clearly this policy has been supported by the leader of his party. Could he give me some idea of the cost of these suggestions and whether the constituents in his riding of Kent support the use of taxpayers' money for these programs?

Mr. Crawford: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. Certainly there will be a cost. The cost will be minimal relative to the returns created by people working. It is just the same as putting a man on welfare when he should be working. The return to the government would be much more with him working. The cost of what the truckers pay to run, for repairs, tires, and fuel and the people who are involved with them, whether truck-stop waitresses, mechanics, everyone that is supported by the truckers through their financial payments to them, all of this will come back to the government. The very little that we would be spending initially would be paid back many thousand times over.

I am happy to see we have the ex-minister of finance with us. If he could give me the figure on how much the GST is going to bring in, maybe I could elaborate further on how much money these suggestions would cost. I cannot give a figure right now. As the hon. member for York West mentioned, it is still in the study phase.

If the hon. trade minister could just give me the figures on the GST then maybe we could come up with a figure.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, we have taken a look at the cost. For instance, through the excise tax on diesel fuel, both in trucking and in aviation, this government raised approximately $300 million. That includes on aviation, so revenues from trucking are considerably less.

If we take a fraction of that $300 million, the revenue lost to the Treasury is very much a cost worth paying for an industry that directly employs 600,000 people across the country, a multi-billion dollar industry that is going down the drain. The cost of unemployment insurance, the cost of welfare to those unemployed people, the cost of losing that infrastructure, the cost of losing 600,000 jobs, the cost of losing multiplier-effect jobs would be a heavier toll for this government to pay.

The government can either pay a cost now worth paying or face a much bigger cost later, after it has lost the industry. Perhaps the hon. member for Kent can make some comments based on this.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry, but the time allowed for questions and comments has now expired. We shall hear from the Minister for International Trade.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate.

I want to pick up on a point that was a topic in Question Period earlier today. Two members were commenting on the cynicism with which Canadians are viewing their members of Parliament these days.

One of the reasons for that is there is too loose a use of so-called truth and a lot of use of myths. We can recall what the member for Etobicoke North said about the free trade agreement.

He said, back in 1988 or 1989: "Every sparrow that falls we are going to blame on the free trade agreement". This is just one of those examples. In the motion that was put today the Liberals have found another sparrow that they are going to blame on the free trade agreement.

I want to substantiate what I say, not with a few generalizations but with facts.

No one in this House is happy when they hear the stories of the truckers. My colleague, the Minister of Transport, has met with the truckers and their wives. They have spent a good amount of time talking about the difficulties that they are facing. We acknowledge and recognize those difficulties.

Let us find out, as members of Parliament, what is causing these difficulties. Let us go to the source of these difficulties and not base our statements on a number of myths.

My purpose today is to talk about the free trade agreement and its impact on the truckers. I cannot let the occasion go by without recalling for the House a decision that we took in the design of the goods and services tax on how we would treat the question of tax on gasoline.

We had a tax under the old tax system of 19 per cent. It was going to drop to 7 per cent under the new tax, but we felt that if we just dropped it to 7 per cent the provinces would take the revenue from the consumer. It would have probably been the easiest $500 million the provinces ever took.

We took a decision that we would keep the price to the consumer the same. We had two ways of doing that. One was to increase the excise tax. The other was to apply the GST on the provincial taxes, broaden the tax base and get more moneys out of the goods and services tax.

We took the second approach. The principal reason we took the second approach was that the tax paid under the goods and services tax could be recovered by people in the transportation industry so they would not have to pay that tax. If we had gained those revenues through the excise tax, we would not have been able to provide the truckers with the credit.

However, because we did it through the goods and services tax, they got the credit. I have heard, from the member for Hamilton East and from other members directly in front of me, that the GST is the the cause of the truckers' problems when the truckers are beneficiaries under the goods and services tax in two ways.

First, as I have just described, the truckers get a full credit on the GST paid in the cost of their fuel. They get it 21 days after they present their application or they get interest paid by the government.

The second reason that the truckers benefit from the GST is because under the old tax there was a hidden tax in the cost of a truck and in the cost of a trailer. All of that is recoverable under the GST so that their costs are being reduced.

Mr. Crawford: They don't buy that.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My friend from Chatham over here says that he does not buy that.

If he did not deal in myths, mistruths, or misinterpretation and distortion of the facts, then he would understand it. This is essentially the point that I want to make to my colleagues here in the House today so that we can deal in the facts and not in distortions of the truth like we are hearing in the House today.

• (1400)

Madam Speaker, my role today is to talk about the free trade agreement. I have two principal points and then some examples to make.

My first point is that transportation, at the request of the Americans, was not a part of the free trade agreement. Therefore, there is nothing in the free trade agreement that applies to the trucking industry. I look at this motion today, which blames the problem on the free trade agreement. Now I hear the critic for transport for the Liberal Party saying that the problem started before that. He is saying it again, Mr. Speaker. The problem was before the free trade agreement came into effect. Then why did he make reference to the free trade agreement in the motion today? For what other reason?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I know it is raining outside, but there does not have to be a storm in here.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. That is my first point, that there is nothing in the free trade agreement that affects the trucking industry in a direct sense in either a positive or negative way.

The point I do want to make is that the volume of trade since 1988 has increased by about 12 per cent. That means business, because that trade has to move on various forms of transportation, including trucking.

Exports are up 12 per cent since 1988. Imports are up 11.6 per cent and the balance of trade is up from $14 billion surplus to a $17 billion surplus. So the basis for the business of the truckers has increased since the free trade agreement came in.

I hear again the member opposite saying that the free trade agreement had nothing to do with it. Then why is the reference in the motion that the free trade agreement is the cause of the problems of the truckers outside here? That is the sort of thing that breeds cynicism in the minds of Canadians today.

I also want to look a bit into the future and relate my comments to what some people are saying about the impact of the free trade agreement on their businesses, because we are hearing a broad range of stories from members opposite about lay-offs and plant closings that they blame on the free trade agreement—more sparrows that fall that are blamed on the free trade agreement.

I want to talk about some people who are saying good things about the free trade agreement. I want to mention a company, Trimac of Calgary. Trimac is one of the largest trucking and service companies in Canada. They expected to see a greater amount of north-south traffic as a result of the free trade agreement, and Bud McCaig has said:

> We anticipated that free trade would impact favourably on the bulk chemical transportation sector. Since we are the largest bulk carrier in Canada and well positioned on both sides of the border, we expected that it would impact positively on us as well. While it is difficult to quantify statistically right now, my feeling is that cross-border trade volumes are up, and that free trade has been positive.

Weyerhauser Canada's investments over the last two years at their plants in Prince Albert and Saskatoon have resulted in increased production destined for U.S. markets. The investments have also resulted in an increase in the firm's shipping volume. I want to quote here from Bill Gainer, vice-president of Weyerhauser. He says:

> We are part of a competitive North American and world market. We have enhanced our competitiveness and we will be investing more.

Jay Lilje, president of Allied Van Lines, says his company's 1989 purchase, in a bid to capture opportunities offered by free trade of the Canadian operations of U.S. based Mayflower Transit Inc. have:

> —strengthened Allied Van Line's transborder operations, which we see growing with free trade, and liberalization of cross-border movements.

He indicates that the company is quite pleased with the results of the acquisition, particularly in the context of the free trade agreement.

Construction is well advanced on Freightliner of Canada's new truck manufacturing facility in St. Thomas. Why would they be making trucks, Madam Speaker? Because people are buying trucks. According to company president John Mosier, the decision to build the St. Thomas factory, which will employ 1,100 people when completed, was taken as a direct result of the free trade agreement.

The point that I want to make here is that if we as members of Parliament are going to remove this element of cynicism which is poisoning the atmosphere in the economy and in society today, we have to deal with facts. I have demonstrated here how the free trade agreement has been a benefit for the Canadian economy, has been a benefit for the Canadian truckers.

There are problems. We acknowledge that, but let us get the facts right, let us get the facts on the table and make the decision based on the facts, not on the myths and distortions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): I have a very simple question to ask the hon. minister. Having cited the great benefits that have come to ordinary truckers in Canada, I wonder whether he would be willing, with me, to put on his raincoat and rain hat and walk out on to the steps in front of these buildings and talk to those people and tell them and their wives and their children how much free trade and deregulation has benefited them. Will you join me? I will meet you out there in five minutes.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, this was an incredible feat. They go to their club house and they pull out the heavy hitters—just like they did in the 1988 campaign—and they were supposed to give us the truth and the facts. Here is a minister who strolls in and who rarely visits his riding and talks to average Canadians in Etobicoke Centre, and he has the audacity not only in the throne speech to say that the free trade deal has been the security blanket for the economy, but comes in here and suggests that somehow the free trade agreement has helped the truckers.

If the minister had cared to tune in this morning and early afternoon, he would have heard that the trucking industry was given away, was sacrificed before the free trade rounds. And what we had suggested, Mr. Minister, was that you would have had the duty and the responsibility if you had any concern during the free trade rounds to have equalized the two fields, to have obtained for our tuckers an adjustment program, just like your Prime Minister said during the 1988 campaign, just like you said, sir, from the Atlantic to the Pacific .You said: "We will bring in the greatest adjustment programs in the western world".

I ask the minister, through the Chair, where are those programs that were promised in 1988? Where are those programs that the Prime Minister promised? Why does he not give us the truth and the facts rather than spinning out these false dreams that he has been spinning out for six years?

Another thing we said about the GST, again if the minister would have cared, is first, we urged the Minister of Transport to increase the time of those rebates. Does the minister know that since January 1 no trucking firm has received its GST rebates and, therefore, its cash flow hurts. The second thing we asked the Minister of Transport was to give the trucking companies extra time with which to remit their GST obtained from the shippers, because the trucking companies have to remit those receipts in 45 days, but the shipping companies don't pay the truckers until 50, 60 and 90 days. That is what we have said about the GST. Those are the facts. The minister is the myth maker and the dream breaker.

• (1410)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to talk about the adjustment programs. As a result of the change in the unemployment insurance program, we have introduced an increase of $550 million this year, which will grow to $750 million in two or three year's time, of increased amounts for training. These moneys will go to people who are out of jobs, who are looking for additional skills so they can get back into the labour force with better skills to get better jobs and better opportunities. That is on top of the $1.7 billion of the Canadian Jobs Strategy that we brought in in 1984.

I remind my hon. friend that back in 1984 almost the total amount of the moneys that were going into the job market were passive moneys, income support moneys, not active moneys, moneys that would help people gain better jobs through increased training.

The Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development, the OECD, has done studies on this that show the change; show that we are still below where we should be relative to other countries. We have made a clear commitment, reinforced in the Speech from the Throne, to move in that direction. These are a fundamentally different set of policies than were followed by the Liberal Party before 1984.

My friend talked about the GST. I am advised that 70 per cent of the refund requests received thus far have been actioned within the 21 days. The other 30 per cent—

An hon. member: That could be false.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): These numbers are supported by figures and facts in Revenue Canada. Let me comment, Madam Speaker, on the other 30 per cent. Sixty per cent of the other 30 per cent are from incorrectly completed returns. The balance requires some form of follow-up from Revenue Canada.

We are working on this and I am sure that the Department of National Revenue will have, in a very short period of time, the whole system normalized.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the issue underlying today's motion, the competitive problems confronting our country's trucking industry, is one that deeply concerns me and every member of our government. The need for a dynamic, competitive transportation sector is real, not just for those who earn their living and support their families through this industry, but also because of the role it plays across the broad spectrum of Canada's economy.

But painful dilemmas will not be solved by political grandstanding, and you will not find effective answers by placing blame where it does not belong.

That is why I want to set the record straight for my hon. friends in the opposition concerning the federal tax system. It is not the source of the problem here today. In fact, because of the extensive tax reforms our government has put in place, this is one area where the trucking industry, and Canadian business in general, is better positioned today than it was just a few years ago.

I know there are people who do not want to believe that. Federal taxation makes a convenient target for those who would prefer to think there are easy, instant solutions for serious difficulties. But the facts tell a different story.

Truckers have identified higher diesel fuel costs in Canada as one of the critical disadvantages they face in competing with American firms both here and in the United States. It has been argued that federal taxes on diesel fuel sales are a significant part of that burden, but that just is not true.

Instead, federal excise taxes on diesel fuel are actually lower in Canada than the federal tax in the United States, 4 cents a litre here compared to 6.2 cents there. In other words, Washington's taxes on diesel fuel are 50 per cent higher than ours.

The only other federal tax on fuel sales in Canada is the GST. And, yes, there is no equivalent federal tax south of the border. The GST is not a hobble on Canada's truckers, not a handicap they face. Instead of tilting the playing field in favour of American competitors, the GST has eliminated disadvantages created by previous Canadian governments through the destructive federal sales tax.

Under the GST, truckers recover every single cent of sales tax they pay on fuel used for business purposes. That means that the GST does not add to fuel costs.

This is not the only benefit the GST delivers, as the minister just said. Under the old manufacturers' sales tax, Canadian businesses, including truckers, ended up paying tax that was included in the price of many goods and services they needed to run their operations.

Some of those costs were direct, such as the telecommunications service tax. Others were less visible, but they were still there. This was because the producers of goods and services paid the FST on many of the items they used to do business and passed them on their customers. But that does not happen under the GST.

Through the use of the input tax credit, businesses at every level now recover all the tax they pay on their commercial transactions. There is no hidden tax passed on through this system. This has already reduced the cost of many items and is helping service providers, such as maintenance garages and mechanics, control their costs and prices. This is helping Canadians compete, not put them at a disadvantage.

There is another issue that truckers have raised and I want to review it. They have pointed out correctly that Canadian tax depreciation rates on tractors and trailers are not as generous as those in the United States.

However, that criticism overlooks that the U.S. truckers must pay a 12 per cent excise tax on the purchase of heavy trucks and trailers. There is no such tax in Canada. This more than offsets the faster depreciation available in the United States.

The facts I have just outlined are the bottom line realities. They provide dollar and cents evidence that federal excise taxes, the GST and depreciation schedules have not sacrificed the interests of domestic transporters. As Monday's Speech from the Throne made clear, this is a government committed to helping Canadians meet competitive challenges, so we can all benefit from that success.

But this does not mean that truckers are crying wolf about the total tax burden on fuel purchases. American prices are lower and state level taxation is a definite contributing factor. We have to confront the fact that provincial taxes on diesel fuel can run double or more than those in neighbouring American states.

Earlier this year if you fuelled up your truck in British Columbia, you paid 11.4 cents a litre in provincial tax. In Washington State, across the border, it was 6.8 cents.

In Saskatchewan you paid 10 cents, 5.3 cents in North Dakota.

In Ontario you were paying 10.9 cents compared to just 4.6 cents a litre in Michigan.

In Quebec, it was 13.5 cents a litre, four times higher than the 3.1 cents that the same trucker would be paying in New York State.

Following the recent provincial budget, this disparity has become even worse. Ontario's tax on diesel was boosted 1.7 cents with an equal increase due next January.

In reviewing these figures, I am not trying to suggest that provincial governments alone have the responsibility for assisting our freight trucking section to deal with their problems. This is a national problem and one that will only be resolved through mutual commitment and partnership by all levels of government working with the industry, much as the task forces the previous minister set up and the current minister is dealing with.

Let me also suggest a basic, critical principle that we must apply to identifying answers. That is, the solution must not be based on actions that would jeopardize our ability to stay the course in holding down our deficit during difficult times and bringing it down dramatically once economic growth is fully restored.

I know my hon. friends across the floor do not share that view. Spending restraint is not a prescription that they are familiar with. We saw that during the 1981–1982 recession, when our deficit doubled in just two years and then continued to grow as we entered recovery, reaching $38.5 billion a year in 1984–85. The all time record.

Today we are still living with the consequences of those deficits and the $200 billion national debt we inherited. If it was not for the for the interest payments on that debt, we would not be in the deficit position now and we would have the resources to better help the many individuals and business sectors that have been hit hard by another recession.

Just last year, $43 billion in Canadian taxpayers' dollars went just to pay the interest charges on the debt. That is $43 billion that could have been used to lower the debt or lower taxes, $43 billion that was not available to increase unemployment insurance entitlements or for education and apprenticeship programs or to contribute to funding health care programs or to boost family allowances and pensions. That is the part of the tragedy of deficits and debt left to us by the Liberal government.

There is another aspect to that tragedy, one that ties directly to the competitive challenges faced by truckers and virtually every other business sector. The blunt fact is deficits and debt contribute to inflation and to inflationary expectations and by doing so put further pressure on interest rates. There is no member in this House who has not heard our constituents, individuals, local businesses and industry associations say that lower interest rates are essential to get the economy moving and reduce investment costs. But, as the February budget so clearly described, the only way rates can be brought down and kept down is to reduce inflation. To do that, government must play its part, including keeping its own costs under control.

Our policies are working. Inflation has stabilized and interest rates have dropped 5 per cent in the last year. Controlling spending does not come easily. There are always ways in which to spend more, always groups and interests, such as the troubled trucking sector, with real problems who can make passionate and convincing appeals for assistance. However, good economic management and real leadership mean a striking and realistic balance between specific sectors and interests and the needs of the wider, national community, including taxpayers.

It is clear that Canadians feel they are already taxed too much. They do not want governments to go deeper into debt with the automatic consequences that tax burdens will rise in the future.

This takes me back to the issue of taxation and its impact on truckers and other industries challenged to compete in the North American and international markets.

There are a couple of issues here I would like to touch on briefly in my final moments. Since first coming to office in 1984, our government has recognized the need to ensure our total national tax system did not place Canadians at a competitive disadvantage. At the same time, we were also committed to improving the fairness of the tax system and maintaining its ability to support the programs and services Canadians value.

We acted on this commitment, not just through the GST, but also through extensive reforms to the personal and corporate income tax systems that took effect in 1988. We are convinced that those reforms have delivered real benefits.

Again, I realize this seems to be a fly in the face of conventional public wisdom. There seems to be a common misunderstanding that we are among the most heavily taxed nations in the world. In particular, Canadians often point to the United States and see it as a taxation nirvana. Figures from the Organization for Economic Co-Operation and Development, the OECD, in 1988, the last year that figures were available, paint a somewhat different picture. On an international basis, the figures show that the burden of total taxation in Canada, by all levels of government, amounted to 34 per cent of our gross domestic product. This was actually lower than 16 of the 24 OECD countries. In fact, among the major group of seven industrial nations, only Japan and the United States had taxes as low as ours. In Japan, taxation was equal to 31.3 per cent of GDP, while in the U.S. it was 29.8 per cent. That was not dramatically lower than our 34 per cent.

While there are many aspects to the relationship between taxes and business, it is a fact that Canadian companies do not face as great a competitive handicap as many would like to believe.

But with respect to our competitiveness with the United States, we have to face the reality that American productivity has grown much stronger than ours in recent years and Canadian labour costs now exceed theirs. Factors like this go a long way to explaining why Canadian firms and workers are finding it harder to compete.

However, there is another aspect to the tax story that we also need to remind ourselves of on a regular basis. We have agreed, as a nation, to allocate tax resources so that every Canadian has access to public health care. We also provide further resources to cover the cost of post-secondary education. Both of these are areas where America places the bulk of the burden on the individual and the private sector.

I do not know of many, if any, Canadians who would trade our medicare system for that in the U.S. The cost of private health care insurance is something that is frequently overlooked when critics compare our tax levels to those of American firms.

I do not want to shift today's debate away from the real problems Canadian truckers face. They are serious, there is a hardship, and we need to look at the problem seriously. However, I know it is essential that, in developing a strategy, this House and all interested Canadians recognize that there is no simple, quick fix solutions that our government can impose by fiat. The perception that the federal taxation is the source of the problem is based on wishful thinking or partisan politics— not fact. Any prescriptions based on such a misunderstanding will run the real risk of missing the mark and could even damage our prospects to strengthen our competitiveness as a nation.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, the idle trucks that are lined up just outside the door here along Wellington Street are really just a microcosm of Canada's labour force. They represent Canada's unemployed men and women. It just happens to be the truckers. That just happens to be the transportation industry in Canada. That is the industry which moves the nation. When that stops, as it has stopped today, it says so much about the inner workings of a nation. It says a once proud occupation has been silenced, that of the truckers, the guys who took pride in their rigs pounding down the nation's highways. They have been silenced because of the mismanagement of the current government and its economic policies.

This is not because they wanted to be silenced. Their rigs are in good shape and they are ready to go, so that is not the problem. They have kept their rigs in good shape because it is a proud occupation and they know that they are in a very competitive business. They know that the tax write-off on their equipment is spread over many years, unlike their U.S. competitors who can write theirs off in a matter of four years or so. They know that they are working at a terrible disadvantage because their competitors can get an annual tax break of several thousands of dollars on the purchase of that very expensive equipment.

They know too that they are trying to survive in an industry when their competitors in the U.S. can buy diesel fuel for slightly more than half the price they pay in Canada. In spite of these handicaps, they would like to keep on trucking, as they say.

However, now they cannot because every mile they drive means they are losing money and time has run out. When they buy a tank of diesel fuel they do not stop to think how much is tax and how much is cost. They only know one figure and that is the one that is registered up on the pump. That is what they pay.

All they hear from the new Minister of Transport is: "You'll have to become more competitive". It is pretty hard to be competitive if you do not have any money in your pocket. This is a government that has its hands in all four of their pockets, right up to the elbow in most cases, and then the minister says: "Come on boys, be more competitive".

Instead of losing more money than they have already lost they decided to park their rigs out on Wellington Street. I talked to one young man outside the other day. He said he would like to be back at work. I asked him how he could afford to have his rig parked here. He said: "If it wasn't parked here, it would be parked somewhere else". It does not really matter to him whether it is parked on Wellington Street or parked outside his home.

These people are really representative of Canada's labour force today. They are disappointed. They are disillusioned that their lives and that of their families have been turned around so suddenly. "Gone are the days", they say, "when there was work out there to be done" and they were willing to do it. They met the payments on their equipment. They took great pride in what they did well and the knowledge that they would be able to look after the needs of their families in those good years.

It just happens to be truckers that have ascended outside the door here recently. It could have been the farmers of this nation. They have been burdened and bludgeoned by debt for so long that they have become discouraged and disillusioned the same as the truckers.

A callous government is how they described the Tory government, as one which does not seem to understand just how tenuous their livelihood is, whether it is trucking or farming these days in Canada.

Instead of truckers or farmers, it could have been the small town merchants, the restaurant owners and the gas station operators of this nation, who just like the truckers are watching their lifestyles disappear as economic conditions in Canada due to the GST, the high dollar, the high interest rate and the over-all cost of doing business in this country has forced their regular customers, their neighbours to go to a foreign country on a regular basis to do their shopping.

All this is happening in spite of the government having studies over a year ago indicating that these devastations of our economy were on the horizon if the government failed to alter their economic policies.

• (1430)

The government knew this was going to happen and sat idly by. It is unfortunate that the truckers have to illustrate their plight in the manner we see out in front of the Parliament Buildings, but I want to congratulate them for their ingenuity. If that is what it takes to get the government's attention, perhaps the truckers' efforts are not in vain after all. We will have to wait and see.

The government's tax policies and fiscal measures have resulted in 1.4 million Canadians being unemployed. After a Speech from the Throne just a few days ago with no new measures in it, none whatsoever, to suggest that the government is even cognizant of the malaise that has fallen over Canada, what alternatives do the truckers have?

I think the truckers with their rigs standing still are symbolic. They are a reflection of so many aspects of Canadian life today. Perhaps it is time for the government to admit what the overwhelming majority of Canadians already know, that this government has caused the nation to come to a halt and is now completely barren of any new initiatives which could get the wheels of the nation turning once again.

Perhaps it is time for the government to be honest with Canadians just this one time. Perhaps the government could admit it has no programs to offer, resign and call an election so Canadians can once more be given a choice.

I think—and the polls would support me—that given a choice today, Canadians would choose to bury the remnants of this government and opt for a government with a new set of priorities for all Canadians.

They would opt for a new government whose number one priority is to address the very real problems of doing business in this country today. The very real problems are dramatically symbolized by the idle rigs outside the House of Commons at this very moment. It is so un-Canadian to have these men and women sitting idle when they would like to get their equipment to work.

They would like to put their expertise and their energies to work but they cannot do it. It is a losing cause.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of my colleague who just spoke.

The representation that he is making today on behalf of the truckers is not new. The Liberal Party, the opposition, has opposed deregulation. We said, years ago, that deregulation would be bad for the trucking industry.

Certainly on numerous occasions, we intervened before the House to indicate the danger of deregulation in Canada. Indeed, it has put our trucking industry in a very difficult position vis-à-vis the American trucking industry.

Would my colleague comment on some of the proposals that have been put forward by our party in this debate in order to help the government a solution to this problem?

On behalf of the Official Opposition, the member for York West put forward a proposal today that is extremely important and could help the government find a solution to the problems of the trucking industry.

I would like to ask my colleague to elaborate on this proposal put forward by our colleague from York West.

Mr. Jordan: Madam Speaker, I have a copy of that paper which my colleague presented earlier today.

When it comes to something like deregulation, we are still a northern nation. We live along a little ribbon around the 49th parallel, but the bulk of Canada is in more extreme weather conditions than exists anywhere in the United States.

We have to realize what is practical, in terms of competing. Take, for example, the dairy industry. Anyone who thinks that we can compete with the dairy industry in southern Virginia probably does not know anything about the dairy industry. Go down there and watch that industry in mass production.

They can make it from some of those places in the United States into Canada. It is a long overnight haul. One of those trucks could bring a litre of milk for every man, woman, and child in my riding in one trip. Can we compete with that? Anyone who thinks we can does not know the dairy industry and what is necessary to compete.

That is typical I think. Canadians say: "We can compete. We are honest, hard working people". Of course, we are honest, hard working people but we have to be realistic. There are areas in which we can compete and there are areas in which we cannot compete.

I do not think we can compete in the transportation industry, not when we see these fellows waiting out there. They cannot compete. They cannot let a fellow who can fill up his tank and save a couple of hundred dollars come across, take away their livelihood, and compete with that.

I wish the government would put it in terms that I could understand. I would try to understand, if the government could explain it to me. I cannot understand. I do not understand how anyone could think we could compete in the dairy industry either. I know enough about it. I know that we cannot compete. The government should realize that there are areas in which we can compete and that is not one of them. I do not think we can compete in this area, with the deregulation as it applies to the transportation industry, either.

The Tories talk about the GST as a great success story, the free trade agreement as a great success story. Canadians had better not accept too many more of these Tory success stories. They have resulted in 1.4 million people being unemployed. It is just too much. We cannot take any more Tory success stories.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I speak today in this debate with much regret and bitterness, because this debate reminds me of debates we had here in this House in 1987 when the Conservative government insisted on presenting Bills C-18 and C-19 which at that time seemed to us in the Opposition to be a death sentence for the whole trucking industry in Canada.

Despite our objections, despite the repeated requests from this side of the House to delay that bill, unless we had guarantees from the Americans, the then-Minister of Transport went ahead with his bill, with the consequences we see today.

We are not glad to see these truckers occupy part of Wellington Street here in Ottawa and protest as they are doing on the highways of Ontario. These truckers are suffering unfair competition from American truckers. We in the opposition had warned the government three years ago that this would happen, and we were not the only ones to say so.

I refer you to a debate that took place on February 5, 1987, where, in a statement I made then, I repeated the words of Gerry Reimer, Vice-President of Reimer Express Lines of Winnipeg, and I quote what he said then: "American companies can come here and cut rates to smithereens for a year or two and all domestic truckers will be gone."

• (1440)

I would also like to quote a leading Canadian business executive, Mr. John Kennedy, the president of Kingsway Transport, of Rexdale, Ontario, who said in 1987: "There is no doubt that deregulation will have disastrous effects on the financial position of the trucking industry in Canada. Ultimately, it will lead to a wave of mergers, takeovers and bankruptcies."

Madam Speaker, three or four years later, we find ourselves in a situation where Canadian truckers are giving up hope of getting any assistance from the Conservative government. At the time, the government refused to listen to the industry, and to the opposition members who opposed these bills and were telling it that deregulation would be harmful to the trucking industry. They were saying that tens of thousands of jobs would be lost if the government were to implement deregulation.

So today, about three and a half years later, we find ourselves with the terrible conclusion that, indeed, approximately 35,000 to 40,000 jobs have been lost in the trucking industry in Canada, jobs that we will never get back, that are now in the United States, that have been lost in Canada because of the incompetence of the Conservative government. Those were jobs that allowed thousands of Canadian families to make a decent living here in Canada and that were totally lost to American transportation companies competing with Canadian companies, with the approval and the blessing of the Conservative government.

Madam Speaker, it is obvious that today something must be done before the whole industry disappears, as suggested by representatives of the trucking industry three and a half years ago. It seems obvious to me that if the government has no other alternatives than to study this issue over and over again, it should immediately implement the proposals made by my colleague from York West, who has specific proposals to assist representatives of the trucking industry who are here in Ottawa. What they want from the government is not studies, but decisions that will solve their problems and save the thousands of jobs which still exist in the Canadian trucking industry.

Obviously, one of the worst problems was that according to Bill C–19, the government at the time proposed that businesses drop the public convenience and necessity criterion. I must recall that the criterion existed in Canada since 1954 for the very purpose of protecting the trucking industry. The criterion was effective, as, between 1960 and 1970, the Canadian trucking industry prospered and rendered great services, not only to our country, but to thousands of its workers.

But, at the request of some important shippers, a few companies, obviously very rich, very important and very close to the government, deregulation was brought in, without regards to the small truckers' interests, but to please a few big shippers in Canada. That is what happened, again. It is easy to understand: a Conservative governement listens to the big and the wealthy in our society, but it remains completely deaf to the interests of the less fortunate. So, it agreed to the request of the big shippers and proceeded with deregulating a Canadian industry which was then in good shape. But that is not the case anymore, because deregulation here produced exactly the same results as in the United States where it had been implemented a few years before, supposedly to allow for more competition on the marketplace.

But, what did we see in the United States? Over there, deregulation favoured the largest companies. Four very large companies are controlling almost all the trucking market in United States and today, they literarily gobble up the small trucking companies in Canada.

We said all that in 1987 to a Conservative government who did not want to listen. Today, we live with the consequences of this harmful, completely inappropriate and unacceptable policy of the Conservative government. Today, we tell them: For God's sake, stop your useless studies and do something. Follow the recommendations of our colleague from York West, solve the problems of the truckers and save the few jobs left in this industry.

[English]

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, on Wednesday and Thursday of this week, residents in my riding and in other part of metropolitan Toronto were terribly inconvenienced by the demonstration by the truckers.

I, myself, spent an extra two hours on highway 2 trying to get through in order to avoid highway 104. I also spent a very short period after I got on to highway 104 at Port Union Road all the way over to Yonge Street viewing the suffering of people trying to get home.

It was an extremely impressive demonstration. There were enormous trucks as far as the eye could see and there were enormous numbers of frustrated motorists. Every single arterial road in my riding was clogged.

There was the possibility of very serious consequences. North York General Hospital, which is at the edge of my riding, has the highest volume emergency department in Canada and that hospital had one of the major access roads to it clogged.

I think that this was an incredible demonstration that should never be repeated. I think the truckers are certainly right in their frustration at the lack of co-operation of government in Canada.

• (1450)

Consumers do not want to pay more for goods and services in Canada than they would in the United States. Clearly, they are voting with their feet. If we do not get our industries competitive, we are going to lose a lot of business and people will move to the United States and industry will leave.

This issue is one that is important to us all and very important to consumers. If there are those who think that regulating the industry and protecting the transportation industry in order to keep out competition is the way to go, they are very, very wrong. It is impossible in the global marketplace. It is key to many of the industries in Canada.

Transportation costs are high throughout Canada, and we have got to get those costs lower. We have been trying, at the federal level with our government, to lower those costs. Clearly, the GST, as the minister has explained, has been extremely helpful. One thing that has to be done to help truckers and other businesses is for the provincial governments to harmonize with the GST. Right away, they could give an enormous rebate to many of these truckers so they could compete because American truckers would also have to pay the GST on any services delivered in Canada and it is fully rebatable.

Look at the tax situation. The taxes at the federal level are much, much lower than the Americans and the problem is at the provincial level. The provincial governments are gouging. When you look at Ontario, we have had a budget that has shown no restraint; 5.8 per cent increase in civil servants' wages. That goes all the way through the economy.

I know people at Metropolitan Toronto Council are talking about the fact that they cannot do anything less with the civil servants there. It is an extremely difficult circumstance and what we have to do is become more competitive.

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, a short answer to the intervention of the hon. member would be what Kevin Ford, a married father of three, who drives for a small Guelph, Ontario hauler, said here yesterday when he was interviewed by the press. He said: "There are days when you have to work 20 hours to make ends meet". This trucker had to give up his house and two cars to keep his family afloat.

There are some inconveniences to people who live in residential Toronto, but you have to think of these drivers who also had homes but because of the incompetence of the Conservative government have lost their homes. If the government had moved earlier on this matter there would be no blockage today.

Last year in the summer, independent truckers blocked several border crossings in Ontario and Quebec to draw attention to the problem they have with U.S. truckers paying less for their rigs, fuels, parts, maintenance and insurance.

The then Minister of Transport decided to study the matter. He established a study that was to cover seven points. This week, the new Minister of Transport is telling us that the study is not finished, that it might not be finished before sometime next year. Well surely these truckers want action and they are not going to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time for questions and comments is over. Debate. The honourable Minister of State.

[English]

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on trucking as there is a need to set the record straight, particularly about as what was just said a few minutes ago across the floor.

There is a need, as well, to explain the enormous amount of complex work that has gone on over the past 12 months.

During the past few days, hon. members of the opposition have criticized the government for its approach taken over the past year. This is not unusual or unexpected. The government has been following an approach of careful targeting of the issue; a difficult job with a moving target. It has been doing this with the agreement and support of a large segment of the trucking industry.

During the past week, we have witnessed a number of demonstrations by truckers here in Ottawa and elsewhere which had their genesis in a series of demonstrations which began in Quebec in mid-May 1990. Then, a group of independent truckers demonstrated by blocking highways and the border crossing at Lacolle.

The Quebec Minister of Transport listened to the demands of these independent truckers and agreed to set up a commission to study their demands. The creation of the commission had been one of the principal requests of the truckers themselves.

The provincial minister invited the participation of the federal government in the work of the commission, and in recognizing the shared jurisdiction between the federal government and the provincial government in extra provincial trucking matters, the former Minister of Transport agreed. A senior official of the department participated fully in all the deliberations of what came to be known as the Charbonneau commission.

Approximately one week after the Quebec truckers demonstrated, a group calling itself "Canadian Truckers Fighting Back" blocked the Ambassador Bridge in Windsor. Another sympathetic group closed additional international crossing in southern Ontario at Sarnia, Fort Erie, Niagara Falls and Gananoque.

The Ontario Minister of Transportation agreed to meet the blockaders at Windsor, because of the extreme importance of that transportation link to the health of the Canadian automobile industry.

The auto industry in southern Ontario and in the U.S., which relies on just-in-time delivery, was rapidly coming to a stand still because of the bridge closures. Once again, recognizing the shared federal-provincial responsibility in international trucking issues, the federal government responded quickly and effectively. The former Minister of Transport flew overnight to Windsor and met with the truckers in the early morning to get to the bottom of their complaints.

After several hours of discussions, the demonstrators agreed that the cancellation of the free trade agreement and the setting aside of the deregulation of the trucking industry were not responsible or reasonable proposals, which shows that the truckers themselves were a little more reasonable than some of the members opposite.

A short list of action items was adopted which the minister agreed to raise with his federal colleagues and best efforts were assured.

These issues were:

(1) U.S. carriers doing cabotage in Canada.

(2) Unfair, even predatory pricing practices by U.S. carriers.

(3) Collection of federal fuel taxes from U.S. carriers.

Also during the meeting in Windsor, the Minister of Transport agreed with the Ontario Minister of Transportation that a federal official be nominated to the Ontario Ministry of Transportation's Trucking Industry Adjustment Committee.

This provincial committee had been struck several weeks earlier to address the rising industry concerns which eventually culminated in the blockade.

The Ministers of Employment and Immigration and National Revenue were asked to investigate and report on cabotage.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was asked to investigate the alleged unfair pricing practices and the Minister of National Revenue was also asked to investigate the possibility of collecting federal excise taxes from U.S. carriers.

The Minister of Transport met representatives of owner operators and the three major trucking unions in Ottawa on June 27, 1990. At that time progress was reported on the three issues.

Stepped up enforcement of existing laws and regulations against illegal cabotage would be undertaken in conjunction with the provinces. Several blitzes have been conducted during the past year in co-operation with provincial authorities.

The issue of collecting federal tax on diesel fuel and its application to all trucking operations in Canada have been examined by the Department of Finance. It concluded that federal taxes on fuel are not a significant factor in the fuel price differences, vis-à-vis the United States. I think that has been amply illustrated today during the speeches.

At the time, diesel fuel sold in Canada was subject to total federal sales tax and excise taxes of 6.8 cents per litre, about 2.8 cents and 4 cents per litre, respectively.

• (1500)

The former federal sales tax has since been replaced by the goods and services tax, as of January 1, 1991. Since then, Canadian truckers have been able to fully recover the GST paid on diesel fuel. The result has been a net reduction in the total federal tax on diesel fuel, from 6.8 cents to 4 cents per litre.

Under the GST, the federal sales tax paid by truckers on fuel in Canada is significantly less than the comparable U.S. tax.

On the predatory pricing issue, the transport minister said that he was advised by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the director of investigations and research under the Competition Act would examine any information brought to his attention regarding possible violations of the act.

During a meeting in May with the truckers, they had been advised to report their complaints to the director. Since then, the director has indicated that he has not yet received any new complaints or information that would raise an issue under the Competition Act.

At the conclusion of the June 27 meeting with the three major trucking unions and the representatives of the owner-operators, the minister decided to set up a ministerial level task force to examine the issues in depth.

Membership on the task force was open to all bona fide identifiable stakeholders in trucking: unions, carriers, shippers, and owner-operator organizations. The provinces and any involved federal government departments were invited to participate as observers so that the task force would be composed of all the stakeholders, with government only there in an observing position.

With respect to the owner-operator organization, modest organizational requirements were imposed upon them, basically to ensure that they had identifiable membership and an elected executive, that is, people they had agreed would speak on their behalf.

Departmental officials were instructed to work with any newly formed owner-operator organization, to ensure they would meet this minimum criteria.

August 13 and August 14 were decided upon as the meeting dates in Toronto. The task force met as scheduled in August and was chaired in its entirety by the minister. In attendance were representatives from 16 industry groups. Five issues were distilled out of the two days of very frank, open discussions which the minister promised to take to his provincial colleagues at a meeting at the end of September.

Those issues were cabotage, Canada-U.S. tax regimes, driver education and training, uniformity of safety and other regulations, and load broker regulation. Although a strong consensus was reached at the task force meeting, there was a sense among the members that they did not share a common information base or even a common understanding of why an issue was important to a particular group within the stakeholder group.

Timely facts on trucking in Canada, especially facts on international trucking, are hard to come by. This realization was one of the reasons the task force agreed to conduct a comprehensive set of studies after the Council of Ministers meeting.

At the September meeting of the federal-provincial Ministers of Transport, the provincial ministers, without exception, committed themselves to work with the federal government in order to enhance cabotage enforcement. The provincial ministers also reviewed their commitment to uniform trucking regulations and pledged provincial support for the employment and immigration committee on driver training.

Last, but not least, they agreed to set up a working group to study owner-operator issues—items such as load broker regulation, the need for an industry standard code of ethics to govern carrier to owner-operator relationships, and so on.

The working group of officials set to work immediately and over the past seven or eight months has worked hard and consulted widely. They are due to present a report at the end of this month.

If there is a negative note to these efforts, it is that the carrier associations have consistently and steadfastly refused to co-operate on the issue of their relationship with the owner-operators.

The reason they advance for not participating in the discussions is that they have no mandate to undertake labour negotiations since they are in the domain of the direct discussions of individual trucking companies.

This is, in my view, a narrow and somewhat legalistic interpretation of the problem. While we have succeeded in convincing the two senior levels of government and the National Coalition of Owner-Operator Associations to sit down and hammer out a model code of practice, the Canadian Trucking Association has stayed away. Nevertheless, it is not too late to join in the process and I sincerely hope they will reconsider their position.

Let me turn now to the studies, as much has been made in this House over the last few days, and especially this afternoon, about the set of studies being undertaken by the minister's task force. As I mentioned earlier, one of the major frustrations surrounding the discussion of the Canadian trucking industry is the virtually complete lack of reliable information, statistical or otherwise. Consequently, the task force agreed to embark upon a set of studies which would rectify this problem.

The objectives of the study are very straightforward and are threefold: first, to determine the nature and extent of the Canadian trucking share of the trans-border markets; to assess the over-all competitiveness of Canadian trucking firms in those trans-border markets; and, to analyse the relative significance of factors affecting that competitiveness.

The project comprises the following individual study components: a survey of trans-border movements at approximately 15 major crossing points across Canada, a review of trends in trans-border trucking markets and a thorough examination of Canadian shares in those markets, an analysis of the economics of the Canadian trucking industry operating in trans-border markets, an examination of the current financial status of Canadian trucking firms, a comparison of Canadian and U.S. trucking costs in trans-border markets, a review of Canada-U.S. tax regimes, and an assessment of a potential Canada-U.S. cabotage agreement. There is also to be a final study to draw together the threads of the individual detailed studies.

At this point I wish to emphasize the complete openness that has been adopted in the conduct of these studies. While federal officials have normally chaired the meetings, the task force members have selected the consultants, commented on the draft reports and are currently in the process of reviewing the final text of most of the studies. A session is being scheduled for early June to put the finishing touches on these studies, not next year as was mentioned earlier by the opposition.

Frankly, while we are duty bound to honour the process that we have started with the task force, that is to allow them the last word on the study contents, we will be very pleased to make these reports public so as to lay to rest the simple minded remarks of the members opposite.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, how can Canadians believe that the minister of state or the Minister of Transport are the least bit serious about the truckers who are lining up in front of the House of Commons when their plight is just like the 1,000 Department of National Defence workers and the 120 Bank of Canada workers who have just been laid off in the last half hour?

Eleven hundred workers were laid off in the last half hour, 1,000 from the Department of National Defence and 120 from the Bank of Canada. These workers are victims of the same right-wing agenda that says: "Make the men and women of Canada pay for the fiscal policies of this government".

• (1510)

I would suggest if this government does not tax Canadians out of their jobs as is happening with the truckers, it will recession them out of their jobs as is being done by the workers from the Bank of Canada.

I would like the Minister of State for Transport to please tell us just how this government cares about the workers in Canada.

Mrs. Martin: Madam Speaker, the policies of this government have been undertaken because we do care about Canadians.

We are concerned about the future of Canada. We are concerned about the children of the present and the future. The problems we are facing in this country today and the reasons for some of these lay-offs that have had to take place are due to the fact that we have some very difficult fiscal problems in this country.

Some of these fiscal problems were started years ago when other governments attempted to fight recessions by spending, spending, spending. They were not spending those days' dollars. They were spending today's dollars, tomorrow's dollars, our children's and our grandchildren's dollars.

The Government of Ontario, run by a party which is the same as the party this member belongs to, is doing the very same thing in Ontario today that did not work for Canada in 1981–82, will not work for Ontario today and it is adding to the problems of this country.

I have children and I want to see them have a future. I want the Canadians of today to have jobs. That is why we are making the difficult economic decisions that have to be made to make us competitive in a global marketplace. We cannot build a wall around Canada and live by supplying the Canadian market only.

We can survive only by being competitive in a global market. Being competitive means working smarter and addressing problems, not by throwing money at them. That is the easy way out.

Any government can throw money it does not have by continuing to borrow on the future to try to solve a problem. Throwing money at problems does not solve them. Working at problems is what solves the problems of this country. Working together, management, labour, government and education. We cannot be competitive in this country if we do not have well-trained young people.

We cannot have our young people dropping out of school because they do not have a challenge, because they are not taught properly and because they are not given proper advice by the counsellors in the schools. We cannot be driving all our children into university educations.

We have to look at the trades. I attended a Skills Canada training competition last weekend in my riding, which brought together 200 students from across this country. They were building framings for housing. They were repairing motors. They were working on tin plates to fix furnaces and piping. They were working on electronic boards.

They were competing in a skills competition which proves that we have well skilled young people in this country who want to get involved in the jobs of the future that are high-skilled. They are going to Louisville, Kentucky to compete. Canadians went last year and there was only one state in the U.S. that got more medals than Canada did at that competition.

They did it because we have young people who are interested in the skills and trades and who want to have jobs in the future. You cannot have jobs in the future of this country if you throw away the money today.

That is why we are taking very hard economic decisions. They are not easy. We do not like to sit here, make decisions and then read in the paper the next day that 1,000 jobs have been lost.

You do not have a monopoly on compassion in the NDP or in the socialist party of this country. There is as much compassion on this side of the House as there is on that side of the House.

We sat here and read statements about the Minister for International Trade from people who were saying: "Yes, there are problems with free trade in some industries but it is also helping industries."

The opposition members say: "That's bull." It is bull when they do not believe in it. When they get up and make false statements, they think they are speaking the truth. One does not hear those comments from this side of the House, at least not from the members who are here today.

We have no monopoly on behaviour in this House. If there were a little more decorum in this House, Canadians might start to believe a little more that we do things in this House.

That decorum comes from all sides of the House. It is something that all members should pay very special attention to. All members from all parties have a responsibility in this House to show the young people in this country that decisions that are made in this House are very important. That is why, as the Prime Minister said, this is the constituent assembly of Canada, this is where the decisions are going to be made, and this is where they are made with a great deal of heart, consideration and understanding, regardless of what the opposition says.

We are talking about governments in general. When the people of Canada don't believe in governments it is not only the government in power that they don't believe in, it is all politicians, because of the behaviour of all politicians. We all have a role to play.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): I appreciated very much the contribution of the minister to the debate today. I think she had a lot of good information and had a lot to contribute to us.

I was impressed with the number of studies that are going on. As it has been stated many times today, truckers are demanding more than just studies.

I would just like to ask the minister a couple of questions. One of the big questions raised frequently is that of cabotage. My question is: Does the government have evidence that this indeed is going on? I have made inquiries myself and I have got mixed answers. So I would appreciate the minister contributing in that area.

It has been reported that there have been 3,300 new licences issued in Ontario alone to truckers in the last six months. To me, this would suggest that there has been a tremendous expansion in a time of recession. I was wondering if she could comment on that. Does she have information on this?

Mrs. Martin: When it comes to the cabotage issue, as I mentioned in my remarks, there was co-operation between the provinces and the federal government in looking at cabotage.

I would just like to read, if I may, the following:

> There were 2,862 truckers who passed inspection stations. Of these, 344 truckers, both American and Canadian, were referred to the custom officials. Of eight of the ten customs infractions discovered, only two involved cabotage, but all ten involved Canadian companies using U.S. vehicles illegally. Five hundred American drivers were checked for immigration infractions, 11 were found to have minor criminality infractions and two others were arrested and removed under escort for serious criminality infractions. No infractions involving cabotage by U.S. drivers were found.

In Manitoba, during the summer of 1990, an RCMP officer while on regular duty laid a charge against a U.S. driver for cabotage. Some half dozen letters had been received from owner-operators in trucking companies reporting incidents of suspected cabotage. These have all been referred to customs or immigration for action. We have been sending information out outlining Canadian immigration laws to U.S. drivers at border entry points. The same pamphlets are being mailed by Transport Canada to U.S. carriers licensed to operate in Canada to make sure that they understand the laws of Canada when it comes to cabotage and our custom regulations.

As to the 3,300 additional licences that my hon. friend mentioned, I am afraid I do not have the facts to confirm that. Certainly, if there have been 3,300 additional licences in Ontario alone that have been issued at this time of what appears to be an over-supply on the market, I would wonder at the provincial government issuing those licences.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I want to participate in today's debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Point of order, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I don't wish to interfere unduly with the remarks of my colleagues, but I just wish to seek clarification from the Chair.

It was the understanding of members on this side that there was a rotation agreed to and which was being pursued by the Chair. Members in this party, like the party to the left, have travel plans to make and we were hoping to be able to participate in the debate which concludes at 4 o'clock. I am wondering whether the Chair has now departed from the rotation which was previously agreed to and was our understanding, and perhaps the Chair would be kind enough to explain to members exactly what is happening. We will abide by the Chair's ruling.

• (1520)

Madam Deputy Speaker: The rotation which has been agreed to has been going on all day. This is a normal opposition day and I do not see any changes in the way we have been operating today than we have on other days. It might be a good idea for future reference that we do get the House leaders and chair occupants together and establish a different rotation. This is the way things have been going for quite a while and I have recognized the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, on the same point if I may, I know that the Table did check and found that the manner in which the rotation today had been recorded was actually at odds with the normal procedure. That is why I am now up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Earlier in the day, as I had written the rotation, the representative of the Liberal Party would normally have been recognized. We did look as to what the rotation had been previously and realized that I had made a mistake and we then advised the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan that a representative of his party would be next. The hon. members from the Liberal Party were advised that I had made a mistake and everything seemed to be normal.

I think that we should use the time for hon. members to make their representations and not for long points of order again.

I will recognize the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Dingwall: Point of order, Madam Speaker. We will consent to the Chair's ruling and abide by that ruling, but since this is a non-votable motion and the House is deemed to close at four o'clock, I am wondering if members would see the clock past four for a few moments, keeping in mind that it is a non-votable motion, in order that the two remaining speakers from our party could have the floor for ten minutes each. I am wondering if hon. members would agree to that in view of the fact that an honest mistake has been made.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I think that might be premature. I certainly would have no difficulty, but depending on how long I go and whether there is a question or comment period, there might be the time to allow the other two members to complete their time.

Mr. Dingwall: Okay, agreed.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate today and before I get into the comments about the motion brought forward by the Official Opposition I want to publicly congratulate the new Minister of Transport and the recycled Minister of State for Transport in their new positions. I look forward to working with them.

I want to suggest that today's debate, what has been happening outside this building on the streets of Ottawa, what has been happening on the streets and highways of Toronto and what has been happening at the Ambassador Bridge, is not just about transport. It is not just about trucking.

It is an indication of the kind of anger that has been building in this country since 1984. It is an anger over the way in which the Conservative Party as the Government of Canada has been changing this country. It is intertwined between taxation, deregulation, the free trade agreement with the United States, the impending Canada-U.S.-Mexico free trade agreement, the cuts to VIA Rail, the cuts to CBC, the cuts to Canada Post and privatization, and it is almost as if people began to wake up in the last two or three months and said "My God what has happened to us? What have they done to us?"

The truckers, unlike most of us, have found the tool by which to express that anger. They have the vehicles which can be used to occupy space on roads, to blockade highways and entranceways, they have the tool by which to express their anger. In some ways, it is no different than what the workers at the Caterpillar plant did when they saw their jobs being lost and their factory being closed and sent to the United States: they occupied that space.

I want to suggest, very strongly, that if concrete steps are not taken soon to deal with the very legitimate grievances of the truckers, whether it be the owner-operators or the trucking companies and their employees, more and more Canadians will find their own way to express their visible anger to the Government of Canada.

It is important that the government works diligently to do that because I do not want to see this escalate. It is not in the best interest of the economy of this country. Politically it may be the best thing that could have happened in many, many years because it would put the pressure on the government to reverse the direction it has been taking us into, but other people will lose if it does accelerate.

I have met with the truckers and I have met with their spouses and their children and they have had it up to here. They have been waiting for the federal government for a year to take some concrete action. Instead, the government has got studies, it has promises of action and then decisions which say: "Well, it is really a minor item so we are not going to worry about it." It may be a minor item, but it is one more straw on the backs of these men and women whom we need to carry our raw materials and our finished products to market, whether within Canada or in the U.S. We have not been treating them fairly.

When this government deregulated trucking a number of years ago, it did not just match what the United States did, it went even farther by giving American truckers access to Canada without getting reciprocal agreements with the United States, putting our people at a disadvantage.

The anger is real, the frustration is real and the hardship is real.

The Minister of State for Transport, in her answer to my colleague, talked about tomorrow's children and tomorrow's grandchildren and that is why the government has embarked on this deficit reduction approach to managing this country. She pooh-poohed what Floyd Laughren has done in Ontario in terms of trying to fight the recession. I want to say to that minister: kids who cannot have food today are not going to be the leaders tomorrow.

Studies have shown that children who have poor food intake are poor students and have the highest dropout rate. They will not be tomorrow's leaders. We have to recognize that we have to do things today as well as think about tomorrow.

I am not saying it is any one policy, but it is that whole range of taxes and deregulation and free trade and the psychological aspect. Owner-operator truckers have no breaks whatsoever. They cannot get welfare because they have got this asset called a rig. If they want to get welfare they can sell the rig, if somebody would buy it, but then they have no livelihood, no chance. Because they are an independent operation they do not qualify for unemployment insurance.

• (1530)

They would be more than happy to pay unemployment insurance premiums if they could qualify.

As it stands, when times are tough it is their life-long, hard-earned savings they have to draw on in order to keep the mortgage payments up on the rig. I will not call them loan payments. They are a mortgage payment, there is no question about it, to provide a roof over their heads and food on the table.

Some of the truckers I have talked to have been losing those homes, are in danger of losing those rigs. One fellow told me this afternoon that he has had to dip into his son's educational savings, money he set aside so that his son could go to university some day. They have had to dip into those savings in order to make ends meet today.

They cannot wait for June for these studies to be completed. In fact, when the minister of state was speaking she made reference to the studies becoming public. I hoped that what she meant was that in this House today, either she or the minister will table them so they could be distributed appropriately and we could all have copies. If not, hopefully, within the next two or three days that can happen.

These people want to work for a living. They are not looking for hand-outs. They are looking for some breaks.

It boggled my mind when one fellow told me that when he blew the motor in his rig, the money he spent to buy a new motor was classified as a capital gain and he was taxed accordingly. Does that make sense? A capital gain to replace an engine that blew. I gather that the folks at finance said it was an improvement to his vehicle. That improvement cost him two or three years of payments.

The truckers themselves have asked for a number of solutions, dealing with everything from capital depreciation to both provincial and federal excise taxes to the federal government following the leadership of Ed Philip in Ontario by putting a moratorium on new licences within the federal jurisdiction, particularly those from the United States. They want American truckers to start paying the same taxes in Canada Canadian truckers have to pay.

Maybe the minister of state is right when she said that when they examined it they found it to be a negligible amount. It may very well be, but it is still unfair. It is unfair that an American company who hires American workers to operate American-built rigs to carry American products into Canada can do so without contributing one red cent to the operations of the Government of Canada which provides services to the trucking industry.

It is a question of fairness. Fairness in taxation; fairness in how the truckers are treated. Also, the cabotage. The minister of state referred to the number of checks they have done and the number of people found in violation. However, it is a psychological threat. The word gets out in the industry and it becomes very real in terms of its impact on cargoes.

When truckers are fighting for nickels and dimes because there are too many truckers and too few cargoes they look for every nickel and dime they can find because that is their livelihood. That is their way of putting food on the table. These folks are hurting.

We have seen some action from the provincial level. The provincial government of Ontario did put on a moratorium. It indicated it would control the brokers, licence them and bond them. That is one of the measures the truckers have been calling for.

I am not going to deny that the Ontario government raised the fuel tax. This government also has to accept the fact that in the over-all scheme of things the fuel tax component is only one part of the equation.

Yes, it needs to be dealt with, but so does the write-off, the capital depreciation, so does unfair competition, so does deregulation. Those items have to be addressed as well and they have to be addressed quickly.

Earlier today the Minister of Transport for Ontario, Ed Philip, wrote to the federal Minister of Transport. My understanding is that his letter has now been released publicly but that the federal minister's response has not yet been completed and made available. I would not mind in the question and comment period if the minister would respond.

Just by way of background, Ed Philip and I first worked together as members of the Ontario legislature. One of the things that we did was participate in the Select Committee on the Highway Transportation of Goods back in 1976-77, which was the first Ontario study of trucking deregulation. We said back then to Ontario: "Don't do it". Just like my colleague for Regina-Lumsden and I said in this House on the white paper Freedom to Move, as well as the NTA and companion legislation, "Don't deregulate trucking or rail or air like you are going to". It is an issue that Ed Philip and I have been involved in for many, many years, fighting to protect the workers in the province of Ontario and in Canada.

I would like to read into the record Ed Philip's letter of May 16:

> I am writing with regards to the current situation facing Ontario's trucking industry. As you know, the activities of the past few days have brought the plight of the trucking industry and the desperation of many individual truckers into clear focus. I believe it is incumbent upon you and I to take the representations of the truckers very seriously.
> I met with two delegations of truckers yesterday, and discussed with them the measures that Ontario has already taken to begin to address the problems in the industry. They understood, however, that Ontario's role is limited in that the basic problems—an oversupply of trucking capacity as a result of deregulation, and competition with U.S. trucking companies due to free trade and other federal economic policies—are clearly within federal jurisdiction. I assured them that I would contact you to raise these concerns on their behalf.
> You will know, Ontario has already taken measures to begin to address the problems in the trucking industry. We have, for example, announced a moratorium on the issuance of operating authorities under the Truck Transportation Act. We have announced our intention to license and require bonding for load brokers. We have increased enforcement to ensure compliance with provincial regulations. In addition, we are nearing completion of an in-depth study of trans-border competitiveness issues, which will provide us with a base to assess all cost factors relating to U.S.-Ontario competition.
> I realize you are also undertaking a number of studies, but I feel it is also of vital importance that you give some indication of support for the plight of the truckers by announcing measures similar to those taken by Ontario. In particular, an announcement of a moratorium on interprovincial and trans-border trucking licenses should be made immediately, to arrest the precipitous decline of the Canadian trucking industry.
> I am prepared to meet with you as soon as it can be arranged to discuss these matters further. You and I have a responsibility to explore all avenues which will help to stabilize and ultimately to restore the financial viability of Ontario's and Canada's trucking industry. I will not sit by while this industry goes under, and I believe you will not either. I look forward to meeting you soon.
> Sincerely,
> Ed Philip,
> Minister.

I would echo that appeal for the federal government to, at the very least, place a moratorium on interprovincial and trans-border trucking licences. I think, based on the comments by the Minister of State for Transport, there may be some willingness by the government to do it because of her comments about how awful it was that so many new licences were issued in Ontario in the last six months.

Ontario recognized that they had to find a solution to that problem and the two-year moratorium was part of that solution. I would encourage the government to continue on.

• (1540)

I would also encourage the government to continue, as I know it is doing today, its meetings between officials of the department and representatives of the truckers. Only through that mechanism can the government understand the impact on these human beings and the transportation economy of this country.

I want to take my last couple of minutes to return to what I said at the beginning. This is not just about trucking. This is not just about transportation. This is about real anger out there at the direction in which this country is going. There is a real feeling that we are being torn apart.

Instead of the east-west linkage that Sir John A. Macdonald built in this country, starting with the Canadian Pacific Railway, we have too much north-south. When the truckers argue that they are being unfairly competed against by the American truckers, that is part and parcel of what other Canadians are feeling.

I spent the last 10 days before the House resumed holding a series of working sessions in my riding, particularly in the rural part, to ask people to draft their own throne speech and to give us the agenda items for the Government of Canada.

One thing came out of that totally unprompted. All I asked was: "What do you want Canada to do for your community, for your family, your province, your country and/or your planet?" That is the only question that I put to them. Time and time again they said: "It is as if we woke up one morning and the country was different. We lost the things that linked us together such as VIA Rail, CBC, Canada Post and those kinds of institutions".

They were crying out in anger because they did not like the way this country was being changed. They were afraid they were going to be forced to become American when all our lives we wanted to be different.

We wanted to be Canadians. They are prepared to pay the price to do that. There is no question about it. They recognize that those kinds of things do not come cheap. They recognize that in a perfect world, the north-south linkages would fit the market model.

Canada does not fit the market model. This government does not understand that. This government does not understand that there is a reason why Canada should exist separately from the United States. The only way we can do that is by having east-west transportation linkages, by having viable transportation entities in this country whether that means trucking, rail, air or marine. We have to be able to have our own.

At the rate we are going, at the level of bankruptcies we have seen, and at the rate of movement of trucking companies to the United States, we are not going to have our own domestic truck industry in this country.

We will have to rely on somebody else's trucks regulated by somebody else, controlled and owned by somebody else, driven by somebody else and with not one Canadian, perhaps other than a dispatcher or a broker, having any kind of employment related to the trucking industry.

It is time this government woke up to the fact that it has been taking this country in the wrong direction. We have to go east-west, not north-south. That is why we have to find solutions to the trucking problem, as well as the other problems that ail this country which were created by this government.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I want to begin my remarks by saying that I have no doubt of the compassion in the mind and heart of the hon. junior minister of transport. I have no doubt whatsoever.

Unfortunately, the Canadian people and the truckers in particular have some doubts. The reason they have doubts is because actions speak louder than words.

Since Monday we have seen in this city of Ottawa and, on our television sets, in and around Toronto on Highway 401 the manifestation of the frustration, the anger and the fear of the truck drivers who are being forced out of existence and are losing their livelihood in this country. This morning I met with a some of the wives and children of these truckers. I saw the apprehension on the faces of the women who understood what the future held for them and it was not very pretty. I saw the faces of the children who did not understand. They only knew that their parents were frightened and that something was terribly wrong.

This is something that those of us in Atlantic Canada can understand and empathize with all too well. We have seen in Atlantic Canada so much of the infrastructure that makes us competitive and even faintly prosperous as Canadians go the way of extinction. In Atlantic Canada we are losing our trains. Our highways are in abysmal shape. Our great ports, most particularly in the city that I have the great honour to represent, the city of Halifax, are in danger of shutting down and the Minister of Transport knows this and knows it well.

We know all these things are taking place and we know why these things are taking place. They are taking place because of an absolutely overblown, over-optimistic, and overbearing belief in the survival of the fittest and the somehow deity-given right of the free market to control all our lives.

This is not something that is easily recognizable to Canadians in our 124-year history. Canada is the second largest country in the world with an amazing geography. We have somewhere in the vicinity of 27 million people strung across this huge expanse of country. We are located next to one of the largest, richest, most competitive, and most populous countries on the face of the earth. All of those things drive Canadians into a different mode from our neighbours to the south. They have to. We cannot survive. We certainly cannot survive as a country if we opt for the American free market spirit. It will not work here. It cannot work here. It has not worked here, and it does not work here.

With regard to the trucking industry in particular, the industry was deregulated in 1988 before the free trade agreement. We heard the Minister for International Trade come in and make all kinds of comments about how free trade had nothing to do with the problems in this country. I have no comment to make about that. The Canadian people will and have judged on that already.

The deregulation of the trucking industry fell absolutely within the purview of this theory of free market and survival of the fittest. What has happened? We do not have the survival of anybody. The trucking industry, the Canadian trucking industry, is dying. That is why Wellington Street is choked with trucks. That is why Highway 401 was choked with trucks. That is why those people came and met with the Liberal caucus on Monday. That is why those women were here yesterday meeting with my leader and today meeting with other members of the Liberal caucus.

The fittest who survive in Canada now in the trucking industry are Americans.

It is a wonderful country to the south and I wish it well, but let Americans go survive in their own country. Do not let them survive on the basis of a Canadian government that says: "You have every bit as much right to work and prosper in our country as you do in your own". That is not Canadian. That is not the way we do things. That is not what we expect.

Under deregulation this government tells us that anyone who has a truck can operate and anyone can work. Well sometimes the arguments that we present in this House are somewhat confusing to the Canadian people. There is one argument that people understand and that is prices. They understand the difference between prices in Canada and prices in the United States. Our border towns are in great suffering because of cross-border shopping.

I saw in the paper just last week that a mayor of a New York town wanted to nominate the Prime Minister for man of the year in his town because of what he had done for the economy for upper New York state.

I am sure that the minister of fisheries would agree with me on what happens when you tell Canadians about changes in gas prices. Look at the difference in gas prices for these truckers between Canada and the United States. I heard the Minister of Transport and other members on the government side say that the subsidy is higher in Canada. Well, with the greatest of respect, as we would say back home, big deal. The subsidy may be higher in Canada, but the prices are so much lower in the United States that effectively it is almost one-half the cost to fill your tank in the U.S. than in Canada.

How can we expect our truckers to survive in this atmosphere? We cannot. That is why they are out there. That is why they have been here this week and they deserve better than they have been getting from this government. Pious words like "we are full of compassion, we care about Canadians" are not going to do anything for them. They are not going to put food on the tables of these people or shoes on their children's feet. These words are not going pay their mortgages. Decent work is going to pay their mortgages, the ability to compete in what is one of the most superb countries—if not the most superb country—in the world, if we run it the way it has to be run.

This is not the United States of America. We do not have 280 million people. We have 27 million people and we have to deal with what we have. We are happy that we only have 27 million people. We do not have the concomitant problems that we would have if we had these huge populations.

If you tie the hands of Canadian truckers, if you tie the hands of Canadian workers, prosperity will become a myth. It has become a myth in the bankruptcies that have taken place and in the number of people unemployed. Worst of all, it has become a myth in the minds of Canadians who look at this government and see no compassion, no assistance, and most of all, no hope.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I have a few words on this particular issue. If you know the geography of this country you will realize that Newfoundland is not on the border between the United States and Canada directly in the same sense that a community like Kingston and the Islands does, for instance, or like some of those communities right along the parallel.

Nevertheless, this is an issue that affects us too. It affects us in Newfoundland and it affects us as Canadians generally. I want to say in the limited time available this afternoon that, as a person who arrives on Parliament Hill every morning and who leaves it every night, I have been rather impressed with the way the truckers have conducted their demonstration. It seems to me they ought to be an example for others. They have managed to do things that many demonstrations have failed to do. They have managed to be effective, and certainly that has to be the purpose of any demonstration of that sort. They managed to get the message across, to get the public's attention both across the country and here, in particular terms, to the attention of the decision makers, including the Minister of Transport, whom I am pleased to see in his place at this time.

They have managed to do it with minimum of aggravation. They have parked their rigs but the traffic flow has not been unduly interrupted. I congratulate them, because they got their message across in spades in a very responsible way.

I was out chatting with some of the truckers in the last few days and was overhearing some of their conversations and I was very impressed in terms of the focus they have brought to this particular issue. I thank them and their families on behalf of other members for the way in which they have focused this issue. It is high time somebody focused on this issue. This issue is only the tip of the iceberg of a larger issue: how a number of initiatives of this government are leading us as lambs to the slaughter. It is terrifying, terrifying if you are a truck driver, a consumer or a worker. Nobody is immune it seems to the wrecking ball of this particular government.

The thing that has astounded me as a Canadian in the past few days is to hear the clinical, detached view being mouthed by the Minister of Transport in Question Period and in this debate today by his Minister of State, and by other ministers of the Crown who in clinical fashion think we are dealing somehow with how to perform some remote operation on some inanimate object literally millions of miles away from us. We are talking about real people here, we are talking about people who are losing their rigs, who have lost their bank accounts, who see their livelihood go down the drain, who cannot meet payments and who cannot buy the groceries. We are talking about real live issues here.

It is aggravating for me as an ordinary human being to sit here and to watch the television when I am out in the lobby and to hear members of that crowd over there talk about it as though somehow it is a game of Monopoly or something. I wish to God they would realize the damage that their policies are doing. It is frightful. Do they realize that they, the cabinet ministers and the members of that Tory caucus, are themselves being led as lambs to the slaughter? Do they realize that?

The Prime Minister knows full well what he has unleashed with his series of policies. When he came to government he came for a particular purpose, as we all did, except his purpose is a lot more diabolical than yours could ever be, Madam Speaker, or mine or almost anybody else's in this House. He came to continue what he had done so well in Labrador City. His test plan, his lab operation was called Schefferville, and he did such a job of devastating that he then took his formula to the country as a whole. He is now doing to the country what he did to Schefferville. He is now doing it through the free trade agreement, through deregulation and through other initiatives. He is now affecting his poison. He is now pursuing exactly his agenda of making us a poor cousin of the Americans, of making us the fifty-first state economically and of making us an appendage economically. That has been his agenda from day one.

You look at his initiatives and they are all aimed that way. If you spent your corporate life and your business life taking orders from Cleveland, it is not difficult to get used to taking orders from Washington.

The minister can shrug and can put on the old bluff and pretend "My leader, right or wrong." He can do that all he wants, he does not understand what I am talking about because he is not from Newfoundland and he was not one of the people who got the axe in Schefferville. He would not know. He has to believe that his man from Baie Comeau has got some principle left. Well, I have news for him. I have got news for him. If that person from Baie Comeau had any principle left he would not be doing this to the people of this country, he would not be doing this to the truckers of this country. You do yourself a disservice in defending that kind of skulduggery. You do yourself a disservice. I thought better of you than that. I never thought of you as a clown, I never thought of you as a puppet.

Mr. Corbeil: Stupid little fella.

Mr. Simmons: Ah, we hear it. This is the minister who is going to solve the truckers' problems. This is the minister who wants to bring "cerebral approaches" to the solution, this is the man who wants to rise above it all.

Let me repeat for you, Madam Speaker, because I am sure you missed it. He just called me a stupid little fella. That is his idea of a debate. No wonder he finds himself defending the indefensible, defending the guy from Baie Comeau who wants to sell us, lock, stock and barrel, to the United States.

