SAILOR'S GENEROSITY.

(From the Sailor's Magazine.) The following is a touching instance of the generous feeling by which seamen are actuated...

"You will be obliged to disrobe that woman, she does her work so badly," said Captain R. to the steward of the Sloop's Home, one day.

"I suppose I shall," answered the steward. "I took her in from pity."

"From pity? Who is she, and what is she?" "She is a poor Irish woman, just arrived in this country; her husband died a few months ago, and left her a widow, with six young children. She has left them in Ireland, and come over here to find employment to earn enough, if possible, to bring them over; such is her story, and she seems honest enough."

"Well, show her how to do her work and keep her while, till we know more about her."

"She was modest, diffident and retiring, little disposed to be communicative, and with little appearance of energy of character."

"You have left your children in Ireland, I understand?" said the Captain, approaching her.

"I have all of them, the dear ones."

"How old are they?" "The oldest little girl was thirteen and a half when I left her in care of them all, and the youngest, sweet one, was a little more than two."

"How long since your husband died, and how have you supported them since?"

"My husband died about four months before I left Ireland, poor man, and left us in a little cottage, and not half of a quarter of an acre of land; and the rent was twenty-five shillings a year. I put the land into potatoes and garden vegetables for the support of the children; but that was little you see, after paying the rent. I thought I should be obliged to take them to the poor house, so I says what I thought to the children; but Johnny says to me—that is the second one, dear boy—'O dear mother, do not send us to the poor house, for ye see they will not let ye come with us, and we shall be separated from you; and the white swelling in there, and many of the children dies; but do, dear mother, leave us here to get along as well as we can, while you go to America; and it may be, mother, with God's blessing, ye may be able to fetch us all over at last, if it be but only one at a time.' And so the child was teasing me day and night to come to America; so I wrote a letter to my two sisters in New York, the one at service, the other married, for the loan of a few pounds to fetch me over; and they sent me six pounds; and I left the younger children asleep when I came away, for I knew, sir, if I parted from them awake, they would cry so after me it would break my poor heart."

"The Irish mother toiled on, after this conversation, for weeks, and even months, doing her work better and better, remitting every cent of her wages, often in advance, to her children, and receiving in return from them letters, from which we give a few extracts:

"DEAR MOTHER.—Soon after you left us, the landlord, seeing we could not pay the rent, took the bed, and the bedstead, and the table, and the chairs, and left us only the blankets, and the straw on the ground; but I hope you will return him thanks, and his family, in your next letter, for giving the house gratis to us this present year."

"Dear Mother.—The price of meal here is one shilling and sixpence; and the worst of flour the same; in regard of the prices being so high, that we deferred to pay their demands for rent, &c., which you had mentioned in your letter, until the next time you write. Catherine bought no shoes since you left home; in like manner, she would want by some clothes for the children. Dear mother we must buy the thing, too, for if we do not see in the mountains, or in any other place, gathering sticks, we will be summoned. Dear mother, I hope you will send for myself, that is Johnny, as soon as you can, if you think I would be of any benefit to you there."

"The mother with her Irish heart almost crushed with the thought, that although nearly a year had passed, not enough money had been saved to pay the passage money of the first child, was about resolving to go back and starve with her children in Ireland. But, by a good Providence, she was in the Sailor's Home—her case reached the ears of sailors. The distance from a sailor's ear to his heart is short, from his heart to his pocket shorter. A subscription was started among the boarders, and raised at once to sixty dollars; increased a few days afterwards, by another set of boarders to one hundred dollars, and by a loan from her relatives and an advance of her wages to one hundred and forty dollars, sufficient to provision and pay the passage of the whole six."

"The second Sabbath in November, in the morning, one of the runners of the house made his appearance before the door with six tiny clad, bare-headed and bare-footed Irish children. The meeting of mother and children was a meeting of Irish hearts; they laughed and cried all at once, and all together. The first burst of joy over, Coron water, hair-brush and comb did all that a mother's love and ingenuity could do to improve the condition and appearance of the young voyagers. At evening she might be seen in her little room, by a cheerful light, and with a more cheerful heart, gazing into the face of one and then another of her sleeping children, as they lay in pairs in different beds about the room."

"This is the first place I came to in America," said she, "and this is the happiest hour I have seen. By the blessing of God, and the kindness of the sailors, God bless them all their days, we are all here in America." The children want shoes and clothes, and the older ones employment. If we can get the latter we will soon have all the rest.

"That I will," cried the affectionate little girl, climbing his knee, and flinging her fair arms around his neck, and kissing him. "Yes, dear brother, I will be your eyes," and blind Arthur's sister kept her word.

"Jane, and Jane, you shall do more," answered her brother, in a tone of solemnity, "you shall read the word of God to me; you know you can read nicely, and you must be instead of eyes to poor blind Arthur now."

"That will," cried the affectionate little girl, climbing his knee, and flinging her fair arms around his neck, and kissing him. "Yes, dear brother, I will be your eyes," and blind Arthur's sister kept her word.

It is a pretty sight to see her leading him about the grounds of Ross Cottage, singing, her hymns, or listening with deep attention while he speaks to her of holy things, of that blessed Saviour who, "came to be a man and die," that man might be redeemed and live forever, of that happy place where light shall dawn upon his eyes, more brightly and gloriously than dawn upon their earthly beams were quenched in darkness. Yes it is on every flower, turning with fraternal yet pious fondness, her thoughts towards heaven, as towards her proper home. When, however, the blue sky is overclouded, and the twin return to the house, Jane in her turn becomes the teacher, and gives her dear brother her latest lesson on the piano, which she newly acquired ear for music, and rapidly expanding powers of memory led him to retain.