Who wants to destroy Canada? You say I want to destroy Canada? Am I the person running the truckers into the ground? The minister and his Prime Minister are the ones—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It being four o'clock p.m.—

An hon. member: Let him finish.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There was a question at one point raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. There was not agreement. What was said was: "Let's see how much time there is left."

Actually, if time had to be given to us, there would be actually a minute and a half left to the hon. member's 10 minutes.

The hon. member for York West was rising?

Mr. Marchi: Madam Speaker, the hon. member from Thunder Bay said that if there is no question and answer, there may be time to get both speakers in.

I know he used the word "may". I think we took him in good faith. I know my colleague was simply wrapping up. If you would accord him the extra minute that he needs to finish this debate, I would appreciate it, given the fact that we did change the procedure. We are playing by your rules, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We did not change procedure. Is there unanimous consent to give the hon. member an extra minute and a half to complete his remarks?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unanimous consent has just been withdrawn.

It being 4 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) proceedings on the motion have expired.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 36(8) of the Standing Orders, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government responses to several petitions.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present the following petition which deals with the massive reductions in education by the government, a little less than $500 million during the last budget.

These Canadians point out that these reductions, these cuts, are a contradiction of not only what was said in the throne speech, but also of the government's agenda with respect to increased productivity. How can you have increased productivity by taking those kinds of actions?

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have circulated a proposal for national education standards across the country as part of a private members' initiative. The response has been phenomenal.

I have with me a petition signed by people from Alma, Gatineau, Hull, Quebec, Saskatchewan and from my own riding of Ottawa Centre. All of these petitioners would like to see the House of Commons press the government to set national education standards in consultation and co-operation with the provincial governments, the territories and professionals in the education field, as well as with the unions, parents, youth, non-governmental agencies and normal citizens. I submit this petition in accordance with Standing Order 36.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the government the hypocrisy of its statements with respect to illiteracy and obliterating it in the near future.

Along with the increase in the role it wishes to play in education, it continues to tax books, which imposes ignorance on our population. Taxing books is a terrible mortgage on our future. It is hard enough to read and not watch television. We must make every effort to make reading accessible and therefore the petitioners call on the government to withdraw the tax on reading, the tax on books.

QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed that all the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Thursday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session; and of the amendment thereto of Mr. Chrétien (p. 24) and amendment to the amendment of Mr. Lapierre (p. 209).

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to continue in the throne speech debate where I left off on Thursday. I want to reiterate that I see the challenge that we face in this session of Parliament as being threefold.

First, we must recognize the real limits of the capacity of Canada and Canadians to deal with change.

Second, we must pursue policies that will work to expand these limits.

Third, we must pursue these policies in a more open and more democratic way.

What does this mean in practical terms? Let me talk about one of the most pressing and tragic issues facing Canada today, one that concerns me greatly. At least one in ten women in Canada is battered by her male partner. A million women in Canada are battered weekly. Half of all women murdered each year die at the hands of their partners.

The prevalence of such violence in Canada is nothing less than shocking. Some say this violence is increasing as the advances made by women in society triggers a backlash, while others claim that the abuse women suffer at the hands of men is simply part of the uneven distribution of power in society. The challenge for everyone involved in this issue is to find a way of preventing the violence from occurring in the first place by changing deep-seated attitudes. We in this House can change laws in a matter of months, but attitudes, values and behaviour can take far longer to change. Recently our government announced a four-year, $136 million family violence action plan. The plan supports projects and programs that will increase public awareness and preventive action. Funding will be provided to women's groups and to other community organizations to raise awareness of family violence and to mobilize community action. We want to change attitudes that cause this violence, call the abusers to account and help the innocent victims.

I was pleased to see announced in the throne speech the appointment of a panel to inquire further into this serious problem of violence against women in our society. Government alone cannot ensure behavioural change, but it can certainly provide support to the important community work that is carried on every day; the work of community organizations and professional associations, schools and universities, the business community, and labour unions.

In other words, we are recognizing that real progress will take time and that the federal government does not have a magic solution. We are taking concrete steps to change peoples' attitudes, and we are involving a wide range of actors in the action plan: all levels of government, the voluntary and educational sectors, business and labour.

Another issue of concern, especially in these difficult economic times, is immigration. Like every member of Parliament, I see first hand in my constituency the human costs of an over-burdened system, separated families, and weeks, months and years for refugee status to be determined. Like every member of Parliament, I talk to constituents who ask why we are accepting so many immigrants when unemployment is so high. This is not such an easy question to answer sometimes. The arguments about future growth, the aging population, the need for certain skills and entrepreneurial talents and our duty toward the oppressed and the less fortunate are not always convincing for someone afraid of losing their job or afraid of different languages or cultures.

It is fair to say the stresses and strains placed on society by immigration policies are real. The impact of the refugee determination system on the health and welfare costs faced by provinces and municipalities is certainly real. The rise in public incidents of racism is certainly real. Perhaps we should take these as warning signs that the capacity of society to accept change is being tested and that we must find ways to review our ability to successfully bring new Canadians into the main stream.

The Speech from the Throne spoke of the importance of lifelong learning and of working to develop a learning culture in Canada. These are an important part of our economy and make us prosperous and more competitive. They can do this by increasing our capacity to adapt to change, to make the imperatives of the world economy a force for growth and for development.

If all the actors in the play—the provinces, business, employees, educators and students—can work together we can reach the goals that were set out: cutting illiteracy in half; doubling the number of university graduates in maths and sciences; quadrupling the amount of training in the workplace. It is important to stress once again that we do not want to turn the world upside down to revolutionize our economy or our system of government. After all they are only tools, tools that are supposed to work for us, instead of us working for them.

It is the end result that matters; the happiness, the prosperity, the security of Canadians. Too radical change threatens this security.

Likewise, the inevitable changes that we will see in the next few years must be made to further our collective happiness, increase our collective prosperity and enhance our collective security. We must all work together to pursue policies that will expand our capacity to compete internationally, to reduce and eliminate violence against women, and to develop efficient and responsive government institutions. We must pursue these goals in an open, fair and democratic way.

This means listening to Canadians, appreciating their dreams and aspirations, and recognizing the warning signs when change goes too far, too fast. This means that we, as members of Parliament, must act as the eyes and the ears and the voices of our constituents. It also means that all Canadians have a responsibility to actively join in the search for solutions and to become personally more productive, more tolerant and more involved in our community and society.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): I am very pleased to speak in this debate today on the government throne speech opening the third session of the 34th Parliament.

The throne speech contains three themes: unity, prosperity and government responsiveness. I would like to speak to each of these themes as an aboriginal person and as a northerner.

As an aboriginal person and a northerner, I am disappointed with the throne speech. It is basically a rehash of previous government commitments and a review of long-standing and on-going government activities. We have heard the promises about national unity, job creation and economic prosperity before. We have heard the promises about government responsiveness before. We we have seen them unfilled.

Aboriginal people and the north were mentioned in the 1989 throne speech, and I said then that I was worried about the extent of the government's commitment to northern and aboriginal aspirations. The government's action in cutting programs for aboriginal people and northerners since 1989 has borne out my concerns.

This session of Parliament will be a critical session in Canadian history. The north and the aboriginal people are looking for more than just honourable mention in this government's agenda. We want to see concrete specific steps taken to include us as participants and not as mere observers or onlookers in Canada's constitutional renewal.

This government has several constitutional activities ongoing. The Spicer commission is to report July 1 and so is the special joint committee on the process for amending the constitution.

Aboriginal people and northerners have participated, albeit with some hesitation and concerns, in both these endeavours. Our reluctance to participate comes from a deep suspicion about where all this effort is leading and whether northern and aboriginal concerns are really going to be listened to and acted upon this time.

Where in the government's constitutional plans do aboriginal people fit in? We do not know yet, but aboriginal people must play a part, a pro-active part.

The new minister of constitutional affairs recently went to to both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and I commend him for travelling north so soon after his appointment. The minister met with only a few people and he is vague about the specific role he sees for aboriginal people and northerners. We still do not know how institutions will be reformed to better reflect northern and aboriginal concerns. We do not know whether northern and aboriginal people will have a participatory seat at the constitutional table. We do not know if the government is committed to completing the outstanding constitutional agenda of 1983 which is so important to northerners and aboriginal people. We still do not know if the government is committed to recognizing aboriginal self-government in the constitution.

I am pleased that the minister agrees that the north and aboriginal people have to be involved in the next round of constitutional talks. I want to urge the minister and the government to ensure that northerners and aboriginal people are involved in their own right and not as adjuncts of the federal government.

I have said before and I say again, this federal government cannot claim to speak for northerners and aboriginal people in constitutional negotiations. The failure of the last constitutional round proved this. The new constitutional relationship that aboriginal people and northerners are seeking must involve them as participants in their own right.

The government's constitutional proposal when it is unveiled, must reflect this necessity. If it does not, I predict more failure. Process, as the government should know by now, can be as important as substance. The process has to be fully inclusive, not exclusive.

In contrast to the views of the leader of the New Democratic Party, I believe politicians have a role to play in constitutional renewal. I see it, however, as politicians working with the people and not in isolation from them. It was the isolation of certain politicians from the people that caused the Meech Lake Accord to fail. This kind of isolation and ivory tower Constitution making must not, and I believe will not, happen again in Canada.

On economic matters, the government has asked Canadians, and I quote from the throne speech: "to participate in fashioning a new agenda for prosperity."

But how are northerners to contribute? Where is the assurance that the north will share in this prosperity?

The north is not mentioned in the government's economic discussion. It speaks of reducing interest rates and creating new investment, but where is the economic plan for the north?

The government is not offering to assist in creating a better climate for investment in the north. Where are the initiatives to help northern businesses reduce the cost of doing business?

Unlike the throne speech of 1989, this throne speech makes no reference to regional development. There is no discussion of the economic and employment needs of the regions in Canada, or of the impact of the current recession.

As a northerner, I cannot help but notice the emphasis on southern Canada. I do not see anything in this throne speech which would assist the struggling and developing economies of northern Canada. I do not see any initiatives which would address the serious employment needs of northern and aboriginal youth.

What we have seen in the past few years is the government's deficit reduction efforts being carried out on the backs of northerners. The goods and services tax is a prime example. Northerners are paying more than their fair share of the GST because the government refused to recognize the unique higher costs in the north.

This past February, the Liberal task force on the economy and the recession visited both northern territories. Our task force heard time and time again about the need for a substantial and revised federal commitment to the north.

The north's unique needs must be recognized by the federal government. Our people, our economic problems and potential are different from mainstream Canada. Federal economic policies must reflect and accommodate our differences.

This means making bold policy and program innovations based on the knowledge and experience of northerners. It means rejecting the old ways of twisting and turning northern realities to try to fit them into a southern Canadian framework.

These contortions do not work. Training, education and employment policies must be developed by northerners for northerners, not by southerners for northerners. I urge this government to adopt this approach as it ventures deeper into the field of education.

With respect to education, the problem is not so much one of money, as attitude. The throne speech talks about reaching a national consensus on performance, goals, partnerships and priorities for learning. The government should speak to the Ontario government.

The government suggests a goal of cutting illiteracy rates in half, but what is the definition of literacy? Is it the inability to read and write, or is it the inability to read and write English and French?

The government wants to double the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, science and engineering. Why then has the government been cutting research and development, science and technology funds since it was elected?

The leader of my party pointed out in his speech last week that despite the promise the Prime Minister made in 1984 to double research and development funding, R and D spending has declined from 1.42 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product in 1984 to 1.28 per cent today, a decline of more than 10 per cent.

We agree that Canada must position itself to participate fully in the global economy. There are opportunities we can seize, but these opportunities are not all in southern Canada. There are northern and circumpolar opportunities in science and technology and research and development which should be pursued.

I urge the government to include the north in its global strategic planning. It should not continue to let the Canadian north fall behind.

Northerners are somewhat sceptical about the proposed North American free trade deal. The Canada–U.S. deal did nothing for us. The government could have sought amendments to the Marine Mammals Act, but it did not.

I want to raise a concern as well about the effects on northern preference of the government's intention to eliminate hiring policies that give preference to provincial residents over those from other provinces. I hope that the government recognizes the large and special problem we have in the north of fly-in, fly-out workers and the pressing need to develop our own local trained labour force.

With respect to the environment, we have seen some backtracking by this government. The recent federal budget stretched green plan funding over six years instead of the five years promised initially. The Arctic environmental strategy, so important to northern Canada and to the world, is a step forward but a very small one. The funding, while welcome, is a drop in the bucket. The plan, for example, proposes cleaning up only 13 contaminated sites out of the 800 identified across the north, and there is much more the plan does not deal with.

The government's commitment to consult with aboriginal people on the terms of reference and membership of the proposed royal commission on aboriginal affairs is a positive one. The terms of reference as announced by the Prime Minister in British Columbia, however, were too narrow. Aboriginal issues are not just social, cultural and economic issues. Aboriginal issues are political issues involving the fundamental relationships between aboriginal and non-aboriginal peoples and governments. The royal commission's mandate must reflect this.

But why did the government need to get such a high-profile person, namely the Right Hon. Brian Dickson, a former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, to serve as a special representative of the Prime Minister? This would seem to be an admission by the government that it does not have the credibility to do the job itself.

In addition, it appears the government did not consult aboriginal people on the selection of this special representative. The president of the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada issued a press release about this matter which reads:

> Chief Justice Dickson's track record speaks for itself, but the fact that the Prime Minister appointed him without consulting us speaks volumes about the new respect for aboriginal people he claims to have developed recently.
> The Prime Minister made a promise to consult aboriginal people about the royal commission, so he should have consulted us about the person he is delegating that work to.

The Inuit Tapirisat of Canada has every confidence in Chief Justice Dickson but is reserving final judgment, as I do, until it sees whether its recommendations to him are reflected in his recommendations to the government and whether the government implements those recommendations.

I want to comment here about the government's land claims policy. The government speaks of a reformed policy, but Canadians should know that the government has not reformed the basis of its land claim's policy.

If the government is serious about improving relations with aboriginal people, it must amend its claims policy. No amount of rhetoric about accelerating claims settlements will lead to the agreements the government says it wants, as long as the basis of the policy remains unchanged. There are fundamental problems with the current policy, foremost among them the continued insistence of the government that aboriginal people must extinguish their rights in claims settlements. The government must remove this offensive requirement immediately if it really wants to see progress made.

• (1030)

I urge the government to work with aboriginal people to develop a mechanism which would achieve certainty and clarity in claims settlements without extinguishment.

Aboriginal justice is another area touched on in the throne speech. The government says it will consult aboriginal people on changes in the system of administering justice. Given the government's track record on consultations, how serious is the government? Can aboriginal people believe the government is willing to make meaningful reforms?

The problems between aboriginal people and the justice system have increasingly come to the attention of the general public. We have had the Marshall inquiry in Nova Scotia. It said that the justice system failed Donald Marshall at every turn. Two recent reports have documented similar failures in Alberta.

Manitoba's massive aboriginal justice inquiry will report this summer and it will likely make the same condemnations of the current system.

Saskatchewan is beginning its own review. A meeting will be held in the north, in September, of provincial and territorial justice ministers and aboriginal leaders.

I would like to comment on another issue in terms of aboriginal justice that happened recently in British Columbia and Iqaluit. Kitty Nowdluk, who was a victim in a rape assault case, declined to testify in Iqaluit last year. Because of that refusal she had to undergo a very embarrassing experience when she was arrested in British Columbia. She was taken to Iqaluit through Edmonton and Yellowknife, back to Edmonton, over to Ottawa, and finally back to Iqaluit. She spent time in jail at every stop because she did not want to go to Iqaluit to testify in the rape case in which she was the victim.

She was made a victim of the circumstances and was treated as a criminal. How fair is the justice system when it arrests the victim instead of putting the criminal in jail? I wanted to comment on that while we were talking about the aboriginal justice system.

I want to conclude by making reference to the royal commission on electoral reform. This commission may recommend a process for aboriginal electoral districts as a means of securing more equitable representation for aboriginal people in the Parliament of Canada.

I would like to elaborate further on that electoral reform. I am a member of a committee that will be making recommendations on aboriginal electoral reform. The aboriginal people are going to be recommending that there be some means of ensuring more aboriginal participation in this House. The way to do that, we believe, is to ensure that there be some way of creating constituencies that reflect a large number of aboriginal people across this country. It does not mean, and I must stress this, that we want guarantees to ensure that aboriginal people get elected. What it means is that we want to ensure the process is there by which aboriginal people can get represented down here. We presently do not have that same problem in the Northwest Territories because the aboriginal people are the majority there. I urge this House to react favourably to the Electoral Reform Commission when it comes up with its recommendations.

I urge this Parliament to give this idea the thoughtful consideration it deserves as one means of changing the way Ottawa works for all Canadians and all aboriginal people.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I listened with intrigue to the hon. member's remarks dealing with the throne speech. I have had the very distinct pleasure of being able to visit Cambridge Bay, which is about 2,000 miles straight north of the city I live in. I was absolutely amazed at all things I found in Cambridge Bay. I am not sure how close Cambridge Bay is to the hon. member's home.

Just to give some idea of how impressed I was, when you arrive in the community you find absolutely no roads, no fences, no power lines. It is a self-contained community. One immediately becomes very much aware of how difficult life must be, particularly given the harsh climate and the fact that the ability to produce things from the soil is not available to the community.

I noticed that the hon. member made reference to the fact that the throne speech did not make specific reference to assisting opportunities to become involved or to make jobs or work easier for employers. I note that is perhaps a much easier statement to make than it is one to put bricks and mortar to. For example, I met an individual who was the taxi operator, the day operator, a mortician, he dug graves, he was a general contractor and on an on. It is tough to eke out a living in the north. There is certainly no question about that.

The hon. member went on to say that he is somewhat concerned with the elimination of borders, to bring in people to assist employers to provide work on the most cost-effective basis. I understand his concern with local employment, but on the other hand if business is to do business and be competitive, then I think they need to have all opportunities open to them.

He made some mention with respect to the Right Hon. Brian Dickson and his role and the system he has been put in charge of with respect to making certain things happen. He expressed some concern that, perhaps, this process did not proceed in a way he found favour with.

Therefore, my question to him is: If he were the Prime Minister and were to begin this process, how would he like this process to begin? How would he like to see this process evolve? Also, if he has time, what conclusions would he like to see?

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I probably will not have the pleasure of being the Prime Minister in my lifetime, so it is a rhetorical question.

I just want to make a couple of comments. I am sorry that I missed part of the question with regard to the Right Hon. Brian Dickson. In terms of freeing the interprovincial barriers, one must realize that in the north today a majority of the construction companies or other companies that operate in the north started out from down here and have somewhat continued, although we are making great strides to get northern owned companies operating in the north.

When a majority of the companies are from down here, the thing that happens is that it is easier, cheaper for them to bring in their own people. In this case, I am talking about construction companies which are in the process of building houses and other construction. When construction workers come north, they leave home. They want to get back home as soon as possible, so they are prepared to work 16 hour days, long days, seven days a week.

The construction companies prefer them because they can finish the job faster and, therefore, the companies can make more money in the process.

As a result, the local people do not get as much of a chance to work for those construction firms as they would like because they have their own lives to live, they have their homes, and they have their families in that community. They have other commitments, whether it is in regional or municipal politics, and so have to do other work. They have outside interests other than the present construction that is going on.

I just wanted to make that point to show that the money that is spent is taken back out again because the construction firm and the construction labourers are not from that community. The money is used to build a house or whatever and is taken right back out again. Therefore, the money does not create the economic opportunities that it should.

I must make a further comment about the Right Hon. Brian Dickson. I never disagreed with his appointment, I just question the fact that the appointment was made without consultation with the aboriginal people.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the member referred to economic matters during his speech and noted the absence of an economic plan for the north in the throne speech. He also spoke of the need to reduce the cost of doing business for northern businesses.

The member is a diligent, hard-working member of the committee of the House on industry, science and technology. I know that he has lots of ideas about what can be done to promote the northern economy. I wonder whether he would care to expand on this briefly.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, one of the things that this government announced last week, on Friday I think, in all its generosity, was that it had decided to maintain what is called a postal rate subsidy for food in the north. After the government cut it from $19 million, it will now be maintained at $15 million.

When we told the government that it should maintain the subsidy, it was adamant about eliminating it in the next 15 years. Keeping it is one way of ensuring that Canadians have a fair chance of being able to buy their produce and other food stuffs in the north in order to operate cheaper and better.

I believe there has to be more tax incentives introduced by the government, either this government or the territorial government, to ensure that northern companies operating in the north are better able to compete with the government, which is the largest employer in the north. We have a saying in the north that the private sector trains and the government hires. The private sector trains people to do certain jobs and then the government comes along, either the territorial government or federal government, plucks away those very people. That makes it extremely hard for the private sector to keep its employees and ensure that they have better productivity in the north.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House this morning to speak in this debate on the Speech from the Throne and to express my full support for the objectives set forth by the government in this historic document.

As was mentioned by the Governor General, His Excellency Ray Hnatyshyn, national unity, prosperity, the environment and education are among the genuine concerns of Canadian men and women.

When I took up my new duties a few weeks ago, I had to go back to school, as it were, and read a number of papers.

One of these described Transport Canada's mission as helping to maintain a safe national transportation system that respects the environment and is responsive to the needs of a competitive economy and to the goals this country has set itself.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the department for which I am responsible is the linchpin of our action in this country. If there is any area and that is also valued as a symbol of the unity of this country, transportation is certainly one of them.

If we were to cross Canada from Cape Spear, Newfoundland, to St. Elias, Yukon, that would be a total of 5,187 kilometres. If we crossed Canadian territory from Ellesmere Island to Middle Island in Lake Erie, that would be a total of 4,627 kilometres. About 14 million people live in the narrow strip, 1,000 kilometres long, between Quebec City and Windsor, which represents only 2 per cent of our territory. About 48 per cent of our population lives in Canada's 10 largest urban centres.

Mr. Speaker, one can scarcely imagine how strong our sense of unity had to be to forge and maintain the ties that keep this country together. I believe that sense of unity is still very much alive in the hearts of every Canadian in this country.

Since the beginning of Confederation, it was transportation that linked Quebec to the Maritimes, British Columbia to the Prairies, and Ontario to the East and to the West.

Historically, transportation has been one of the factors that helped unite this country. The construction of the railways brought the West into Confederation, and when we think of Canadian history, we often tend to think of those who built the railways as nation-builders. In fact, the railways started to expand in Canada during the second half of the nineteenth century when it was perceived as an important tool for uniting and opening up the country. Companies and private citizens started to invest massively in railway construction. The network extended in many directions and finally culminated in the transcontinental line built by Canadian Pacific.

When the "Last Spike" was driven in 1885, the railways became a symbol of the determination of Canadians. Has that determination disappeared? I don't think so, although Canadians may be less aware of it. We must therefore renew that awareness of their values, their strengths and their determination to be united with in a prosperous country.

[English]

Transportation was not only fundamental to the creation of our nation, but also has been and continues to be a mainspring of our country's economic growth. We estimate that the transportation services sector currently employs 700,000 people and generates $41 billion annually in economic benefits.

Transportation is more than just another economic sector. Since the earliest days of Confederation, the industry has been the main agent of the physical and political cohesion of our country. A strong and competitive transportation system is as necessary today as it was in 1867 to promote the development of all of Canada's regions.

Distance makes a transportation policy essential to our national well-being and influences our transportation priorities. Further, because the greater part of our country is so sparsely populated, domestic transportation is particularly important to strengthen our national unity, encourage national and regional development and provide services to remote areas.

• (1050)

We all know that Canada's economic future depends on our ability to compete internationally.

[Translation]

We believe that the planning of a new national rail system for freight transport complements the study of the national rail network and will help us develop an integrated surface freight transportation strategy.

The railways' rate of return for freight transportation was rather low in the past and there is no prospect of improvement if the present trend continues.

But those are not the only problems: Canadian ports have expressed many concerns about the competitive advantages that American ports enjoy and the possible diversion of containers destined for Canada to ports and railways in the United States.

The continued viability of Canadian ports as an essential link in the surface transportation system cannot be assumed. The success of our main ports on the east and west coasts is closely tied to the ability of our railways and trucking companies to provide services and rates that are competitive with those offered by American ports, railroads and trucking companies.

The task force report on Canadian ports that will soon be made public should provide an interesting analysis of the above issues and other aspects of the overall problem. The many interrelationships of the surface transportation system suggest that we cannot successfully meet all the challenges of transportation unless we consider the system as a whole.

Transport Canada is working on the first step of this strategy, which involves predicting what our surface transport system could be like and how it will function in a few decades. This document should be released shortly for comment to the railways, trucking companies, port authorities and provincial governments, among others.

We believe that this strategy will encourage intermodal transportation and help all modes of transportation look forward to a prosperous future and increased competitiveness. Our ambitions should not be limited by the size of our domestic market. Canada is home to some of the largest paper companies in the world and they produce twice as much wood as the Canadian market needs.

Canada is also the headquarters of one of the world's largest textile companies which earns 68 per cent of its revenue abroad. Bombardier sells 90 per cent of its transportation products abroad. I could continue this list for a long time.

All these industries contribute directly to the welfare of all Canadians. The government can help stimulate some of these industries and keep our industries competitive, but cannot do it alone. All concerned must cooperate, both private enterprise and workers and their unions. All those who are in any way involved with the country's productivity must work in the same direction.

[English]

Today, Canadians are increasingly concerned about their ability to compete. These concerns range from broad economic issues such as inflation, interest rates and the exchange rate to problems with our productivity performance like the effectiveness of investments, the burden of government and the business climate.

Government's have a responsibility to create an environment that encourages the growth of competitive and successful enterprises. The 1991 budget announced actions to restore fiscal balance and move toward price stability. This will lead to a stable-wide economic environment, increase the confidence in the Canadian economy and will strengthen Canada's ability to compete in a tough, economic world.

Boosting productivity growth and prosperity is far more than a job just for government. The private sector must take full advantage of the opportunities created by the actions of governments. In order to maximize productivity growth, the quality of investments in infrastructure, machinery and equipment, training, education and research and technology must be scrutinized. As well, consideration must be given to private sector spending in the areas of training and research and to other areas, such as education, where by international standards Canada's level of spending compares well but its performance does not. Prosperity and competitiveness are not only issues for business, labour and government. All Canadians can help to strengthen Canada's competitive ability by identifying and developing an awareness of the problem. Only then can they be a part of developing solutions.

[Translation]

I hope that all Canadians, business as well as labour, are thinking about innovative solutions that will strengthen Canada's ability to grow and regain the prosperity that made it the envy of so many other countries for so long. We are prepared to help Canadians explore new ways and new opportunities for cooperation between the public and private sectors to create a more favorable environment with a view to improving our productivity performance.

Cooperation could take the form of a partnership, for instance. We believe that it would provide a sound basis for solving common problems and face the challenges in an efficient way. The government is reaching out and I would like to give an example of this.

[English]

We are currently involved in negotiations to transfer the management and operation of several airports to local airport authorities. We expect the transfers to be completed by the end of this year at Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver and Montreal. Aviation services, including air traffic control, airport safety and security, will remain the responsibility of the federal government.

The whole point of this initiative is to allow airports to respond more directly and positively to local communities' needs and interests and to encourage the national airport network to operate in a more commercial and cost-efficient fashion. It offers communities the opportunity to share in their airports' business.

The airport transfer policy announced in 1987 has sparked interest across the country and local groups are working with Transport Canada on similar transfers in Moncton, Quebec City, Windsor, Thunder Bay, Winnipeg and Kamloops.

The federal government earlier this year transferred 38 Arctic airports in the Northwest Territories to the territorial government. Last year, 10 other airports were transferred to the Yukon territorial government. Our objective is to establish a self-sustaining airport network that promotes increased local involvement while meeting the operational objectives of the national air transportation system.

I would like to address another matter, where partnership and co-operation between all parts of society is essential, and I mean government at all levels, industry and individuals, which is the environment. The government has already put in place a series of environmental partnerships involving individuals as well as special groups, the private sector, as well as municipal and provincial governments. Those partnerships extend to the international level. In the transport field, we must try to reduce the activities that are harmful to the environment. We must try to balance the demands for long-term development with environment consideration, such as noise, pollution and congestion. These factors will remain at the centre of our work and activities.

But there will be a price to pay. For example, last November the public review panel on tanker safety and marine spills response capability filed its report. It recommends, among other measures, the improvement of our capability to clean oil spills, the financing of research in the field of cleaning equipment and the assurance that in 10 years all tankers in use in Canada will be equipped with double hulls.

In a more general manner, my department will contribute to the environmental objectives of the federal government by proceeding with changes to regulation of the transportation of dangerous goods; responding to and implementing in conjunction with Environment Canada and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans the recommendation of the public review panel on tanker safety and marine spills response capability; working with the international marine organization toward development of an international convention on oil spill response; implementing the green plan initiatives which impact upon Transport Canada, including the federal code of environmental stewardship; the sustainable management program for the Fraser River Basin, the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence pollution prevention program, et cetera; contributing to the development of regulations pursuant to the new Canadian Environmental Assessment Act; reviewing departmental practices and procedures to integrate environmental considerations into the decision-making process at all levels, in other words the airport group's environmental strategy; augmenting departmental work on environment protection through research and development like waste management, spills and leaks, long-term climate change and fuel efficiency; and finally by reviewing the regulation of vehicle emissions to phase in more stringent standards.

We hope, Mr. Speaker, that these actions will all contribute to the national effort to protect the environment and to avoid repeating past mistakes.

However, there is no magic solution to this tremendous task as many seem to believe. The support and involvment of everyone, at all levels, will be required.

I would now like to talk briefly about education, which occupies a prominant place in the Speech from the Throne. My concern for education dates as far back as the days when I was Labour Minister and will certainly not fade, because education is the cornerstone of any modern society.

As Michelet, the XIX century French historian and author, wrote in his book titled "The People":"What comes first in politics? Education. Second? Education. And third? Education."

The statistics quoted in the Speech from the Throne are unbelievable, Mr. Speaker: 3 out of 10 young Canadians do not graduate from high school and 4 out of 10 adults are virtually illiterate.

Canadian industry spends half as much on its employees' training as its American counterpart, a fifth as much as the Japanese and an eight as much as the Germans. That is terrible, Mr. Speaker, is it not?

How can we ask illiterate people to make a choice when in fact they cannot understand what is being asked of them? How can we ask young people to feel useful and proud when they cannot find a job because of lack of training?

I am from Quebec, Mr. Speaker, and I have never appreciated the federal meddling in education. It is clear that, to protect its language and culture, Quebec has to exercise an exclusive jurisdiction on education.

The federal government recognizes this and reaffirms its intent to respect provincial jurisdictions in that area.

It would be tragic, however, for the government of Canada to shirk its responsability to ponder over that whole question. Although statistics do not relate to one province in particular, they vary little from province to province.

In the context of a global economy, education and training needs know no boundaries. It seems perfectly logical to me to undertake a nation-wide discussion on the subject. Each province will then be able to choose among the proposed solutions the ones that fit their objectives.

Everyone's cooperation is urgently required, otherwise Canada will take a back seat to an increasing number of countries and will be incapable of taking up the challenges inherent to the pursuit of prosperity and quality of life all Canadians want.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I have to say a few words about Montreal, one of the most beautiful cities in Canada, and one of the most cosmopolitan as well. The ongoing development of the metropolitan area of Montreal is a main concern of mine and of this government.

What I has just said about education and training in the whole country also applies to Montreal, where the industrial structure is changing. Montreal youths have to be prepared to fill the high technology positions in the high-tech industries we have helped set up through our direct assistance. I am referring to research funding in the fields of pharmaceutical products, aeronautics and space tehcnology. It is imperative to prepare our youths to acquire expertise in these high-tech sectors.

In Montreal, multiculturalism is lived in great harmony. The social climate has always been one of tolerance and cooperation between its various elements. This is in line with the desire of Montreal to be recognized as a city of international status and to accomodate as many international organization's headquarters as possible. It has the full support of our government in achieving its goals.

Canada has always been a trading nation and a flourishing trade inevitably causes the movement of goods across Canada and a abroad. These operations cannot be carried out successfully without an efficient and competitive transportation system. A first-rate Canadian transportation system is one of the main components of a unified Canada. I undertake, as Minister of Transport, to do my best to promote this level of excellence.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask a question, since I have four children in the Quebec school system. I would like to know whether the minister is prepared to criticize the education system in his province. Is he willing to do so?

Another item: The minister mentioned the problem of inflation when the last Budget was brought down. I believe that a study published this morning by the Consumers' Association of Canada indicates that the GST has added enormously to inflation in this country and to rising prices. Is he prepared to comment on that? Finally, I also want to mention what his colleague the Prime Minister said in Alberta to Albertans, to convince them that the GST was a good thing. The Prime Minister was quoted this morning on the CBC. He said:

[English]

"The GST will not cost you a nickel. The GST will not cost you a nickel".

[Translation]

That is what the Prime Minister said. Is he willing to comment on these two items?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as far as education is concerned, when the federal government announces an exercise in reflection on education in this country, it does not mean the Government of Canada or the present speaker is putting the blame on a particular jurisdiction. Statistics have shown that over 30 per cent of young Canadians do not finish high school, and there are some major reasons for this. This means we must be concerned about the situation across Canada, because we will live in an increasingly global economy, so that across Canada, people will have to start asking some very serious questions about the drop-out problem. We must start asking some very serious questions about what brings young people to leave school when they are well into high school and, as a result, practically kill any chances they would have on the labour market in the years to come. Obviously, if they don't have the right education, if they don't at least finish high school or better than that, they will not be able to fill the high tech positions that the world of tomorrow is starting to create in increasing numbers.

It is certainly not our intention, not in the Speech from the Throne and not in our comments, to criticize one particular jurisdiction. We are merely asking all Canadians to take a long hard look at problems in education, to find the causes and, finally, to come up with the solutions.

As far as the GST is concerned, Mr. Speaker, this government had the guts to act after the previous government refused to do so, following reports from at least four task forces and commissions of inquiry, each of which concluded that the Government of Canada should eliminate the manufacturers' sales tax and thus enable our manufacturers to meet world competition head on. The only way to remove the tax on manufactured products was to replace it with a tax on consumption. We had the guts to do that, Mr. Speaker. For a whole year, the two Opposition Parties put up a ferocious battle against this salutary, energetic and courageous measure.

When the government finally put the bill through the House of Commons, the Opposition transferred the debate to the other place, where it did not belong, and they urged the Liberal senators to wage a fierce battle against a tax that is the best and the fairest tax we could have, a tax that will prove in the years to come, to all Canadians, how energetic and courageous we were to make this decision.

• (1110)

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I noticed that the hon. minister, when he was speaking, mentioned the green plan. He also mentioned the Fraser River basin and the work that is being planned there.

I wonder if the Minister of Transport is aware that the debris control program on the Fraser River, as we speak, is being dismantled because we have not had funding from two out of the three ministries responsible for federal funding in that program. Fisheries has cut back on part of its $45,000 and forestry is looking at cutting back. The only department that has come through with its $90,000 portion has been the Coast Guard.

My question concerns what comes down the Fraser River. When I talk about what comes down I am talking about the logs and the flotsam and jetsam that come down the river during the freshet. The debris catch basin catches 135 pieces every minute during the freshet. The catching of those 135 pieces means a tremendous impact on what will not be coming down the Fraser where fisheries is taking place, where fish habitat is, where sports fishing takes place, where houseboats are and where industry is plying the Fraser.

The $180,000, which is the federal government's share of the Fraser River debris control program, is a very small price to pay for the tremendous job that debris control does. Some 90 per cent of the debris caught in that is debris as a result of natural causes and not as a result of the forest industry. The forest industry has undertaken to pay one-third, the provincial government is paying one-third and the federal government, under three ministries, is all over the map on it.

We are talking about a green plan and protecting and enhancing the Fraser River basin and the government is showing its lack of seriousness by not having full commitment to the debris control program. It should enhance that program so that the sludge left at the end, after the good stuff is cut for fire wood or chipped for pulp, could be chipped for hog fuel, if we had a way to use hog fuel, as opposed to being burned. That is how the government could be serious about the green plan and the Fraser River.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he would comment on just how serious the government is on the Fraser River basin.

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleague from the most western province her concern with the Fraser River, which is certainly one of the nicest waterways in this country. I have had many fortunate occasions to visit that area, and I certainly would like to see that area cleaned up as soon as possible because it would further enhance the beauty of the province of British Columbia.

I would like to reiterate here that this government has adopted a green plan which has been recognized by the knowledgeable authorities in the world as the best green plan ever adopted by any government in any country. We have repeated, many times, that we will implement that program over a given period of years.

We have to live with the constraints that we inherited from previous governments, but our commitment is there and the cleaning up of the Fraser River basin is one of the main commitments of the green plan.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. There is much in the speech that one could speak on for quite a long time, not that the speech really has much substance. It does, however, touch base with a variety of issues that are important and deserve attention from this House and from members.

However, this morning I would like to touch on just two areas with which the Speech from the Throne deals. One concerns the question of national unity and the other area I would like to discuss is the question of productivity and economic growth.

First, concerning the question of national unity and the constitution and ways and means of getting constitutional change in Canada, I personally believe that what we need is a constituent assembly. I felt this way when Mr. Trudeau, of the former Liberal government, brought in its constitutional proposals. I believe a better way of dealing with a broad, sweeping change of our Constitution would be through some form of constituent assembly.

For a while, the then leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Yellowhead, supported that proposition. He advocated it for a short period of time, then he withdrew the idea. I thought he was wrong in withdrawing it. I wish he had continued to press for some form of constituent assembly.

What has occurred in the 1980s in terms of attempts at constitutional change just reinforces for me the necessity of having some form of constituent assembly. I believe our present institutions, Parliament and the provincial legislatures, as well as provincial and federal political parties are not suited to deal with the constitutional issue. I suggest that political considerations play a major part in our discussions and in our decisions concerning the Constitution. That is not surprising; whether we are provincial or federal politicians, our concern is getting re-elected. That is the nature of the job and the role that we have. It is a job requirement, so to speak.

Our concern with the politics of it is an ingredient that is always there. I do not think I am divulging any caucus secrets, but when we sit around the table and discuss things like the Quebec veto, and I am sure this occurs in the Liberal and Conservative caucuses, a great debate occurs among the members, depending on the region you are from. The debate very often goes in terms of: "Can we sell this back home"? In other words, what are the political dimensions of this?

On top of that, going through the decade of the 1980s and toward the end of the 1980s, politics, political institutions, legislatures and parliaments have lost a lot of respect and credibility among Canadians. They see us very often as playing the political role rather than doing what the public feels is good for the country. In many ways this is simplistic, to be sure.

The fact that it is a widely held belief and feeling that we are just functioning for our own political interests and not for what is good for the country disables us from getting the credibility in dealing with this most important issue of national unity and the question of whether Canada, as we know it today, will continue to exist in the years and decades ahead.

My preference would be a process of consultation. All political parties on the federal and provincial levels would consult with various groups and get people from those groups to sit on a constituent assembly. We would have representatives from labour, business, the farming community, fishermen, women's organizations, native organizations, the arts, the universities and from a broad spectrum of Canadian society. The way I envisage it is somewhat similar to what many of the bands in my district have. There is the position called "elders", the elders of the band.

I would like to see a constituent assembly of elders from Canada to sit down—give them a year or two years—to discuss among themselves how this country can function. I would like them to get to know each other and the nuances of the various geographic districts as well as of the various specific interests and concerns that women, native people and that labour must have. Through discussing these interests and concerns, a proposal can come forward in which there is equality and justice for Canada. They can propose a way of governing ourselves that would make sense and that would be acceptable to the Canadian people.

I would then suggest that proposals be put forward in a national referendum so that people supporting, advocating and educating the public on them would not be just politicians. They would be the representatives of the women's organizations, native organizations, labour, business and the various groups and components that make up our broad mosaic and are members of the constituents assembly. In this way, they would find the common concerns for example of women in Quebec and outside Quebec. The question of Quebec and the distinctiveness of Quebec would be reflected in their discussions.

Personally, I see this as the only means by which we could resolve the constitutional impasse that has been created for us. I must say this constitutional impasse has, to a certain extent, been the result of political considerations that were involved and which have created, to a large extent, the situation we are in today. I do not believe that our political institutions are capable of untying the knot that we are in now.

The other area I wish to touch upon is the question of productivity and economic strategy that the Speech from the Throne talks about. Again the Speech from the Throne talks in glowing terms. Often the rhetoric in the speech is correct.

I noted, as well, one part of the speech the Speech from the Throne calls upon:

> Canadian business, workers and governments will be asked to work together to generate at least two and a half million new jobs by the year 2000 and to raise the real incomes of Canadians by at least twenty-five percent, by the same year.

In other words, the Speech from the Throne and this government calls upon business and labour to work together and to co-operate. That is a lofty notion. Excuse my cynicism when I hear it coming from this government.

This government has done more to alienate labour and to set one group of people in society against the other group in our society than any other previous government that I am aware of. This government talks about increased productivity and the importance of education. Excuse my cynicism, but this government has done more to cut back on research and development, and post-secondary education than any government that I am aware of.

To be sure, I have not been here all that long. I have been here only since 1979, but I must say that in the 11 or 12 years that I have been a member, I have never seen such systematic cutbacks to post-secondary education, the science councils and the research councils than what has occurred under various budgets introduced by the government opposite.

There is no doubt that if we are going to survive economically, we have, as a society and as a country, to begin to focus our capacities and our assets as a nation. We must be able to bring private capital, labour, science, the public sector together to focus on certain economic strategies and goals. When you look at the successful economic models in the world today, whether they are Taiwan, Japan, Germany or other European countries, you would see, Mr. Speaker, that they have been so successful because they have been able to focus, to bring together and to harmonize the various assets they have as a country; to bring capital, the resources of the scientific community, and the public sector together to act as a co-ordinator and initiator and to ensure that public policy is in harmony with the goals.

To achieve that in this country I suggest requires quite a different attitude by this government. While this government might pay lip service to the goals, its actual record and its actual deeds have been the opposite. Rather than creating harmony, it has created disharmony; rather than being able to bring together and to focus, it has done the very opposite. It has split this country and its people into various factions and groups at war with each other.

As well, Mr. Speaker, when you look at the models of Taiwan, Japan, Germany and other European countries, you begin to notice that the public sector there plays a very important part. Even in Taiwan its steel companies are publicly owned because it fitted in with its industrial strategy.

This government opposite is so ideologically driven that it will privatize for the sake of privatization. It will not step back and ask the question: "Does it make sense to have this particular enterprise in the public sector or not". It refuses to look at the question in this light.

The government is ideologically driven. It is part of the new right that assumes that any public involvement is bad. It says, just leave it entirely to the private sector and the private sector somehow or other will create new wealth and that new wealth will be distributed creating new jobs and opportunities and so everyone will be happy and well off. It is obvious that this has not worked.

If this government is serious about an industrial strategy, it has to drop its ideologically motivated and driven agenda. It is not appropriate in the 21st century. We have seen, mainly in the English speaking world, Canada, the United States, Great Britain, go through a new right era, the era of Ronald Reagan, the era of Maggie Thatcher and the era of this particular brand of the Conservative Party, which I hasten to add is different from the old Conservative Party of Stanfield and Diefenbaker.

This Conservative Party is the new right that originates in the United States. It has captured this party and has derailed it from the great tradition of the Progressive Conservative Party.

The type of Rambo capitalism this government encourages is not the model that would allow us to remain competitive, to have the leading edge technologically, to produce an economy that has decent wages, that has the production of new wealth in order for all of its citizens to benefit.

The first thing this government has to do, if it is serious about an industrial strategy, is to understand that the state does have a role to play in the creation of wealth as well as the question of the distribution of wealth.

• (1130)

We can also look at past Liberal economic strategies. Often, to tell the truth, they did not work that well. Quite often it was a case of throwing money at the problem. It was not all that smart. A lot of the money was wasted. It did not produce what the Liberals hoped it would produce.

The whole mad scheme that the Liberals introduced in the dying days of their government of the scientific research tax credit comes to mind. Billions of dollars were wasted, a terrible waste. It just benefited smart accountants and fly-by-night operators who took advantage of this tax loophole. Had the billions of dollars been actually used in directed grants to our universities, to our research councils, we could have gotten much more benefit out of that loss of tax revenue.

The hallmark of Liberal economic strategy very often was waste. Money was given to people who did not need the money. Grants were given to certain businesses, and not to other businesses, which gave some businesses unfair competitive advantage over other businesses.

This practice continues with this present government. We hear stories now and then about certain businesses getting grants from the government, putting at a tremendous disadvantage that business' competitors.

The question arises whether the state should be involved in selecting winners. I would shy away from that. No, the state does not pick the winners. However, surely the state, in co-ordination with labour, business, and the scientific community, can select certain areas in which we can specialize, in which we can marshal our resources to ensure that we are successful in that area. The decision of picking winners is not one that a few bureaucrats in the government should make but a decision that should be made by a larger group of people in society.

The other thing that is important when we talk about an economic strategy or a social contract is that this government has to sit down and have some honest words with their business friends, and particularly Mr. d'Aquino and the Business Council on National Issues. It happens too often that governments, whether this government or the previous Liberal government, have given tremendous tax advantages or direct grants and loans to certain businesses, which then in turn have taken those gifts and very often moved south of the border. There is a certain social responsibility that requires that companies receiving special grants and subsidies or tax treatment remain in the country.

The other thing the government has to talk to its business friends about is their responsibility to pay their fair share in taxes. I am tired of hearing the business council and members of this country's large wealthy families lecture us about getting the deficit under control, while they who have benefited most from the deficit, from the economic growth that has occurred because of the deficit, are the ones who pay the least in terms of taxes.

Talking about the types of rip-offs that occur, the Minister of Finance said in February of this year in a small press release, No. 91-018, Draft Legislation on the Income Taxation of Trusts, that when this legislation is passed by this House the government will defer billions of dollars of tax revenue that large wealthy families—the Eatons, the Bronfmans, et cetera—should start paying.

The Liberals in 1972 in their tax reform, when we changed from an inheritance tax to a capital gains tax, allowed the very wealthy families to defer paying taxes 21 years on their accumulation of wealth—the increase in the stocks and the bonds and the real estate that they held.

They were allowed to place that wealth into a trust, but there was a rule imposed that required them to start paying taxes on that wealth 21 years down the line. This government is now going to defer that for a whole other generation. I find that outrageous and obscene. If we are going to have an economic strategy with labour, management, business, and the public sector co-operating then everybody should also be paying their fair share in taxes.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wished and hoped that the comments of the hon. member would have focused on the Speech from the Throne. I was quite disappointed to see him moving his cannon away from shooting at the government to shooting at the Official Opposition. For the record, when the hon. member was talking about Liberal policies and investing money in certain programs, what problems does the hon. member have with the national health care program, one of the finest national health care programs in the world. Is he suggesting that the Liberal government, or future governments, should not be investing money in a national program such as health care?

The hon. member spoke about fair taxation. I wonder about fair taxation when the only NDP government in Canada introduced an 8 per cent tax on top of the 7 per cent GST. Is there any fairness whatsoever in that way of doing business? Why would the hon. member not go to his colleagues at the provincial level in Ontario and ask them to introduce some fairness in the provincial tax system so we would not see the 7 per cent on top of the 8 per cent, tax on top of taxing?

What is the problem is with the hon. member when he talks about a fair taxation system and turns around and attacks the Liberal initiatives of the past? If we leave it to my colleagues in the NDP probably everyone in the country would be poor. They do not seem to like anybody getting ahead in our society and getting rich, even without taking away from those needing assistance.

He spoke about the educational system and tried to attack the government. I am not here in order to defend the government, but I was quite amazed that the first province across Canada to oppose any kind of move toward reform of the national education system was Ontario and its NDP government. I wonder what the hon. member's position is vis-à-vis that. Is he going to communicate to his colleagues, the NDP Government of Ontario, that there is a need to reform the educational system across the country? I would like to hear his comments.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises quite a few issues. First of all in my criticism of this government and previous Liberal governments I generally tried to direct my comments to the question of taxation and industrial strategy. He talked about health and what the former Liberal government did in that area.

As with many things, including the economic strategy of the former Liberal government, very often it was hit and miss. There were some successes and some failures. They introduced some good legislation in terms of health care, yet let us not forget that it was the Liberal government that started moving away from block funding.

He then asks the question about tax fairness and ends his comments by asking what I have got against wealth. I accept that the accumulation of wealth is part of our society and has some desirable aspects to it, but to have large wealth not pay a cent of tax I find a little too much. I wonder if the hon. member really believes that large wealth should not be taxed.

• (1140)

I look here at an editorial from The Financial Post of March 27, 1991, which talks about the deferral of the trust tax. The editorial ends up by making this statement:

> There could be substantial sums at stake in allowing trusts to defer capital gains taxes further. Taxpayers should be told how much revenue is at stake, and who will benefit most by allowing trusts to defer capital gains taxes for many years beyond the 21 already allowed.

Another editorial, by Diane Francis in the Macleans' issue of December 25, 1989 asks this question:

> I'm all in favour of a society that encourages the creation of wealth, but I certainly hope that courts, politicians and tax officials remember that taxes, like death, should be as unavoidable for the rich as they are for the rest of us.

There has got to be some basic fairness that everybody should pay their taxes.

On the question of education and the Ontario NDP government's decision not to participate in the national testing, I am sorry, I do not know enough about the particulars of that situation to comment on it intelligently.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member spoke quite strongly about the idea of a constituent assembly. I certainly know that we share the concern of many Canadians that there has got to be a better way of involving people across this country.

When I was going home on the plane last weekend, I talked to a gentleman who is on the citizens' forum. We got talking about the findings that are very general across Canada: citizens, generally, are hostile, cynical and disillusioned with government, with their Prime Minister and with most politicians. This also ties in with the feeling of isolation of Ottawa and government and politicians being so far from local ridings.

I was suggesting that maybe—and I would like the member's view on this—what we should be trying to do is get MPs and Parliament to establish a regular system of citizens' forums in local communities. Hopefully it would be non-partisan. Perhaps several MPs could host forums in a given city, for example, and they could be held on a regular basis, perhaps three to four times a year. They could be advertised through our householders. It would give people a chance to discuss issues, it would give a consensus from citizens that we could bring back to Ottawa, and it would also make us more accountable to local communities and local people.

I think it would be very easy to do it without a lot of expense because we have offices in the ridings and we could rotate where it meets and so on.

I wonder what he thinks of this idea, whether it would have any validity in trying to make our democracy work more at the grassroots level.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a great idea. I think it has got to be done on a non-partisan basis.

I would dearly like to tour my constituency of Regina—Qu'Appelle and the constituency of my colleague from Regina, the hon. member for Regina—Wascana. We could go to both the city of Regina and to our rural communities and talk about the problems we face as a country and where the agreements and the disagreements lie so that our constituents have a better sense of what is going on here.

The real bottleneck, in terms of grassroots democracy, is in this place right here. The Speech from the Throne deals with it to a certain extent, and again excuse me for being cynical. Yes, we had the McGrath commission report and its recommendations to increase the importance of committees. At one stage we all seemed to agree that members of Parliament have got to be more independent so that what our constituents are telling us will be addressed in the House of Commons or in committees. This government has done more to hinder and obstruct committees, especially those committees that are independent and those members in their own ranks who have independent thoughts and feelings. This House is more partisan than I have seen for a long time, at least since I have been a member of Parliament.

The ability for us to act more independently as members of Parliament representing our constituents, rather than representing our political Whips, is less today than it was 10 years ago. If we are going to have real grass-roots democracy, this is the place that needs to be reformed. First and foremost, it is the thinking of this government that needs to be reformed.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate at this time. It is one of the few opportunities for private members to address this House on the many issues that concern us and most important, on those matters that are of particular concern to the constituents who elected us.

First I want to take a moment and talk about Durham constituency, which I have the honour of representing here.

All of Durham constituency lies within the regional municipality of Durham. There are also within the Durham region two other smaller but more densely populated constituencies represented here by the members of the ridings of Ontario and Oshawa. Also one municipality in Durham lies within the federal riding of Victoria—Haliburton.

Durham is situated immediately to the east of metropolitan Toronto, and we have rich, rolling farmland and pine forests. Resort communities, such as Lake Scugog, are renowned throughout North America for their sports fishing. Also, Durham boasts a major industrial complex centred on the auto industry at Oshawa.

Durham is a community in which anyone would choose to live, so it is no surprise that it is one of the fastest growing centres on this continent. While providing ample space in which industry, commerce and families can prosper, it is readily accessible as well. Through it runs Highway 401 and principal transcontinental rail lines. GO trains and buses link Durham with Toronto and the rest of Ontario's heartland. Oshawa airport offers excellent passenger and freight service to more distant points. In short, Durham is open for business.

Anyone who gets to know Durham will agree with me that there is no better place to live, to work or to play. I say that advisedly. I have lived there most of my life and my family has been farming in that area for almost 200 years.

During the recent recess, we all had a valuable opportunity to get back to our roots, back to our constituencies, and to talk with the people we represent. That is an essential part of the democratic system. I want now to speak for a few minutes about some of the issues that are foremost in the minds of constituents, that concern me as a member of Parliament, and which I trust we will be addressing during this third session of the 34th Parliament.

As a member of Parliament, I am very pleased to see comments in the throne speech about increased independence of individual members in the House of Commons.

I doubt that there is a mature Canadian who is not deeply worried right now about our nation and how its future will evolve. It is all too easy to blame these worries on the present government and on the Prime Minister. I know many people do, including some members opposite. They are ignoring history and reality.

• (1150)

Finding ways to accommodate the demands of Quebec and French-speaking Canadians has been a top agenda item for every federal government at least since the quiet revolution in the early 1960s. Various approaches have been tried, offering Quebec particular status, seeking to make its people as one with other Canadians through bilingualism and guaranteed language rights. Succeeding governments had the best of intentions and wanted to make this work. Today, 30 years down the road, support for Quebec sovereignty has never been stronger and that province's future relationship with Canada is the most urgent question facing us now.

It is a complex question, as was detailed in last Monday's throne speech. All of us who have served through this Parliament are, or should be, aware that there are no simplistic solutions. I believe if we have a will to keep this country united, we can do so.

That is what I hope this session will achieve. I am sure that the great majority of Canadians feel the same way. We are seeking in the end a country which we each can love and cherish in our own way, though our reasons may differ due to our origins, our backgrounds, or the geographic regions in which we live. Within that we want an equality that is qualified only in a very limited way for any group or region.

We have an excellent justice system built on heritage and tradition which incorporates safeguards to ensure fair treatment for all. It bothers me and many others to see these safeguards misused perversely. Our extradition laws should be tightened so they can no longer provide a haven at the expense of our taxpayers for those who enter Canada solely to evade criminal prosecution in other countries.

Surely changes are in order to prevent similar misuse of our generous immigration provisions for refugees. Almost every day we hear of cases involving those who enter Canada illegally and seek to stall extradition or deportation by claiming refugee status to which they are not honestly entitled, with the knowledge that the required hearings process will take months, if not years, during which they remain here, often at public expense.

One sometimes wonders whether the bar associations and law societies can condone the actions of lawyers who counsel clients to abuse our laws and the charitable instincts of Canadians in this way.

Preserving and improving our environment is a very broad concern. I am confident there is an ever-increasing public demand for action and results, which is how it should be. Our world is our most precious possession. Diminishing it in any way could only lead to our own destruction.

Our basic, continuing aim must be to leave this planet in better shape than we found it for the generations which follow us.

For Durham constituency, as for all of central Canada, improving the water quality of the Great Lakes must be a priority consideration. While much has been accomplished, we still have a long way to go. Although the levels of concentration of many chemicals in the Great Lakes have decreased significantly over the last two decades, they remain above acceptable limits.

Ottawa and other governments have recognized this. Canada and the U.S. have signed agreements aimed at eventually stopping the discharge of all pollution into the Great Lakes. This is a principal focus of the federal green plan.

In late 1989, the federal government announced a five-year, $125 million clean-up, with special attention to the most severely polluted locations in the Great Lakes basin. A recent agreement with Ontario will reduce threats to the waterways from high risk contaminated sites. Because virtually all the waterway is shared with the United States, what many of us want to see is a Great Lakes clean water agreement, similar to the clean air agreement for controlling acid rain and other airborne pollutants which was signed in March by the Prime Minister and President Bush. This agreement was only achieved as a result of some unusual high-powered lobbying of Americans and their elected representatives by our government and by dedicated public interest groups. Similar action may well be needed to achieve international co-operation necessary for a determined campaign to restore the Great Lakes.

Man-made pollution is not the only problem. The St. Lawrence seaway and the international shipping it attracts have brought some natural threats to the ecology. One of these was the sea lamprey. A more recent arrival is the zebra mussel, which has begun to plug intake pipes, affecting drinking water and threatening the very ecosystem of some Ontario lakes. Research indicates zebra mussels and other foreign pests may well have come here in the ballast water of foreign freighters which was pumped out while the ships were on the Great Lakes.

During this session I hope to introduce a Private Member's Bill amending the Canada Shipping Act to require that all ships dump ballast water while on the high seas, before entering the St. Lawrence seaway and other inland waters, with a very stiff fine for non-compliance. This should prove a significant step toward protecting and restoring the ecology of the Great Lakes, a water system which contains close to one-fifth of the world's fresh water supply and which we have too long taken for granted.

Anyone living in or near urban centres has to be concerned about municipal waste and the resulting demand for rural landfill sites in which it can be dumped. In Durham we have had to contend not only with our own waste, but with growing pressure to accept massive amounts from metro Toronto. This almost reached a crisis stage. Fortunately, public awareness of the need to reduce, re-use and recycle and of the advantages of composting has been having a noticeable impact.

I think it is worth remarking here that by next year Durham region will have achieved a 25 per cent reduction in the amount of waste going to landfill, and fully expects to make that 50 per cent by the end of the decade. It demonstrates how strong the public concern is about waste and the willingness to participate when people are given leadership.

It is important that we follow the intent of the packaging protocol which has been established. It is even more important that individuals who have already reached a 50 per cent reduction in the volume of waste leaving their homes be given leadership so they can go farther in reaching their personal objectives of minimizing household waste. I would suggest that we are now at the stage where legislation could be proposed and enacted, with the co-operation of the business community, to set specific targets and deadlines for eliminating unnecessary packaging. It need not be an onerous process. People want this. Smart industries will know that less packaging is the way to attract new customers.

In any discussion of municipal waste, another bugbear is so-called junk mail, the mass of unrequested advertising and promotion flyers which is delivered to our homes each day. Presumably it must be an important source of revenue for Canada Post at a time when it has begun to run in the black after decades of staggering deficits. Obviously, some people appreciate receiving this mail and respond to it. If it did not pay, retailers would not use this form of advertising. There are also a great many who abhor junk mail and they tell me about it constantly.

• (1200)

In attempting to deal with this issue, I think we should start by closely examining legislation that is now before the European Parliament to restrict the sale of mailing lists to direct mail organizations.

The European Community proposes that people must agree in writing before their names and addresses can be used in this way. One can anticipate the howls of protest from certain sectors of the business community. But here again, I believe they could be shown it would be smart and even profitable to stop antagonizing so many Canadians in this way.

My final words will be on the touchiest of all subjects these days—taxes. I want it understood that no one is more anxious to reduce taxes than I am. In that respect, it was my pleasure last winter to initiate and head a committee of our Ontario caucus that went through the Public Accounts of Canada and recommended a number of areas where substantial cuts should be made to federal spending.

Some of those were included in this year's budget. I regret that some other suggestions were not adopted, including cuts in the allocations for this House and its members.

I hope the Canadian public will understand just how effective this government's controls on federal spending have been. Average increases have been below 4 per cent, well under the inflation rate. Legislation outlined in the budget will restrict spending increases for future years and restrain future governments.

One might only wish that some other levels of government, including the province of Ontario, would show similar self-discipline. It is long past the time when all governments and elected public bodies must realize that, no matter how spending responsibility is rigged, jigged or shuffled about, it is the same taxpayers who pay the final tally. That includes you and me, everyone else in this House, and all the people across Canada.

The other day I spoke to an irate citizen who had just received his property tax bill. It was from his municipality, which is not in Durham, I might add. I am not sure that he did not hold me partly responsible. Certainly, he sounded so. He pointed out that his property taxes would be going up about 12 per cent this year, on the heels of a 10 per cent rise last year, with a similar 12 per cent tax boost forecast for 1992.

Yet, his personal salary increases for the past three years have barely kept up with the rate of inflation. My friend noted that almost 60 per cent of his mounting property tax is due to education.

The throne speech spoke of the "learning culture". We are putting enough money into education and retraining, but we must redeploy some of that funding to maximize the potential of every Canadian.

There is a basic message in all this, a warning which we can only ignore at our own peril. People are demanding governments that cost less and that tax less. They want government that is lean. If they do not get it, the taxpayers are going to become mean.

The taxpayers of Canada do not have deep pockets. In many cases, their fingers have already touched the bottom. Spending trends in Ottawa have been reduced significantly over the past six years. But more needs to be done. Now, other levels of government must recognize that the party is over and the onus is on them directly to stop overspending.

I have covered a number of issues in my remarks, all of which are important to me and to my Durham constituents. I believe the Speech from the Throne has outlined the correct course of action for Canada and Canadians.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the member for Durham did speak about a number of things, as he indicated, but it seems to me that a major part of his speech was on the question of junk mail. I hope he does not think that amid all the problems we have in Canada today including national unity and economic problems, which I will get to in a moment, that junk mail is really a major concern of his constituents. Because if it is, they are certainly different from my constituents. For example, we have one in eight children who are allegedly not getting enough to eat in Edmonton and something like 50,000 people unemployed in Edmonton. I would seriously question whether his constituents' major concern is junk mail. If I misunderstand the member I hope he will correct me.

He mentioned that the party is over. But I would remind him that his government, which virtually talks about nothing but financial restraint to anybody who will listen, and not many people will, has added about $214 billion to the national debt of Canada, about $30 billion a year including this year.

I happen to have some statistics from the recent Economist magazine. I will just mention a couple of these things. Canada's industrial production for the last three months has gone down 10 per cent. That is one of the highest rates among the OECD countries. Our GNP is down 1 per cent on a yearly basis. Retail sales are down about 15 per cent. Unemployment, of course, is at 10.5 per cent.

The government is going to be massacred on this record in the next election, and I assume that the member will have something to say about these figures.

Let us take consumer prices. They are up on a three-month basis by 12 per cent. The only country that is worse than Canada in this regard is Sweden at 18 per cent. On a one-year basis, of course, prices are up 6.3 per cent. Again, only Sweden, Australia and the U.K. seem to be worse.

The current prime lending rate is worth noting at 10.25 per cent in Canada according to the Economist magazine.

What on earth does he think the people of Canada are concerned about, to end it? Does he think it is junk mail?

I am told that the member for St. Boniface will speak next on a matter of education. I might again ask the member, as I asked the last member who spoke for his party, the Minister of Transport: is he prepared to criticize the Government of Ontario which has the primary responsibility for education? Why, for example, is the Government of Ontario not prepared to take part in a cross-country test on the educational system?

Mr. Stevenson: I am quite happy to respond to what were, I believe, the questioner's three main points.

I have not gone back through my speech to check, but I believe I had two paragraphs on junk mail in a 20-minute speech, so junk mail was hardly a leading component of my speech. Possibly if the member represented an area just outside metropolitan Toronto, where just a few months ago six potential land fill sites were selected for receiving garbage from metropolitan Toronto, he would understand the sensitivity in those areas. Of course each one of those blocks represents hundreds of acres of prime agricultural land. Municipal waste, a small component of which is junk mail, is a very high-profile issue in my riding. Needless to say, the member is not aware of the significance of this issue in our part of the country.

I certainly have no problem resting my case on that particular matter.

As far as spending trends are concerned, any Canadian can check the audited Public Accounts of Canada and see the spending trends of Canadian governments of all political stripes since 1970. One will see I believe, since 1972 through to 1986, no government in Canada ever collected enough money to pay for programs, let alone one cent on interest and principal.

Any Canadian who has a mortgage and does not pay the interest or the principal for a period of something in the order of 16 years would have some appreciation of what their personal financial state would be. That is the situation in Canada.

• (1210)

Since 1986 we have been raising more revenues than we are spending on programs in any individual year, but it is still not enough to pay off interest on an old debt. In 1984, which was the worst year, there was a shortfall of $16 billion on programs alone, let alone the more than $22 billion shortfall on interest.

We have had a major turnaround, from running a tremendous deficit on operations to a surplus, but a surplus that still is not a big enough to pay interest on the old debt. Essentially, the build-up in total debt which occurred under the current government is compound interest accumulated on previously established debt.

While I wish that more could have been accomplished to minimize the impact of that compound interest, the facts are there for anyone to examine.

As far as the learning culture is concerned, I appreciate the comments of the member. I think the concept of the learning culture is much broader than just the educational system, although that is certainly part of it. It applies to the attitudes and the desires of individual Canadians to improve themselves at whatever job they may be doing or hope to do in the future. It does involve the entire primary, secondary, university, and subsequent retraining programs of one type or another that, as groups or individuals, we might seek to make use of. It is important that all governments co-ordinate their activities so that the money that goes into the whole learning process for Canadians is used for maximum benefit.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to address the Speech from the Throne and I want to do so from two perspectives: first, what the address does not in fact speak to and, second, what the Speech from the Throne does address.

What does the Speech from the Throne not address? I think colleagues from all sides would agree that when one reads it very carefully there is indeed nothing that attempts to respond to the plight of the almost 5 million poor in this country, most of whom are women and over 1 million of whom are children. Neither does it speak to the difficulties suffered by the 2 million Canadians who are on welfare. That is most unfortunate.

Neither does it address the whole question of the food banks. You and I know, Mr. Speaker, there is an estimated 1.8 million Canadians during the year who will in fact be fed at those food banks, in a country such as ours which is considered relatively rich. By the way, it is important to note that perhaps 40 per cent of those individuals are children and young adults.

Neither does it address the question of the unemployed, the slightly more than 1.5 million people who are out of work today in Canada.

I was talking to a young woman during the weekend who desperately wants to work, desperately wants to find a job. She is extremely articulate, presents herself particularly well, and is anxious to work. There is no employment which is sufficient to help her raise her two children. There are jobs. Some of them are part time with minimum wages and poor benefits. That is unfortunate.

A week ago last Saturday, at an open house in my constituency, I met a young man who is well educated and has special skills in the area of marketing. He is a new Canadian and a member of a visible minority. He has been unable during the last 10 years to find suitable employment.

There have been short-term jobs but they have paid very, very poorly. There has been absolutely nothing upon which they could build a future. The Speech from the Throne does not address the plight and the concerns of those individuals and many hundreds of thousands of others like them.

The speech does not address the whole question of bankruptcies either which, if one compares March of this year with one year ago, have gone up over 50 per cent. What about those four small businesses in my constituency, the federal constituency of St. Boniface, that have gone out of business? What will it do for them? What will it do for its workers, for the men and women who were employed, some of whom were working for many, many years and now are without work, but who have families, who want what you and I want for our families, who want to be able to hang on to their homes, who want to be able to feel as if they can grow and prosper in our nation. The speech did not address the question of those bankruptcies where many people are put out of work.

Some members will recall my raising in the House of Commons the plight of almost 2,000 Canadians who were victims of the bankruptcy of Route Canada. We have tried every way to get the government to try to respond to their needs. What has happened? It has shielded itself behind the investigations that are going on, rather than reach out to those men and women and try to make things right. These are men and women who had worked for many, many years. Some of them had no severance pay, no holiday pay. Some of them are still owed wages and other types of benefits.

Surely those are issues that touch the very fibre of what it is to be a citizen in Canada, and they might have been addressed.

What is there for farmers? I was speaking to a farmer yesterday who indicated to me that with the growing stress of attempting to run a farm in uncertain markets, with uncertain policies emanating from the federal and provincial governments, it is becoming increasingly difficult to operate.

What about small businesses? I met a proprietor of a small business just a few days ago in my constituency who said to me: "I wonder why I am doing this. When I look at the number of hours that I work, and when I look at the profit at the end of the day, at the end of the year, when I look at the red tape that there is with respect to a host of government regulations, both federally and provincially, when I look at the additional work that is necessitated because of the goods and services tax, I wonder why I am doing this. I," he said, "and many others are seriously considering whether or not we should continue to operate our own firms".

He asked whether there would ever be any relief in taxation because, quite apart from paper work, that is another issue. He pointed out that taxation had been increased not only at the federal level, but at the provincial and municipal levels as well. He was aware of the 34 tax increases that have been imposed by this government, which has made his workload much heavier, which has made his profits much thinner and which has increased the risks of operating a business.

This Speech from the Throne did not address the whole issue of day care for parents who need assistance. I met a young woman who was married and had a child. She is no longer with her husband and has an infant. She has a job that pays around the $6 per hour mark. She has no place to put her child. Even if there was, if she could find one, with the wage that she earns she probably could not afford it. Yet I admired the courage of this young woman. She was very young. She had a great deal of spirit, a tremendous determination. She simply wanted to work and raise her child so that he could grow up and be a productive citizen.

In the Speech from the Throne there is no reference to recession. We are in a massive recession. We know that the deficit is in excess of $30 billion. It has been about that for a number of years. The debt will soon be $400 billion. That debt, which was less than $168 billion in 1984, according to a signed statement by the former Minister of Finance, is now going to be close to $400 billion. What does it do to allay the fears of Canadians with respect to that deficit and that debt?

• (1220)

Those are some of the points that the Speech from the Throne might have addressed, to reach out to Canadians and make them feel as if there was hope, as if there will be a tomorrow, as if things will fall into place, and provide them with some assurance that this great and prosperous nation will provide them with the opportunities they want and require in order to live in dignity.

What this Speech from the Throne addressed—

[Translation]

National Unity. Some statements are fairly interesting; unfortunately, I think they are rather vague. I understand that the Prime Minister no doubt wants to have some flexibility but on the other hand, it does not reassure Canadians very much about what is happening. They are nervous. Obviously, they are very, very nervous. There is not too much assurance that linguistic minorities will not be sacrificed, an assurance that I would have liked to see in the Speech from the Throne. You certainly know that there are all kinds of rumours going around Canada that some fairly well placed people believe that one of the things that might be done is simply to sacrifice linguistic minorities, supposedly to make the country more united.

I would have liked to have a firm statement on the protection of linguistic minorities. And I can assure you that if support for linguistic minorities is ever removed, there will be a storm of protest across Canada because these minorities have been protected, continue to be protected and want this protection to continue.

As for the bill or the initiatives that could have been taken on national unity, many people have noted that time has been wasted. They would have liked us to proceed as soon as possible, because if we continue according to the government's timetable, it is not impossible that once we reach the end of the tunnel, we will not have much time to correct the mistakes made along the way. It would be unfortunate to find ourselves in a situation where we would not have time to solve this major issue.

[English]

Another point made in the Speech from the Throne was participating in prosperity, la prospérité pour tous. The speech contained, and I understand that all political parties have a tendency to do this, exaggerated claims with respect to the Canada–U.S. agreement on trade and the benefits that another trade agreement with Mexico would bring. In the speech there is a comment with respect to the removal of interprovincial barriers. I find that extremely positive. I find though, that the exaggerations on the control of spending are really, really misleading. There have been reductions and they are around 3.7 per cent. However, let us admit that this has been achieved by cutting transfer payments to health and education. Who has picked up the difference? It is the provinces and the municipalities.

My colleague mentioned just a moment ago that people were complaining about the provincial and municipal tax bills. Of course, because the federal government has withdrawn. It turned over the cost to the provinces and municipalities which turned it over to the people.

Perhaps, the most glaring issue are the comments with respect to education, I do not mean to be unkind but they could be termed hypocritical. They are more rhetoric and the rhetoric has been excellent. It was excellent before the Prime Minister became the Prime Minister, when he was Leader of the Opposition. It was excellent before and during the 1984 and 1988 elections. However, nothing has happened except for massive cuts. There is flagrant contradiction in the whole area.

He talked increased productivity. We know that better education, training and retraining, research and development contribute to increased productivity. What do we do? Slash, slash. I have mentioned it so often. Cuts in 1986, cuts in 1989–1990, freezes for 1990 to 1995. During that period of time $10 billion, not million, fewer dollars have been targeted for education. No wonder the provinces and municipalities are suffering.

What about the reductions in research and development. What about the cuts in science and technology and investments in literacy?

The goals are laudable. I have to admit that, but there is nowhere any indication as to how the federal government is going to help the provinces or others realize those particular goals. I think that is unfortunate.

There was a lot of talk on the part of government in the Speech from the Throne regarding productivity and efficiency. That is a bit of a contradiction, some people would say a flagrant contradiction, because we have a government which says the right things but does the wrong things.

I understand very, very well that we have a serious financial problem. Are there not other ways to deal with the problem besides dramatically cutting spending on health and education?

[Translation]

Could other possibilities have been considered? Were there other alternatives? I think there could have been some. It is unfortunate that they claim to be controlling spending when they pass the costs on to the provinces and municipalities. We must look at it in terms of revenue, because as you know, revenue was over $70 billion in 1984, I think, and now it is over $130 billion.

So there has been an extraordinary increase in taxes from all sides.

[English]

The goals, yes, they are worthy of being pursued, but we need less talk. We need action. We need to ensure that something is done, because our eroding competitiveness is directly related to a number of factors and one of those factors is our investment in education. Government is fond of saying:

[Translation]

—that investment in education exceeds that of most OECD countries. Yes, but be careful. The comparison is valid for elementary and secondary education, but less so for post-secondary. So let us make the distinction.

I know that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the other ministers are aware of the distinction. Do not try to fool the Canadian people, please. We must tell them the truth.

If I have time, Mr. Speaker, I will make a final point on the efficiency of government. The government says in its Speech from the Throne that it has reduced the number of Crown corporations by 24. Yes, but does it talk about the price paid in terms of efficiency, service and number of layoffs?

The government talks about 90,000 employees who were eliminated or cut. It talks about men and women as though they were products that are cast aside once they are used. But we must ask another question: Honestly, how much money was saved by cutting these 90,000 jobs? How many contracts were awarded to replace these employees? That is not discussed.

It is somewhat like the topic of job creation; we must also look at the other side of the coin. How many jobs were taken away? It is one thing to say, "A job is a job" but I can assure you that working full time for a reasonable salary with benefits that help us support our family is much better than something part-time at a very low salary.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue, but I have the feeling that my time is almost up. I see that I still have a little time left, so I will go on.

I will give a short summary. The Speech from the Throne touches on a number of issues like national unity, the economy, the efficiency of government and of course, education. These are all important topics but we must not forget, dear friends, that we must look not only at what the Speech from the Throne says but also at the issues it does not raise.

I just mentioned the unemployed, people who are fed by food banks, the poor; I mentioned those who live on social assistance; I also mentioned the small businesses and larger firms that went bankrupt and the people who will go bankrupt. Canadians would have liked something to be said on those issues, but there was nothing.

I also deplore the government's trying to make Canadians believe that control on spending is much sounder than it is. The government should also tell them that although it has controlled spending up to a point, at the same time it has transferred the burden to the provinces, municipalities and people like you and me. I believe that is very important. When we talk about job creation, let us look at the other side of the coin. Let us talk about the number of jobs that were eliminated, let us talk about the number of jobs that were created, but let us also talk about the quality of those jobs and what that means for our constituents.

• (1230)

Neither must we forget that eliminating the Public Service raises another very important, downright fundamental issue: How much money was saved? Or were enough contracts simply given out to exceed any so-called saving?

[English]

When we look at the theme national unity, we have to ask ourselves questions about the massive cutbacks to VIA Rail, the privatization of Air Canada, the massive attack on CBC, the 20 per cent reductions in employment, 27 per cent I think it is nationally, and about 20-some per cent in Manitoba, what have they done to national unity. When we talk about economy and government efficiency, let us be very honest. Let us put the facts in front of the Canadian people so that they can understand what it is that you are trying to do and what it is that we are trying to do.

With respect to education, I understand it is always very, very tempting to say the right things. This, in a sense, is a win win proposal for the government because it talks about education, which is important to all of us: elementary, secondary and post-secondary, but actions speak louder than words and the actions have simply not followed the words.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a couple of comments on the hon. member for St. Boniface's response to the Speech from the Throne.

He made some very strong innuendoes, in fact, accusations that the federal government is practising its restraint on the backs of the provinces and the municipalities.

I think the figures really speak for themselves. Over the last six years, government restraint has controlled our expenditures at 3.7 per cent per year. The provincial governments' growth in their expenditures has averaged 6 per cent and 7 per cent and in some provinces, as high as 10 per cent. There was absolutely no impact on the transfer to the provinces up until this year's budget and last year's budget.

Last year, he implied we had a massive attack and although there was an increase, it was cut back by a half of 1 per cent over what it was planned. This is far, far less than a massive attack on provinces and municipalities.

I would ask the member for St. Boniface if he feels that the provinces should continue to spend way in excess of inflation, way in excess of what the federal government spends and should they not have any sense of restraint in their own programs?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for the question. I note that it is posed in good faith. Clearly, I believe that all of us should be showing restraint, whatever level of governments we represent and whatever programs we tend to advocate.

At the same time, the government talks about the 3.7 per cent control of expenditures. I am sorry, I guess I did not make my point well The provinces are in the neighbourhood of 6 to 7 per cent. He is quite right. One of the reasons that the provinces are in that range is because of the massive cutbacks.

With all due respect to my colleague, the first cutbacks started a long time ago. For example, the most significant one was in 1986; 2 per cent cut in the transfer formula for health and education. That was followed in 1989-90 by another 1 per cent which was not executed because there was a freeze that came along for two years, which has been extended to 1995.

When I talk about massive cutbacks, that is another point I want to make. Not only the provinces and the municipalities have had to shoulder that additional load because they could not downsize quickly enough to accommodate that lesser revenue.

I mean it is very difficult to downsize the universities, the colleges, the schools, the hospitals and what have you. Not only that, but the other side of the coin we have to look at it in a more global context.

There are two issues here when you look at it in the global context. It is the accumulated impact of those reductions over time. Because the base is lower if you freeze it or cut it, the percentage increase over time is less. There is the double whammy if you wish. There is the accumulated impact of the cuts over time and there is the percentage increase which has been applied to a smaller base.

The point that I am making is yes, I agree with you that we must continue to show restraint. The federal government, to a certain extent, has shown restraint but let us explain to Canadians why that figure is as low as it is. Let us be fair with provinces and municipalities, and not dump on them without recognizing that one of the reasons that their taxation rates are going up—there are others—is because there is less assistance from the federal government and from the provinces as they tend to fill in that vacuum.

That is an extremely important point. It is not being made in a partisan kind of way. If you look at what I said, you will recognize that this is true.

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, under Standing Order 43(2), I would just like to advise you that the government speakers—one from Wild Rose and the other from Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia—will be splitting their time so they will be going into 10-minute speeches with five-minute questions and answers.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, in the throne speech, our government proposed specific targets for Canada concerning the direction of our educational system.

As a result, our government has outlined educational goals and strategies that will lead us into the 21st century. Canada already spends more money per capita on education than almost any other industrialized country in the world.

Our review of educational performance has led us to ask why Canada as a nation does not appear to be getting a greater economic return on its substantial investments. Our government believes that educational goals reflect a changing labour market. This does not necessarily require more funding, but rather a shift in emphasis toward a more active orientation.

As more countries become self-sufficient with agriculture and flood the world market, Canadian farmers will no longer be able to rely solely on agriculture in the future.

Technological advances and increased competitiveness reflect a changing labour market which demands a highly skilled and educated labour force.

Canada has failed to rank above the middle level in several international comparisons of student achievement in mathematics and science. We have a low rate of engineers and scientists in our work force. In particular, women account for only 13 per cent of the engineering degrees and 30 per cent of math and physical science degrees.

Canadian industry spends less than half as much on training its employees as American industry does, a fifth as much as the Japanese and an eighth as much as the Germans. This is not the kind of performance that will guarantee increased prosperity for our children. It has given rise to concerns whether the next generation of Canadian men and women will be the first to have a lower standard of living than its parents had. The challenge of Canada's training system is to provide individuals with ongoing opportunity to acquire productive skills that are needed in the marketplace. The focus of our government is to link educational and economic goals—specifically the future competitiveness of Canada's work force is in a knowledge-based economy. If Canada is to reverse its economic decline we must improve math, science and technology standards.

• (1240)

Canadian men and women must have access to both the skills and the life-long learning opportunities necessary to improve their job prospects and to ensure their own prosperity. Despite the great dedication of so many talented educators and administrators, Canadians are questioning whether the country's approach to learning is adequate for the future.

Our government recognizes that Canadians are concerned about education and would like to see Canada-wide goals established for the year 2000. This will require provincial endorsement and co-operation.

Our goals include cutting illiteracy rates in half, ensuring that 90 per cent of Canadians attain high school diplomas or the equivalent by the age of 25, doubling the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, science and engineering, and quadrupling the training provided by employers to their employees.

Students and parents, employers and employees, educators and governments, will be asked to work together to develop a learning culture. Just as we have developed an environmental culture, we all must play respective roles in the future.

Continued prosperity depends on technological competitiveness and Canada faces a critical shortage of scientists, engineers, technicians and technologists in the coming decades. The role our government is playing to enhance our future competitiveness is to encourage studies in the natural science and engineering through the Canada Scholarship Program. This program will benefit 10,000 recipients, half of whom will be women.

We have also jointly developed a very encouraging program in several provinces to persuade young people to stay in school and complete their education. We have created Centres of Excellence programs which link Canada's best minds in universities and the private sector.

When unemployment insurance was first introduced, it was meant to be a temporary means of living while unemployed and searching for another job. There are now some Canadians who make collecting unemployment insurance benefits a lifestyle and it is at the expense of other Canadians. Many unemployment recipients feel a sense of helplessness and low self esteem when they are unable to qualify for various employment opportunities as a result of their limited educational background, which deters them from obtaining a job.

In the past, an unemployment insurance recipient was unable to upgrade the skills required to become more employable without jeopardizing the benefits. Our government realized that this unemployment cycle needed to be broken. As a result, we launched a major new initiative, the labour force development strategy, to help the unemployed acquire the skills they need to change with a changing world.

An example of such a program is the literacy training program for unemployment insurance recipients. Unemployment insurance recipients usually jeopardize their benefits if they are not ready and able to work. Under section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, people can now take certain types of training without incurring this risk. The new policy incorporates literacy and numeracy training into this category. A literate Canada will benefit both workers and employers alike.

We have done much but more needs to be done. The quality of Canada's human resources, a determining factor of our competitiveness and the engine of our future prosperity, is a national issue. It is not a federal issue, it is not a provincial issue, it is not entirely a governmental issue. It is a national issue and it demands a national response.

Co-operation will be critical. Federal and provincial governments, industry, the universities and consumers all have their roles to play. If everyone can work together on these challenges to reach a common goal, all Canadians in every region will benefit, now and in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minutes, questions and comments period. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): I was quite impressed with the presentation of the hon. member and I notice she focused exclusively on education. She is to be commended for that. I would like to ask her whether she is aware that the private sector in Canada, particularly the companies that are involved in research and development in high tech, does not invest in Canada as much as other companies around the world do. That is because there is no national strategy that deals with the question of education or the question of research and development. There is no leadership on the part of the government whether we are talking about provincial or federal levels of government.

Rather than focusing all the time on the negative, I would like to mention on the positive side that we do have Northern Telecom, a leading company, not only in Canada and in North America but all around the world, which invests up to 9 per cent, even 10 per cent in some cases, in the area of research and development. That is a perfect example of the great success that our industries could have internationally, only if our government provides them with the tools necessary with the proper method.

I would suggest that rather than waiting until the year 2000 in order to deal with the problem, we have to start now in dealing with the issues of illiteracy and education. By the year 2000, there will be over one million Canadians who will be uneducated and untrained and will not be able to enter the work force in a proper fashion.

Also by the year 2000, two-thirds of all jobs created in Canada will require more than a grade 12 education. So I would suggest that this matter is of great urgency and needs immediate action.

My question to the hon. member is: in her view, what is it the government should be doing now in order to deal with the problem we are faced with?

Mrs. Feltham: I want to thank my hon. friend and colleague for asking that question.

I feel very strongly that we have, up until now, recognized that there is a concern there.

• (1250)

We do need to have more graduates. We do need our young people to complete school, especially in the provinces that have not themselves dwelt that much on education.

The government, at this stage, recognizes that it is a problem. It is a problem today and it is a problem for the future.

I spoke of the year 2000. We are all looking now at the word "2000". We are looking at the future. We say 2000, but it is not something that will wait until the year 2000 to come into effect. We must start now. People in industry, the employers, are definitely losing the advantage by not putting more money into training their staffs. Yes, we are looking at training and will encourage employers in whatever is necessary. We will stress training over the next number of years leading up to the year 2000.

After visiting Taiwan I became very aware of the need for this country and for all governments, as my colleague has said, to work together. Both provincial governments and the federal government must work together because Canada must enter the technological age and must concentrate on technology.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to participate in this throne speech debate concerning a throne speech which set out in general terms the direction for the next session of this 34th Parliament, the third session. This 34th Parliament may in many ways prove to be one of the most significant Parliaments, if not the most significant, in the history of our country.

The first session dealt exclusively with the ratification of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. The second session was highlighted by the passage, over the objections of an unelected and unaccountable Senate, of the goods and services tax legislation, the sales tax reform which had been due in this country for some 40 years.

This third session of this Parliament deals with the very future of the country itself. The three themes of the throne speech—unity, prosperity and government responsiveness—find themselves inextricably linked and intertwined.

There is an enormously high level of frustration experienced by Canadians today. A good deal of it is, I believe, economic. However, Canadians also want to feel that their elective representatives are hearing them, are listening to them and acting accordingly. It is clear, as well, that the deficiencies and the inadequacies of a Constitution framed in the 1860s, and modified somewhat 10 years ago without the support of a province which contains some 28 per cent of the population of the country, must be addressed. It is time to shake off the post-Meech doldrums and move to make the changes necessary to our Constitution.

The message from Meech Lake was twofold. First, Canadians wanted into the process. They felt left out. The decision-making seemed too remote. Indeed, after the midway point, December 1988, and the passage of Bill 178 in Quebec, the process was not in keeping with the wishes of the majority of Canadians. Those concerns which arose half way through the ratification process made it, I believe, politically impossible for any province which had not by that time ratified the accord to ever do so.

The second message is one of fairness and equity. Whatever one province is seen to achieve through the process must also be available to others. There must not be any particular special status for one province or another, no deal for one that is not available to the rest.

That is why the federal government must and will ensure Canadians the opportunity to participate fully in this process of constitutional renewal. This is being done and will continue to be done through a number of commissions and fora.

The citizens' forum, while obscenely expensive, can nevertheless claim that it has received input from literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I believe that there will be some useful input coming forward from it when the report is filed on or before July 1.

Also due on July 1 is the report of the Beaudoin–Edwards joint Commons–Senate committee, which has been charged with the responsibility of finding a way out of the impasse, to find a means to achieve constitutional change.

At present, constitutional change requires in many instances the unanimous agreement of the House of Commons, the Senate and the 10 provinces. This requirement for unanimity has caused a constitutional log jam.

It is rather difficult to go into the room to talk about constitutional change when the door is locked tight and no one can get in. To get the door open, we need a key and that is where the Beaudoin–Edwards committee comes in. It will find the key that will open the door to constitutional change.

Once these various reports are in and the government has a chance to digest them, the government will lay out proposals to focus public discussion on the goal of a more united Canada. In doing so, it is important to remember that what we have right now is not all bad. Relative to the rest of the world, Canada is in pretty good shape.

I come from an area on the prairies in Saskatchewan of some 25,000 square miles which is overly dependent on the growing and marketing of grain. My constituents tell me overwhelmingly that they want a continuing strong central government: one capable of setting and maintaining national standards; one capable of managing the eighth largest economy in the world; and one that is capable of responding to the needs of a particular sector or region when it finds itself disadvantaged, as all the regions and sectors of our country have found themselves from time to time.

In Saskatchewan, in my area particularly, we have a very cyclical economy. Sometimes we are on top of the world and are putting in through equalization, and other times—now being one of those times—we take out. That message comes to me clearly from constituents.

They want to get rid of duplication and waste, they want efficient government and they do want to see some decentralization out of Ottawa to the provinces and to the regions of the country.

The objective is not to throw everything out and start over again, but rather to modify and seek change in order to build on and improve that which we already have: a nation which, from the outside looking in, is the envy of the rest of the world. Residents of many other nations would give their eye teeth to enter this country.

The proposals generated over the summer months, after the reports of these various commissions, will be referred to a joint parliamentary committee which will be established to consult with Canadians. This referral is to take place by the end of September.

The committee will then have five months to travel within Canada from sea to sea to sea. It will meet in public session with provincial and territorial counterpart committees.

After receipt of the report in February of next year, the government will propose a plan for a renewed Canada for the consideration of all Canadians. There will be legislation to provide for greater participation by Canadians in the process, if indeed this is necessary.

I believe also that the time necessary must be taken. The unity question must be dealt with in a measured way which permits ample time for input from Canadians every step of the way. Only in this way will the end product be capable of acceptance by the great majority of Canadians.

National unity and economic prosperity go hand in hand and there can be no doubt that insofar as the future is concerned, investment decisions both in Canada and abroad are affected by uncertainty. Interest rates are affected because investors want certainty, stability and sound management.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, this government has a policy of hiring at Revenue Canada's Data Taxation Centre in Sudbury which discriminates against non-residents of the city and district.

In the past year we have lost over 2,400 of the 4,000 mining jobs at Elliot Lake and we will lose over another 1,000 jobs next spring. This community is hurting, with homes, careers and even lives being lost in the turmoil created by the mine closures.

When one of my constituents applied for a job at the Data Taxation Centre in Sudbury, he was told that he must live in the Sudbury district to be considered for the job. This person is a Canadian citizen. He pays taxes to this very Data Taxation Centre. He needs a job.

I call on the government to stop this irrational, unreasonable and unfair discrimination against unemployed Canadians seeking a job. The government's hiring policy is simply wrong.

SYRIAN JEWRY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I recently met with members of the Jewish students group Nahon. These students are among many who are very concerned about the oppression of some 4,500 Syrian Jews.

There is an urgent call for action against the Syrian government. Jews are forbidden to leave Syria, they are being tortured and jailed, they are not allowed to vote and their homes fall victim to random, unwarranted searches.

The Jews of Syria are being denied basic rights that are set out in the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights which Syria has signed. The Government of Canada has always supported the cause of oppressed Jewry and human rights.

Today, along with members of this House, I call on the government of Syria to comply with the UN declaration and allow those Syrian Jews, who wish to emigrate, the right to do so freely.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, during the weekend Canadians were informed that this government is once again secretly considering closures of Canadian forces bases in five communities across the country.

Communities in the Atlantic provinces, already suffering as a result of the recession, stand to be the hardest hit. Three bases are being targeted in that region alone.

Canadians know the economic ruin that befalls a community when its major employer is suddenly removed. In these difficult times, the last thing Canadians need is for job losses and upheaval as the government makes piecemeal decisions about defence spending.

There is no doubt that defence expenditures must be reduced. These kind of secretive, ad hoc decisions, however, serve neither the local communities nor our national defence policy. We call on the government to undertake an immediate, thorough review of Canadian defence policy before any closures are considered and to assure Canadians that viable alternative economic opportunities will be provided to communities in the event base closures are necessary.

TAXATION

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, families have changed drastically over the last century or so. Today they are much smaller and they tend to scatter across the country rather than stay in a single location.

Taxation has changed as well. Unfortunately, the changes in taxation have not reflected the changes in the family. We now have a situation which penalizes married couples and gives a tax advantage to singles living together.

I am sure that each one of us in this Chamber is deeply disturbed by the erosion of the family as we have known it. Do not let us contribute to that erosion through lack of legislation.

I am very much encouraged by the throne speech, in which the government promised to review our policies in relation to the family. I am very proud to be part of this initiative. I believe strongly in protecting the interests of the family, for it is the very foundation of this great country.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in the past year, rumours of base closures in Atlantic Canada and rumours about military cuts in general have created a climate of anxiety in my region.

Canadian Armed Forces personnel are understandably anxious and worried about where they might fit in the crunch that appears to be on its way.

Armed forces personnel are not alone. The closure of bases in the Atlantic region will be devastating for an economy already hard pressed by government policies to date.

If the reports prove to be true, the provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, in particular, will be hurt by loss of personnel and a loss of spending dollars and a loss of spin–off jobs.

Air force bases, particularly in Nova Scotia, are an important part of Atlantic Canada's lifeblood. They are also part of our history, our industry and our well–being.

We ask that this government take a long look and think hard before adding more fuel to the fire that is burning up the economy of Atlantic Canada.

POSTAL SUBSIDIES

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the work accomplished by native people in remote localities, by native businesses, airlines, merchants, provincial and territorial officials who, through extensive consultations with the government of Canada and the task force, made it possible to stabilize the postal subsidy for the North at $15 million.

Without this subsidy, the price of perishables in most localities of Northern Quebec would far exceed the prices being paid in areas such as Central Arctic. For example, one litre of milk could cost $10 and a loaf of bread $7.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the hon. Tom Siddon, and his team, but caution will be required in standardizing postal rates.

PENITENTIARIES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, recent reports in Kingston suggest that budget cuts at federal penitentiaries may negatively affect public safety.

Corrections Canada employees are, like all public servants, suffering at the hands of this government. To date, 59 positions have been eliminated in the Kingston area alone. By reducing staff there will be fewer guards on duty. Each guard will have to man more shifts. This will lead to overwork and increased stress. In a prison environment, this will in turn create greater tension between guards and inmates and lead to dangerous confrontations.

The federal government's attempts to reduce the deficit by attacking public servants is deplorable. However, by cutting prison staff, the government is not only attacking its employees it is also creating a potentially dangerous situation.

I therefore urge the government to listen to the Union of Solicitor General Employees and provide each institution with the funding it needs to adequately guard federal inmates. The safety of the public and the safety of the staff may be jeopardized if the government does not act.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, whatever one may think of the Bélanger–Campeau report, it clearly identifies Quebec's concerns with our 1982 Constitution Act.

First, the report makes clear that the principle of equality of all Canadians enshrined in the Charter of Rights does not make allowance for special constitutional recognition for Quebec society.

Next, the principle of multiculturalism enshrined in the charter implies that the French language and culture are on the same footing as other languages and culture and does not require special guarantees in our Constitution.

Finally, the principle of equality of all 10 provinces enshrined in the amending formula of the Constitution implies that any power granted to Quebec must be granted to all other provinces as well, thereby conflicting with both the concept of a unique Quebec and with the views of the proponents of a strong national government.

Essentially, Bélanger–Campeau identifies the fundamental differences that haunt our country, differences that we must resolve if we are going to continue to have a strong and united Canada.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the matter of national unity. I would like to express the concerns of thousands of Canadians who are outraged by this government's dismantling of our national postal service.

To date, over 950 federally owned and operated post offices have been closed or privatized. Many of these closures cause hardships for residents who deserve first–rate postal service and are losing postal service altogether. Many of these people are our seniors and handicapped people.

For many communities, the post office is the only visible federal presence. After gutting the CBC and VIA Rail, this government will deal another serious blow to Canadian unity by closing down hundreds of post offices.

On behalf of the residents of communities like Avonmore, Ontario; La Redemption, Quebec; Mabou, Nova Scotia; Brandon, Manitoba; and Pitt Meadows, British Columbia, I strongly urge this government to stop post office closures and to work to improve our national postal systems.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint–Maurice): Mr. Speaker, the latest VIA Rail annual report proves that the government did the right thing when it forced it to slim down before it would suffer a heart attack. Here is some good news. First, customer complaints went down 60 percent last year, while praise for VIA Rail and the new service it offers increased substantially. Second, the on–time performance of VIA trains increased from 65 percent in 1989 to 80 percent in 1990.

[English]

In fact, the only bad news in the VIA Rail annual report was about passenger revenues during the first half of 1990 which were below the targets. The only reason for that was the negative publicity created by the Liberals and the NDP surrounding the introduction of the new service.

Shame on the opposition on that question.

TOURISM AWARDS

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, Saturday evening in the Montreal Congress Centre the national Quebec tourism award ceremony was held.

I am very proud, Mr. Speaker, to report to this House today that Abitibi–Témiscamingue won top honours at that occasion, as the International Film Festival of Abitibi–Témiscamingue was awarded the most prestigious award, that is the Prix de l'excellence touristique (award of excellence in tourism), for contributing over the past ten years to the Quebec cultural and tourism recognition. This high distinction crowns ten years of efforts and relentless work to turn a regional festival into a national and even international event.

So, I want to congratulate, in my name and on behalf of my constituents, all the organizers of this festival for this great success. Well done!

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, after studying and hearing countless witnesses last spring on Public Service 2000, the public accounts committee had very serious concerns about the so-called reform to the Public Service.

It strongly recommended that before proceeding with legislation or administrative changes, the government should establish a special committee of this House of Commons and should refer all recommendations from Public Service 2000 to that special committee.

The white paper on Public Service 2000 was tabled over five months ago and yet the President of the Treasury Board has still failed to heed the advice of the public accounts committee of this Parliament.

By stomping all over collective bargaining rights, gloating over thousands of lay-offs, spending countless taxpayers' dollars fighting court cases on equity and fairness in government, the government has proven beyond a doubt it knows better how to dismantle, destroy, and demolish than how to build a nation.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, without question the very fibre of our society and family life is being threatened by an ever-increasing criminal element goaded on by suggestive pornographic material so readily available in video shops and on our bookshelves. Despite the efforts of many concerned people, hard core pornography still exploits children and degrades women. It is a frightening reality that child abuse and battery of women is on the increase.

We heard in the Speech from the Throne the importance of protecting our children and the stability of family life. I have heard from many constituents who believe that tough legislation to control the distribution of pornographic material is a necessary step in ensuring our children, our women, and our society have the protection they deserve. We have not yet put this legislation in place. Let us not continue to delay. A strong and healthy Canada depends on it.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, like my father before me, there are tens of thousands of individuals waiting to adopt Canada as their home. There are tens of thousands of families waiting to be reunited with their loved ones. There are tens of thousands of refugees waiting for their first hearing.

Canadians and immigration applicants certainly would like to know, in fact they demand to know, how it is that Mohammed Al-Mashat managed to jump the queue and get through the entire immigration process in just 28 days, leaving them behind.

The tens of thousands of immigration and refugee applicants want to know—actually they are now fully aware of—the motto that this government has on immigration policy: It is not who you are or how desperate your case, but who you know.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, as a reward for their responsible and competent gulf contribution our armed services are going to be rationalized and down-sized. This is sneaky and ominous bureaucratic fuzz for saying that cuts are coming that will adversely affect Canadians from coast to coast, including my native province of Nova Scotia, where we have had a history of servicing the services that has been a long and time-honoured military tradition, and whose economy very much depends on servicing the services.

So far, all we have had are rumours and resignations and silence from the minister. Surely before any decisions are made there has to be an open and thorough debate of defence policy. Canadians must be involved and what better way than through the new parliamentary committee on national defence. The committee's first priority next week should be public hearings on this vital issue and they could do no better than to start in my home province of Nova Scotia and perhaps in its shire city of Halifax.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, each spring the Porcupine caribou herd migrates past the most northerly community in my constituency, Old Crow, as they make their way to calving grounds on the Arctic north shore. For 20,000 years the Gwitch'in people of Yukon and Alaska have depended on the Porcupine caribou herd for their livelihood, all the while practising sustainable development in its purest form.

In 1980 the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge was established to protect this way of life from exploration and development. But this could all change. President Bush wants to open up the refuge for oil and gas development and a key committee of the U.S. Senate is to vote on this matter today.

I call on the ministers for external affairs and environment to meet with their U.S. counterparts to reinforce that exploration in that refuge is simply unacceptable to Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. On the weekend the Prime Minister said during an interview that Canadians were responsible for the present economic and constitutional situation. When will the government stop blaming Canadians for the present situation and act responsibly, since this government is responsible for the serious problems facing this country?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is true that we are going through some difficult times. We have a very serious slowdown in the economy and the unity of the nation is under question. Obviously it is going to require a broad-based public debate to deal with all of these issues.

The issues we face are very complex. They can only be resolved on the basis of Canadians working together in a partnership. I think we have to draw all Canadians into the process, to come forward and be a part of the solution. We must deal with the issues in a manner that is traditional and in keeping with the Canadian way of life.

I sense that the Leader of the Opposition has indicated his full co-operation in addressing the issues that confront Canadians. I welcome that and look forward to his co-operation.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say the Prime Minister is quite wrong to blame Canadians. Canadians are not suffering from a lack of affection for their country, they are suffering from a lack of affection for this government.

Today the Conference Board of Canada said that the recession will be much worse than had been predicted only three months ago. It said that seven of ten provinces would experience negative economic growth this year.

When will the minister realize that the economic policy of this government is a great failure? The government has given us a new Minister of Finance. What we need is a new set of economic policies. If the Minister of Finance wants our co-operation, he should listen to us, reduce our interest rates so they are more competitive with those in the United States, reduce the Canadian dollar to improve the competitiveness of Canadian goods and services. Then we will be on the road to recovery. But he should listen to us once in a while.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I am sorry that the Leader of the Opposition gets political on this very important issue. However, it allows me to say that during the time when he was the Minister of Finance the Bank of Canada rate climbed from 7.5 per cent in September of 1977 to 11.25 per cent in May of 1979.

What has happened with this government is the fact that interest rates have gone down by 5 percentage points over the last year. There is clear evidence that business confidence is improving, housing starts are improving, housing sales are improving, automobiles sales are improving, the unemployment figures are going down, not up. There are some positive signals on the horizons, Mr. Speaker. I don't want to be over-optimistic but I want to assure my hon. friend that all the indicators are leading in the right direction.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we thought we had a new Minister of Finance, but this is the same old stuff that we heard from the previous Minister of Finance. I would like to tell him that when I was Minister of Finance Canadians were working.

• (1420)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: At that time, we had Canadian economic policies.

I would like to know from the new Minister of Finance when he will take his responsibilities seriously. If this government decided that we need a new Minister of Finance, it is because we need new economic policies. When will the Minister of Finance do his job?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the fall-out of the policies of the Leader of the Opposition when he was in the government and occupying the position of the Minister of Finance, we saw the unemployment rate at that time at 12 per cent. It was 16 per cent in the province of British Columbia. It is considerably less now. Canadians and Canadian enterprises have created 1.6 million jobs in a climate that was positive.

We have serious inflationary pressures which must be addressed. The hon. Leader of the Opposition knows that very well.

I regret very much that he does not like me being a bit old-fashioned, but I can tell him that unless you get the fundamentals right and unless you deal with the underlying causes of inflation, inflationary pressures and expectations, you will not be able to bring interest rates down. If you are not going to bring interest rates down, you will not have a turnaround in the economy.

I repeat again, we are heading in the right direction. All the indicators suggest that, and the hon. Leader of the Opposition is just going to have to be a little more patient because when we get the fundamentals right, the Canadian economy will start to grow again.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it relates to the crisis faced by the Canadian trucking industry.

As the minister knows, last week the human face of the difficulties and frustrations facing Canadian truckers was brought to Ottawa and is still here for all to see.

The minister subsequently met with the workers. We debated the issue in this House. We, the Official Opposition, offered the minister and the government a package of alternative options that can work if put to use.

Therefore, I ask the minister whether the government is finally prepared today to announce some immediate relief measures that will serve to alleviate the overwhelming burden that truckers face as a result of the policies of this administration.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report that over Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of last week, I and the officials from my department met with the spouses and the truckers themselves to examine this situation.

The conclusions of these meetings according to my officials are to the effect that two sets of recommendations have been outlined by the owner-operators. The first set is what one can call the political agenda in that they are going back to the free trade agreement, the GST and deregulation of the industry.

As far as the GST is concerned, I said last week in this House that there is nothing wrong with the GST as far as the trucking industry is concerned. For one thing, the tax on fuel has been reduced by 2.5 cents per litre as a result of the implementation of the GST.

As far as deregulation is concerned, there is no intention on the part of this government to go back on the question of deregulation. From all quarters, we are hearing that deregulation has been very beneficial to the Canadian people as such.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the minister must be talking to American truckers because they are the only people who have gained from deregulation, not Canadian truckers.

Not only has this government been hiding behind seven studies for almost a year, but we have gone through one week of protest, discussion and debate and the minister continues to abdicate responsibility and fails to show key leadership at this critical period of time.

I return to the minister. What is it going to take to wake up this government and to resolve this issue immediately rather than hiding constantly behind studies? Temporary relief measures, even at that, are not incompatible with his studies.

Can the minister tell this House when the truckers can expect some real action, some real solutions and some real sensitivity to Canadians for a change?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned before that the recommendations were of two orders during the meetings last week. The second order is related to the operational costs of the truckers. We have examined many of these issues and found at the end of the day that the recommendations today are exactly the same as those which were made by the representatives of all segments of the trucking industry last year. Those recommendations gave rise to the formation of a task force that is made up of all representatives of the trucking industry.

The owner–operators on the street at the present time refused to be part of that coalition. That coalition and all the other segments of the industry are saying today they are in agreement with the processes that have been implemented. They agreed to have these seven studies. These studies are going to be released on May 27 and the task force is going to meet on June 4 and 5 to make their recommendations.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. There is one thing that no study needs to be done to tell us, and it is that these truckers parked outside this House and many like them across this country are losing their homes. It is creating many family problems and truckers are losing their businesses. We do not need a study to tell us that.

There are two concrete things this government can do. One clear problem that the truckers have is related to the GST and the fact that they have to wait five to six months for any rebate. This costs them thousands of dollars, which they have to put up front. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he will not ensure that those rebates can get to those truckers when they need them and second, whether he will acknowledge that the deregulation policies brought forward by the previous Liberal government and continued by his government will be reviewed and regulations brought in so that Canadians truckers can compete in the Canadian market?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to remind the leader of the New Democratic Party that the GST replaces the federal sales tax. The truckers paid federal sales tax before. They did not get any rebate. They had to swallow it. In the case of the GST, they get it refunded as an input tax credit so it really does improve their competitive position in that it does reduce the cost of doing business.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear from the personal instances that we have seen what this government's policies have done to the independent trucking industry.

The trucking industry is one industry that has been devastated by this government's policies. The steel industry is another, particularly the policy of the U.S.–Canada trade deal. This week the United States Congress decides whether it will give the fast track to the trade talks. I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister what work the government is doing now to ensure that in two years' time we will not have another devastated industry lined up on Wellington Street because of the policies that this government is pursuing around the trade deal?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I again want to remind the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party that transportation was not a part of the free trade agreement, so it has nothing to do with the allegation that she suggests.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the transportation industry is not on a level playing field in Canada. My question to the Deputy Prime Minister was simply, what preparations is the government doing, given that the United States is going to fast track the Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade deal? But on another subject—

[Translation]

Carla Hills, the U.S. representative at the tripartite negotiations, has confirmed that the United States wants to put culture on the table. Ms. Hills suggested that culture could be adequately protected with cultural exhibitions. Will the minister confirm that culture will never be part of two-way or three-way free trade?

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party knows full well that the government's position on this has not changed. Culture is not on the table, never has been and never will be.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In his absence, I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

This weekend there were press reports of a recommendation to cabinet that included closing Canadian forces bases, two in Europe and a number all across the country. In view of the fact that Canadian forces performed so admirably in the gulf, and in view of the fact that many people want to know their long-term security at those bases, will the minister confirm or deny these reports? Will he say why the government continues to operate on ad hockery and will he say why it refuses to bring forward a defence policy for this country?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that my hon. colleague recognizes the very important role that our Canadian men and women played in the gulf. It was interesting to note this weekend the accolades which our naval personnel received.

With respect to the defence policy review, yes, indeed, and I think my hon. colleague would agree that the changing international situation, the changing fiscal situation, requires us to look at the future of defence policy in this country. That work is under way. Based upon changing assessments of threats and new roles for our people, decisions will flow from that about the appropriate size of the force, the appropriate infrastructure and equipment that will be required for the future.

Until cabinet has had an opportunity to look at those proposals, it would be inappropriate to discuss any specific aspects of it. Following those discussions, of course, I am sure my colleagues will look forward to discussions about the future defence policy for this country.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the international situation may be changing, but it is changing in this country to getting worse. We are in the middle of a recession now and there are areas that depend economically on defence establishments.

Will the minister give an undertaking that before any changes are made in defence policy, there will be a full review which will be in consultation with all the people of Canada. Will she give that undertaking?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Obviously, in looking at a defence policy for the future, there are many aspects that must be considered: the international situation, Canadian security, the numbers of people and roles they must play.

I think it is evident, though, and I am sure my hon. colleague will agree, that some changes to infrastructure will be required. In fact, we are looking at all aspects of infrastructure. In looking at that, of course we look at the social and economic effects of changes in our infrastructure, and that will be part of the considerations that will come into our cabinet deliberations.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Over and over again, this government has told Canadians that the GST is revenue neutral. On November 12, the Prime Minister said in Calgary that the GST would not cost Albertans a nickel more than they now pay. But today the truth comes out. The Consumers' Association of Canada reports today that 72 per cent of products monitored by them have cost more than the government promised they would.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: how can he possibly reconcile the statements made by the Prime Minister, in his home province of Alberta, with the facts as they are presented to him today.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it might interest the hon. member to know that the Consumers' Association of Canada just issued a news release which indicates that this is not an official study by the Consumers' Association of Canada.

What they do say is that the Consumers' Association of Canada believes that Canadian consumers deserve a full and comprehensive quantitative study on the impact of the GST on prices in the Canadian marketplace. We agree with that.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I think the Deputy Prime Minister should get his quotes straight. It says:

> This has not been released as an official study of the Consumers' Association of Canada at the present time.

My question to the new Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister is this. Will he please tell us which of the only two possible scenarios could explain the startling discrepancy in facts? Either the former Minister of Finance could not count straight or his government misled the Canadian public about the disastrous effects of the goods and services tax on their own pocketbooks.

Mr. Speaker: There are ways to get around making statements and putting questions which are unparliamentary and I do not want the hon. member skating too close to the edge.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refuses to deal with the present. He may want to take the House into his confidence and tell us whether he would rather deal with the past or the future.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment.

Canada's forests are being overcut according to the majority of professional foresters, and Japanese corporations are leading the pack with activities that would land them in jail at home.

Will the Minister of the Environment ask our Prime Minister to deliver a message while he is in Japan this week that clear-cut logging inside our largest national park, Wood Buffalo, is unacceptable and that Daishowa should stop that activity, that clear-cutting 40,000 square kilometres of Alberta without an environmental assessment is unacceptable and Daishowa should stop, and polluting the Peace River upstream of Wood Buffalo National Park and many Northwest Territories communities is unacceptable and Daishowa should stop those kinds of activities in Canada?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say today that the member is being consistent with himself in statements that he made last week in the House of Commons. They seem to be blanket statements that do not always correspond to the facts.

I think the record will show that, as far as this government is concerned, we will have been the government to have created a full-fledged Department of Forestry to deal with issues directly related to forestry, to have brought in a green plan that brings together sustainable development, to make that happen for Canadian people, and that, in this context, we intend to deal with all forestry issues as they come along.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to hear that this minister has crawled under the same blanket and he endorses foreign nations logging inside our national parks.

I have a supplementary. Mitsubishi and Daishowa are clear-cutting 120,000 square kilometres of Alberta, an area one-third the size of Japan. They will pollute the Peace River and the Athabasca River upstream of our largest national park.

Will the minister send a message along with our Prime Minister for the 10 days that he is in Japan that Albertans and Canadians care about the environment and when a project like Mitsubishi's ALPAC is turned down by a federal environmental assessment, no means no, and this new Minister of Environment will stand behind decisions that are made by panels, not beside them like his predecessor did?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we need any lessons insofar as dealing with the environment is concerned. We need to take no lessons from the hon. member or people from his own party.

The member will also know that certain projects that he is referring to have gone through environmental assessments and they have been dealt with at both provincial and federal levels. There are assessments that are there, there are processes that are there now that are even under review, that there will be legislation and has been legislation brought before this House to deal with environmental assessments. All these projects and future projects will be dealt with with one single important consideration in mind that all members share around this House and that is with dealing with the environment and sustainable development.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

Last week, the Federal Court of Appeal ruled that the James Bay Agreement has force of law. As a result, the minister not only has the authority but the obligation to take his responsibilities seriously. This judgment is a clear contradiction of the agreement signed with the former minister on February 12 to split the Great Whale project study.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Could the minister confirm that the study will not be split, and that infrastructures will not be separated from dam construction? Could the minister confirm that he will reject his government's unsavory policy on the Great Whale project?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that I had a meeting last Thursday with my colleague, the Quebec Environment Minister, representatives of Inuit groups and representatives of the Cree.

To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, it was the first time all four parties were around the same table, and it was at our request.

At this meeting, Mr. Speaker, we reached the following consensus, and this includes my Quebec counterpart: everyone agreed that for environmental purposes, it made more sense to conduct the study on the Great Whale project as a whole, instead of splitting the project in two for this purpose, as had been the case.

Mr. Speaker, it was not our decision to split the project study in two. After last Thursday's meeting, I can also inform you that my Quebec counterpart intends to have a meeting with the parties—with representatives of his own government—to find out whether there is a possibility to consider the project as a whole for environmental purposes.

• (1440)

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly not the report we had on that Thursday meeting. The Minister of the Environment of Quebec has stated unequivocally that the problem he is having with his own cabinet arises out of a lack of support from this government for the environment. That is very clear and this minister is not going to get away with that kind of insipid, weak-kneed response.

The minister either takes a stand now or he stands forever condemned, along with his predecessors.

The issue is very, very clear. The Federal Court of Appeal has spoken. It said that the 1975 James Bay Agreement has the force of law. It has the force of federal law. This government has the right to move.

The only question in this House is: Why will this minister not stand up in this House and state unequivocally that this government will stand behind its own laws?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member pretends to get his information.

I was in a meeting with my colleague, the Minister of the Environment for Quebec and with representatives of the Inuk and of the Cree, no later than last Thursday night.

As I have already said, all parties, including the provincial minister, agreed at that meeting that for environmental assessment, it was a lot better to undertake an assessment based on all of the project and its cumulative effects, rather than split the project in two. I was very happy to hear that coming out of the mouth of my hon. colleague of the environment for Quebec.

He also undertook at that meeting to go to his own government to try to see whether it could change its approach vis-à-vis this project, which we were very happy to hear. We will see what the outcome of that meeting is and we will then go on to deal with the environmental assessment of the project.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Recently a member of this government admitted that the average processing time for a Canadian citizen to be reunited with a spouse married abroad was 900 working days.

Many of these Canadians were devastated to learn that Mr. Al-Mashat and his spouse were admitted in just 28 days.

I ask the minister why his government has fostered an immigration system that offers special treatment for the elite but only delay and despair for ordinary Canadians?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member thinks that she is helping Canada by trying to portray our immigration system as a system favouring the elite over poor people, then I submit with respect that she is not helping her country, Canada. We have no such system in this country.

Last year, 212,000 people immigrated to Canada and they were not all former ambassadors.

The situation of Al-Mashat is going to be looked at by a standing committee of this House and it will do its task.

The answer to the member's question as to why will be answered then. Please, do not tell the world that in Canada we favour the elite over ordinary people who immigrate to Canada according to the rules.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): The last refuge of a scoundrel is an appeal to patriotism.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would put her question.

Ms. Guarnieri: My supplementary is for the same minister. At the commencement of the gulf war, the then Minister of Employment and Immigration delivered a directive banning the issuance of visas to Iraqis and Palestinians applying for entry into Canada. Clearly, in the case of Mr. Al-Mashat, who was admitted before a formal cease-fire was signed, this directive was ignored. Does the minister expect Canadians to believe that his officials in Vienna would override a specific ministerial directive during a war without the knowledge of his predecessor?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to note that there was some discussion in the House on this topic last week and there was an agreement forthcoming from this government that all the issues related to this matter would be discussed in committee. We are looking forward to being at that committee, both my colleague and myself, and all the relevant officials.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When I called the minister's 1-800 line regarding the Meme implant, it was still using figures saying the risk of cancer to women with Meme implants is equivalent to smoking one and a half cigarettes in a woman's lifetime and refers to only one in a million women facing cancer from the Meme. The FDA in the U.S. is saying one in 10,000, but some scientists from the FDA are stating one in 50, or one in 100.

Will the minister tell Canadian women who to believe and what is the minister planning to initiate to clarify for Canadian women the wide-ranging disparities coming from scientists?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all, in response to my first question as minister of health and welfare, I would like to say that my primary interest is the health of Canadians, particularly women in this case. I think all our work, as minister responsible for the department, is for the health of Canadians.

In this case I believe that everything has been done to be as up-front as we could in terms of the information provided. The 1-800 line has been used over 500 times since it has been put in place a couple of weeks ago.

In the medical world, decisions are made in light of information that is available, and I believe that in terms of breast implants that is the basis on which our decision has been made. In this case all information available is referred to the department and, when necessary, we duplicate the control to be sure that the information is the best and we will continue to do that.

In light of the information that we have, a decision will be made in light of the health of all Canadians.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer. However, I think it important that we be aware that when there was nothing out of the FDA, this government was waiting for the FDA for stats. Now we have stats from the FDA that say one in 10,000, and some of the scientists are saying one in 50, one in 100, and we are still saying we are using the best information available.

In light of this, I would like to ask this minister if he will make an undertaking that the kinds of projects that Dr. Chan from Calgary, and other doctors who want to do research into the safety of implants, will be funded as soon as possible. Will he give women of Canada that undertaking?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the department received in March the study by Dr. Chan from Calgary and we are dealing with that project. Dr. Chan himself said that he believed that more study should be done.

The hon. member is are asking me for an undertaking on funding. I have not personally received any request from Dr. Chan to provide any help. If this should be the case, we would consider it. There are many researchers in this country who are independently doing this type of research and refer to the department all instructive information that could be provided. We will continue to do that.

• (1450)

First of all, what Canadians, particularly women, want in terms of that issue is the best information available. It is what we do and the department is open to anyone who wants to check if what we are doing is well done. There is no problem with that.

FORESTRY

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade, whomever he or she may be today.

A long time family-owned sawmill business in the upper Ottawa Valley which under normal conditions employed about 300 people has closed down its operations, taking 12 million badly needed dollars out of several small communities.

When is the government going to wake up? When is it going to get rid of the 15 per cent export tax? When is it going to lower the high Canadian dollar and give the forest industry and the forest workers a chance to survive? Where is the government's level playing field?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that that particular company was dealing with an eroding resource, a particularly low grade of product. It could not survive based on the specie that was left.

The hon. member should also know that this 15 per cent tax which has been collected is to be used to help that particular industry. We were determined to do that, but we need help from the provincial government in order to make it work.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, this government is the eroding resource.

My supplementary is to the same minister. This government inflicted devastating measures on the forest industry and has done nothing concrete to date to change its destructive policies. This closure brings to approximately 3,000 the number jobs lost in the upper Ottawa Valley alone due to this government's policies.

When is the government going to get together with the big spenders at Queen's Park in Toronto and bring in a federal-provincial forestry agreement that will give the employers and the workers some hope for the future?

What is the government going to do for these unemployed people? Is there any mercy out there at all?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will allow me to answer this question. As my hon. friend knows, we have negotiated and entered into agreements with almost all provinces, now except the province of Ontario, which in itself is insisting on conducting more studies before it determines the future of the forest product sector in that province.

I would like to remind my hon. friend as well that the industry is in a normal cycle. In fact, in 1976 the Canadian dollar stood at $1.014 American and the industry survived that. There are other factors that are involved in the lack of productivity of the industry right now. One has to do with the decline in the demand of forest products in our major market, which is the United States. Current signs indicate that the recession has bottomed out and the industry will recover its vibrancy later this year.

ARMENIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. She will know that Soviet troops, backed by armoured vehicles and helicopters, have been storming villages along Armenia's border with Azerbaijan for the past two weeks. Earlier this month over 30 Armenians were killed and hundreds were injured when heavy fighting flared up at the border. Many Armenians suspect the Kremlin is giving support to Azerbaijan to punish Armenia for its determination to secede.

My question is: Will the minister intervene either through the United Nations or directly with the Soviets to end this anti-Armenian violence by the Soviet and Azerbaijan authorities?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, clearly we are very concerned about the reports of increasing violence in that region, in Azerbaijan and Armenia. Like all members of the House, we regret that this conflict has not yet been resolved. We have called on all sides to show restraint in this dispute and to seek negotiated solutions because it is very important that further bloodshed be averted.

I think, particularly for Canadians families of Armenian descent, there is great concern. It is up to us and we have been making representations within the Soviet Union. Our embassy has been instructed to convey our concerns directly to the Soviet Foreign Ministry and, Soviet authorities permitting, embassy officers will be making a fact-finding visit to the region so that we can report directly back to those in Canada who have an interest in this.

FINANCE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Earlier in the Question Period he said he is interested in getting the fundamentals right. Well, today the Conference Board said that its "forecast for the Canadian economy has been revised downward", and it gave as a primary reason that "export performance has been weaker than expected".

One of the fundamentals when it comes to exports is the value of the Canadian dollar. If the Minister of Finance is interested in getting the fundamentals right when it comes to exports, why is he keeping the Canadian dollar so high? Why will he not take steps to bring the value of the dollar down right now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member knows that the exchange rate is established in the marketplace. The difficulty that Canadian industry faces is a lack of productivity and competitiveness, and that is one of the issues that needs to be addressed. The hon. member knows that there have been built up over the last two or three years serious inflationary pressures and inflationary expectations that have to be brought down. As those are brought down, interest rates are brought down. We have seen a reduction of some five percentage points in the last year.

That is the key to economic recovery. There is nothing in the Conference Board report that was not outlined in the budget of 1991 or referenced in the budget of 1990.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, one of the main factors robbing Canadian industry of its competitiveness is the over-valued Canadian dollar, and I wish that the minister would be more willing to recognize this.

The government claims to be concerned about cross-border shopping. Why will the minister not recognize that one of the fundamentals that is driving Canadians to shop in the United States is the value of the Canadian dollar? Why will he not do something about that right now if he is interested in preserving our retail industry and bringing about a strong economic recovery now and not next year?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps a fundamental difference in policy. Back on August 8, 1981, his leader at that time saw no reason for an emergency session of Parliament in the face of soaring interest rates and the dropping value of the Canadian dollar, which was approaching a 50-year record low, and 12.8 per cent inflation.

Our policies are not designed to achieve that kind of a Liberal result.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and concerns the agricultural safety net program.

Earlier this year I spoke with farmers in my constituency and I asked for their input on the type of program they would like to see implemented to see farmers through until GRIP and NISA become effective. They said: "Keep the program simple and deliver it before seeding".

NISA is now designed to allow farmers to access funds immediately in order to help pay for costs associated with seeding. The minister knows that seeding is currently under way and to date there is no indication that applications for NISA are available.

Can the minister give the farmers of my constituency an explanation as to why NISA applications are not available? And can he give some assurances as to when we can reasonably expect them to be made available?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, when the farm support adjustment measures program was announced it included the Net Income Stabilization Account and the GRIP, the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan. I can tell the hon. member that the forms for NISA, the Net Income Stabilization Account, are ready, they can be put out.

One thing my colleague should understand is that there has to be legislation passed in the provincial legislature before we would be able to send those forms out. To this point, it appears that the opposition in the Saskatchewan House is putting a political priority of its own ahead of the priority of the farmers to receive the NISA funds, which they very much would like to have as soon as possible.

An hon. member: Sounds NDP to me.

THE LATE RAJIV GANDHI

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the House of the assassination of Rajiv Gandhi earlier today during election campaigning in the state of Tamil Nadu.

Mr. Gandhi was known personally to Prime Minister Mulroney and to the former Secretary of State for External Affairs. I know that they join with me in deploring this senseless violence.

I express the profound hope of the Prime Minister and of this government that this event will not be allowed to interfere with the democratic process at this very sensitive time during this very important election to India and to those of us who have an interest in democracy and the development of democracy in India.

I know I speak for this House and for all Canadians in deploring this senseless violence and in extending condolences to the bereaved family.

[Translation]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are truly sorry to learn of Rajiv Gandhi's tragic death. We wish to extend our most sincere sympathies to the people of India and to Mr. Gandhi's family.

[English]

In a world where violence and terror has become so commonplace, it is very hard not to overlook these shocking events. Political assassinations are the most ugly of all political crimes, especially when it happens to someone who has held such a distinguished position in the largest democracy in the world.

We certainly want to share the sympathies the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have expressed, both to the family and to the people of that country.

We hope that this will not result in the further fragmentation and fracturing of that country as it goes through a very delicate and sensitive time.

We point out again the irony of human events. Once again, a member of that family has been struck down. It is a family that has provided such distinguished leadership over the years.

We hope and pray that this event will not result in further loss of life in India at this very important time.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, we certainly share the sadness at the tragedy which happened today, expressed by the minister responsible for external affairs.

[Translation]

Certainly, the violent death of the former Prime Minister of India affects us all and reminds us, as if it were necessary, that violence is everywhere and that democracy must triumph.

[English]

We would like to express our sadness to the family and our thoughts that democracy will triumph in India. We wish everyone in that country all the best regarding the election which is taking place. Our sincerest condolences to the family.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to join the members of this House, on behalf of my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois, to extend our sympathies to the Gandhi family.

Several years ago, I had the opportunity to meet the mother, who suffered the same fate as her son. We are all touched by events like that in one of the world's greatest democracies and we hope that this event will not be followed by an outburst of violence.

It is regrettable that democracy is thus sidetracked by violence; we bitterly regret it. Our sympathies to the family.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS OF MINISTER

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, notice of which was initiated by my colleague, the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, and which I confirmed as I was returning to the Chamber at about the time he was concluding his representation on my behalf. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for reserving for me that question of privilege.

Section 80, paragraph (2) of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fifth edition states in part:

> A question of privilege—is a question partly of fact and partly of law—the law of contempt of Parliament—and is a matter for the House to determine.

I will show that the minister for immigration made an incorrect and misleading statement, which is therefore a question partly of fact.

Section 16 of Beauchesne also says:

> Parliamentary privilege is the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions—

I would like to underscore the phrase "and by Members of each House individually". Section 18 states:

> —it is clear that many acts which might offend against the law or the moral sense of the community do not involve a Member's capacity to serve the people who have chosen him as their representative nor are they contrary to the usage nor derogatory to the dignity of the House of Commons.

I feel that it is contrary to the usage and derogatory to the dignity of this place when a member knowingly makes a statement that is incorrect. When such a false statement is used to assail the reputation of another hon. member the indignity to this House becomes more serious.

Hence, when the hon. minister of immigration, in reply to my supplementary question during the proceedings of May 16, said, referring to me:

> He was not even able to give me the name, the date of birth, or address of the person we want.

This statement is on page 194 of Hansard. The minister, by his statement, impaired my ability to fully discharge my duties and obligations as a member of Parliament for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to submit the following as you consider my question of privilege:

First, with respect to the matter of the applicant's name, on May 9 I wrote a letter to the said hon. minister in which I indicated very clearly the name of the applicant visitor, Mrs. Surjit Kaur, for whom I have been making the representation. I am now prepared to table this letter if necessary. I should further inform the House that my office faxed a copy of this letter to the minister's office on the same date and the original was marked urgent and sent by messenger.

I should also inform the House that on May 13, in this Chamber, I personally approached the minister for follow-up and, once again, provided him with the name of the applicant. I am confident no member of Parliament would ever intercede for any person without knowledge of that person's name.

Second, with respect to the date of birth of the applicant visitor, my office was indeed unable to provide this information when first asked by the minister's staff, as we did not have it in our record at that time. However, on May 13 I furnished the minister's staff the date of birth, which is December 4, 1941.

I should add that the bereaved brother in Winnipeg approached the local immigration office on April 30, the day after the death of his brother, Mr. Sidhu Singh. One would assume all necessary information with respect to the applicant visitor, including the date of birth, should have been requested from the family at that time. I personally advised the minister's staff to kindly get in touch with the Winnipeg immigration office for further information.

Third, with respect to the address of the applicant, I must tell this House neither the minister's staff nor the minister himself had ever asked my staff or myself for this information, even though it has been in our case file since April 29. Certainly we would have provided this information had it been requested. My record, Mr. Speaker, is open for your inquiry.

Thus, the minister was correct, if he meant the information on the date of birth was not initially available from my office when first requested on May 9. However, the name of the applicant has been known to us all along and to the minister's department office in Winnipeg since April 30, and to the minister's office in Ottawa since May 9, well before he requested it. I once again provided him with the information when I approached him in person on May 13.

The address of the applicant, which has been available in my record since April 29, has never been asked of me to date.

Did the minister deliberately mislead the House with the statement in question? If he did, it would be derogatory to the dignity of this House and, thus, constitute breach of privilege. Were it the case I am prepared to make the appropriate motion and seek the remedy of this House.

I realize that ministers make mistakes when they are not informed. I also realize they can make mistakes when they are wrongly or incompletely informed.

In conclusion, therefore, I would still like to believe, in all sincerity, that the minister, in reply to my question last May 16, could have mis-spoken that statement in his reply, considering the atmosphere of the moment, and that he did not deliberately and wilfully mislead the House. If this is the case, I will be prepared to accept an explanation and an apology from him and I am sure he would apologize to this House.

• (1510)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to have the remarks I may have made interpreted so as to try to impugn or in any way reflect badly on the hon. member.

I do not think it is important to go into all the details of this. Suffice it to say that the member's office did provide to my office on May 13, 1991, the details he referred to, as he stated today.

I do not hesitate to apologize to the hon. member if my comments put his dedication or his integrity or work as a member of the House in question. The only point I was trying to make was that we deal with literally thousands of these cases. In that specific instance, I did enquire from the Visa official in New Delhi so I could understand why the decision was made. I am sure the House will agree that no minister should overturn a decision by an official without knowing the reasons why he made that decision. That was the simple point I was trying to make.

Again, I have no hesitation in apologizing to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I want to thank the hon. minister for his gracious and appropriate response.

I also want to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North for the concise and courteous way he put his case.

RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session; and amendment thereto of Mr. Chrétien (p. 24) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Lapierre (p. 209).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assinibois has the floor. You have two minutes left.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the time left, I just want to quote very briefly from the throne speech a passage which I believe to be the most important. It refers to productivity.

> Increasing our productivity across the full range of Canadian industry—manufacturing, resources, and services—is the only way to secure and enhance our prosperity of the longer term. Productivity is the difference between prosperity and decline. The prosperity of all Canadians and our ability to maintain social programs depend on the productivity of Canadians. Increasing productivity requires the collaborative efforts of governments, business, labour and individual Canadians, in all regions.

I believe these are very important words. What can government do? Government can control spending, can try to balance the books and bring interest rates down. There is no way on God's green earth that governments can borrow their way into prosperity.

To this end the government has pledged itself to legislate limits to government spending. For the first time there will be actual legislation putting a limit on government spending in this country.

In addition, legislation establishing a debt reduction fund to which the revenues from the goods and services tax and from the proceeds of privatization can be dedicated: further trade liberalization; public service reform; and privatization, where feasible. Theses are all measures designed to make the economy more competitive and to lessen the reliance upon government.

An additional measure is the pledge to work with the provinces in certain areas of education, in the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers and the management of the economy.

It is quite clear that government must control spending and inflation so that Canadians and others can have some confidence in our future.

A sound economy is the solid foundation for a strong nation. All of the hopeful signs are there: the stock market is up; interest rates are coming down; housing starts are up; business confidence is increasing; and employment opportunities are up. The path laid out in the throne speech is the best way to ensure the future: guarantee our Canadian way of life by strengthening and improving the Canadian federation constitutionally and economically.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to the member and he made the point that national unity was an important theme in the throne speech and that competitiveness was a factor. I realize he has only been here since 1984 I believe, but I would like to know if he has ever known a time in Canadian history since perhaps before the Second World War or the conscription crisis of 1941 when Canada has been more divided, when Canadians in all parts of Canada have been more frustrated, as I think the Spicer committee has discovered.

I would make the point to this member that when his colleague, the Prime Minister, went especially around Quebec last year and said in effect to Quebecers that if Meech Lake did not pass they should consider themselves to be rejected by English speaking Canadians, it was a calumny, it was untrue, and it was probably the most irresponsible thing that anyone who purports to call him or herself Prime Minister could do in this country.

I would ask the member, as a westerner—I have been to speak to his riding association and I know the community he comes from—how he can sit with a government that has done more to disunite Canadians from north, south, east and west than any other government in Canadian history?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the tone displayed by the hon. member, given the fact that he was I believe elected four or five times as a Progressive Conservative opposing the policies that he now apparently espouses and holds so dear. Perhaps after all he was in favour of the national energy policy, perhaps after all he favours the kind of wanton spending and irresponsible borrowing that characterized the policies of the party that he now sits with, having betrayed the people who voted for him. Perhaps he thinks that his party is God's gift to agriculture and that it would have come forward, as this government has, in response to the needs of western grain farmers.

It seems to me that embedded in the question and in the emotion displayed in it, there was a good deal of personal animosity toward the Prime Minister. I do not know what it relates to, perhaps the fact that the hon. member having been elected four or five times was consistently by-passed. I can only suggest that it is the apparent reason for the sort of venom and animosity displayed.

I believe and I hope that all members in this House are concerned about national unity. This throne speech lays out a consistent and steady pattern, leading toward the resolving of differences among Canadians and hopefully will lead to a rebuilt Constitution, one which will enable us to progress into the 21st century.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, further to the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister said that he wanted to take an interest in education, when we know very well that the Bélanger-Campeau Commission asked that Quebec alone have authority over education; when we know that the Quebec Liberal Party, the Government of Quebec says that it absolutely wants sole control over education and job training; when we also know that the Quebec Chamber of Commerce has asked the Government of Quebec alone to be responsible for education and adult training. This means that all Quebecers want education to be controlled by Quebec. So what an insult for the federal government to try to control education in Quebec! This will lead to inconsistency and confrontation and clearly hurt education in Quebec instead of helping it.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he agrees with his government interfering in education in the provinces, even if the intention is noble.

• (1520)

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member for Longueuil is easily insulted and always humiliated, in a position of perpetual humiliation.

The fact is that the throne speech clearly recognizes education as a provincial jurisdiction. In fact I have the document in front of me. It says: "My government recognizes that education is a provincial responsibility under the Constitution and respects that fact".

However, I do not think that means that it is not the concern of every Canadian. Whether they happen to be sitting at the federal level, provincial level or municipal level, they want to get the most they can for the spending on education that we have in Canada.

The throne speech quite clearly points out the fact that we have to improve our educational levels, our technological skills, if we are to compete in the coming knowledge age. It is part of being productive and competitive. That is the sense to choose from the throne speech, and I think it is something that all members in this House should be in a position to support.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, today this debate brings us a sense of unease and frustration about the validity of the Speech from the Throne process.

In addition, I would like to focus in my intervention on what the Government of Canada says in the Speech from the Throne on the important issue of sustainable development.

Let me deal first with the Speech from the Throne as a political instrument. I would submit that at this stage the credibility, the validity and the significance of the Speech from the Throne have been lost enormously over time. I am not saying that in a partisan sense, because one can remember also speeches from the throne when my party was in power which were not fully implemented. In other words, it is a statement of dreams, a statement of intent. However, it is a statement that because of its lack of accountability at the present time has to be questioned.

We know that Canadians at large at this particular time in history have raised questions about the credibility of the political system. Therefore, I submit that it is necessary and incumbent upon us to raise a question of this kind with you, Mr. Speaker, because it is valid, it is timely and it is necessary.

I will illustrate this point with a few examples to move from the abstract, so to speak, into the practical.

Why am I saying that the Speech from the Throne reduces even further the credibility of politicians? I would ask you to compare the Speech from the Throne of April 1989, in which you will find under the heading "Environmental Imperative" a number of specific proposals. I will start with the one which reads: "The government has also altered its operational practices and enlarged the responsibilities of the Minister of the Environment to ensure that environmental issues are fully considered in the course of its decision making".

That was a very bold, a very promising and a very welcome statement two years ago. If we look at what happened, without reciting a number of events that have proven the contrary, I would only ask you to think back to last week when the courts made a decision on Kemano II and urged that the government apply its own environmental impact assessment process.

This was a decision, is a decision and will be a decision of enormous importance. In other words, the court told the federal government that it was breaking its own environmental impact assessment rules. This was last week, and by comparing that event with what was in the Speech from the Throne two years ago, one cannot help but conclude that something here has gone seriously wrong.

I would submit that the gap between the rhetoric in the pages and lines of a Speech from the Throne and the action is widening in a dangerous manner.

If you look at the 1989 Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, you will find a statement to the effect that in the new environmental agenda the government will limit the environmental impact of toxic chemicals through the development of regulations for the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

As of today, under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act no new chemicals have been added since the birth of this legislation. Before this legislation came into effect nine chemicals were included, precisely nine out of thousands and thousands of chemicals that were in use out there, and today we still have nine. Therefore, the inevitable question is: What has happened to this important commitment?

Let me move to another example. In April 1989, the government committed itself to improving the quality of our water through new legislation. Nothing has happened since. We had the Pierce report on the federal water inquiry in 1985. We had the publication of a federal water policy in 1987. We had a commitment from the government in April 1989, and we are still waiting for the legislation.

If you want another example, there was a very important policy commitment in April 1989 to protect the environmental integrity of our Arctic regions. What do we find here? We find that a few days before the last session died an Arctic strategy was released. It is another piece of paper; it is not an implementation of an Arctic protection strategy.

I must bring the strategy itself to your attention, Mr. Speaker, because you come from a province which is undertaking or proposing a major hydroelectric plant that could affect the salinity in Hudson Bay. I come from a province where eventually over the decades similar projects will be proposed, with an impact on James Bay, which is part of Hudson Bay. Manitoba is also in the long term likely to produce some hydroelectric plans of that nature.

In the Arctic strategy there is no reference to the importance of the ecological role of Hudson Bay, its salinity, or how it could be affected by these megaprojects as they are being proposed to come on stream.

What we have instead of protection are nice words, beautiful sentences and lots of paper.

In the April 1989 Speech from the Throne, there is a reference which reads: "My government will proceed with the initiatives to clean up the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River and, together with the provinces, to further the process of cleaning up dangerous land sites".

• (1530)

The remedial action plan for 17 Canadian sites in the Great Lakes and in the St. Lawrence River lacks federal support. We have not seen the action that was proposed in the Speech from the Throne two years ago.

The Speech from the Throne of two years ago proposed the encouragement, the development and the adoption of clean and efficient production processes.