Little Jane, indeed reaps the fruits of all her labours of love. She is storing her mind with useful and entertaining knowledge, and improving all the talents she is exerting to please Arthur, and he, the blind and solitary one, thus thrown upon her care and kindness, does he not love his young but faithful guide? Oh, yes! for when his giddy companions forsake his society for ruder sports, Jane is still waiting at his side, to cheer and amuse him. Sometimes she teaches him to knit, or makes him guess the flowers of which the nosegay is composed she has gathered for him. It is curious to hear how exactly he names them, guided by his exquisite touch.

But there are holier moments when the world fades from his mental eyes, and his thoughts soar upwards, towards another higher state of being; moments that atone for all his deprivations, when all his sufferings are lost in joy. The other day, his sister was reading to him the tenth chapter of St. Mark's gospel, which contains the account of our Lord's giving blind Bartimeus sight, and with artless simplicity remarked, "Oh, that he were here, dear Arthur, to restore your sight!"

"He is here, dear Jane," replied the beavereyed, yet happy Arthur, wiping the tears from off her young fair face. "He is with me," for darkness is no darkness with him; and he has turned mine into "noonday." For though my mortal eyes are quenched in night, they shall yet behold him in his beauty, at the resurrection of the just. Then weep not for me, dear sister, 'for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth sometimes.'"

THE TEMPTATION OF RICHES.

(From the Banner of the Cross.) A wanderer from our mother-land, to improve his circumstances, "settled" in one of the most fertile counties in lower Virginia, purchased a small farm, and by the "sweat of his brow" acquired a comfortable subsistence. A member of the Church, it was his privilege "gladly to give of the little" of his worldly goods. On one occasion he contributed to a benevolent object (much to the surprise of the applicant) fifty dollars. By the death of a relative in England, he became possessed of a large fortune—and was soon after applied to in behalf of the same object. After much hesitation he presented the applicant with one dollar, which elicited expressions of reprobation. "The truth is this my friend," said the donor, "when I had but little I had the disposition to give much, but now that I have much, I am disposed to give but little."

BLIND ARTHUR. (From the Lathan Standard.) "Mamma, when shall I see the light of heaven again?" asked Arthur Brandon, turning as he spoke, his sightless orbs upon his mother's face, although her dear features were no longer perceptible to his darkened vision. Tears filled Mrs. Brandon's eyes, who had long expected, long dreaded, to meet this natural question. Arthur's aunt quitted the room to conceal her emotion: his little Jane laid her curly head upon his knee, and sobbed as if her heart would break. "Mamma, you do not answer me," continued the youth, "but I can hear you weep; poor little Jane is crying too. I perceive you yield, yet dread to speak the truth. Mamma, I will spare you that pain, I will tell it myself: I shall never see again!"

These sad words were spoken in a tone of calm resignation, which proved that the youthful sufferer had already armed his mind with fortitude to sustain the calamity that had overshadowed the morning of his days.

"Arthur, dear Arthur," replied Mrs. Brandon, seating herself beside the invalid, and tenderly taking his hand, "it would be useless and cruel to deceive you; for yours is, alas! a hopeless case. I have had every advice upon it that money or friendship could procure, but every application has been made in vain. I have hitherto been silent on the subject, because I still flattered myself that an operation called couching might possibly restore your precious eye-sight. Yesterday that hope faded forever, when Mr. Guthrie, the most skillful oculist in London, communicated to me the sad fact, that the fever has totally destroyed the visual organs. But, oh, my son, despair not the chastening of the Lord, neither be weary of his correction; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, even as the father the son in whom he delighteth."

"These are the verses you have often repeated to me to reprove my querulous impatience during the fever," rejoined Arthur. "Ah! dear mamma, I have often thought upon them since then; indeed, they have been to my mind what medicine has been to my body; and now I can say with truth, 'Thy will, O Lord! not mine be done.'"

These pious words fell like balm upon the wounded heart of the afflicted mother, and at once relieved her mind from the anxiety that had been pressing upon it during many weeks of care. She uttered a fervent thanksgiving; and then wiping the holy tears of maternity from her face, turned to her sightless boy and said, "Arthur, my dear, dear Arthur, you do not know how happy your patient resignation to the Divine will has made your poor mother. I would not as this moment, exchange my blind son for any son in Christendom."

"I shall never see your kind face again," replied the blind boy, in a mournful tone, a sudden shade of sadness passing over his expressive features; "nor little Jane's sweet, sunny smile, I who loved to look upon you both so dearly! How I used to laugh when the breeze played among my sister's fair tresses, like the wind when it waves the ripening corn! Ah, Jane, I shall never fling off your bonnet and ruffle your golden curls for my sport again!"

"But Arthur, you will love me still,—won't dear Arthur, I will tell you stories, and do all I can to amuse you."

"Jane, and Jane, you shall do more," answered her brother, in a tone of solemnity, "you shall read the word of God to me; you know you can read nicely, and you must be instead of eyes to poor blind Arthur now."

"That I will," cried the affectionate little girl, climbing his knee, and flinging her fair arms around his neck, and kissing him. "Yes, dear brother, I will be your eyes," and blind Arthur's sister kept her word.

For though my mortal eyes are quenched in night, they shall yet behold him in his beauty, at the resurrection of the just. Then weep not for me, dear sister, 'for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth sometimes.'"

"He is here, dear Jane," replied the beavereyed, yet happy Arthur, wiping the tears from off her young fair face. "He is with me," for darkness is no darkness with him; and he has turned mine into "noonday." For though my mortal eyes are quenched in night, they shall yet behold him in his beauty, at the resurrection of the just. Then weep not for me, dear sister, 'for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth sometimes.'"