We have a situation where, unfortunately, we cannot say that this has happened. In our tax system, the only write-offs refer to pollution control equipment, a narrow range of devices related to equipment. Clean production processes that aim as close as possible to zero discharge do not qualify yet for tax breaks.

In other words, the government, despite the intent that it expressed two years ago, has not yet been able to come to grips with the use of fiscal and taxation levers and instruments that would allow it to implement what it promised to do two years ago.

We have the commitment by the government, also two years ago, to legislation that would ensure an appropriate environmental assessment review process.

On that, the government attempted to act. In June 1990, it introduced Bill C-78, which did not make any progress during the summer of last year. Between January and April, it was no longer the object of discussions in committee.

In addition to that, it was quite interesting to notice that witnesses who came before the committee on that environmental impact assessment bill were of the opinion that they would prefer to live under the present guidelines than under the weaker and vague clauses that are embodied in the now defunct Bill C-78.

Might I add that the guidelines are the result of an Order in Council decision by the then Liberal government in the spring of 1984.

We have a situation where we are still living in a legislative vacuum, but instead of legislation we have a stronger regime thanks to guidelines that are in place by way of a decision of the courts.

In the Speech from the Throne of two years ago, and before I move on to sustainable development, there was also a commitment by the government to a national child care program.

Inevitably, one has to ask, if one were an average Canadian looking at the Speech from the Throne of two years ago, what happened to that commitment. Unfortunately, we cannot find any initiatives, not even the shadow of a bill in the legislative system, that would indicate that the commitment has somehow been developed and given the necessary political will to move ahead into the legislative system.

Actually, it is not only on the child care program front that we find the Speech from the Throne wanting. It is not only wanting because of what was not implemented since 1989 in the previous Speech from the Throne.

We find an absence of understanding of the social agenda of Canadians at large, the situation being faced by one-parent families, the situation being faced by people who depend on food banks, the situation of people who are waiting to be admitted to social housing, the situation of those who are unemployed and are waiting to be recalled to their job or perhaps are not going to be recalled at all because their previous job has simply disappeared.

The absence of social awareness and conscience in this particular Speech from the Throne is particularly striking and particularly shocking.

I indicated a few minutes ago that the second reason for making this intervention relates to the issue of sustainable development. I must refer you to the present Speech from the Throne. I was astounded to read the following statement under the heading "Participating in Prosperity":

> My government will, over the coming months, consult with provincial governments, industry and environmental leaders to explore means of complementing current regulatory approaches with innovative instruments that would achieve positive environmental results—

And here are the key words, Mr. Speaker, before you fall asleep:

> —without prejudicing economic prosperity.

That really struck me like a thunderbolt. By saying "without prejudicing economic prosperity" the Government of Canada rejects all the commitments it has made so far to sustainable development and the commitments made so far, including the Speech from the Throne of 1989, to the Brundtland report and our common future.

The government is saying that the environment will only count if the economy does not come into the picture, which is diametrically opposed to the principles and recommendations contained in the Brundtland report. This is contrary to what sustainable development is all about because sustainable development means development that can be sustained over a long period of time without prejudicing the choices and opportunities of generations to come.

You can invent another dozen definitions if you like, if you have enough imagination.

The point I am trying to make is that this government, either out of bad faith when it was popular decided to embrace sustainable development hoping that it could ride the popularity of that concept and maintain public support and possibly increase it, or embraced it without knowing what it was embracing, without realizing what sustainable development meant.

This is a government that either attempted to deceive the public or was stupid enough to embrace a concept whose meaning it did not understand. The proof of that was a few weeks ago during Question Period in this House when the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, now minister in charge of federal-provincial relations, in reply to a question from the member for Skeena, insisted that the trade negotiations and the environmental negotiations presently taking place between the United States and Mexico, and eventually involving Canada, would have to proceed on separate tracks. At that point we knew that conceptually this government was unable to understand the significance of what sustainable development is all about.

Therefore, and it was almost prophetic in a sense, the reply given by the secretary of state, that revelation, has found its way into the text of the Speech from the Throne. When the government says it will introduce innovative instruments to achieve positive environmental results without prejudicing economic prosperity, it is saying that it has chosen a policy that will take care of the short term, that it will endanger our natural resources and that it will perpetrate the mistakes that have been made in the environment and in environmental policies over several decades, particularly in recent years.

In other words, it is saying that political expediency will come before long-term benefits. It is saying that it endorses particularly in international bodies, in the United Nations and at conferences on climate change, certain principles and concepts in the world community but it does not want to practise them at home. It is saying it has decided that the integration of economic and environmental goals is not a knock on the table. It is attempting to turn the clock back 20 years. What a shame, what a disgrace for the Canadian people.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, through you to the member, there was an article in the New York Times yesterday by an American environmentalist who argued—the member probably saw it—that because President Bush had agreed to factor the environment into the talks that somehow the environment in effect was likely to be safe.

If the member saw the article, I wonder if he would wish to comment on that principle.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I have not seen that article but I am aware of the theology being adopted by the administration in Washington which has unfortunately been swallowed hook, line and sinker by the administration here in Ottawa, as demonstrated by the endorsement given almost overnight by the Minister for International Trade of the approach that the hon. member just attributed to President Bush.

There is a lot of environment in trade policies because there are very few other human activities that impinge so heavily on environment and our national resources as trade activities in any jurisdiction. To pretend out of the blue that trade policies have to be considered on one track and then on another track you should consider environmental policies is an unreal conceptual organization.

If I remember correctly, the administration in Washington went so far as to say that the two would be considered on parallel tracks: trade on one track and the environment on the other. Anyone who knows geometry knows that parallel lines never meet. That fact alone reveals the weakness of this particular approach. A separation of the two will not allow an examination of trade activities with the environment in mind with a concern for the long term. It will not allow a concern for the capacity of natural resources to rejuvenate themselves while anticipating and preventing pollution activities resulting from trade. In other words, one cannot have a meaningful trade negotiation process at the table without having people knowledgeable on the environment as part of that particular trade delegation.

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr Speaker, first of all, the start of a new session in the life of this Thirty-Fourth Parliament is a proper occasion to thoughtfully and carefully reflect on our collective achievements, as a Parliament and people. It is also a time to provide both leadership and vision for the long-term future of our nation.

No issue is more important, as stated in the Speech from the Throne, than the unity of Canada. We must learn to overcome obstacles, erase doubts, and strengthen Canada's position to meet the challenges of the twenty-first century which is waiting for us just around the corner.

All hon. members are united in this purpose, as far as I know, and the government's commitment to Canada and to our vision for the future is strong and clear in this Speach from the Throne. If, in our minds, the picture of the future is dim and clouded, and if we remain preoccupied only with the whims and pressures of today, we put at risk our very future.

Daily, we face such constant pressures and exhortations. However, to deal only with today and let the future take care of itself, spend a few billion here and there, invent a new program overnight to demonstrate concern and action, not worry about the national debt, not question the value of existing programs, and not even wonder if a new costly effort is certain to be cost effective and bring the desired results, is a dangerous and costly attitude.

Keeping our eye firmly on the long-term and staying the course is difficult for some hon. members. Satisfying every want and wish today comes just too naturally. It may play well to the cameras.

However it does not meet our duty and responsibility as Parliamentarians. As members of this House, we must resist the temptation of pressing for instant gratification and magic solutions for every real or imagined need. Magic wands such as popular but ineffective policies are hoaxes. They don't work.

What does work is implementing today carefully-designed measures directed to achieving long-term goals. As I said earlier, the year 2000 is not far off and our focus on the future must not prevent immediate action. This action must be in line with goals for the future. This is the view, and the vision, that is put forward to this House and the people of Canada in the speech from the Throne.

This has been the guiding principle of this Government since 1984. The foundation has been the Strategy for Economic Renewal: We have firmly put the break on the mindless expansion of government programs and expenditures; deficit reduction has been and remains a primary goal; tax reform is yielding economic returns; and free trade and productivity growth open the doors to prosperity and the world for all Canadians.

There is no other route for making it in the tough competitive world we face. Let us not deceive Canadians into believing otherwise. Wise leadership and effective management is our mandate. That demands that we confront directly the complex challenges and problems facing Canadians.

Moreover, that means developing coherent and consistent long-term plans to meet goals and targets and stick to them.

• (1550)

It also means taking the time and devoting the energy to build a concensus among Canadians. Broad agreement among Canadians does not simply arise on command to suit the agenda or meet the demands of those who call for instant solutions. Such a consensus must be encouraged and nurtured in a deliberate and planned way. Leaders must make the commitment and set the course. Knowledge and power has to be shared. New forums and meeting places need to be fashioned. Energy and time must be invested.

To pretend that we have all the answers and reject the need for public consultations—and those critical requirements to make consultation work—is to mislead Canadians.

[English]

It is not government but people who have the real power in our society to set the course and make the rules which govern their lives. Certain people in this Chamber question or even ridicule the government's decision to consult seriously and widely with the Canadian people.

The people who are questioning or ridiculing a commitment like this one by the government are, in reality, questioning and ridiculing a commitment to empower people and make democracy work.

As the Speech from the Throne clearly states, increasing prosperity is first and foremost an issue of people. Canada is much more than an abundance of forests, minerals and water. Our greatest strength is our people. Our knowledge, skills and brains are our greatest national asset. They are our ticket to prosperity and they are our ticket to growth, more so than they have ever been in the past.

This is a tough and competitive world that values knowledge more than any other asset. Canadian jobs are being threatened by a new kind of competition. It is not primarily low wage competition that threatens us, increasingly it is high wage competition. Canada is losing ground to industrial competitors who are simply better than we are at inventing, designing, managing, manufacturing and marketing. We must, and we can, outsmart our international competitors.

In this, the information society, the knowledge age, how well we live will depend on how well we learn. Learning, from infancy, in school, on the job, and throughout life.

Governments in Canada spend more than $50 billion a year on education and training, with federal expenditures amounting to over $11 billion. This is a greater expenditure than almost any other developed country in the world, but the results, not government spending more money, is the question that should be of most concern to every Canadian.

The importance of learning as our ticket to prosperity is not a new concern for us. The Prime Minister has strongly asserted, over the years, the national interest in calling for all Canadians, all levels of government and all groups in society to recognize and then confront the fact that our performance lags behind other developed nations.

Our government, under the Prime Minister's strong direction, has established a record of important accomplishments to further learning, amounting to billions of dollars in expenditures. This represents an innovative and creative record. Each initiative is targeted to deal with the specific issue. Together they represent an integrated approach.

These new measures, many in my own Department of Employment and Immigration, include the new Labour Force Development Strategy, the National Stay-in-School Initiative, Canada scholarships from Industry, Science and Technology, major literacy initiatives, networks of Centres of Excellence, Canada Student Loans Policy Review, education for Canada's First Nations, the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy and the Aboriginal Employment and Training Strategy.

In November 1989 at the First Ministers' Conference, the Prime Minister defined the challenge and provided the leadership. There was wide recognition and understanding then, as there must be today, that learning throughout life, good jobs and our success as a nation are closely linked.

Who in Canada wants low paying and low skill jobs? No one wishes such a future for themselves or their children. The ticket to good jobs and a good life throughout one's life is learning. The ultimate goal which can be shared by all Canadians and all levels of government is to build an innovative, competitive economy, based on high skill, high wage jobs, a society where all Canadians value learning and fully enjoy the benefits of their learning and labour.

Learning reform is rooted in international competitiveness and is a function of national economic policy. The European commission and the sovereign member nations are forging ahead in developing European-wide targets and standards.

The Americans, the Japanese and other developed nations are confronting this challenge more successfully than Canadians.

[Translation]

Compared to many of these other countries, Mr. Speaker, our human resources are underdeveloped and underutilized. The fundamental problem with learning in Canada is that, compared with other nations, there isn't enough of it, and we don't take it seriously enough. Our prosperity depends on major improvements in the general level of skills held by all, as well as having many more people with advanced and specialized skills. No one party has a monopoly on life-long learning. The provinces have undisputed primacy for schools, a pat recognized in the speech from the Throne. We fully respect the Provinces' jurisdiction. The federal government has long played a major role in adult training. Life-long learning requires that we all work in partnership to confront our competitors.

Future constitutional restructuring in this area is not ruled out. In fact it could be informed by wide consultation. What is proposed in the speech from the Throne is a call for a national consensus on performance, goals, partnerships, and priorities for learning.

To build this consensus, we will now launch a process of consultation throughout Canada. This will represent another major step to further learning. It will focus the attention of all on the benefits of developing a learning culture in Canada.

[English]

A commitment has been made to publish a discussion paper on learning. This paper, now in draft form, has been prepared under the close direction of the Prime Minister. It fully reflects his long-standing commitment to learning, to further Canada's competitiveness, and to provide greater prosperity and personal fulfilment for each individual Canadian. This paper will be the federal government's contribution to a national dialogue on how Canadians acquire their skills and knowledge and how our approach to learning can be improved to ensure that Canadians can continue to enjoy the benefits of a globally competitive economy in the 21st century.

The primary aim of the paper is to initiate a national consensus-building discussion on targets and priorities for learning in Canada. While we have some understanding of the extent of the problem and the challenge we face as a nation, change will not happen unless public attitudes change.

• (1600)

This is the core of what we seek to accomplish, creating a climate or a culture among individuals, employers and all others to both learn throughout life and increase wide demand for better, if not outstanding, performance.

Change will only occur when large numbers of Canadians of all ages choose to make learning a personal priority and an individual responsibility throughout life. Learning is not something done to us by external institutions. Learning is what we can choose to do or not. The enormous personal, spiritual and economic benefits that learning can produce for each individual can be defined and readily understood. They can be a major source of new wealth for every Canadian.

These benefits must be made widely known. This revelation alone could be the spark that ignites an interest in more Canadians to pursue a life of learning and personal growth, and to create demand and support further reform.

[Translation]

Four Canada-wide goals for the year 2000 are suggested in the Speech from the Throne. With Provincial endorsement and cooperation, these could be considered by Canadians: cutting illiteracy rates in half; ensuring that 90 per cent of Canadians graduate from high school or the equivalent; doubling the number of post-secondary graduates in mathematics, the sciences, and engineering; and quadrupling the training provided by employers to their empoyees.

Mr. Speaker, there are many other goals that Canadians can consider in defining a learning system for life that is among the best, if not the best, in the world. Today, I might suggest two more goals that Canadians could discuss, namely to double the number of Canadian youth who participate in a structured learning programs leading to entry-level jobs and to achieve full representation of women in the fields of mathematics, science and technology.

These, and many other goals, will be suggested and examined in the discussion paper. As the Minister responsible, I can inform Members to day that the discussion paper will be tabled in the House within several weeks. I will be a substantial and important contribution to our knowledge.

The release of this paper will be a first step in a process of consultation and consensus building with Canadians throughout the nation.

[English]

The release of this paper will be the first step in the process of consultation and consensus building with Canadians throughout the nation.

In the several weeks following the release of the paper I will be meeting with many across Canada to decide on the approach to the process of consultation. Public consultations should start within the coming several months and throughout we want to examine learning as a life-long activity and the reforms required.

I will keep hon. members of this House fully informed and seek their views and support at every stage. Members from all sides of this House have indicated on many occasions support and commitment to the goal of improving our performance and furthering learning for all Canadians. We share the recognition that this is one of the most important challenges facing Canada. We have as a nation one of the strongest, best staffed and amply funded education systems. If together we deliberately build on our intellectual strengths we can take on the world. We will become competitive with the best learning systems in the world and create prosperity for ourselves as we enrich our own personal lives.

[Translation]

Our increased prosperity will help to build the unity of Canada. Not for today alone, but for the long term.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Rosemont, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Scarborough West.

The hon. member for Rosemont.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, there is incredible federal arrogance behind the rather engaging expression on the Minister of Employment and Immigration's face.

The minister told us: There are problems in the field of education. We spend a lot, but the performance we get is insufficient to face up to world competition. Granted, the education system in every country has to be reviewed constantly. But there are also plenty of other problems, Mr. Speaker, that are very important and completely under federal jurisdiction but nevertheless a long way from being solved.

The minister called for a consensus and stressed the importance of economic policy. We know what this government thinks of economic policy. We also know that the Economic Council of Canada says: The most significant obstacle to productivity in Canada is the lack of consensus. That is why we are saddled with a very harsh monetary policy, a real horse remedy—because we are in a country where there is no consensus. That is what the latest report by the Economic Council of Canada tells us. And if anyone expected a new consensus after the Budget speech—well, after Ontario brought down its budget, which represents 40 per cent of the Canadian economy, and after it adopted a policy that is diametrically opposed to that of the federal government, it is pretty obvious this government is far from obtaining a consensus.

We won't mention the constitutional question where, as we know, there is no consensus in sight. And now this government, which has trouble handling its own affairs, decides to intervene to a substantial degree in a field that is entirely under provincial jurisdiction, when it says: Well, there are a few problems, and we intend to help you deal with them.

Mr. Speaker, I am trying to understand on what basis—What qualifications does the federal government have for making a contribution of any kind in this area? In fact, what we need here is a consistent approach. In Quebec, there is a consensus among employers, unions, educational institutions and the government for patriating the entire area of occupational training. They are unanimous on this score, Mr. Speaker.

Could you imagine, a minister with that engaging expression? You would almost forget the federal arrogance behind it, but we must not forget it. Ms. Lise Bissonnette said as much this morning in an editorial which I recommend to the minister. Incredibly, when the federal government can't deal with its own problems, it goes and interferes with education. My point is that education must be brought closer to business and to the community. And that is exactly what the various parties want to do in Quebec, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect for the hon. member, I would like to say first of all that education is not what we traditionally think of as education, including the little red school house and all that. That is thè traditional picture we have of education, as I am sure he will agree. However, that is only part of the learning process. What we are talking about is developing a learning culture, and I am sure he will agree that people learn at home, they learn at school and they learn at work. Knowledge is not a monopoly of one particular jurisdiction. Knowledge is everybody's business at every stage in our lives. We are not talking about encroaching on the jurisdictions of the provinces, but about setting national objectives in this country and getting the tools to turn people across this country into the best qualified labour force in the world. To achieve these objectives the hon. member mentioned certain efforts in this area in Quebec, involving management and labour, and I totally agree that is the way we should go. The federal government is already spending $11 billion. It may well be that once we reach a national consensus, we will agree on a different way of spending those $11 billion.

As I said in an interview last week, we are not "jurisdiction-hungry". We want to develop a learning climate for Canadians across this country, so that even if you come from New Brunswick, when you graduate, it won't matter that you don't come from British Columbia.

The same thing applies to the young man from Newfoundland or the adult student from Vancouver or Trois-Rivières. We want to create this culture and give our people the best possible skills, because there is a direct link between skills and standard of living. That's the way it is, and we must have this national consensus so that we can start the next century with the most effective tool we have a skilled and highly professional labour force that will be able to meet the challenges of the twenty-first century that is just around the corner.

[English]

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. minister's comments, particularly as they relate to education. I want to tell him, as I begin my brief remarks, that in this Speech from the Throne there is certainly one thing that we can agree on, and that is the national tragedy relating to illiteracy and education.

It is almost inconceivable that in this country, one of the most developed countries of the world, 25 per cent of the adult population of this country is functionally illiterate. It is difficult to imagine how we got ourselves into this dilemma with respect to simple, basic, everyday functioning in society.

I want to wish the minister, the government and our country well in doing everything we possibly can to alleviate that problem.

I want to turn my attention, just for a few moments, to something else which is mentioned in the throne speech. I would ask the hon. minister to address the concept of the family. The hon. minister will know, if he has been listening to the members of his own caucus when they have been speaking in Question Period and even the odd question to ministers, that the subject of the family is of great concern.

There is one sentence in the throne speech about the family and I would like to quote it:

> In addition, my government will review its policies in relation to the family, the most fundamental building block of Canadian society.

There was a time when I would not have to ask the minister the following question, but I am going to ask it in any event. What is this government's definition of family? Is it what we have traditionally known to be the family or is it something else? Is this what the government is going to be looking at or reviewing in its review of its policies in relation to the family? That is the first question I would like to ask the minister.

The second question is if this government is in fact committed to the family, the minister, being the Minister of Immigration, knows of the tragedy of family reunification and of the long delays that thousands of people are suffering in this country by being unable to be reunited with their spouses. Will he take a fresh look at this problem and undertake on behalf of his government to speed the family reunification process?

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, concerning the first question, I will not attempt to enter into a debate today as to how a family should be defined. When this government states that we value family and its contribution to the national life of Canada, I can best describe the type of family that this government is talking about by just looking at Canadians where they live in family situations. These are the families that we are talking about.

I cannot tell my neighbour who might live in a family that is different from the one that his parents have taught him, that it is not a family because it is not nuclear, because it is not what families used to be.

As Canadian citizens, they do contribute to their communities. The government is committed because it values families for what they produce for communities, provinces and this country.

We only have to look at our own personal background. Where do these values come from? It is not that I want return to discussing the learning culture, but maybe families, for too long, have entrusted many family matters to the school system. Possibly we have been asking our teachers to act as parents, and this is not right. This is the proper role of the real family which my learned friend is talking about.

In the next few months, we will have the chance to discuss in Parliament and with Canadians the role of the family. We will see the programs that the government will bring forward to try to enhance family values in Canada.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize for interrupting you, but unless there is unanimous consent, I must inform you that I have shown tolerance and that the questions and comments period has already been exceeded by one minute.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Windsor—Lake St. Clair.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me point out that I am sharing time with my colleague, so I will be speaking for only 10 minutes.

I must say that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has managed a heroic mobilization of platitudes about education without responding in any significant degree to the problem at hand. He offers us another of these study papers, a consultation paper with respect to which he is going to consult with the people of Canada to find out on what basis they should consult on education.

It sounds to me as though we are going to have a Spicer commission on education, with equal productivity.

We should recall that the government offered us any number of discussion papers, fora, workshops and committees designed to improve Canada's situation with respect to research and development. This reminds me of the throne speech, which is the topic of the debate.

One of the notable omissions from that throne speech which cannot be missed by anyone is a complete omission of any reference to research and development, to any targets for research and development. That is a true test of this government's commitment to competitiveness and increased productivity, as I understand it.

In documents that the government has provided with respect to the report of the parliamentary committee on industry, science and technology, we see not only an abandonment of the target that was established for research and development and promised by the Prime Minister in 1983, but we see the absurd rationalization for the desertion of that goal and the response of government bureaucrats speaking in the name of the minister, which has to be read to be believed.

It says that a target of 2.5 per cent of GERD for Canada is a highly questionable proposition. It says that other nations that have achieved the target of 2.5 per cent of expenditures in proportion to the Gross Domestic Product are nations that spend a great deal on defence—ignoring Sweden, West Germany, now Germany, and Japan, none of which had the abundant investment in research and development of other competitors.

Nevertheless, they have achieved 2.5 per cent or more of Gross Domestic Product in expenditures on research and development.

We find that, in spite of a consensus among ministers of science and technology that there should be a goal of 2.5 per cent, it is the federal government that is resisting it. However, I would have to say in all seriousness and in all honesty that I am deeply concerned about the failure of Ontario to specifically marry itself to a goal with respect to involvement, and to achieve that goal which the federal New Democratic Party caucus certainly agrees this nation should achieve. The goal of 2.5 per cent, or any other goal, dictates that there must be a mechanism for achieving that goal. It dictates that there must be policies and action to achieve those goals. In all probability the rejection of the 2.5 per cent GERD by the federal government probably implies that this government has found itself incapable of achieving any goal that implies a mechanism, a policy, an action for its achievement.

When we look at the throne speech, which, like all throne speeches, is as full of platitudes as can be, we have to recognize that the goals set out there for education and training are at least a statement which could give this country profit if it is understood by this government that those goals, too, dictate that there must be a mechanism for their achievement.

We must doubt that those goals mean anything at all. The goals, as I said, are salutary; they would seek to ensure that every Canadian of 25 years of age, or 90 per cent of all Canadians reaching 25 years of age, will have achieved a high school education. It calls for the cutting in half of illiteracy in this country. It calls for quadrupling training in this country and for doubling the number of mathematicians, scientists and engineers in this country.

If one looks at the record of this government, how can any Canadian fail to receive these promises, these goals, with anything except doubt?

With respect to illiteracy, it has become well known that 25 per cent of our population is functionally illiterate, and the government's response to this has been a very cautious, tenuous, private, non-profit oriented volunteer approach to doing something about illiteracy, which has failed abjectly.

It talks about increasing the number of trainees, quadrupling them, in an attempt to catch up to the Americans, who have a rate double that of ours in industrial training, or Japan, which has four times the number of trainees in industry, or Germany, which has eight times. It would suggest to us that now we are going to have a target to at least come up to the level of Japan.

How are we to believe such goals? Only in the last budget $100 million was cut from the training programs that this government is supposed to be providing under the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

The most galling example of hypocrisy is when this government says that it would double the number of mathematicians, engineers and scientists, which implies that our universities must graduate more. And yet this is a government which, along with the Liberal government before it, has consistently cut back on transfer payments intended to support post-secondary education. Three and a half billion dollars cut from the Established Programs Financing as a result of this past budget. A total of $12 billion over the last decade has been cut from post-secondary education. Now we hear that we are going to double the number of graduates from the most expensive faculties in our universities.

How can anybody believe this government? How can anybody believe this government is serious when at the same time and in the same speech it rejects any mention of research and development? It is a shameful example of the typical hypocrisy that plagues this government.

I want to make note of the last interchange that occurred between the member for Scarborough and the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It had to do with family. The member for Scarborough rightfully expressed some concern about any omission of the question of family in any serious context within the throne speech.

In response to that, we had a good deal of moralizing on the part of the Minister of Employment and Immigration that provided no answer.

It is fundamental to understand that the nature of the family has changed in such a way that increasing numbers of our pre-school kids have not developed through the normal processes the skills of learning that are needed for success in elementary school and subsequently high school, university, and so on.

Life-long learning is going to have to admittedly extend through the lifetime of an individual, but it means it is also going to have to extend to an earlier period during the development of Canadians. Day care must be a part of the equation, and that was not mentioned in the throne speech at all. I do not mean day care as a place to put kids while parents work. I am talking about day care that will be a form of education that will provide those skills to kids who are about to enter school, a day care that will create for them a level playing field.

These are the kinds of policy initiatives that we need, not more discussion. Our party understands the jurisdictional aspects of education, but our party has also suggested that there should be created at the national level a council on education that will provide the resources, that can underscore the policy initiatives and curriculum changes and other techniques that are going to underlie any future marrying of education with economic goals.

That should be beyond the jurisdictional disputes and the dissension within this country, because our future is at stake, and this government seems to have failed to understand that.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his excellent speech, particularly on education. We know that he is a great doctor and a responsible person. We sat together on the Committee for Industry, Science and Technology.

I rise again today because the federal government wants to get involved into something that is beyond his jurisdiction. We all know, and we cannot overemphasize the fact that Quebecers will never accept any involvement on the part of the federal government in the field of education in Quebec. Education has been a strictly provincial matter since Confederation and Canadians have always wanted it that way. Canada has not helped Quebecers: Quebecers themselves have paid for their education and their training, and they want to continue to work and get appropriate training in order to be successful. This is very important, so important in fact that the commissions that were established recently in Quebec have again insisted on that issue.

The Bélanger–Campeau Commission proposed that Quebec maintain exclusive jurisdiction in the field of education in order to properly ensure its future. The Chamber of Commerce of Quebec City has asked the provincial government to assume exclusive responsibility in matters of education and manpower training. In recent months, the Government of Quebec has asked the federal government to take charge of the training of its manpower. This is total chaos! The federal government spends hundred of millions of dollars in Quebec for the training of workers, when it is well known that, in the majority of cases, this training is useless. It is useless because every week people come to my office and complain that they cannot get adequate training since it is already a provincial matter.

So, I would like to ask a short question to the hon. member that just finished his speech: Since the federal government is going to be even more involved in training, does he not think that this will exacerbate the existing conflict, especially between Quebec and Ottawa?

• (1630)

[English]

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I do not view education as another platform for national dispute. I am not here to argue about whether Quebec should have more influence, or Ontario should have more influence, or the federal government should have more influence in particular areas of education. This is not an area in which to carry out the constitutional fight. Our kids are not benefiting from it.

I do not dispute that education is and belongs within the jurisdiction of the provinces, just as in the United States education lies within the jurisdiction of the states. But we should have some national consensus, some national direction, and some national understanding that as a nation, not as provinces, we have to exist in this new economic world.

The jurisdictional separation of responsibility in the United States did not prevent a presidential commission on education, Carnegie Foundation's studies on education or any number of long-term initiatives on education to benefit the whole country without stepping on jurisdictional jealousies. I think Canada ought to be able to do the same thing, look to what we should accomplish as a nation in terms of national goals rather than see every issue as an issue on which to express our differences.

I am tired of it, and I think our kids are going to be tired of it when they grow up and find that their skills, their education, and their training were compromised because we were so busy talking about whose responsibility it was rather than finding what common responsibilities had to be met.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, there are many things in this throne speech which make the people of Canada question this government's commitment to the improvement of the quality of life for Canadians.

A considerable amount of time has been spent in the last few days considering the pros and cons of the plan of action as it was presented in the Speech from the Throne and on the main issues raised in this plan of action, important issues such as competition, unity, prosperity, education, and parliamentary reform.

However, I want to look at some of the things that were not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. The quality of a civilization is judged by its treatment of the elderly, the children, and those in need, the so-called underprivileged. We cannot in this modern world ignore the lame, the weak, and the hungry in other parts of the world while we take care of ourselves here at home.

In the Speech from the Throne the government has ignored its responsibility for the needs of the so-called Third World. In fact there is no mention of the hungry world. There is no mention of the need for development. There is no mention of our responsibility in these areas.

The speech came close to this issue once. It said:

> Last September, at the Children's Summit in New York, the attention of people everywhere was focused on children at risk. Seventy-one leaders pledged that that moment would last a decade.

Our Prime Minister promised a decade of assistance to children in need. That implied assistance to the world's children. However, the next line of this particular quotation from the Speech from the Throne indicated that the government was somewhat introverted in this particular area because it went on to say:

> My government will bring forward a plan to implement the commitments it made that day: the objectives to see Canadian girls and boys better educated, better protected and better nurtured so that they can make their own contributions to Canada's future.

In other words, even as we made a commitment to the world in this Speech from the Throne, we turned it back on ourselves. There was no suggestion that the Prime Minister would continue the leadership he indicated in that conference, that his promises at that time would be honoured.

In this speech there is no mention of how we will do our share in taking care of the world's destitute.

Along with the slashing of foreign aid spending in the February 25 budget by more than $5 billion over the next five years, this lack of mention in the Speech from the Throne indicates, or at least leaves the perception, that Canada is withdrawing from its involvement in humanitarian aid to those countries needing it most.

Right now is the time for Canada to be aggressive in our leadership in humanitarian aid, aggressive in our involvement with development of Third World countries.

Right now around the world, one billion people live in absolute poverty. One billion adults can neither read nor write. One hundred eighty million children suffer from malnutrition, that is Canada's population multiplied by about six. Three million children die each year from diseases against which they can be immunized. These are the year to year statistics.

Right now we have a special outstanding requirement in places like the Horn of Africa. In the Sudan, it is expected that 300,000 people will die of starvation in the next few weeks, even if immediate food aid is sent into that area. If that aid is delayed, the number of people who will die will increase proportionately to the days and weeks it is delayed.

In Ethiopia, the war situation has brought the food movement to a halt, temporarily we hope. Up to 7 million people are in danger.

In Somalia, there is a mass movement of millions because of food shortages. They are moving from one food shortage area to another. So little organization is available in that particular country that no one knows what can be done or what needs to be done.

I do not expect that Canada can jump in and solve all these situations, nor does the world expect Canada to do it. However, we should not ignore it or even seem to ignore it, which is what the Speech from the Throne does.

Granted there are many problems in the Third World, problems which seem to suggest that we are just wasting good money by giving aid. There is excessive spending in the military. There is wasteful public spending of other types. There are unnecessary projects which are taking a considerable amount of money. There is corruption.

There is abusive lending on the part of organizations such as the World Bank and the IMF, which are part of the donor structure. There is trade that undermines the production of the people and, in many cases, the health of the people.

The UN, in a report that was released just a few days ago, suggests that Africa, which has become the continent most in need of aid, receives more than $6 billion in so-called technical assistance. However, too much is spent on foreign experts and too little on building up local institutions and national consultants.

• (1640)

This aid does not reduce the need for humanitarian aid, nor does it mean that Canada should wait for these improvements. The starvation and death statistics will not go away without action. That action is expected of Canada and Canada has to take leadership and give continued aid. We cannot just ignore the problem.

The Speech from the Throne suggests massive increases in spending on education, and that is commendable. If it happens, it should be a continued policy of our government. The government's record of cutting assistance to education does not give us too much hope in that particular area.

However, it ignores the world's need for literacy training. In the Niger only 15 per cent of its adult population is literate, in the Sudan only 23 per cent of its population is literate. So, even as we hope for better education for Canadians, we cannot forget the rest of the world.

Why do I dwell on the Third World when the Speech from the Throne talks about what is happening in Canada? I talk about the Third World because, as we are told daily by this government, we are a global society. Our prosperity, a throne speech theme by the way, is dependent on our ability to be competitive in the world.

Sometimes it appears that this competitiveness must always be at the expense of some other country. I do not believe for a minute that we in Canada can be continuously prosperous while two-thirds of the world is having an increasingly difficult time feeding itself or is being forced into further destitution.

Canada must keep its humanitarian responsibilities before us at all times. We are falling further behind our commitment to spend .7 per cent of Canadian GNP and we need to make sure that world aid does have an impact on people. At present, 8.3 per cent of the total world aid is earmarked for people, the rest goes to trade development for the donor, projects which the donor thinks are worth while, and other areas of concern.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the very moving comments of my colleague. I certainly know that most of us share his concern that Canada has an international responsibility and that the situation of people, particularly in Africa, is just absolutely desperate.

This was brought home to me in the last two or three days when I met with a constituent visiting here who is quite desperate. He is a refugee from Somalia and is trying to get his family who are in Nairobi into Canada. The family consists of five children he and his wife, four children of a brother and sister-in-law who were murdered and two children of another sister who was murdered. That is 11 children he is trying to bring to Canada.

We have to work at both ends. We have to help people in their own situation first and foremost. Would he also agree that Canada needs to do much more in the area of practical help with respect to the UN Convention on Rights of the Child? We have to do a lot more to help children in particular.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I guess the point I am trying to make is exactly the point that my colleague is making. We in Canada can become very prosperous. We can, as the UNDP has indicated, be number one as far as human development is concerned. We must take our responsibility within the world, particularly the Third World, for human development. That means child development, health care and literacy. The time will come when we cannot continue to be prosperous if a larger proportion of the Third World, with a population growing considerably faster than our own, is not taken care of in its own way and allowed to develop.

At present, for instance, we work through organizations such as the World Bank and the IMF. They put in place structural adjustment which does more harm than good. We as Canadians can have a considerable amount of impact on how these organizations work in the Third World. We have not taken that opportunity.

Canada has not taken the opportunity to become an effective leader in the Third World aid structure. We do well. We assist a great many people, but we have not taken the leadership that needs to be taken.

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to inform the House that the rest of the government members will be speaking for 10 minutes, with 5 minutes for questions.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate in response to the Speech from the Throne and would like to divide my comments into two parts: the first dealing with the economic side of the Throne Speech and the second with constitutional renewal and the national unity question.

Canada has one of the highest standards of living in the world and a quality of life that is the envy of almost every nation. However there is no guarantee this prosperity will continue. Simply relying on things that have helped us succeed in the past will not be enough to improve our material welfare and quality of life in the future.

Therefore, I am pleased that the Speech from the Throne addressed the very important topic of restoring economic competitiveness to Canadian industry.

During the past four-week break from Parliament I spoke with some 60 company presidents and many of their employees in my riding. The message they all gave me was unanimous: Canadians must work more effectively together in a partnership of management and labour to meet Canada's competitive challenges over the next several years. We absolutely must become more productive and competitive.

Mr. Speaker, you will notice that I purposely left the government out of that bilateral partnership between management and labour, because the role of government is to set up a free and open economic environment, set ground rules for that competition and working environment, lay down the tax structure and rules for investment and then step aside and allow both labour and management to create economic wealth and prosperity.

Our budget of February 26 of this year reinforced our commitment to restore the economic health of this country. We have made considerable progress to date even though our efforts have been roundly opposed, ridiculed and condemned. Canadians have not taken kindly to suddenly being deprived of the many gifts and handouts of the irresponsible federal government of the Trudeau Liberal era from 1968 to 1984, during which time we saw the damaging fiscal policies that created a near bankrupt position.

Now, unfortunately, these same policies are about to be repeated by Ontario's NDP government. While Ontario will double its debt load in the next four years to a deficit which took 124 years to accumulate, we at the federal level are legislating a mandatory program of 3 per cent spending limits.

• (1650)

Second, we are establishing a debt servicing and reduction fund solely dedicated to offsetting the costs of the public debt. By law, net revenues from the GST and from privatization will flow into this fund.

With regard to enhanced competitiveness and productivity, we are making some progress since, for the first time in 16 years, we have been attracting more direct investment into Canada than has been going abroad.

In 1984, direct investment outflows were over $11 billion. Progressively and incrementally since 1984, investment outflows have grown smaller and smaller. Now we have turned it around.

Currently we are experiencing a positive direct investment inflow of approximately $500 million. Contrary to popular perceptions, according to Statistics Canada, exports from most industries to the United States since the implementation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement have risen.

For example, after two years of the 10-year phase-in period of the agreement, sectors such as food and beverages, rubber and plastics, textiles, clothing, furniture, transportation and electrical products have experienced increases in exports ranging from the low 20 per cent to as high as 67 per cent.

Now we are entering into discussions with the United States and Mexico regarding a North American free trade agreement. We did not ask for this. Mexico did, but there is no way that we could stand idly by while two other nations, our neighbours, negotiate such an agreement. We must participate in the talks if for no other reason than to protect our interests and the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Furthermore, this opportunity can be used for Canada's long-term gain in the larger North American free trade zone. I am convinced that this possibility will be beneficial to Canada in the long run, especially in the light of changing global trading realities.

As a representative of a manufacturing constituency in southwestern Ontario, the federal riding of Kitchener, I agree with the Simon Fraser University economist, Dr. Richard Lipsey, who has often appeared before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade on trade related matters, that we might consider a 20-year rather than a 10-year phase-in of the agreement for certain industrial and other sectors due to a variety of reasons and differences between Canada and Mexico that are not the case between Canada and the United States.

Before commenting on the second issue of national unity, I would like to add that I am pleased with the sentence in the throne speech which reads: "My government will review its policies in relation to the family, the most fundamental building block of Canadian society."

I hope that this will result in more favourable taxation treatment for the traditional family. I also hope that we will bring in provisions that will make it easier for younger families to acquire a home that they can actually enjoy.

I know that lower interest rates will help tremendously in this direction, but I think we also have to look creatively at other means which would assist that.

Further, I would like to see a tough pornography bill that would protect our children and women from degrading and disgusting violent forms of pornography, which are far too easily accessible in Canada today and which treat our children and women as things and not as human beings.

The second theme of the Speech from the Throne was Canadian unity.

Much has been attempted to ensure the unity and strengthening of our Confederation. Recently, the Meech Lake round almost succeeded where the constitutional amendments of the early 1980s had failed, that is including the province of Quebec as a signatory to these changes.

Presently, two commissions have tabled their studies in the province of Quebec. Additionally, the Beaudoin–Edwards study of Canada's amending formula and the Spicer Commission on Canadian values, attitudes and aspirations are to report by July 1.

Other provinces will soon be receiving their own constitutional studies. The Speech from the Throne announced the creation of another special joint parliamentary committee to bring together the recommendations of these many studies. It will also be given the mandate to meet with provincial legislators and aboriginal groups and to report back by February 1992.

As a result of these many studies and consultations, the federal government will propose its plan for a renewed Canada. Some have said "oh, no, not another committee." However, given the severity of the issue and the attitude of so many Canadians that Meech Lake was developed in secrecy, it is far better to err on the side of yet another open consultation than risk the loss of making real progress, thereby creating the misunderstanding and mistrust of earlier attempts.

It is my hope that when we discuss the issue of national unity, we do so in the spirit of tolerance, compromise and non-partisan debate.

We now need to state what a former president of the United States once said: "Ask not what your country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country." John Kennedy took those words from the French philosopher, Rousseau, who wrote: "As soon as any man says of the affairs of state, 'What does it matter to me?' that state may be given up as lost."

All Canadians must stop thinking pessimistically about Canada today and I would recommend that all would cease all talk of separation and all debate of "let them go" or "good riddance to them" because to me, a Canada without Quebec is no Canada at all.

Let us each dedicate ourselves as Canadians, and each of us as members of the only democratically elected, accountable and true constituent assembly of Canada, the House of Commons, to now work together in healing our great land to preserve its unity and strength for ourselves and our children.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to the member's observations about the fiscal policy being pursued by the Conservative government. He had some criticism directed toward the previous Liberal government which is consistent with what we hear from members of his party. It has now been almost seven years since the Conservative government took office and rather than standing up and accepting responsibility for the affairs of state, it is still talking about what happened eight, nine years ago, and is still blaming its predecessor for the ills of the country.

I find it really astonishing that members of that party would not stand up and accept the responsibility. I would like to draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that the former Minister of Finance in his first budget six years ago said that he would get the deficit down to $18 billion by the end of the decade. That is, presumably, by December 31, 1990.

In his last budget several months ago, the former Minister of Finance predicted a deficit of $30.5 billion for the fiscal year—I believe it is—ending March 31. He missed the mark by the small sum of some $12.5 billion and yet we have members like the one who just spoke, who have the nerve to stand up in this House and give us lectures about fiscal discipline.

I would ask the member to be a bit more humble when it comes to talking about the accomplishments of his government.

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, the member is saying that this government has now been in office approaching its seventh year and is asking when is it going to take responsibility for some of what it is doing.

• (1700)

We are pleased to take responsibility for our actions. We have turned around a generation of going in the wrong direction, and you cannot do that overnight. We have brought in some very significant changes.

The members in the Liberal Party like to suggest that we have doubled the national debt. What they forget to say is that in our first three years of operation, we took the national accounts of all the revenues received that go out for programs spending, and we took a deficit of $16 billion and we moved it to $8 billion, then to $2 billion, and for the last four years we have been operating on a surplus. Were it not for interest and compound interest on the national debt left to us by the party of the member who asked the question, we would now have a surplus, we would have balanced budgets.

What the hon. member is ignoring is that for the last four years of the seven, this government has not added one single penny to the national debt; all that has been happening is compound interest on the national debt.

The hon. member made his point and said he would like a little humility from us. It is taking longer than we had hoped, that is true, but the severity of the problem that was left to us in the compound interest factor is huge and immense and we are working at that.

Look at the legacy of spending in the previous 16 years that created this question compared to the legacy of spending now for the past seven years. Look at the average spending of over 10 per cent in the previous 10 years, compared to the now 3.7. We are now bringing in a legislated ceiling of 3 per cent on spending. We are coming to grips with the issue. We are making some success, and if we can continue in the direction we are heading we can see the end of the problem. Should they ever come back, we would see a bankrupt nation.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): It gives me great pleasure to take part in this debate. This Speech from the Throne touches on several of the priorities that the government has identified for the upcoming session. I believe that this Speech from the Throne identifies many of the priorities on the agenda of Canadians.

What are these issues that Canadians have identified? Canadians are interested in the future of Canada; they are interested in the future that they are going to build for themselves and for their children. They want to know about jobs; they want to know that the government has a definite plan to address the economic problems that block the paths to prosperity.

Canadians know that this government has this plan. For too long they have seen spendthrift governments borrow from our children's future to pay for questionable excesses. That changed in 1984. Although the ability of this government to serve Canadians has been limited by the burden of debt left to us by the previous government, the last budget has shown us that there is light at the end of the debt tunnel.

Canadians signalled their desire for change in 1984 and they reaffirmed that desire in 1988. The reason for this is simple: Canada was in a mess that would only get worse unless a measure of reason could be restored to the way the government operated.

We have gone far to restore that reason, and this Speech from the Throne indicates that we are willing and able to go the distance in providing Canadians with the kind of government that they need and want.

The over-all message that comes from this Speech from the Throne is that it is time for us, for all Canadians, to re-examine our attitudes. Before we can see ourselves reflected in the Constitution, we must know who we are; we need to know more about our history. It is time to search our souls and it is time for us to learn about ourselves and to rediscover the real priorities in life.

I am encouraged by the government's reaffirmation that the family is the most fundamental building block of Canadian society.

This is a very significant approach to the troubles facing Canada today. A strong sense of family leads to a strong sense of self. This strong sense of self brings with it the confidence and initiative that results in a productive and prosperous society, a society free from insecurity.

For too long Canada has suffered from insecurity. We have been without the focus and the sense of purpose that comes from a sound knowledge of self. I believe that if we can strengthen the family, we will strengthen society.

In reviewing its policies toward the family, I believe that it is necessary to restore fairness to the taxation system so that Canadians who choose to be a traditional family are not disadvantaged.

The Department of Finance will have to look closely at the existing system and find ways to provide fairness for all Canadians, including traditional families.

The government has indicated that it will be bringing forward initiatives to ensure the protection of children within our society. One of the many ways that the government can do this is by strengthening the family unit.

Before I continue, I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces. We have just seen the Canadian Armed Forces participate in a world effort to settle the crisis in the Persian Gulf. This participation is cause for great pride. Canada's role in the crisis has drawn Canadians together. It has been a unifying force. Canada has been, and continues to be, well served by the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces.

In my riding of Fraser Valley East we have Canadian Forces Base Chilliwack. This is the only Canadian Forces Base on mainland British Columbia. It is the proud home of the 1st Combat Engineer Regiment. A major portion of the 1st Combat Engineer Regiment is now on duty in Kuwait doing demolition work, clearing mine fields. These some 300 Canadians are proving with their actions that the training that occurs at the engineering school at CFB Chilliwack is invaluable.

CFB Chilliwack is more than just the home of the 1st Combat Engineer Regiment. There is the school of military engineering and there is also the officer's candidate training school. CFB Chilliwack is also the logistic centre for the militia in mainland British Columbia. It is the only base in Canada where the heavy equipment training can go on year round. It is minutes from secluded and isolated training areas and minutes from urban areas.

British Columbia is a unique part of Canada and CFB Chilliwack is a unique Canadian institution. Without CFB Chilliwack, B.C. would be without a Canadian Armed Forces presence on the mainland. An Armed forces presence is essential. It is essential to note that there are a number of federal correctional institutions within a 30-minute radius of CFB Chilliwack.

During the Matsqui Institute riots in 1970, the forces were called upon to provide assistance and restore order. The significance of this resource should not escape us.

Disaster preparedness is also a consideration, especially considering the geography of B.C.

We, in B.C. and in the Fraser Valley, are well aware of the important role that CFB Chilliwack plays. The base is a unifying element. Rumours that the base may be closed have caused us great concern. After the remarkable role the Canadian forces played and continue to play in the Persian Gulf, and bearing in mind the pride that Canadians felt because of that participation, a very unifying pride I might add, I say let us keep our priorities straight.

CFB Chilliwack is an integral part of the Canadian Armed Forces and an integral part of the community. It is the forces' presence on the mainland in British Columbia and is not a base that can be considered eligible for closing. In 1992 Canada celebrates its 125th birthday; Montreal celebrates its 400th; Matsqui, its 100th birthday. CFB Chilliwack will celebrate its 50th anniversary. I hope that we will be able to mark the four celebrations together.

The Speech from the Throne mentions that we must proceed with caution as we enter into a new stage of constitutional building. What we must do is change our attitude as a society. In addition to strengthening the family unit, we must look at our relationship to the institutions of government. We hear a great deal about rights, but we do not hear a lot about responsibilities.

• (1710)

In congratulating new Canadians upon receiving citizenship, I often take a moment to remind them that with the rights and privileges of Canadian citizenship come many responsibilities. I tell them that Canada has become the great country that it is because people have recognized that as citizens they have a responsibility to take part and become involved in our society. As citizens, we define what Canadian society is.

A country like Canada is always changing. It is like a person who is growing up and going through a maturing process. All Canadian citizens, whether they are born here or choose to come here, help Canada to mature and grow. For Canada to be the best that it can possibly be, everyone must take part and contribute. This is the responsibility. This is the flip side to the rights and privileges.

We must remember our heritage, but we cannot be limited by that heritage. When we share our personal heritage and culture with each other, we create a better society. When we build barriers, we miss out on the benefits of sharing. Instead, we see ignorance and hostility. It is this ignorance and hostility that leads to disunity and talk of separation. This causes me great concern.

My parents were born in Shawville, Quebec. They homesteaded in southern Saskatchewan and farmed there for some 60-odd years. I grew up on the prairies and having moved to British Columbia, chose to raise my family there. I am proud to be a Canadian and have my roots throughout the country. I am proud to share my heritage with other Canadians who come from other parts of the country and who have come from other parts of the world.

The energy and resources that we expend trying to convince ourselves that we have a country worth having is astounding. I look around me and see what we have in Canada and can only shake my head in wonder. We are the envy of the world.

Yet, the problem of disunity in this country is very serious. If we can once get beyond this issue, we can raise the level of debate in this country and can raise the standard of living. We can re-channel the enormous resources now spent on trying to solve our problems toward creating a better standard of living for our children. Now is the time to act, and we must. We cannot listen to the voices that represent only parts of our country, the voices that would have this country torn apart, the voices that would build barriers to understanding. Instead of encouraging Canadians from all parts of Canada to get to know one another, these parties would have us turn our backs and create new solitudes.

I am encouraged by the Speech from the Throne. The government is committed to unifying the country. By strengthening the family, the fundamental building block of society, the government will ensure that Canada will enter the 21st century in sound shape. These are important times in the life of our nation. It gives me great peace of mind to know that the government in power is choosing a wise path.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, when the premier of British Columbia met recently with the Prime Minister, she accused the Prime Minister and his government of treating B.C. unfairly.

The Prime Minister responded by promising a list which, to the best of my knowledge, has not yet materialized.

If CFB Chilliwack is closed, has the member given any thought to what the cost of this one more blow by the federal government to British Columbia would be? Does the federal government have any plans to try to even things up a bit for British Columbia?

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member from British Columbia for that very pertinent question which is on a great many minds in British Columbia.

I might say to the hon. member that a letter has gone forth to the premier. I have just seen it. It is quite an extensive list. I will do my best to get a copy of the letter for the hon. member opposite so that he can see the information that has been sent to the province.

He mentioned CFB Chilliwack. My greatest concern is that the logistics centre for the militia in British Columbia is centred at CFB Chilliwack. When we have our cadet training in the summertime at Vernon, it all emanates from Chilliwack. When we have training that takes place in the Cariboo, which took place last weekend, it emanates out of Chilliwack. When we need a quick response to any disorder requiring the assistance of our law enforcement agencies, it is CFB Chilliwack that is called upon. Yet if that facility were not there, I shudder to think what might happen had we the same problem that broke out in Matsqui a few years back. The hon. member opposite will remember that time. It was a very serious incident. We were concerned about the lives that could have been lost if it had continued. The forces were there. They were able to come to the area. There was no danger to the communities surrounding the institution at the time when the inmates were running rampant.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. There are two minutes left. The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member how he could possibly expect the Prime Minister's latest brainstorm, and I am referring to interference by the Canadian government in a matter of provincial jurisdiction—education and manpower training—could help reunite two countries whose respective visions of themselves are so different, and I am referring to Quebec and Canada?

[English]

Mr. Belsher: I think I heard the hon. member talk about two countries. The last time I checked in my Atlas there was only one country, and the hon. member comes from one of the 10 provinces that is part of the Confederation. I really take great exception to his calling the province that he comes from another country.

The problem is that we have people who are trying to tear our country apart but are not willing to turn around and talk about keeping our country together.

What we have said in the Speech from the Throne is that we have too high a dropout rate before the young people graduate from high school. We are endeavouring in co-operation with the provinces to see if we can cut in half the dropout rate in the provincial school system.

Yes, the provinces under the auspices of Confederation are responsible for the school system, and so they should be. We are not trying to change that. We are working with them, putting our heads together, and making sure that we do not have this tremendous dropout rate which results in Canada being the loser. This is what we are endeavouring to accomplish, and what we are talking about in the Speech from the Throne.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Longueuil.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the Speech from the Throne, and we in the Bloc Quebecois, especially, realized that the emphasis was on the fact that Canadian unity was the only way to strengthen the Canadian economy or save Canada. They say that without Canadian unity, we won't be able to save this country, we will not make any progress, we will not develop, and they even go so far as to include education.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that Canada has been united for at least 20 or 30 years and things are not bad. However, in the process we have managed to go into debt to the tune of $20 to $30 billion annually. That is the only way this country has been united.

So far, as everybody is aware, and especially members of this House, Canada is facing a deficit of $400 billion. To those who may not realize what this means, $400 billion means $400,000 million dollars. Every year, nearly 30 per cent of our income tax and other taxes are used to pay off the interest on the debt alone. A few years from now, this figure will be 50 per cent. As for me, I do not think that the Canadian unity has been well served until now.

An hon. member: You are right.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): The big problem that we are dealing with exists primarily because the union that was seeked, namely the union between Lower and Upper Canada, has become a centralized federalism. At the same time, the provinces and the central government were given powers, thereby setting the stage for regular confrontations. Every day, there is confrontation between the provinces.

At the federal level, members want more and more powers in order to be able to spend more and give theats to the population. This is not necessarily logical; it is not necessarily adequate, but they are only interested in being able to give to the population, in order to win votes. That happens at the federal level.

It is the same with the provinces. In Quebec, for instance they want to regain certain powers in order to be able to give out more money, and to show the population that they have something to offer. That is what brings on confrontation. That is why having 11 jurisdictions in this country is leading us towards catastrophe and bankruptcy. It is essential to decentralize and, we think, go all the way to sovereignty, because in the Meech Lake Accord, Quebec wanted a little more power to function smoothly, just a little bit more power to build a successful society. But no, these minimal requests were rejected. So, Mr. Speaker, what then could do the members of Parliament that were here to defend Quebec's interests in Ottawa? We had no choice but to resign and form the Bloc Quebecois, as we have done, in order to defend the interests of Quebecers with dignity.

This cannot be done if one belongs to a so-called national party, because when you belong to a so-called national Canadian party, it is impossible to protect the interests of Quebec, since you always have to take into account whether you are likely to win or lose votes in Ontario or in the East.

On the other hand, when we ask questions in the name of Quebec, when we defend the interests of Quebec, those interests are strictly the interests of that province. We are not the least concerned about whether we are going to lose votes in East or in the West.

That is why we can look after the interests of Quebec with dignity. That is also why I ask the Prime Minister of Canada to resign—

An hon. member: Right now.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): —to call an election as soon as possible so that Quebecers can at long last elect members of Parliament who are worthy of them. That is what Quebecers need now.

It is absolutely unacceptable to see our members not using their powers the way they should to defend Quebec's interests.

What I am trying to say is that the Canadian economy cannot function in the present situation. It is now essentiel to decentralize government and even to proclaim Quebec's sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker, I will use the minutes that I have left to say a few words on education. I think it is absolutely scandalous for the federal government to interfere with education in Quebec. I just cannot understand such arrogance. And this after several studies were made in Quebec, including the Bélanger-Campeau Report, the Allaire Report from the Quebec Liberal Party, and the Quebec government has claimed exclusive jurisdiction in matters of education. The Quebec Chamber of commerce also asks for exclusive jurisdiction in matters of education. Even federalists like the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel have asked and stated that the Quebec governement should have exclusive jurisdiction over education matters.

Thus I cannot understand that conservative members from Quebec who hold the power—I was told that they will vote against the amendment to the amendment and I hope I am mistaken—may vote tonight against our proposition to the effect that the federal government withdraw completely from the area of education. We are told that the conservative members who are in power and must represent the interests of Quebec citizens will vote against our amendment to the amendment.

An hon. member: Shame!

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): That is utterly unaceptable. I cannot understand what goes through their heads. That is why I repeat again that if they deem themselves worthy of representing Quebecers they will stand and vote against this government.

I hope that you will do it. It is very nice to look after one's personal interests to get a litte reward from the Prime Minister, whether it is the job of minister, or parliamentary secretary or committee chairman, but instead of looking after their own personal interests, they should rise, this evening, and vote in favour of our sub-amendment.

It is totally unacceptable and it is really beyond me, as a Quebecer, that a member who claims to look after the interests of Quebec in Ottawa would vote against that proposal.

An hon. member: They have no guts.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): This does not make sense! I cannot find the words and perhaps I would get carried away—

Mr. Rocheleau: It is a shame!

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Yes, it is a shame.

So, Mr. Speaker, I have a few minutes left to tell you once again that the government is trying to fool us by saying that the economy or the national unity will help us proper. By getting involved in the field of education, the federal government will primarily favour confrontation, inefficiency, and total chaos in the field of education and manpower training and development. It is a well-known fact that Quebecers are number one in Canada as regards education; moreover, the Government of Quebec has asked to develop his own professional training programs and, lastly, our school boards and the Government of Quebec, who are responsible for training, should also assume total responsibility for professional training and development. Mr. Speaker, I thank you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments period. The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question and make a comment.

I would like to start with my comment. The question will be very easy, will it not? Mr. Speaker, I want to say—and I do not have to quote any newspaper like the hon. member on the other side says—that when the hon. member for Longueuil stated that we were only starting to look after the interests of Quebecers in Ottawa, I was reminded of the fact that before he joined the ranks of the Bloc Quebecois, the hon. member was travelling a lot all over the world. He was not often here in Ottawa—He may have often tried to speak, but he would not do it for long—

Mr. Speaker, I am not at all uncomfortable when I hear the members from the other side; it is just a game for them and I am quite willing to compare his achievements—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

It being 5.30 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 50(5), to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the sub-amendment and the amendment.

[English]

The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

PEACEKEEPING

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on May 21 and 22, 25 MPs and experts from 15 countries sponsored by Parliamentarians for Global Action met in Ottawa to develop a new approach to peacekeeping.

During the recent Iraq-Kuwait war there was much talk about a new world order. That war also taught us that the existing approach to peacekeeping was no longer adequate. It is mostly ad hoc, reactive, slow and underfinanced. In the case of the Iraq war, the force was overwhelmingly American and not under UN command.

What is needed is an early warning process that will provide for preventive peacekeeping. Under such a process there would be standing UN peacekeeping forces stationed in the different regions of the world which would be sent to trouble spots to deter and repel aggression such as that of Iraq against Kuwait.

It is easier and less costly to prevent the occupation of a country than to evict an aggressor once an occupation has taken place.

I ask the government and this House to take these proposals seriously and make the slogan "a new world order" a meaningful reality.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I hope that Canadians who say they want to separate and other Canadians who say "let them go" realize that a divided Canada will mean a lower standard of living for all of us.

Each portion of a fractured Canada would of course assume its own share of our national debt. But each portion would also have a much more narrow economic base. That would reduce our attractiveness to the lenders who finance our debt and result in higher borrowing costs, higher taxes and less government services for all of us.

In addition, Ontario and Quebec with economies that are so closely linked by massive two-way trade would be especially hard hit if the free movement of goods and services was in any way restricted.

Perhaps some Canadians think that a lower standard of living would be worth it, but I am not one of them.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the public works minister has turned the environmental review of the fixed link bridge across the Northumberland Strait into a farce.

Even though in 1990 the Environmental Assessment and Review Process said no, the minister's announcement that his department has invited three companies to submit proposals for the project means that the government is serious about going ahead.

As Minister of Public Works the minister had the responsibility to carry out an objective environmental review. But also as minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency he publicly lobbied for the project, thereby flying in the face of EARP.

The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency's annual report classed the proposed fixed link crossing between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island as one of the new opportunities expected to benefit Atlantic Canadians and stated: "A favourable decision on construction of the fixed link is expected to enhance economic growth in the future".

The facts reveal that 700 jobs will be lost, major destruction of the fishery and environment, and in fact this megaproject will only benefit Conservative cronies.

The minister has made a sham of this Environmental Assessment and Review Process.

EDUCATION AND JOB TRAINING

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative and Liberal members from Quebec, especially the francophones, have every reason to be embarassed today. Indeed, the headline in the papers read: "Five Liberal MPs are hiding behind the curtains."

An hon. member: Shame!

Mr. Rocheleau: It is nothing but the truth. Instead of protecting Quebec best interests in the fields of education and job training which are threatened, they are hiding behind the curtains. Some give as an excuse that they were late. Others denied the fact arguing that they agreed with the Bloc Quebecois motion to ask the federal government not to interfere in Quebec's exclusive jurisdiction in these fields.

If they were committed to supporting Quebec, they would not be hiding behind curtains nor would they arrive late for such an important vote. Quebec Conservative and Liberal members will certainly be severely criticized for this lack of respect, to say the least, toward Quebec. As I told them yesterday, Mr. Speaker: "They should be ashamed."

EDUCATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the conservative government knows that education is a provincial jurisdiction by virtue of the Constitution and respects that.

This government spends directly or indirectly some $11 billion a year on education and training.

I would not want to be in the shoes of the Bloc Quebecois member who would try to take away the Canada Scholarships the students have earned this year in Abitibi. I would not want to be in the shoes of the Bloc Quebecois member who would come and try to abolish the job training programs, the Challenge program and the dropout programs in Abitibi.

Mr. Speaker, rest assured that Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa and the Minister of Education Michel Pagé will see to it that the province's jurisdiction as regards education is fully respected.

[English]

EDUCATION

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this government's attempt to make up for its lack of commitment to education by talking about national objectives and standards in last week's throne speech is nothing less than a charade.

Due to the government's cutbacks and the federal commitment to the provinces for education, the University of Prince Edward Island announced last week that tuition fees would need to increase by 15 per cent. This could cost students $280 more a year.

Here we have a federal government that has not increased the maximum student loan allowed since it came to office in 1984; a government that has imposed a tax on books, learning materials, further burdening students with more costs; a government that has implemented a 3 per cent administration fee on student loans, which is nothing less than a tax on the most needy students in our country.

Actions speak louder than words. We have had seven years of words. So when are we going to see some action on the part of the federal government to improve the accessibility and quality of our nation's education system?

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the Port of Halifax is facing the possibility of losing a considerable part of its container traffic because rail costs from Halifax to central Canada are prohibitive.

This loss will result in substantially reduced rail traffic from Atlantic Canada to central Canada and could in fact jeopardize the viability of the entire rail link to Atlantic Canada. The final result could be a devastating blow to an economy already lagging behind the rest of the country.

Under section 3 (1) (d) of the National Transportation Act, the act states:

> Transportation is recognized as a key to regional economic development and commercial viability of transportation links.

Under this act it appears the National Transportation Authority can instruct CN to provide competitive and quality transportation to the Atlantic region.

I urge the Minister of Transport to bring the NTA into this urgent situation and act quickly to resolve this important issue.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the ongoing difficulties the Canadian public and economy are having with the GST illustrates how out of step the government is with this country.

Last year the Prime Minister promised: "They're not going to pay a nickel more, not a nickel more" with the GST.

Yesterday The Financial Post announced: "Ottawa goofed on GST prices". The Toronto Star blamed the tax load for cross-border drain. And a survey conducted by the Consumers' Association of Canada found that close to 75 per cent of consumer items experienced a rise in cost thanks to the GST.

Moreover, revenue officials are reported to be stating that "the amount being collected by the GST far exceeds expectations". According to The Toronto Star "the GST collects billions of dollars more this year than the $24 billion expected".

Remember, the GST was supposed to replace only the MST revenue of $18.5 billion. But a 7 per cent GST on national goods and services valued at $410 billion annually will produce $28.7 billion, a full $10 billion more than the government claims.

Can the public be blamed for dismissing the Prime Minister's claims as nothing more than political puffery, totally divorced from reality?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, many allegations have been made that former Greek resistance fighters have used fraudulent documents to support their claims for the war veterans allowance.

I would like to acknowledge that action has been taken by our government in the following manner. As soon as the Minister of Veterans Affairs was informed that fraudulent documents might have been used by former Greek resistance fighters, the minister immediately asked the RCMP to conduct an investigation which is still under way.

• (1410)

In July 1990, when the RCMP provided proof that certain documentation was fraudulent, a new process was put in place to ensure that all new applications be verified by the Government of Greece. The department has also initiated a review of existing cases in pay.

To date, the Government of Greece has found a small number of applications to be fraudulent. In cases where these people have received money, the department has ceased payment and is acting to recover past payments.

WOMEN AND THE LAW

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the study by the Manitoba Association of Women and the Law on gender equality in the courts of criminal law is disturbing.

The report addresses the areas of wife abuse, sexual assault, incest and child sexual assault from the victim's perspective.

It shows that stereotypical assumptions about women including the myth of non-violent sexual assault and the concept that "no" from a woman may mean "yes" or "maybe" still play an important role in judicial decision making. We remember the recent decision of Judge Hood from British Columbia.

There is evidence that many women choose not to report sexual assault and wife and child abuse because they feel the system will not treat them fairly. This is terrible.

There is a conference coming up in Vancouver on Women and the Law that will be useful. But, more than conferences, I call upon the government and the Minister of Justice to implement some of this report's recommendations, including the establishment of a national task force on gender equality, improved training of judges and lawyers, and the appointment of more women judges to the bench.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak on behalf of my constituents in Beauséjour.

In these times of economic uncertainty, the people of Beauséjour face all kinds of problems, but unemployment is the problem I want to discuss more particularly here in the House today. No steps have been taken yet to remedy the situation facing the unemployed in Westmorland. The rural residents of Westmorland have to live with an artificially low unemployment rate.

[English]

Under the present circumstances, the rate of unemployment for rural Westmorland and the city of Moncton is 10 per cent. But realistically the rate of unemployment of Westmorland should be comparable to that of Kent county, which is 16.4 per cent.

The people of Westmorland have the same lifestyle and work conditions as those in Kent, but they must work for a longer period of time to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits.

It is time for this government to stop this injustice and to change the unemployment insurance regions in my constituency of Beauséjour so that all the unemployed people of rural southeast New Brunswick are treated in exactly the same way.

INCOME TAX

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, considering the government's undertaking in the last Speech from the Throne that it would review its policies in relation to the family, I would like to remind my government that improvements are urgently needed to correct the present situation. In fact, there are a number of major flaws in our taxation system.

Mr. Speaker, is it normal for a married couple with two children, where each spouse earns $17,500—a total family income of $35,000—to pay $852 more in income tax than a couple living common law, whose income and family situation are otherwise identical?

Is it normal to allow a married couple a deduction of $399 for a dependent child, when a couple that has decided to live common law can claim $5,141 for that child?

Is it normal for a man who is separated to be able to deduct from his income, as alimony paid to his ex-spouse, the total amount of living expenses of his dependent children, while the woman has to declare this as additional income on her income tax form?

Briefly, although the taxation system has evolved in terms of the changes that have taken place in the family structure over the years, the rules governing tax allowances have become inconsistent. The result is a system that is unwieldy, inefficient and unfair, and it should be reviewed and amended as soon as possible.

THE LATE RAJIV GANDHI

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the senseless and brutal slaying of Mr. Rajiv Gandhi emphasizes once again the benefits of living in our country.

We are going through a period of protracted discussion and negotiation about the constitutional concerns of Canadians.

Feelings are running high. As a group politicians are being condemned, but our greatest concern is that we might be harshly criticized in the media.

Our hearts and prayers go out to the people of India, and especially the family of Mr. Gandhi. At the same time we should offer a prayer of thanks for the privilege of living in Canada and serving in a tolerant, open, caring society where violence is not acceptable as a means to achieve political ends.

NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the sun is shining in Ottawa as we begin Fitweek across Canada.

The warm weather also indicates that summer is coming and Canadians are beginning to think about vacations.

I would like to let all members in on a little secret. Indeed I will share it with all Canadians. The best place to spend part of your summer is on the beautiful south coast of Nova Scotia. Nowhere is there a more beautiful coast line or more beautiful beaches. Nowhere is the hospitality warmer or more friendly.

If you want the tranquillity of lakes and forests, a touch of Canada's history, hospitable accommodation or the best seafood in Canada, not to mention blue, sunny skies, come to Nova Scotia this summer.

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. Today, the U.S. Congress is expected to give its approval for facilitating free trade negotiations between the United States, Canada and Mexico. President Bush already advised members of Congress of his objectives several weeks ago, clearly explaining what would and would not be included in the negotiations. I therefore want to ask the minister: When is he going to do what President Bush did? When will he advise the members of this House and the Canadian people of his government's clear and specific objectives for these very important negotiations?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations we hope will be commencing shortly on the North American free trade agreement which will involve, we expect and hope, an opening up of the Mexican market to Canadian exporters.

We expect also that there will be an element of the free trade agreement which will involve an opening up of investment possibilities between Canada and Mexico.

I have made it very clear that the question of cultural industries is not one that we are prepared to negotiate. We believe the position we took in the free trade agreement with the United States is one that we should continue in these negotiations.

Some hon. members: Wrong.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Colleagues opposite say: "Wrong". I would suggest that they check with their leader before they comment in that regard.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before President Bush can even begin fast track negotiations with Mexico, he has to get the approval not only of the committees of the Congress, but of Congress itself.

That process gave the American people a chance to express their concerns. When will the government give the Canadian people the same opportunity and agree to public hearings on these very important negotiations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have made a speech in this regard and I am prepared to appear before a committee.

I have had some preliminary discussions with the chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade. We are also going to be following the same process of very open and ongoing consultations with people in the private sector, both business and labour.

We are also going to be having extensive consultations with the provinces so that they will be totally aware of the positions that we take in the free trade agreement negotiations, as well as be able to give us their advice, their guidance and their judgment as to positions we should be taking in relation to their own interests as provinces.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in order to win support in Congress for these negotiations with Mexico, President Bush promised to bring in adjustment programs for American workers who will lose their jobs because of the trilateral trade agreement.

I ask the minister: What about Canadian workers? When will we see a commitment by this government, the government of the Canadian people, for a program of adjustment for the Canadian workers who will lose their jobs because of these negotiations?

• (1420)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend opposite jumps to the conclusion that free trade results in lost jobs. I question that because in the last 45 years, as tariff barriers and non-tariff barriers have been falling, we have seen a continuation of growth in jobs from trade. Trade has grown from about 15 per cent of our economy to 30 per cent of our economy and has provided jobs for over three million Canadians. The automatic knee-jerk response of my colleague opposite simply is not borne out by the facts.

He asks what our position has been on adjustment for workers who lose their jobs. We have far better adjustment programs than the United States has.

Some hon. members: Where?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I do not know where this party has been if they do not know what we have in place. We have brought in the Canadian Jobs Strategy and other training programs. Since 1984, when the federal government had practically no training programs under the administration of the previous government, today with changes to the Canadian Jobs Strategy, the unemployment insurance program, we have $2.2 million worth of moneys going into training programs. That I believe is far greater on a per capita basis—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Etobicoke North.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. One crucial aspect of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, a clear definition of subsidies, is still outstanding. The government knows that the free trade agreement will necessarily be reopened in the negotiations with Mexico.

What does the government intend to do with regard to Canadian subsidies, whether to agriculture or to manufacturing, when the United States will demand that all subsidies, whether Mexican or Canadian, be on the table?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend forgets about the subsidies that the United States has. These are subject to scrutiny as well.

My friend also is aware of the extensive discussions that have been going on in the multilateral trade negotiations. Our approach as a government has been to participate actively and aggressively in those discussions to ensure that we can have a broad agreement on what constitutes a subsidy and on what basis countervailing duties might be appropriate. Those multilateral discussions are still under way. Once those are completed then I expect we will be able to tie down the agreement with the United States in a way that is consistent with the multilateral negotiations.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that the chances of the Uruguay round being completed prior to the beginning of the negotiation of the Mexico agreement is non-existent. The negotiations of subsidies will be in the Mexican agreement. The minister knows that.

Also the minister knows that Mexico has said that its constitution does not permit it to negotiate on energy or transport. On the other hand, Canada agreed to the inclusion of energy and transport in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Will the minister now tell the Canadian people how such sectors can be excluded in the discussions with Mexico and included in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, transportation was not a part of the discussions with the United States at the request of the United States. Energy was included in those discussions because we wanted to have access to the United States market—

Mr. Chrétien: We had access.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He is saying we had access. The whole point, Mr. Speaker, is that the access was being interrupted by non-tariff barriers which we wanted to avoid through the free trade agreement with the United States. That is precisely the reason why we included energy in the free trade agreement with the United States. It is on that basis that we would continue to have discussions as far as Mexico is concerned.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Consumers' Association of Manitoba has just released a six province check of prices after the GST. Frankly, their conclusion is brutal. Of the 50 items surveyed, 36 cost more than the government had estimated. Only 14 items cost less.

Will the minister admit that this government has hoodwinked Canadians on the GST. Will he admit that in fact the economic damage to this economy is much greater from the GST than its estimates suggested?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the statement made by the Consumers Association of Canada, which said:

> The CAC believes Canadian consumers deserve a full and comprehensive quantitative study on the impacts of GST on prices in the Canadian marketplace.

I agree with that statement.

What we have here is an incomplete, erroneous study. It is very difficult to do a study with any degree of accuracy with a tax system that has not been maturely put in place. It is going to take some time before all the benefits of the GST flow through ultimately to the consumer. That has not been taken into consideration.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the details in this report are quite clear. Things like a wallet, which most Canadians can understand, includes a percentage change of 17 per cent increase, compared to the government's estimate of .8 per cent increase. I could go through detail after detail to demonstrate that, in fact, according to something which comes from a neutral party, the Consumers' Association of Manitoba, has found that across this country in case after case, the government's estimates were simply incorrect.

Despite that, what we also find is that business people are starting to talk publicly, saying that government officials have told them that GST revenues far exceed what was expected so far.

In view of this, will the minister give back this extra tax grab? Will he give tax cuts to the lower and middle-income Canadians who have paid for this tax bonanza which these figures demonstrate?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the news release that was issued yesterday by the Consumers Association of Canada, they have dissociated themselves from this particular report. I quote:

> This has not been released as an official study of the Consumers' Association of Canada at the present time.

We have not made any projections with respect to specific price increases or decreases. What the government said, and we stand by this, was the fact that we anticipated a one-time rise in the consumer price index of roughly 1.25 percentage points and we stand by that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex—Windsor, a short supplemental.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I simply make the point that the document is here. It has been released by the Saskatchewan and Manitoba consumers associations.

[Translation]

Once again, Statistics Canada tells us that our ecoomic problems are continuing: retail sales dropped in March. The recession goes on, and what is the government going to do about it? How is the government going to respond to the needs of unemployed Canadians across this country?

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, while it is true there was a reduction in consumer demand in the month of March by some 1.3 percentage points, it is considerably less than the reduction in demand in the months of February which was 2.1 per cent and January which was 4.1 per cent. It is less on a month-to-month basis.

Instead of the gloom and doom the hon. member is advocating, we have in the month of April some positive indicators such as the improvement in business confidence, the improvement in housing starts, the improvement in housing resales, the employment improvements and the 5 percentage point reduction in interest rates. The prime rate in Canada today is 9.75 per cent and in the United States it is 8.5 per cent; that is a 1.25 per cent spread so we are making progress.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week U.S. trade negotiator Hills repeated that the United States will demand that the Canadian government drop all protection for Canadian cultural industries in the forthcoming free trade negotiations with Mexico.

We have heard the Minister for International Trade say that this is not so, yet the Americans have cited, in particular, the federal postal rates that benefit Canadian publications and the limits on foreign ownership for broadcasting and publishing.

My question is for the Minister of Communications. When will the government tell the Americans that these policies will not be changed, that they are not unfair restrictive trade practices, but rather essential investment tools for our Canadian cultural development and our identity? Obviously the government is not listening and the Americans are not listening to our international trade minister. What about you, sir, are you going to tell them?

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to put their questions through the Chair.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, yes, indeed, I am going to tell them, just as my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, told them and just as yesterday one of my other colleagues told them.

Canadian cultural products are for sale to the world. Canadian culture is not for sale.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this side of the House and Canadians will be very pleased to hear this. I wish they could believe it. They have to use it or they are going to lose all their credibility.

This government knows that Canadian films only make up 3 per cent of our cinema screen and for the last four years this government has been promising a new law on film distribution. When will that law be tabled? When is the government going to act to increase that share? Are Canadians in control of their cultural destiny or has George Bush, in the context of the Canada–U.S.–Mexico free trade agreement, said: "No way, José"! What are you doing about it?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the fact that Mrs. Hills is asking to have it re-opened simply demonstrates the excellent job that was done by the government in the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement to ensure that Canadian culture was protected.

We intend to follow exactly the same policy here. We will be taking a number of measures to enhance Canadian arts and culture. For example, as early as tomorrow, we will be introducing the new status of the artist bill. I will be looking for co-operation from all sides of the House to see this through the House of Commons by the summer recess.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

President Bush announced measures to protect some U.S. environmental interests in the free trade agreement with Mexico. Unfortunately, the Minister said that as far as Canada was concerned, it could simply imitate or copy the Americans. Mr. Speaker, that is unacceptable. We have our own environmental requirements, even if the Minister does not want to admit it.

My question for him is: When does the Minister intend to table here in the House an independent policy that will protect Canada's environmental interests in these negotiations?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, Canada's environmental concerns in these negotiations will be dealt with on three levels. The subjects negotiated in the agreement itself will have an environmental aspect involving Canada. As for subjects outside the agreement, Canada hopes that they will be covered in parallel negotiations.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we already had the opportunity to say in this House that once the agreement is concluded, it will be subject to an environmental review, like all other government policies, when it is submitted to Cabinet. The government will then have to draw some conclusions and make them public, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the failure of the minister to answer demonstrates very clearly that he does not understand the integration of the environment and the economy. The promise was not to make the environmental impact study available after, it was at the time the initiative was made, and you have broken your promise already.

Will the minister, or will any minister on the other side who is prepared to make a commitment, commit to meaningful, timely and public participation in developing the Canadian environmental position? Will the minister agree that there will be no signing of a free trade agreement until at the same time the parallel environmental agreement is signed? Finally, will the minister undertake that no trade measures, no trade procedures will be agreed to in the negotiations that would in any way, shape, or form inhibit Canada's right to protect its own environment?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is quite a change in tone for the member for LaSalle–Émard today in the Houses of Commons. He found his way today from hiding behind the curtains yesterday on a vote here in this House.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. minister would want to get on with answering the question.

Mr. Charest: It may be of some interest to the member that it is the Minister of the Environment who is answering this question. I am working in very close co-operation with my colleague from trade, with all my colleagues in fact, in approaching these negotiations to assure ourselves that in so far as trade related matters are concerned within this agreement, they will be dealt with. Environmental matters that concern those trade related items will be dealt with in the negotiations. We want non-trade related items to be dealt with at parallel negotiations.

Finally, there is one thing that seems to me very central in all of this. Once an agreement has been concluded and before the policy is dealt with before cabinet and within our own system of government there will be an environmental evaluation. That in itself is a fundamental change for this government to do business and, in fact, for any government around the world to do business so far as the environment is concerned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday the minister announced contracts worth more than $1 billion for a radio communications system that apparently will be used primarily by our troops in Europe. Yet the Associate Minister of National Defence said yesterday that the government was reconsidering our commitment to keep our forces in Europe.

What is going on? Who is in charge at the Department of National Defence? How does this minister justify spending over $1 billion on a radio communications system for the army when the government is cutting back the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, cutbacks for which this minister was responsible?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. member asked a question:

[English]

I think what is going wrong is that the member is badly informed because there is no relationship at all with Europe and the communication system.

[Translation]

The contract announced yesterday in Calgary will enable the Canadian Army to be very efficient and modern in signaling and in the transmission of everything the Army needs to operate. That has nothing to do with the issue of Europe. It is for all the forces—in Canada, in Europe and serving with the United Nations.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the Institute for International Peace and Security says differently so I will have to sort that one out over the next few days.

Let me follow up with a question about the government's review of its defence policy. Yesterday the associate minister also said that she expects that the review will be made public in June. I would like to ask why the government is making a series of very important long-term decisions before any review has even been completed. How come it is doing this without any public input whatever?

• (1440)

Will the government make a commitment here today in this House that the public will be consulted before this government makes irrevocable restructuring of the Canadian forces?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first, there was never any question of the foundations and basic policies covering the Canadian Forces' responsibilities being at issue.

Nevertheless, the hon. member, like all Canadians, has certainly realized that in the past few years, very important changes have taken place, particularly in Europe, and that all countries, both inside and outside NATO, must take account of this reality.

Obviously, the Government of Canada, like its allies, must also consider what has happened and the effects of this situation on the Canadian Forces, taking into account Canada's finances, especially the announcements made in the 1989-90 Budget where the Department of Defence was asked for more than $3 billion as part of Canada's deficit-fighting effort.

Therefore, in view of these two situations, the Government of Canada is reviewing its policy, Mr. Speaker, as Germany, England and the United States are also reviewing theirs.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Yesterday in response to the truckers parked in front of Parliament Hill, who have become a very powerful symbol for many Canadians across the country, the minister said, and I quote:

> It is impossible to really discuss with a group of people who have no authorized representatives.

Rather than pitting one group against the other and playing the politics and the game of "divide and conquer", when will the minister recognize that ultimately the federal government is the authorized and elected representative of these people who happen to be Canadians and who are legitimately demanding action, solution and leadership from this national government?

What is so wrong with that, Mr. Minister?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The hon. member from the other side may try to distort what I said to the people yesterday, but he certainly will not succeed in making the Canadian population believe that we have not met with the people involved. We have met with all the stakeholders in the trucking industry. I just came out of a meeting with the representatives of the Canadian Trucking Association.

So, we have met with all people and we have listened to them. On Friday we told the people assembled on the street that their concerns have been expressed by the Coalition of Independent Owner-Operators in the task force that we have created. This task force has asked for studies. These studies are coming forward and they will be wrapped up by the task force. Then we will address the problems based on facts and not on misconceptions.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): The fact of the matter is that these truckers speak for more Canadians than this government's 14 per cent standing in the polls right now. That is the problem.

I ask the minister this: He said that he has met and talked with many people. He has had a nine-option plan proposed by this Liberal opposition party. He has had solutions from the truckers and their wives. He has had specific representations for over a year. I ask the minister, why is this government so reluctant to even usher in temporary relief measures?

Which will it be? Crossing every t and dotting every i of every study ever commissioned, or listening and responding to average Canadians and their plights?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am happy that the member has given me the occasion to respond and make known to the general public the Liberal way of meeting crises: Spend more money.

I have here a brochure put out this week by an hon. member. I want to quote one of his suggestions, and I would like everybody to listen to this: "7. Federal-provincial trade-off: Financial co-operation to ease the provincial tax portion on diesel fuel can be attained by the federal government agreeing to roll back its share of revenues supporting the road infrastructure".

Then there is an explanation, because that needs an explanation. He says: "The federal government presently contributes approximately 5 per cent of total highway expenditures in Canada. In the U.S., the federal government contributes 20 to 25 per cent. Our federal government"—listen to this—"should increase its share of contributions of total highway expenditures to 20 per cent". Quick-fix spending by the Liberals.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

A year after the report of the task force on Barriers to Women in the Public Service, the same old attitudes keep women below the glass ceilings.

Today, the Public Service Commission reported that women working for the federal government resign at twice the rate of men. They fill most of the short-term positions, with no benefits, no security, no rights and they make only 55 cents for every $1 a man earns.

What does the minister have to say to the women of Canada about this abysmal treatment of women working for the Government of Canada?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member will realize that this has been a problem in Canada for many years.

Our government, fortunately, has done much more than the Liberals did during decades of government. We have set very precise targets in each area to improve equity.

I fully agree that we need to continue to do more. We are doing that in every area. I remember, not so long ago, the Prime Minister giving numbers of achievements that we can be very proud of.

I can say that this government will continue to press with its effort. We have precise targets, and we are achieving them.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Targets require steps. Women make up nearly half the Public Service, but they got less than 25 per cent of management promotions last year, less than one quarter of the appointments to the management from outside the Public Service and just 20 per cent of the appointments within the management category.

One year ago, the former President of the Treasury Board said: "I can tell my colleague that the report is being acted on today. We are not going to hold up action on this report." When will the government give women more than empty promises?

When and how will this minister give women a chance at equality?

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has asked me for some figures, I am very pleased to give her some to explain just what progress has been made. Of course, I do not deny that much remains to be done. We live in a society that unfortunately has not always given equity its proper place. However, if you take for example the management categories when the Liberal Party, to which she belongs, was in power, there were 308 women in the management categories—that is, 7.3 per cent. We took power and today we have 730 women in management, or 15.3 per cent. We have more than doubled the number of women in the management categories and we will continue to move forward.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance in his role as Deputy Prime Minister said yesterday that free trade was not involved in transport.

He knows that free trade has meant more U.S. imports hauled by U.S. truckers and Canadian exports hauled by U.S. truckers.

He talks about competitiveness when his own laws prevent Canadian truckers and railroads from being competitive.

Will the Minister of Finance act immediately to amend our tax law and regulations to ensure that depreciation allowances, which he knows something about, for trucks, tractors, trailers and railway rolling stock do not exceed those applied by U.S. laws?

• (1450)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that our capital cost allowance and depreciation compares very favourably with the United States, particularly when you take into consideration that the United States has a 12 per cent heavy duty sales tax which applies to tractors and trailers. This drives up the price and nullifies any acceleration of the depreciation which the United States tax system has.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Since the truckers and the Canadian Trucking Association are complaining about the lack of enforcement of Canadian laws and regulations, whether by provinces or the national government on trans-border traffic, will the Minister of Transport ensure that his department, and other departments that have responsibility for enforcement, will increase their personnel, enforce regulations and on the spot collection of fines in the role as a regulator of cross-border traffic.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, that is something that would have to be pursued at the federal-provincial level.

As a long time expert in transportation matters, he also knows very well that extra-provincial trucking is largely a provincial matter. What he and others have been trying to do for many years is to establish some degree of uniformity across the country so that truckers can operate with fewer barriers and obstacles than they now have. That is part and parcel of the problem.

If the hon. member wants to do anything for the truckers, he may get on the telephone this afternoon and call his friends at Queen's Park and ask them to do something about ratcheting down the sales tax or excise tax which they have on fuel, which will reach 14.3 cents a litre when the NDP government puts into effect the increases it brought down in the last budget.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, the Conference Board of Canada released its provincial economic forecasts. The report says that the economic situation in Quebec will continue to deteriorate and that during the coming year, the unemployment rate is not expected to drop below its current level of 12.5 per cent.

My question to the minister is this: When will he realize that the economic policies applied by his government are doing nothing to help the economy in Quebec, and when will he table new measures to give the economy a boost, not just in Quebec but across Canada?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the slowdown was, in fact, anticipated in the budget of 1990 and reconfirmed in February when the budget was brought down. Clearly, because of the inflationary pressures and inflationary expectations which developed between 1988 and 1990, that issue had to be addressed or we would have ended up being in the same position that we were in 1981 and 1982 under the Liberals, where we had inflation rates of 13 per cent and 14 per cent and interest rates in excess of 20 per cent. We wanted to avoid that.

What has been indicated is that we have developed and put in place policies that will see us ease out of the recession in the second half. We expected the first half to be slow, but the economic indicators that we now see with respect to renewed business confidence, increased housing starts, increased housing sales and the decline in interest rates, we believe auger very well for recovery in the second half.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister referred to a recession that was not only anticipated by this government but in fact created by this government's policies.

My question is quite straightforward and is directed to the same minister. When will he reduce the spread between U.S. and Canadian interest rates so that Canadian businesses can compete and create jobs for the unemployed in Montreal, Quebec City and Trois-Rivières? When are you going to do something?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in an earlier answer, the prime rate in the United States is 8.5 per cent. The prime rate in Canada is 9.75 per cent. That is a 1.25 per cent spread. That is the lowest it has been for a long time.

MISSING RESEARCH

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The town of Val-d'Or now has a new CANMET laboratory for mining research, at a cost of $15 million over the next five years. This laboratory reflects the Conservative Government's commitment to improving the competitive position of Quebec's primary industry, both in terms of technology and cost-effectiveness. Mr. Speaker, my question is as follows: Could the minister tell us today whether the technology to be developed in this new mining laboratory in Quebec can be used anywhere in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we all know that we have to bring our research and development into a traditional industry such as mining. The Val d'Or research laboratory has been designed to do just that. In particular, we will have underground research in rock breakage and fragmentation. It will serve the entire mining community for all of Canada. It has had very good co-operation from the Canadian mining industry and particularly from my colleague who has asked the question. I thank him for his support and for his encouragement.

EXTRADITION

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, the case of Charles Ng points to the ineffectiveness of our current system of extradition. The Minister of Justice must be aware that Canadians will lose confidence in our system of justice if our extradition system is not made more effective.

Can the minister indicate what she is doing to ensure that Mr. Ng's case is dealt with as expeditiously as possible and what she is doing to ensure that Canada does not become a haven for fugitives?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that the decision which I made when I was Attorney General has been heard in the Supreme Court of Canada. The Minister of Justice fast tracked it through the procedures that were available to her so that it would be heard as soon as possible. That is the Ng case.

The actual issue of a review of the extradition laws is currently under way and I understand the minister hopes to be able to bring forward something in the fall.

REFERENDUM DEBATE IN QUEBEC

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the press reports that Quebec Minister Marc-Yvon Côté is concerned that abuse of federal funds may upset the political balance when a referendum is held in Quebec. Mr. Côté said he intended to meet his federal counterpart as soon as possible to ensure that democratic standards of balance and equity are observed when a referendum debate takes place in Quebec. I want to ask the Secretary of State who, I believe, administers these funds whether he intends to respect the wishes of the Quebec minister?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs is not in the House today. I will take that question as notice and report back to the hon. member.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): As far as taking notice is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see everything transmitted to the responsible minister. Our other concern was expressed in an article published in Le Soleil and signed by Mr. Vastel, which mentioned a fund of $100 million to be used to oil a propaganda machine that would be started up very shortly—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but this is not a question but a statement.

The hon. member for Windsor West, a single question.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance relating to the matter of retail sales. As he may know, retail sales fell 3.1 per cent in the first three months of 1991 compared to a decline of only 1.1 per cent in the last three months of 1990, last year.

I ask the minister: How can he describe this startling fall in retail sales as an easing out of recession? Does the minister not realize that the dead hand of the GST and the other faulty economic policies of this government are preventing a recovery of retailing in this country, and why does he not do something about it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my answer was based on the fact that in the month of April there were a number of positive signals that would lead us to believe that we are nearing the bottom of the recession and expecting that recovery will emerge in the second half, as was predicted by the Minister of Finance when he presented his budget in February.

• (1500)

What I did say, and I will repeat it again for the hon. member, is that there are indicators that business confidence is up. Housing sales and housing starts are up. The interest rates have declined by 5 percentage points and the spread between the United States and Canadian interest rates at the prime rate level is 1.25 per cent. Consumer confidence is improving. Automobile sales are improving. There is some reason to be optimistic. However, we do not underestimate the depth of the downturn. With sound, positive economic policies as were enunciated in the budget, we have every reason to believe that we will be on the road to solid recovery in the second half.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver East, a single question.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the President of the Treasury Board. In his early absence, I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

This government has not dealt fairly with complaints of racial discrimination within the Public Service. As a result of complaining Dr. Chander Grover was dismissed by the National Research Council one month short of 10 years of service.

The contract of Frank Boahene, a CIDA manager, was cancelled despite minority advisory committee reports that this should not have happened.

Recently, the government disbanded the three Public Service Employment Equity Advisory Committees.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister when this government will take employment equity seriously. Will the minister reinstate the Employment Equity Advisory Committees to monitor employment equity? What steps will he take to enforce mandatory employment equity with job protection for public employees who complain of racial harassment and discrimination?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, again I do apologize to the hon. member. I was asked by the Table to comment on something and I was away for the first part of the hon. member's question.

I understand she referred to employment equity. I will reiterate the commitment of this government and our very great determination to reach our targets. I can tell the hon. member that in each of the categories we are reaching them.

As far as equity for women I would like to give the hon. member some numbers that I did not have a while back. In the judiciary system, in 1984 when we came to power there were 37 women now there are 81. We had two ambassadors, now we have 13. We had seven deputy ministers, now we have 22. We had two women members of commissions, now we have 31. Equity is a commitment of the government.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question which was put by my colleague, the member for Lasalle—Émard, the Minister of the Environment, I believe, breached the provisions of Standing Order 18. I wonder if the hon. member would do the appropriate thing and withdraw the statement in which there was reference made to how a member voted with regard to a particular matter before this House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has risen on a point of order and his point of order is, of course, well taken. The House will remember that when this happened I rose and asked the minister to get on with the answer to the question, which he did.

I will hear the minister.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, so that there will be no ambiguity about this question, I wish to withdraw my comments and I do so without any hesitation.

RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to express my disappointment at the lack of opportunity to ask a question in the House today.

Point of Order

We have more private members on this side of the House than any other party, but out of 25 to 30 questions, we only get two. I had an issue that was very important to my part of Canada, and I really wished to bring it up. I hope we will get more questions in the future.

Mr. Speaker: I want to respond to the hon. member and to all other hon. members. The private members on the government side got two questions today.

It does not take very much arithmetic to realize, as I have had to say before, that with the way this present House is structured it is extremely difficult to satisfy everybody who wants to ask questions.

Now there is an answer to this. The answer is that hon. members on both sides of the House get together and negotiate some new approach, if that is what is wished by the majority of the members. That is the response which is necessary if the customs are going to change.

I would ask hon. members to please listen carefully to what I am saying. There are only so many minutes in Question Period. There was discussion before that maybe Question Period should be made longer. I am inviting hon. members, as there have been exchanges across this House on the question of Question Period, to engage in discussion, all of you. If hon. members wish to change the structure of Question Period then of course, as your Speaker, I shall be bound by your suggestions and your recommendations.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on that point of order, we have heard, on a couple of occasions, members of the government side making objections with regard to their inability to raise questions on the floor of the House of Commons. I think it indicates a number of points, and I will be very brief.

One point is that members opposite are not having an opportunity to express their views in their respective caucuses. This is obvious with government members—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I would ask the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond to leave the matter as it is and not to get into a discussion on the floor of the House as to what takes place or what does not take place in any other caucus.

Point of Order

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to follow your direction. However, I want the record to clearly show and clearly state, in case there is any false impression, that those members of the opposition of my particular party have said, for quite some time, that we were concerned with regard to the length of answers which were given by members. In point of fact, we have tried very hard in our questions to make sure that they are succinct and to the point. We have made that point repeatedly. However, in no way do we accept the argument that members should pool their resources together and somehow change the format of Question Period. This is the last bastion of democracy for members of—

Mr. Speaker: I am only reminding hon. members that ultimately the Speaker's role is to do what the majority of members in this House wish to have done.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, if you follow the logic of your argument to the fullest, I am sure that there are many members on the government side of the House, who are in the majority, who would like to see Question Period done away with.

Surely there has been a tradition, not just followed for 124 years in this Parliament, but also previously in the mother Parliament, to ensure that the opposition had a small period out of every day to put the questions of the nation.

I am seeking guidance, Mr. Speaker. However, if I understand your suggestion to be that somehow we are supposed to get together with the government members and divvy up the time of Question Period. Clearly this is the only time of the day that the opposition has the chance to put the questions for 24 million people. If the hon. member wants to ask a question of his minister then I suggest that he utilize his access to the minister as a government member and do so in the appropriate fashion. This is the Parliament for the people of Canada, it is not the Parliament for a backbencher who feels stifled by his own caucus.

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure the hon. member for Hamilton East that the Speaker is not unilaterally changing the customs in this Chamber. All I am saying is that if there are complaints, then members had better conduct some conversations among themselves and then discuss the matter with the Speaker. I think that the matter has been aired sufficiently. The hon. minister.

• (1510)

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I agree with you in principle that the matter has been aired sufficiently. However, I think that some facts need to be rectified.

When the hon. member for Hamilton says that the opposition has questions to put for 24 million people, I would humbly submit to her, Mr. Speaker, that every member of this House can put questions on behalf of all 26 million Canadians.

As regards the rules of the mother of Parliaments, Mr. Speaker, maybe it is a subject that we should look into and about which government members also have questions.

Now, on the question of concision and precision, I would suggest to my colleague the leader of the Opposition to look at a few of the questions asked today and determine whether or not they were concise and precise.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: If it is the same point of order, I think there has been sufficient discussion about it. I would like, with the consent of the House, to move on to tabling of documents.

AERONAUTICS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-205, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to move to introduce this bill again this session. The purpose of the amendment to the Financial Administration Act is to prevent the kind of abuse that this House suffered under the government in 1989 when special Governor General's warrants were used and the regular supply proceedings in this House avoided.

The purpose of this act is to stop that kind of abuse. It will ensure that Governor General's special warrants may not be used between sessions of Parliament, but only after dissolution of Parliament and before the recall of the new Parliament.

I believe the bill meets with approval from most hon. members and I think it is unfortunate the government was unable to include this particular amendment in its recent set of amendments to this very important act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

VOLUNTEER FIRE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today, now that we are back here, to once again present some petitions signed by volunteer firemen and by those individuals whose interests they look after in the Oxford area of Nova Scotia.

The petitioners are very concerned about the government's decision last year to raise radio licence fees primarily for municipalities and volunteer fire departments.

These petitioners ask the government to reconsider its measures to hike fees by up to 1,000 per cent because these are volunteer organizations which look after the welfare of the community.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition on behalf of several hundred fishermen in the Gulf of St. Lawrence region of my constituency who are protesting the government's introduction of dockside monitoring fees.

The petitioners are calling upon the government to withdraw these fees, which are not only harmful and injurious to the fishermen, but as I mentioned earlier today are without legal standing.

The petitioners call upon Parliament, and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans specifically, to withdraw these fees and to reimburse those fishermen who have unlawfully been charged.

NATIONAL GALLERY

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present today a petition signed mostly by college students in my riding.

The petitioners object to the displaying of deteriorating beef shank in the name of art at the National Gallery.

By signing this petition, the students are telling the Canadian people something. They are joining with thousands of other Canadians expressing their disbelief in this ridiculous display in a publicly owned building.

THE CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston and the Islands.

The petitioners are concerned that the destruction and desecration of the Canadian flag is an offence and insulting to all Canadians.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to pass a bill making it an offence to destroy or desecrate the Canadian flag.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of the entire Polish community in Thunder Bay.

The petitioners feel Marie Sklodowska Curie, a servant of mankind and a scientist whom fame could not corrupt and who has been honoured by many different countries throughout the world, should be honoured by Canada.

Point of Order

The leaders of the Polish community—Walter Kwasniewski, Stan Tedinka and the Malicki family—pray and call upon Parliament to honour Marie Sklodowska Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth on November 7, 1992.

I am sure that all people in Canada would like to honour Madam Curie with this commemorative stamp.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleague from Thunder Bay in presenting a petition on the same subject.

I received a petition from Canadians in Toronto, including my riding of Rexdale. The petitioners suggest, as did my colleague from Thunder Bay, that Marie Sklodowska Curie be honoured as a woman of great achievement and distinction by commemorating her achievements and contributions.

The petitioners suggest the issuing of a stamp in her honour on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth.

These petitioners feel that it would be an inexpensive yet very large symbolic gesture on behalf of the Government of Canada. These are the types of deeds that I believe ought to be of concern to this government.

• (1520)

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I have here that a petition a colleague sent me from Barneys River, Nova Scotia.

[English]

As you know, the federal Department of Communications has imposed huge increases in licence fees for radio telecommunications, including all emergency service radio equipment. I know the rules, so I will not say all the "whereases", but these honourable Canadians humbly pray and call upon Parliament to exempt fire departments from these excessive radio licence fees because many fire departments are operated by dedicated volunteers who simply cannot afford these fee hikes.

I very humbly on their behalf present this petition to the House of Commons, hoping that the Minister of Communications will read the petition and act accordingly.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will listen to a point of order from the hon. member for Shefford.

POINT OF ORDER

ROLE OF SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I find most unfortunate that I was not allowed to raise this point of order in due course.

You left us cooling our heels for a while. But I wanted to follow up on what I heard the Speaker say and I hope that I heard him wrong. I heard him say that he is here to do what the majority of members want to be done.

Mr. Speaker, I really hope I heard wrong because, if indeed the Speaker of the House claims his role is to serve the majority, this means that, tomorrow morning, the majority could decide that there will be no question period and no speeches by opposition members, and the Speaker of the House would go along with that.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is a misconception of the role of the Speaker and all that time, as a minority member, I thought the Chair was here to protect me. I would like, Mr. Speaker, and I probably will, to reserve the right to raise a question of privilege because, if the Speaker has now decided to serve the majority, this institution is in grave danger. It is facing the threat of becoming undemocratic.

Mr. Speaker, I want the senior Speaker to realize that this is a statement that has to be clarified as soon as possible because I refuse to believe that the Speaker is only here to serve the majority.

RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 21 consideration of the motion of Mr. Pronovost for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, almost 125 years ago the first government of this nation was seized by a bold and a compelling dream.

The goal was to resist the unrelenting pull of the American states by stitching together a disparate group of northern colonies into the fabric of a nation. The government's vision was to bind the country together with ribbons of steel, providing the conduit for an entire nation's dreams, hopes and aspirations. And they did it.

New industry began to flow from one region to another, and ideas and dreams, packaged in letters, sped across thousands of miles. The railroad became the principal method for Canadians to share their goods, their culture and their need to communicate with one another.

Like most technologies, in time it was added to by faster, more efficient and cheaper methods. Railways were joined by aeroplanes, and rail cars by container trucks. The east-west bonds once again became susceptible to the tug of north-south industry and culture.

It was not just transportation that underwent this revolution; it was also communications.

In 1874, Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone in Brantford, Ontario. A former native of my own home town of Fergus, Reginald Aubrey Fessenden made the world's first radio broadcast of voice and music on Christmas Eve in 1906.

By 1990, the Canadian telephone industry was employing almost 100,000 workers and managing more than 35 billion phone calls each year, or nearly 1,400 calls for each and every Canadian. Telecommunications rapidly became the electronic railroad of today. Telephones and fax machines, robots and computers, electronic mail and desk top publishing are the methods Canadians use today to share their ideas, their dreams and their aspirations.

In that sense, telecommunications and cultural identity are absolutely dependent upon each other. Without communication, Canadians cannot develop shared values. Without the shared values which form the basis of our culture, we cannot define our Canadian identity.

I made these links because culture and communications are key to the three themes developed in the Speech from the Throne of unity, prosperity and a responsive government.

Under the theme of unity, the Speech from the Throne states that:

> The ability of Canadians to live together in harmony and the ability of Canada to make a major contribution to world affairs depend upon our understanding of who we are as a people.

A changing world is challenging our values and severely testing our sense of self as a nation. Many of the old images which used to define how we see ourselves no longer hold the same relevance for Canadians today.

For example, how many of us sang The Maple Leaf Forever with its refrain of "thistle, shamrock, rose entwined"—which are the emblems of England, Ireland and Scotland—in school with the same reverence normally accorded the National Anthem? Yet today, more than 15 million Canadians claim a heritage which does not include either England, Ireland or Scotland. The thistle, shamrock and rose entwined is not, and some would argue never was, an image that fully represents Canada.

[Translation]

The challenge which confronts us, as the Speech from the Throne points out, is to "create a climate in which Canadians can deepen their understanding of their history and traditions and their appreciation of their country's rich diversity."

We deepen our understanding of history by visiting our museums. We learn more about our traditions by rediscovering our heritage. And we come to appreciate our diversity by being exposed to the cultural expression which thrives across this country.

In that sense, art and culture must be the key to this government's priority of building a unified and prosperous Canada. Discussions pertaining to our constitution are essential, as it is one element of what makes us Canadian. But it is also essential that we talk about the soul and spirit of the country.

In society, there are two broad ways in which we communicate. One is as a collective voice, be it through the speeches of our own elected officials, or the editorials of leading newspapers, or the way in which our media reflect our activities back to us.

But the other, and the more powerful, is the individual voice which speaks without censorship, without editing, without rewriting, without a committee dictating what can and cannot be said, and simply shouts out whatever can, and must, be heard from a personal point of view.

When our artists speak, whether on paper, on canvas or in clay, through the movement of their bodies or the flickering light on the cinema screen, they express our deepest thoughts. They see into the hearts of Canadians and focus bright light on what is real and what is true. Those countries in the world which have flourishing artistic communities inevitably also have a strong sense of identity. Regrettably, the men and women who dedicate their lives to their talent are not supported as generously in Canada as their talent deserves.

As the arts community knows so well, it has always been difficult for artists to earn enough to support their families. The average artist in Canada hopes to earn from $13,000 to $19,000 a year. These are particularly unimpressive figures when we consider that the average artist also has a university degree and at least 17 years of experience. Many are forced to take second jobs, thereby limiting the time they can devote to honing their skills. They live with recurring unemployment and fluctuating and sporadic incomes.

They do not fit the standard business relationship because their work is a labour of love. More than half of the Canadian artists surveyed recently by Statistics Canada said that they considered their art a vocation rather than a business or a profession.

Because they fall through the cracks, qualifying over the course of their years neither as employees nor as employers, they have no professional status in our society and have limited recourse to the social safety net that the rest of us enjoy.

I had the good fortune almost seven years ago, when I was minister of revenue to work with the leaders of the arts community in Canada on the government's response to the report of the subcommittee on the taxation of visual and performing artists and writers. Together, we sat down and wrote new rules which recognized that artists play a unique role in Canada and that they deserve special consideration in tax administration. It was a good first step, but the time has come to take that principle further.

Our artists in Canada need a framework in law which acknowledges their special and distinctive contribution to our country and which allows them improved access to certain rights and benefits that other Canadians are privileged to enjoy.

This is not a new idea. The government and the arts community of Canada have recently completed years of intense collaboration, which has resulted in a bill on the status of the artist in Canada. It has been prepared in collaboration with the Canadian Conference of the Arts, with the performing artists' associations including ACTRA, L'Union des artistes and Actors Equity, with creative artists and producers' associations, and with the Canadian Advisory Committee on the Status of the Artist.

This issue has been thoroughly reviewed by the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture and the bill has been welcomed by our Prime Minister.

It provides recognition, unprecedented in federal law, of the professional status of our country's artists as well as their contribution to the development of our culture and our society.

It gives me great pleasure to confirm to the House that I intend to introduce this legislation on the status of the artist tomorrow. I am confident that all parties will recognize the value and the urgent need for this bill and agree to pass it as quickly as possible.

Improving the recognition received by Canada's artists is not a partisan issue. I will be seeking the support of my colleagues opposite in the hope that the bill can be sent to the Senate before we rise for our summer recess.

Each year the arts sector contributes billions of dollars to the economy and provides hundreds of thousands of jobs to Canadians, but the true value of the arts goes well beyond the economic. Their real value lies in their ability to civilize, to break down boundaries, to open up new horizons and to act as a mirror to our society.

The arts is an avenue beckoning us to discover who we really are as a people. And in helping us to understand who we are, the contribution of the arts to Canadian unity is both profound and enduring.

Just as art, culture and unity are intertwined, so are communications and prosperity, the second theme found in the Speech from the Throne.

[Translation]

Telecommunications is an essential building block to national prosperity, just as the railroad was a century ago.

Its chief value lies in its ability to act as an "enabler" to Canadians companies. Global telecommunications networks have made the flow of capital virtually instantaneous—transferring hundreds of billions of dollars daily among the world's major financial centres.

The markets of the world are now available to us with the bending of an elbow over the telephone, telex or fax machine.

But the telecommunications industry is also valuable in itself. Telecommunications is the premier high-tech industry in Canada today, one of only a few in which Canada is a world leader. It contributes 3.5 per cent of our GDP, or $21 billion a year—as much as agriculture, fisheries and forestery combined.

The opportunities for growth are substantial. The current world market for telecommunications equipment is estimated at beween $100 and $150 billion, of which Canada's share is but 4 per cent or $4 to $6 billion.

Our competitors are investing billions of dollars, which we cannot hope to match dollar for dollar. But we can strive to be more effective, to marshal our resources and target them to the areas where they can do the most good.

However, as the Prime Minister stated in Vancouver last year, there is a third value to telecommunications. To borrow his words: "It would be hard to exaggerate the importance of the communications industry to Canada. It is a powerful instrument of economic and social development".

Telecommunications and its related technologies have the power to do tremendous social good by reducing the inequities we find between people. For example, the Department of Communications has been very active in improving the lives of disabled Canadians. We have developed a National Broadcast Reading Service for those who cannot read. We have closed captioning on TV for those who cannot hear. We have also developed special computerized telephones for those who have problems with speech.

Telecommunications also has the power to reduce inequities found in the regions. For example, in Newfoundland, we are using satellites to link the health care centres of 140 small, rural communities to help with emergency diagnosis and to provide training and upgrading.

In Manitoba, teachers felt their children were not getting enough attention in the maths and sciences. In response, working with the provincial government, we set up a Homework Hotline, which allows children to phone in questions to teachers in a television studio. The teachers answer the questions and their images are beamed by satellite into the cable systems so that students can watch them on television.

And, up north, we are helping to implement a native cultural and educational broadcasting network which will give northerners greater access to information and cultural programs.

[English]

Our technology makes it possible for us to meet our social responsibilities and to open up whole new worlds of information and learning to Canadians who might have no other access. It gives us the ability to respond to the needs of all Canadians—the third theme found in the Speech from the Throne.

Government responsiveness must play a large role in the future of telecommunications and culture in Canada. But our role must be fine-tuned to respond to the needs of today and tomorrow.

The days when governments could meet the needs of industry by simply handing over money are over. Our deficit is much too large and the competition much too sophisticated for that sort of an answer to work. If government is really to make a difference, it must concentrate on structural changes which will allow individuals and businesses to compete in new markets. The status of the artist legislation is a good example of a structural measure which governments can take to help Canadians help themselves.

A second example can be found in telecommunications. The industry is currently regulated by the Railway Act, 1904. It was a very good bill for the 19th century railroads, but it will not meet the needs of the 21st century telecommunications system. If we are to be competitive and effective, we will need a national, unified market. New legislation would help break down the barriers to trade between provinces, and I intend to discuss this issue with my colleagues both in government and in industry to see what can be done.

A third example can be found in the marketing and distribution of cultural products. In our enthusiasm to produce excellent products, we have sometimes forgotten to make sure that we have gained maximum access to the markets.

• (1540)

Larger audiences would go a long way toward ensuring growth in our cultural industries.

A few weeks ago, the Citizens' Forum on National Unity sent out a request to 2,000 visual artists living across Canada, asking them to send in works which expressed their feelings about this country. Last week, their entries were on display at the regional headquarters of the Ottawa-Carleton region. Some of the pieces were angry or critical, and that is fine. We were not looking for propaganda. We were looking for thoughtful expression. We were looking for people who were willing and able and talented enough to express what was deep inside.

There were two entries in particular which caught my attention. One, from Toronto, was a Canadian flag with a fleur-de-lis and a maple leaf and a caption which read: "Keep building bridges", continuent à tisser des liens. The other, from Sydney, Nova Scotia, showed a Canadian flag with the maple leaf divided into 10 sections, one for each province, about to fall off to the side. Its caption was: "Unite or fall".

I was heartened by these entries because they expressed a sincere hope that Canada could resolve its problems and remain united. I think that is the way the vast majority of Canadians feel today.

As members of Parliament the demands on our time are many. We have no shortage of duties to fulfil. We have duties both in government and in opposition. We have duties to our constituencies, to our caucuses, to our parties, to our consciences. Whether we call ourselves Conservatives, Liberals or New Democrats, I believe that we agree our paramount duty is to the country that we love and cherish, the country which has allowed us to live in freedom, peace and prosperity.

Today that duty should speak to all of us. It tells us that we must discover the way to resolve the problems facing Canada, to rediscover who we are as a people, and to renew our appreciation of our history, our tradition and our rich diversity.

Most important, we must reject the claim by some that we can let our country slip away from us without enormous cost to every Canadian. We owe it to those who built this great country. We owe it to ourselves. And we owe it to our children.

May the Speech from the Throne, and this debate that follows, remind us of this most compelling of all duties.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the Chair that on the government side, we have decided to shorten speeches on the motion concerning an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne from 20 to 10 minutes, so that more members will have a chance to speak to the motion.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear the minister in his first speech in the House on the Speech from the Throne and very pleased to hear his commitment to the well-being of artists and the general population with respect to culture.

If there is anything that defines a country internationally or globally it certainly is the culture that is left behind—what is written, what is painted, its stories, et cetera.

I think it is unfortunate—and I hope this minister will not be too unhappy in his task—that the previous three ministers were not as successful as I sincerely hope this minister will be.

The minister spoke about telecommunications, the size of that industry, the fact that it was an economic lever. We have all known that for quite some time, the fact that it is 3.5 per cent of our GNP or $21 billion. Yet since 1985 this government has been promising us a new and updated Telecommunications Act.

I wish this minister good luck, good health and long life. I hope he is able to introduce this bill. I would very much like to know what this minister is planning to do, as he spoke of the fact that it is through communications and cultural products that we have access to the world of art, the world of literature, and the world of people out there.

I would like to remind the minister that next week is access week for the disabled.

Is the minister aware of the fact that Braille books are produced by the CNIB and that we do nothing to enable the production of books in Braille? Is he aware of the fact that we have a tax on reading and a tax on literacy and that this is absolutely against any kind of principle found almost anywhere in the world? Does he realize that his predecessors brought in an incomplete copyright bill and that there should be copyright exemptions for books with large print to enable the poor-sighted to learn effectively and efficiently? In every other way they are normal but they have a problem with their sight.

Children and young adults in high school and college have their learning circumscribed because of the fact that this government has not been clear in its copyright legislation. It has not exempted the printing of such material from the laws of this land.

In terms of access I heard the minister talk about native programs. I suggest he go back and find out how much the past Secretary of State cut from those programs. He is now the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. Let him tell you what he did to native programming in the north. Let the former minister tell you what was done about the satellite that was supposed to be provided so that there could be a proper distribution system up north.

We have a minister of good will and I would very much like to see him be successful in his task as it is in the best interest of national unity and the development of this country. He started off very well in his first speech to the constituency and everyone was very pleased to hear from him.

Last but not least I would like to know, before he tables his status of the artist legislation, which is very key to the well-being of the artist, if he recognizes the low income level of most artists in Canada. I believe it is around $12,000 a year, which is a nice starvation figure. If he does not address within that bill the kinds of tax measures that will make living viable so that artists can be productive, he is in effect window dressing and not looking at the real issues.

I ask the minister to do two things. First, tell the Americans that you are master of your own destiny as minister and bring in the film distribution bill in Canada. Second, for the artist and the creators, address the tax measures so that they are entitled to income averaging. If you know anything about the field of art and artists, you know that they have lean years and fat years, and they must be allowed to have income at—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. minister.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, may I first of all thank my hon. colleague for her kind words and say how much I am looking forward to my new responsibilities in this portfolio. I will do my best to respond to the various points that she raised.

I am certainly pleased to indicate to her, as I said in my remarks earlier, that I am very much aware of the financial problems faced by so many artists across Canada today. As she knows, taxation matters are the responsibility of the Minister of Finance and I cannot introduce legislation here which deals with changes to the Income Tax Act in this way.

We are, however, as a government very conscious of this particular problem and will be seeking ways to provide assistance to Canadian artists in addition to what is done within the status of the artist legislation.

The member will see tomorrow, when I introduce the bill in Parliament, that the legislation goes a long way toward addressing some of the major concerns of artists. When it is complemented by other economic measures which are designed to improve the status of artists in Canada, I think it will begin to give to Canadian artists some recognition of the tremendous contribution they make to our national life. She should not see it in isolation; she should see it in the context of other initiatives that will be taking place as well.

She asked that we serve notice on the Americans and on others of the fact that we in Canada want to have the ability to have our own unique culture. That was in essence the—

Mrs. Finestone: No film distribution.

Mr. Beatty: She mentions film distribution in particular, but in general the problem is one of ensuring that we have a unique voice in Canada and that it has the opportunity to be heard. Whether it is in films, book publishing, newspapers, radio, television, or a whole range of other areas, my goal is to ensure that Canadian voices are heard. My goal is not to prevent contact between Canada and the rest of the world. I think we are enriched by that contact. I do not believe that Canadian culture is frail and fragile and that it does not have something to offer the rest of the world.

• (1550)

Our voice to the rest of the world is strengthened and made more worth while to the extent that it is uniquely a Canadian voice. I have no hesitation in bringing in measures which help to protect the ability of Canadians to have their voices heard in Canada in a whole range of areas.

I look forward to working with my colleague opposite and with others on ways in which we can do that.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if he would take a special interest—and I have written to him on this subject—in the whole question of media sensitivity and stereotyping, particularly as it applies to racial and ethnic minorities.

In particular, the Vancouver community is very, very concerned about a recent CBC series called The Dim Sum Diaries. There is not time to describe it, but I have written him about this. This is about the third time there have been programs—in this case on CBC, formerly on CTV and so on—that really stereotype a minority group.

I would like to ask the minister what he can do within his jurisdiction to try and encourage greater sensitivity in the media. Will the minister review CRTC policy and guidelines? Will the minister also take a look at how the Employment Equity Act and the multicultural bill itself is being applied within his jurisdiction?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to look into all the areas raised by my hon. friend. She raises in particular the issue of stereotyping and problems with a particular program on the CBC. I did notice in the newspapers that she had raised that issue on the west coast.

I know my hon. friend is as sensitive as I am to ensuring that governments do not reach into the CBC to instruct it as to what it can and cannot run in terms of specific programs. The principle of ensuring fair treatment, or the principle of ensuring that stereotyping does not take place, is a matter that is of concern to all members of Parliament. It is entirely legitimate for Canadians concerned about the content of any broadcast to raise those concerns with the broadcaster, with the minister who will convey those concerns to the broadcaster, and with the CRTC, where the regulator will try to ensure that licensees operate in an effective and fair way.

I could indicate also to my hon. friend an area that I bring with me from my old responsibilities of particular concern is that of image portrayed in the media particularly of women and children and the effect it might have on issues related to family violence.

When I was Minister of National Health and Welfare, I asked that more be done to try to sensitize Canadians, particularly people within the media, to concerns about dehumanization of women and children, and portrayals of roles which could foster or could encourage violence in our society. This is certainly one of my concerns.

The issues she raised are all legitimate areas to be looked at.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this important occasion for the purpose of participating in the debate on the last week's Speech from the Throne. That speech was really a declaration of despair. It should have set new goals for our country and put in place a concrete plan of action to help Canadians climb out of the economic recession in which they now find themselves, an economic recession that this government brought on itself.

The Speech from the Throne offered no new hope and no new progress. This government has failed, and has failed Canadians once again. What unites my colleagues and me and gives urgency to our task is the need to define Canada's destiny and shape the society we all want. While the hopes of the Fathers of Confederation have become our record of Canadian accomplishment, it is the Liberal Party of Canada that has embodied the story of Canada's development for many decades.

For over 100 years, Liberals have sought to fulfil the aspirations of those Canadians seeking a better life and a better land. Traditional Liberal principles have given us purpose and direction, but we have also been innovative. We have responded to new concerns and new realities: from Alexander Mackenzie's political and electoral reforms in the 1870s to Pierre Trudeau's Charter of Rights and Freedoms a century later; from Wilfred Laurier's efforts toward self-government and foreign affairs to Mike Pearson's new Canadian flag and the Canada Pension Plan. This commitment to national progress has been a tenet of Canadian Liberalism when Liberalism was at its best. It developed railways, built the Trans-Canada Highway, the St. Lawrence seaway and the pipelines. The same commitment created a national airline, a major energy company and one of the world's best health care systems.

Our purpose and our progress was shaped by a faith and a power of hope over adversity. That purpose still lives. The Liberals did it and the leader of my party can and will do it again.

Progress has been our heritage; not that of the Conservatives or the NDP, and certainly not that of the Reform Party. The policies of the Mulroney government are policies that punish provinces and working people, deny education, destroy jobs and diminish opportunities. It is a government that presides over people who live on the edge of economic fear or who are experiencing the full and painful realization of those fears. Whether it is the savaging of rail passenger service, budget cuts at CBC or the tightening of purse strings for health care and higher education, the results are the same.

National institutions are being dismantled and destroyed. The destruction of Atlantic Canada is particularly frustrating and sad to many of those Canadians who live in that region. Trains are gone, the planes are gone, our health care system is being threatened and the education of our young people could be limited. It is disheartening to see small towns filled with character, close families and unique identities slowly but consistently crumbling.

Rarely has a government in Canada been given such an historic opportunity to demonstrate vision and rarely has a government failed so badly.

Last week's Speech from the Throne and the budget that was brought down earlier this year completely failed to address the many problems and concerns all Canadians have and the hurt and the hardship that many Canadians must endure. The government had to prepare a budget and a throne speech in an economic situation produced by the cumulative effect of its own policies.

The size of the annual budget deficit since 1986-87 has not been reduced and the national debt has been about doubled in size. Unacceptably high interest rates and exchange rates have been maintained, producing a made-in-Canada recession. Canada's competitiveness has further declined, bankruptcies have reached a record level, unemployment is rising and so is the tax burden and inflation.

The balance of payments in Canada's foreign indebtedness has seriously deteriorated and government revenues are falling.

This is the record of this government: a major recession, public finances out of control and the country itself in serious difficulties.

As recently as last September the former Minister of Finance declared before the Canadian Chamber of Commerce: "Our policy is working."

The minister was referring specifically to his monetary policy, which has caused the recession that all Canadians are now suffering through. One of the most remarkable features of the former Minister of Finance, in his tenure in office, is that over the years, in each and every budget speech, he maintained that his policies were working. His forecast of budget deficits, interest rates, growth rates and inflation rates have been consistently and repeatedly wrong time after time after time.

Another hallmark of the hon. member's career as Minister of Finance must surely be his aptitude at crafting a mythology instead of facing up to reality.

There are so many examples, but none more disturbing than the concluding words of the minister at second reading on the GST on January 29, 1990, when he said:

> I believe that in the months following January 1, 1991, when the cut and thrust of partisan debate on this issue has calmed down, when the controversy has subsided, when Canadians can see our economy even more vibrant and growing, they will conclude, as I have, that this is the right policy for the right reasons at the right time.

• (1600)

We are now in the months following January 1, 1991, and if our economy is now "even more vibrant and growing", it is only I suggest in the minister's mind. It is because the former Minister of Finance was more interested in crafting the myth than dealing with reality that he and his government must bear the full responsibility for Canada's current financial and economic situation.

Perhaps we should talk to the truckers, those many men and women who are losing their jobs and their homes. They see no solution to their tragedy but to come to the front steps of the House of Commons and plead for help from the Minister of Transport.

Perhaps this Minister of Finance should speak with senior citizens, perhaps he ought to speak to students and single parents across this country, those Canadians who are among the least able to pay more in tax and those Canadians who are suffering so unfairly. These are the Canadians on whom the burden of the Mulroney government's new taxes have fallen and will fall again.

This government must stop attacking the middle class and the working poor, those many Canadians in every province and territory who get by each day on nothing more than pennies and yes, prayers. This government has raised the taxes on working Canadians 31 times since 1984. In fact, income tax revenues collected by this government have increased by 70 per cent since the Conservative government was elected in 1984 with most of the increases being taken from middle-class families.

This government has doubled the national debt and has in fact piled up more debt than all of Canada's Prime Ministers since Sir John A. Macdonald. In this government, tax reforms have had the result of raising personal income taxes by replacing deductions with tax credits, by deindexing tax brackets and by introducing the so-called clawbacks of social welfare legislation such as family allowance and old age pensions.

Our goal must be a simpler and fairer tax system. The Conservative government has tried and has failed. As well, the incomes of middle-class families have not kept ahead of inflation since this government was elected and these families are finding themselves increasingly in debt as they struggle to attain the goals of a middle-class life; a home, a college education for their children and a comfortable retirement.

These are hard times for these honest people. The tax policies that favour the few and punish the middle class are unacceptable to my party and I believe they are unacceptable to Canadians across this country.

There are many ways to raise money or to save money than to increase an already unfair tax burden. We do not accept the belief that savings in federal spending can be achieved only by eliminating or devastating programs that help the poor, the elderly, the ill, the young and the disadvantaged.

Even the minister's seventh and last budget was an economic failure. In point of fact, this budget has been characterized by one of Canada's leading financial institutions, none other than the Toronto-Dominion Bank and I quote: "It is probably the most economically inept and destructive budget since 1930s". These are strong words, but words that are warranted when the record is examined.

The 1991 budget papers' treatment of the recent economic performance is particularly damning. It confirms that the retrenchment in interest, sensitive consumer demand, cuts in business investment and manufacturing decline, all signs of an impending recession were evident at the time of the 1990 budget. A year ago, there was an unmistakable set of warnings about the trouble the Canadian economy was heading for. The then Minister of Finance had an opportunity to change course and stop pursuing policies which were driving the country into a recession. But, no, he stuck to that policy.

Even more surprising, in 1990 the minister continued to daydream in spite of the harsh reality depicted in his own budget papers. Once again he expressed confidence that after a short economic slowdown in the first half of 1990, the imbalances would be corrected, mostly by natural forces in the economy and sound non-inflationary growth would be resumed in 1991.

Last year the minister's predictions were regarded by most economic observers as totally unrealistic. The reality is that the macroeconomic policies pursued by the Minister of Finance did not work and they have produced this recession. The government has also failed to deal responsibly with big budget deficits.

Those with long memories will recall how the Minister of Finance described his strategy for controlling the national debt in his first budget of May 1985. He called it the: "clear and realistic medium-term plan". Those were the buzzwords.

Last year, that is five years after the plan was launched, the minister was still referring to it in his budget, in spite of the consistent failure of his plan to reduce the deficit. The record speaks for itself.

The cost, however, paid by all Canadians for these and the minister's other mistakes have been a dramatic increase in the tax burden, particularly upon individuals. Sadly, Canada has joined the ranks of the most internationally indebted countries and our future ability to manage monetary policy will be even more restrained in the future.

For all these reasons the former Minister of Finance and this government will be judged severely, not only for their poor or indifferent economic management, but for the gross lack of vision when we faced the greatest current challenge to Canada's existence as a dynamic and a united country.

The clear and realistic plan of budget deficit reduction has failed. The economic renewal plan has failed and the five-year plan for further deficit reduction is in the course of failing.

Nowhere is the Tory record of failure more evident that in my own province of Nova Scotia. The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council predicts that real growth in my province will be limited, with almost no growth at all in the economy. In Cape Breton, unemployment is running at about 20 per cent or double the national average where statistics can be found. Many stores and restaurants in the Sydney and Glace Bay area have closed their doors. Jobs are disappearing and hope of finding another one does not exist any more.

Hotels and restaurant operators in Cape Breton say that the number of bus tours fell by as much as 14 per cent last year, with American tourists complaining about high prices and high taxes. American tourists, like so many Canadians, do not like the Prime Minister picking their pockets every time they go to a local shopping mall, see a movie, go out to dinner with their family or visit the corner store.

Times continue to be tough in fishing towns such as Lockeport and Digby, where the fish processing plants closed and put a town out of work. And now in my own small town of Louisbourg, signs are evident that real danger is on the horizon.

Halifax, the capital of our province has its problems too. The Metro Food Bank is feeding more than 7,000 people a month, 40 per cent more people than it did in 1989.

There are many things one could refer to with regard to the throne speech. But let it be said that this is a very, very difficult time for this country both economically and politically.

• (1610)

I believe that young Canadians want their leaders to exercise prudent judgment on their behalf, not only for the short term but certainly for the long term as well.

The essential question facing our country has always been the reconciliation of Quebec nationalism with Canadian nationalism. While we can point with pride to our past, Confederation's agenda remains unfinished. Quebec and its people must become a full partner in our national life. Greater efforts must be taken to ensure that that occurs. Whatever the differences between English Canadians and French Canadians, it is vital that French Canadians be assured of the future of their language and culture.

Beyond these concerns, we must work to strengthen the common ties that bind together, ties of history and of kinship. Whatever the differences between Quebec and the rest of Canada, they must be overcome because the relationship between English Canadians and French Canadians is essential to the nation at the present time. More, it is critical to our own future and to the very meaning of our Canadian way of life.

Surely the hope of this nation lies in the acceptance of our differences, our distinctiveness and the recognition of our common problems and our common purpose. That is what John A. Macdonald and George Cartier had in mind in Charlottetown in 1864, when beneath the old gas lamps in the old Prince Edward Island legislature, they committed themselves to building a new nation with a new Constitution.

Today, that same challenge faces us anew. Today, more than ever, Canadians need a vision of what their country can become. We can choose, as parliamentarians, between industrial vitality or industrial decline, between national renewal or national ruin.

If we do not try to change things today, we may not have a chance tomorrow. We must demand a fair deal for families and a fighting chance for our young people. To be involved in that effort is to be involved with the same spirit that fired the imagination and efforts of the first settlers to New France several centuries ago.

In closing, every one of us can be a pioneer in our own time, blazing by thought and service a trail to a better and brighter future. Together, my colleagues and I on this side, are determined to carry our great democratic experiments proudly forward; rekindle the commitment to the human spirit on which the greatness of our country depends; and yes, to pledge our future to building a better Canada in every region, province and community across this great country.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to what my hon. colleague had to say about the Speech from the Throne.

I must say that for much of his intervention, I really had a difficult time in processing what I was hearing because he was painting such a black, bleak future and such a black, bleak picture of Canada. I was almost not able to get to my feet because I fell into the depths of depression.

I would suggest that what we have to do is begin to look for answers and solutions. It is not enough to criticize what the government is doing and then say that the country is falling into disrepair, disrepute and that terrible things are happening from one end of this country to the other.

We must have a plan. It is clear in the Speech from the Throne that Canada does have a plan led by the Prime Minister and that the budgets on the financial side which have been produced by the finance minister previously have given us hope for the future. The policies this government is putting forward paint a brighter picture for the future than we have had in the past, certainly in the past 20 years.

I would suggest again that it is not enough to criticize. I think we need alternatives. Canada needs hope, not hopelessness as painted by the member opposite.

I would ask the hon. member to give us his personal blueprint, a positive blueprint, for the future of Canada—not just a lot of rhetoric, but a real blueprint. Tell us what your plans are.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the observations and the question of the hon. member opposite. I am not prepared to apologize to the hon. member for the picture I had painted for her in terms of what is out there across this country. The hon. member must realize that, notwithstanding the fact that she is a member of the government and enjoys a majority at this point in time, there are many, many Canadians who are in deep economic anguish. However, the hon. member asked for my answer and I will respond if she would just be a little bit courteous and listen to my response regarding her observation. There are many Canadians who suffer great, great economic anguish, who are greatly concerned about what is taking place politically in this country in terms of national unity.

I do not make apologies for standing up on behalf of those truckers outside. I make no apologies for standing up for the unemployed in my constituency. I make no apologies for standing up for those individuals, both young and middle-aged, who want a fair shake from government and have been denied it. I make no apology whatsoever for putting on the record that there are thousands upon thousands of Canadians whose economic plight has been driven into the ground, down through the ground, by the policies of the government opposite.

The hon. member has posed a very specific question: What is my blueprint? I will give the hon. member just a little sample.

The other day we had an opposition day where we put forward a motion regarding the trucking industry. The transport critic for our party laid on the table nine specific points that the government could pursue without great cost, many of them without great cost to the taxpayers, either provincially or federally. All the government did was thumb its nose at them.

That is one point I want to bring to the hon. member's attention.

Second, the hon. member talks about the blueprint. One of the essential ingredients of an economic blueprint has to be monetary policy. The monetary policies of this government, in terms of its high dollar and high interest rates, are choking small and medium-sized businesses across this country. It is preventing companies from going out and hiring individuals they would normally want to hire.

I believe, as I am sure the hon. member believes, very much in the private sector. We have to facilitate the private sector, which is the engine of growth in this country. That certainly cannot be done with a monetary policy which chokes small business and medium-sized business. You don't do that. That is what this government has done in the regions of this country, in my own region of Atlantic Canada.

It is absolutely devastating. I am not joyful about standing on the floor of the House of Commons and telling members of the plight of those Canadians, but that is the responsibility that I have as a member of Parliament.

The member can speak from her seat and say: "your specific plan". There are three items that the member could act upon. However, the member won't act upon it, just as the member failed to act with regard to what Canadians were saying on the GST and a host of other things.

The hon. member knows very well the answers, the courses of action that have led to this economic recession. The government refuses at every opportunity to accept cogent, prudent advice and change its ways.

We hoped that with a new Minister of Finance we may see some light at the end of the tunnel, but unfortunately he is sticking to those old policies.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): I, too, have similar concerns to those raised by my hon. friend from Winnipeg, and that is the lack of answers.

• (1620)

I think we have suffered through a 20-minute litany of all of those things that are wrong. Correction, there were a couple of minutes of praise for those good old Liberal times, the times when we had capital gains tax, the national energy policy, the scientific research tax credit, the Katimaviks, and the 22 per cent interest rates, the airplane manufacturers, VIA Rail and all the rest of it done on borrowed money year after year, the borrowing piling up to the point where in March 1985 the national debt reached some $207 billion. Of course, our friend suggests that this government has doubled the debt since that time.

It is almost true. It is up to $390 billion now. My hon. friend knows that almost all of that increase is compound interest on that legacy of debt left to us as a result of the mismanagement and gross overspending of his regime.

The fact is that the deficit this year is something like $30 billion. If his party had continued to be in charge the deficit this year, based on those trend lines, would be $99 billion. The national debt would be in the area of $700 to $800 billion. Canada would be on the verge of bankruptcy.

What have we done? Based on what was left to us, yes, this government has increased taxes and has reduced programs and reduced spending. Every single measure was opposed by the members opposite.

What I want to ask him, and I would like an answer, not this nonsense of fixing interest rates and the absence of the rest of the world, as if we did not have an increasingly interdependent global economy, not this nonsense of a lower dollar, as if we are suddenly going to magically pluck a figure out of the air and lower the dollar—Bangladesh style—and suddenly prosper. What I would like to know is what would the Liberal Party do with the deficit? Apparently it would not increase taxes, it would not reduce spending. What would it do? Just a simple straightforward answer, please.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks what we would do in terms of the deficit. I think it is very clear that—

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Borrow, borrow.

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member does not want to give me an opportunity to respond. The fact of the matter is that his monetary policies and the policies of the Minister of Finance, as echoed by the Bank of Canada, in themselves have contributed more to this national deficit than anything. When people are unemployed, people are not paying their fair share of taxes. Those kinds of things contribute substantially to a national deficit.

The monetary policy is what must be changed by this particular government to get the deficit and economy under control.

In conclusion, I am somewhat surprised that the hon. member would stand in the House and make reference to the national energy program, when the former premier of Alberta, Mr. Peter Lougheed, signed the deal here in Ottawa. The hon. member ought to be ashamed of himself for taking shots at the former premier of the province of Alberta.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to add a few of my thoughts and words to this debate on the throne speech. By their nature, speeches from the throne are usually pretty general. Other speakers and media commentators have pointed out that they tend to lack specifics. They are not unlike a motto though, something that sets a tone and a direction.

Before being elected to this place, while serving as mayor, I wrote a motto for my municipality. We said that we had pride in our past and faith in our future.

That same motto should apply to our country today. The Royal Canadian Legion borrowed our motto for its diamond anniversary celebration. I am proud to share anything with the Royal Canadian Legion. I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to compliment the Dominion Command of the Legion for its recent initiative on national unity.

There is no group in Canada that has more invested in this country than do its members. The men and women who stood strong to defend our way of life are now, through their national unity campaign, continuing to fight to preserve the country in which they have invested so much.

I believe in the Canada they have worked for. I am very proud of our history.

In reflecting on that motto, one of the reasons that Canadians today may look to the future with discouragement is that they have not learned enough of our past. They do not have the pride in our Canadian history that they should have. Ours is a history of strong people who were willing to put aside individual differences and build a nation, a nation that exists today and is the envy of much of the world.

As members of Parliament, we have all had the opportunity to attend citizenship court. The most recent one I attended in Red Deer had 34 people from 18 different countries. Every one of them was there, not to become a hyphenated Canadian, but to become a Canadian.

In discussing with them afterwards, a number expressed amazement at how little Canadians knew about their own history. There is an old saying that if you do not appreciate what you have, you are going to lose it.

During the recess we each had the opportunity to spend some extra time with our electorate. We must have all heard that which we know, that we face serious challenges in our country and we are at a turning point in Canadian history.

There is a great malaise across this nation of ours. Canadians are concerned. They are also frustrated and upset. It is my strong personal opinion that we must be open to discussions on change in this very institution. However, the throne speech points out many other areas of change that Canadians must be open and receptive to.

There are many agendas across the nation and each is important to the people in those areas, and indeed to Canada as a whole. In my own province we want to see the Senate made responsive to the needs of Canadians and capable of defending the rights of the provinces. It is time for a major change.

I appreciated the comments of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs when he said that Senate reform would be one of the items that he would be addressing.

Challenges present opportunities and I see a major opportunity given us right now. The ongoing discussion, indeed the conflict and the questions have Canadians involved and attentive to the happenings in this House. The level of involvement and concern possibly makes politicians uncomfortable, but I think that is healthy. People should be aware of what goes on in their political institutions, and those of us who serve in political office have to be ready to accept comment and constructive criticism.

The economy and our ability to compete internationally is another reason why we must work together. A diminished Canada would diminish each of the regions as well. Those who believe otherwise are fooling themselves. It is true that in an individual sense the day-to-day activities of our lives might not be affected. We would still live in the same house, drive the same car, shop in the same store. The sun would still shine, the rain still fall and the seasons pass, but Canada would be diminished and there would be an economic price paid by all. We would lose our place at the G-7, our international prestige would diminish, and the resulting uncertainty could tie up courts and political effort for years. International monetary markets would question investment in this country. None of us can afford that uncertainty, and no thinking Canadian wants it.

Executives at major Canadian corporations were quoted in the press last week as saying:

> The separation of Quebec would do more than divide Canada. It would eliminate jobs and send investment, plants and opportunities to the United States, Europe and Asia.

It went on to say that our unity is strengthened by a strong economy and prosperity is enhanced by a united country, but that disunity in the face of global economic challenge invites decline.

I love this country. Canada is a great nation. I believe it became the great nation it is because of the core values it was developed upon: the belief in God and the dignity and worth of the individual.

Our society was built on the foundation of faith, family and community. I was encouraged by the one sentence in the throne speech where His Excellency said:

> My government will review its policy in relation to the family, the most fundamental building block of Canadian society.

There is systemic discrimination against the traditional family. It is wrong when a single parent will question whether he or she will get married because of the income tax implications and the child tax credit. It is wrong that two senior citizens would question whether to marry because of pension implications.

One sentence in the throne speech is not much, but I will be joining other members of our caucus in this House to encourage the government to act on it.

In many areas of the world the conflicts that exist within Canada today would be the basis of armed conflict. The hon. member for Edmonton Southwest recently remarked that we are engaged perhaps in a form of civil war in Canada, only in typical Canadian fashion we are trying to talk ourselves to death. We have problems and we are talking, and I believe we have the resolve to address them and to work out amiable solutions.

I feel it is very important that we try to understand and get to know people in all regions of Canada.

• (1630)

Recently the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs told rural Albertans that he and his family still live on the same land that was farmed by his father, grandfather, great-grandfather, back 11 generations. Nobody loves the land like an Alberta farmer, and to think of one family inhabiting one piece of land for 325 years gave them cause for serious thought.

Last summer I had the occasion to attend a special anniversary for the McAllister family in the Antler Hill district. It was celebrating the 100th anniversary of the arrival of the first McAllister to farm that land. This year, I plan to join the residents of Willowdale as they too celebrate the centennial of their rural community. These people are proud of their land and they are proud of their heritage. Their forefathers rode across Canada by wagon, by horse and by train to come to an unknown and uncertain part of this country. By coming to the west they helped to build a nation. We, their descendants, are very proud today of what they built. We are proud to be Albertans, but above all, we are proud Canadians and we know that any reduction to Canada is a reduction to us all.

In closing, I have a short poem to which I am sorry I cannot ascribe any author. I have checked it and it is listed as anonymous.

I stopped to watch them tear a building down
Some working men in my hometown.
With a heave and ho and a yes, yes yell,
They swung a beam and a sidewall fell.
I asked the foreman,"Are these men skilled?
The type you'd hire if you were to build?"
He chuckled and said, "No, indeed.
The commerce of labour is all I need.
For I can destroy in a day or two
What skilled men worked many years to build".
And I thought to myself as I wandered away
Which of these roles do I plan to play.

During our constitutional discussions and during the debate, there are all too many people in this country who have been willing to play the role of the destructor; the person who is willing to sit back, criticize and tear down the efforts of the others who are trying to build. We are the recipients of the efforts of many men and women who have constructively worked together in a struggle to forge a consensus and who have toiled with their minds and their bodies to develop the land, a land that is the envy of the entire world and a country that sits as an example.

I am confident that we can ignore the naysayers and overlook those who would simply criticize and tear down for their own political or personal reasons, because the needs of Canada are greater than the needs of any individual. Canada is worth fighting for. Should we succeed in our efforts to overcome the many problems and challenges that face us today, history may record this period as nothing more than a footnote. Should we fail, we will have to explain to our children and grandchildren what we were doing when Canada was ripped apart.

I was elected as an Albertan. I was also elected as a Canadian. I was not elected to see this country torn apart and I want my efforts to be recorded on the side of those who are willing to work and add my skills to the building of the greatest nation in the world, my Canada.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my friend who just spoke if he would comment on an article in Quorum today which stated, I believe—I do not have the exact quote in my hand—that he does not really support the present government policy of multiculturalism. Particularly, I think he referred to the funding of ethnocultural organizations. I would like to ask him to explain his concept of multiculturalism and his views on the government's policy and why he said this.

I would also like to know whether he represents many of the groups in Alberta, where there have been many ethnocultural organizations that have been very active and form the backbone of the population of Alberta and our western provinces, generally.

I would also be very interested to know whether his concept of multiculturalism looks at employment equity, racism and the needs for us to implement equality in society. We need to have an affirmative multicultural program that will work toward those goals.

I really think he needs to explain his position.

Mr. Fee: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to reply to the question of the hon. member for Vancouver East. It is not often that those of us who inhabit the backbenches get their name in Quorum and not too often do we get a chance to explain.

As the member well knows, each one of us in this House is very often interviewed by people from the media. They take our comments and they write them up. Quite often they attach their own headings and they editorialize a little bit in the comments.

The comments in Quorum today attributed to me were part of an extremely long interview that I did with one of my weekly newspapers. It took about a page and a half of the paper to do the whole thing. There were certain elements taken out of it and recorded, one of which was my comments on multiculturalism.

I touched on this very briefly in my comments when I referred to the citizenship court. Canada is made up of different ethnic groups, and Alberta is a tremendous example. In that diversity there is strength. It is also beautiful that we have so many cultures come together. I personally encourage those people to pay attention to their heritage because we have to know our heritage. If we do not appreciate our heritage, we do not appreciate what we have in the present and we cannot plan for the future.

At the same time, there has been no period in Canadian history when we needed to develop a sense of being Canadian more. My comments were critical of any funds that went to a hyphenated Canadian group. I do not feel that we should be encouraging people to stress their differences. Encourage them to recognize their own heritage, by all means, as that is important, it is the strength of Canada, but my comment was that the Government of Canada should not be funding people to be hyphenated Canadians. It is important at this juncture of our history that we develop a sense of community, being together, and what makes us the same, not what makes us different.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, on July 1, Canada will be 125 years old. It is going to be an uneasy birthday because we are wondering if we are going to reach 126, and if we do, what kind of Canada we will have. Will we have a unified Canada, a divided Canada or a Balkanized Canada? Those are the questions that are going through all of our minds and we are very worried about our country.

I mention that because there seems to be a mood in this House that has not been evident in past years: we do want a strong Canada, a united Canada. We have to work a little bit harder to ensure that happens, especially as we approach Canada's 125th birthday. We are only a month and a half away and I think that thought is really bearing pretty heavily on our minds.

Just to emphasize this, last evening I was leaving the House of Commons with a Liberal member of Parliament from the Moncton riding. He had with him a couple of relatives. Their names were Georgie and Murray Seeley from London, Ontario. They wanted to talk about Canada, and we talked very freely.

One of the things that Mrs. Seeley pointed out to me was that she and her husband, who are both World War II veterans, are very worried about what might be happening. Her question to me was: "Do you think we will get through this thing?" That seems to be the dominant question, the theme that is on everyone's mind.

That generation seems to have more of a feeling for this country than maybe the rest of us, because it knows what it is like to have to work for something and to preserve something worth preserving.

In the course of that conversation she asked about one of my constituents, whose name is Lorne Groom. They served together during that war and when Mr. and Mrs. Seeley mentioned the relationship with Mr. Groom, it brought back a lot of memories.

I mention this again for a very specific reason: to point out the sacrifices that many Canadians have made for our country.

• (1640)

Lorne Groom was a very young man in World War II. He is a double amputee who worked very hard and went through university. He raised a fabulous family and still resides in St. Stephen. In fact last week he experienced a great hardship when his wife passed on very unexpectedly.

When we look at people like the Seeleys, the Grooms and others around this country who have sacrificed so much, it really explains in toto why they are so nervous and upset with what is happening. They want to see us confident that we are going to get through this thing.

To me, the mood in this House is that we want to work together to ensure that we do get through our difficulties. We do want a united and strong Canada. We have to work to make it happen. We have taken so much for granted in this country in the last 25 or 30 years. Maybe it has been too easy for us. Maybe it is time that we reflect on the past and the sacrifices that Canadians, who in many cases are older than us, have made for the country and why they are so worried about it.

Despite all the difficulties that we are going through, we tend as Canadians to ignore the positive. There is so much happening in this country that is positive.

I am going to quote from a speech the Prime Minister gave in Calgary on April 22 of this year: "Those who claim that Canada's standard of living and quality of life, our social safety net and our legal system, our culture and our international status add up to failure must have a very strange definition of success. The evidence proves the contrary". The Prime Minister went on to point out that we could not afford to be complacent in this country.

But we are successful. Do we throw that success down the drain? Do we throw it all away? No, we do not. Canadians do not want to throw it all away. We simply have to work harder to continue the kind of success that Canada has enjoyed in the past number of years.

In terms of economic strength Canada is number eight in the world, although in terms of population we rank 31st. We have earned our place and we have to maintain it. We have earned our place at the economic summit. We sit beside countries like the United States, Japan, France, United Kingdom and Italy. We have earned our place. We have to maintain it, but we are not going to do it by being complacent. We have to get at the reasons why we were successful in the past. We have to respond to changes that have to come about but which are not always easy.

We have to take a very strong look at our educational system in this country and what we are doing. Some of the alarming statistics point out that we are not doing it all right. It is estimated that 40 per cent of new jobs created by the year 2000 will be highly skilled. Today, that figure is only 24 per cent.

One of the things that we are very conscious of is that at 30 per cent Canada has one of the highest high school dropout rates in the world. It is 30 per cent. As a nation we spend more on education than 90 per cent of all other countries in the world.

Yet, we have statistics that are so alarming. They point out that a large percentage of our population is not functionally literate. Given those alarming statistics, do we have any hope of competing in the future? Do we have any hope of competing against countries in the world that are changing or have changed with the times, that are willing to commit and have committed resources to those changes that are being dictated to us? We cannot go on in the old sense of doing things, the old ways of doing things.

The Speech from the Throne simply indicates that Canada and this government are willing to move with the times and make the changes that are necessary to ensure that future Canadian generations will be as prosperous as we have been in the past. We are going to commit the resources to ensure that happens.

When Canadians look at us and scrutinize us very carefully in this House in the coming weeks, I hope they can identify that sense of urgency, that we realize what has to be done and we are going to work together to make it happen. A unified Canada is a prosperous Canada. We need to have that economic prosperity, that dedication to task, to make it happen. I am convinced that we will and it will not be the politicians who do it. It will be Canadians themselves who will do it.

The cynicism that surrounds politicians is very understandable. From time to time in this House Canadians witness unnecessary heckling and criticism back and forth across the floor and they wonder what we are doing here to resolve some of the difficulties.

I think the urgency of the times has drawn a line across that type of behaviour and we realize we have to work together. We can have our differences, but we are going to have to work very hard to get through this thing.

On July 1, when we celebrate our 125th year, maybe we will have that sense of optimism that we are going to make it to 126. We are only going to do it by working together, working for that common goal which is a prosperous Canada, a unified Canada.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the hon. member. I certainly share his concerns about national unity.

I want to comment on the lack of concrete plans in the Speech from the Throne for jobs for Canadians at the present time. I have a question that I want to ask the hon. member.

I know that in my own province of Prince Edward Island the unemployment rate is running roughly 2 per cent more than it was at this time last year. We have a lot of people looking for jobs, as we have all across this country.

We look to this Speech from the Throne to offer them some hope, and here again the government has let them down. Not only that, but last week in my province we were told that the GST centre which was to open in the fall of 1992 will now be delayed one year until 1993.

When the Prime Minister promised this, he said it would be open in the fall of 1992. Then it was delayed until January 1993, then to June 1993, and now we are into the fall of 1993. I must say that last weekend I had a number of people speak to me who were beginning to doubt the commitment of this government to ever open that centre.

I have never heard a logical reason for this delay. It has been reported in the press that some government officials have said that the delay has to do with the battle that this party, my party, waged against the GST. That is absolutely foolish. It does not make any sense. I do not think that this type of nonsense has any place in an issue where the economic survival of a community is at stake. This government started the GST on the date that it had planned and continued through with its plan to collect the tax. If it can do that, surely it can continue with the construction of that GST centre and get it open, if it has the will to do it.

• (1650)

I want to ask the hon. member: Does he agree that the lack of job creation possibilities in the Speech from the Throne, coupled with delays like the GST centre in Summerside, are completely unacceptable?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, in direct answer to the question regarding the GST centre, that would probably be more appropriate if it were answered by the minister in the House. I am sure the hon. member will put that question to the appropriate minister soon, if she has not already done so.

With regard to the big picture of the economy, one of the things that the opposition fails to recognize is that Canada is part of the western world. The decline in the economy, and if you want, to a recession in the western world, is something that we cannot avoid because we are international players, international traders, and we cannot escape that reality.

If the member would look beyond just Canada, and I know that she does, the devastation in the U.S. with regard to the slowdown in its economy, has been greater than it has been in Canada, far greater. That does not remove us from our own responsibilities. In that sense we have a tremendous responsibility, no question about it, to get the economy moving again.

I believe that we will because I believe that the policies we are putting forward are the types of policies that will get us through the hard times and will create a stronger and more vibrant Canadian economy.

We cannot remove ourselves from the real world. We cannot buy our way out of problems. That was the tendency of previous governments.

Mr. Speaker, if you give me just a minute, I want to explain this. This pen—I often do this when I am speaking to groups—I pull it out of my pocket and I say, this has been the biggest enemy of the Canadian taxpayer since Confederation, especially the last 25 or 30 years. For the last 25 or 30 years successive governments and politicians from all sides—I am not just picking on the Liberals or the NDP, I can say it about Conservative governments as well—have pulled this pen out of their pockets and just written the cheque, knowing darn right well the money was not there. What did we do? We saddled the Canadian people with a huge debt because the easy answer for those 25 or 30 years was write the cheque, buy off the Canadian people. What we were doing was mortgaging the country.

I do not want to see that happen. It will not happen with this government. It did not happen in the last budget brought forward by this government and it is certainly not reflected—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I think that some people in this House realize that this is probably one of the most important debates so far as a throne speech is concerned that we are going to have because it will be during this session that many of the national problems concerning the national unity of this nation will have to be grappled with and, indeed, solved.

Therefore, we must take a very serious approach to this whole business of national unity and the economy. I am a firm believer that when people are dissatisfied over the economy, it certainly gives them more to complain about what is happening in the country. It is weakening national unity at the same time.

In previous speeches in the House, I have said that what this good old nation of Canada needs is a good dose of healthy national spirit. I do not think we are going to get this if we are going to keep on complaining inwardly about ourselves and if we are going to be downgrading ourselves in the eyes of the world.

We have indeed been given a great nation to manage. What we have to do is talk more about our opportunities in this country. We have to talk about the assets that we have been given, that we have inherited in this nation. We have to talk about what the Fathers of Confederation set going—and not just the Fathers of Confederation, but those people before them who for years built the colony which eventually became the nation.

The Fathers of Confederation had great insight for people in that particular age. Many things have happened to date that they could not visualize any more than we in this House today or anyone across this nation is going to visualize what is going to happen in the next 25 years of Canadian history. The country will have to adjust accordingly. We may well have to adjust our Constitution along the way to meet those challenges.

I think we, as Canadians, have to realize that God has given us a great land. We have indeed been blessed. If we do not manage it correctly, then we have no one to blame but ourselves. But there must be the right attitude. You cannot do it if you have a lot of negative attitudes. If you do not have a positive attitude, you are not going to build anything.

We in this nation have seldom been without the necessities of life. Indeed, there have been some people across the country who have experienced hard times and who have had difficult moments in their lives looking after their families, but we have found that for Canadians generally, be it at the community level or be it with our social programs in Canada, a great deal has been done to help everybody over those rough periods here in this nation of ours. We must never lose that feeling of empathy, that feeling of concern for our fellow individuals, any more than we should lose that feeling of empathy and concern for the international community. No nation in the world has been able to build the international highways of good will that have been built up by former statesmen in this House, former public servants in Canada and former Canadians generally.

It is indeed a great time. People say: "Oh, they are challenging times, things are difficult, my goodness what are we going to do next?" Well, what we do is sit down and get going on the challenge. You don't sit around wringing your hands, complaining and bickering and badgering.

I want to mention the economy one more time at the beginning of my speech. During modern day times when the economy goes flat, it affects far more Canadians than it ever did before. Even during the "dirty thirties", as people called them, by far the largest portion of Canadians still lived on farms and in small rural communities, were able to plant a garden and grow potatoes and kill the pigs in the fall, and they got by. They got by, but why? What added quality was there?

They got by because those Canadians, in many cases our parents, came through that because they had a faith. That is something that we have got to develop, within our own minds and our own mentality today. Do we have a faith to go ahead and build this nation? Do we have a faith to go ahead and work hard and be productive? Do we have a faith to believe in Canada?

I don't say this by way of criticism, Mr. Speaker, but I have heard people get up in this House and say: "I am an Albertan", "I am a Quebecer", "I am so-and-so". Well, Mr. Speaker, I am a Canadian. I may live in Ontario, and I am proud to live in Ontario and to have grown up there, but as a federal member of Parliament, I am a Canadian. If we are going to start building a national spirit in this country, we have got to forget those former terminologies that describe us, and from day one we are Canadians. We must make up our minds that we are going to build a national spirit in this country that will give great pride to Canadians at large.

• (1700)

Leadership is very important. Every time we get up in this House and start talking the blues and bickering and bantering with one another, we are discouraging Canadians. We have to stand up in this House and say first of all that we need to have faith in ourselves and we need to have faith in our fellow members in this House and in the other chamber. We have to realize that we are here to do a job for the people of Canada. We have to realize that we are here as federalists and that we are going to build a nation that we are going to be proud of.

We are very vocal at times in criticising the Americans and the way they build up their country and their pride and so on. We sometimes look upon that as being a bit artificial, but when the President of the United States gets on national television and asks the American people to pull together for the good of the nation, they do it. We must have a strong base where we, ourselves, have faith in this nation, where we implant that faith in all Canadians.

People came here from other countries and are Canadians today. They have adopted this country. Some of them have greater faith in this nation than we have demonstrated. I think that is a shame. Let us begin with that premise.

The other thing that sometimes bothers me in this House is comments about politicians. Yes, we know. I have been around long enough to know when people are angry and when they are in good humour. That is a cycle in politics. There are difficult times. A certain generation of politicians may start arguing and bickering at one another and give people the wrong impression. People blame it on television in the House, but there were wars on the floor of this House of Commons long before television was ever heard of. People ask me: "Does television make a difference?" Television makes a difference, but people across Canada see what is going on here.

However, if we would have had television in this House in 1917 when we had the great debate on conscription across this country, people would not have thought too much of politicians at that time either. This is not a new phenomenon, but it does mean that we have to clean up our act. There is nothing wrong with having strong debates, that is the name of the game. This House is not going to become a puritanical temple where people are not going to argue with one another in honest and earnest debate from time to time. There will always be very strong debate in this House.

Politicians sometimes downgrade themselves by admitting that they are not really showing a good image of themselves, that the people are angry with them because they are not doing their job properly or because they are debating. The first thing we have to realize is that this is a debating institution. From there on, as far as behaviour is concerned, it comes down to the question: "Do we have faith in ourselves and do we have faith enough to have earnest debate back and forth across the floor of this House without getting nasty?"

There is a good old rule in politics that I always use, and in my experience it normally works. If you treat the average individual with a little sense of decency and common sense, they will respond twofold. If we, once in a while, gave them a little encouragement verbally in this House, that would do a great deal to encourage them to go ahead with their daily jobs.

Do not downgrade ourselves as politicians. I am proud to be an elected member of this House of Commons. I am proud to be an elected Canadian who can get up and speak on behalf of my constituents, and even for the larger community abroad from coast to coast to coast in this nation. We must realize the great assets we have, the great things we have to work for. We must take examples from those who came to this country with nothing and have succeeded. That is what we have to do. We are only going to do it if we have the energy and determination to do it ourselves.

I want to discuss regional development factors. If we are going to develop a Canadian nation, it has always been the case, over the decades of Canadian history, that as regional development goes, so goes the nation.

Northern and eastern Ontario are in a downturn now. What is happening in Toronto? Toronto is in a downturn because it is losing industry. The larger urban centres of our nation suffer when the regions that feed them suffer because they do not get the same input and do not have people doing the same kind of business with them from right across that particular region.

These are basic economic issues for the future development of Canada. What are important issues in regional development? Well, it has to be admitted that the free trade agreement, regardless of what we think of it on either side of this House, has hurt agriculture in this country. There is no question about that.

The dairy industry is very concerned and has been for some time. There is no question whatsoever that the famous memorandum of understanding, signed by a former Minister of International Trade who now has the delight of sitting in the Senate as a reward, putting a 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber to the United States hurt the lumber industry. We in northern and eastern Ontario, and in particular this region, have seen the effects of that since day one. There is no question about it.

When we see 300 people walking away from a sawmill, we think of the 15 per cent export tax, we think of high interest rates and an artificially high Canadian dollar. Then we think of all the added expenses the truckers have to put up with in order to transport those goods to market.

How can we succeed under that? Again, I come back to my original theory. If we are going to have faith in this nation, we have got to correct some of those inequities and not just sit back and complain about it. I wish some of us were on the government side of the House so we could do something about these issues. When we get there, we will clean it up.

We are no sooner reeling from the results of free trade with the United States than the government is running headlong into free trade with Mexico. We have already seen what can happen. Of the eight industries that left the town of Renfrew, in my riding, one was the Playtex plant. Some of that business went to Mexico because of cheap labour. Some went to parts of the Far East. Those interests go wherever the low wages are.

What are we going to do to handle that? Are we going to lower our wages in this country down to poorhouse wages? We have more faith in ourselves than that. We may have to adjust and do other things we can do better. It has to be done.

The government had promised that company that it was going to take the tax off the raw material that came into Canada from the United States. So the company thought: "Great, we will stay in Canada". It waited until after the free trade agreement was passed, and what happened? The tax on the raw material coming in from New Jersey, or wherever, was not taken off. So the company felt betrayed and left.

Those are just some examples. It is true that there is a big link between the economy and national unity in this country, as I said in the beginning. It is too bad it has taken the government so long to find that out.

I was delighted to see the recognition in the throne speech, just as I was delighted to see our leader's term: "the Canada round", referring to the next round of negotiations to try to amend our Canadian Constitution and create a base for national unity.

• (1710)

The term "Canada round" was used by the leader of the Liberal Party months before this throne speech came into play. We do not mind them picking up some of our good points. We can give them lots of good points if they would use them. We hope they will.

It is too bad the government is seen to be so eager to produce quickly with free trade agreements. With the deindustrialization of places like Ontario, with what has happened to the lumber industry, as I have outlined, you almost begin to wonder whether this government really knows for which nation it is the national government.

We see the trucking industry in the United States getting preference over our industry and the forest industry getting preference. I just want to say here that on the defence side there are all kinds of contracts. The Americans are holding back some of those contracts for themselves in the United States. Are we really on a free trade basis?

This government was elected in 1984 and stated that it was going to do everything possible for the Department of National Defence. We heard all these great comments, but the fact remains that the defence department personnel certainly are not very proud of what the government is doing for them now.

It wants them to go abroad. It wants them to go into the Persian Gulf and anywhere in the world for peacekeeping. When the soldiers came home from the Persian Gulf, the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and the Associate Minister of National Defence were all there shaking hands with them when they came off the plane.

About two weeks later, they said: "We are going to cut you by 25 per cent." That was their reward. Some of these things have great effect on the regional development of this country. The then Minister of National Defence even mentioned this while some of the troops were still in the Persian Gulf. You can imagine what encouragement that gave to them.

Regional development involves post offices and various industries, government departments and so on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia)): I regret to inform the hon. member that his time is up.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a bit of a statement and a question.

Basically the hon. member is promoting a protectionist approach to government direction. There is no question there is a world-wide recession. We cannot blame the free trade agreement for the problems we are facing. In my opinion the free trade agreement should have happened 20 years ago. The world is becoming a smaller place in which to do business.

The hon. member mentioned agriculture. For instance, in wheat and grains alone Canada has exported to the U.S. an additional 16 per cent since the free trade agreement.

I was talking to a businessman from Winnipeg who has a leather factory. He tells me business has never been so good. It employs 60 people in Winnipeg and the same number in Nova Scotia. You cannot lay the blame of a recession on the free trade agreement.

Would the hon. member, if his government were elected, support removing the free trade agreement? Would he support tearing it up?

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I never blamed the recession on the free trade agreement. As all Canadians do, I blame the recession on the Government of Canada. You are the ones who created it. To have the gall to stand up here and misinterpret my remarks I think is pretty weak.

As far as saying that I was giving a protectionist speech, my goodness, I just explained what happened with the softwood lumber industry. This government signed a protectionist agreement with the United States just moments before it signed the official free trade agreement. Why did they do that? Because that was the last nail in the Canadian coffin that the Americans wanted. They are hard bargainers, we all know that. They are great neighbours but they are hard bargainers. That was the last nail in the Canadian coffin and they wanted that nail in there before they would sign the free trade agreement.

This government used a protectionist measure to destroy the softwood lumber industry in Canada in order to get its free trade agreement. It will not have to use the same thing with Mexico because they will probably want us there anyway.

Mr. Gustafson: Are you going to keep it or tear it up?

Mr. Reid: Would you tear it up?

Mr. Hopkins: What would we do when we are elected? We are going to look at that free trade agreement and use common sense. We are not going holus-bolus down the road and we will change the things that are hurting Canada. We are not going to coast along with this.

Mr. Gustafson: He won't commit himself.

Mr. Hopkins: The hon. member is trying to say something here about something I never said.

I want to say to him, if the Conservatives are so all interested in free trade, why did they not first of all tackle the provincial barriers in Canada to get them out of the way? They have not done that. They have been in power for seven years and they are still blaming the previous Liberal government. They will still be blaming the previous Liberal government the day they are defeated and the Liberals are back in power again. Then we will have the mammoth job of fixing up all the things in Canada that they have destroyed.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment very quickly. As usual my friend from the Ottawa Valley makes a tremendous amount of sense, particularly when he talks about regional development and that sort of thing.

To suggest, first of all, that a world-wide recession is the fault of the Canadian government is a bit beyond even this government's capacity and I think his credence. He cannot deny there is a world-wide recession and he cannot blame that on the Canadian government.

Mr. Jordan: Tell your Prime Minister that.

Mr. Reid: He cannot blame that on the Canadian government.

People ask me what I think about the free trade negotiations with Mexico. I have to say, I do not know, because I do not know what the proposal is. I also say to them that it strikes me as obvious that if the Americans are going to sit down with the Mexicans, and we are on the same continent and the Americans are our biggest trading partners, we should be at the table.

Would a Liberal government, if that remote possibility could ever be imagined, allow the Mexicans and the Americans to negotiate a trade deal and not sit at the table?

Mr. Hopkins: The Conservatives are great at asking hypothetical questions.

Mr. Reid: Well, you're talking hypothetical economic theory.

Mr. Hopkins: The hon. member obviously does not want an answer because—

Mr. Reid: What should we do?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has just asked the question. I would hope that he would allow the hon. member to answer.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I get the distinct feeling that he is afraid of what I am going to give for an answer, because he is not going to let me answer.

The Liberal government will use common sense in its trade deals. It is not going to go holus-bolus down the road with anybody if it is going to hurt the economy of this nation.

Why is the Prime Minister finally over in Asia to talk? He is over there because he wants to take some of the heat off the negotiations with Mexico. He wants to take some of the heat off the American free trade, as they call it. It is not very free to many people in Canada. The truckers would not agree with the government that it is free trade. They do not agree with it on deregulation either.

The real essence of Canadian government is that the government of the day, any day, must use common sense, reasonable business management and a little financial management too. While this government thinks it has done everything in the world, that it is just one of the finest bankers going and one of the best financial managers going, the fact is that it has indeed more than doubled—it is on the way to tripling—the national debt of this country in six and a half years.

After the previous Minister of Finance had the gall to say in August 1984: "We don't have to increase taxes to pay off the deficit or pay off the national debt. All we have to do is cancel government programs". The government has cancelled programs day in and day out. It has raised the taxes of this country 33 times since taking office and it has not made an impact. The national debt is still going up by leaps and bounds. That is the kind of managers these people are. It is time they are the customers rather than the managers.

• (1720)

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to talk about the subject of Canadian unity, the theme in the Speech from the Throne.

It has been said many times, but I think most Canadians realize that this is a critical and difficult time in the constitutional history of Canada. Most Canadians are coming to the realization that it is a fact of life and something that we will have to come to grips with, that there will have to be a constitutional accommodation within Canada. I think that can be a very healthy thing.

When you look at the Canadian Constitution, there is no particular reason why an individual should be married under provincial law and divorced under federal law. Hopefully a look at our constitutional documents will yield a new accommodation that will make more sense and will be to the benefit of the Canadian Confederation. It is going to be a difficult job and everyone knows that.

Sometimes partisan considerations can get in the way of making a good accommodation for Canada. I do not denigrate partisan politics. I take pride in the fact that I am a partisan. I love partisan debate. I love the Progressive Conservative Party and I have been a member of it since my childhood but, at the same time, I do not think that either my partisan views or the partisan views of other members should get in the way of coming to the accommodation that we will need in Canada.

Let me give you an example of what I am talking about. I remember, shortly after my election in 1984, sitting down with one my constituents who was very much identified with a political party other than my own. It became obvious after awhile that it was very difficult, these partisan differences between the two of us, to talk about what, in effect, was a mutual problem. After awhile I said to the man involved, "Look, let's make a deal here. I am not going to look for your vote. I do not expect your vote. I am going to take a chance that I will not win or lose the 1988 election by one or more votes. So let's you and I agree that you are not going to try and change me because you will not. Let us get on with the problem and see if there is something that we can come up with."

I do not think that is a bad way for Canadians to proceed. Quite apart from whatever their perceptions are of me or the Progressive Conservative Party, this government or of politicians, it should not colour their perceptions about the need to come to an acceptable solution to Canada's constitutional needs.

If we can solve that, there will always be plenty of time. We have a long, great democratic tradition in this country where there will always be room and time for partisan politics, but this is too important an issue for that. I believe the stakes are very, very high.

I was at a meeting of the Royal Canadian Legion, the Stanford branch, several weeks ago. One of the veterans there, a man by the name of Frank Simon who lost an arm in World Word II, told me and those assembled that night that the veterans had fought for all of Canada, had fought for all of the provinces and all the territory of Canada, and the veterans, he said, are counting on the politicians and, indeed, all Canadians to keep this country together. I think those are good words to remember in this debate because when all is said and done, this is a wonderful country. You only have to visit other countries in the world, you only have to talk to any of the people who come into our office who want to emigrate to Canada, to know just how lucky we are as Canadians. I think it is important that we remind ourselves of that sometimes.

All of us have had conversations where we dwell on the problems that Canada is facing. All of us have letters that enumerate all the things that are wrong with Canada. Of all the letters I get, the ones that bother me the most are not the ones that criticize me personally. They are not the ones that criticize this government. They are not the ones that criticize politicians. They are the letters and comments that seem to take aim at Canada itself. Those are the ones I find very difficult and upsetting, even after being in this business for six or seven years.

What I say to them, to all Canadians, and to my constituents is: "Okay, there are many problems in Canada. I think we can solve them". Perhaps we have even made a list of all the things we think are wrong with Canada. But in every argument there is another side. Is it not equally valid, once we have talked about all the provinces, to talk about all the great things about Canada? Is that not equally valid? I think it is.

Whenever I mention the wonderful things in Canada, the obvious counter argument is: "Well, there are still problems with that. It is not perfect". To which I reply: "The list of things that are absolutely no problems or the list of things that are perfect is a very, very short list". If we acknowledge that, which can be the perennial criticism, we should talk about, we should list, and we should think within ourselves as Canadians about all the things that make Canada the great country it is, if we could possibly list them.

I have been saying to people for many, many years that we have the best health care system in the world. The best health care system in the world is right here in Canada. People say that there are problems with it, that it is not perfect. I acknowledge that it is the best in the world, right here in Canada.

This parliamentary system is one of the wonderful things about Canada. This is an open system. This is a Parliament that gives an opportunity to individuals who are not rich or are not born into an aristocracy. This Parliament is open to all who have ambition and who have something to say about Canada. That is one of the wonderful things about Canada.

We can check all the judicial systems in the world, but I know of none better at balancing the public interest and individual rights than our judicial system.

We have an open, accessible, affordable education system in Canada.

Someone said to me recently: "The geography and climate in Canada mean that we are spared most of the natural disasters we read about almost every night in the paper. Those are things we should be thankful for". However, if this country is going to pull together, if it is going to solve the problems we face, it will take all of us looking at the big picture. It will take all of us looking beyond whether we like politicians. It will not just be politicians that will be able to solve this. We need the special interest groups that will say: "Okay, let us look at the greater good of Canada at the same time as looking at our needs".

We will have to ask the media to say: "There is a bigger picture here".

An hon. member: Good luck.

Mr. Nicholson: One member says "Good luck" to me on that. Mr. Speaker, you can check my record. I have not been a basher of the CBC. I do not think I have ever mentioned it. However, I was a little distraught two weeks ago to read an article in Maclean's magazine. I am not going to get into it because there may be rebuttals for these things. I see how difficult it was for us if Dr. Meisel's comments are correct about the coverage of the Meech Lake Accord.

I would say to the media, to politicians, to partisan politicians, to all of us: "Let us give Canada a break this time, because Canada needs some help from everybody". It is worth it.

Sir John A. Macdonald said that if Canada wants to have its own country, if Canada wants to pursue its own destiny, there will be prices to be paid to be Canadians. That was true in 1867 and it is true today. I believe that when Canadians look within themselves, they will come to the conclusion that Canada is worth the effort.

• (1730)

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments with regard to the hon. member's speech.

First of all, I think most members would probably agree with him in the sense that the constitutional debate should be a non-partisan type of debate. I would tend to agree with that also. But the difficulty I have with that and the difficulty that people have with that are the actions of the present government.

The present government, as I see it and as many Canadians see it, has contributed to the problem in Canada. It has contributed to disunity, mistrust and the loss of confidence in the system. Rather than developing the proper attitude and esprit that is necessary, this government has been dismantling many of the institutions that have kept us united over the years.

I can mention the CBC, VIA Rail cuts, and even Canada Post. In many areas in Canada the only federal presence they have in their communities is the post office with the Canadian flag on it. Right at the present moment, even in my own area of Restigouche—Chaleur and in northern New Brunswick, we see what they are doing to Canada Post. Recent announcements indicate the possibility of laying off 11 workers in an area where the unemployment rate is 18.5 per cent. They are going to lay off 11 workers for the sake of rationalization. There is no way that Canada Post can convince me that it is going to be more efficient to send mail 200 miles east to be sorted only to come back west later. At the present time it is being sorted right in that area and then sent directly west.

I find it very difficult to believe that it will be a non-partisan debate. I hope it will be for the sake of the country, but now the biggest malaise out there is not necessarily a mistrust in the politicians but a mistrust in this government. They see that the government has contributed to the problem of unity in this country and dismantled many of our national institutions that were there to keep our country united.

Does the hon. member agree with the type of program that his government is carrying out in the sense that it has announced cutbacks in public servants, some 90,000 of them since its mandate started? It is proud of that and wants to continue that. Does he agrees with the Canada Post policy of completely closing down rural post offices?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just enumerated, I believe if I counted right, eight different things he sees wrong with the government and with the programs of the last six or seven years.

If the hon. member wants a non-partisan debate, I will tell him something that may sound partisan to him, but it is something I deeply believe in and something I believe to be correct.

Contrary to comments that I read that were reported by Dr. Meisel about the motives of our Prime Minister when it comes to national unity, I can tell the hon. member that I have listened to the Prime Minister carefully throughout two Parliaments now, the 33rd and the 34th Parliaments. I have listened to him speak to our national caucus every Wednesday morning for the past six and a half years. I believe as strongly as I believe in anything else that the Prime Minister of Canada sincerely wants the best for all Canada. He will go to any lengths to preserve the unity of this country in reasonable, fair terms by which all Canadians live. I believe he is capable of doing that. I believe the leadership is in other political parties as well to come together and take that kind of non-partisan approach that will act in the best interests of this country.

I say that because I saw it at the time of the Meech Lake Accord when it was very difficult for political leadership in this House and throughout Canada to come together. Not only do I believe that the Prime Minister can do that. I believe that kind of leadership exists within other political parties in Canada as well.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation for the opportunity to take part in this throne speech debate and to express some of my concerns arising from the government's current economic and other policies which I believe are contributing to the state of this country today and are tearing this country apart.

I listened with interest to the speech of the member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke. It is important to understand that many Canadians, when they express concern about the unity of the country, are concerned about the economic issues and their status within the national economy. I think that is a serious part of the problem this country is facing today.

I listened to the Minister of Communications when he opened the debate today. He talked about what the Fathers of Confederation were facing in the period between 1864 to 1867 when as the Minister of Communications said they were looking at putting or stitching together a disparate set of colonies with stitches or ribbons of steel.

I am not sure that when he talked about the vision of those Fathers of Confederation that that was actually the vision they had. I think the Fathers of Confederation were probably more concerned at the time in addressing the economic and various social problems they were facing as partisan politicians of the day. They were trying to deal with the problems of their relations with the United States economy, trying to deal with the problems of transportation and communications within what was then British North America, trying to deal with the problems of two very disparate cultures that existed in the North America of the day. Essentially, they were not politicians with long-term visions; they were pragmatic politicians who were trying to deal with the problems they perceived were facing British North America at the time they set out on their project of nation building.

The other thing in the process of nation building that these politicians were facing was the fact that they were operating against the natural geography of North America. Those disparate colonies that the Minister of Communications was talking about were in essence extensions of the geographic systems of North America: the Atlantic provinces are an extension of Appalachia; central Canada is an extension of the central United States.

They were trying to create a nation in British North American that ran contrary to the normal and natural boundaries and process of human communication within the geographic areas of North America.

It was a great challenge. It was an inspiring challenge to those of us who are trying to deal with similar problems in the current day because what those politicians were attempting to do was ignore the natural boundaries of North America and create a nation which, rather than running from north to south, ran from east to west across the natural barriers of the country.

Given what they had to work with I think they did a terrific job. The Canada of today is a tribute to the foresight of those Fathers of Confederation and also of subsequent Parliaments which generally followed in their pragmatic footsteps. To the credit of the founders of the Canadian nation they ignored those natural boundaries, the pressures and the pulls from the United States, and they created this country of Canada.

I think they had to recognize, Mr. Speaker, as you and I have to recognize today, that we are living in the third largest national state in the world, one of the largest countries on the globe. We have a very small population, 27 million people spread in general over a tiny belt of land adjacent to the United States boundary. The logistics of trying to create, manage, and sustain a country that is built on that basis is very difficult for any Parliament, for any government, for any politician and it requires a tremendous amount of pragmatism, of looking at the problems facing you, the circumstances facing you, and dealing in real terms with those problems.

I think over the years that is precisely what we have had. We have been well served by parliaments in terms of their pragmatic approach in dealing with this country—which defies national order—and keeping this country together.

We have been, I think the operative word is pragmatic. Unfortunately, within the last few years, governments have tended to become more and more ideological. In those terms they are following the political culture of the United States, which is becoming more and more polarized in terms of right wing politicians and liberal politicians. As a consequence it appears that the government in this country is becoming more and more oriented to the kind of free market theory that seems to have been adopted by the Reagan Republicans in the United States.

It is that orientation towards the free market theory that has undermined and destroyed the pragmatism that generally governed politicians in this country up to the present government. As a result, we are seeing the forces that are tearing this country apart coming from an ideological commitment and from a dismissing of the pragmatic approach to governing Canada.

As the Fathers of Confederation saw it, Canada was a very large land mass that had to be held together to support a very small population. Well, how do you do that? You cannot do it simply with private investment because no investor in his or her right mind would invest money in such a very small market distributed over such a very large land area. So there was a necessity for government involvement in these kinds of investments.

The Government of Canada became involved in the building of the national railway system. Essentially it was a joint venture between private entrepreneurs and the Government of Canada, so there was public money as well as private money involved in what the Minister of Communications called that ribbon of steel that stitched the colonies of British North America together.

In addition, when the time came to have an airline in Canada, that initiative did not come from the private sector because there was not sufficient market to serve in order for the private sector to make a profit. The Government of Canada became involved and set up the trans-Canada airlines system, which became Air Canada.

The government also became involved in other areas of transportation and communications. The post office became a communications system that extended through every part of Canada, as our leader likes to say, from coast to coast to coast. You could send a letter to any part of Canada whether you sent it next door or you sent it up to northern Canada, it could all be done at the same rate. All Canadians have the right to communicate with their fellow Canadians on an equal basis.

All of these things were done through government investment, because the government and the pragmatic politicians of the day realized that if they were going to keep a small population welded together into a nation over the huge land mass that is Canada, it was going to require a more pragmatic approach than could be provided by the ideologies of the day.

One of the problems that Canada is facing today is that they have an extremely ideological government that ignores the pragmatic requirements of this country and in fact has adopted economic policies that are tearing the country apart.

What has this government done? It has virtually eliminated passenger rail service in the country. That ribbon of steel that the Minister of Communications was talking about no longer serves Canadians in the same way that it served Canadians before. There is no continuous passenger service across this country because the Tories in applying their marketplace test to that institution, decided it did not meet the test. It may have met the national unity test; it may have been important from the point of view of national unity, but the Tories decided that it did not meet the marketplace test and therefore they undermined the VIA Rail passenger service that was used as a link to keep Canadians together from one end of the country to the other.

The same thing is happening with the post office. It used to be that if you went to any community in Canada, from the east coast to the west coast, to the north coast, there was Canada Post with the name of the community on the side and with the Canadian flag flying overhead. This party with its ideological rigidity decided that even though the post office system met the test of national unity, something that Canadians could perceive as an institution in their community, whether they lived in eastern Canada, western Canada, northern Canada, central Canada, it did not meet the market test.

Therefore, the Conservatives dismantled the Canada Post system by privatizing rural post offices, by putting postal services into Seven-11 stores in communities all over the province. When we go to buy our stamps, money orders and pick up our parcels and mail, where do we pick it up? Do we pick it up in an institution with the Canadian flag flying overhead? No, we pick it up in a private enterprise store owned by the Southland Corporation of the United States.

In that way they undermine the unity of this country for market reasons, for ideological reasons. It has created serious divisions between Canadians, serious divisions within the Canadian community. The same thing has happened with virtually every other national institution that was put together, not with a market test in mind but with the national unity test in mind in order to keep this country together.

It is unfortunate that the Tories have allowed themselves to be strictly hidebound to this market test, to this ideological test while ignoring the requirements for national unity.

As the Fathers of Confederation determined, sometimes it does not make sense in terms of geography and the economy to build a nation where there was not a nation before. Sometimes it required a commitment beyond the market test. They challenged that commitment, they met that commitment and they built this nation.

Now unfortunately what we are perceiving in the Conservative economic policy is that they simply apply the market test, whether it is to CBC, whether it is to VIA Rail, whether it is to Air Canada, whether it is to Petro-Canada, and they have failed to apply the national unity test. As a result they are dismantling many of the national institutions that Canadians perceive as necessary to keep this country together.

One of the serious cracks that have occurred in the system of national unity in the last few years is as a result of the so-called free trade agreement between Canada and the United States.

Before I discuss that, I want to discuss social policy because it is not simply the concrete and the steel, and the communication and transportation systems that are the bulwarks of national unity in this country. Pragmatic politicians in later days also saw that there was a necessity to maintain a consistent standard of social programs across Canada so that someone who entered a hospital in the provinces of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, or someone who entered hospital in the provinces of British Columbia, Ontario or Quebec, could enjoy the same standard of care regardless of where they entered that hospital.

The same is true of social programs, such as welfare, child support and that kind of thing. The same is true of old age pensions and family allowances. All of these things became a part of the bulwark of national unity so that Canadians in one part of the country felt they were equal in terms of the benefits they received from the government as Canadians in any other part of the country.

Conservative economic policy, based on Conservative ideology, rather than on a pragmatic need to keep this country together, to sustain and to maintain it has begun to tear that system of social benefits apart, so that soon in the ultimate goal of this Tory ideology is to disassemble that system of social benefits so that some Canadians benefit more than others or some Canadians in some regions of this country are going to benefit more than others.

The result of that dismantling of social policies, of that bulwark of national unity is going to be threats to national unity, a decline in the sense of nationhood among Canadians because of the feeling that some Canadians are going to benefit more greatly than others.

The same thing has happened with Tory fiscal policy, with taxation policy. I think everybody who reads the statistics of Statistics Canada will know that the changes in the tax system, the so-called tax reform that this party has brought out, have resulted in the rich in this country becoming richer and more secure while the poor in this country have become poorer and less secure.

I ask you members, sitting in the House here today, how you would feel about a Canada that treats rich people differently than poor people, one that oppresses its poor people and makes the rich people richer. You will not have a very good sense about Canada if you are one of the millions of poor people and poor children in this country who see the system treating them unequally.

Before we get involved in the discussions around national unity which look at the Constitution, the distribution of powers and the mechanics of amending the Constitution, we must walk back through the damage that the Conservative Party has done over the last few years, since 1984, to the economic system in this country.

I think Canadians have always felt that, almost exclusively among countries in the world, in this country there was at least a measure of fairness from their government and that they would not be taxed more heavily than other Canadians or would not be excused from taxes because they enjoyed a certain amount of wealth or power. Canadians always felt that there was a certain amount of fairness in a progressive tax system; that the benefits they received from this country would be received equally and fairly no matter where you lived across the country. Family allowances were the same in Nova Scotia as they were in British Columbia. All of those benefits were fairly distributed.

The Tories have begun to tinker with and undermine that system. As a result, many Canadians feel that there are now different gradations of Canadians, different classes of Canadians and that some people benefit to a greater extent while others pay to a greater extent. That is not the way to encourage national unity.

I would encourage the current government to examine some of its social policies and some of the policies that it has brought about over the last few years and find out how they have contributed to undermining a sense of national unity among Canadians. It is not too late to change those policies, to reverse them and to start moving back toward a system in which Canadians feel equally treated by the Government of Canada and equally responsible toward maintaining this country and maintaining the unity of this country because they certainly do not now. It does not matter where you go in this country, there are people who feel they are unfairly treated by the federal government and that some people are treated much better.

Once we restore the balance and restore the equity, we can start talking to people convincingly about national unity. We certainly cannot do it until then.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member began his remarks by talking a little bit about the history of this country. He prefaced some of the things he said by suggesting that—if I have got this down right—no investor in his or her right mind would take money and invest in such a sparsely populated country. He then went on to tell us how they—I guess the government is what he was referring to—took public money to build a railroad and this, that and the other thing.

I wonder where the hon. member thinks "they" got the money. It takes investment. It takes people with businesses, people willing to risk the money that they have brought from other places to build an economy so that the government, "they", can take some portion of that money and reinvest it in areas where it seems to be doing the most good for the most people.

I would ask the hon. member how he thinks that by spending $1.20 for every $1 or $1.30 for every $1 the government is capable of taking in over a long period of time, this can possibly produce the kind of Utopian world that he is talking about in which everybody has equal access to every single thing and to every single benefit of living in a country like Canada. How can we do that over a long period of time when the debt continues to build and build and build?

Surely at some time we have to allow those people who create the wealth in the country to take the money that they have earned or built through their activities and risks and build some prosperity for the country.

I think that right now we are in a mood where we must begin to develop a new prosperity for the country or all the wonderful things—I have much sympathy with my hon. friend—he talks about simply will not be possible. Perhaps my hon. friend could tell me where governments would get money if it were not for people willing to invest and risk the money that they have in the first place.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, there is more than one way to invest in a country. I come from a forest industry community.

It is made up of workers who have invested all of their lives, skills, talents, ability and strength in that forest industry community. Out of that community—I am talking about Port Alberni—Canada has taken millions upon millions of dollars in taxes, income taxes, resource royalties, and products that have been sold overseas such as plywood, paper, pulp, construction lumber and other things produced in that community.

Those things are produced with the investment of labour on the part of hundreds of workers. Those workers invest that labour not without risk because many of them—it is the highest risk work force in the world—die on the job every single year because of safety problems.

They pay their money to the government. They often pay more than the company they work for. That is where the government gets its money to invest in social programs, in new infrastructure development and in those kinds of things that we need in order for this country to survive.

I am saying it does not come simply from one place and that our ideologies should not tell us that it comes strictly from one place. We should not be using only the market test. We should be using the national unity test before the Tories decide to disassemble programs in Canada. Both tests are valid when we are talking about saving a country, not simply the market test but also the national unity test.

I might point out that as a reward for the investment those people in the plywood plants in Port Alberni made over 20, 30 or 40 years in some cases, they were all fired on April 30. They all of lost their jobs in spite of what they risked and invested on behalf of Canada and on behalf of their community over the last many years. Not everybody is rewarded equally in this country.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Rosemont, for a question or comment.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I was very surprised at some of the comments made by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

First of all, his view of the Fathers of Confederation surprises me, coming from a Socialist member. He saw them and the birth of Canada as part of a great vision. Well, there were two major reasons behind the birth of Canada: Wealthy British capitalists, backed by the Bank of Montreal which actually was the Bank of Canada for a long time until the thirties, needed solid guarantees to build railroads. There was no thought of a great symbol of unity or a great vision. Financial guarantees were needed on the London market, and these very wealthy capitalists made a lot of money on the railroads with the guarantees they got from the people. So this had nothing to do with a great vision for the people of this country.

The second reason for Confederation was that since the union of Lower and Upper Canada had become unworkable, it was necessary to resume the original divisions and give back to Quebecers a certain degree of autonomy within their own territory.

I think the hon. member has become as obsessed as the Prime Minister and the Governor General who always see the birth of Canada as something arising from a great vision. It was a bunch of capitalists who got together to make money, and that was it.

Now, should we keep symbols of Canada like the post office? As far as I am concerned, 90 to 95 per cent of my mail consists of advertising flyers and the rest is bills, although increasingly, these will be debited directly from my bank account.

So if that is a symbol of Canada, I don't think this country will be around much longer.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member, speaking for English Canada, wants to maintain national standards and keep something that defines them. The only problem is, and we have seen it now in the field of education, when the Speech from the Throne announced that the federal government intended to interfere in this area. It's the old story. I understand this desire to intervene where there is a certain social cohesiveness as there is in English Canada. I understand this desire to have national standards and to reinforce those standards within a national perspective.

• (1800)

However, in your speech you forgot all about the situation in Quebec. You can have as many standards as you like, but we still have the situation in Quebec, and there we have a major problem, Mr. Speaker. Quebecers—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member does not put his question, he will not be able to get an answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, when you gave me the floor, I understood that you said this was a period for comments and questions. So—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are now three minutes over the time for questions and comments. I am allowing the hon. member his comment. If he will put his question, I will allow the hon. member at least a minute to answer it, if that is possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): I would like to ask the hon. member how he could make a long speech about national unity without referring to the people of Quebec? That takes some doing, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Comox—Alberni, one minute.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I can make it shorter than that.

During my speech when I referred to Canadians, I was also referring to the people of Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Strathcona has a 10 minute speech, then I return to the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to give my response to the Speech from the Throne.

The throne speech addressed three major concerns of Canadians: unity, prosperity and government responsiveness. All are intertwined.

The fragility of unity becomes apparent when our economy falters. It has also become apparent as our national debt has grown, compound interest on compound interest. We as a government must address these economic matters. We must also address the constitutional matters, and we are.

Today I would like to speak about Canadian unity from a different perspective. It is a narrow perspective, but it is one of utmost importance. I would like to discuss the importance of Canadian symbols.

I agree with all the debaters before me who have talked about the health of the economy and the structure of the Constitution and division of powers. Those are of paramount importance. However, we as Canadians have symbols. We must look back at what has united us as a country and at our common historical reality.

We have many, many symbols in this country. We have the flag, we have our institutions, we have common celebrations like Expo '67 and the Centennial celebrations of 1967. We will have one in 1992. We have common rituals, such as the singing of the anthem and the citizenship ceremony. All of these create a feeling of patriotism. We should increase and expand our use of symbols so we can quietly be proud of what we have achieved as a nation and as Canadians. These are positive things we can do to unite our country and our people.

All too often we forget about the benefits we have enjoyed as Canadians and our accomplishments as Canadians. I have been fortunate enough to do a little travelling. When I am in other countries, I realize how good we have it in Canada and for how much we have to be thankful.

We look inward as Canadians, when often we should be looking outward. We have made contributions to peace and freedom through two World Wars, the Boer War, the Korean War and the recent war. Our achievements continue. These are the achievements of Roy Brown and Billy Bishop.

Next year, Canada will celebrate its 125th birthday. In 1927, Canada celebrated its 60th birthday. At that time, celebrations were held and Canadians rejoiced about Canada and the contributions they made to the world.

The Prince of Wales, the future Edward VIII, toured Canada to celebrate our Diamond Jubilee. That year, the Confederation Building, which is part of the House of Commons, was opened. It was to commemorate Canada's 50th birthday. During Canada's 50th birthday we were involved in a war and celebrations were postponed for 10 years.

Canada should commemorate our 125th birthday by opening our Parliament Buildings to Canadians. The Parliament Buildings are one of the most important symbols we have as Canadians. They have become crowded, overused and overworked.

There are plans to reallocate space and build a visitor reception centre in the basement in the entrance under the Peace Tower, where there could be a theatre, public washrooms and some displays. We should do this without hesitation or trepidation. A small expenditure like this is money which is not wasted.

The Government of Canada should help Canadians to recognize their achievements by building symbols like statues and monuments. For example, we could participate with the city of Edmonton to build a statue to commemorate the achievements of the five women who pursued the Persons case—Louise McKinney, Henrietta Edwards, Nellie McClung, Emily Murphy and Irene Parlby. These women's historic accomplishment was in pursuing the right for women to vote. They took the case all the way to the Privy Council of London, England.

The Government of Canada should not be afraid to erect a statue of these women on the lawn of the Supreme Court. We may want to commemorate other historical figures. For example, those Canadians who have won the Victoria Cross. We think of them fleetingly on November 11 each year. Why, for example, could we not erect statues of Victoria Cross winners in the towns and cities of their birth? Perhaps we could erect one or two each year to ground in reality our achievements as Canadians and to celebrate our common historical experience.

Canadians are imaginative and we, as a government, should share in their sense of how to recognize Canadian achievements. It seems only prudent to ask Canadians to come up with ideas on how to do this.

The confusion of our historical reality manifests itself in the fact that departments and ministers create award after award to recognize achievements of Canadians. For example, the Secretary of State has a National Volunteer Award. The Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council has recently established a gold medal for science.

We see a proliferation of awards throughout departments and ministers. There are awards for business excellence and many other awards. Perhaps as a government we should take a look at these awards and bring them together under one administrative unit and then re-examine what we are doing and where we are going.

We have national institutions in Ottawa which people rarely see. We should try to bring our national institutions out to Canadians. For example, why should many of the National Art Gallery's treasures be locked away in storage? Could there not be more travelling exhibitions, more co-operative exhibitions with galleries across the country? Perhaps we might even consider building branch plants: a western art gallery or an eastern national art gallery.

The same could be said of our other institutions such as the Museum of Civilization and the Museum of Science and Technology.

Canadians feel very proud when we think of our international accomplishments such as peacekeeping, fighting apartheid, or emergency relief. We give aid to developing countries but Canadians complain that the money might be better spent at home.

We help countries to develop their economies, train their people and protect the environment. This is largely unknown to Canadians. I believe we must recognize in Canada our international accomplishments.

• (1810)

We have to achieve much more. For example, the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore has suggested that Canada aggressively pursue the idea of an international green cross, an international environmental disaster clean-up organization. I think this is where we could symbolize our achievements to the world, and I believe that the government should pursue this with vigour.

We might also think of pursuing with the United Nations an international environmental agency, something along the lines of the International Atomic Energy Agency. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the International Atomic Energy Agency provides expert advice to countries as well as funding to develop nuclear energy. It also serves as an enforcement agency in checking to make sure that the countries adhere to the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

We might develop an international environmental agency along the same lines. This environmental agency could provide expert advice as well as funding to developing nations on environmental matters such as energy efficiency and renewable energy. It could also serve to set and enforce minimum environmental standards.

We have much to offer the world. As a middle power we are limited in what we can do, but perhaps we can stretch our boundaries to move beyond our well-known and effective traditional intermediary role.

I would like to close by reiterating that we as a country should continue to build our symbols and continue to develop and share our common historical reality with Canadians so that we can be proud of our accomplishments.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of my colleague from Edmonton. I must say that I could not agree more strongly with the principle of national unity, the concerns for prosperity, and certainly the division of powers with respect to the Constitution.

I find it a little bit difficult to accept the fact that all we are really addressing is the Constitution when we should be looking at the issues, as the hon. member put it so well, that bind us rather than those that divide us. He pointed to the importance of Canadian symbols and expressed some creative ideas which could certainly add to the concepts of Canadian unity, and for that I want to thank him.

However, I want to ask him about two things. When we look at the Canadian symbols we could perhaps recognize that the Speech from the Throne does not particularly relate to all the issues that he talked about. In fact I would suggest that the Speech from the Throne has obfuscated the issues of national unity and national economic well-being. Could the hon. member consider that we have to honour those people who have contributed to the two world wars and to the history of Canada by putting some financial wherewithal into our Canadian Museum of History, the national monuments as he has pointed out? I think they are seriously underfinanced.

To date we have been busy building museums in most of Canada, particularly in Quebec, and I think we have ignored one of the most important major symbols that has united us as a country.

The second symbol which I would ask him to address is: What would he do if he were the minister with respect to the Canadian broadcasting system? Can he think of a mechanism that can unite this country from coast to coast better than that which transmits, broadcasts and shows Canadians one to the other?

Mr. Thorkelson: Mr. Speaker, I will first address the issue of the CBC. Certainly the CBC is an important national institution. I believe it can contribute to national unity.

As Gerard Veilleux has said in his speech, stable multi-year funding is important. He has qualified that by saying that probably more important than the amount of money is the knowledge of how to plan and proceed. I would tend to agree with that.

We have set a level for this year, and I would not think it would be too hard to set certain levels for other years.

On the museum issue, as I said in my speech, we should take our museums out to the people. There are ways we can do that through partnerships with provinces and with the private sector. Although I am not as experienced in the cultural field as the hon. member is, I certainly would be prepared to take a look at budgetary matters, but I cannot comment on those right at this moment.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak in the debate on the Speech from the Throne.

This is a very important juncture in our country's history. We are faced with gargantuan problems as a nation and as politicians. Following our recent recess, it was reasonable for the people of Canada to assume that the government was going to deal with these problems in a meaningful way in the Speech from the Throne. Unfortunately, all we have are meaningless platitudes and generalities, not coming anywhere near what is necessary to deal with the daunting problems with which we are faced.

The major concerns of Canadians are not addressed. The major concerns of Canadians today are high taxation, unemployment, the Constitution, and the environment. Yet we see in the Speech from the Throne mere generalities and conversation. Where is the fodder, the seed needed to develop answers to the problems that we have as a nation? It is completely absent. This government has indicated that the problems of the country are not first and foremost in its mind. What it hopes to do is be able to skate through the next few months and hopefully along the way, by perhaps tapping into a poll here and there, be able to generate some answer that will be pleasing and meet the approval of the Canadian public.

The Canadian public is not going to be fooled. The Canadian public realizes the seriousness of the problems that face this nation at the present time. The Canadian public realizes, as we do here in this House of Commons, the possibilities of this great country. Yet these possibilities are not being honoured by this government. The government is completely sloughing off the duty which is before it at the present time.

What is it sloughing off, what does it refuse to deal with? Well, it essentially refuses to deal with problems that are of its making. This is what most annoys Canadians. The government entered into a trade agreement with the United States. Now it is talking about a tripartite trade agreement with the United States and Mexico. Yet the trade agreement with the United States is a very ill-conceived document in many ways.

What is happening as a result? We have not received the benefits of the trade agreement that were promised by the government. In fact, we are losing industry to the United States. States from the United States are setting up offices in Canada, presumably trade delegations, with the main purpose of influencing and encouraging Canadian industry to move south of the border. They are doing it. We are not competing with the United States. Our industries are leaving Canada because of high interest rates, because we are not providing for Canadians what the Americans insisted on having for their own businesses and their own citizens. That is a level playing field.

The government would have us believe that we have high interest rates as a result of inflation.

• (1820)

That is part of the reason for high interest rates, but the main reason for high interest rates is that the government has to sell Treasury bonds. The government has to sell bonds to pay the interest on the debt. The reason the government is doing this is because it has not found the answers it promised the Canadian public it would find in the 1984 election campaign. It was horrified that a debt existed in Canada, it was horrified that the debt was approximately $170 billion in 1984.

This summer the debt of this nation will reach $400 billion. Four hundred billion dollars. The government says: "Well, don't look to us, we inherited this problem". The fact that it is almost more than double what it was when this government came to power is not important to the government. It sees this as incidental. It sees the fact that the deficit was there, albeit a much smaller deficit, as the most important thing.

The government will say to us: "We couldn't deal with it, we inherited it, it is not our fault". I would say to the government that it more than doubled the debt in a period of time when the economy of Canada was in very, very good shape indeed. We were going through very good economic times between 1984 and 1990.

If the government is saying it could not deal with the debt at that time, when can we as a nation deal with it? Can we deal with it now, when the government through its poor and misguided economic policies has plunged us into a made-in-Canada recession? No, we cannot. We cannot do it now. Of course, we have to be mindful of spending. However, the fact that the debt has been allowed to grow to $400 billion because this government did not keep its word to the Canadian public has put in peril the programs that this country holds dear, that this country holds as pillars of its society and foundations of the Canadian way of life.

We are now in a position of listening to the government question programs that we as Canadians had reason to believe would be there—hard fought programs which the Liberal government put in place, such as the national medical plan and the old age pensions.

These are programs that Canadians now feel are not solid. They look to the government saying: "My heavens, you have broken the promise of solidifying the economy of this country. You told us that there was not going to be any danger to the programs that we fought for and won. Now, we look at the situation that exists in Ottawa and we are afraid, afraid for our Canadian programs, and afraid for our social programs. We are very concerned about where this country is going".

If it was the plan of the Government of Canada to do away with our social programs, it could not have handled it any better than the government did. The economic mess it created put the Canadian public in a position where they assume that anything can happen. This is a very sad legacy indeed.

No wonder politicians are just one notch above loan sharks in the minds of the Canadian public, when they see what this government has done in taking the country of tomorrow, as we liked to regard Canada, and jettisoning its future, its immediate future. No wonder the Canadian public is upset. They have every reason to be upset.

What has the high interest rate done? The high interest rate has created a high Canadian dollar. That was the whole idea, to make our Treasury bonds attractive. Of course, it has also raised the value of the Canadian dollar. What do we have now as a legacy from this government? We do not have a solid commercial economy. We do not have a solid commercial and industrial base. We have, thanks to this government, ever increasing cross-border shopping. Cross-border shopping is a situation that is going to devastate the border towns and communities in Canada.

Why is it happening? It is because the people of this country are fed up. They are showing their distaste and anger with the government by getting into their automobiles and driving into the United States. This could be corrected if we could reduce the value of the Canadian dollar to where it should be. Then the products in the United States would be more expensive and there would be no incentive to go to the United States. We cannot because the government refuses to reduce interest rates and the resulting high Canadian dollar.

Because of the high Canadian dollar and high interest rates, businesses in Canada are finding it very difficult to compete. They are finding it difficult to sell into the United States. They are moving into the United States because they find they can have reduced expenses if they are located in the United States, and this is not helping Canada.

Whether we get out of this recession this year or next year, we are going to be faced with a smaller number of commercial enterprises in this country. We are going to lose these industries and organizations. This is going to be another sad legacy of this government and another problem with which the Canadian public will be faced.

We entered into a trade agreement with the United States that did not define a subsidy. We do not have a subsidy. We have five to seven years to determine what a subsidy is. A subsidy is not defined. It is defined in the minds of the American people, the American agencies and the American government. They know when Canadians receive a subsidy.

I have a plant in my riding, Sydney Steel Corporation, that is being subsidized because it received federal and provincial government assistance in the 1970s and the early 1980s, long before the free trade agreement was even contemplated with the United States. It is being countervailed against because the Americans are saying that this company received a subsidy.

What about the tax free period of time being offered by the United States to industries that will leave southern Ontario and relocate? What about the free land that is being offered in industrial parks to have these industries move to the United States? Are those subsidies? Of course they are subsidies. Our government is not sticking up for and protecting the Canadian commercial base the way the Americans are obviously protecting their industry and their economic future.

We are saying: "If the Americans want to do it, it has got to be fine, it has got to be great". I am not criticizing the Americans. The American government is obviously sticking up for its own people and its own commercial base. All I am saying is: Why is our government not doing something to protect the Canadian economy? Why are we leaving? Why are we jettisoning our Canadian public?

Something has gone wrong here. What has gone wrong is that this government does not know what to do. No wonder it cannot put anything in a Speech from the Throne. It does not know what it wants to do.

All of the points I have made are to me and to most Canadians extremely serious. The most serious economic difficulty we face is our constitutional problem. Fortunately, we still have investment that can be made in Canada, but a lot of people who would like to invest in Canada will not invest in Canada with this uncertainty with respect to our constitutional future and our unity is up in the air.

• (1830)

What is the government doing? It is dragging its feet. The government is saying: "Well, we are going to bring forward a plan in the fall." Then it says: "Now don't you say anything, opposition, because we want this to be non-partisan." If you are a Canadian and you feel for this country and you see that this government is doing absolutely nothing to try to correct the differences and to try to bring this country together, you have got to say something. You have got to complain that you feel frustrated by what is going on, that we are just marking time and we are going to roll the dice perhaps at the last minute to try and solve the problem again.

You have got to say something to voice your disapproval. According to the government, if you do you are being partisan. Well, I am being partisan because I find that what this government has done is woefully inadequate. It is woefully inadequate to deal with the problems that face this country; the unity question and the economy. How is this government going to deal with the problems of the future if it cannot deal with the problems of the present? What are we going to do with our environment?

The government has a green plan. That was deep sixed like nothing we have ever seen. It saw the light of day and like the groundhog, it saw its shadow and went back underground again. The whole question of the environment is just a real bad joke in this country. We have a very serious environmental concern in Canada and this government is saying: "Wait now, we do not want to get this started. We may be starting something here we are not really ready to handle." It is saying that this is something that can wait. Well, it cannot wait.

Child care in this country cannot wait. This government cannot define economic success and it cannot see that what it has created is an economic hole for itself. It cannot see that regional disparity is increasing. It is referring now to the 1990s in Nova Scotia as the mean decade. It sees transfer payments being cut off. It sees equalization payments disappearing. It sees regional development as a thing of the past. We are losing our support from the federal government. It is now talking about closing more bases in Atlantic Canada. It is closing bases when it does not even have a defence policy. How does it know what to close? It does not know what it is doing.

This is chaos, this is not government. People of Canada are concerned and they have every reason to be concerned.

How can the Canadian public possibly even consider supporting this government in a subsequent election? What the people of Canada want is action. They want us to bring back the Canada that was being evolved through years of hard work by politicians and by Canadians. They do not want the government to deep-six the future of this country. They want the government to deal with the questions. They want their concerns addressed. They do not want any more burying of the problems. They do not want Parliament just to sit every now and then. They do not want the government to be more concerned with polls and public opinion than with the needs of Canadians.

Canadians have a right to have their concerns addressed and it is time this government realized it and it is time this government did something about it.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, another interesting talk by a member opposite who has a very deep insecurity problem because what I heard as I listened, and I did try to listen to everything that the hon. member said, was a lot of worry, a lot of doubt and a lot of basic inability to come to terms with reality as it is in the world today.

I guess that inability to come to terms with reality is part of what was wrong with the Liberal government prior to 1984, when it was in power over such a long period of time, when it developed a burdensome debt that we are still trying to get out from under and left a legacy in this country that probably our children and perhaps even our grandchildren will still be dealing with.

I am not surprised, given the sense of insecurity and self-doubt that the hon. member epitomizes on behalf of his party, that they were so incapable of dealing with these problems and these challenges in the past.

Fortunately, the electorate saw the light and elected a government that does have a plan, a government that does have the ability to take the kind of action that the hon. member calls for and a government that has the courage to do things that are necessary, even when perhaps they are unpopular, because we know that we must do what is right over what is perceived to be popular.

I would suggest to the hon. member that change is precisely what we have created in this country. We have done these things, taken these actions that the hon. member calls for. We have addressed some of the problems that were burdening the economy of this country. Maybe our reward for that is to be at perhaps less than a desirable point in the polls right now, but I think that really just points to the fact that there is courageous ability on this side of the House to take the kinds of actions that are necessary.

Our job is to create a climate of security, a climate of hope, a sense of a future for this country where people will be prepared to make the kinds of investments that are necessary to ensure our prosperity in the future. I suggest that is the positive kind of action we are taking.

I would just ask the hon. member opposite if he would tell us what the Liberal government would do to reduce interest rates below the already low rate they are at, at around 9 per cent, when in their term of government, interest rates reached the all time high of over 22 per cent.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite talks about courage. They do have courage. The fact that they show up in public is in a sense a form of courage. The hon. member also talks about the Canadian electorate as if the Canadian electorate has bestowed some kind of support upon them, a party at 14 per cent. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, more people think Elvis is still alive than support this government. It is absolutely incredible that it would even contemplate this. I mean, holy cow.

Something about reality is that the deficit this year is $30.5 billion. It is as high as it has ever been. This was a government that was going to reduce the deficit. There are 5 million poor people in Canada. That is reality. There are 1.5 million unemployed. That is reality, and 1.8 million Canadians depend on food banks. That is reality. That is the reality that this government has imposed on this country.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this moment pass without a comment, which would indicate that I find the question of the member opposite with respect to the fact that she has shown courage, that her government has set a climate of security and hope, for prosperity in the future and has taken the right action and there is nothing better than being right, sanctimonious.

I would like to ask my hon. colleague: Is life any better for the citizens of Sydney? He gave an enlightened speech. He knows what is going on in this society. Perhaps he could tell us how his community feels about the enlightened remarks of our colleague across the floor.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question.

In my constituency, in industrial Cape Breton, the unemployment rate is 22 per cent. That is the figure that Statistics Canada will admit to.

• (1840)

We are continually losing jobs. Our unemployment rate is growing constantly. Our young people are not coming back to Cape Breton. There are no jobs available. The older workers are retiring or going on pre-retirement or disability. Their jobs are disappearing after them. We are losing these salaries in our community. Our communities can no longer afford to provide the essential services that Canadians have every right to take for granted in this country.

We are in a deep problem in our municipalities. The future economically is of grave concern. To even suggest that this government has addressed these problems is ludicrous.

I would like to say that what Canadians want is hope. We still hope. We still hope that this government can change. We still believe that this country is the greatest country in the world and this country will have its future, but not as long as this government is imposing policies and running the country down like it is at the present time.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak, albeit 10 to 20 minutes late. I want to thank you for recognizing me now.

I want to join my colleague from Edmonton—Strathcona in expressing my pleasure in having the opportunity to speak to the address from the throne. The throne speech itself gives a blueprint for what the intentions of the government are for the rest of this Parliament. Partly it is built on the record of the past, and it looks backward, but it uses that backward look in order to establish a plan and a blueprint for the future.

In this particular throne speech the focus has been on unity and the economy. It is difficult to bring unity to a country and tranquillity to a nation when there are economic barriers to that kind of security that people long for. When unemployment is high, as it is in parts of Canada today, it is difficult for those people to think in terms of unity of the country, even though they want that for our land. Their first concern is for a job. When there are business failures across Canada, it is difficult for those business people, who have experienced that loss, to think in terms of unity, even though that is one of their first desires. It is very important that we address the economic issues in our land together with the unity questions.

I want to say how pleased I am to be part of a government that has been making the tough decisions that should have been made years and decades ago in order to usher us into the 21st century and prepare us for that.

So much of what we have done in the last six or seven years has been in the nature of restructuring the nation, restructuring the economy so that we can be ready to move with the rest of the countries of the world into a new and emerging economy of the world. Therefore, we have been dealing with such things as pension reform so that our people can have confidence in the future for their own personal lives. We have been dealing with tax reform, whether it is sales tax, corporate tax or income tax. We have dealt with issues like tax reform so that our economy can adjust itself to the future competitiveness of our nation which we are are going to have to face if we are going to trade around the world.

We have dealt with trade liberalization because the world is changing. We cannot expect the world and the economies of the world and the trading patterns of the world to stay the same in order to accommodate us. If the rest of the world is changing, we have to change along with it in order to be competitive, in order to provide jobs, in order to provide the security that our people long for.

We have dealt with the restructuring of our economy and we have dealt with making our country as competitive as possible in order to help our people. When there is unemployment, when there is poverty, when there is any other difficulty, nowhere is it felt more keenly than at the level of the family. So I am pleased that the throne speech included a statement that dealt with a look at the family. It says:

> In addition, my government will review its policies in relation to the family, the most fundamental building block of Canadian society.

"The most fundamental building block of Canadian society." Mr. Speaker, if we are going to have a confident, unified and sure approach to the future, we have to do it in the context of happy families, of sure and secure families.

There are probably a lot of people here in the House and across Canada who ask themselves why have we come back to the notion of the traditional family unit; why is the traditional family unit so important?

I want to take a minute just to commend the member for Calgary North for the extensive research he has done on the way the tax policies of our country have prejudiced the traditional family. I would commend his speech of May 15, pages 125 and 126 of Hansard to members. They should look at how, since 1917, the tax policies of successive governments of Canada have ignored the pressures that tax policies are placing on the traditional family.

As I said, some people wonder why we keep harping on this. It is a part of reality to recognize that the family unit is not what it used to be. We can think of Leave it to Beaver or Father Knows Best or any number of those folksy kind of shows that were popular in the fifties and sixties, and think that that is the traditional family unit. Well, it is not that way.

Statistics show us that in the family today, in 62 per cent, both spouses are working; in 27 per cent, the husband only is working; in 7 per cent, neither husband nor wife is working; and in 4 per cent, only the wife is working. When we consider that in 62 per cent of the homes across Canada both husband and wife are working to make ends meet, we recognize that what we think of in a fanciful way as the traditional family no longer exists.

There are strains on the family, and it should not be the role of government to add to those strains. People ask; why is it so important to deal with family issues? I refer again to a gentleman whom I quote often, a famous sociologist from the University of Bordeaux, Jacques Ellal. He says that if a relationship is to be authentic, the other must be able to rely on the continuity of my behaviour, and know that he can expect certain kinds of words of help or refusals from me. Without such continuity, a relationship becomes impossible.

That is why the family unit is so important. The fact is that marriage introduces a regime of dependability in relationships. Dependability creates security, and security is important not only for the adults in the relationship, but for the children also.

The fact is that through the family we build the relationships that provide that security, but we also have the vehicle that creates the transmission of values which are so very important for our society. Yet, as I indicated, and as my friend from Calgary North has pointed out so vividly, the tax policies of our governments through the years have created tensions for the family.

I quote an example from his speech on page 126. The family earns $60,000:

> One family lives a traditional life-style and has one income and three children, two under seven and one child over seven. One of the parents cares for the children at home. They are married—The other family—is the same in every respect except that one of the younger children is unrelated to the others. Both parents work, earning $36,000 and $24,000, for a total of $60,000.

• (1850)

In the second example, the adults are not married.

> It may seem incredible, but the total taxes paid by these two families differ by over $12,200. That is $1,000 per month more tax that the traditional family pays. Almost half of this can be related to the $36,000-$24,000 income split. The other half is due only to the fact that the traditional couple is married.

That is not the intention of any government. This began in 1917 and has carried on right to the present. It is important that our government take note of the fact that taxation policy is putting pressure on people who value the traditional family, who believe that tight, dependable, secure human relationships are important, who believe that children grow up best in families and who want to transmit their values through the family to the children.

It is important that we deal with this. I am happy to say that the Speech from the Throne indicates that the government is prepared to look at the traditional family as a building block for our society.

There is no doubt that poverty is an important question for our nation, but on this issue it is not a question of poverty. It is a question of fairness and taxation policies that deal fairly with all people. There should not be an advantage for one group of people over another.

I applaud the Prime Minister for taking this initiative to signal to the Canadian people and to the Parliament of Canada that he wants to see a regime introduced in Parliament whereby the traditional family is going to be dealt with equally with other families, and that the taxation policies of this government are not going to penalize those who want to build a traditional family unit.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to take part in this debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

The speech pronounced by the Governor General on May 13 this year outlines the themes, principles and initiatives that the government intends to pursue in the months to come. Several journalists called this Speech from the Throne a straight repeat of the one pronounced on April 3, 1989.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, we find the same themes and the same ideas in both speeches. In other words, in the months to come, the government will follow the same path it has followed since it came to power in 1984. It promises to be a rocky road, if we consider the results of the initiatives announced in the Speech from the Throne in April 1989.

Canadians realize this, because the path this government forced us to take proved to be a dead end. For the first time in our history, we have a recession made in Canada by the Government of Canada. That is where we are now, thanks to the ideas set forth in the Speech from the Throne on April 3, 1989. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am concerned, because if the government intends to take the same path that led us into this recession, the situation can only get worse.

As I just pointed out, the present Speech from the Throne generally repeats the themes and objectives announced two years ago. Consider the four main objectives the government intended to pursue in its speech in April 1989.

The objectives mentioned were as follows: to build a strong economy; to preserve the environment; to maintain a caring, compassionate society; and finally, to renew the government's commitment to national unity.

Undoubtedly, these four objectives were, and still are, very noble and significant.

Unfortunately, the Conservative Government has failed miserably in these four major areas that are so important to the well-being of all Canadians.

Consider the first component of the April 1989 Speech from the Throne: to build a strong economy. Two years ago, the Conservative Government said it wanted to build a strong economy, encouraged by incentive. Today, the Conservatives seem to have been on the wrong track.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, we are experiencing one of the worst economic recessions we ever had. This is not only a serious crisis but a crisis created by this government as a result of unsound economic policies.

The government's so-called incentives merely discouraged Canadians, Mr. Speaker. Just ask them. The incentives mentioned by the Tories two years ago merely worsened an economic situation already vulnerable as a result of high interest rates. Today, the Conservative Government says it has managed to bring down interest rates down, but it created this economic crisis by raising them in the first place.

In April 1989, the unemployment rate in Canada was 7.8 per cent. Today, it is 10.5 per cent. This is the highest unemployment rate since May 1985. In Montreal, the figures are even more depressing. In April 1989, the unemployment rate in the Montreal region was 9.7 per cent, and today, it is up to 14.2 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, the Montreal region has been severely affected by the economic crisis created by this Conservative Government. Today, nearly one out of four persons in Montreal, in other words, 25 per cent of the population, is living below the poverty line. This is shameful, Mr. Speaker. Across Quebec the situation is not much better. During the first months of 1991, the number of bankruptcies rose 40 per cent. According to Statistics Canada, 1,818 persons filed for protection under the Bankruptcy Act.

Clearly, the objectives pursued by this government since the April 1989 Speech from the Throne have done nothing to improve the lives of Canadians living in the Montreal region. If with this new Speech from the Throne, the government intends to follow the same path, the economic situation of the people of Montreal can only get worse.

In 1989, the then Minister of Finance promised that the deficit would go down to $28 billion. The exact opposite happened, Mr. Speaker: The deficit is now up to 30.5 billion. As far as the national debt is concerned, my leader, the Leader of the Opposition, explained in his speech how the Conservative Government had accumulated in only six years a debt equivalent to the debt accumulated in 117 years by all previous governments.

In the Speech from the Throne two years ago, the government told Canadians that it would offer incentives, but since then we have seen cuts in unemployment insurance benefits and cuts in the Job Development Program, subsidized housing and medicare.

This Speech from the Throne claims to help those in greatest need, but the truth is, this speech offers no respite for the unemployed, poor families, students who pay GST, the elderly or the sick. There is absolutely nothing in this Speech from the Throne that gives any hope to the neediest in our society. The government seems to be saying that the jobless will have to wait until the year 2000 to find jobs. That is unacceptable.

Mr. Speaker, the question we should be asking ourselves today if we give credence to the government's Speech from the Throne is this: what is going to happen to Montreal's 225,000 unemployed workers between now and the year 2000? Will they starve to death or will live with the hope that, one day, the sooner the better, they will be able to find a job and preserve their dignity? Cutbacks in all support programs during a time of crisis do little to inspire confidence.

Canadians are also sceptical about the latest Speech from the Throne. It states that the government wants to double the number of graduates in mathematics, the sciences and engineering to increase Canada's competitiveness. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that we need scientists and mathematicians if we want to encourage research and development. The fact remains that, in 1987, the total level of federal spending in research and development represented 1.4 percent of our GNP. Today, it is down to 1.28 percent, Mr. Speaker. Yet, I can remember well this Prime Minister stating loud and clear during the 1984 campaign, that he would double investment in research and development. Now, he has just reduced whatever little there was.

So, Mr. Speaker, how are we to encourage our young people to pursue their studies in science when the government makes no effort to promote research and development. This is evidenced by the fact that we spend less in that area so vital to our economic progress than any other industrialized country.

This government admits that the Canadian economy needs to be revived. The way to go, according to them, is to negotiate a North America-wide free trade deal. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I represent the riding of Saint-Léonard, a riding seriously hurt by the Canada-US Free Trade Agreement. In my riding there is an important manufacturing industry and companies like Maxim Canada Inc. and Rosita Shoes suffered the consequences of this government's disastrous economic policies. How can you expect the Canadian workers to compete with the Mexican workers who earn $2 an hour on average?

Mr. Speaker, the government seems to link national unity to economic prosperity in the Speech from the Throne. I have to say that, if indeed the unity of our country depends on the economic prosperity promised by the Conservatives, we are in serious trouble.

A key factor contributing to national unity, Mr. Speaker, is the promotion and strenghtening of our national identity. Our identity is based on cultural achievements. It is clear that this government does not care as much about this aspect because there is only one short reference to it.

One of the best tool for promoting and strenghtening our identity is the CBC. Unfortunately, the government has closed down stations in Calgary, Saskatoon, Windsor, Corner Brook, Sydney, Matane, Rimouski and Sept-Îles. How can we talk about culture and identity while, at the same time, dismantling a tool that has served us well in that respect? I believe that the task is becoming harder and harder, Mr. Speaker.

This Speech from the Throne, just like the one of April 3, 1989, clearly shows the Conservatives' lack of leadership on the Constitution and national unity. Since the Meech Lake Accord failed, Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives have no constitutional position or platform. Canadians have a government that offers no solution to the country's constitutional deadlock.

The government's answer to this dilemma is to create another committee, Mr. Speaker. Canadians have enough of being studied; they want answers, they want results. This committee is not to report until January 1992. That means Canadians must wait eight more months before finding out the Conservative government's constitutional position.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, this government is waiting till the last minute to solve such an important problem. It is playing poker with Canada's future. It would seem that the government has learned nothing from the failure of the Meech Lake Accord. Every minute that the government lets go by on this issue is wasted time that could have been used to solve the constitutional problems and finally concentrate our efforts on the economy and job creation for all Canadians.

Obviously, the government lacks leadership. However, on our side, Mr. Speaker, my leader, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, has shown his real leadership qualities by outlining his approach for solving the constitutional problems.

On April 21 in Montreal, the Liberal leader presented his approach for a constitutional framework based on principles that are fair to Quebec and all of Canada. This approach requires the government to take a stand and make public before June 1, 1991 a concrete reform proposal resulting in a Canada-wide referendum. This referendum would carry with the support of the three main political parties represented in this House, Mr. Speaker. Of course, if these three parties did not support it, this referendum would be illusory.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote you a passage from the Speech from the Throne that seems to justify the Liberal leader's proposed approach. It is found in the section on national unity and reads as follows: "A constitution should unite a nation. Canadians should be able to see themselves mirrored in their constitution."

That is exactly what the Liberal leader proposes with his winning popular consultation formula. Canadians must be given an opportunity to express their feeling of belonging to this country. What finer way is there is there to help Canadians identify with their Constitution than to have it so directly approved by all citizens?

Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada on his courage in putting forward a concrete constitutional proposal while the country waits another eight months for the government's proposal. Mr. Speaker, the Liberal leader has clearly understood that the time to act is now.

Another point that I would like to raise is the question of Canada remaining a generous society. Those words are from the Speech from the Throne of April 1989. Mr. Speaker, caring means open and accessible. Unfortunately, under the Conservatives, Canada has become far less accessible and caring for its citizens and would-be citizens.

Honourable members know that we have two long lists of people waiting to enter Canada. Some of these people have their spouses already settled here, but they are refused admission into this country, and worse of all, they are refused access to their own families. There are couples who have been living apart for four years, one spouse being here and the other in another country. This is unacceptable, especially from a country which claims to be caring and tolerant. Had we had this policy years ago, Mr. Speaker, you and me would not be here today. So, if we are a caring and tolerant nation, we should open the doors, and allow family reunification. This is another of the fundamental policies of a caring Canadian nation.

Mr. Speaker, as I already pointed out, Canada has become less caring towards its own citizens when it decided to cut programs aimed at the less fortunate among us. The fate of the middle class, the fate of the unemployed in the Montreal area, the fate of the sick do not matter, what counts is big business, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, in the few remaining minutes I would like to talk about Montreal. Last Friday, we learned that Pascal Hardware had gone bankrupt. This bankruptcy adds 2,600 unemployed to the 225,000 already without work in April.

• (1910)

Mr. Speaker, Pascal was a big company for sure, and this is why it made the big news. We put the question in the House and asked the government what policy it was going to put forward, what was it going to do to help those 2,600 workers who lost their jobs, who have no hope left for the future.

But, we tend to forget that many small companies are going out of business every day, that many jobs are lost with the failure of those small companies. No one ever mentions them. But, there are thousands upon thousands of jobs lost every day. And still, as we are facing the worst recession brought upon by this government, here we are, listening the same Throne Speech as in 1989, Mr. Speaker.

As I already asked him earlier today, I would like the Minister of Finance to tell me, what he is waiting for before introducing new measures to revitalize the economy, so Canadians, especially young Canadians, can have faith once again in this country. It is a fact that if there are jobs, and if young people can find hope, we will be able to find a solution to many constitutional problems that plague this country, as any other modern country confronted with important changes, Mr. Speaker.

But, for almost seven years, this government has been rebashing the same speech. It raises interest rates—true, after having raised them, it is slowly starting to get them down—but it is too late, Mr. Speaker. People have lost faith. We just have to look—we just had a long week end, and that is where the tragedy is—never had we seen so many Canadians crossing the border to go shopping, Mr. Speaker. This is very serious.

How many victims are there? I am not only talking about Pascal. How many other victims have there been who are not important enough to be make the headline in our dailies? It still goes on. Why have Canadians lost confidence? Why do they not buy in Canada anymore? Here is the crucial question we must ask ourselves. How can we stimulate our economy if our Canadians people do no longer trust our economical system and our products and if prefer to cross the border. They even charter busses to go shopping across the border.

Every day, my colleagues ask the government some questions. What are its answers? It does not have any. But it is necessary to look at the whole situation, Mr. Speaker. Canadians are fed up with the GST, free trade and high interest rates and the time for good sounding rhetoric and studies is over. The Canadians people, as I was saying earlier, are fed up with studies. They want to see some concrete action, they want to work and they want their children to have hope in this great country of ours.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. There are four speakers left to speak. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would make a short comment and ask a question.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what my colleague had to say and I am sure all hon. members would like to join me in congratulating him on his remarks.

My comments will deal in particular with the Canadian footwear industry, because this is one sector of our economy which has been badly hurt. Our footwear industry was dealt an almost fatal blow. Once again the policies of this government are responsible for the hardship this industry went through.

In my riding, when I was elected in 1984, there were 450 jobs in the footwear industry. Nowadays, for both plants, the Alexandria Footwear, which is the Rosita Shoes Company my colleague knows quite well, and the Brown Shoes Company, that figure is down to about 100 jobs at the very most.

So, wouldn't my colleague agree with me that all the hardship suffered by our Canadian footwear industry including first the effects of the quota reduction, second, the incidence of the Free Trade Agreement, and third, the recession which has, of course, reduced our footwear consumption by limiting our purchases, that all this is a complete disgrace?

I would like my colleague to comment on that.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question.

As I pointed out, when I was elected in 1984 there were about 2,000 jobs in the footwear industry in my riding. Today, Mr. Speaker, there are about 100.

There was Rosita Shoes, a big factory that employed between 600 and 800 people. Today, the factory is closed, and that was almost two years ago. Excelsior Shoes also closed. Only Christina Shoes is left, with about 100 jobs. In a riding like Saint-Léonard, with a lot of small businesses, a lot of factories specializing in clothing or footwear, all these factories are gradually disappearing. In addition to factories closing down, the POWA program to help older workers who lose their jobs in these situations, especially in the footwear, textile and clothing industry— To avoid having to pay these benefits, the government introduced a rule which says that to be eligible for the program—this in a region with a population of over 500,000 residents—the factory or business that closes down must have at least 100 employees. However, more than 75 per cent of Canadian businesses are small businesses with fewer than 50 employees. So no one qualifies, and every day—and I am sure you have the same situation in your own riding, Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member does in his—we have people coming to our riding offices. They are over 55. They have no unemployment insurance. They don't have jobs, and the chances of finding one are practically nil, Mr. Speaker, and the government is playing games with the rules.

That is the human tragedy we are seeing today, as a result of this government's policies.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in today's debate on the Speech from the Throne. I would like to start by saying how proud I am to represent my constituents in the riding of Joliette in a responsible government that looks to the future.

In 1984, this government inherited a country that was divided, poorly governed and in debt to a dangerous degree. That is why we will probably need more than one generation to correct the deficit problem.

Since 1984, our government has made a number of courageous decisions in order to put the country's finances in order and reduce government spending. We have reduced a government apparatus that had become far too unwieldy and costly. We modified our taxation system to make it fairer and more equitable. We improved our relations with our trading partners, which helped us develop new markets and conclude a free trade agreement with the United States, our principle trading partner. In fact, 70 per cent of our exports go the United States. Thanks to this agreement, we have found new outlets for our goods and obtained more secure markets.

We have updated our structures to improve productivity. One example was our decision to eliminate a hidden sales tax—the manufacturer's sales tax which created unemployment and made our industries less competitive—and replace it with a visible tax that is much fairer because it protects the neediest through a system of regular refunds. This is one more example of this government's determination to put the country in a better position to meet increasingly strong competition on external markets. We embarked on deregulation and privatization to make our domestic market more competitive and more productive.

In 1984, we started implementing a strategy for improving our competitive position, and we did so successfully. Of all industrialized countries, comparatively speaking, Canada has created the most jobs and has attracted unprecedented levels of private foreign investment.

All these structural reforms do not necessarily produce tangible results overnight. However, we know the result will be increased productivity in the years to come, for the greater benefit of Canadians. However, we cannot stop there. There is still a lot to be done to achieve the prosperity we want for ourselves and for future generations.

The Speech from the Throne tells us how.

• (1920)

North America–wide free trade is the logical next step if an acceptable agreement can be negotiated with Mexico and the United States.

We will have to maintain controls on government spending. Steps will be taken to cap federal program spending. Legislation will also be introduced so that all GST revenues as well as monies from further privatization of Crown corporations will be used to reduce the national debt. And I think, Mr. Speaker, that this meets the expectations of the people.

We will work with provincial governments to eliminate interprovincial trade and investment barriers by 1995.

We are also planning to generate 2.5 million new jobs over the next nine years, while raising the real incomes of Canadians by 25 percent by the year 2000. That will require the cooperation of business, labour and the various levels of government.

However, all these efforts will not produce the expected results if we keep putting all our energies in a debate over constitutional issues. Since the Constitution was patriated in 1982 without Quebec's consent, our national unity has been in jeopardy.

All my government's efforts to rectify this situation and bring Quebec back to the constitutional table were sabotaged. The proposal which was signed by all the provinces would have allowed us, had it been ratified, to undertake with much more serenity the thorough reform the entire Canadian population wishes. Unfortunately, that is not the case.

Therefore we must do all we can now, in that difficult context, to overcome all obstacles, dispel the people's doubts and ready Canada to go forth with confidence into the 21st century. We must do so while protecting the rights of all Canadians. Throughout the country, Canadian men and women must be able to identify with their Constitution and recognize in it their hopes and aspirations. That is why our approach relies on public consultation. And that is what we are doing now with the Citizens Forum and the Beaudoin–Edwards Parliamentary Committee.

And we will continue to consult the public through a parliamentary committee when we will deposit our propositions in the fall. Our propositions will have to reflect Quebec's unique or distinct character as well as the special interests of all the regions of our country. They will have to be based on fairness and efficiency.

Mr. Speaker, any commitment must necessarily be based on a reasonable compromise and conciliation. To reach the objective of a more united and more prosperous Canada, we will need the cooperation of every Canadian man and woman of goodwill who will show tolerance, generosity and fairness.

Economic prosperity is first of all a matter of human resources. While entering a knowledge era, our quality of life will depend on the quality of our knowledge.

In the Speech from the Throne, we are made aware of the fact that four out of ten Canadian adults cannot read or do math well enough to perform everyday tasks. Three out of ten students dropout of high school before graduating.

Mr. Speaker, my government recognizes that education is a provincial responsibility and respects that fact. But, if we do not act to change that situation, at the beginning of the next century, one third of our people will have no jobs to ensure our prosperity.

Canadians are concerned about these statistics and expect their elected members to propose ways to tackle this problem. That is why our government has included in the Throne Speech goals to cut, by the year 2000, illiteracy rates in half, to ensure that 90 percent of Canadians attain high school diplomas by age 25, and to double the number of post–secondary graduates in mathematics, sciences and engineering.

Of course, we want to pursue these goals within the jurisdictions of the provinces, but with their cooperation.

Canadian industry spends half as much on training its employees as American industry does, a fifth as much as the Japanese and an eighth as much as the Germans.

We have to close the gap. The governement establishes for himself the goal of quadrupling the training provided by employers to their employees. Mr. Speaker, if we want to ensure prosperity for future generations, we must resolutely follow that path.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have enough time to expand on what the government proposed in the Speech from the Throne to do for the environment, the family, the handicapped and the natives.

However, I can assure you and my constituents that I will continue, under the leadership of our Prime Minister, to work with courage and determination for Canada's unity in the greatest respect of the aspirations of our peoples.

[English]

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words this evening concerning the Speech from the Throne, a speech aimed primarily at finding a way to solve our national unity and constitutional crisis, a crisis which most certainly concerns two fundamentally different visions of Canada. On the one hand is a vision based on the concept of the two founding nations, on the other hand is a vision based on the concept of equality—equal– ity for all Canadian cultural origins, equality for all 10 provinces, and equality for all Canadians.

For a very substantial number of English-speaking Canadians, at least, this crisis goes well beyond the Quebec issues. It also involves the concerns of native Canadians, of women, Canadians whose heritage is neither English nor French, national standards, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, multiculturalism and our system of government itself.

It is very much a crisis of confidence in our present system of government. Those feelings were clearly evident in the Meech Lake debate, and again, they are now very clearly evident in the findings of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future. However, in the face of this lack of confidence and trust in our present system, both the minister of constitutional affairs and the Prime Minister have said that we are going to solve our unity and constitutional crisis by using the very system that so many Canadians do not trust to represent their interests. That is, the present House of Commons and the present Senate.

With the greatest of respect, that will not solve this crisis. When the minister of constitutional affairs says, as he did last week in this House, that members of this House and members of the Senate will solve this crisis in, and I quote: "the most open and innovative way", does he truly believe that the real decisions are going to be made here in this House in an open way, and not by the Prime Minister behind closed doors?

When the Prime Minister said last week that there is no greater constituent assembly than the House of Commons, and that the House of Commons will assume national leadership, did he really believe that the members of this House would assume the leadership role in this crisis rather than he, himself, as the Prime Minister of this country?

If the press and the media truly believed that the House of Commons will assume the national leadership role in this crisis, would the Press Gallery not be packed tonight? It is not. They were here for the speech of the Prime Minister and for the party leaders. They are not here now.

If there truly is no greater constituent assembly than this House of Commons, should Canadians not be hearing their members of Parliament in this very crucial debate deal with the issues that Canadians have raised before the Citizens' Forum in an open and an innovative way?

It is no wonder, then, that so many Canadians have no confidence in the ability of this House or its members to speak for them. That is why Canadians want to be involved in this process themselves. That is why we need a truly representative constituent assembly, one that Canadians will have confidence in, one that truly speaks for them, and that they feel truly speaks for them.

Ideally, such an assembly should be directly elected and made up of men and women, native Canadians and Canadians born elsewhere, represented proportionately and geographically as they appear in Canadian society itself. It would be very difficult within the time set for the Quebec referendum by the Belanger-Campeau report to design geographic constituencies for an elected assembly which accurately reflect the demographics of Canada. It is quite possible to establish a non-elected but representative constituent assembly within such a time frame.

The 1991 Canadian census will be carried out on June 4. By mid-January 1992 we will know the present demographic and geographic composition of our country. At that time all Canadians interested in sitting as a member of the constituent assembly could file an application, pay a deposit and submit nomination papers signed by at least 200 persons from the demographic and the geographic category that he or she wished to represent in the assembly.

Two hundred and ninety-five of the applicants, the same number as the present number of federal constituencies, would then be chosen by computer, as suggested by former Supreme Court Justice Estey, to constitute a representative assembly as reflected by the 1991 census. Present politicians would be eligible to apply but they would have no better chance of selection by the computer than any other Canadian.

The assembly would convene 30 days after its selection, choose its own chairperson, establish its own procedure, consider all submissions, concepts, ideas that were presented to it in writing and make its constitutional recommendations to Parliament four months later, just as the United States constituent assembly in Philadelphia did in 1787.

These recommendations would then be subject to ratification by all Canadians in a federally sponsored referendum, tabulated on a province-by-province basis. This would ensure that all Canadians were involved in the constitutional process and that their feelings were made clear to this Parliament and to the provincial and the territorial legislatures.

The recommendations and the results of the referendum would then be submitted to Parliament and to the 10 provincial legislatures to be dealt with in accordance with the amending formula of our present 1982 Constitution Act. This approach would ensure that Canadians get the Constitution that they want and not the Constitution that we, the politicians, want them to have.

It has been said that Quebec will not participate in a constituent assembly. Mr. Remillard has said so publicly. To the best of my knowledge, Premier Bourassa has not. Premier Bourassa has said that he will not talk to anyone else but the federal government and that it is unacceptable to Quebec to talk to the other provinces. It is just as unacceptable to Canada that Quebec talk only to the federal government, a federal government and a Parliament that it really does not trust.

The only real solution is a truly representative constituent assembly in which we all participate. If Quebec refuses, the constituent assembly can be used to develop Canadians' response to Quebec, a response that Quebec tells us it is waiting for.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. member for Sarnia—Lambton. I would just like to thank hon. members for deleting questions and comments so that we could get all these speakers in, and then starting on Monday we will probably have a new routine.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this important debate.

Apart from the over-arching importance of the need for Canadian unity, the section of the Speech from the Throne of particular personal interest to me is the section on participating in prosperity. In particular, this section places appropriate emphasis and federal government attention in human resource development and in the field of education.

In the area of human resource development, the speech rightfully notes that in the interdependent world we live in prosperity will, more and more, be a factor of knowledge, skills and innovation. Increasingly—thanks for the support back here—economic prosperity is first and foremost an issue of the people. Canada's ability to prosper in a global economy will be determined by the level of Canadians' educational achievement, by the sophistication of our management skills and by our attitudes to work and to change.

Globalization requires a new strategic alliance between government, labour and business. It means striking new effective partnerships, new forms of co-operation and collaboration between all major stakeholders if we are to meet the challenge of the integrated global economy.

While technology is certainly an important component of competitiveness, it is not by itself sufficient. A high quality work force and organizational innovations are required to capture the full potential of the new technologies that are around us.

The message is clear: Canada needs to build on its past performance in human resources to maintain its high standard of living and to ensure prosperity for future generations.

Canada ranked third, after the United States and Japan, out of 23 OECD countries, in terms of its human resources according to the 1990 edition of The World Competitiveness Report. Canada did poorly, however, in areas such as managerial initiatives, 15th; vocational training, 16th; and availability of skilled labour, 15th. These areas are now, more than ever, of key importance to competitiveness in Canada.

While Canada's education and training systems have served us well in the past, it is not clear that our systems are geared to meet the new job requirements of the emerging global economy. Nor is it clear that they can respond to demands for continuous learning and retraining brought about by a technology-driven, rapidly changing system.

If we are to meet future competitiveness challenges, we will need to increasingly view the development of human resources as an investment as opposed to a cost item.

The thrust of the Speech from the Throne is that the potential for gains in productivity, flexibility and responsiveness offered by the new technologies can only be realized through the skill and innovation that workers and management bring to their adoption and to their use.

It has been said that intelligent machines work best when paired in innovative ways with skilled workers. In this light, the challenge for all major stakeholders is to craft a way that ensures new workers entering the labour force of the capability to learn new skills many times in their working lives. Once they are in the labour force, they will probably have to be retrained a number of times. So they should be encouraged to learn new skills, to accept new challenges and job changes.

The Speech from the Throne is essentially about preparing us for the 21st century. For example, it is about developing a strong training culture in this country and continuing to move toward a more active training system than one that is based strictly on income maintenance. Our wealth and resources, both material and human, have led us to a point of complacency about the importance of skilled and innovative workers that must be drastically altered if we are to meet the challenge of a knowledge-driven economy.

In the wake of strong growth in the labour force over the past several decades, we have developed a weak training culture and thus have failed to adequately recognize that investment in human resource development is just as important as investment in plants and equipment. So we must do these things to be competitive.

The demographers tell us that by the year 2040, Canada will change from a country with abundant labour and scarce capital to a country with scarce labour and abundant capital.

Throughout the 1990s it is anticipated that the labour force will grow at a slower rate than in the previous two decades. It will grow at only an average of 1.2 per cent. What does this mean to Canada? It means we must put greater reliance on the current labour force and the pressures of adjustment will affect the existing work force much more directly than in the past.

Predictions of future job prospects also tell us that more and more will require higher skill levels with the growth of this information-based society. Fuelled by changes in technology and economic restructuring, Canadians have begun to witness the occupational transformation which is occurring in this country. We have experienced a shift from primarily a goods economy to a service economy. The problem arises in that there will be a general increase in the skill content and education requirements in most occupations and many future jobs will require higher skills.

Almost half of the jobs created between 1990 and 2000 will require more than five years of combined education and training beyond the completion of high school. The problem is that these requirements will exceed the current education and training levels of many workers.

Some 60 per cent of the workers today possess no more than secondary school education. In the absence of action there could be an increasing mismatch between the skills available and those that will be in demand. In the end Canadian industry and our economic prosperity depend upon a flexible workforce capable of taking on new jobs, changing occupations, acquiring new knowledge and developing new skills.

As we emerge as an information-based society, the need to adapt to the new skill demands on a regular basis will affect increasingly the number of Canadians. In tomorrow's society our workers will have to maintain a core of specific occupational skills, i.e. literacy and numeracy. They have to access skills up-grading and will need to be multi-skilled.

In effect, workers will increasingly be required to undertake a lifetime of learning in the work force. The convergence of these demographic and technological trends raises important questions about how well equipped we are to maintain and improve on our relatively high standard of living in Canada. For example, as envisaged in the Speech from the Throne, an important vehicle or mechanism through which the problem of skills-training can be addressed is our education system.

In the field of education, the speech correctly notes that in the dawning knowledge age how well we live will depend on how well we learn. Canadian men and women must have access to both the skills and the life-long learning opportunities necessary to improve their job prospects and ensure their prosperity.

Like our approaches to training and human resource development, our education system is under pressure to reform its curriculum so as to better prepare students to contribute effectively to a rapidly changing knowledge and technology intensive economy. There appears to be considerable agreement that schools should provide students with the basic skills they will need for a lifetime of learning so they can be trained and retrained.

Canada is near the top of the OECD countries in terms of spending on education. Currently Canadians are investing some $50 billion in education and training systems, $45 billion in formal education, and $5 billion in adult training. The federal government spends over $10 billion a year in education, a terrific amount of money, but it raises some great concerns about the results.

Despite the high levels of money poured into it the current education system produces something short of world-class results. The commitment to a discussion paper on learning is not intended, as noted in the throne speech, to violate provincial jurisdiction. That is set out or acknowledged in the speech itself. It is looking beyond jurisdictional squabbling to what is good and best for the country as a whole.

This is a commitment targeted toward a system apparently in need of direction and reform. The question is seemingly one of quality in education. Our education system is facing challenges.

The discussion paper will be out in a short while. All Canadians will be asked to participate and we will be looking forward to setting some new directions in education, as we have noted in this speech and in the throne speech, which are so needed for the development of our people so that we keep them in our schools, reduce the drop-out rate from our high schools and reduce this business of 17 per cent functional literacy and numeracy on graduates.

We are looking forward to important results from this discussion paper so we can carry on in developing our human resources in Canada. We must move in to the 21st century in the right way so that we maximize our prosperity in Canada.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, after nearly seven years in office, this government has brought in a throne speech which was heralded as the most critical and important in Canadian history.

While we have heard about the need for new ideas, we can find few new ideas in the path the throne speech has laid out.

There were some positive signals, however, although they were vague.

First, there is no doubt about the importance of eliminating interprovincial trade barriers to ensure Canadian competitiveness. The Reform Party has advocated this for some time. It is hard to imagine an economic policy which has free trade with the U.S. without free trade within Canada. However, it has taken a long time to realize that problem.

Second, regarding the call to improve education and training, there is little doubt of the need for Canada to do this to ensure economic prosperity. However, defining the problem is not a prescription.

Third, the government description of the changes in the way Ottawa works are almost directly out of the Reform Party manual and were a primary reason for my party's creation. However, one has to ask whether description of problems equals the will to change. If Canadians want reform of interprovincial trade, education system and the Parliament of Canada, they certainly need to send reformers.

Of all the issues facing Canada, the issues of national unity and constitutional change are the ones which are to be of key importance in this session of Parliament and to Canadians outside these walls.

Our ability to settle the fundamental question of Canada's unity will decide whether Canada enters the 21st century on a sound footing as a united country or whether it staggers into the next millennium still seeking solutions to problems that have gone unanswered.

For the record, the Reform Party proposes that the Constitution of a new Canada ought to be built on the following basis:

First, new Canada ought to be built by those who want in. Canada should not be built by accommodating those who wish to divide it in order to remain united.

Second, new Canada ought to have a genuinely federal system, including a strong national government with strong regional representation through a Triple E Senate and strong provinces to protect cultural identity and regional character.

Third, new Canada ought to have a division of power which fulfils the needs Canadians share, especially the needs for a competitive economy, a sustainable environment and a responsible community.

Fourth, new Canada ought to be a country which respects the democratic values that Canadians share and protects the interests of Canadians in the current constitutional situation. It ought to have a new Constitution which is accepted by demonstrated popular consent. It should not be a federation where powerful interests succeed in getting their ideology entrenched in the Constitution of Canada so the public cannot choose a new course even if it wanted to.

In summary, the Reform Party believes that new Canada should be a balanced democratic federation of provinces, distinguished by the conservation of its magnificent environment, the viability of its economy and recognition of the equality and uniqueness of all its citizens and provinces.

In the 12 months since the defeat of Meech Lake, the Reform Party has put forth its view. The Liberals, NDP and various provincial governments have also put forth their views on future constitutional development. The federal government has yet to put forward any concrete constitutional proposals of its own.

Almost a year after Meech Lake we have had hearings, committees, forums, the Prime Minister's committee of committees, the promise of more committees, and yet no concrete proposals of where the government actually stands on this issue.

We have been given vague proposals and high-sounding platitudes, talk of economic costs and benefits, but no vision of exactly what the government wants for this country, except that it remain united, which most Canadians, including myself and the Reform Party desire as well.

Certainly, one of the major reasons that Meech failed to win public support was the top-down, closed-door process. From the Reform Party's perspective, if the process is not correct, there is little chance that the content will bear the public's approval. The process followed is as important as the content, because the proper process will ensure that the content is good for Canada and acceptable to the Canadian public.

It is almost unprecedented for a government which has lost the confidence of the Canadian public and has already seen its major constitutional agenda fail to announce its intention to keep control of the entire constitutional process in upcoming negotiations before obtaining a new mandate.

While all of us who sit in this House have a constitutional responsibility to deal with major areas of concern to Canada, it is an undeniable fact that the parliamentary institutions and individuals are held in some degree of contempt by the Canadian public. This undermines the ability of Parliament and the government to propose even truly good constitutional changes to a suspicious public.

• (1950)

If the old Canada parties close ranks, the public will think they are trying to put something over on them. If the old Canada parties act on partisan lines, then the public is just as likely to consider it to be political posturing.

Reformers believe that the process of constitution-making in Canada must be as open and as broadly based as possible. Even before Meech, the Reform Party was a strong advocate of constituent assemblies, a concept which has very much come into vogue.

Of course, we would like to see a process involving directly elected delegates to these assemblies held on a provincial or regional basis as well as one held for aboriginal people.

Reformers believe that aboriginal people should be given the opportunity to define among themselves their position in the new Canada, their relationship to the federal government, and their rights and responsibilities, and not merely to have their conditions simply studied further.

Reformers believe that constitutional conventions held on a provincial or regional basis before a national convention is convened help to ensure that the hopes and aspirations of all provinces are put forward. This will help to ensure that the best opportunity to reach consensus is reached.

Many Canadians are suspicious of a call for a single national convention before each region has had time to develop its position and, for that matter, of the Prime Minister's insistence that the the House of Commons, with 50 per cent of its seats representing only two provinces, deal with constitutional negotiations on behalf of an entire federation.

Reformers believe that ordinary citizens would best be able to stand for an election to a constituent assembly. While Canadians recognize the hard work and dedication of their elected officials, they also recognize their very partisan nature, the excessive party discipline and the deeply held ideological bias of many elected representatives, characteristics which most Canadians simply do not share. This leaves Reformers to prefer a non-political, non-partisan convention.

Also, the short-run vision of our politicians to gain electoral success contrasts with Canada's need for a long-lasting Constitution and united country.

Of course, Reformers believe that once a constitutional package has been developed by a constituent assembly and ratified by the elected provincial legislatures and Parliament, it should be ratified by a referendum of each province.

Reformers believe that a constitution developed in a bottom-up process with a constituent assembly at the front end followed by a referendum is the best way to achieve the consensus which Canada needs and which Canadians are now demanding.

When Canadians and Reformers speak of consensus, they mean a consensus of the people of Canada, not the traditional mythical consensus of old Canada's politicians, which was a consensus of political elites, the Canadian establishment and other people who matter.

Old Canada's supporters will say that consensus cannot be worked out if too many people are involved. Certainly, this is a slightly warped view of what true consensus is. Consensus, it is said in old Canada, can only be worked out in secret and behind closed doors. Compromise in old Canada can only be achieved when a majority government can force through compromise when it cannot achieve consensus. Compromise in new Canada can only be worked out through a genuine process of give and take, where each side is involved.

Reformers believe that, free of threats or ultimatums, the process of a constituent assembly and a referendum is the best way of assuring that genuine compromises are developed and reached so that each region has an opportunity to ensure that their hopes and aspirations are addressed and embodied in the Constitution.

A constitutional package developed in a public consensus-building process, as the Reform Party has suggested, stands the best possibility of being a deal that will bear the will of Canadians and of being a package that will withstand the test of time.

If, however, this constitutional package is reached by bullying threats and coercion, especially over economic circumstances, if a deal is developed as the result of panic to meet a deadline or an ultimatum or else Canada will not survive, if a deal is reached that is perceived, like the 1982 Constitution, to exclude a province or region of Canada, or if a deal is perceived to be for the benefit of one province and the exclusion of the others, like the 1987 accord, if the deal finds accommodation without finding solutions to deeper underlying problems, if it addresses the concerns of one group and excludes others, if it is a deal where people are spoken to but neither listened to nor understood because of a top-down process, then the deal reached will either fail or only be a temporary solution that will help only to inflame underlying tensions and divisions.

It will ensure that Canada stumbles into the 21st century, uncertain about its future, its direction and its unity.

For three decades various political leaders and political parties have proposed solutions to Canada's problems. They have not solved our problems, and in many cases have not even addressed the real problems.

One of the primary reasons Canada's major problems, especially those concerning Quebec have yet to be answered is that Canadian politicians have failed to believe, or comprehend, the honesty of some positions taken.

It has often been said that Canada should not separate because we have built a country that is the envy of the world. Canadians all know that Canada is a country worth preserving, and Reformers have always said that we want to preserve Canada as one country if possible; however Canada cannot continue to be a house divided against itself.

Almost 2,500 years ago there came into existence a great confederation which produced a golden age which was the envy of the ancient world. Its architecture, philosophers and poets are still held in reverence to this day. At the centre of the confederation of ancient Greece there was a great city surrounded by great walls which no army could breach. Inside these walls was the rich city and culture and the first democracy known to man. While the confederacy was vast, the democracy was limited to those few who lived within those walls; those living outside the walls began to perceive and those living within the walls began to believe that the purpose of this confederacy was to build a civilization that would be the envy of the ancient world.

Despite its greatness, the ancient Greek confederacy and its great civilization crumbled because of internal dissension, the result of failing to listen to the hopes and aspirations of the confederation outside the walls of Athens.

Now parallels can be drawn from events of 2,500 years ago. The historian of the great dissolution of that confederation, Thucydides, wrote "The Greeks did not understand each other any longer, though they spoke the same language". Some may say; well, I am speaking of the two major language groups in Canada. However, what some others see in Canada is the inability of the politicians of old Canada, living behind these walls, to hear and to understand the people already living in new Canada.

Finally, a country cannot be founded or maintained merely by threats and fear. Neither can a country be built merely upon the economic benefits to the participants or to make the world envious. Debate about a commitment to Canada should be more than just a discussion about the economic costs and benefits. A country can only be maintained by a clear commitment and a feeling of belonging on the part of all its citizens and all its provinces.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, The hon. member spoke about a vision of a new Canada compared to an old Canada. I guess I come from the old Canada and I identify with the old Canada. It has proven to be, in spite of a small population, one of the most prosperous in the world, an old Canada that has carved out a place for itself in the history of the world. It stands as a symbol of what can be done when people come together and work with vision and commitment, a symbol of which it can be said that there is a vision that understands that bigger and stronger is not always better, where compromise is of value and not just confrontation.

I find it peculiar that the Reform Party presents itself as a party of the grass roots, and yet when I sat at my television set and watched their convention I discovered that of all of the parties in this country, it is the Reform Party that is the least grass roots, because one individual stands at the top and spreads his gospel down. I ask the hon. member to respond as to how that happens.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): She can come back Monday and respond.

It being 8 o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 8 p.m.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-206, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act and the Parliament of Canada Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain the purpose of this bill.

It is to ensure that when a vacancy occurs in the representation a by-election shall be held within 80 days after the speaker sends his warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of the writ.

This bill was suggested by the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore so I know it will win widespread approval on the other side of the House. I see the parliamentary secretary sitting here. Perhaps the bill could be given second reading at once and could be referred to a committee so the matter could be studied promptly and dealt with very quickly.

In any event that is the purpose of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION OR TRANSFER AUTHORIZATION ACT

REINSTATEMENT OF BILL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and agreement on the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any standing or special order of this House, the following bill introduced in the Second Session of the Thirty–Fourth Parliament be reinstated forthwith in this session as follows:

An Act to provide for the dissolution and transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, be deemed to have been introduced, read the first time and ordered to be printed, read a second time, referred to and reported by a Legislative Committee with an amendment (Bill C–73); and that the bill as reinstated be called for debate during this sitting or any forthcoming sitting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUPPLY

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions on the following motion as well:

That, notwithstanding the relevant provisions of Standing Order 81, Supply Proceedings for the current trimester be subject to the following provisions:

1. the last allotted day be Thursday, June 13.

2. every estimate or supplementary estimate referred to a committee be reported or be deemed to have been reported by Friday, June 7.

3. "extension of consideration by a Committee" (as set out in Standing Order 81.(4)(a), (b) and (c) be subject to a notice of motion from the Leader of the Opposition to be given not later than Tuesday, June 4, with such motion to be deemed adopted when called on "Motions" on Thursday, June 6; and

4. there be eight days allotted for the business of Supply for the current period ending Thursday, June 13.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. the parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

RURAL CANADA

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured once again to rise in the House pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present a petition on behalf of the constituents of Kentbridge, Chatham, Thamesville, Ridgetown, and Blenheim. This petition is with regard to the Conservative government's direct attack on the rural way of life, including cuts to Via Rail, abandoning small rail lines, the neglect of fisheries, forests and other natural resources, cuts to the CBC and the erosion of the royal postal services, particularly the closure of small post offices, many of them being the backbone of rural areas.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life, to support the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services, and to reject the Conservative agenda of cutbacks and closures.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from residents of my community and elsewhere regarding the Baltic states. The petitioners call for the use of every means available to prevent further bloodshed. They call for a peaceful restoration of independence to the Baltic States and they wish to send Canadian parliamentary observers to the Baltic States. They urge the government to raise this issue at the Security Council of the United Nations and to press the United Nations to send its observers to the area immediately.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of people in my constituency of Notre–Dame–de–Grâce in Montreal condemning the government for its cuts to the CBC and calling on Parliament as a matter of priority to ensure that the CBC be further strengthened to serve as a primary instrument of Canadian cultural sovereignty, providing high quality service to all Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to table the following petition which stresses the problems caused by the GST, reflected today in a number of reports; it also states that the cost to the consumer is much higher than was predicted by the government. Residents of Duguayville and Hacheyville in my riding ask the government to rethink this disastrous policy that continues to feed the recession in this country.

CANADA POST

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to present a petition to the House on behalf of a number of people from the Windsor, Essex County area. They petition Parliament to call on Canada Post to honour Marie Sklodowska Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth, November 7, 1992.

This petition has been duly certified by the clerk, and I present it pursuant to the relevant standing order.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston and the Islands in support of a bill to make it an offence to destroy or desecrate the Canadian flag.

I note that such a bill was introduced as a private member's bill during the last session, and I hope that the hon. member who introduced the bill will come forward with it again.

This petition supports the intent of this bill and urges this House to adopt such a bill.

EQUALITY RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of people from Quesnel, Kingston and the Islands, Calgary and from all over Canada.

These petitioners point out to the House that a report has been prepared by the committee on justice and legal affairs on equality rights in Canada. The government has accepted this report and its recommendations saying it would take whatever measures necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination.

These particular petitioners ask that government and Parliament act to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present petitions, a large number of which are signed by people in the Ottawa area.

Whereas our Parliament is located in Ottawa and legislates the National Energy Board, the proposed move of the board to Calgary, according to the petitioners, will seriously affect the ability of environmental groups and other interested parties to make representations to the board. The only persons to derive a benefit from this proposed relocation are the big oil and gas companies.

The undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reconsider and stop the move of the National Energy Board to Calgary.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I have a question on the Order Paper dated May 13. While that may sound like a very recent question, I put the same question on the Order Paper in February during the last session. A 45–day answer was requested and now it is the mid–May.

The government has had since February to prepare an answer to this question. I would have thought that as soon as I put it down on the Order Paper the answer would have been forthcoming. It has had months and months to prepare this answer. I wonder why the government has failed to comply with the rules of the House and answer this question within the 45 days. It is not a difficult question. The answer may be embarrassing to the government, but it is not a difficult question.

With respect, I hope the parliamentary secretary has some explanations as to why there is negligence in failing to answer this question.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raises a very important point, and that is the whole question of how we treat issues, questions or bills that are dropped as a result of a prorogation and then require a reintroduction process.

I hear his arguments. They are very valid, and I am sure that the hon. member will want to discuss with his caucus whether we should apply the same argument to bills that were in similar treatment in the last session.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C–2, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to begin the debate on Bill C–2, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act. As my colleagues will recall, in the budget speech of February 26 last, the then Minister of Finance, the hon. Michael Wilson, announced that the Government of Canada had made a decision to relocate the National Energy Board, or the NEB, from Ottawa to Calgary, Alberta.

The bill we are discussing in the House today is a necessary piece of work in order to facilitate that move. The bill to amend the National Energy Board Act will make it possible for the Government of Canada to follow through on those commitments and plans.

This bill and this move has to be put into some context. The National Energy Board was formed in 1959 by the then government of the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker during the time when Canada's oil and gas industry was being organized in an attempt to make it a national economic instrument for the development of Canada, with particular interest for the producing provinces.

In 1961 the so–called first agreement on how Canada's oil and gas resources would be used in Canada was formulated. Colloquially, it became known as the Ottawa Valley line because from Canada's Pacific coast to the Ottawa Valley western Canadian oil and gas would be used for those Canadians living in that part of Canada.

That agreement had followed a very acrimonious debate, the so–called 1957 pipeline debate. The result was that when the government came into office, there was an attempt to bring about some form of order within the industry. Equally important, there was to be an agency to allow both producers and consumers to have access to a regulatory process bringing some order to both sides of the energy equation.

I believe that agreement served Canada very well. It allowed us in western Canada to develop an industry which today is a major economic engine, not only for that region of the country, but all of Canada. If one takes a look at Canada's balance of trade payments, it is that industry which is very instrumental in Canada's economic growth and stability. Even in the most recent gulf crisis, when other countries were looking for sources of supply of oil, Canada remained in a self-sufficient position and was not asked by the International Energy Agency, for example, to develop strategic petroleum reserves, as other countries such as the United States, Germany and Japan have had to do.

Since 1961, there have been in this House a great number of debates relating to ownership of the resource and control of the resource.

Those of us who come from western Canada have always argued that the Natural Resources Transfer Act of 1930 once and for all confirmed conclusively that resource ownership lay in the hands of the provinces. I mention that as background.

Even in the early days when the National Energy Board was formed, it was argued that as a demonstration, so that the Government of Canada should have a presence throughout the country, it should be located some place other than in the national capital.

That is history. I am pleased that through this long debate this legislation is a further step in fulfilling not only the commitment made in the most recent budget speech, but the vision of the value this industry could have to Canada's future.

This move is being made for a number of very good reasons. I hardly need to remind hon. members that we live in a critical juncture in Canada's history, at a time when the forces of disunity and divergence threaten the unity of a nation that generations of men and women have toiled to build.

It is extremely important at this point in time that national policy be responsive to the aspirations of Canada's regions for a fuller participation in our national life and greater proximity to the making of decisions which shape the economic future of our country.

Western Canadians in particular have increasingly felt that their problems were not always well understood in Ottawa and that decisions were sometimes taken without a full appreciation for their views and perspectives.

I could quote nothing better than the member for Edmonton—Southeast. In his book Uneasy Patriots he said, and I quote but one paragraph of which there are many I could quote.

On page 96 he said:

> Defenders of the NEP—

The National Energy Program.

> —agree that one of its objectives was to establish the leadership of Ottawa in the energy sector. The means chosen was a bold attempt to create a new community of energy leaders with a primary loyalty to the federal government. This group was to join industrial-financial elites in Toronto and Montreal who have historically identified closely with Ottawa because of various federal measures such as the Bank Act. The NEP was thus profoundly anti-western because until 1980 our energy industry was one of the very few sectors centred in Western Canada. It was, to many Westerners, as if a national government with no elected representation on either coast had told our east- and west-coast fisheries that they should relocate their industry decision-makers to Ottawa.

That puts it in perspective.

The more than 2000 miles between the nation's capital and the principal cities of western Canada partly explains this sense of alienation. These feelings are aggravated by the fact that decisions concerning the nature of development of western oil and gas resources are perceived to be made far removed from where they impact most heavily, namely in the west.

While many Canadians appreciate the nature of the harsh realities which govern life in western Canada—most importantly, volatile and unpredictable international grain and energy markets—it is important that this understanding be reflected in our national institutions. They must be ones in which westerners can take their place as full and equal participants.

There has been another change and that is regarding cost recovery. Obviously, when we are being asked by the industry, once it makes application to the National Energy Board, to pay for the National Energy Board's costs directly as interveners and not only as taxpayers, it is important to take another note.

• (1030)

Over 80 per cent of the National Energy Board's activities relate to oil and gas produced in western Canada. The board's decisions on these matters are of importance to all Canadians. Some petitions have indicated that and we are mindful of that fact. But the board's decisions touch upon the lives of westerners in a more direct and tangible way.

The new location for the NEB will in no way diminish the quality or direction of board decisions. The planned relocation of the board from Ottawa to Calgary, while symbolic, is more important than that. It is a demonstration of the government's desire to ensure that its institutions and decisions are seen to be responsive in areas where regional impacts are profound.

Some have alleged that moving the National Energy Board will somehow throw into question the integrity and impartiality of its decisions. The argument that a national institution such as the NEB can act in a non-partisan fashion in Ottawa and not when located elsewhere is simply, to put the best face on it, preposterous. Moreover, it is an insult. It is an insult to the intelligence of the audience, it is an insult to western Canadians, it is an insult to the board's staff and it is not worthy of those who utter it. If they have other arguments, economic or whatever, I can understand the argument, but I do not understand the impartiality argument because one could say, in reverse, if that is the case, because the board has been located in Ottawa since 1959, all its decisions have been against the interest of the industry or the west as a region.

We are saying very clearly, there might be other economic arguments, but no one can question the board's integrity.

We recognize that the National Energy Board has diverse responsibilities that extend well beyond oil and natural gas. I want to assure Canadians that the board will continue to fulfil its role as that of a truly national institution. In that regard, as the board has been doing in the past, we would like to emphasize that it will continue to conduct hearings relating to pipeline and electricity transmission routes for example in centres right across Canada. They will be in close proximity to where the project impacts and public interests are the greatest.

Most importantly, I would like to emphasize that the integrity of the board as an arbitrator of diverse industry and consumer interest is not in question. The board will continue its mandate to regulate in the Canadian public interest fairly and effectively, taking into consideration the views of all interested parties; consumers, producers and others.

I think it is also worth mentioning that the NEB employees, as they become increasingly aware of the opportunities associated with both working and living in the Calgary area, will view the relocation favourably.

I appreciate that any change of location will bring about disruption, but the fact of the matter is that when we speak about the Public Service, we speak about it in exactly those two words; it is a service to the public and it is the service concept that has to be stressed.

The National Energy Board has taken steps, in co-operation with the Treasury Board—and I want to thank the President of the Treasury Board—many of which are precedent setting, to ensure that for these individuals, the move and transition to Calgary is as smooth as possible.

I have also had an opportunity to meet the mayor, members of the council, school boards, French speaking associations in the Calgary area and educators, and I can say, without any hesitation, that the welcome these Canadians will receive in Calgary will be second to none. I appreciate the work that has been done in the Calgary region for these people.

Some individuals, regardless of what assistance we offer, will either not be able or will choose not to relocate to Calgary. The NEB will make every possible effort, within the limits of available resources, to help these employees find alternative employment.

The board's regulatory calendar for public hearings for the rest of the year and into earlier 1992 is a heavy one. That is for reasons primarily on the gas side and pipeline proposals, as well as electricity export proposals. We are taking every necessary measure to ensure that there is no loss over the transition period in the continuity and effectiveness with which the board performs its duties.

This applies of course to both its traditional duties and those frontier lands functions which it has assumed with the dissolution of the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration.

To show how these things work, roughly 10 days ago the governments of the Northwest Territories and Yukon signed a memorandum of understanding for further development in the regulatory process in conjunction with the federal government's responsibility of the regulation of oil and gas, particularly north of 60.

I recall in 1979 when we were negotiating with these very people as to the future of their area, specifically on the COPE agreement. Now some 10 years later, the people who were negotiating the agreement are now ministers in those governments and they also see the need not only for regulation, but also very strongly endorse their western Canadian presence.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, the move to Calgary will offer a new chapter in the history of the NEB. That history has been one of achievement in the past. We as Canadians do not face the reality, for example, that our neighbours to the south do where roughly 50 per cent of their oil needs must be imported, while we have a self-sufficiency in oil and gas. Obviously more work has to be done in terms of frontier lands, oilsands projects, other projects such as offshore with Hibernia, LASMO and Cohasset-Panuke because the oil production in the western sedimentary basin is dropping. We knew that. Our projections were correct.

These are changes that will come in the industry. One thing I know is that as the board relocates in Calgary it will continue to offer high standards and excellent service to the Canadian public. I believe Canadians will recognize that Calgary is in fact a major energy city and this national endorsement is another affirmation of that fact.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, as the energy critic of the Official Opposition, I would indicate at the outset that the leader of my party and the party supports the spirit and letter of Bill C-2. The important issue of employer-employee relations, a subject which is not the long suit of those on the other side, will be dealt with by my colleague from Ottawa West when she becomes the second speaker for my party.

We believe that the matter should be moved quickly to a legislative committee and there the questions of employee rights and employer responsibilities can be dealt with quickly. As you will be aware, Sir, being an Albertan yourself, the NEB has already leased space in Calgary. You and I both wish it were in Edmonton but I think as northern Albertans we recognize that unfortunately Calgary, speaking as a northern Albertan, does have the ERCB and is the more logical place to put the NEB than our own city.

Space has been leased and the move is going ahead. I think the member for Ottawa West will deal in detail with what it means to the careers, children in high school and university and a good many families of those who do not choose to go with the board to Calgary.

• (1040)

It should also be stressed—and I think the minister mentioned this point—that the relocation of the NEB to Calgary will save our western oil and gas industry money and make it easier to deal with a regulatory agency.

As a member from Edmonton, you will be aware, Sir, that since 1986, two years after this government came to office, approximately 50,000 bread winners in the western oil patch have lost their jobs. The industry continues to hurt badly.

At present energy company representatives have to make frequent trips to Ottawa. One of the advantages of moving the NEB to Calgary will be a reduction of the costs of coming to Ottawa and staying in expensive hotels and the like.

I might tell the minister that last night I had dinner with one of his former constituents. I have to say, without revealing any names, that I do not think that particular former constituent is going to be voting for the minister's party any more.

Mr. Epp: Especially if he is a former constituent.

Mr. Kilgour: In fact they went to school together and the minister knows the former constituent very well.

An hon. member: It is his brother.

Mr. Kilgour: Currently energy company representatives have to make many trips to Ottawa to present information and opinions on issues being dealt with by the NEB. Trips for the hearings are often lengthy—and I think that is an understatement—and expensive particularly since the government has made applicants pay to have their cases heard by the board to cover the costs of operation.

It is estimated that 90 per cent of the National Energy Board's operating costs, about $25 million yearly, is funded by the deeply wounded oil and gas industry from western Canada.

Another point is that in spite of the NEB's best persuasion on the petroleum companies to get their co-operation in recruiting competent and knowledgeable men and women, the number of candidates as employees for the board has evidently declined. Many of them are from the oil patch and simply do not want to live in our national capital region. That is now a requirement under the NEB Act.

It is very important that NEB board members and employees be impartial and capable of balancing all of the affected interests and regions of the country, consuming as well as producing, electricity, nuclear and all the issues they deal with in the decision-making process.

I congratulate the minister on his reading habits. I am glad he quoted from the book. I guess if he can quote from it, so can I. I am going to quote from both of them. I would like, if I may, Sir, to read—

An hon. member: I have them both.

Mr. Kilgour: Oh, you have them both. Well, why didn't the minister quote from that one too?

I would like to quote from the section of the first book Uneasy Patriots, called Oil Sands, Coal and Natural Gas.

Mr. Arseneault: Who is the author?

Mr. Kilgour: You have known him a long time, Mr. Speaker. This was written in 1988. I know you have your copy with you this morning. A paper presented to provincial energy ministers in 1986 estimated that without new sources of supply Canada would require imports to meet one-quarter of its light crude and oil needs by 1990 and more than half by 2000.

It seems to me to follow that western Canada should aim to become the technological world leader for oil sands energy development. It would certainly help Edmonton.

A new mined oil sands project in Fort McMurray which was to start in 1996 unfortunately will not, and an upgrader at Lloydminster to start in 1993, recently announced amid much controversy as to its economic viability and I understand viability remains a major problem for that facility, could become an important component of a prairie manufacturing base in the overall national interest. I skip down a bit and I mention that the security of the future supply is so critical that the risk appears to be warranted. The U.S. now has a strategic oil reserve of about 515 million barrels which, at $20 U.S. per barrel, represents a $10 billion investment in oil security without including carrying charges on the investment.

I have recently written to the minister on this matter so I will repeat it from the book. "Ottawa must also recognize that the oil sands sector badly needs help in other spheres. For example, new oil in sand extraction technologies appear to hold real promise for efficiency and reduction of water and air pollution when compared to the hot-water processes now used by Syncrude and Suncor at Fort McMurray".

Even the member for Edmonton East seems to agree with it. He can do that in his speech.

"Imaginative new research and development programs funded by Ottawa should assist the more promising of these technologies with a view to enhancing existing western strengths. World leadership with all of its spin-off in terms of exportive services should also be a goal".

This next paragraph I think the member for Edmonton East may not agree with.

"Substantial growth for gas exports from western Canada was predicted in a late 1986 study by the National Energy Board—"

That has certainly been the case since.

"If, however, NEB does not permit exports beyond 1991," as was then a possibility, "a cost-benefit analysis by the Alberta Research Council predicts a virtual calamity for exploration and development in this important western industry and estimates that the present value of a no-export policy after 1991 for Canadian consumers because of resulting lower prices would be $8.8 billion between 1988 and 2003"—get this, Mr. Speaker—"the net present loss to Alberta producers"—your constituents and mine and many others—"alone would be $25.3 billion, making a net loss to the economies and governments of the western provinces of $18.3 billion over the period. Given the indications that large quantities of gas are still to be found within the western provinces, it is surely in the general national interest to continue exports beyond 1991. Ottawa, or the Western Diversification Office, might usefully address this issue, if only by funding further research on the employment and other costs to the west of alternative gas exports supplies".

I promise not to quote any further from that book.

By the way, before I forget, I hope the member for Edmonton East will tell the members of the House whether he and his party support the move to Calgary and that he will correct me in his speech. The member for Edmonton East has indicated that he was "indifferent" about the move, but would not fight it. I hope he will explain that comment to 2.5 million Albertans when he gets up to speak.

A conviction shared by outer Canadians is that we are chronically under-represented in the Public Service, including Crown corporations, of our own national government. Atlantic Canadians protested this soon after Confederation. Toronto, Ottawa, Hull and Montreal together contain almost half of the more than 200,000 federal employees. I speak, Sir, as a former federal employee so I hope you will forgive me for that.

About one-third of the federal government employees live in the national capital region. In the United States the equivalent figure for Washington, D.C., is only 12 per cent. My leader, Jean Chrétien, revealed during the early 1980s that only one out of seven senior executives in the federal Public Service lived outside of Ottawa and Hull.

Mr. Chrétien also noted that as many as 70 per cent of the senior government policy makers in this city had little or no regional experience and as many as half of them had never worked outside Ottawa during their entire careers.

There appears to be a clear consensus now among federal mandarins that there is no such thing as a parallel career for their colleagues "in the regions". Job classifications, salaries, and a host of other factors make it clear to everyone that the best careers are the ones that begin and end in Ottawa.

In my view, there should be some real effort to recruit people from all areas of the country and there should be an equal chance for everybody, whether they are from St. John's, Yellowknife, or Nanaimo. I will give the minister an example which I am sure will concern him. I am a former Winnipeger, Mr. Speaker, and I should confess that to you. A friend of mine, with a couple of university degrees, went to the Public Service of Canada in Winnipeg three or four years ago to see what jobs were available. Nothing of interest to her was available. She got on an aeroplane, came to Ottawa and rented an apartment for a month or two, I think it was. She went to the Public Service Commission here and found all kinds of interesting jobs, of which she accepted one and began to work in Ottawa. Is it right that somebody who cannot afford to fly to Ottawa and open an apartment here does not have the same access to these jobs as somebody living in outer Canada? That simply has to stop if we are going to do something about national unity in our country, which we all want to do, except the people in the back row.

In mid-1989, my office did a little study. We found that of 220 senior people from 28 federal departments and agencies—and there are about 40, so we did not do them all— only about 10 per cent of them were born and educated in western Canada. We have, as you know, about 30 per cent of the population. Obviously, we have about one-third of the number of senior public servants in Canada that we should have based on population.

What was it for Atlantic Canada? It was 4 per cent. Atlantic Canada, as you know, has about 10 per cent of the population. For the north, it was 0 per cent. In short, Atlantic Canada, western Canada and the north, eight provinces and two territories, had about 14 per cent of the senior public servants by birth and by education.

When the ex-Minister of Finance announced his budget recently, there was sustained applause from the government members, I am sure it included the minister, when he announced that the NEB would be moving to Calgary. I wonder why, and I do not mean to be unkind to the minister, it was not in the text of the finance minister's speech. I hope that the minister, when he is giving us the reason, will also tell us how much this move is going to cost.

To those opposite, this was great politics. In fact, moving the agency to Calgary is a very long overdue proposal. I might tell the minister that I had dinner last night with two other people from Calgary and they both told me that they were not going to vote for his party next time. This is just in passing.

An hon. member: Harvey is quaking in his boots.

An hon. member: Are they from your riding?

Mr. Kilgour: No, no. They live in Calgary.

As members know, Albertans marched in the street against the GST. The Prime Minister's caucus, I believe, has been at the brink of revolt. In fact, two of us were expelled from the caucus for voting against the GST. The Reform Party—

Mr. Peterson: Send us more.

Mr. Kilgour: The member for Willowdale may not appreciate that the last poll that I saw for Calgary indicated, and appreciate that Calgary has been the most loyal Tory city in Canada for generations, that 11 per cent of Calgarians were planning to vote for the Tory Party in the next election. In Edmonton, Mr. Speaker, you may not be pleased to know, it was reported by one of your favourite newspapers, The Edmonton Sun, that the number of people planning to vote for the Tory Party in the next election was 9 per cent.

Mr. Van De Walle: What about St. Albert?

Mr. Kilgour: I did not see the figures for St. Albert. The decision to move the NEB was done so hastily that there was insufficient time to include the announcement of the printed text of the ex-Minister of Finance's budget speech.

How are Ottawa's myriad agencies, departments and Crown corporations doing in an age of instant communication in providing regional leadership to our private sector? In 1989, only five out of forty of our largest or best-known national Crown corporations had their head offices outside of what I call inner-Canada; Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa. Not one of the five was in Atlantic Canada, and the five in western and northern Canada were the Canadian Wheat Board—well, they cannot very well put that in Ottawa—Cameco, formerly Eldorado Nuclear, in Saskatchewan, NWT Power Commission in Yellowknife, Petro-Canada in Calgary and the Canada Harbour Place in Vancouver. Five out of 40 of our largest Crown corporations are in western Canada. The other 35 are all located in either Ottawa or Montreal, none of them in Mississauga. Some seem to me to be especially out of place, given the nature of their activities and locale of their clientele.

For example, why is the Farm Credit Corporation in Ottawa? I think it would be of interest to members from the west to know, which I was reminded of recently, that Mr. Chrétien attempted to move the Farm Credit Corporation to Camrose—I see the member for Camrose and that area is in his seat—and it was blocked by the government which he supported in 1979-80. Mr. Chrétien has also moved jobs to Sudbury. He has moved jobs to Atlantic Canada. He has been in a real sense the author of decentralization in this country.

Why, for example, does the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, the Farm Credit Corporation, Canada Ports and the Canadian Dairy Commission need to be located in Ottawa-Hull?

I share the concerns expressed by many of the 285 NEB and COGLA employees, who are very unhappy about uprooting their families in some cases. They were shocked by the announcement in the media of the move. There was no consultation with employee representatives prior to the announcement, I understand, and I hope the minister will clarify that as well. It was rather typically insensitive and arrogant of the government to notify them over television that they are going to undertake a major change in life style.

I feel they understand that very little thought or planning has gone into the move. I understand the minister's department still does not have a budget for the move, but he will tell us about that. I hope he will tell us the details of it.

Calgary may look distant and forbidding to an anglophone. For the 30 per cent of the NEB work force who speak French, I would point out that we have a 12,000-strong francophone community in Calgary. It has pledged to offer its help, and I am glad the minister spoke of that. I am told the Catholic Board of Education can accommodate all francophone families in the city's two French-language schools.

It is estimated that about half of the employees will elect to make the move, as was the case when TransCanada Pipelines moved its head office to Calgary from Toronto last year. Those who decide not to move will receive, as I understand according to federal policy, priority for hiring in the Public Service. The member for Ottawa West will speak further about that, I believe.

Mr. Malone: I'll bet she will.

Mr. Kilgour: Might that be on the record, Mr. Speaker. The member for Crowfoot said: "I'll bet she will", and I hope the people taking notes of these things got that. It was one of the best lines I have heard from the member for Crowfoot.

Certainly some board members of the NEB and a certain percentage of the 285 employees will choose to remain in Ottawa. New staff would then have to be recruited from the producing sector in Calgary. I would point out to those opposite that there are a good many unemployed engineers and geologists and the like in Calgary, and hopefully some of these men and women will have a chance to work for the board. Some concerns have already been raised about their presumed predisposition to the producer's point of view. You know, if they go skiing up on Connor's Hill in Edmonton, they might ski with somebody who works for an oil company.

The ERCB has been in Calgary since its inception and I don't think anybody has ever accurately accused the ERCB of being a tame agency, a corrupted agency or biased in favour of the producers.

The NEB has proven to be an extraordinarily objective tribunal. It has not shown any propensity to favour a particular interest group. I think it would be very unfair for anybody to impugn the integrity of the agency by suggesting that its impartiality and even-handedness would be threatened on the basis of relocation to Calgary. It is also true that it is a move from the "corridors of power" to the capital of the oil and gas sector, one of the few to be located in western Canada. Should we question the board's impartiality? I do not think we should.

Ontario and western Canada have had their energy differences in the past, and may have again in the future.

• (1100)

Differences may occur—

Mr. Horner: Do you remember black Tuesday?

Mr. Kilgour: Yes, I do. If you are not careful, I will read from my book on that subject.

Differences may occur, but the location of the NEB hardly seems to justify renewed tensions. When the idea to establish some form of national energy body was first suggested to the minister, C. D. Howe, an Ontarian, snapped: "What in hell would such an agency do that I do not do already?"

The question was rhetorical. The creation of the NEB was not a sudden flash of inspiration, it was a natural progression of regulatory developments stretching back to the early 1900s.

What was new then was the fact that for the first time an independent tribunal had been established to provide advice to the federal government on certain energy matters, based on evidence put before its members at public hearings conducted in the nature of a court.

The board continued to be actively engaged in an advisory capacity because of its broad knowledge of energy matters generally, familiarity with the operation of many sectors of the industry and its involvement as a regulator with respect to many of the energy issues that came to the fore over the succeeding years.

Over a period of 32 years the scope and extent of its activities have expanded significantly, in part because of the broadening of its legislative mandate by Parliament, but even more because of the enormous growth in the scale and complexity of energy issues in which the board was involved, both as an adviser and as a regulator. It certainly stood the test of time.

I think I still have a few moments. The minister may have missed this section of the book, and I am sure the member for Mississauga missed this section of the book. As an Albertan, since much of the energy industry, oil and gas is in western Canada, I would like to say something about my own province which may even be of interest to the minister.

It reads: "The lack of western diversification does not satisfactorily explain the volatility of the Alberta economy. Why were the province's booms and busts since 1980 significantly worse than in Texas or Oklahoma, two American states with similar reliance on oil and agriculture? Why did the province experience a net loss of about 100,000 people between 1980 and 1989? During the decade, home prices collapsed; 14 provincial financial institutions failed or were forced to amalgamate; approximately one-third of the credit unions were placed under direct government supervision. The social and human costs to thousands of Alberta families and individuals were enormous.".

The Calgary economist, Robert Mansell, points out that unemployment in the province did not return to its pre-1981 recession high until May 1987 compared to November 1983 for Ontario; in 1984 for Atlantic Canada; in June 1984 for Quebec.

Contrary to the conventional wisdom in Ottawa that it was the drop in oil and farm prices that caused the most severe Alberta recession since the Great Depression, Mansell notes that the average price for oil and gas producers did not decline until 1986 and farm receipts remained quite stable during the period.

By 1980, Alberta's petroleum industry accounted for almost one-third of the provincial economic output, approximately one-half of all construction starts and about 80 per cent of the province's yearly spending." I say parenthetically, Mr. Speaker, that probably about 20 per cent of your constituents and 20 per cent of my constituents, perhaps more in southeast Edmonton than in yours, are directly involved in the oil and gas industry as a way of earning their livelihood.

"The growing dependence on the oil industry made Albertans increasingly vulnerable to anything that threatened new investment in the sector, including the NEP and high interest rates. Another important factor was that by 1980, Ottawa's taxation spending and energy policies as a whole were withdrawing about $15 billion more each year than the national government was injecting into the province through all forms of federal spending.

A major consequence of this was the transfer of numerous jobs and incomes out of the province, which severely weakened the provincial economy." I skip a paragraph and this one is worth noting.

This was written in 1990: "Albertans wonder why Alberta and not our largest and richest province, Ontario, has continued between 1980 and 1988 to be the only province from which Ottawa removes more in federal taxes than it spends. Why should parts of outer Canada be the cash cows of Confederation, providing cheap inputs for the industrial heartland?" If I were writing that now I would note that Ontario was losing about 3,000 jobs a day, I understand, in the manufacturing sector. The free trade agreement will have to be renegotiated by a new government after the next election.

While the Mulroney government continues to spend more in Ontario than it raises in federal revenues, thereby increasing inflation, his finance minister argues that sky-high interest rates are necessary to dampen inflation.

In August 1990, the Prime Minister told his constituents in Charlevoix—I do not want to speak against the Prime Minister. I will leave that part out.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kilgour: Do not coax me.

Some additional data on federal spending and taxation by province released by Mansell in August 1990 were equally distressing. Between 1961 and 1988 Albertans contributed $145.7 billion. Will the member for Willowdale tell the opposite side how many zeros there would be in $145 billion?

Mr. Peterson: Almost as many as in the Conservative Party.

Mr. Kilgour: Expressed as 1990 dollars, it is more to Ottawa's revenues than it received in federal spending and transfers.

British Columbians were the only other net contributors to Confederation during the same period. Ontarians, who might have been expected to have contributed generously to have-not provinces, received $24 billion more in spending than it paid in taxes during the same years.

Most of the national government is located in Ontario and the argument is frequently made that this explains this anomaly. How then to explain that between 1970 and 1979 Ontario made a net contribution to residents of the other provinces of about $3.6 billion?

Mansell's latest figures also indicate that since 1980 alone, the province of Quebec has received $95 billion from Ottawa, more than it contributed to the national government.

I will spare talking about the CF-18. I would ask the minister, when he is explaining the budget, to put it on the record and tell us why the one surface mining laboratory in western Canada, that at Devon, Alberta, which had, I believe, 12 PhDs working there doing research on surface coal and who wanted to do research, as I understand it, on things like the oil sands and other important matters, was, in effect, disbanded. Why were 12 professionals who had moved in good faith from Ottawa to Devon, Alberta, in effect told that they could get out of Alberta and go back to some other line of work? I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong. We have had a good many letters and exchanges on this. I would be grateful for his comments on that.

I guess this has been a pretty long talk. I think I have made all the points I was planning to make. I do not want to take any more time in the House. I hope it is clear to those opposite that this party, subject to what the member for Ottawa West will say, supports this move. We support decentralization.

I will end on that note.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Under the new rules the first two speakers have 40 minutes plus no questions or comments. Now we have the third speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton East, who will have 20 minutes plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to refrain from dispelling the tension that I am certain has gripped the House now as people anticipate on which side of the issue the New Democratic caucus will fall. It is with concern for the well-being and equanimity of my colleagues in this House that I decide at the top to inform them that the New Democratic Party, on the basis of a free vote in its caucus, will support this bill and will support the move of the National Energy Board to Calgary.

• (1110)

Having said that, I feel compelled to point out in a number of regards why the quote was attributed to me and noted by the hon. member for Edmonton—Southeast to the effect that the move of the Energy Board to Calgary was a matter of indifference. I did say that, but before getting into it, I would like to note that what we are dealing with here is a matter of government policy that was apparently conceived so hastily that it was shoehorned into the budget speech long after the date for the actual printing of the budget speech had passed.

This means that those of us following the finance minister's words on the written page found ourselves hearing the announcement of the move without being able to read it.

This indicates, better than anything else could, the nature of the haste of the decision. Why was the decision made in haste?

An hon. member: Why?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I would suggest that it is because it was made on the occasion of the return to Ottawa of the Prime Minister, who previously had been in Calgary and in the west and who had discovered to his dismay that all of these nasty rumours circulating in the national capital about the collapse of the Conservative Party in western Canada were not rumours at all. They were facts.

It was resolved that something quickly must be done to address this problem. "What to do? What to do? What to do? We could alter our economic policies and bring in new policies that will be of benefit to the west but no, no, no. That would require stepping on too many important major corporate toes. What to do? What to do? What to do?"

The decision was made to move the headquarters of the National Energy Board, its board and its staff, to Calgary, the perceived hotbed of Reform Party activity, in such a way as to salvage at least a couple of seats in that city for the Conservative Party.

As the minister noted in his remarks upon moving second reading of this bill, the move is a symbolic one. "Symbolic" was the term he used, and that is correct. It is more easily understood to be correct when you consider exactly what it is we are moving and why. In this sense it is and remains a matter of indifference to me.

What now is the National Energy Board? Why, as the member for Edmonton Southeast noted, are applications for employment with the board actually declining? The National Energy Board as we find it today is little more than a pale shadow of its former self. It has every bit as many employees but its duties and the range of activities that it is charged with undertaking on behalf of the Canadian people have been radically cut back, in five areas especially.

Those who have been following the energy industry for a while will remember the old concepts of security of supply and, consequently, the surplus test.

Before the passage of the free trade agreement, the National Energy Board had broad powers to regulate energy exports to ensure that they were in the Canadian public interest. Old section 119 of the NEB act gave the board the power with the approval of cabinet to: "revoke or suspend the licence if"—in the case of a licence other than a licence for the exportation of power—"the board is of the opinion that the public convenience and necessity so require."

More specifically, section 118 of the old act gave the board the power to "satisfy itself that the quantity of oil, gas or power to be exported does not exceed the surplus remaining after due allowance has been made for the reasonably foreseeable requirements for use in Canada".

This included the so-called and justly famed surplus test. Mr. Roland Priddle, the Chairman of the NEB, noted in his testimony of August 27, 1988, before the Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs when it was studying Bill C-130, an act to implement the free trade agreement, in response to a question at pages 34:39 of the transcript of that hearing: "You are correct. Under the law as it presently stands, the government cannot initiate an export where the board has declined to issue a licence. So if an applicant has failed to convince the board that the gas is surplus and that public interest criteria are met, the government cannot then nevertheless grant a licence unless it took special legislative powers to do so and to override the National Energy Board."

Mr. Priddle in the same instance: "When Bill C-130",—that was the free trade act—"is enacted, unless it is amended, it would not be possible—to put the clock back and restore the application of the surplus test." "So unless the bill to implement the free trade agreement were changed, no, it would not be possible to revert to the present style or the old style of applying the surplus test".

Once again, the chairman of the committee pro tempore, the Hon. John B. Stewart asked: "Under section 83 of the present National Energy Board Act, if the board refused a licence to export, the government could not overrule the board. Is that correct?" Mr. Priddle responded: "That is correct, Mr. Chairman".

The free trade agreement did away with the surplus test. Annex 905.2 of the agreement contains the following provision:

> It is understood that the implementation of this Chapter includes the administration of any "surplus tests" on the export of any energy good to the other Party in a manner consistent with the provisions of Articles 902, 903 and 904.

That was the specific elimination of the so-called surplus test.

After the amendments to the National Energy Board Act were made as result of the Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act in December 1988, the NEB was ordered to give effect to the agreement in new section 119.2 of the act. The cabinet, instead of the NEB, was given the power to restrict exports, and then only if the FTA provisions were not violated. That is in new section 119.3 of the act. The NEB can only suspend its determination for granting an export licence for 120 days. However, even before the 120 days are up, if the minister or the cabinet disagrees, the NEB is to issue the licence in question with all due haste. That is in new section 119.6 of the act.

To make it even more specific, the NEB cannot violate article 904(a), (b) or (c) of the free trade agreement. That is provided in section 119.5 of the new act. It is clear from the free trade agreement that the old surplus test is gone, an entire area of NEB jurisdiction wiped away.

Second, with regard to price determination, the board has suffered another major chop. Under the old National Energy Board Act, the board had the power, and I quote from Section 118(b) of the old act:

> —to satisfy itself that the price to be charged for power exported—is just and reasonable in relation to the public interest—

And under section 120(2) of the old act the cabinet could set the export price or range of prices for oil and gas. These provisions were not deleted by the free trade amendments to the NEB Act, but the free trade agreement itself supersedes them. Specifically, new section 120(2) of the NEB Act allows cabinet to exempt oil and gas exported to the U.S. from any price regulations. More important, article 904(b) of the free trade agreement prohibits the maintenance of export prices higher than domestic prices. Price discrimination is gone.

Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, that article 409 of the free trade agreement ensures that the proportion of exports does not fall below the previous 36-month average—the so-called free trade ratchet that requires us to continue to sell energy to the United States in a proportion of production not less than that which we exported in the previous three years. Again no higher export price can be charged.

The third big cut is the elimination of the so-called least cost alternative test. Under section 6(2)(z)(iii) of the NEB Part VI regulations—this took some research, Mr. Speaker—the National Energy Board required applicants for exports to demonstrate that the export price "would not result in prices in the country to which the power is exported being materially less than the least cost alternative for power and energy at the same location within that country".

This was one of three price tests the board established in 1967 to ensure that exporters should seek full market value for Canada's energy exports, especially in cases where there were non-arm's length transactions; discounts to penetrate new markets or to take a greater market share from other Canadian exporters, or, third, to dispel accusations of unfair trade.

On September 2, 1986, then energy minister Marcel Masse instructed the National Energy Board to review changes that could be made to simplify and reduce the regulation of electricity exports. This report was to include a review of the appropriateness of the existing three price criteria used to assess proposed electricity exports.

What do you suppose happened, Mr. Speaker? The National Energy Board conducted the review as requested stating that "the third price guideline may be a dispensable element of electricity export regulation". It added that if the guideline were deleted "the benefits accorded the bargaining position of a Canadian utility by dint of the existence and federal application of the third price guideline would be forgone".

• (1120)

That is from pages 1, 34 and 35 of the Regulation of Electricity Exports, a document published by the NEB in June 1987.

Canada agreed to eliminate the least cost alternative test for the export of energy goods in the free trade agreement in annex 905.2.

The fourth cut was contained in Bill C-23, the elimination of public hearings for most electricity export applications. Cabinet, not the NEB, now makes the final decision. The passage of Bill C-23 last session means that most electricity export applications and applications for international power lines will now not require that a public hearing be held. This used to be an important part of the NEB's job, but no more.

The final decision on whether a public hearing is held is no longer made by the NEB, it is made by cabinet. In other words, the cabinet can overrule a decision by the NEB that a public hearing should be held. This politicizes the process and seriously undermines the authority of the NEB, as we argued at the time, but that is the case. That is the fourth cut.

Fifth, and most recent, is the elimination of the market-based procedure, including the benefit cost analysis to assess natural gas export licence applications.

Price controls were eliminated by this government in the name of deregulation in 1984 and 1986. The volume-based surplus tests, as I noted earlier, were eliminated. This left the NEB relying solely on the so-called market-based procedure to assess the national interest of natural gas exports.

This procedure, briefly stated, is a complaints process where Canadian users are assured supplies of gas on conditions as favourable as export proposals. It includes an assessment of the impact of export proposals on Canadian natural gas exports, and a determination of whether proposed exports are in the national interest.

This market-based procedure, including the benefit-cost methodology used to assess natural gas export licence applications, was one of the few regulatory mechanisms that remained to protect the public interest of Canadians.

The elimination of the NEB's benefit-cost analysis sanctioned, indeed it invited, a situation in which exports of a finite, strategic commodity could result in net harm to Canada.

Even the Government of Alberta, that staunch advocate of free market ideology, recognized and made adjustments for the shortcomings of the natural gas market. It blocked attempts by home owners, hospitals, school boards and other core natural gas users in Ontario to purchase Alberta natural gas at deep discount prices, arguing that these short-term sales were not in the interest of Albertans.

However, what the Alberta government stood up for in its own interest has now been abandoned, with regard to the rest of Canada, in terms of effective regulation by the NEB. This happened, under pressure from the industry and the government, on March 15, 1990, a little more than a year ago.

In its decision to abandon the market-based procedure, the NEB stated that it will: "Henceforth, not require applicants for licences pursuant to part 6 of the act to provide evidence on the net social benefits of their projects."

In short, as we pointed out at the time, this means the NEB has no effective way to block exports of finite, strategic resources even if these exports result in net harm to Canada.

As I said at the outset, the NEB is but a pale shadow of what once it was. Proof of this is the recent decision by the NEB to allow completely TCPL's application for rolled-in tolling on the building of the new pipeline to the northeastern United States, a pipeline that will be paid for by Ontario consumers. That decision was made before the board was moved to Calgary. That decision was made when the board was still right here in Ottawa.

What of intervener funding? What of funding to be supplied to those who would appear before the NEB regardless of where it is, especially as the NEB has been given new authorities to conduct environmental assessments under the so-called EARP guidelines? That, too, is still not there. The location of the NEB is, in that sense at least, a matter of indifference to me because the NEB is no longer allowed to do the job it was originally created to do.

However, I do support the move of the NEB to Calgary anyway, for three reasons.

My first reason is that, as the minister himself pointed out, over 80 per cent of the NEB's activities now relate to the oil and gas industry.

Second, in Alberta there is academic, industrial, consumer and environmentalist expertise that will be of tremendous use to the board in its assessments.

Third, it is long past time that this government started paying attention, real attention, to the concerns of the west, and not just at the symbolic level.

I will be dealing with a concrete matter in this regard during the oral question period this afternoon.

There remains only to note the concerns of the employees of the board and of the Public Service at the way in which this entire matter has been handled.

My time has expired, Mr. Speaker. I acknowledge that. However, my colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan will, when the speaking order comes around to him, deal thoroughly with those concerns. Those concerns which we hope will be effectively addressed by the government were all that stood in the way of the New Democratic Party supporting the move of the NEB to Calgary.

We believe, on the basis of a conversation I and others, including the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, have had with members of the Public Service and with Mr. Roland Priddle, the chairman of the board, that adequate provision will be made for those employees. Therefore it is with some considerable pleasure that I tell the House that the New Democratic Party will support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments on Bill C-2, which proposes to transfer the National Energy Board to Calgary. Obviously, I am concerned to see jobs leaving the National Capital region, especially since this seems to be a political decision and a very partisan one at that.

Whether it is better to centralize or decentralize is an issue that I would prefer to debate in the legislative committee. What concerns me most today is the problems this will cause for employees in the National Capital region, for instance loss of jobs, and also the way they were treated. The minister told us that he spoke to the municipal authorities in Calgary and the school boards, and that the people of Calgary would roll out the welcome mat. I am sure they will, and I am sure the same applies to high schools and elementary schools, because these jobs are coming to Calgary. I am not worried about that, but I am worried about the following: How will families from the National Capital Region be treated? How were these families treated by the Department?

Mr. Speaker, I expect no one likes to hear the news on television or read it in the paper that his employer is going to transfer him—whether he is willing or not—a thousand miles from his present residence. I am worried about the francophone community in Ottawa. I am worried about anglophone and francophone communities in the national capital region that will be uprooted, because both husband and wife work to pay off the mortgage on their house. Will they have any guarantees that their spouse will get a job as well?

If we assume that the wife works for the National Energy Board, is her husband guaranteed a job? The department says it will help people look for jobs, but the minister told us earlier that there was quite a bit of unemployment in Calgary. Won't they have a problem here? Who will be given preference, the spouses of employees who will be transferred to Calgary or Calgary residents?

• (1130)

This is an interesting question. Among the families which will have to move there are certainly children who will have to change school systems since they are different from one province to the other.

The difference is even greater for francophones. I understand two French-speaking schools are prepared to accomodate them. But will they be integrated into the catholic or public school system? Will the families have a choice between the two systems? What kind of future is in store for these children? It is certainly a concern.

I very much regret this way of dealing with these families, hurrying them like that and suddenly disrupting their life in the national capital region, the life of professional civil servants. That is what concerns me the most, Mr. Speaker: the families of the civil servants being transfered.

What are their chances of finding a job? What are their chances of development in a new setting, far away from the capital? What guarantees will the government give to help these people not only to look for schools and jobs but also to find schools and jobs to ensure the future of the entire family?

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the board or the department with regard to the adjustment provisions that are being made for the employees, but I can at least set the hon. member's mind at ease in this regard. In terms of the amenities, educational opportunities and business opportunities that are available and in terms of the spectacular scenery and environmental wonder surrounding it, the city of Calgary is second to but one city in all of Canada.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise to make a comment. The member for Edmonton East deserves tremendous congratulations from this House and from the people of Alberta for the persuasive role he has played in drawing attention to the need to have some serious decentralization of policy in this country, as symbolized by this move of the National Energy Board to Calgary.

He was particularly persuasive in our caucus and has persuaded us that we, from all parts of Canada, should be supporting this move. We have our concerns about the way in which the workers here will be treated. We have received some assurances and we would hope that when this bill comes before the committee, there will be an opportunity for those concerns to be given a full airing and to be sure that they are met.

We support fully the idea that it is important that the west have the headquarters of the National Energy Board, that it be centred there. Alberta is the obvious place for it.

The member for Edmonton East has shown great leadership on this and I would like to congratulate him. I ask him if he would like to focus for a minute or two on the workers and how they might be treated in this shift. It is important, both from the point of view of the employees here and, of course, in Calgary, and how the workers would be received in that city.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, again I will attempt to be brief. First of all, I would like to thank the hon. member for those generous remarks. I will attempt to give them as wide as possible distribution in my riding.

With regard to the question of the employees, I would note that I have had discussions in this regard with the chairman of the National Energy Board. I know that my colleague, the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, who will be speaking directly to this question a little later in this debate has met with representatives of the employees and, indeed, directly with employees. The two of us are satisfied that the adjustment package put together is a generous one. However, there are still elements in which it must be further fine-tuned. We look forward to getting the bill before committee to address that question.

There is no question that the manner in which the employees were notified was shameful. It was tawdry. It is a wrong that I do not suppose any adjustment package, however generous, could ever set right.

On the whole, we do not believe that the treatment being accorded the employees of the board is sufficiently poor to warrant opposition to the bill.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise to speak on this bill. I know the government had hoped of having it go through with virtually no debate to escape any examination, in fact to even escape the bill being referred to a legislative committee where witnesses could be heard and the concerns of employees could be raised, along with any other matters that people might want to bring to the attention of Parliament.

However, we have made sure that that does not happen. We are insisting on it going to a legislative committee because we think there are issues that need to be addressed.

This was an extremely sudden decision of the government, an extremely sudden announcement that did not appear in the budget speech and seemed to roll off the top of the head of the Minister of Finance, as so many other things seem to have done from time to time.

That decision, with so little planning going into it, created great unfairness, threw 300 families into turmoil and in fact threatened to disrupt the operations of the board. It had not been looked at. It had not been examined, as this kind of decision would normally be. Planning had not been done for it and a schedule and so on set out.

We see some problems in the way the employees are being treated and these need to be addressed. That is why this bill must go to committee. That is why we need to hear from people who are affected by this move and to address some of their concerns.

It is evident, given the way in which it was announced and the way in which it is proceeding post-haste, that the timing is dictated more by the political agenda of the government than concern for the operation of the board or the lives of its employees and their families. I would like to give several examples.

The treatment of the employees in this case has been arrogant and insensitive in the extreme. There is nothing like finding out that your whole life is going to change, your whole career is going to be disrupted and your whole family is going to be disrupted on television at night. That is the way the employees of the board found out that their employer was moving and either asking them to go with it or leaving them behind.

A week before the budget announcement, a large number of employees were transferred into the National Energy Board but were given no hint, no indication that accepting that transfer into the board would mean a major move more than half way across the country for their families.

The government is playing with words in attempting to deprive employees of rights they are entitled to under their contract and under government policy by insisting on calling this a relocation and not a decentralization. This deprives the employees of entitlement that they are entitled to: entitlement to notice with time to plan their lives, time to plan their careers and time to work other family responsibilities around a reasonable and rational adjustment to the requirements of their employer. The decentralization policy, that is, moving a work unit—and I doubt that anybody would call this anything else—requires a normal notice period of one year. It is clear that the employees have been given a matter of weeks, not a matter of months to make a serious decision.

In rushing the move, the government is causing undue and unnecessary hardship for employees and eventually for the board. As late as April 4, employees were told not to even list their homes with a realtor, even though they were being asked to decide just four weeks later whether they would be moving to Calgary or not. Employees were told at the same time that information on the relocation package would not be available until the end of April, and at that time their decision had to be made by the middle of May. This, I understand, has now been extended to the end of May but it is still unfair to give employees who have been loyal and hard-working, who have made the board what it is, a matter of a few days and weeks to make a major decision like this about their lives.

• (1140)

The government suggests that families with school-age children should relocate before September 1, but only a token portion of the board's operation will even be in Calgary by then. What will these employees be relocating to? It is not until the end of October that the major component of the board will be up and operational in Calgary, if the government's plans go ahead on schedule.

Employees are faced with deciding this week. But it will be five months before most of the board's operations will move. Now I ask the government, why is it so crucial that employees make decisions within a matter of weeks? Why does it consider that employees need only a matter of days and weeks to make this kind of decision, when the government needs at least three to five months' notice to make its moves?

Employees are asking what is the rush when this move has been under consideration on and off for nearly two decades. Surely it is possible to plan in a way that is humane to workers and humane to their families and to the other obligations they have in their communities, and still accomplish the government's objective.

Mr. Speaker, there is serious concern about discriminatory treatment, about some employees being treated as elite employees who are important to the board and others being treated as unimportant employees to the board. We have some employees being offered red carpet and expensive treatment because the board needs to keep them, and others not being offered similar treatment. Similarly, we have very special and very expensive packages for people who are moving, but no equally special consideration for those who, for one reason or another, cannot move with the board. This is not the discriminatory and unequal kind of treatment that these employees or any other employee of the government deserve.

It started within hours of the announcement, when the government hired Decima to design a package that would entice employees to relocate. The proposal from Decima made it clear that out of the 350 employees of the board, their job was to put together a package that was acceptable to 35 employees. They did not want the employees to know this, so their survey scheme was going to include twice that many so that nobody would know they were targeting a special 35 people with special and discriminatory treatment.

Do we have an elite in the National Energy Board? Do we have some people who are more valuable employees than others and deserve to be treated more generously? I don't think that is the kind of Public Service we want.

Let me give you an example. We are told head-hunting services will be provided for the spouses who relocate with an employee. The same opportunity, the same treatment will not be given to employees who stay, they will be subject only to the normal workforce adjustment policy—and there is even some question about that. We question whether this head-hunting service is only available to certain employees' spouses and whether it is a simple employment counselling service that is available to the rest of the spouses who are not one of the select 35.

Those who relocate will be reimbursed if they take an exploratory trip to Calgary to find out whether they would like to live there. But those who decide not to relocate will not get reimbursed for those expenses. Is that fair? Is that equitable? I don't think so.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation for the space agency and for the Canadian Centre for Management Development contained special provisions for employees to ensure that they were not disadvantaged, whether or not they went with the new agency. Why does this bill contain no mention of the employees, no mention of provisions for them?

The government will say that employees are subject to the normal work force adjustment policy which gives them priority for other appointments within the Public Service for a limited period of time. In fact, that policy expired on March 31. It has been extended to June 30, but just until June 30.

The employees want to know, and I want to know, what happens to them after that? What about the employees who have worked their way up to senior positions but do not have the paper qualifications for similar positions elsewhere in the government? Perhaps the minister might want to answer this. Has the NEB asked the whole Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to assist in relocating these people and ensuring that they are employed.

What about people with highly specialized skills who, for one reason or another, cannot go to Calgary, much as they might like to? These are the people that the work force adjustment policy is far too limited to serve well. They are too specialized, they have become specialized in serving the Government of Canada, and therefore are less employable by other employers.

Where is the head-hunting help for these people? Where is the help for these people to find alternative employment? What about employees who are close to retirement? The government has all kinds of money to convince people to go to Calgary. What is it doing for people who are staying here? This is not their decision. They should not be the ones to suffer for it. Are we going to throw somebody out on the street without a job, a year from retirement, and make no special provisions for that person? I would hope not. These are certainly questions that need to be addressed at committee.

The government might say: "Well, that is peoples' choice. If they do not want to come with us, tough luck". I do not think that is a good policy for any employer, public or private. It ignores totally the fact that many people are unable to relocate. Often, the people who are unable to relocate are women. They may have a spouse who is the higher income earner and it does not make any sense for the family—and people do consider their families in these decisions— to uproot because of one spouse's job.

Many, and most of them are women, now have custody arrangements which prohibit them from leaving a certain region without going back to court, and that can take a long time and may not even be possible. Many have the care of elderly parents or other family or community obligations as a result they simply cannot pick up and move in a very short time frame, as is happening in this case.

What about those who decide to relocate and then cannot for one reason or another, and it may be any of the above, it may be illness or anything? These people will be considered to have abandoned their positions. In other words, they will be out of a job overnight.

The move is creating particular problems for francophones, many of whom have spouses who are not bilingual. I know the department has offered language training to those spouses. However, the plain fact is that to move to another community without a milieu that is familiar to you in your own language, your traditional connections to your culture and heritage and language, is more difficult for a francophone family in this case than it is for an anglophone family. I think the government has to pay special attention to that.

The National Energy Board has now indicated that it intends to apply for special employer status. One reason is to allow for higher rates of compensation than it now pays its employees in the government.

• (1150)

For many of its employees the board will have to pay up to $15,000 a year more in a location where it is competing with the private sector in the resource industry. Many employees will have to be paid that much more, or they simply will walk across the street and take a job in industry.

This special employer status has certain implications for the employee. They are not terribly clear as to what those implications are, and they are certainly entitled to know.

Does this, for instance, let the board pay support staff, who earn less, at lower rates if it allows it to pay some employees at higher rates? What assurances do these employees at lower rates have that their salary level will be protected? How does this affect those who go to Calgary and then decide to return two years from now if they are with a separate employer as opposed to their current status with the National Energy Board?

The employees have talked to me about their concern about the impact on operations of the board as well. Consultants say the normal rate of relocation for private sector moves in a case like this is approximately 50 per cent. That obviously must have a serious impact on the board's operations because the government has left very little time to make plans to ensure that there can be a smooth transition.

As a result of the political "symbology", as the minister calls it, of this move, the board itself but not most of its employees will be moving to Calgary on September 1. In fact the board will not be fully operational until the end of October. That seems to me to create quite a little gap.

I want to address very briefly concerns raised by others, as the minister has done this morning. The minister has received letters from, among others: Consumers Gas, Union Gas, the Industrial Gas Users Association, and the Ontario Natural Gas Association. They all opposed this move and raised some very serious concerns about it.

While the minister has attempted to calm these concerns this morning, certainly one of the letters suggested specific amendments to the act that would relieve concerns about the neutrality of the board, its impartiality.

The minister's statements this morning—I take them at their word—are not helpful when spokespersons for the industry in Calgary start saying: "Won't it be nice when our kids are going to the same schools and we are skiing at the same ski hills and the board is more sensitive to the needs of the producers?"

It is not helpful when the Calgary Chamber of Commerce says that the board will be closer to its principal clients. I hope the minister is aware that its principal clients are the public. Its principal duty is to the public interest, not the producers, not the shippers or the exporters.

Consumers Gas has asked for a specific provision in the act with respect to public interest.

The concerns are exacerbated because this move coincides with the board becoming financially self-sufficient, that is funded by the industry. In fact we know the ultimate cost is to the consumer and not to the industry. Suggestions have already been made by the Canadian Petroleum Association and the Independent Petroleum Association that producers should have more control over the operations and the policies of the board.

Concerns about the public interest are legitimate and need to be addressed in legislative committee.

I want to say simply that the board reports to Parliament. It co-ordinates with many departments and agencies, even more so now that it has responsibility, beyond what it thought, for the environment.

The board has maintained an office in Calgary continually. Has the government considered whether, for purposes of parliamentary liaison and efficiency in liaison with other government departments, it should now maintain a smaller Ottawa office as well?

It is important for the employer and for the operation of the board that this move be carried out providing employees with every opportunity to make a decision to stay with the board. That is why we want to see some of these issues addressed. That is why we want to look at the schedule for this to see if it really makes sense to say employees have this week to decide and then stretch the move out over five months. Can we look at another schedule that is better for the board, better for the employees, and better for the public interest?

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have just a couple of quick comments and then a specific question for the hon. member.

My first comment is that there may be members in this House who will not sense the extent to which this is important to Alberta or, as it might be, important to the province of Saskatchewan. But we are two provinces unique in the development of this country. Constitutionally we stood apart and different from all other provinces.

When Canada was formed in 1867, the presumption of resource ownership belonged to the four original provinces. It belonged to Prince Edward Island a year later, in 1868, when it became a province; likewise to Manitoba and to British Columbia.

However, in 1905, when the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan became part of Canada, the federal government kept from those provinces the ownership of natural resources. For 30 years the province of Alberta never raised enough money in taxes to be able to pay for schools and hospitals. They indebted themselves every year. For 30 years they fought, until 1930 when they won the Natural Resources Transfer Act.

Ingrained in an Alberta or Saskatchewan person is that deep resentment that somehow the federal government had coveted unto itself the resources of only two parts of Canada, where there were provincial ownerships in all other cases. It is more than symbolic. It is extremely important to those two western provinces for all of its right reasons and its symbolic reasons.

I want to ask a question of the hon. member for Ottawa West. I note that she said there are persons who had worked their way up and she had concerns for them. There are persons close to retirement and she had concerns for them. There are many who are lower income spouses, and again she expressed concerns as a good member of Parliament representing constituents of hers who by and large are public servants. I commend her for the compassion she is showing.

The real question is when a move in the public interest ought to be made. That argument could be put for every move to every locale and every situation.

I just want to ask her specifically: Is she or is she not in favour of moving the National Energy Board from Ottawa to Calgary?

Mrs. Catterall: The member was not listening very carefully to my speech. I said I had concerns I wanted to address. I think we all recognize in this House, and I certainly do, the importance of government services being available to people across this country.

The member is obviously unaware that 70 per cent of the Public Service is not in the national capital region but is decentralized across this country. Only 20 per cent of the jobs in this community are Public Service jobs. It would be nice if before he got up he knew what he was talking about.

I also want to point out to him that he mentioned Alberta and Saskatchewan. He forgot to mention that Manitoba was formed as a province in 1870 and did not get control of its resources until 1930.

Mr. Epp: It was 60 years.

Mr. Kilgour: The minister is right.

An hon. member: Do you favour the move?

Mrs. Catterall: We want to see this bill go to committee so we can see those concerns addressed. I would like to be able to support this bill whole-heartedly.

• (1200)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, one of the questions raised by the member for Ottawa West concerned a suggestion which was put forward in a letter to me by companies like Union Gas, that if we shift a regulatory agency such as this from Ottawa to Calgary, in this case, somehow this would represent a process of tying the agency more closely to the producer side of the industry.

I must say I find that a very strange argument. I do not see why an agency's location should affect what it is able to do in terms of justly and carefully considering questions which come before it. That is one of the reasons for some of the concerns of our caucus with respect to the workers being affected by this which we intend to take up in committee.

Nevertheless we felt that it was possible to have precisely the same kind of careful, judicious analysis of questions that come before the National Energy Board in Calgary as in Ottawa. It would seem to me that to suggest otherwise is to say there is something about the air in Calgary that destroys the capacity of people to be judicious and impartial, and that is certainly not the case.

I would therefore ask the member for Ottawa West if she would be prepared to make quite clear that she was not putting forward any suggestion that a shift of the National Energy Board from Ottawa to Calgary would lead to any change in the impartiality and the judiciousness with which that board has operated in the past and will operate in the future.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I suggest the member might have listened to what I was saying. I was referring to correspondence from people who have expressed legitimate concerns about this particular aspect and have asked the government to take particular steps to ensure that that does not happen. I think the board has always recognized that it was important to keep an office in Calgary—this is nothing new—to keep contact with the oil industry, and it has done that well over the years.

I would not for a moment suggest that the board would do anything but fulfil its mandate under the act and act in the best interests of the people of Canada.

None the less I think it is very important that with this bill before committee, the committee also address the concerns that have been raised by significant interests in the energy field. I repeat the point I made during my speech that if the board has always felt it important to keep an office in Calgary to be close to the producing industries, perhaps the government should now consider that it might also be important to keep an office in Ottawa since the board does report to Parliament and does work very closely with many other government departments.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I presented a bundle of petitions, some 2,500 names, all expressing concern about this move and signing the petitions in opposition to the move of the National Energy Board to Calgary.

I have another group of petitions with some 300 names. Most are from the Ottawa area, but some names are from different communities in Quebec, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan. I suggest that they are doing so in part because they just do not know enough about the way in which the whole thing is being handled to this point in time. New Democrats have always supported decentralization, to the best of my knowledge, if it is done in an orderly manner. We are mainly concerned about the way in which the employees are handled. Certainly in this case there is no question, and others have commented on this, that the employees were handled very badly, including the chairman of the National Energy Board himself who put up a notice in the board office to the effect that he knew nothing at all about the move other than what he had heard when the budget speech was read.

The minister of energy in presenting and speaking first on the bill said that it was in the budget speech. Technically it was because the budget speech is what the minister said in the House. Certainly we all know it was not in the printed material which was made available to the minister for his speech when he was presenting it or in the material that was distributed since, other than Hansard, which is the budget speech.

That is how the chairman of National Energy Board found out about the move according to him, and to this point we have no reason for doubting it. If he did not know then certainly the employees did not know. Perhaps even the Minister of Finance did not know, except that he got a note before he got on his feet asking him to announce this.

Why was it done in the budget speech? To the best of my knowledge it is not a budget item. Why did it have to be done then? If it were going to be kept secret from everyone the excuse could be that it was a budget matter, it was in the budget speech, but we know it was not in the budget speech until moments before the minister stood up to speak. There was no reason for the secrecy, for not letting people know if the decision was actually made earlier than the budget speech which was presented some day late in February.

Why has everyone concerned with this move been treated so shabbily as to tell them with so little notice what was going to happen? From the start the employees have been handled badly and that is the nature of our concern about this legislation.

If it were in the budget speech one would expect to find some reference to the cost. I would suggest if one read through the budget speech very carefully one would look in vain to find any reference to what it is going to cost. I have heard figures running anywhere from $40 million to $70 million. Who knows? Nevertheless it is happening. It is happening in a real hurry. That the means the cost of finding the accommodation in Calgary will probably be higher than it might have been had the government had the time to look with some care. The cost of abandoning space in Ottawa itself may be high. We do not know. Certainly the government has given every indication of downsizing. It would seem unlikely that the space currently filled in Ottawa is going to be filled with other employees unless they are spread more thinly.

The loss of expertise has been commented on. One does not know how much. How can we know? The employees had originally until the middle of May to make up their minds. They now have until the end of May to decide and only then will we know just how many will be lost and also the loss of expertise. That is a real question. Estimates have suggested that some 50 per cent of the staff will be unable or unwilling to move or a combination of both. People with families may find that they are quite unable to move, especially if there are two income earners in the family. If one has other employment here in Ottawa it is going to be very difficult for the two of them to pull up stakes along with their family and move to Calgary and it is not quite as difficult perhaps for them to stay here.

It is going to present a problem. People who have been working for the National Energy Board for some time probably have accumulated a lot of pension time and were looking forward to working for the National Energy Board until they retire. Now all of a sudden they have to deal with a situation in which their work is going to be moved some several thousand miles away from its present location and with very short notice.

• (1210)

In filling the vacancies, the government has been reassured by the Chamber of Commerce, according to a letter that went to the then minister of energy, I believe, that there would be plenty of expert employees in the oil industry available and willing to fill in the vacancies in the National Energy Board. I expect they would be willing. If they are unemployed right now they would be even more willing.

Unfortunately, that lends weight to the argument that they are going to be more under the influence of the oil industry in that location than they would be here in Ottawa. I think it is important that the NEB be able to do everything possible to convince people that this is not the way the system is working. I expect the National Energy Board will be very much aware of that and will be watching that carefully.

I have talked to employees' representatives and I have talked one of the employees and will be talking to more. I am pleased that this matter is going to be referred to a legislative committee so that there will be an opportunity to get in to more of the details.

One of the questions that I and others have asked is why does it have to be by the end of the September? Originally, I think it was September 1 and now it is the end of September. I do not know why it has to be that soon. Why could the government not have taken more time? Would it not have served its political purposes at least to have said: "Yes, it is happening. It is going to happen. We are going to be there a year from now or some such date"? That would have given everyone, the board itself and the employees, much more time to make their preparations and decisions. It seems to me that could have been done and it could still be done. I do not know what the magic is about the current date of September 30. If it is going to have an affect by then the deadline given to the employees has to be real because the board has to know who it is going to have working for it when it arrives in the Calgary office and opens shop.

I do not think anyone is really complaining about the special provisions enabling employees to make the move with minimum cost to themselves, at least in terms of dollars and cents. The guarantee that employees leaving Ottawa will get at least market value for their homes is a good one but even then there is so little time to make that decision, even with the deadline being extended last Friday.

The employees are going to have to sign up for two years if they are going to move to Calgary, but any time in the third year or between the end of the second and the end of the third year they can change their mind and decide they made a mistake in going to Calgary. I do not know if it is clear whether the board would move them back to Ottawa or move them wherever they wanted to go. I have not been able to determine that yet because I just have not had a chance to read all the material.

It is tough to decide in a couple of weeks whether you are going to accept today's current market value for your home or wait and perhaps think that maybe in six months the market is going to improve and you may receive a higher amount. Why do they have to decide at the same time as they are moving? Why not give them that two or three year period to make the decision as to whether they would dispose of their homes here in Ottawa?

For all I know there may be more in the agreement than I am aware of but my understanding now is that they have to make up their minds as to whether they are going to accept the board's offer of getting minimum market value for their home at the same time as they decide whether they are going to Calgary.

I see no reason for that deadline not being extended, even if the government decides that it cannot do anything about the September 30 deadline for opening up shop in Calgary.

There will be opportunity now that we are going to committee and certainly we are co-operating fully. All the opposition members, as far as I know, are co-operating in getting this bill to committee because we believe that is where we can best hear from the people who are being affected. The employees are the ones I am particularly concerned about at the moment but there are others who are being affected by this, such as the industry itself. I am sure the oil industry will want to make representations as to what a great idea it is, the oil industry from Calgary anyway. It may be that user industries and other energy groups will want to make representations of their own. I am looking forward to this bill being referred to the special legislative committee, getting answers, we hope, to some of the questions and perhaps getting some movement from the government on the deadlines it has imposed, deadlines that are totally unfair to employees who heard about this from someone who heard it in the budget speech.

Giving people a choice of being out of work or of moving hundreds of miles away is really no choice at all. And to find out that this decision has been made by watching television has only added salt to the wounds of the employees.

We expect employers to treat their employees with dignity and respect. These workers were treated with what can only be seen as contempt and disdain.

We do expect the government to be a little better than the average employer when it comes to treating its employees fairly. We do not expect it to keep secrets like this when there is absolutely no reason that we know of, no reason has been advanced, for keeping it a secret until the last moment.

What I am talking about is fairness to the employees. I am not talking about the location in Calgary. I have lived a little while in Ottawa and during the war I lived a while in Calgary. There is not a heck of a lot by which to choose but if I had my choice I would go to Calgary. They do not have time to find that out before they have to make their decisions.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): The minister asks why we are concerned.

• (1220)

We are concerned about people. That is why we are concerned. This government has not looked after the people who have made the National Energy Board what it is, which is a really good and responsible agency of the people of Canada. That is why we want to make sure their concerns are addressed.

I just heard another Tory member of Parliament discounting Manitoba entirely, talking about this caucus having no western members in it. Has he not heard about Manitoba? Has he not heard about B.C.? Are the prairies to him just Alberta and Saskatchewan?

I want to ask a question of the previous speaker. He seems remarkably uninformed about the situation of the employees. That is typical of NDP members. They tend to get up and speak at the last minute, try to get themselves a briefing with one person who is supposed to give them the truth from on high, and do not really know what is on the minds of the people they are talking about.

The hon. member seemed to imply that the schedule for this move is all right, even though it requires people to make a decision by next week to disrupt their whole lives, while the government has another full five months

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): I will be very brief.

I have a question for my hon. friend and it is based on what I have seen in my 12 years here. I know that the federal government is often accused of being centralist in its attitudes and approaches and this bill is an effort to take the National Energy Board to the place where the action is. In other words, since most the people dealing with the National Energy Board are from the western provinces we should make it easy for them.

I have a question and then I have a comment. There seems to be, perhaps organized by the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast, a complaint here from people in the the west that we are moving this National Energy Board to Calgary. As a central Canadian I have great difficulty in understanding why members from the west, such as the hon. member who just spoke, are concerned about us taking this western operation out to Calgary. It seems to me to make good sense. I do not understand why the Liberals and the NDP are fighting this effort by the government to take it to the west.

That is my question. If I may reach back into my past as the housing spokesman for our party back in 1981, and having followed it ever since, I can say that one should never worry about the prices of houses in Ottawa; they do not go up, they do not go down and they do not follow the trends of any other city in the country. This place is recession-proof. I do not understand why the member for Edmonton Southwest is fighting this transfer of the National Energy Board to Alberta. It may be the transformation he made when he went in to a party without any western members. That could be, I do not know.

I would like my hon. friend from British Columbia to explain if he knows whether this is an organized plot to prevent the National Energy Board from going to Calgary.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, I tried to make it plain that I was speaking for the employees and asking for fair treatment for the employees.

I am going to read briefly from a letter from the Ontario Federation of Labour:

actually to implement its decision. Does he think that is fair? Does he think it is fair that people who are relocating with the board are getting special and privileged treatment, and people who cannot, are not?

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, it is not fair that any employee should be treated in that manner. That is the point I was trying to make in my speech, that we are concerned about fairness for the employees. We are concerned about it whether the Liberals or the Tories are in charge of the move. There have been examples of decentralization that the Liberals have implemented where they paid no more attention to the concerns of the employees than the Tories are today. They are both wrong. The employees should be the ones that are treated with real concern when their lives are being uprooted in the way that some of their lives are going to be uprooted in this case. It is wrong whether it is the Liberals or the Tories that do it.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in this debate on Bill C-2 simply to make a few comments on the fate of the National Energy Board's present employees who live in the National Capital Region, mostly in Ottawa, which I try to represent as best I can.

Mr. Speaker, the arguments for moving the National Energy Board may be valid and I suppose they are for some western MPs. I have heard some convincing arguments but I hear contrary ones from my constituents and I would like to put the remarks I am about to make in this context.

We must not forget the very important human factor involved. I remember that we had an interesting debate in this House in 1989 on Bill C-16, creating the Canadian Space Agency and dealing with other matters. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that the main concern then was for the public servants and workers affected by that decision.

Mr. Speaker, the number of positions at the National Energy Board has gone from 50 in 1959 when it was created to nearly 330 today, in 1991-92. The Public Service Commission report, which I have consulted, shows that the National Energy Board had 291 employees in 1990, of whom 273 were in the Ottawa area. This means that 273 families will have to choose in the next six months to relocate to another city in another province or, if they decide not to move, hope to find other employment. The lives of 273 families will be put in turmoil by this government which I think has been insensitive by not foreseeing in its bill a situation that could be distressing for many of them. The proof, Mr. Speaker, is that I have letters from constituents who express quite eloquently the situation their families find themselves in, with children at school or university. They will have to make a serious decision: Do they move or do they break up the family, in a sense, leaving the children to complete their education here? Do they take the children with them, and God knows the problems that can mean socially and for their education.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, the testimony of one of my constituents shows very well how hard this decision is. This lady left her native province almost 20 years ago. She settled in the region, here in Ottawa, with her husband, who works for the National Energy Board. They have laid down roots here, Mr. Speaker. Their daughter attends the University of Ottawa; their son is in high school. The woman works. She has found a satisfying job that she loves and would like to keep and of which she is very proud. If her husband decides to leave Ottawa, they will have to decide what to do about the children.

If she chooses to follow her husband, Mr. Speaker, which is quite normal, the separation between the children and their parents will be painful. She will have to leave her job that she loves. There is no guarantee that she will find another one in Calgary. Once the school year is over or once they have completed high school or university, because it is not easy to move from one institution to another, the children will also have to decide on a career.

When you are 20 or 30, Mr. Speaker, those decisions can be made and it is sometimes exciting to relocate and have new experiences in another place in this great country of ours. For a family, it can be very trying at times. The responsibilities are great and I think that the choice can be a nightmare.

Mr. Speaker, of the 291 person-years or persons affected by this decision, 131 are in managerial, scientific, professional or technical positions. The NEB or National Energy Board estimates that 50 per cent of the employees will remain in Ottawa. That is an estimate. This means that the Board's expertise will be cut in half. Fifty per cent, or some 65 to 70 additional people, will have to be hired to replace those who decide not to move.

Mr. Speaker, what will happen to those people who decide not to follow their employer to Calgary? They will be put on a priority list for one year. What will happen to them after a year? I do not know. Mr. Speaker, 80 of those 291 employees are French-speaking. Although Calgary is a friendly city, as I admit, and Alberta as a whole has a large, lively French-speaking community, our perception of Alberta is a province that is stingy in providing services to the linguistic minority. Therefore these French-speaking public servants, who make up 27.5 per cent of those who will have to relocate or leave their job, are legitimately concerned about their children's education and whether they will obtain in Alberta the same services that they had here in Ottawa, Ontario.

• (1230)

Mr. Speaker, the question is, can the government offer any hope to these public servants, these families who heard the news, as we all know, through the media. The news was announced the day before a budget. I wonder why these employees were treated differently from those who worked for the Space Agency?

To get back to that experience, I would like to remind hon. members that although the second reading stage of a bill is basically intended as an opportunity to consider the principle of the bill, and we acknowledged that principle, as I said earlier, because there are a number of pros— There are many reasons why we supported this initiative, but there is also reason to be worried about the human factor, about what will happen to the Canadian men and women who are now working at the National Energy Board.

[English]

I want to remind members of clauses in Bill C-16, an act to establish the Canadian Space Agency and to provide for other matters in relation to space.

Section 28(1) of that bill states:

> Where a position in the Public Service of Canada is transferred to the Agency within ninety days after the day on which this Act comes into force, the incumbent of the position continues in the position in the Agency, unless the incumbent otherwise elects prior to the transfer, and any person so continuing is deemed to have been appointed to the Agency in accordance with subsection 16(1).

Then it goes on to subsection 2.

The preoccupation at that time was identified by Brian Leddy, the National Research Council's Vice President of Personnel. He said they were preoccupied with the anxiety about the problems of uprooting families, getting French language training and finding suitable schools for children.

Mr. Leddy said in an interview, and I quote from The Ottawa Citizen, March 19, 1990:

> All the government's regular workforce adjustment programs, including early retirement, severance packages and retraining would be available to eligible individuals.

That experience is not, in my view, at least from what I understand and from what I have heard, going to be repeated with the transfer of the board to Calgary. I would think that in committee the government would want to answer some questions.

I give credit to previous speakers for raising this issue. I agree with my colleague from Ottawa West on her comments. I know the member will be in committee, bringing forward some of the concerns people in the Ottawa area have expressed to us but not specifically about the move. As I have said, there are reasons to support it and there are also reasons against it. However, we are talking about the principle of second reading here.

If I know my rules, the principle of the bill is at stake here. That is the most important part, as far as I am concerned, of any bill's process, the principle being that the decision has been made by the government to move an agency to Calgary from its Ottawa head office location by law. All the bill does, essentially, is make it possible for the board and its employees to be outside the national capital, in Calgary. What happens after that? I guess the government will not have to come to Parliament any more if it wants to move the board to any other place in Canada.

Section 1 says very clearly that after the move to Calgary the Governor in Council may approve any decisions to relocate the board. I think that would also be of some concern to some people and we might want to get some explanation from the minister in committee.

But to come back to my point.

[Translation]

It is pretty obvious to a member who represents his constituents, and the hon. member for Ottawa West said as much as 70 per cent of our public servants are outside Ottawa and scarcely 20 per cent work in Ottawa. There may be 27 or 30 per cent in the National Capital Region as a whole, including the Quebec side, the Outaouais region.

In my own riding I have about 10 per cent, but for obvious reasons, I have a lot of these people living in Ottawa—Vanier who wrote letters expressing very strongly their reluctance, their worries and the problems they had.

As far as the principle is concerned, we acknowledge that the decision has been made and it is going to happen, but we now have to decide how it will be done, and that, I think, is what the legislative committee will have to consider. How will the government ensure that no employee's rights are violated, and that employees do not suffer economically, socially or in their family life?

Mr. Speaker, that is why the Liberal caucus, through its critic and the hon. member for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, did not express the kind of reservations the Solicitor General wanted to use to turn this into a partisan issue. We did not make this a partisan issue. We said that the decision was made, and we respect that decision. It was the government's decision. It wasn't our decision but the government's. As I said earlier, there are many reasons for thinking this could have been done differently, with more consultation, with a little more tact, with more attention to the personal and human factors. It was not done and we deplore that, but there are times when in this kind of situation, special measures must be taken after the fact.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, before expediting this bill through the House, I think it is only fair that the bill should go to committee, so that the minister has a chance to explain and we can have the assurance that this government, which in the case of the transfer of the Space Agency to Montreal was receptive to certain comments by Opposition members, that this government will also be receptive in this particular case and that it will deal sensitively with the employees who will be asked to move.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Malone): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Malone): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION OR TRANSFER AUTHORIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-8, an act to provide for the dissolution of the transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendment) from the legislative committee.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lewis moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

• (1240)

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today for more than one reason.

I want to address the third reading of what was known as Bill C-73. This is an act that deals with the dissolution and reorganization of several Crown corporations.

One of the aspects of this that gives me some pleasure—and I hope it gives my colleagues some pleasure—is that we have an opportunity to resurrect or revive a bill that died at the end of the last session of the House.

In being able to do that, I think all of us in the House can manifest a degree of co-operation that for most purposes will enhance and further the interests of the taxpayer who pays for the cost of running this place. Also, it would advance the speed with which we deal with the bill and thereby permit government to get on with the work that is specifically proposed.

This particular bill has had the benefit of significant scrutiny at the legislative committee stage. That is one of the reasons why we in opposition at this point in time are able to conclude that Parliament and the public have sufficiently examined what lies behind the bill and its purposes. This enables it to be dealt with reasonably expediently here in this new session.

I want to congratulate the chair of that legislative committee and the members on it for the way in which the bill was handled at committee. However, I want to raise an item of caution. It relates to the way the government has proposed legislative committees to deal with bills such as Bill C-73 in the future.

We all know that in the new rules that were passed here a few weeks ago, legislative committees are only permitted to call witnesses on technical matters. I objected to that restriction at the time the rule was passed, as did many others on this side of the House.

I would like to point out that if committees in the future follow that rule strictly, that is deal with technical matters only, then the very full review of Bill C-73 at legislative committee will not be able to take place in this House in the future. That is a negative in terms of procedure.

I want to caution Parliament about that and about a too rigid application of that restriction on legislative committees in the new rules. Committees must have sufficient latitude and not just deal with crossing the t's and dotting the i's on a bill, or whether the words put on paper will effectively accomplish the legal purpose of the bill.

We also have to give some attention to what the effect of the bill will be, based on the procedures that the bill proposes.

In this particular case dealing with the dissolution of these Crown corporations, all the members on the committee—not just the opposition, but the government members—did spend some time thinking about what would take place after the provisions of the bill were in place, giving authority to government officials to do certain things with Crown corporations.

There are six parts to this bill. There were two in particular that involved the disposition or sale of Crown assets of significant value. One involved B.C. Place in Vancouver where the federal government owns the land and the facility and the other involved Harbourfront Corporation in the city of Toronto. In both cases, the government owns millions and millions of dollars worth of real estate.

In this particular bill the provision simply said that the minister, in most cases the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of Transport as the case may be, would dispose of the government holding, as he or she thought appropriate. That is an awfully vague provision without much in the way of oversight by this Parliament.

That bill simply asked parliamentarians to say: "Yes, Minister of Public Works, you may take this asset worth $200 million, $300 million or $400 million and sell it as you think best". The taxpayers of Canada have an interest in how the government sells a $300 million or $400 million asset in bits and pieces. In committee we had to inquire into what the proposal was.

Regarding B.C. Place, and I want this to be on the record—it is on the committee record as well—the government has stated that it will dispose of it in a way that, at a minimum, gives the local governments in Vancouver the right to acquire it. I believe the intention is to actually move the asset over to provincial or municipal ownership.

We did not get the same assurances regarding Harbourfront in Toronto. I should also mention that in relation to other portions of Bill C-73 there were other assurances given by the government appearing before the committee as to what it would do when the assets were disposed of, when the corporations were dissolved.

In dealing with the Harbourfront Corporation, which is the one major corporation involving much more money than any of the others—a few hundred millions of dollars, mostly real estate assets—we in opposition had three concerns. We were reflecting concerns put forward, not just by our constituents, but by the government of the city of Toronto and the government of metropolitan Toronto. I do not believe that the provincial government itself has raised any caution flags, but I am sure we tried our best to accommodate their role in the disposition of this very significant harbour front asset.

All three areas were dealt with at committee. Believe me, they were more than just technical matters, much more than that. As a result of the committee inquiries and the communication that was had during and subsequent to the committee inquiries, a number of the misunderstandings or questions that existed then have been resolved. The real tough questions involved in Harbourfront have not been resolved. Those hard questions involve money. Unfortunately we do not always have a solution to money problems.

However, I would like to run through those areas for the benefit of the record. The first involved what appeared at the time to be a very significant premium being given to three large Canadian developers who were very active in the Toronto waterfront. At the time the Harbourfront transition committee, which was composed of Harbourfront officials and directors, had publicly recorded their projection that the premium, the giveaway that the developers would receive, would amount to approximately $36.6 million.

There is no one in this place who could sit here and not be disturbed at the prospect of the taxpayer doing a land swap or a flip with developers which gives them $36.6 million more than they give back to the taxpayer. That issue was raised and discussed. Subsequently, because of public concerns about this the city of Toronto commissioned a consultant study. That study was just recently published and made public.

It appears that the premium which was initially expressed to be approximately $36 million is estimated by this particular group of consultant to be in the vicinity of $5 million or $6 million. I do not want to say that now it is only $5 million or $6 million and that it is not a big deal so let us forget it; $6 million bucks is still $6 million bucks. In a fair, objective guess by a consultant, which is all they can do, that premium now, on the public record, is calculated to be closer to the $6 million level.

As one prominent individual who was quite involved in this process of resolving the Harbourfront challenges has pointed out, an expropriation process which the public, the federal government, the province, the city or metro could embark on, would cost as much as $5 million. By the time they have finished with new evaluations of the properties, retaining solicitors for all parties involved in the process, dealing with any expropriation hearings that might result in the event that there was a failure to agree and significant costs by the developers in preparing the lands for development there now based on existing zonings or zonings they thought they might have, it could possibly cost $5 million.

At one point the city of Toronto and the province of Ontario were so concerned about this area that they actually, by ministerial order, froze development and rezoning activity on all of these lands. If you are a developer and owned these lands, as soon as the freeze went on someone has a hand in your pocket because you were stuck with an asset that was not producing income and it was frozen. I think we should recognize that as an economic reality.

Now that the premium is guessed to be $6 million, I leave that on the public record. If the government's view is that the premium is worth it, valid, viable and acceptable to the taxpayers, then that government will bear the responsibility for that deal when it takes place. There is nothing that we in opposition are going to be able to do to derail it once this bill goes through. The public will then make the decision.

The first issue, the swamp of the pipeline lands, we consider to have been adequately canvassed and developed on the public record, including the record of this House.

The second involved the endowment fund. This is easily canvassed. It is the money issue. The Harbourfront Corporation has carried on for years extremely valuable cultural, artistic, athletic and public participation programs on the Toronto waterfront. These were programs and activities in a city urban culture that simply would never be there if Harbourfront did not exist. That was the legacy of politicians and government officials from almost 20 years ago.

The concern of Torontonians was that this entity would be able to continue after the federal government completed its job of reshuffling ownership and basically getting out of the business of providing cultural entertainment on the Toronto Harbourfront. I take it that is the government's objective. I might object to that. I am of the view that the federal government is involved in providing cultural programming and support in a number of Canada's cities, Toronto included. I am of the view that it should continue.

In any event, the deficit issue, the endowment fund issue for Harbourfront, the federal government has stated that it will be in a position to pay into an endowment fund for Harbourfront $80 million from the sale of Harbourfront real estate assets. That is after the land swaps and all of the other rezonings and activities which must take place.

If they give $80 million, it is the view of most who look at the scene that the income from that endowment fund would be insufficient to maintain Harbourfront even at its current reduced level of activity. I accept that there are those who call many federal institutions fat cows—no disrespect to cows—and that perhaps we should all be trying to make federal institutions get along with a bit less money. I am going to use the calculations that were provided in the report produced only two or three days ago and made public at City of Toronto Council. They are as follows.

If the $80 million fund is used in perpetuity to provide income only to Harbourfront, that $80 million will finance a funding shortfall, a revenue shortfall, at Harbourfront of only $1.5 to $3.5 million per year. I will not make any value judgment on whether or not that is a lot of income. I simply put that on the record.

If the $80 million is simply viewed as a fund from which Harbourfront will draw income and capital to finance deficits over the foreseeable future, Harbourfront's funding from that endowment fund will only last according to the consultants until 2003.

The third possibility had to do with an if. If the federal government—or all levels of government—were able to commit to fund Harbourfront at a level that was consistent both with its past level of expenditure and revenue and its projected level of expenditure and revenue, and based on the shrinkage factor that I have just alluded to, the endowment fund according to the consultant would have to be at least $193 million, roughly double what the government is proposing to provide now.

I will leave those facts and figures there. It is our view here on this side of the House that our role now is to point out these things. The harder decisions will be in the hands of the Minister of Public Works as he or she disposes of assets and takes the money and puts it into an endowment fund.

Harbourfront is going to live and thrive or it is not, or maybe we will stumble along somewhere in the middle. My view is that Harbourfront should live and thrive and continue to do the work it has always done on the Toronto Harbourfront.

Before moving out of the debate here, I wanted to raise another caution flag. It is important when pursuing the public discussion and the communication that have permitted us to deal with this publicly that we deal with the concept of commercial confidentiality. Even today, as I stand here now, I am unable to obtain information that would permit me to make an even better judgment about this.

Regarding the commercial confidentiality imposed or requested by the developers or by the public individuals who have been working on this issue, I understand where it comes from. It is a request by individuals that evaluations of their corporate assets, their strategic goals and their development proposals not be made public. The problem I have with that is that we are dealing with public assets here. We are already dealing with what the taxpayers own. I start off looking at this whole area and saying we cannot permit confidentiality to preclude the taxpayer from knowing everything that is going on with these assets.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you wish to take note of the clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Malone): It now being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

TAXATION

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, on February 11 of this year, the Minister of Finance tried to pull a fast one on Canadians. On that day, he issued what appeared to be a harmless press release concerning some technical matters dealing with family and private trusts. What it really amounted to was perhaps the biggest tax windfall for the wealthy in history.

In 1972, a law was passed which stipulated that after 21 years any increase in the value of assets in trusts would be subject to a capital gains tax. That meant that in 1993 the government would have come into billions of dollars in tax revenue. Instead, what was proposed was a loophole that allows the tax to be put off for decades.

Isn't that something? While the national debt is being saddled on the backs of the working and middle class, the wealthy get the tax breaks.

Why were these changes not announced in the budget that was delivered only days later? Why was no estimate of lost revenue provided to the Canadian people? Indeed, this would have proved too embarrassing for the government.

After all, it was the Minister of Finance who said: "I am asking Canadians to share the burden of fiscal restraint—the challenge to all Canadians is to do what each of us can do to strengthen our country."

It seems that this government wants to challenge some Canadians more than others. Of course, the fight against the deficit will go on.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian ambassador to the UN announced yesterday, at the first session of the United Nations Economic and Social Council, that the Canadian Parliament will ratify by the end of the year the bill of rights approved at the Summit for Children held in New York City two years ago.

In September 1989, prime minister Mulroney was co-chairman of the international conference. By January 1991, Canada had already set up a children's bureau coming under health and welfare Canada. Benoît Bouchard is the minister in charge of coordinating all government programs to ensure they are in keeping with the provisions of the bill of rights. Canada also invested $136 million this past February to support the fight against family violence.

Mr. Speaker, these are concrete steps taken by this government to help families torn by family violence.

AIRPORTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in his frenzy to cut costs, the Minister of Transport is permitting security firms to undercut one another as they scramble to secure contracts with airports. They do this without any regard for existing wage rates or respect for existing collective agreements.

At Terminal 1, the security firm Aeroguard is demanding a wage cut of $2 an hour from its employees as well as elimination of a group insurance plan. The company is threatening the 100 passenger screening agents with lay-offs if they refuse these cuts designed to get the contract for Aeroguard.

How long is this government and the Ministers of Transport and Labour going to allow these conditions to persist? When are workers rights going to be protected? When is this government going to realize that the safety of the travelling public depends on skilled workers? When is this government going to live up to the words of a previous transport minister who stated that he would not permit such contracts to be let on the backs of workers?

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, a recently completed United Nations survey confirmed what many of us in this country have known for a long time, that Canada is a great place to live.

Through examination, a number of categories including health standards, education, social conditions, taxation system and disposable income, the UN determined Canada ranks second only to Japan in terms of over-all standard of living.

It seems incredible to me that there are those in this country who are willing to risk all that we have attained as a country over the past 125 years to pursue their own narrow political aims.

It is time we, as Canadians, started to work together to ensure we remain the envy of the rest of the world.

ALLAN CUP CHAMPIONS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, today I rise to bring to the attention of the House the victory of the Prince Edward Island Armour Fence Hockey Team in the Canadian Allan Cup Triple "A" Hockey Championships.

The Islanders dramatic 5 to 4 win over the Thunder Bay Twins 57 seconds into overtime brought the best of seven finals to a close in a four game sweep at the Charlottetown Civic Centre. This win has earned Prince Edward Island its first ever Allan Cup victory.

It is very admirable when provinces with such a small population as that of Prince Edward Island produces such a victorious team. Indeed, this is an occasion when the other provinces can take note and look with admiration towards the maritimes.

On behalf of all Islanders, I wish to congratulate the Armour Fence Islanders on their impressive championship win and express our most heartfelt pride in the example they have set through their tenacity, enthusiasm and outstanding sportsman–like conduct.

Congratulations team. You've earned the recognition and pride of all Canadians.

CANADA FITNESS WEEK

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is Sneaker Day, marking once again the kick–off of Canada's Fitweek.

Throughout the week and until June 2, a number of events are planned to promote healthy active living.

To highlight in a special way the first day of this week featuring physical activity, all Canadians including members of this House are invited to wear their sneakers tomorrow.

Canada's Fitweek is the largest celebration of physical activity in the world, Mr. Speaker, as no less than eight million people across the country will participate in over 14,000 events already scheduled.

Canada's Fitweek now has an enviable world–wide reputation that all Canadians have every reason to be proud of.

In closing, I would like to point out that the success of this celebration is due, to a large extent, to the 300,000 volunteers who have organized the various activities in most cities in the country. I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to thank them for their dedication.

YUGOSLAVIA

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, last year the people of Slovenia, Croatia and Macedonia experienced democracy for the first time in half a century.

More recently, Croatians and Slovenians, by way of referendum, have expressed their willingness to withdraw from the chaos that is Yugoslavia today.

The republics and provinces of Yugoslavia have failed to agree on a leader, and the collective presidency is mired in discord. The evolving democracy is now in danger of being ambushed by military rule and occupation.

I call upon the government to respect the democratic wishes of the people who live in Slovenia, Croatia and Macedonia and to be prepared to recognize whatever form of government they choose.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, after Switzerland and the United States, Canada is the oldest federal system in the world.

Great nations are not built on a foundation of common language or common territorial boundaries, but rather by people who have done great things together in the past and who intend to do great things together in the future.
